Avtar Singh Bhasin (b.1935) B.A. (Hons) and M.A in History. He had a short stint of service with the National Archives of India and the Ministry of Defence before joining the Ministry of External Affairs in 1963, where he served for three decades retiring in June 1993 as Director (Historical Division). He was posted in the Indian Missions in Kathmandu, Bonn, Vienna and Lagos. He travelled extensively within and outside the country in the discharge of his duties in the Ministry. He was a member of several official, ministerial and Prime Ministerial delegations for discussions with various countries.

He took to academic studies after retirement in 1993. He was Senior Fellow at the Indian Council of Historical Research from 1994 to 1996, an Honorary Fellow at the Institute of Contemporary Studies of the Nehru Memorial Museum and Library from 1996 to 2000. He attended several seminars and contributed research papers at these dialogues. He has also published several articles on South Asian affairs in newspapers and journals.

His main focus has been documenting India's foreign relations, a task that had not been attempted in the past more than sixty years. His first work was a two-volume study of India-Nepal-China Relations: 1947-92, later expanded and updated to Five Volumes covering the period up to 2005. His second contribution was the documentary study of India-Bangladesh Relations, first published in two volumes covering the period 1971 to 1994, and then updated and expanded to Five Volumes covering the period up to 2002 and published in 2003. The success of these two studies encouraged him to undertake a third one, a study on Sri Lanka, also in Five Volumes which was published under the title “India-Sri Lanka Relations and Sri Lanka's Ethnic Conflict—1947-2000.”

In the golden jubilee year of the Indian independence, 1997, he wrote 75 pieces for the Asian Age which were published consecutively from June 1 to August 14, 1997 every day as a throwback to the tumultuous days of 1947, to refresh the memories of the older generation and inform the younger generation of the sacrifices, trials and tribulations and travails through which the people had to go through, before independence. Subsequently, these articles were published in the book-form under the title “Some Called it Partition, Some Freedom”.

Returning to the subject of Sri Lanka, he published a new book in 2005 under the title: “India in Sri Lanka: Between Lion and the Tigers”, highlighting the Indian role in attempting to resolve the Sri Lankan imbroglio. This book was published both in India and Sri Lanka.

In 2012 he published a Ten Volume Documentary Study on INDIA - PAKISTAN RELATIONS covering the period 1947 to 2007.

Also in 2012 he published a documentary study under the title “ASEAN – INDIA: Progress & Prosperity” to coincide with the 20th Anniversary of the ASEAN – INDIA Commemoration Summit, held in New Delhi in December of the same year.

He separately edits and publishes an annual series under the title “INDIA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS” which showcases the documents bearing on India's foreign relations. Starting with 2002, so far ten volumes, covering the period up to 2011 have been published in cooperation with the Public Diplomacy Division of the Ministry of External Affairs.

This is the 11th volume in the series INDIA’S FOREIGN RELATIONS, published annually in cooperation with the Public Diplomacy Division of the Ministry of External Affairs. It is a showcase for the documents bearing on India’s foreign relations during the course of a given year.

In the past, we published the documents both in a printed volume and in the e-book format. Keeping with the international trend of producing e-books, this volume is now being presented this year only in the electronic version. If this experiment with the e-book is successful, we propose to continue with this practice in future as well. This not only saves on paper and therefore a greener option, it is convenient and cheaper on transport, particularly when the book has to reach the far and wide located diplomatic missions of the Ministry of External Affairs.

As far as the format of the book is concerned, it follows the trend set in the earlier years. The documents have been arranged thematically and region-wise and then put across chronologically. Those documents which do not fall in any particular category or deal with multiple subjects or more than two countries have been placed in the General list with cross referencing wherever considered necessary.

As in the past I have extensively used the facilities of the Library of the India International Centre. I am grateful to Chief Librarian S. Majumdar and his colleagues Shafali and Rajiv for their ready help all the time, which greatly facilitated my work.

In the selection of the documents that have gone into the making of this compendium or in adding footnotes or for the introduction, I have been guided by the experience gained by me during the three-decade of my service with the Ministry of External Affairs in various capacities. The experience gained in the production of the earlier volumes in this series too has been of great help. If, however, still some deficiencies or shortcomings are noted in the book, I hold myself entirely responsible.

INTRODUCTION

Indian Foreign Policy in the year 2012 remained, as in the past, an enabling instrument for securing a peaceful and tranquil environment for the transformation of its society and economy. How the world grows and develops, is of vital importance to India, since it has to navigate the shoals that may cross its path and find the appropriate channels for safe and rapid voyage to reach the desired destination. To keep pace with the new emerging trends in global politics, where countries have gathered together to form regional and intra-regional groups to deal with the new and tortuous problems of security, climate change, trade and investment, India increasingly plugged itself in to those groupings for a constructive and productive dialogue. While doing so, it continued to attach the same importance, as in the past, to the bilateral route in promoting relations in its periphery and beyond.

The Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN) in Southeast Asia has emerged a strong and successful force of ten countries. It is the new co-prosperity region of Asia. Its various off shoots have taken care of the all-round and multi-faceted development of the region including the complex problems of security and piracy. In the last two decades, India has developed a cozy and beneficial relationship with the ASEAN as a dialogue partner at various levels. Over the last ten years, the ties between them have matured into Summit level dialogue. India now interacts with the grouping in most of its activities including trade and investment, security and defence, piracy, science and technology, environment, education and culture, tourism etc.

To celebrate two decades of sectoral dialogue and ten years of Summit level engagement, India had proposed to the ASEAN a Summit level Commemorative Conference in New Delhi. The enthusiastic response that the invitation from the Prime Minister received from member states echoed the mutuality of interest and commitment to the relationship that has evolved over the years. Nine of the ten Heads of Government of the ASEAN countries and the Vice President of the tenth member, the Philippines, responded to Dr. Manmohan Singh’s invitation and graced the Commemorative Summit in New Delhi in December 2012. The presence of such a large galaxy of high dignitaries together on one platform in the capital city of India, with our Prime Minister, was a high water mark in India’s foreign relations. It not only strengthened the bonds of friendship between India and the ten ASEAN nations but also marked a paradigm shift in India’s Look East Policy. This highlighted the intrinsic links that have existed through the centuries between India and the countries of the Asia-Pacific region and also a tribute to our enterprising ancestors who created through the passage of time a most wonderful matrix of mutually enriching culture and mutually reinforcing bonds. This created a new urge to assiduously promote people-to-people relations with the Southeast Asian countries.

The Indian Ocean is central to India’s geography, climate, economy and its security. At the same time, it is also a region of growing global strategic attention. India continues to make efforts that the Indian Ocean emerges as an uncontested region, able to cope with piracy or instability whether on its own or in partnership with the littoral states. India has not only developed robust bilateral economic and security relationships in the region, but also through initiatives like Indian Ocean Naval Symposium and the IOR-ARC, sought to promote comprehensive economic cooperation.

III

SOUTH ASIA

Nearer home, in our immediate neighbourhood, South Asia, India has been driven by the vision of encouraging regional integration to bring about peace and prosperity for more than one and a half billion people of this region. As part of this vision, India has implemented a policy of asymmetric engagement in providing greater market access to our neighbours, which enables integration in a mutually beneficial manner. Prime Minister Dr Manmohan Singh articulated India’s vision of regional economic integration at the SAARC Summit held in Maldives in November 2011. This vision was based on enhanced intra-regional trade in goods and services, investment flows and enhanced regional transport and communication links. He announced virtual elimination of sensitive lists facilitating the export of least developed SAARC countries to India.

The creation of the South Asia Forum, the first meeting of which was hosted by India in September 2011 on the theme ‘Integration in South Asia’ was a step in the direction of moving towards a South Asian Economic Union. It enabled the engagement, for the first time, of representatives of governments, academics, civil society and business-persons on the same platform to discuss the future of SAARC. This initiative would contribute significantly to charting the future direction of SAARC.

Essentially India’s approach towards its neighbours is predicated upon the need to develop mutually beneficial relationships to ensure a peaceful, secure and stable neighbourhood. It is India’s belief that its growth should have a beneficial impact on the region. Similarly it seeks to build closer connectivity in physical and communication infrastructure to facilitate trade and communication links and enhance people-to-people interaction within the countries of the region. It is a historic moment where expectations of the peoples of South Asia have risen to a new high and fulfilling these expectations is an imperative and a challenge, which only a vibrant regional cooperation can meet.

To integrate Pakistan in this historic process has been a challenge for New Delhi. Reducing trust deficit between New Delhi and Islamabad has been the constant endeavour of the Prime Minister. Trust is a two-way street. India, has constantly sought Pakistan's cooperation in this onerous task. Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh met President Asif Ali Zardari in April 2012 when he stopped over in New Delhi on his way to Ajmer Sharif for a pilgrimage. (This was in follow-up of the Prime Minister's initiative in meeting Prime Minister Yusuf Raza Gilani in Mohali in March 2011, on the sidelines of the India-Pakistan cricket match.) This enabled the two leaders to discuss the entire gamut of bilateral relations. In August, Prime Minister Met Pakistan President Zardari on the sidelines of the NAM Summit in Tehran. In September, the External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna visited Islamabad and held wide ranging talks with Pakistan's Foreign Minister and other leaders. The EAM's visit led to the making of travel between the two countries easier. New Delhi hopes that there will be a reciprocal response to these initiatives from Pakistan, since one-sided efforts cannot reduce the trust deficit between the two neighbours created after the frosty bite of 2008. (The victory of Nawaz Sharif in the May 2013 elections holds out that hope)

Engagement between Pakistan and Afghanistan holds the key to peace in the region and is of profound interest to India. India naturally has a vital stake in their stability and progress. With Pakistan, as pointed out above, New Delhi continued its efforts to seek a peaceful, cooperative and normal relationship. Afghanistan's future after the NATO withdraws bulk of its forces in 2014 and hands over the security of the country to the Afghan National Security Force continues to engage the attention of India. During the year, New Delhi and Washington had close consultations and coordination. India envisions a stable, democratic and prosperous Afghanistan, but it can only be realised by the people of Afghanistan with the help and support of friendly nations. India will continue to work towards extending that support to Kabul. India believes that Afghanistan's regional economic integration within South Asia and beyond in Central Asia is important for Afghanistan's well being as well as for the expanded region's stability and prosperity.

The quest for a settlement in Afghanistan must ensure that the enormous sacrifices and efforts of the people of Afghanistan and the friendly countries that supported it in the past decade are not in vain; it must build on the progress and change that Afghanistan has experienced in the last decade; and, it must embrace all sections of Afghan society, including women and minorities. Any landlocked country's fortunes are linked with its neighbours; in the case of Afghanistan, it is even more so.
India’s commitment to Afghanistan is reflected in its Strategic Partnership Agreement of October 2011; its two billion dollars of assistance; its support for capacity building for governance, security and development; Afghanistan’s preferential access to the Indian markets and New Delhi’s efforts to improve its connectivity to the world; commitment to invest in Afghanistan’s mining sector; and willingness to use regional cooperation frameworks with the other neighbours of Afghanistan including Pakistan and Iran.

IV

EAST ASIA

The interaction between India-China, the two most populous and the two largest developing countries, attract attention beyond their borders. Relations between them and their new equilibrium hold an important key to the emerging economic and strategic landscape of Asia and, to a certain extent, the world. India’s relations with its northern neighbour are on a standalone basis and are not determined by extraneous factors or relations with any other country.

India and China are among the societies and economies in the world that are transforming themselves most rapidly. The two countries are building a strong domestic economic base and rapidly training scientific and technical manpower. They share a common geopolitical space and similar socio-economic aspirations for themselves. Asia and the developing world have witnessed a greater accretion of relative economic power following the financial crisis of 2008. In Asia, larger economies like China, Japan, India, South Korea and Indonesia, all members of the G-20, have increased their ability to influence economic outcomes. That the BRICS process, in which both are active players, has also gained ground in recent years is a welcome development. Similarly the two also interact on the RIC (Russia, India and China) platform, which provides an additional forum for assuring each other of their goodwill, and provide an opportunity for demonstrating a similar outlook to international developments. The BASIC too has emerged a strong forum for leveraging and coalescing policies on the climate and environment issues, which today occupy centre stage in international politics. Equally, global issues like nuclear proliferation and cyber and space security matter to both in this globalised world as they influence their development and peace and prosperity of all.

India and China currently give the highest priority to their domestic transformation. A peaceful periphery, a stable and benign world environment and continued prosperity among their economic partners are of utmost importance to both of them. It is in their mutual interest to work together, bilaterally and with other partners, to reduce uncertainty and create an international environment that is supportive to their domestic transformational efforts because both realise that there is enough space for their developmental aspirations. In such an environment there is scope for healthy competition.

China remained India’s largest trading partner in 2012 with a total trade turnover of $66 billion. There is, however, the factor of trade imbalance. China is seized of this problem and hopefully would offer greater access to Indian manufactured and agricultural products to create a near balance in their trade. The process of strategic economic dialogue on regular basis, initiated between the two countries would help to streamline the business engagement between them. Nevertheless the two-way trade is targeted to touch 100 billion dollar mark, in the next few years. The people to people contacts are on the increase. The number of Indian students in China is around 7000. The exchange of youth delegations between the two, which is a recent phenomenon has given new impetus to their relations. The exchange of scholars at the level of think tanks offers opportunities to peep into the thinking of policy makers in the two countries and understand the rationale of their actions in perspective.

At the political level, boundary question defies easy solution, despite 15 rounds of talks between the designated Special Representatives. There is awareness of the complexity of the problem on both the sides. The existence of the various instruments to resolve any misunderstanding that might arise from time to time on the boundary question is a healthy sign of mature relationship. The signing in January 2012 of the Agreement for the Establishment of a Working Mechanism for Consultation and Coordination on India – China Border Affairs is the latest addition in this series. The visit of the Chinese Defence Minister to India in September provided another opportunity for the two Defence Ministers to pledge to enhance and maintain peace and tranquillity in the border area, and carry the military-to-military relations to an advanced stage. (The peaceful resolution of the face off that took place in April 2013 in Ladakh underlined the strength and utility of the mechanisms in place).

Similarly there are hopeful signs of China offering to cooperate on the question of use of the Brahmaputra waters, a vital matter particularly for India, the lower riparian. There is already a Memorandum of Understanding between the two signed in 2005 on provision of “Hydrological Information on the Sutlej/Langqen Zangbo River in Flood Season”, by China to India to tackle floods and other natural disasters on the Indian side. Additionally it was agreed at that time that the two sides would discuss further the possibility of providing hydrological information during flood season in respect of two more rivers. (The agreement in May 2013 on the Brahmaputra during the visit to New Delhi of the new Chinese Premier Li Keqiang is a step in the fulfilment of that process).

Security is an issue of great importance for both the countries and they have to strive together for inclusive Asian security architecture, since it is the common concern of the region in which both live. The two are already tied together in several multilateral arrangements in partnership with other countries in Asia to achieve this cooperation. Chief among them are the Asian Regional Forum and the ASEAN Defence Minister's Meeting Plus (ADMM+) in which both are members. The theme of Asia-Pacific stability found echo during the visit to New Delhi of the Chinese Defence Minister in September when the two sides proclaimed their decision to work together to maintain peace and stability of the Asia-Pacific region, promote port calls by naval ships of the two sides and conduct joint maritime search and rescue exercises. The two sides decided to further enhance and strengthen cooperation between the naval forces of both sides in counter piracy operations in the Gulf of Aden and off the coast of Somalia. It was also agreed that the two armies would strengthen exchanges in personnel training, academic research and promote cooperation among educational institutions of the armed forces. These are major confidence building measures and should go a long way in ensuring friendlier relations between the defence forces of the two countries.

Communication and dialogue at various levels will ensure the robustness of India–China bilateral relations. The dialogue has to be at more than one level and not just at the government level. This process must embrace media, business, culture, education, science and technology exchanges, communications, linkages among the experts in various disciplines to exchange the latest developments and sharing the new knowledge to grow together.

The Prime Minister and the Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao made use of opportunities offered by the multilateral gatherings to maintain personal contacts and discuss bilateral and other issues during the year. They met in Rio de Janeiro in June on the sideline of the Rio+20 Summit and again at Phnom Penh in September on the margins of the ASEAN Summit. In February the External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna visited Beijing and his Chinese counterpart paid a return visit in March. The External Affairs Minister had another opportunity in June to visit Beijing, where he attended the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation meeting. The BRICS Summit in March brought the Chinese President Hu Jintao to New Delhi, where he and Prime Minister together, after a bilateral meeting, declared the year 2012 the “Year of India-China Friendship and Cooperation”, and while discussing the India-China boundary agreed to continue to work on the current special representatives mechanism and maintain peace and tranquillity on the borders and pledged to “push the Sino-Indian strategic cooperative partnership to a new level”. All these contacts at various levels portend a friendlier relationship in the coming years with a new leadership taking over in Beijing in 2013.

The annual Summit level talks with Japan got postponed due to the sudden announcement of the general elections in that country. However, interaction at other levels continued with full vigour to emphasize the robust health of their relations. In January, the Coast Guards organisations of the two countries held consultations. In February the two foreign offices held their annual discussions on bilateral and regional issues. In March, the two countries along with the United States met for the trilateral dialogue. The Japanese Foreign Minister visited New Delhi in April, and in the same month, the Second India–Japan Government-Business Policy Dialogue took place in New Delhi. Two rounds of talks on Energy issues were held in April and October. An important round of talks was the 2+2 Dialogue (between the defence and foreign secretaries of the two countries) which was in October.

CENTRAL & WEST ASIA

India’s civilizational bonds with Central and West Asian countries have over the years resulted in warm and friendly relations among them. India was one of the first countries to open diplomatic missions in all the five capitals of the Central Asian Republics, which emerged independent after the collapse of the Soviet Union. There has been extensive programme of exchange of visits by the leaders of India and the Central Asian countries. India’s policy has been marked by deepening relationships based on political, economic and technical cooperation as a partner rather than a mere contender for the region’s vast oil and gas resources.

India shared its experiences and expertise, built capacities and focused on training through the ITEC and other assistance programmes. India’s cultural heritage is deeply rooted in the Eurasian past. Indian traders and travellers actively traded along the Silk Route and Buddhism flourished across the vast Eurasian steppe. History is full of friendly interactions between India and Central Asia, through movement of people, goods and ideas, including spiritual interfaces that enriched both.

India’s trade with the Republics is at a relatively low level of around 500 million US dollars because of the limited land connectivity and the limited size of the Central Asian markets. India is now looking intently at the region through the framework of its ‘Connect Central Asia’ policy, which is based on pro-active political, economic and people-to-people engagement with Central Asian countries, both individually and collectively.

The interaction with the Central Asian countries has to factor in the challenge of rebuilding Afghanistan. A cooperative approach for embedding Afghanistan into a more meaningful regional economic and security framework would benefit the entire region. One way is to work towards converting Afghanistan into a hub for trade and energy, connecting Central and South Asia. The landmark agreement for the construction of the TAPI (Turkmenistan-Afghanistan-Pakistan-India) pipeline has put the spotlight on the importance of Central Asia for India’s future energy plans which would also greatly benefit Afghanistan. Central Asia’s desire for diversifying hydro-power and energy export routes would correspond with India’s quest for diversifying imports. India will be keen to invest in setting up downstream production facilities, instead of exporting raw materials out of the region through expensive pipelines. The approach could differ from those seeking exclusively to pump out Central Asia’s riches.

On the continuing impasse in Syria, India stood by the United Nations and supported the Resolution 2043 with “the expectation that UNSMIS will implement its mandate impartially, objectively and fairly and help the Syrian parties to build on the ceasefire and commence an inclusive Syrian-led political process that will meet the legitimate aspirations of the Syrian people”. The resolution is based on the 6-point Kofi Annan plan incorporating the understanding signed by the Syrian Government and the UN on April 19, 2013. The plan obligates both the Syrian Government and the Opposition groups to abide by it (Kofi Annan plan).

AFRICA

With Africa, India has historic relations. The Indian independence movement started in Africa after Mahatma Gandhi found himself stifled and suffocated under the apartheid rule of the Europeans. Thereafter there has been no looking back. India did not rest with its own freedom and took up the cause of African independence soon after its own independence. New Delhi is now engaged with Africa in more than one way, particularly in building and developing its manpower resources.

During the year India condoled the passing away of some senior African leaders such as the President of Ghana, Prime Minister of Ethiopia, and the President of Malawi. The maturity with which these countries handled the transition in a peaceful manner, created the confidence in the robustness of their democratic institutions. At the same time, New Delhi expressed its concern at the rapidly deteriorating situation in Mali and reiterated its support to efforts being made by the African Union and ECOWAS towards restoration of constitutional order. India too hoped that peace would return to Cote d’Ivoire and Democratic Republic of Congo.

There are at present more than 6,500 Indian soldiers under UN Peace Keeping Operations in Africa’s hotspots, including the Democratic Republic of Congo, Liberia, Sudan, Cote d’Ivoire. Despite causality suffered by the Indian soldiers in Congo and elsewhere, India remained committed to playing its role in ensuring safety to the people as well as strengthening humanitarian assistance programmes in Africa. India has also contributed US $2 million to AMISOM for its operations in Somalia.

The African continent has emerged the second fastest growing region in the past decade. Between 2000-2010, six of the 10 fastest growing economies were in Africa. India enjoys close and friendly relations with all the countries of Africa individually and through their Pan-African Organisations—African Union, African Development Bank, ECOWAS. India is one of the cooperating partners of COMESA, the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa and Southern African Development Community (SADC).

India has undertaken special programmes for Africa’s faster development under the rubric of the two India - Africa Forum Summits—the first held in 2008 in New Delhi and the second in 2011 in Addis Ababa. The Delhi Declaration and the Addis Declaration together defined the future roadmap for cooperation between India and African countries particularly in the areas of technology transfer, economic cooperation and capacity building. This new paradigm of cooperation aims at building upon the historical trust, goodwill and political engagement between India and Africa to create a modern functional partnership for mutual benefit.

During 2012, President Smt. Pratibha Devisingh Patil paid the state visits to Seychelles and South Africa. India was honoured by the visits of Presidents of Mali and Burundi; and Prime Minister of Mauritius. Apart from these, several high level visits were exchanged between India and African countries. India and Africa share the mutual desire to expand economic cooperation and trade and investment linkages between them. India-Africa trade crossed US $65 billion in 2011-12. India’s unilateral non-reciprocal Duty Free Tariff Preference Scheme (DFTP) for LDCs announced at the time of the first India - Africa Forum Summit in 2008 significantly contributed to the ability of African LDCs to access the growing Indian market and contributed to the complementarity in their export baskets.

To give further push to their economic relations, 115 Letters of Credit of the value of US $5.2 billion have been extended to African countries in the last decade. Africa has also effectively utilized concessional Lines of Credit offered by India for supporting the development of its infrastructure, industry and capacity building. Some of the projects executed and under execution include setting up of tractor assembly plant (Benin), rural electrification (Ghana, Burkina Faso), low cost housing, setting up of textiles project (Angola), Cassava plantation (Cameroon), hydro electric projects (Central African Republic, Burundi, Rwanda), development of Sugar industry (Ethiopia), renewal of urban transport system (Cote d’Ivoire), Setting up cement plants (DR Congo, Djibouti), Energy transmission (Eritrea, Mali). This list is not exhaustive but just an indicative one of projects undertaken by India under lines of credit. India’s efforts in Africa are directed at capacity building, infrastructure development, promotion of trade and industry and value addition/beneficiation.

As part of Joint Action Plan approved under the Framework for Cooperation of the India-Africa Forum Summits, India has been regularly organising familiarisation visits and training programmes for journalists from Africa as well as visits of Indian journalists to Africa. Overall from 2009 to 2012 India has hosted nearly 90 journalists from Africa and trained another 45 African journalists. The "INDIAFRICA: A Shared Future" programme is a dynamic platform to exchange ideas about emergent realities.

In the last few years, India-US relations have sustained an unprecedented level of bilateral engagements from strategic bilateral talks to trilateral involving a major East Asian country, Japan. Since the signing of the civil nuclear energy cooperation agreement, there is now enhanced cooperation in non-proliferation and nuclear security, besides deepening cooperation in counter-terrorism and intelligence cooperation. The launch of Homeland Security Dialogue in 2011 was an important initiative from India’s point of view, considering India lives close to the epicentre of terrorism. It was in this context that India had welcomed the elimination of Osama bin Laden “as a significant step forward” which hopefully dealt a decisive blow to Al Qaeda and other terrorist groups.

Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai visited Washington in February to hold wide ranging talks with the US leadership on matters of bilateral, regional and global interest, including Afghanistan. India appreciated the US notification exempting from the scope of the US sanctions, the Indian financial institutions from application of the provisions of the US domestic law on energy related transactions with Iranian Central Bank and other financial institutions designated by U.S. Government, thus enabling the import by India of Iranian oil. In June, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton made a halt in New Delhi and availed of the opportunity to once again have in depth discussion with External Affairs Minister SM Krishna. In the same month India engaged the United States in the second Indo-US Dialogue on Higher Education unveiling the initiative “Connect to India”. Significantly while on the Indian side the talks were chaired by the Human Resource Development Minister Kapil Sibal, the United States delegation was led by the Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. The month of June turned out to be a very busy for India – United States relations, since that month also witnessed the Indo-US Strategic Talks in Washington. This round, on the Indian side, was led by External Affairs Minister, with the Secretary of State Clinton leading her country’s delegation.

Recognizing that the India-U.S. relations draw their strength and dynamism from shared values, the breadth and diversity of the engagement and growing links between the people of the two countries, leaders of both countries placed promotion of closer ties between the peoples, private collaborations and public-private partnerships at the centre of the Strategic Dialogue. The comprehensive regional consultations touched on nearly every region of the world.

On the margins of the Strategic Dialogue, an unprecedented number of sub-dialogues took place, including the Global Issues Forum, S&T, Joint Commission Meeting, the Counterterrorism Joint Working Group, Cyber Consultations, the Information and Communications Technology Working Group, the Women’s Empowerment Dialogue, Homeland Security Consultations and other events, besides the Higher Education Dialogue, as pointed out above. Also in June the US Defence Secretary Leon Panetta visited New Delhi for security related consultations.

The shared vision for peace, stability and prosperity in Asia, the Indian Ocean region and the Pacific region that the two countries shared, committed them to work together as well as with others in the region, for the evolution of an open, balanced and inclusive architecture. The talks reaffirmed their support for regional forums like East Asia Summit, ASEAN Regional Forum and ADMM Plus, and committed to regular consultations in this regard. The United States welcomed India’s actions to strengthen regional economic connectivity. Both sides are committed to the promotion of regional trade, transit, and energy linkages. Secretary Clinton welcomed India’s growing engagement in the Asia Pacific. They agreed to further enhance their consultations on the Indian Ocean. External Affairs Minister Krishna welcomed the U.S. interest in choosing to become a dialogue partner with the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation (IOR-ARC), and assured the United States that as the current Chair, India will take the American desire for a dialogue forward with the other IOR-ARC members.

Given the importance of Afghanistan in the promotion of peace in region, particularly in the post-2014 scenario, the two countries stressed the importance of sustained international commitment to Afghanistan "as it assumes full responsibility for governance, development and security". It was noted that both India and the United States had each signed Strategic Partnership Agreements with Afghanistan, and hence it was the responsibility of both of them to intensify their consultations "to achieve coordination and cooperation in promoting a stable, democratic, united, sovereign, and prosperous Afghanistan". India welcomed the election of President Obama for the second term in the elections held in November.
India has over the years increased its interaction with the other States in the American continent including the Caribbean. For a comprehensive review of its relations with the countries of the region, the first India, Community of American States and Caribbean (CELAC) consultations took place in New Delhi in August. It was an opportunity to discuss regional and multilateral issues aimed at, inter alia, strengthening the multifaceted bilateral cooperation between India and CELAC, coordinating responses to regional issues and addressing international challenges including UN reforms, the international financial crisis, climate change and international terrorism. The Foreign Ministers of India and the CELAC Troika expressed satisfaction at the First Meeting of the India-CELAC Troika Foreign Ministerial Dialogue after the commencement of CELAC in December 2011. The CELAC members were highly appreciative of the expanding relations between India and countries in the Latin America and the Caribbean region and reiterated their desire to work together bearing in mind each sides’ respective development priorities based on the common shared values of democracy, freedom, equality and justice.

The Brazilian President Mrs. Dilma Rousseff paid a State visit to New Delhi in March and the Canadian Prime Minister came in November. The External Affairs Minister visited Toronto in June and the Canadian Foreign Minister visited New Delhi in September just before his Prime Minister’s visit to prepare for it. The 11th meeting of the Joint Working Group on Counter Terrorism between India and Canada was held in New Delhi on 29 November 2012. The meeting took place within the framework of the enhanced interaction in bilateral relations between India and Canada, and in keeping with the desire of the Prime Ministers of India and Canada towards greater cooperation in counter terrorism matters, as set out in the India-Canada Joint Statement of 6 November 2012. The Prime Minister of Trinidad and Tobago had visited New Delhi at the start of the year in January. The Cuban Vice-Foreign Minister came in August.

EUROPE

India and Europe have traditionally maintained cordial relations and in pursuance of those relations there was interaction among them during the course of the year. India welcomed the visit of the King of Spain in October and his foreign minister in August. The Belarus Prime Minister came for a visit in November and the Deputy Prime Minister of Belgium in August. With Austria, New Delhi signed a Technology Cooperation Agreement in Shipping and Port Development. In June the German Foreign Minister held talks with the External Affairs Minister in Bengaluru, and India signed the Tax Information Treaty with Monaco. Two other important agreements were signed with Netherlands and Switzerland with a view to sharing of information on tax matters to tackle the problem of tax avoidance and fiscal evasion.
With Russia there were series of engagements at various levels. The annual Summit took place in December when President Putin visited New Delhi and signed several important agreements. The Prime Minister and the President stressed the importance of special and privileged strategic partnership between the two countries. They expressed satisfaction that the year 2012 was marked by an intense bilateral dialogue, regular top and high-level meetings and multifarious cultural activities to mark the 65th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between them. The two leaders reviewed the progress made in all important areas of cooperation, including in sectors such as energy, trade, high technology and military-technical cooperation. They noted that they shared common views on all the important issues of regional and international cooperation. President Putin’s visit was preceded by the holding of Inter-Governmental Commission meetings in New Delhi in October. One of these meetings was on Military and Technical Cooperation which on the Indian side was at the level of Defence Minister and the other at the level of External Affairs Minister. The annual Foreign Office Consultations were held in February. The 7th meeting of the India-Russia Joint Working Group on Terrorism met in April. In March the Prime Minister greeted President Putin on his election as President of the Federation. The External Affairs Minister Krishna visited Moscow in April to participate in the concluding functions to mark the celebrations of the 65th anniversary of the establishment of India-Russia diplomatic relations. In November India – Russia talks were held at the level of Foreign Secretaries of the two countries.

MULTI-LATERAL COOPERATION

India hosted two most important summits during the year—the ASEAN Commemorative Summit and the BRICS Summit. Reference has been made to the ASEAN summit above and New Delhi hopes to build its Look East Policy on the Vision Statement adopted at the end of the Conference in December. The BRICS summit laid great stress on the global governance and sustainable development; it considered solutions to finance and promote the two challenges particularly in ensuring energy and food security. It adopted an Action Plan as reflected in the Delhi Declaration. The Agreement among the Development Banks of the BRICS member countries, it is hoped would boost trade among the member countries by the use of credit offered by the member countries in their own currencies. The proposal to set up a BRICS Development Bank is now under the examination of the finance ministers, who have been tasked to report the result of their deliberations at the next summit. When setup it would be a major step forward in the evolution of the grouping.

While the India-EU Summit was held in New Delhi, the Prime Minister travelled to South America (Mexico and Brazil) to attend the Rio-20 Summit on sustainable development and G-20 Summit on global economic issues. He played an important role in the proceedings of the Rio Conference on sustainable development. Describing the Rio meeting timely since the world was facing a “serious economic crisis and political ferment”, and also because “it focuses our minds on ‘the future we want’ and how to realize it.” Prime Minister exhorted the conference to summon “the imagination to balance the costs that we will incur in the present with the benefits that will accrue to future generations”. Therefore, he said: “Economic Development, social inclusion and environmental sustainability are all equally critical as components of sustainable development. The task before us is to give practical shape and content to this architecture in a manner that allows each country to develop according to its own national priorities and circumstances.”

At the G-20 Summit he warned that the “global economic situation is deeply worrying”, since the economic recovery was faltering and even the fast growing emerging markets were slowing down. This, he said “calls for policy action on several fronts”. In a plain and straightforward looking speech at the G-20 Plenary he said “Of greatest concern at present is the uncertainty affecting the Eurozone. The sovereign debt crisis and the banking crisis now on the horizon have grave implications for the health of the entire global economy…. However, the risks of contagion in Europe remain because they reflect weaknesses in the banking sector arising from excessive sovereign debt and low growth prospects. A crisis in the European banking system can choke trade finance quite quickly, and end up choking economic growth not just in the Eurozone but in the world in general.” He therefore suggested that this “Summit needs to send a strong signal to the markets that the Eurozone countries will make every effort to protect the banking systems and the global community will back a credible Eurozone effort and response.” He said the International Monetary Fund “has a critical supportive role to play in stabilizing the Eurozone. All members must help the Fund to play this role.” Playing a positive role, he announced the Indian contribution of $ 10 billion to the IMF’s additional firewall of $ 430 billion.

Another important Summit was the 16th NAM Conference which Prime Minister attended in Tehran in August. He pointed out to the Summit that the deficit of the theme of the Conference “Lasting Peace through Joint Global Governance” was most starkly felt in “the sphere of international peace and security and in restoring just and fair economic and financial mechanisms”. He regretted that “today’s structure of global governance remain driven by the power equations of the past”. The Prime Minister was candid in telling the Summit that “they have proved inadequate in dealing with the economic and political crises of our present” day.
Situated at the strategic crossroads of Asia and astride one of the busiest sea lanes of the world, India faces many security challenges. Their defence and security are a fundamental obligation of the Government to the people of India and an essential prerequisite for its national, social and economic transformation. The Government naturally attaches the highest priority to these tasks. It seeks to advance peace, stability, friendship and cooperation in the region and beyond, and it does so with the confidence that its Armed Forces can defend the country against any threat. This confidence is based on the many steps that the Government has taken to strengthen nation's defence capabilities.

India sought to achieve its security and foreign policy goals through the use of soft power and diplomacy by scrupulously avoiding the use of any coercive power in its relations with other countries. However in a world where use of coercive power has still not been outlawed, and given the challenges from the non-state actors, and non-conventional sources there are occasions when the use of coercive power to back diplomacy becomes necessary. India not wishing to be found wanting to defend itself and in its duty to the people of India, has in the last few years, added significantly to its defence forces to protect its borders and inducted new equipment to increase their firepower more as a deterrent than as an instrument of coercion. Improved infrastructure and enhanced air mobility have added considerably to the confidence level of the security forces. To deal with multiple security challenges particularly of non-conventional variety, and from non-state actors, it is geared to deal with them especially in the cyber and space domain through the implementation of a national architecture of cyber security. India, therefore, is now capable of facing the entire spectrum of security challenges, which given its difficult neighbourhood, holds the full range of conventional, strategic and non-traditional challenges. Given the importance of energy security and the fact that India has to look for resources far beyond its borders, added a new paradigm to security dimension. India is poised for a leap in outer space domain. This will bring in its wake new challenges which possibly could assume military dimensions.

Increased engagement in neighbourhood, deepened economic and strategic obligations in the Indian Ocean and Asia-Pacific and in West Asia, membership of multilateral, regional and intra-regional agencies and grouping call for greater and newer responses from New Delhi and it cannot be found wanting in meeting these challenges. Taken together, these challenges and opportunities prompt India to gear for higher responsibilities in the coming years.

New Delhi, January 23, 2012.

External Affairs Minister (Shri S.M. Krishna): I have just spoken with the Foreign Minister of Norway in connection with the two young children currently being held in foster care by the Norwegian childcare services. I have urged him to find an amicable and urgent solution to ensure that the children are returned to the biological parents. I have also conveyed this earlier to the Norwegian charge d'affaires who met me.

Given the children’s young age, their removal from the care of the natural parents and to be placed in foster care till they turn 18 is an extreme step which should normally be taken as a last resort. The children are Indian nationals and the Government as well as their extended family have legitimate right to protect the interest of the children. Mrs. Brinda Karat also has gotten in touch with me with reference to the fate of these two children. I have assured her also that we will be taking it up with the Norwegian Government.

The problem here is that it is before a court of law. The judicial process is on in Norway. We will have to work through our Embassy, and through the parents and through the grandparents of the children that a solution is worked out to the satisfaction of the Norwegian court because now they are seized of the matter and the children are now in a foster care in Norway.

After my talks with the local Embassy and my talk with the Norwegian Foreign Minister, I have come to this conclusion that a reasonable settlement of this issue can be worked out and our anxiety is that it should be worked out at the earliest so that the children are brought back to the protective umbrella of their biological parents and grandparents.

Question: Sir, the visa term of the parents ends probably by the 8th of March. What happens then? Have you expressed concern about the fact that the parents might have to return without the children?

External Affairs Minister: Let me here emphasise that we have very cordial bilateral relations with the Government of Norway. They are willing to accommodate the Government of India to the extent possible within the limits of their jurisdiction. And if there are certain visa issues, I think it can be worked out.

Question: Mr. Krishna, from your statement it seems that you are very clearly asking for the kids to be returned to their parents’ custody, anything else is unacceptable. Custody with grandparents, is that acceptable to India? Custody with another Indian foster family, is that acceptable?
External Affairs Minister: No, I think this has to be worked out with the immediate family of the children. But in India we have a fairly legitimate institutional mechanism to protect the rights of the children and we can always use that in order to protect the interest of the children. But after my talks with my counterpart in Norway, and taking into consideration the kind of relationship we have between the two Governments, I think it should not be too difficult for us to work out an understanding.

Question: Sir, given that the case of Norway children is now in the court in Norway, what is the real possibility of working out an amicable solution? Is there any possibility or circumstances under which an amicable solution can be worked out and the kids can come back to their parents?

External Affairs Minister: The point to be noted and understood is that a court is seized of the matter in Norway, and on the orders of that court the children are in the foster care unit in Norway. Hence, when the courts are involved, we will have to work through the courts for an amicable solution.
Interview of National Security Advisor Shivshankar Menon with Kalyani Shankar for the All India Radio.

New Delhi, February 9, 2012.

Ms. Kalyani Shankar: Welcome to this programme Mr. Shankar Menon. Recently we have had another round of border talks with China. The two Special representative have had a meeting on the 15th Round. But the perception is that the 15th Round ended in a deadlock after Beijing ... China also will establish a working mechanism for consultation and coordination on the boundary issue to maintain peace and tranquility. How will this mechanism take the talks forward and also about Arunachal thing.

Mr. Shiv Shankar Menon: I am not sure how this. Well, thank you for asking me. In fact, it is a pleasure to be on your programme again. I am not sure how this impression has spread, because actually we had a very constructive and a very positive round this time in the 15th round, because we did three things. As you know, we are discussing a boundary settlement between India and China. And we had agreed originally that we would do this in three stages. We would first agree with principles which we did in 2005. Now we are discussing a framework. And finally, we will have an agreed boundary. In the framework, we have now exchanged our frameworks and we have found there are naturally, as would be expected, common elements and differences. So, we will now work on them and we will try and arrive at a common agreed framework which both the governments feel comfortable with, which will lead us towards a settlement. So that is the stage we are at. So we made progress on the framework. We also during this round, signed the agreement on a mechanism to maintain peace and tranquility in the border areas. And that I think, is a big step forward, because even if it takes time to settle the boundary itself, both sides have maintained peace along this boundary, border, it has been generally peaceful and both want to continue to do so.

Ms. Kalyani Shankar: Did the Chinese mention the Arunachal thing in your meetings?

Mr. Shiv Shankar Menon: Well, not in these terms, but you know, what we are doing is not to restate positions, not in the terms in which you mentioned that in the story. It is not our purpose to go to the Round just to state our position. We know each other’s position. But what we are doing is without prejudice to our stated position, we are exploring the possibilities of the boundary settlement, that is what we are doing. So, I am not sure really that how this impression spread. But, I think may be it is an expression, I see it positively. People are getting impatient, then it means that they want the boundary settlement.
Ms. Kalyani Shankar: Did you also discussed about the incursions, you know we have always been hearing about the incursions.

Mr. Menon: If you look at the facts on the ground, the actual situation on the border in terms of incursions and so on, is actually much better than it has been in the past. In fact, this has diminished steadily. Both sides have different perceptions of where the Line of Actual Control is. So, each side goes into the areas that they think are theirs which the other side might actually think it is theirs. But we have worked out a standard operating procedure. We have agreed means of dealing with these situations so that it does not lead to any mistakes or anything.

Ms. Shankar: What about the stapled visa?

Mr. Menon: The stapled visas, we think that we have a solution for part of the problem but we hope to remove this entirely. It is a reflection of a more fundamental issue of the status of areas. So, therefore, it is an issue which touches on sovereignty and, therefore, becomes very sensitive, and it is an issue that we hope we can continue to address and ultimately solve.

Ms. Shankar: But Arunachal, we are not willing to yield at all.

Mr. Menon: You know, A) we don’t negotiate through the media; B) there is no question that Arunachal Pradesh has been a part of India for centuries. It has elected Members in Parliament. So, I don’t think that is the issue.

Ms. Shankar: How do you see the disturbing political developments in Pakistan. Do you see early elections there, and secondly, Pakistan Prime Minister Gilani in a newspaper has said the dialogue is the only way for settlement of Kashmir issue. How is the situation on Indo-Pak border and again infiltration ..

Mr. Menon: So many questions altogether. I will tell you frankly, I am not an astrologer. I don’t know what will happen in Pakistan’s internal affairs. From our point of view, we wish Pakistan well. We would like a stable, prosperous Pakistan which at peace with itself, because for us it is important. Just as we are concentrating on our own development, our own economic development transforming India, we need a peaceful territory, we need friendly neighbours who help us to achieve this. So, we wish Pakistan well. But whether, how it will develop, what will happen, I don’t want to speculate frankly. The last thing we need to do is to become an issue in Pakistan’s internal politics. But as long as everybody in Pakistan understands that India’s approach to the relationship is to seek friendly relations with Pakistan and a friendly neighbourhood. I hope that is true.

As for the relationship itself, as you know the composite dialogue process has started up again. They are continuing to discuss the various issues at the Secretary level and we hope that we can carry that forward. The plan which has been agreed by both sides is to work towards the Foreign Secretaries’ meetings and then ultimately the External Affairs Ministers. But before that, hopefully, the Home Secretaries and Commerce Secretaries will meet. I believe that Speaker Lok Sabha is planning to visit later this month. Commerce and Industries Minister also will be visiting with a business delegation. So, things are moving steadily.

Ms. Shankar: But what do you make of Gilani’s statement that dialogue is the only, it is just a public posture or?

Mr. Menon: Well I think we have always said, both of us have always said that the only way forward is dialogue. There are no other ways, second issue that might be wider or of building a cooperative relationship.

Ms. Shankar: And what about this Mumbai .. that nothing more has been done by Pakistan so far.

Mr. Menon: Well, I think we are, naturally in touch with the Pakistanis pressing for further action against the perpetrators because not all the perpetrators have been brought to book and we do need assistance from them in terms of actually bringing all of them to book. We have asked for various things for example. Let us see whether the Pakistanis can see their way to doing these things.

Ms. Shankar: You see there is such a political atmosphere in Pakistan. Who do you talk to ?

Mr. Menon: We talk to everyone.

Ms. Shankar: The army ?

Mr. Menon: We deal with everyone, we talk to everyone, and we have the same message to all of them.

Ms. Shankar: We have signed a nuclear Indo-US nuclear agreement with much fanfare in 2008. But not much has happened on that front, you know they have to pass some law, we have to make some rules all this. The actual investment has also not come into the power sector so far. Even our own investment has not been finalized. So, what is the next step ?

Mr. Menon: Well, there are two parts of the question. One is in terms of cooperation with the US. I think the inter-governmental arrangements which are required for nuclear cooperation between India and the US, are in place. We have done all those including the arrangements and procedures, under the 123 agreement, all that the government has to do is done. The companies are now in touch with each other directly because they have to make the commercial, the technical and other understanding. Just last week, I think the Nuclear Power Cooperation of India had talks at a preliminary round of discussions with the US companies on an early works agreement where the US companies came and described what they would like to offer and what was possible. That is the first step in actually discussing these. This will take time. Frankly this is something that happens with all our partners. First the two governments set in place the framework, then within that the commercial arrangements and discussions take place. That is going on. That has actually continuing.

On the investment, we are not looking for foreign investment in the civil nuclear power sector, not at all in fact. So investment I think it will become clear once we announce the 12th Plan, the immediate investments over the next five years will become quite clear. And government as you know, is determined to build these power plants because India needs power, needs the electricity. So, the investment we hope will be forthcoming.

Ms. Shankar: In the last four years or so, many websites belonging to the government have been subject to cyber attacks. You know, even in December 15, 2009, even the NSA and then PMOs they were attacked, some e-mails were also sent. So how do you tackle that.

Mr. Menon: I think, you know we must decide what we want to protect, what we don’t protect. Websites, by definition, are meant to be open to people, otherwise, I mean you measure the success of a website by how many hits they get. You want people to come to websites. You open a website, it is like putting up a political campaign, people will draw moustache on it and put their … That is part of the risk of being out there in the public space. And this will happen to websites. Does it do real security damage to you if a website is hacked, not really. Because it is designed to be available and open to everybody. There are other things, networks which are critical to a state, to a society, which should not be attacked, which should be defended. And we in the process of putting in place the cyber architecture which allows us to defend these, whether it is in terms of creating the competences, not just within government, because most of these are either private or government and private together. So creating the competences, generating the manpower in India through the university and other systems or also to have, if necessary, the legal regulations in place, so that we can do this, so that we can defend the critical parts, networks which exist in the society.

Ms. Shankar: But when will you do that? You know people will talk about freedom of.

Mr. Menon: I think we can do this very well while maintaining freedom. We are not the only democracy in the world and there are other democracies which do it. But after all people also have a right to expect to be able to conduct a normal day to day business safely and securely. And I think that right also must be protected. I don’t think it is an infringement of anyone’s rights if you defend the ability to lead a normal life. But as I said we need to define what we defend and the levels of defence that we need a little more carefully. Websites are being hacked, and the most obvious, everybody reacts. Yes, it hurts your pride perhaps. But, what do you put on a website if you are not willing to share on the websites, then why you put it there. So I think there is definitional problem here. But it is true, it is like as I said somebody puts up a political poster, somebody else comes and paints a moustache on it. And this is the price of being out there in the public space.

Ms. Shankar: Ever since India voted on Syria, there are a lot of debate going on about why did you do it why didn’t you do it. And China and Russia join together and they have vetoed also. So, why did we do it?

Mr. Menon: Everybody on the Council except Russia and China voted for. We had three criteria which we applied. One was the original resolution as it came sounded as though it was asking for regime change in Syria. We made it quite clear that this is not for the international community or any external body to decide. Political arrangements within Syria are an issue to be decided by the Syrian people. So we got the resolution changed, we and others got the resolution changed and the final resolution actually calls for a peaceful resolution of issues through a Syrian-led political process. And that is what it calls for It does not call for regime change. Secondly, especially after the Libya experience, I think people are nervous that there would be attempts of foreign military intervention in Syria and other places. So, again the resolution was changed during the negotiations to include an explicit provision saying this does not enable foreign military intervention. In fact, no foreign military invention is . Thirdly, from our point of view and most important that all our Arab friends came to us and said that they thought this was the way forward. Once they accepted our two basic points, we worked with them to try and say how it would be done. Now, why Russia chose to veto, why China did, I think that is the question you have to ask them. We have to make a calculation based on our interests. Don’t forget, we have six million Indians in the Gulf, 63 per cent of our oil supplies come from the Gulf. We had over 35 billion dollars worth of remittances last year from this part of the world. This is important to us. For us, a peaceful resolution of all these issues, stability in the area is very important for India. And, therefore, we voted for what we thought was a way forward towards that, the best available alternative.

Ms. Shankar: On the domestic side, with the Maoists continuing to be a great concern is there a need for a relook of the Maoist and the Naxal policy because people think of India as a soft power in dealing with these people. Secondly how many modules are there now. You know, your predecessor had always said some 600 modules or something like that.

Mr. Menon: As far as review of policy, I think the basic policy sounded has shown results. If you look on the ground at the situation at the end of last year compared to the year before, you will look at, by many matrix, if you measure incidents of violence, number of people killed etc. the area under dominance or controlled or threatened, all these have shown improvement during the course of 2011 when you compare the beginning of the year and the end. So I think the basics of the policy are sound, twin track walking on two legs. On one development, the other also providing security so that there can be development and I think this twin track is correct. But naturally, how you apply it — the emphasis, the relative emphasis, how good you are at implementing it, how good the instruments of state are doing this. I think all these things you need to continue to look at. And I think it is normal that policy will be constantly reviewed in the light of experience and that you learn from experience. Number of modules .. normally modules we talk in terms of smaller terrorist groups. This is essentially a cadre-based organization with very strong military wing. And also with over-ground workers who do some of their work for them. So you have to draw a distinction between each of these and how you deal with each of them. There is no question that armed strength has to be met with.

Ms. Shankar: How many modules are there?

Mr. Menon: It is very hard to give a precise number and I don’t want to put a figure on that.

Ms. Shankar: You know, this Indian Mujahideen is of recent origin. That also must be causing so much concern for you, are you trying to check this growth of Indian Mujahideen.

Mr. Menon: Yes. We are working and I think we have had some successes recently in the past you have seen, both in Delhi and in Mumbai. And I think now that we have created not just the NIA but also we have a decision to set up NCTC, the National Counter-Terrorism Centre which was decided last month and now that we also have the NATGRID the National Intelligence which shares information on these groups, you will see the results now, more and more results in practice in the years to come. And I think it is already visible when you see what happened in Mumbai what happened in Delhi recently and the progress that we have made in dealing in these cases. I think that is proof

Ms. Shankar: But how do you go to the root of it?

Mr. Menon: I think there are three parts to this. One is, of course, social origin of how, but there will always be some individuals misguided who, now the important thing is that the society itself must quickly pick them up and isolate them. Secondly, you must be able to intelligence-base. This has to be based on good intelligence on knowing beforehand what they are planning what they are doing. So, you have to strengthen your intelligence capacity and that we have been doing steadily, we have worked on it. Thirdly, you need the capacity to actually act to isolate and that we have improved, if you look at the training of our people who are involved in counter-terrorism work. It has considerably improved compared to what it was earlier. Now, it is never perfect because the day we think we are perfect then actually everything stops. So we need to keep improving. But if you compare to where we were three years ago, it is much better.

Ms. Shankar: You know, this NTRO set up recently, and there were so many other intelligence agencies also which are reporting to different Ministries – one to Home Ministry, one to PMO. You know, there was lot of confusion about it. Do you think there is a need for a single top man to supervise all these intelligence agencies.

Mr. Menon: I think each of them has very different mandates and this is why they exist. Of course, the idea of a premier internal agency, premier external agency or separate agencies. NTRO is a technical intelligence agency. The question is how well do they work together. It is not the question of one man or two men, because

Ms. Shankar: They will not work together even in American

Mr. Menon: Whether one or more is not important. The important thing is that they must understand their own rules, they need to work together, there has to be synergy in what they produce. And that they have to be responsive to each other. And that cannot be just at one point. It has to be right through the organization. I mean, if somebody finds out something about a terrorist plot and so on, then it has to work across, you will have to work outside you will have to work inside, you will have to work everywhere. So, it is not something that. So, for me these are not these are not solutions to the issue. The real issue which needs to be dealt with is much more fundamental.

Ms. Shankar: You know, recently the Chief of Army Staff Gen. Singh met you and he had also met with Pranab Mukherjee and Salman Khursheed.

Mr. Menon: But I am not going to comment on something that is in the court. And now it is in the Supreme Court.

Ms. Shankar: But what is the way out?

Mr. Menon: I have said I am not going to comment.

Ms. Shankar: Okay. Afzal Guru's mercy Petition is still with the President.
Jammu & Kashmir Assembly they said that it should be seen favourably, when do you think the decision should come?

Mr. Menon: I can’t speak for the President.

Ms. Shankar: Here is the last question. In a recent speech you have said there is a possibility of a limited war in nucleus conditions.

Mr. Menon: I just said that one of the scenarios that people must think about is this, that is all. That was a theoretical discussion on what are the kinds of things. What kinds of deterrents are available, what kind of. I did’nt say that a limited war is going to happen, not at all.

Ms. Shankar: No, with all the instability in Pakistan are you concerned about the nuclear establishment there.

Mr. Menon: You know, we are paid to worry about many things, so we worry. And we are also paid to make sure, to the extent we can, we have to mitigate any such events.

Ms. Shankar: Because how can anybody ensure that it does not go into the hands of the Talibanis or anybody else.

Mr. Menon: As I said we are paid to worry about so many things.

Ms. Shankar: Thank you very much for being with us.

Mr. Menon: Thank you very much.

003. Address by the Defence Minister A.K. Antony at the 14th Asian Security Conference.

New Delhi, February 13, 2012.

Excellencies,
Distinguished delegates,
Ladies and gentlemen,

“At the outset, I extend a warm welcome to all the participants from the world over for the 14th Asian Security Conference organised by IDSA.

The concept of security has expanded and undergone a massive transformation to include economic progress, particularly given the direction the global economy has been taking, climate change and good governance. Such issues have assumed heightened significance for the comity of nations.

Over the years, Asian Security Conference has emerged as an ideal platform for academicians, researchers, scholars and security experts to discuss and analyse the recent trends in security across the world. The Conference is a unique opportunity to understand each other’s perspectives and identify common issues for cooperation.

Today, the global community faces common challenges in the realms of economics, geopolitics, demography, sharing natural resources, climate change and information. The impact of basic issues such as food, water, economic instability and security-related issues such as terrorism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and drug trafficking is having an impact on the dynamics of various societies and nations.

As one of the fastest growing economies of the region and a stable democratic nation, India has been and will continue to be committed towards building a peaceful, secure and economically stable Asia. However, to address such non-traditional challenges, we also need to move beyond conventional ways of dealing with them.

IDSA has been discussing these and other such issues since the first Asian Security Conference held in 1998. Late Shri K. Subrahmanyam had identified thirteen types of non-military threats to security, some of which I have just mentioned. IDSA has brought out publications on related themes, which include reports on climate change, environmental security and water security.

The themes for this year’s Conference are extremely crucial and relevant. The threat to the overall security and well-being of the people from non-traditional factors continues to pose a threat to nations in general and Asia, in particular.
With the world population putting an enormous burden on existing natural resources, competition for these resources can lead to conflicts among various countries in Asia.

Terrorism, drug trafficking, money laundering and transnational crimes are common concerns the world over. Terrorism continues to remain a grave concern to world peace and stability. Nations must draw up collective and innovative measures to counter and defeat such asymmetric threats. Weapons of mass destruction go beyond nuclear weapons. These weapons may be biological, chemical and radiological, in nature. Often, these weapons do not require sophisticated delivery systems. There is always a danger that these weapons may fall into wrong hands. Thus, nations need to cooperate with each other and draw up a comprehensive approach to evolve institutional frameworks to defeat such challenges.

Natural disasters seem to be occurring with regularity. The destruction caused by Tsunamis has killed thousands of people. Earthquakes and floods too have caused havoc in various nations. We need to develop common institutional mechanisms to deal with such disasters. Disaster management occupies an important place in our policy and must be taken down to regional and local levels in our region.

We have been trying to address such concerns for a long time. For instance, in 1982, the Ministry of Defence initiated the Ecological Task Force (ETFs) to restore degraded ecosystems. These Task Forces have been undertaking afforestation, soil conservation and water resource management techniques. India is also the only country in the world to form a ministry for new and renewable energy. We have also drawn up a National Action Plan for Climate Change and set up an Advisory Council, chaired by the Prime Minister.

Climate change too has an impact on security. It is causing floods and resulting in changes in crop yields and crop patterns. The per capita availability of water is decreasing sharply worldwide. Water is actually fast emerging as a major source of insecurity and a potential issue for conflict among nations. Thus, nations need to cooperate on sharing water and efficient water usage and harvesting and initiate collective action for preserving our common environment.

Energy is a source of competition among nations for energy demands. Energy sources like fossil fuels are required for economic growth and development. However, as fossil fuels are depleting at a rapid pace, nations and societies need to focus on alternative sources of energy to meet our needs.

Cyber security is a critical area of concern. With digitisation of world and various services, the world is becoming increasingly dependent on internet and information technology. However, security of networks has become an urgent concern, as enormous vital and critical data passes through them every day. Any breach of cyber networks can cause untold damage to the security of any society, or country. Nations must take serious and prompt note and cooperate with each other to strengthen seamless cyber security.

United Nations and other multilateral institutions will continue to play a proactive role. However, the time has come for Asian countries to set up a mechanism to take regular contact and dialogue mechanisms to the next higher level. A network of prominent Asian think-tanks to hold regular dialogues on security issues can make common recommendations to governments to help them address such challenges in an effective manner.

Peaceful coexistence and equitable development are the keys to the future and security of nations in the Asian region. I am sure that all of you will hold comprehensive deliberations on these issues and other common challenges, as well as come up with innovative and new ideas to aid planners and policy makers.

With these words, I wish all the participants, particularly from abroad, a pleasant stay in India. I wish you all the very best for your fruitful discussions at the Conference over the next three days.

Thank You. Jai Hind

New Delhi, February 14, 2012.

Dr. Arvind Gupta, Director-General IDSA,
Distinguished participants,
Ladies and Gentlemen.

Thank you for asking me to speak to the 14th Asian Security Conference on Non-Traditional Security Challenges — Today and Tomorrow. I see from your programme that you have a very distinguished list of speakers and participants and an exhaustive agenda on non-traditional security issues. I am glad that you are looking at these issues so carefully and look forward to learning from the results of your deliberations.

In the circumstances, there really is not much that I can add which most of you do not know about what you are considering.

So I thought I would share some personal thoughts on what constitute non-traditional security challenges, and then to say a few words on which ones should really concern us in India.

What is non-traditional security?

In my present job I find that two of the most abused words are “security” and “strategic”. We have, in my opinion rightly, broadened our definition of “security” over time. The very fact that we use the term “non-traditional” for security challenges makes it clear that many of these issues, such as energy, water and natural disasters, were not originally regarded as security issues. This does not mean that the issues did not exist in the past. It is no one's case that natural disasters, water scarcity and energy security did not affect mankind before the 20th century. But we include them today in our security considerations for two reasons. Firstly, our ability as societies to withstand, mitigate and adapt to the challenges of water scarcity and natural disasters sometimes appear less than before. Secondly, their consequences for our lives and societies are far greater, given our increasing dependence on complex systems in our economic, social and (to a lesser extent) political lives.

But have we taken this too far? I sometimes think that we risk being too inclusive in treating everything as a matter of security. The ultimate is the term “human security”, which reduces life and it's living to a matter of security! I am not sure that this is either helpful or useful. It is not helpful in understanding or prioritising among security challenges, and it is certainly no guide to the actions required to deal with such threats. For instance, I notice that you had a session yesterday on climate change as a non-traditional threat to security. I am not sure that thinking about climate change as a security issue really helps us to identify responses to it. Thinking of it as a scientific issue could.

From a practitioner’s point of view I find it better to distinguish between security issues amenable to the application of hard power, those less so, and those which are not. Along this continuum, non-traditional security challenges would be those that require the mixed application of hard and soft power, where solutions are not so clear as victory and defeat, and where problems mutate into more benign forms. They would also include those which do not respond to the application of hard power, such as food security.

Another similar and largely overlapping way of looking at the problem is to distinguish between zero-sum challenges and non-zero sum challenges.

Let me elaborate. Zero-sum challenges are those like terrorist threats, espionage and other state-security threats, and traditional military threats. These respond to the application of hard power. Non-zero sum challenges are those like energy, water, maritime security and others. And there are those which overlap both categories, like cyber threats, space and nuclear threats. These are domains where the combination of intent and capability mean that the nature and definition of the threat is necessarily subjective, and perception management becomes an extremely important part of both the challenge and the response.

Which ones should concern India?

It is easy to do a catalogue of all the threats that we should be worrying about. The broader our definition of security is, the longer the list of challenges. But how do we choose which ones we should worry about and concentrate our effort on?

The traditional answer is that we should concentrate on those of strategic significance to ourselves. This brings me to the second most abused word that I mentioned earlier, “strategic”. The dictionary meaning of “strategic” is of or serving the ends of strategy. And strategy is defined as the art of war, or of attaining longer term military objectives, or a long-term plan of action or policy. I assume from this that by strategic we mean of long-term and primarily military significance.

Now, not many of the non-traditional security challenges that we so blithely list these days actually meet the test of this definition. Not many of them actually serve the attainment of longer term military objectives, or are of long term military significance. They are, instead, of varying long term significance to the attainment of India’s grand strategy, the purpose of which is to transform India, so that every Indian has a fair chance of achieving his potential, untrammelled by poverty, illiteracy, and disease.

If India’s transformation is our criterion, energy security must have one of the highest priorities among the many non-traditional challenges on your agenda. Energy is the one challenge and possible future constraint on our economic growth which could limit India’s development. Besides, it is also the key to other challenges that you have listed. Water, for instance. Eighty percent of the surface of this planet is water. But it is unusable because it is salty. Given energy that problem could be solved.

My conclusions from this argument are simple. I would draw three lessons from an Indian point of view:

1. It would be useful if we were to also rank and deal with our non-traditional security challenges from this point of view, examining how they could and do affect our ability to transform India.

2. When security challenges are looked at in this manner, India’s strengths could well be in asymmetric domains – cyber, nuclear and space – which require not just (the creation and design of) capabilities but also imagination (in doctrines and uses of those capabilities).

3. Thirdly, traditional or hard security issues should not be under-estimated. There is an overwhelming need to undertake the hard power military modernisations and revolutions and internal security reforms necessary to defend our increasingly complex society and economy. We had a vivid reminder of this only yesterday in the terrorist attack on Israeli Embassy personnel in a vehicle not far from here.

With these few words I hope I have provoked a discussion or even an argument. I wish you and your conference success.

Thank you.
005. Press Release of the Ministry of External Affairs regarding External Affairs Minister's inauguration of the 50th Passport Seva Kendra.

New Delhi, February 23, 2012.

External Affairs Minister Shri S. M. Krishna today inaugurated the country's 50th Passport Seva Kendra at Herald House, ITO in the presence of Hon'ble Chief Minister of Delhi, Smt. Sheila Dikshit, Minister of State for External Affairs, Smt. Preneet Kaur, and other dignitaries.

2. 77 Passport Seva Kendras (PSKs) are being set up as part of the nationwide implementation of the Passport Seva Project with the aim of providing easier accessibility, convenience and public services to citizens in a comfortable environment using world class infrastructure. The Project has been completed in several states and by the end of February 2012, Ministry plans to make 60 PSKs ready for operational launch. Work is in progress at other sites.

3. Speaking on the occasion, the External Affairs Minister reaffirmed Government of India's firm commitment to providing timely delivery of passport services to Indian citizens. A total of 73.65 lakh passport services were rendered in 2011 through the network of 37 Passport Offices (supported by Passport Seva Kendras) and 178 Indian Missions and Posts abroad.

4. The sprawling Passport Seva Kendra at Herald House is equipped with state-of-the-art facilities for processing nearly 1000 applications per day. Two other PSKs are already operational under the jurisdiction of Regional Passport Office, Delhi at Shalimar Place and Udyog Vihar, Gurgaon. The 4th PSK will be opened shortly at the premises of RPO, Bhikaji Cama Place for augmenting facilities for passport related services. Citizens are advised to visit website www.passportindia.gov.in or 24x7 call centre (toll free No. 1800-258-1800) for any query relating to passport services.

5. The Passport Seva Project is a flagship e-Governance initiative undertaken by the Ministry of External Affairs to comprehensively overhaul the Passport Issuance System. The Project is being implemented in public-private partnership mode with Tata Consultancy Services as service provider. The Pilot Project was launched in Bangalore in May 2010 and following requisite certification, the nation-wide rollout began in June 2011. In a short time, the Project has moved from Pilot Project mode to nation-wide rollout with 50 out of 77 planned PSKs already operational across the country. The Project is to be completed within next two-three months, setting a new benchmark for project execution and delivery of public services in the country.

It is a great pleasure for me to be here today to interact with you through the platform of the Institute of South Asian Studies. In a relatively short span of its existence, the Institute of South Asian Studies has established a formidable reputation internationally as a major centre for vigorous and objective study of South Asia from a policy perspective.

2. I see many familiar faces in the audience. This, given the proximity of ties between India and Singapore, is hardly surprising. As you all are aware, our Prime Minister had visited Singapore only a few months earlier. May I say how deeply touched public opinion in India was by the installation of a Nehru Bust and Marker in Singapore and I would like in particular to thank H. E. Tommy Koh for all the initiatives he took in seeing that this idea came to fruition.

3. We are now looking forward to the visit of the Singapore Prime Minister His Excellency Mr. Lee Hsien Loong to India later this summer. I am confident and hopeful that these two high level visits within a relatively short period of time will provide a substantive content to our bilateral agenda.

4. The topic of my address today is very broad. This necessarily implies that I have to be selective. This, however, does not mean that what are not covered by me are not our foreign policy priorities. Given the focus of the Institute of South Asian Studies, I think it would be appropriate today to look at India’s engagement with our immediate and extended neighbourhood. The challenges facing our foreign policy are directly related to this process of engagement.

5. I would begin by recalling the vision of our first Prime Minister, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. During a visit to Singapore in March 1946 he had spoken of Singapore becoming the place where Asian unity is forged and had also gone on to say “In the future, the peoples of Asia must hold together for their own good as well as the good and the freedom of the world”.

6. The biggest development over the past two decades in our continent has been the evolution of the process of Asian re-integration. Our engagement with our international partners, both in our immediate and extended neighbourhood, is testimony to this phenomenon. The rising profile of India as a major economic powerhouse, and the reciprocal interest of the international community in engaging with India in a broad-based manner, has added a significant global dimension to India’s external engagement.

7. In our immediate neighbourhood of South Asia, India has been driven by the vision of encouraging regional integration to bring about peace and prosperity for the more than one and a half billion people living in this region. As part of this vision, India has been implementing a policy of asymmetric engagement in providing greater market access to our neighbours, which enables integration in a mutually beneficial manner. This is one of the most significant challenges facing our foreign policy today.

8. Prime Minister Dr Manmohan Singh articulated India’s vision of regional economic integration at the last SAARC Summit held in Maldives in November last year. This vision is based on enhanced intra-regional trade in goods and services, investment flows and enhanced regional transport and communication links. He announced virtual elimination of sensitive lists affecting exports of all least developed SAARC countries to India. New initiatives for capacity-building and to enhance the sense of a South Asian identity were also announced.

9. A significant initiative taken by India in the SAARC process was the creation of a South Asia Forum. The first meeting of the Forum was hosted by India in September 2011 on the theme ‘Integration in South Asia: Moving towards a South Asian Economic Union’. We are able to engage for the first time representatives of governments, academics, civil society and businesspersons on the same platform to discuss the future of SAARC. I am confident that this initiative will contribute significantly on charting the future direction of SAARC.

10. In our bilateral interaction with our immediate neighbours, we have sought to provide substance to this vision of South Asian integration through a number of initiatives.

11. India and Afghanistan have established a strategic partnership during the visit of President Karzai to India in October last year. Our historical and civilizational relationship with Afghanistan is being further strengthened by India actively engaging in the development and reconstruction of Afghanistan. We already committed two billion US dollars for this purpose. Afghanistan joined the SAARC community in 2010. We stand committed to help Afghanistan integrate into the regional economy of South Asia. The ambitious gas pipeline project from Turkmenistan in Central Asia to India through Afghanistan and Pakistan, known as TAPI, is an example of this vision.
12. Over the past two years, we have made major strides in reducing the ‘trust deficit’ between India and Pakistan. I hosted the Foreign Minister of Pakistan, Her Excellency Hina Rabbani Khar, in New Delhi in July last year, and plan to visit Islamabad myself this summer. We affirmed the importance of carrying forward the dialogue process with a view to resolving peacefully all outstanding issues through constructive and result oriented engagement. We agreed that terrorism poses a continuing threat to peace and security and reiterated the firm and undiluted commitment of our two countries to fight and eliminate this scourge in all its forms and manifestations.

13. We welcomed Pakistan’s efforts to normalize trade relations with India by moving from positive to negative lists, and their eventual elimination. The Prime Ministers of India and Pakistan, during their meeting in November last year, reaffirmed that people are at the heart of the relationship between two countries and that people-to-people contacts and cultural exchanges should be promoted.

14. I accompanied our Prime Minister, Dr Manmohan Singh, on his historic visit to Bangladesh in September last year. The orientation of our discussions was directed towards creating a mutually beneficial framework for raising the living standards of people of our two countries. Two historic accords and eight other bilateral documents were signed, including the landmark Framework Agreement on Cooperation and Development, widening the cooperative landscape between the two countries significantly.

15. India attaches the highest priority to further strengthening the existing co-operation with Nepal. In this spirit, India has continued close consultations with the Government of Nepal and the major political parties with a view to support Nepal’s transition to a democratic, peaceful and prosperous State. This was underscored during the visit of the Prime Minister of Nepal to India in October last year. Our two countries share a "special relationship" that has granted Nepal preferential economic treatment and provided Nepalese in India the same economic and educational opportunities as Indian citizens.

16. Many of you are familiar with the extremely close relations between India and Sri Lanka. During my visit to Sri Lanka in January this year, I had the opportunity to interact with the political leaders in that country across the spectrum. There was consensus on the increased Indian role in assisting the economic reconstruction and development of Sri Lanka, especially in the health, education, housing and infrastructure development sectors. I had the opportunity to hand over the first lot of housing units constructed under India’s assistance to the beneficiaries at Jaffna.

17. India has conveyed in no unclear terms that it is committed to the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Sri Lanka. It is our hope that the vision and leadership that resulted in an end to armed conflict will now be employed in the quest for a genuine political reconciliation. We look forward to progress in the ongoing dialogue process, in order to address this issue in a timely manner. We will continue to work with the Government of Sri Lanka to take this process forward, in a spirit of partnership and cooperation.

18. Our priorities in relations with Bhutan are similarly driven by mutually beneficial socio-economic interaction. India is committed to assisting Maldives with its development cooperation across diverse sectors. The positive role played by India during the recent political turmoil in the Maldives has been welcomed by all political parties in that country, and we are confident that the road-map that has been agreed to will enable the hard-working people of this beautiful country to soon return to their normal lives, especially in the tourism sector where a vast majority of Maldivians are employed.

19. China, as another immediate neighbour, is a priority in India’s foreign policy. We have attempted to establish a strategic and cooperative partnership with China. A stronger India-China economic relationship can make a direct contribution to the quality of life of over two billion people. China has emerged as the largest trading partner of India, and our engagement with China is now multi-faceted.

20. Naturally, as between any two large countries, there are areas of convergence as well as fields of divergence between our nations. We will continue to engage China in a constructive and forward looking manner so that both countries can achieve a win-win situation. It is true that there are some differences between our countries such as on the Boundary Question. Here we will maintain dialogue with China with the objective of minimizing such differences or bridging them.

21. Myanmar is our land bridge to the countries of the ASEAN. Today, winds of change are blowing through Myanmar. We have close political, economic and people to people ties of longstanding with Myanmar. Our relations will therefore assume even greater prominence for mutual benefit.

22. The challenges to the process of integrating the economies of South Asia cannot be understated. These challenges are rooted in geography, history and economics. However, we in South Asia have to only look eastwards towards our extended neighbourhood to see how these challenges can be successfully addressed.

23. I believe it was about a decade ago that the term “India fever” was coined in Singapore to describe the growing momentum then developing in our bilateral relations. Over the past few years our relationship with Singapore has also catalysed our relations with the whole of ASEAN. It would be therefore true to say that there is an equivalent “ASEAN fever” in India now.

24. A few weeks ago I hosted a successful exchange in New Delhi with colleagues from ASEAN on a whole gamut of issues. This was held under a platform provided by the Delhi Dialogue and we were fortunate to have present with us six Ministers from the region. The Delhi Dialogue itself is the outcome of a very fruitful relationship built up by think tanks and business organisations in Singapore and India.

25. A very large number of initiatives and projects are under discussion and are at different stages of finalisation as we move towards commemorating the 20 years of our Dialogue Partnership with ASEAN by means of a Commemorative Summit in Delhi in December this year. How do we enhance connectivity and push forward the ongoing process of economic integration are the two large questions which will form the sub-text of the Commemorative Summit.

26. The Summit takes place in the backdrop of a changing architecture in our region through the East Asia Summit (EAS) process. We recognise the centrality of ASEAN in this process. We see a wider consultative structure in place with the inclusion of United States of America and Russian Federation. As you are aware we have a strategic partnership with both the US and Russia. This underlines our multifaceted relationship with them.

27. The ASEAN-India Commemorative Year 2012 has a rather full calendar ahead including ASEAN-India Car Rally, interactive expedition of Sail Training Ship “Sudarshini” to ASEAN countries to trace traditional trade routes and holding of ‘marker events’ to reinforce connectivity between India and ASEAN.

28. The challenges to greater economic integration between us driven by sentiments of protectionism, have been addressed through the implementation of the India-ASEAN Free Trade Agreement on Goods. India and ASEAN have put in place one of the largest free trade agreements on goods. We hope that the early conclusion of a similar Free Trade Agreement in Services and investments between India and the ASEAN will significantly broaden and deepen this process.

29. In our extended neighbourhood to our west, we enjoy traditionally close political, economic and cultural linkages with the countries of the Gulf region.

30. These countries are among our largest trading partners. Our trade with Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) countries amounted to 130 billion US Dollars during the past year. Secondly, close to 50 per cent of our crude oil requirements is met by the region. Thirdly, the region hosts more than six million Indians who contribute to the economies of the region and remit significant foreign exchange back into their households in India. Accordingly, we have a vital stake in the peace and stability, and continued progress and prosperity, of the countries in the Gulf. Ensuring this is a major challenge facing our foreign policy today.

31. To our north are the countries of Eurasia, with which we have special relations based on our common civilizational heritage. The lack of appropriate communications, especially transportation, linkages with this region has acted as a major challenge for us. The proposal for a New Silk Road Initiative, which would enable the countries and more importantly, the peoples of Central and South Asia to restore the vitality of the Silk Road is, therefore, of paramount importance for us.

32. We are aware of the challenges that are pre-occupying the international community, which can adversely impact on the process of Asian re-integration. The global economic crisis, especially in the industrialized nations of the West, has thrown up challenges of constricting export markets and slowdown of inward foreign investment flows for many Asian countries, including India. The issue of climate change is crucial for the socio-economic development plans of all of us, and India is no exception to this. The continuing spread of terrorism, which has its epicentre in the Af-Pak region, is a major challenge for us.

33. However, the process of Asian re-integration has gathered momentum, and India is proud to be part of this process. By moving in a gradual and deliberate manner, Asian re-integration has enabled our economies to sustain their growth rates at a time of worrying economic problems in the older industrialized worlds of Europe and North America. In turn, our economic growth has helped lift millions of our people above the poverty line, and generated in them viable dreams of a peaceful and prosperous future.

34. It is this vision that drives India’s engagement with the world today. At the United Nations, especially as a member of the Security Council representing Asia for a two-year term since January last year, India has played a constructive role in shaping the emerging international order. Based on our experience and performance, we believe that the time has come for India to become a permanent member of the reformed United Nations Security Council.

35. India has been active in the Security Council on the issue of piracy, which is of great importance to all of us, especially in Asia. We have stressed that there is an urgent need for the international community to address the problem of hostage-taking by pirates and consequent humanitarian problems faced by the hostages and their families, and seek their quick release by whatever means appropriate.
36. India remains an active member of the Commonwealth. India provides the largest number of technical experts engaged by Commonwealth Fund for Technical Cooperation and extends assistance to developing Commonwealth countries in Africa, Asia and the Caribbean. India is also playing a meaningful role in revitalization of Non-Aligned Movement.

37. In the past decade, India has taken several initiatives to respond to the changing world around us. Revitalization of our relations with Africa is one such initiative. At the second India-Africa Forum Summit last year at Addis Ababa, we reiterated our commitment to meaningfully contribute in human resources and institutional capacity building.

38. The Pan-African e-Network Project has been commissioned in all the 47 countries that had agreed to join in the project. Under this Project, India is setting up a fibre-optic network to provide satellite connectivity, tele-medicine and tele-education for African countries.

39. Imbued with this vision, India is keen to galvanize the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation, which brings together 19 littoral states of the Indian Ocean Rim. India assumed the Chairmanship of this body at its Ministerial Meeting held in Bengaluru in November last year. I have placed emphasis on the need for building functional relationships between the Navies and Coast Guards of member States to enhance cooperation and security in the Indian Ocean Region. We have called upon member States to address issues of transport infrastructure and connectivity which hamper the growth of intra-regional trade and investment.

40. We are conscious that cooperation between states acts as a force multiplier in a fast-changing world. With this in mind, India has participated in the creation of trans-continental regional groups to maximize the way in which we can achieve our objective of sustainable development. These groups include the BRICS, which brings together Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa. India would be holding the next BRICS Summit in New Delhi at the end of this month. It serves as a useful platform for consultation and coordination, and promotes mutual trust and understanding amongst its members, on global issues.

41. Similarly, the IBSA Dialogue Forum brings together India, Brazil and South Africa, three developing, pluralistic, multi-cultural, multi-ethnic, multi-lingual and multi-religious democracies from three different continents who face common challenges.

42. I would like to conclude by asserting that we can succeed in making the most of the opportunities for prosperous socio-economic growth by continuing to remain engaged in a process of dialogue. Our dialogue has been greatly helped by setting before us clearly defined objectives, whether in terms of trade turnovers, or greater people-to-people exchanges. Above all, we have demonstrated our ability to meet the challenges along the way through calm and mature negotiations, which have enhanced trust and confidence between India and her partners across the globe.

43. I wish to convey my deep appreciation to Prof Tan Tai Yong and his team for giving me this opportunity to interact with you all.

It is indeed an honour for me to be here among this august gathering and to be part of this important initiative of the Indian Council of World Affairs and the Association of Asia Scholars. I must first congratulate the ICWA for reviving the process which was initiated way back in March 1947 in the form of the first Asian Relations Conference organized under the leadership of Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru. The Asian Relations Conference of 1947 brought together many leaders of the independence movements in Asia and represented first attempt to forge Asian unity and also to address the common concern of the people of the region encompassing social, economic and cultural problems of the different countries of Asia and to foster mutual contact and understanding. All these issues remain extremely relevant even today and in this context, this new series of the Asian Relations Conference by the ICWA is really a commendable effort.

2. Over the past two days this august gathering of the parliamentarians, thinkers and leaders from the Asian Countries have mulled over a wide range of issues like commonalities and convergences, issues of economic integrations and social and cultural exchanges. I am sure the Conference will succeed in evolving a blueprint of action to achieve these goals as it is important that the efforts of the governments go hand in hand with the efforts of the groups such as this.

3. India’s approach towards its neighbours is predicated upon the need to develop mutually beneficial relationships to ensure a peaceful, secure and stable neighbourhood. India’s growth has a beneficial impact on the region, and we are trying to build closer connectivity in physical and communication infrastructure to facilitate trade and communication links and enhance people-to-people interaction with the countries of the region. We are at a historic moment where expectations of the peoples of South Asia have risen to a new high and fulfilling these expectations is an imperative and a challenge in front of all of us. We are convinced that vibrant regional cooperation is good for each one of our countries.
4. In the context of the regional cooperation and engagement, SAARC remains the driving force as it seeks to address the needs for regional economic cooperation, trade, infrastructure development, social development and in the further development of a South Asian identity. India is, therefore, consciously pursuing its transformational role in changing SAARC into a more effective organization.

5. During the recently concluded 17th SAARC Summit held in Maldives in November 2011, India announced several measures to help build regional cooperation, most significant of which was the virtual elimination of India’s Sensitive List for items exported to India by the five States considered to be Least Developed Countries within SAARC, namely Afghanistan, Bhutan, Bangladesh, Nepal, and Maldives. In doing so, we have reduced our Sensitive List from 480 tariff lines to 25 tariff lines, for SAARC LDCs. Zero Basic Customs Duty access has been given to all items removed. We are confident that these measures will certainly boost the cause of the SAFTA where significant progress has been made in past three years. Even though intra-SAARC trade has crossed US $1.1 billion in 2010, it still remains well below potential as compared with other blocs such as ASEAN and EU. However, we remain committed to take whatever initiative necessary to realize the full potential of the SAFTA. We hope that our desire and commitment is shared by our friends in SAARC.

6. The South Asian University, which was established in 2007 as a vehicle of cultural integration, is gaining momentum. The University is currently offering six courses to about 200 students. India offered 50 “SAARC Silver Jubilee Scholarships” for meritorious students from SAARC LDC countries for the South Asian University. During the 17th SAARC Summit, India announced 100 more scholarships for the University. India also announced scholarships at Forest Research Institute, Dehradun and suggested initiatives to enhance connectivity in the region including conclusion of a Regional Air Service Agreement, Conclave of Tour Operators to boost tourism exchanges and enhance people to people ties, such as a travelling exhibition on the ancient history of the Indian people and by developing a regional telecommunications infrastructure to improve the quality of connectivity among SAARC countries.

7. ‘South Asia Forum’ was established at the 16th SAARC Summit for the generation of debate, discussion and the exchange of ideas on South Asia. and its future development. The first meeting of the Forum was held in New Delhi on 7-9 September 2011. We are hopeful that this mechanism will bring in new ideas and new initiatives to forge a better understanding between our societies.

8. In the end, I would like to say that the Government of India will do whatever is within its capabilities to enhance cooperation in South Asia to deliver on its vision of common peace, shared prosperity and cooperation. However there is a need for the private sector and other stakeholders to show greater involvement to contribute in diverse ways. The stencil of engagement should comprise more and more of the interactive agenda so that gains are visualized and felt across the board and in immediate term.

Thank You

I rise to join all Members of this august House in conveying our sincere thanks to the Honourable President for her enlightened address. The debate on the President's Address has been very wide-ranging and Shri Jaswant Singhji has made his contribution as well. I thank all the Hon. Members from all sides who have contributed to this debate. The President's Address lays down the objectives and the roadmap that our Government is following and will pursue with greater vigour to deal with the challenges that are mentioned in the President's Address. The President's Address in paragraph 10 refers to five important challenges that our country faces today. They are:

1. To strive for livelihood security for the vast majority of our population and contribute to work for removal of poverty, hunger and illiteracy from our land;
2. To achieve economic security through rapid and broad-based development and creation of productive jobs for our people;
3. To ensure energy security for our rapid growth;
4. To realise our developmental goals without jeopardizing our ecological and environmental security; and
5. To guarantee our internal and external security within the framework of a just, plural, secular and inclusive growth.

Madam, these five challenges sum up the task that lies ahead of our Government in the two-and-a-half years that remain.

As far as the economy is concerned, my colleague, the hon. Minister of Finance has placed the Economic Survey on the Table of the House and the Economic Survey gives an exhaustive account of the state of the economy. The Finance Minister has also referred to challenges facing us, in his Budget Speech. Madam, all these issues will be thoroughly debated during the general debate on the Budget next week. Therefore, I will be brief while dealing with the economy of the country.

I am sure, hon. Members are aware that we are charting our course through waters that are choppy for all countries today. The year 2011-12 has been a difficult year for all countries. Global growth decelerated everywhere. The Industrialised countries grew at the rate of only 1.6 per cent in 2011, which is half the rate in the previous years. The international economic environment that we face is highly uncertain.
The developments in North Africa and West Asia have led to a steep increase in the prices of hydrocarbons adversely affecting among others prices of fertilisers, food grains and have also put pressure on our balance of payment.

Madam, in this background, our own economic performance of about seven per cent growth- though slower than what we had hoped- must be regarded as commendable. Of course, we cannot view this as acceptable. We must strive to improve upon this in the next year and return as quickly as possible to a higher growth path and we must do this while also ensuring that we will progress towards our objective of achieving inclusive growth with reasonable price stability. Madam, for all this, we need a broad-based national consensus covering all sections of political opinion represented in this august House. This is an occasion when we must rise above narrow partisan ends and stand united as a nation.

Madam, we grew at 9 per cent for five years before 2008, and I do believe that we can get back to that kind of growth rate provided we can agree on a number of difficult decisions. If we succeed in that objective, we will ensure that India continues its rise as an economic power and acquires the economic capability of reducing persistent poverty from which we have suffered and filling the gaps, which are all too evident in critical areas such as health, education, skill-development, and provision of clean drinking water and sanitation. Shri Jaswant Singh referred to the problem of drinking water supply. I assure him that our Government attaches high priority to ensuring that all our citizens have access to clean drinking water. ... (Interruptions)

Madam, several Members have referred to the problems faced by weaker sections of our society and I do agree with them that we need to focus, in particular, on the developmental gaps affecting the weaker sections of our population such as Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes, the Other Backward Classes, the Minorities and other disadvantaged groups. I would like to assure the Hon. Members that we will rise to this important task. ... (Interruptions)

Madam, the Twelfth Five-Year Plan, which will be presented to the National Development Council (NDC) sometime in the middle of the year, will lay out the credible plan of action for faster, sustainable and more inclusive growth. I do not wish to go into details, but only wish to remind the hon. Members that our path is not easy.

I am sure that the hon. Members also realize that the difficult decisions that we have to take are made more difficult by the fact that we are a coalition Government and we have to evolve policy keeping in mind the need to maintain a consensus. The challenges that this poses have been sharply brought out in the developments following the presentation of the Railway Budget. I would like to use this opportunity to inform the hon. Members of the latest development. Madam, I received late last night an e-mail message followed by a formal letter from Shri Dinesh Trivedi tendering his resignation as the Railway Minister.

I propose to forward this letter to the President with the recommendation to accept Shri Trivedi’s letter of resignation. I regret the departure of Shri Trivedi. He had presented the Railway Budget which promised to carry out the Vision 2020 that was outlined by his predecessor. A new Railway Minister will be sworn in shortly. He will have the onerous duty of carrying forward the challenging task of modernizing our railway system.

Madam Speaker, in a country as large and as complex as ours, and where the farmers of our country constitute 65 per cent of the labour force, it is inevitable that Parliament and the Government should be worried about the state of India’s agriculture. I share the agony of the hon. Members, when they refer to the suicides of our farmers.

The House has my assurance that we will work with the renewed vigour to ensure that no farmer in our country is forced to go to the extreme level of committing suicide.

Our Government has attached high priority to the development of agriculture, to increase public investment in agriculture, to ensure that there is more attention, technologically, paid to the development of agriculture and as a result, the growth rate of agricultural production within the last five years has been as high as three per cent or 3.5 per cent per annum. This year we are likely to achieve a record production of food grains of 250 million tonnes.

Last year, Rashtriya Krishi Vikas Yojana, the National Horticulture Mission, and the Food Security Mission have all contributed to create a more favourable environment for the growth of agriculture. But I will be the last one to say that more cannot be done. We will, in the Twelfth Five-Year Plan, focus more sharply on the development of our agriculture because the interest of farmers is uppermost in the minds of our Government. That will be the priority we will follow with due diligence.

Madam, there were references to the price situation in the country. I do admit that in the last two years, the prices have become a problem. Fortunately, there are indications that prices are coming under control, but we have to be vigilant. It was in this context that the Finance Minister’s effort to control the fiscal deficit is very relevant. Our fiscal deficit did increase in the year 2008-09 because of the developments in the international economic environment, and it was our hope that we will be able to get back to a more reasonable level of fiscal deficit in the year 2011-12. The Finance Minister had projected a fiscal deficit of 4.8 per cent for that year. It turns out that the fiscal deficit will be as high as 5.9 per cent. The Finance Minister has committed our Government to work towards a reduction in the fiscal deficit to 5.1 per cent in the next year. It is very important that the Finance Minister succeeds in the control of fiscal deficit, in the control over the balance of payments deficit to a more reasonable level as it is essential for us to achieve our objectives of growth with reasonable price stability.

Since these matters will be debated at length during the debate on the Budget, I do not propose to spend more time in dealing with these issues. However, there are certain matters which I would like to refer to and one of these relates to the establishment of National Counter Terrorism Centre. While discussing issue relating to the National Counter Terrorism Centre, Shri Rajnath Singh Ji questioned the sincerity of our Government while dealing with problems of the terrorism.

Madam, dealing with terrorism and dealing effectively as well as the control of left wing extremism constitute two big challenges before our country and for all the growth objectives that we have, particularly, the developments of the Central Indian regions. The States of Chattisgarh, Madhya Pradesh, Bihar, Jharkhand are infested with left wing extremism. Control over the left wing extremism and control over terrorism are absolute necessities if we are to achieve our growth objectives.

Madam, let me assure the House that our Government is committed to providing fully secured living conditions to its citizens and it will take every possible step to deal with the menace of terrorism. In fact, setting up the NCTC is an important step in that direction. Concern has been raised that the Central Government is trying to encroach upon the jurisdiction of the State Government and it has been suggested that they should be taken into confidence before the National Counter Terrorism Centre becomes operational. The question of setting up of National Counter Terrorism Centre has been discussed at various fora since the report of the Group of Ministers appointed by the previous Government and the recommendations of the Second Administrative Reforms Commission were submitted. Multi-agency Centre that was established in 2001 was a pre-cursor to the NCTC and the need for a single and effective point of consideration for coordination for counter terrorism has been discussed in meetings on internal security of Chief Ministers. As has been pointed out by some Members that a number of Chief Ministers have expressed their concern after the order was issued and I have replied to them that there will be consultations before the next steps are taken. The consultation was held on 12th March, 2012 with the Chief Secretaries and DGP's from different State Governments. The meeting of the Chief Ministers on Internal Security has been called which was originally scheduled for 15th February, 2012 but because of elections, it had to be postponed. It is now scheduled on 16th April, 2012. Therefore, adequate and full consultations will take place before the next steps are taken.
Madam, I think that the idea of NCTC and the manner in which the NCTC will function are two separate issues. The idea of NCTC, you have all agreed is unexceptional. And the manner in which the NCTC will function, there may be differences about tingle but I am confident that through discussions and dialogues, these differences could be narrowed down and a consensus can be arrived and that will be our sincere efforts.

Madam, another issue which was raised during the debate relates to the state of Sri Lankan Tamils. Some Members have raised concern regarding the situation in Sri Lanka. The Central Government fully shares the concerns and sentiments raised by hon. Members regarding the welfare of Sri Lankan Tamils. Since the end of conflict in Sri Lanka, our focus has been on the welfare and well being of the Tamil citizens of Sri Lanka. Their resettlement and rehabilitation has been of the highest and most immediate priority for our Government. The steps taken by the Central Government in this regard has been outlined in the suo motu statement made by the External Affairs Minister on 14th March, 2012. As a result of our constructive engagement with the Government of Sri Lanka and our considerable assistance programme, the modicum of normalcy is beginning to return to the Tamil areas in Sri Lanka. There has also been progress, given the withdrawal of emergency regulations by the Government of Sri Lanka and the conduct of elections to local bodies in the Northern provinces of Sri Lanka.

Members have also raised the issue of human rights violations during the protracted conflict in Sri Lanka and on the US initiated draft resolution on promoting reconciliation and accountability in Sri Lanka at the on-going 19th Session of the UN Human Rights Council in Geneva. The Government of India has emphasised to the Government of Sri Lanka the importance of a genuine process of reconciliation to address the grievances of the Tamil community. In this connection, we have called for implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Commission appointed by Sri Lankan Government that has been tabled before the Sri Lankan Parliament. These include various constructive measures of healing the wounds of the conflict and fostering the process of lasting peace and reconciliation in Sri Lanka.

We have asked the Government of Sri Lanka to stand by its commitment towards pursuit of a political process through a broader dialogue with all parties including the Tamil National Alliance leading to the full implementation of the 13th Amendment to the Sri Lankan Constitution so as to achieve meaningful devolution of power and genuine national reconciliation. We hope that the Government of Sri Lanka recognises the critical importance of this issue, act decisively and with vision in this regard. We will remain engaged with them.
through this process and encourage them to take forward the dialogue with the elected representatives of Sri Lankan Tamils.

As regards the issue of a draft resolution initiated by the United States at the on-going 19th Session of the UN Human Rights Council in Geneva, we do not yet have the final text of the Resolution. However, I may assure the House that we are inclined to vote in favour of a Resolution. That, we hope, will advance our objective, namely, the achievement of the future for the Tamil community in Sri Lanka that is marked by equality, dignity, justice and self-respect.

Madam, Shri Jaswant Singhji has raised the issue of Gorkhaland Darjeeling Hill Council. I wish to assure this House that we have worked with sincerity to find an amicable solution to this difficult problem. We recognise the contribution made by the Government of West Bengal in facilitating this outcome. Whatever issues are outstanding, the House has my assurance, we will work with the same constructive spirit to find a pragmatic, practical and viable solution.

Madam, I would not like to take more of the time of this House. I once again join all Members in thanking hon. President for her enlightened address which I hope we can adopt with acclamation.

Thank you.

Honorable Chairman sir, I rise to join all honourable members of this august house in conveying our sincere thanks to the Honourable President for her enlightened address. The debate on the President's address has been very wide-ranging. I thank all the honourable members from all sides who have contributed to this debate.

Shri Venkaiah Naidu, speaking on behalf of the NDA, mentioned that the President's address does not lay out a roadmap. I do not agree with this finding of Shri Venkaiah Naidu, and I will draw his attention to Paragraph 10 of the President's address, and I quote:

My Government will work on five important challenges that our country faces today:

1. to strive for livelihood security for the vast majority of our population and continue to work for removal of poverty, hunger and illiteracy from our land;
2. to achieve economic security through rapid and broad based development and creation of productive jobs for our people;
3. to ensure energy security for our rapid growth;
4. to realize our developmental goals without jeopardizing our ecological and environmental security; and
5. to guarantee our internal and external security within the framework of a just, plural, secular and inclusive democracy.

Since the presentation of the budget 2012-13, the finance minister has elaborated in his budget speech on further challenges that our economy faces. The Economic Survey that has been presented to both houses of Parliament also deals with these issues, and therefore I will be very brief when it comes to dealing with the State of the Economy.

The President, in paragraph 9, mentions that the year 2012-13 will mark the first year of the 12th 5-year plan that sets the goal of faster, sustainable and more inclusive growth. The approach paper sets a target growth rate of 9% for the 12th Five year plan, with four percent for the agricultural sector. The President's address highlights the working of the existing programme as well as some new initiatives that the government proposes to take to bring about faster, sustainable and more inclusive growth.

At the outset I would like to mention that honourable members will recognize that all the economies of the world are in the midst of very uncertain times. The industrialized countries in the wake of the crisis of 2008-09 have registered mainly a fragile recovery. In the year 2011, the growth rate of the industrialized countries was half the level that was achieved in 2010-11. We are all affected by this disturbing economic environment that faces us. There has been too much liquidity in the global economy. This has put pressure on commodity prices. Commodity prices of foodgrains, of petroleum products, of fertilizers in particular, have gone up. Therefore, there has been pressure on our Balance of Payments. There has also been pressure on prices. These are circumstances in which our economy has to chart out a path. I would be the last one to say that we do not face difficulties. We do face difficulties. It is my honest assessment that the difficulties that we face – a balance of payments deficit on the current account which is now as high as 3.6%, a deficit on the fiscal balance account of 5.9%, is something that we cannot tolerate, year after year. Therefore, I appeal to all the members of this august house to recognize the pitfalls, the dangers that lie ahead if we do not rise to the occasion, and help the government to undertake remedial measures in time.

Amidst uncertain environment, our own economic performance of about 7% growth, though slower than what we had hoped, must be regarded as commendable. Of course, we cannot view this as an acceptable outcome. We must strive to improve upon this next year, and return as quickly as possible to a higher growth path. And we must do this while also ensuring that we make progress in achieving our objectives of inclusive growth with reasonable price stability.

For this we need a broad-based national consensus covering all sections of political opinion represented in our Parliament. This is an occasion when we must eschew narrow partisan ends and stand united as a cohesive nation. We grew at 9% for the five years before 2008, and I do believe that we can get back to that kind of growth rate provided we can agree on a number of difficult decisions. If we succeed in that objective, we will ensure that India continues its rise as an economic power with the economic capability of reducing the age-old poverty from which we have suffered and filling the gaps, which are all too evident in critical areas such as health, education, skill-development, and provision of clean drinking water and sanitation.

We need to focus, in particular, on the developmental gaps affecting the weaker sections of our population such as Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes, the Other Backward Classes, the Minorities and other disadvantaged groups. I would like to assure the Hon. Members that we will rise to the occasion.

The Twelfth Five-Year Plan, which will be presented to the National Development Council (NDC) sometime in the middle of the year, will lay out a credible plan of action for faster, sustainable and more inclusive growth. I do not propose to deal with the economic scene in greater detail. The Finance Minister has discussed that in his budget speech. There will be a debate on the General Budget. That will be an occasion for the Hon. Members to express their views and for the government to reply to their concerns.

I wish to deal only with one or two issues. Once is the charge that the government is destroying the federal structure of our country. Sir, Nothing could be further from the truth. Let me assure the House that our government is committed as ever before, to uphold the constitutional imperatives in letter and spirit.

Terrorism and Left-wing extremism are two issues, which I believe would unite the nation to work out comprehensive coordinated strategy to work out the menace of terrorism and left-wing extremism. What happened in Orissa earlier this week, where two Italians were abducted by Left-wing extremists, is a grim reminder to all of us that our nation’s security can be in danger if we are not careful or alert to tackle the anger of left-wing extremism or terrorism.

Our Government is committed to providing fully secured living conditions to its citizens and it will take every possible step to deal with the menace of terrorism. In fact, setting up the NCTC is an important step in that direction. Concern has been raised that the Central Government is trying to encroach upon the jurisdiction of the State Government and it has been suggested that they should be taken into confidence before the National Counter Terrorism Centre becomes operational. The question of setting up of National Counter Terrorism Centre has been discussed at various fora since the report of the Group of Ministers appointed by the previous Government and the recommendations of the Second Administrative Reforms Commission were submitted. Multi-agency Centre that was established in 2001 was a pre-cursor to the NCTC and the need for a single and effective point of coordination for counter terrorism has been discussed in meetings on internal security of Chief Ministers in the last couple of years. As has been pointed out by some Members that a number of Chief Ministers have expressed their concern after the order was issued and I have replied to them that there will be consultations before the next steps are taken. The consultation was held on 12th March, 2012 with the Chief Secretaries and DGPs from different State Governments. The meeting of the Chief Ministers on Internal Security has been called which was originally scheduled for 15th February, 2012 but because of elections, it had to be postponed. It is now scheduled on 16th April, 2012. Therefore, adequate and full consultations will take place before the next steps are taken to operationalize the National Counter-Terrorism Centre. I think that the idea of NCTC and the manner in which the NCTC will function are two separate issues. The idea of NCTC, you have all agreed is unexceptionable. And the manner in which the NCTC will function, there may be differences of opinion but I am confident that through discussions and dialogues, these differences could be narrowed down and a broad-based consensus can be arrived. That will be our sincere effort and this House has the assurance that nothing will be done which will in any way impinge on the federal imperative of our Constitution.

Some other members brought up the question of the problems of Sri Lankan Tamils, and I will therefore devote a few minutes in describing our job of dealing with the problem of the Sri Lankan Tamil community. Some Members have raised concern regarding the situation in Sri Lanka. The Central Government fully shares the concerns and sentiments raised by hon. Members regarding the welfare of Sri Lankan Tamils. Since the end of conflict in Sri Lanka, our focus has been on the welfare and well being of the Tamil citizens of Sri Lanka. Their resettlement and rehabilitation have been of the highest and most important priority for our Government. The steps taken by the Central Government in this regard has been outlined in the suo-motu statement made by the External Affairs Minister on 14th March, 2012. As a result of our constructive engagement with the Government of Sri Lanka and our considerable assistance programme, a modicum of normalcy is beginning to return to the Tamil areas in Sri Lanka. There has also been progress, given the withdrawal of emergency regulations by the Government of Sri Lanka and the conduct of elections to local bodies in the Northern provinces of Sri Lanka. Members have also raised the issue of human rights violations during the protracted conflict in Sri Lanka and on the US initiated draft resolution on promoting reconciliation and accountability in Sri Lanka at the on-going 19th Session of the UN Human Rights Council in Geneva. The Government of India has emphasized to the Government of Sri Lanka the importance of a genuine process of reconciliation to address the grievances of the Tamil community. In this connection, we have called for implementation of the recommendations contained in the report of the Commission appointed by Sri Lankan Government that has been tabled before the Sri Lankan Parliament. These include various constructive measures of healing the wounds of the conflict and fostering the process of lasting peace and reconciliation in Sri Lanka.

We have asked the Government of Sri Lanka to stand by its commitment towards pursuit of a political process through a broader dialogue with all parties including the Tamil National Alliance leading to the full implementation of the 13th Amendment to the Sri Lankan Constitution so as to achieve meaningful devolution of power and genuine national reconciliation. We hope that the Government of Sri Lanka recognises the critical importance of this issue, act decisively and with vision in this regard. We will remain engaged with them through this process and encourage them to take forward the dialogue with the elected representatives of Sri Lankan Tamils.
As regards the issue of a draft resolution initiated by the United States at the on-going 19th Session of the UN Human Rights Council in Geneva, we do not yet have the final text of the Resolution. However, I may assure the House that we are inclined to vote in favour of a Resolution. That, we hope, will advance our objective, namely, the achievement of the future for the Tamil community in Sri Lanka that is marked by equality, dignity, justice and self-respect.

There are a number of other issues which have been raised. Several members have expressed concern about the state of our education. Concerns have been expressed about the suicide of farmers. Let me say that I share these concerns. It has been the effort of our government to revitalize, to put more vigour into the development processes for agriculture in the last seven and a half years that we have been in office. Already there are indications that the growth in our agriculture production has gone up to about 3 to 3 and a half percent in the eleventh five-year plan, as against less than 2 percent in the preceding five years. But I am not saying that we are satisfied. We will work with all the vigour that we are capable of, in imparting a new momentum of dynamism to our agriculture, and that is a commitment that we have undertaken, we will discharge our responsibilities in that direction.

Concerns have been addressed about various other matters, like black money. The finance minister, in his budget speech, has explained the government’s approach, how we propose to deal with the menace of black money. He has also promised the House that the government will come forward with a white paper. I therefore hope that there will be ample opportunity in the rest of the session to deal with these issues. Therefore I will not take more time of the House. I join all the members in conveying our grateful regards and thanks to the Hon President and I sincerely hope that we will pass the motion of thanks with acclamation.

New Delhi, March 23, 2012.

"I am truly happy to participate in this inaugural function of the 7th Asia Gas Partnership Summit 2012. I compliment the Gas Authority of India Limited and FICCI for taking the initiative to organize this very important conference.

The use of natural gas offers greater supply security through diversification of the energy basket and also helps in promoting sustainable economic growth and development. Compared to other hydrocarbons, the use of gas is not only price-competitive but also environmentally benign for a number of user-industries. Gas is an efficient fuel for power generation, a better feedstock for fertilizer production and a cleaner alternative for vehicular transport.

The emerging economies of Asia are rapidly increasing their use of natural gas. As an illustration, in the last five years, natural gas consumption in India and China has witnessed compound annual growth rates of 14% and 18%, respectively. The remarkable growth in the use of gas in the Asian economies underscores the greater role that this region is poised to play in the future development of gas markets in the world.

The Asia-Pacific region, particularly Australia and the Middle-East, has already emerged as a principal source of gas supply. The Asian region, led by China and India, is also emerging as a major destination for that supply. Asia Pacific accounts for about 60% of world’s total LNG imports. Therefore, there is a natural synergy in promoting greater flow of trade, investment, skills and services, across the gas-value-chain within the Asian region. Indeed we should move beyond the conventional buyer-seller relationships to more a comprehensive gas and energy partnership in this vast region.

Such partnerships can benefit the gas-endowed countries in the region from capital investments in their gas fields and also from the associated long-term purchase agreements. Simultaneously the fast-growing emerging markets in the region can gain in terms of securing reliable supplies of gas at affordable prices.

The large and growing markets in Asia also provide an opportunity for collaboration through joint research and technology development for the supply of clean and cheaper energy to the people.

Expanding the use of natural gas in India is one of the most important and immediate ways of responding to the challenges of energy security and the management of climate change. The Government of India had launched the New Exploration Licensing Policy (NELP) way back in the year 1997-98. The policy has resulted in investments of over US$14bn and discovery of 87 oil and gas blocks, with three blocks in production. The 9th round of NELP has just been completed covering a sedimentary area of about 88,000 sq km, which saw participation by 37 companies including eight foreign ones.

The opening up of the oil and gas sector to private industry participation has resulted in higher domestic gas availability and has also led to growing participation by multinational corporations.

To cater to the large demand for gas, India has accelerated investment in creation of LNG re-gasification facilities. With new re-gasification LNG terminals coming up at Kochi and Dabhol, the country’s current import capacity of 14 million tonnes a year is set to increase to 20 million tonnes a year by 2012-13.

We have also launched an ambitious pipeline development programme. I understand that the Gas Authority of India alone will expand its pipeline length from the existing 9000 Km to around 14,500 km by 2014. Private operators are also expected to add another 5,000 km in the same period. The target is to have a country-wide gas grid of about 30,000 km by the end of the 12th Five-Year Plan in 2017.

The 2000 km long Dahej-Vijaipur-Bawana-Nangal/Bhatinda pipeline of GAIL has been completed recently. I have great pleasure, I have the privilege of dedicating it to the nation today. I understand that it has the potential to be extended up to the border with Pakistan. I am happy therefore, to dedicate this pipeline to the nation today.

We are pursuing the development of sources of unconventional gas such as Shale gas and Coal Bed Methane. The mapping of India’s shale gas resources has been undertaken and we are working to put in place a regulatory regime for licensing rounds by the end of 2013. We are also harnessing coal bed methane for which four licensing rounds have been held and commercial production has commenced at Raniganj in West Bengal. As India has one of the world’s largest coal reserves, we wish to work with international companies having the requisite experience and expertise for exploitation of coal seam gas.

The Government has initiated gas pricing policy reforms to incentivize production of natural gas. We are conscious that remunerative energy prices are needed to ensure expanded energy supply. At the same time oil and gas are national resources and, therefore, should be within the framework of government and regulatory oversight. The economic exploitation of these resources should lead, therefore, to win-win solutions for both the investors as well as the people of India at large.

Let me take this opportunity to reaffirm that our government is committed to taking all possible steps to find viable solutions to meet the concerns of the gas industry. We are committed to ensuring the predictability and transparency of our policy and regulatory environment. While governmental support can greatly help in developing useful partnerships in the gas and oil sector, I expect the industry to also come forward with innovative ways and means to create a better and sustainable energy future for the Asian region.

With these words, let me end by wishing this summit all success. Thank you.”

Kochi (Kerala), April 2, 2012.

Hon’ble Chief Minister Shri Oommen Chandy ji Hon’ble Ministers of State Shri E. Ahamed ji, Shri K.V. Thomas ji and Shri K.C. Venugopal ji Hon’ble Ministers, Members of Parliament, Members of Legislative Assembly, Additional Secretary Shri B.K. Gupta,
Joint Secretary (PSP) and Chief Passport Officer Shri Muktesh Pardeshi, Passport Officers from Kerala, Friends from Media, and
Ladies and Gentlemen

I am extremely pleased to be present in this beautiful city of Kochi on the occasion of the formal launch of 13 Passport Seva Kendras (PSKs) in the State of Kerala. Today, we cross yet another milestone of operationalizing 70 PSKs, out of a total 77, in fourteen States under the Passport Seva Project which is part of National e-Governance Plan.

I would like to reiterate on this occasion the firm commitment of the Government of India to provide timely delivery of passport services to our fellow citizens. The setting up of PSKs is a first step in this direction. More reforms are indeed needed and many reforms are underway to further ensure citizen-centric role of Passport Offices and also to facilitate speedier service, greater convenience and comfort to the public at large.

We are witnessing rapid transformation in the nature of engagement of our people with the rest of the world. India’s rising international profile and its growing integration with the global economy and with more disposable incomes, more Indians are traveling abroad than ever before. The travel of Indians abroad for the purposes of education, tourism, pilgrimage as well as for social purposes is also growing rapidly. The number of passport applications at the national level has trebled since 2000.

I am conscious of the need to further streamline service delivery systems in Passport Offices particularly with the ever increasing pace of demand for such services. Sustained attempts are underway to streamline passport issuance procedures, computerization of passport offices, decentralization of passport applications collection and reforms in the Central Passport Organization.

The people of Kerala have had historical contacts with the Gulf and have been more globalised than our other compatriots since the early days. In response to the fast growing demand for passports in this State, four Passport Offices have been set up in Kerala, with the first one in Kochi as early as in 1975, and the fourth one in Malappuram in 2006. A total of 7.46 lakh passports were issued in Kerala last year, which represents an increase of 21% since 2006. In addition, 90 thousand miscellaneous services were also rendered last year. It is indeed heartening to note that over 5.5 million Indians working in the Gulf, largely from the State of Kerala, is a standing testimony to the enormous contribution made by the people from the State of Kerala. It is indeed an unfolding drama of excitement and drama of confidence exhibited by the people from Kerala. The biggest contribution to India's Foreign Exchange reserves comes from people from Kerala who are living abroad. I wish to acknowledge on behalf of the Government of India, that this contribution is indeed an important one and also speaks about their direct contribution to the economic development of the country.

I am aware that Kerala Government has also launched a number of citizen-centric e-governance projects such as Akshaya, e-grantz, LOG.IN KERALA, SAGE and SAMEEKSHA for making technology and e-government services accessible to common man.

There is considerable progress in the implementation of this high impact Passport Seva Project of the Government of India. In a short time, we moved from Pilot Project mode in May 2010 in Bengaluru to the commencement of nation-wide rollout of Passport Seva Kendras in June last year. I would like to acknowledge the contribution of the service provider Tata Consultancy Services, in speedy implementation of the Project. I also wish to convey thank Shri Ratan Tata for his personal commitment in ensuring deployment of sufficient resources for timely implementation of Passport Seva Kendras.

We are looking at the next steps in our endeavour to further improve passport services in the country. Apart from adding 77 PSKs, the Ministry is working on setting up 16 Mini PSKs in North Eastern States and other parts. The Ministry is also working on other related issues such as integration of Indian Embassies and Consulates abroad with the Passport Seva Project. The Project provides for integration with other e-Governance initiatives of the Government such as CCTNS (Crime and Criminal Tracking Network and Systems), IVFRT (Immigration, Visa and Foreigners’ Registration & Tracking) and e-Migrate, which will be useful for sharing of required information.
I would place on record our appreciation to the Passport Officers and the officials of the Central Passport Organisation for their diligence and dedication in helping to realize the vision of passport services closer home. I am also confident that with increased coordination between the Passport Offices and the local police authorities, requisite police clearances would be obtained speedily to minimize pendency in issuance of passports. I also wish to compliment the Hon’ble Chief Minister of Kerala for announcing the initiative to organize meetings of the Chief Secretary and Home Secretary, along with relevant senior officials from the Police Department, with the passport officers in the State of Kerala to address bottlenecks in speedy issuance of police clearances. I am confident that this measure would further result in reducing pendency in issuance of passports.

I would like to felicitate the people of Kerala on this momentous occasion of launch of 13 PSKs. I would also like to express my deep gratitude to the Hon’ble Chief Minister Shri Oommen Chandy for the whole-hearted support that we received from the Government and people of Kerala in the timely execution of this prestigious Project.

I have also taken note of the suggestions from Hon’ble Chief Minister of Kerala for opening 5 mini-PSKs at Pattanamthitta, Palakkadu, Kasargode, Idikki and Wyanadu. We will certainly look into this request from Hon’ble CM.

Thank you.

011. Press Release of the Ministry of External Affairs regarding its documentaries being screened on Air India flights.

New Delhi, April 12, 2012.

Over the last three decades, the Ministry of External Affairs has worked with independent film makers to produce a broad range of documentary films. These films are aimed at creating a better understanding of India amongst global audiences. They have been acclaimed for providing a wide angled and in-depth view of India by focusing on our rich cultural and civilizational values, our democratic and pluralistic society, our secular aspirations, our vibrant economy and on the innovativeness and enterprise of Indians. Our diplomatic missions around the world have used these documentaries over the years as an important tool of public diplomacy.

2. The Ministry has taken a number of initiatives to create new audiences for these documentaries. Some recent films have been screened on international TV outlets like Discovery and The History Channel. Shorter versions of the films have also been uploaded on the YouTube channel of the Ministry (www.youtube.com/indiandiplomacy) under a Creative Commons License and these have already received over 235,000 views. They are also available in DVD format through Magic Lantern Movies (mlf.core@gmail.com) and are being used as audio-visual training material by some foreign universities running India studies programmes.

3. As part of this process, MEA has now tied up with Air India to make its films available on the airline’s in-flight entertainment system. Air India have made an initial selection of 24 of MEA’s films and these are reflected in their In-flight magazine of April 2012. This programme is expected to grow significantly over the coming months.

Speech by Foreign Secretary on Building Global Security at the Institute of Peace and Conflict Studies (IPCS) - Konrad Adenauer Stiftung (KAS).

New Delhi, April 16, 2012.

Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

1. I would like to thank the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung and the Institute Of Peace and Conflict Studies for the opportunity to address this distinguished gathering in New Delhi. This event brings together two well known and reputed think tanks from India and Germany. The Institute of Peace and Conflict Studies (IPCS) has been making a valuable contribution through its research on nuclear issues, disarmament, non-proliferation, and other related subjects ever since it was set up in 1996. The Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung provides a platform for study of peace and security in the world. Through its very name KAS reminds us of the great achievements of this Chancellor of West Germany from 1949 to 1963, “Der Alte”, as he came to be known, led Germany through a period of transformation at the end of which it emerged not just as an industrial giant but as a democracy, with stability, the respect of the international community and a growing impact on world affairs as the axis of a new Europe. When he started Germany was not only divided between the East and West but with occupation zones – within the Western Zone. Here it was said jokingly that “US got the scenery, France got the wine and British got the ruins” When Der Alte finished Germany had got the scenery and wine back, while the British were pondering the ruins of staying out of the E.C.M.

2. This collaboration gains significance, as India and Germany are celebrating the 60th anniversary of establishment of diplomatic relations in 2011-2012. India and Germany have had an instinctive feeling of respect for each other – through ties of culture, trade & technology and travels and diplomacy. Just think of Max Mueller. (Or as Mr. Chandran told us we should remember also Wassmuss and others who rattled the railings of the British Empire.) After the Second World War, India was among the first nations to recognize the newly formed state of Germany. Diplomatic relations were established with Germany as early as in 1951, but the Cold war politics pervading the globe, complicated the growth of relations between the two countries. Nonetheless, the two countries signed the Indo-German Development Co-operation Agreement some fifty years back, and the Indo-German Chamber of Commerce which remains a successful model, added to the pace for Indo-German industrial co-operation. The scenario changed more rapidly as the 1991 economic reforms undertaken by India coincided with the unification of Germany and the emergence of the European Union. This has helped to deepen and expand our relations with newer possibilities of interaction through political and strategic consultations and in the spheres of long term investments, bilateral trade and technical and scientific co-operation. The Agenda for German-Indian Partnership in the 21st Century was adopted by the Foreign Ministers of the two countries in May 2000. India and Germany entered the phase of strategic partnership in 2001. Germany has become India’s largest trading partner in Europe and the 5th biggest trading partner in the world with $18.37 billion in trade (though this level is below the potential). It also stands as India’s second largest technology partner. You have heard about Germany’s constructive role in helping India move towards participation in the NSG and our move away from technology denial.

3. The current range of issues in Indo-German dialogue reflects in a sense the theme given to me today – Building Global Security. We are members together in the G-20 and look to German leadership in resolving the Eurozone crisis. We are in the G-4 as aspirants for UNSC permanent membership, we speak about terrorism and piracy, we plan together to facilitate investments, development of hi-tech, energy efficiency, environmental sustainability and so on. There is great pragmatism in the theme chosen by Germany for the year of German celebration viz. “Urban Spaces”, which is particularly relevant for a rapidly urbanising India. We will respond with a mix of cultural and technological presentations in the “Days of India” which will be formally launched in Hamburg where India has been chosen as the Partner Country for the 823rd birthday celebrations of Hamburg Port. Successful transfer of German skills for Industrial Training Institutes would enhance our relations and I believe add to not only our economy but to our security.

Global Security

4. What do we mean by Security? As a concept security implies freedom from apprehension, anxiety, or care. It leads to confidence of safety and hence, assurance and certainty. Security is the much-valued product of freedom. These are all psychological states of mind. For the diplomatic practitioner, this is too wide-ranging a definition. The NSA in a recent speech suggested a more concise way of handling the definition of security. I quote:

Quote

“From a Practitioner’s point of view I find it better to distinguish between security issues amenable to the application of hard power, those less so, and those which are not. Along this continuum, non-traditional security challenges would be those that require the mixed application of hard and soft power, where solutions are not so clear as victory and defeat, and where problems mutate into more benign forms. They would also include those which do not respond to the application of hard power, such as food security.

Another similar and largely overlapping way of looking at the problem is to distinguish between zero-sum challenges are those like terrorist threats, espionage and other state-security threats, and traditional military threats. These respond to the application of hard power. Non-zero sum challenges are those like energy, water, maritime security and others. And there are those which overlap both categories, like cyber threats, space and nuclear threats. These are domains where the combination of intent and capability mean that the nature and definition of the threat is necessarily subjective, and perception management becomes an extremely important part of both the challenge and the response.”

Terrorism

5. Let me now start with terrorism, which in our age has become a primary concern of civilized societies. Terrorism is often used not just to impose a political agenda but to force unacceptably backward codes of life and governance on democratic societies. It invariably translates into meaningless and horrific incidents of violence. The 2008 Mumbai attacks were symbolic, striking at everything India has been able to achieve – economic success, openness to the world, freedoms, conventional defence capabilities and pluralism in society. The targets were carefully chosen. Fortunately despite killing 164 people and wounding at least 308, the terrorists could not blow India off its path or diminish our international exposure. Recently, the United States has announced $10 million for information leading to arrest of Hafiz Mohammad Sayeed and Abdul Rahman Makki under the Rewards for Justice Programme. We welcomed the notification as it sends a strong signal to LeT and its patrons that the international community remains united in combating terrorism.

6. Building Global Security requires the international community to come together and forcefully combat the use of terror as state policy by countries as well as root out safe havens for terrorists. This requires action at the global level through a CCIT and through multilateral cooperation in every region affected by terror. There must be concerted action by security forces, and political consensus that terrorism as a means is not justified by any ends. Improved governance is a common goal of all of us but ending terrorism has to take priority in operational terms.

7. Afghanistan is currently in the process of transition and transformation in a region which is the epicenter of world terrorism. Virtually all dangerous acts of terrorism in the world recently, can be traced back to the Af-Pak region.
Any perception of lack of will on the part of the international community to deal firmly with terrorist groups will risk Afghanistan sliding back to being a safe haven for terrorist and extremist groups that threaten the region and beyond. During his visit to Afghanistan in May 2011, Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh announced additional assistance of US $ 500 million, over and above the existing commitments of US $ 1.5 billion. India’s assistance programme is spread across Afghanistan and spans almost the entire gamut of economic and social developmental activities from schools and hospitals to trade, power lines and hydro-electric projects. Construction of Afghanistan’s new Parliament building, a symbol of the common commitment of both countries to pluralism and democracy, is also progressing.

8. We believe the international community must remain engaged with Afghanistan in the decade ahead. External Affairs Minister, Shri S.M. Krishna led our delegations to the two International conferences organized on Afghanistan in Istanbul and Bonn in November and December, 2011 respectively. These conferences were aimed at generating international and regional consensus for long term engagement of the international community - and the region - with Afghanistan, in the backdrop of the announcement of withdrawal of NATO forces from a combat role in Afghanistan by the end of 2014. While the “transition dividend” did not emerge clearly in these conferences, there will be further opportunities in Kabul and Tokyo to ensure continued support for modernization and stability in Afghanistan. We recognize that regional economic cooperation involving all the countries of the area also has a role to play. But we expect that Germany and EU as a whole will remember that there can be no compromise with terrorism and its sponsors. We need to be clear where the danger is emanating from and what we can do about it. Otherwise as Adenauer said, “the one sure way to conciliate a tiger is to allow oneself to be devoured.”

9. The AfPak region is faced with problems not only of conventional terrorism but also the danger of proliferation and nuclear security. So let me take Nuclear Security as a second item. On 26-27 March 2012, 53 countries and four international organizations, namely the UN, IAEA, EU and NATO, attended the Second Nuclear Security Summit at Seoul, South Korea. The Summit focused on one of the foremost challenges of our times; the danger of nuclear explosives, materials and technology falling into the hands of terrorists. The Final Communiqué of the Summit listed nuclear terrorism as one of the most challenging threats to international security. Prime Minister of India attended the Summit in Seoul, as he did in Washington D.C. in 2010. During the Seoul Summit, Prime Minister emphasized that nuclear terrorism and clandestine proliferation continue to pose serious threat to international security. He announced a contribution of $ 1 million for IAEA’s Nuclear Security Fund.
Clandestine Nuclear proliferation is one of the gravest threats to global security as it enables this greatly destructive technology to fall into the hands of irresponsible actors. India shares and supports the non-proliferation objectives of the international community. We have an impeccable non-proliferation record and have in place a stringent export control system in line with the highest international standards.

10. The more fundamental problem is the one which deals with the issue of nuclear weapons themselves. India has also been steadfast in its support for the goal of universal, non-discriminatory and verifiable elimination of nuclear weapons, leading to global disarmament in a time-bound framework. The then Prime Minister Shri Rajiv Gandhi had put forward the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan of 1988 which offers a comprehensive plan to take this process forward. In a 2006 working paper on nuclear disarmament in the UN General Assembly, India made specific proposals towards achieving this goal, including negotiating a Nuclear Weapon Convention. We believe the goal of nuclear disarmament can be achieved by a step-by-step process underwritten by a universal commitment and an agreed multilateral framework that is global and non-discriminatory. The issues in Iran and DPRK need to be seen in this context as well as in the framework of tackling proliferation. These are major subjects with would require a separate address. Suffice it for me to say today that we support the P5 + 1 dialogue with Iran and the Six-party engagement with DPRK. We feel there is vital need to find diplomatic solutions conforming with relevant UN resolutions with the overriding need for these countries to keep to commitments taken on by them themselves in the past.

Security on the Seas

11. Piracy on the high seas is as old as the history of seafaring itself. Piracy is a resurgent threat which has come to the fore in recent times. Concerns over maritime security have been not only centered around piracy in the Gulf of Aden, but also in the Malacca Straits and the Mozambique Channel. Somali pirates, by far the greatest global piracy threat, have increasingly pushed farther off the Somali coast. They have moved deeper into the Indian Ocean.

12. Today's pirates are not swashbuckling raiders of the past but trained fighters aboard speedboats, equipped with satellite phones and global positioning systems, armed with automatic weapons and rocket propelled grenades. According to the International Maritime Organisation almost 90% of world trade is transported by sea. The continuing threat of piracy raises the cost of trade directly and indirectly. Examples of direct effects are robbery and ransom payments, losses of ships and cargo and additional pay for crews. Indirect effects are the security costs incurred in the fight against piracy and higher insurance premiums in the dangerous areas. The cost of trade is further pushed up by the need to take longer alternative routes to avoid pirate infested sea-lanes and the need for convoys and naval protection. The threat posed by piracy attacks to maritime traffic and seafarers continues to be a major problem. As a result of these challenges, many ships have begun to hire armed guards as a deterrent for would-be attackers. However, there is not yet a process or an internationally accepted regulatory framework for regulating these guards, creating legal complications. Presently, there are around 27 Indian seafarers in the captivity of pirates. Their well-being and early release is a priority for our government.

The numbers are not surprising as one out of every 10-12 merchant mariners, on any ship, is an Indian, irrespective of the flag of the ship. Some countries believe the problem is limited to Somalia and the waters nearby and insurance companies don’t seem to be complaining. As Adenauer said wir leben alle unter - dem gleichen Himmel aber wir haben nicht alle den gleichen Horizont (We all live under the same sky but do not have the same horizon or perspective). But the seas are open and everybody is getting affected; recent incidents have highlighted the need for international cooperation to evolve a common strategy to combat the global scourge of piracy at sea. The international community has of course taken a number of steps to tackle piracy since Somali pirates emerged as a threat to international maritime security four years ago. In 2008, the UN Security Council passed a series of measures targeting Somali piracy, culminating in the unanimous approval of US-led Resolution 1851. The move authorized states with navies deployed in the Gulf of Aden to take action against pirates and armed robbers within Somalia. India has committed its full support to international anti-piracy efforts. Our Navy has been conducting anti-piracy patrols in the Gulf of Aden since October 2008. Our naval ships provide security escorts to both Indian and foreign flagged ships. We participate actively in the anti-piracy efforts of the Contact Group on Piracy off the Coast of Somalia. We believe that a more robust strategy is required to effectively deal with the problem of piracy. Such a strategy should involve an UN-led anti-piracy force to conduct naval operations. This would help in greater coordination of anti-piracy operations by various naval forces. The shipping industry and national governments must coordinate their response better to combat this resurgent threat of sea piracy.

Reform of UN Security Council

13. International security is a function of the measures taken by nations and international organizations, such as the United Nations, to put in place systems which ensure respect for concerns of countries and lead to mutual survival and safety. These measures include military action and diplomatic agreements such as treaties and conventions. International and national securities are invariably linked. International security is national security or state security in the global arena. In the UN, the Security Council enjoys the unique position among the principal organs of the UN, as it is devoted to the objective maintaining and preserving global peace and security. It is also bestowed with the unique authority to undertake actions under Chapter VII of the UN Charter with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, and acts of aggression to maintain and restore international peace and security. However, the Security Council has hardly changed since the establishment of the UN in 1945 though the membership of the UN has grown from original 51 members in 1945 to 194 in 2011. Its non-representative character and somewhat opaque working methods have been criticized by the wider membership of the UN.
The efforts for the Security Council reform have, however, been thwarted by the lack of consensus which has been thwarted by the veto powers enjoyed by the Permanent Five members over the UNSC reform process and the high procedural bar for reform involving Charter amendments and their subsequent ratification.

14. India is seeking an expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent membership of the Council and permanent membership of an expanded Security Council. It has also called for an improvement in the working methods.
India in collaboration with Brazil, Japan and Germany (together known as the G-4) has proposed expansion of the membership of the United Nations Security Council from fifteen to twenty-five by adding six permanent and four non-permanent members.

15. India’s claim for permanent membership is based not only on its strong credentials and factors, such as its population, size, GDP, economic potential, civilizational legacy, political system but also contribution to the activities of the UN and its profound conviction that a more representative Council can genuinely contribute to global security.

G-20 and Reform of International Financial Institutions

16. The financial crisis of 2008 which has grown into a global economic crisis clearly impacted on global security - through decreased confidence and a boost to protectionist instincts. The G-20 has thus evolved into an institutional mechanism which can contribute to global security. We believe that the G-20 needs to retain its focus on economic issues and conditions for ushering economic growth worldwide. While the Eurozone difficulties need attention, in the long term it is the recovery of growth worldwide and the reform of international financial institutions that can contribute to a global architecture of governance which enhances security. The creators of the Bretton Woods multilateral system had designed an international economic architecture to deal with the causes of the global financial breakdown in the 1930s and with the economic and security problems they thought would follow World War II. The policy prescriptions of the IMF, be it the Structural Adjustment Programme or the so-called “Washington Consensus” as coined by the economist John Williamson in 1989, with the focus, amongst others, on Fiscal policy discipline, Tax reform, Trade liberalization, and aggressive Deregulation often ended up exacerbating the situation in the affected borrowing countries. Many of the painful financial crises in Africa, Latin America, East Asia, Russia, and Turkey have been attributed to the above measures. It has been argued that a greater voice to the developing world in International Financial Institutions would have allowed for modulating policies, which would have been in consonance with the requirements of developing countries. Reform of the Bretton Woods Institutions, by enhancing the voice and participation of the developing world in these International Financial Institutions would, we believe, make an important contribution in building Global Security.

India’s role and collaboration with other developing countries.

17. India stood shoulder to shoulder with the developing countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America as they fought for political freedom from colonial yoke. Once this fundamental freedom was attained, India shifted focus aiding fellow countries in their social development and capacity building, even within the constraints of India itself being a developing country. Towards this end, the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) Programme was instituted by a decision of the Indian Cabinet on 15 September 1964 as a bilateral programme of assistance of the Government of India.

Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, who also served as the External Affairs Minister, was the main architect of the ITEC programme though it actually came into being after his lifetime. After their independence, the most important task facing the developing countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America was the promotion of social and economic advancement of their people which had been retarded and in most cases reversed during the years of colonial rule. Skilled manpower and experts, financial resources and transfer of technology were the bottlenecks to be overcome. To meet the challenges of socio-economic development, cooperative efforts of the developing countries were as important as assistance from developed countries and international organizations. India has made substantial progress and gained useful experience in industrial and technological development after it regained its freedom in 1947. It has extended assistance for infrastructure, industrial, agricultural and capacity building, programmes in other developing countries particularly in South Asia. These projects along with the wider ITEC schemes are an earnest attempt by India to share the fruits of its socio-economic development and technological achievement with other developing countries.
It is about cooperation and partnership for mutual benefit. We hope that such cooperation between countries will go a long way in promoting prosperity and enhancing security in the developing world. We are now seeking to improve the quality of India’s assistance program by creating a separate agency within MEA to give specialized attention to the task.

A word about Africa and our development partnerships there

18. With growing economic dynamism in India, India’s efforts have concentrated on enhancing economic development as the best antidote to poverty which is an issue connected to global security. Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh, visited Ethiopia in May 2011 to participate in the Second Africa-India Forum Summit at Addis Ababa – Ethiopia, the seat of the African Union. The Addis Ababa Declaration and the Framework for Enhanced Cooperation, adopted in 2011, bring out clearly the striking convergence of views between India and Africa, not only on bilateral matters, but also on issues such as UN reforms, Africa’s place in world affairs, climate change, and countering of terrorism. It may be recalled that in April 2008, our Prime Minister hosted the first historic India Africa Forum Summit, in Delhi that heralded the commencement of institutionalized interaction with Africa, injecting new momentum into an old relationship. The political will and commitment to build ties afresh with Africa have thus been on display in abundance. I believe that the collaboration between India and countries in Africa will have a salubrious role in enhancing stability in both the regions and contribute to mutual security.

19. India also draws upon it’s being the largest democracy in the world with a tradition of respect for rule of law, and its own experience in nation building to assist the UN in the maintenance of international peace and security in many of these countries. India has contributed nearly 100,000 troops, the largest number from any country, participated in more than 40 missions and more than a hundred Indian peacekeepers have made the supreme sacrifice while serving in UN missions. India has also provided and continues to provide eminent Force Commanders for UN Missions. This is not just a contribution to the UN but draws policy drive from a general commitment to what is today called “the Global Commons”. Building rule based international systems, with improved international monitoring and control can contribute to building global security. In the same way our Election Commission is gearing up to help with capacity building for election management in newly emerging democracies.

20. It is a fact of life that even in a world in which the UN has a greater role, the individual weight of nations will create polarities in the world order. It is our assessment that multipolarity would enhance global security. In the past we had non-alignment which started out as an attempt to preserve strategic autonomy but became an alternative center of activity in a bipolar world. Today, even as we speak of NAM 2.0, we are party to groups like BRICS which enhance multi-polarity. The original economic rationale put forward by Goldman Sachs in 2001 when they coined the term BRIC was the potential of these four countries to be drivers of global growth. However, the impact on global security due to the economic growth of the BRICS cannot be underestimated. The Fourth BRICS Summit was held recently in New Delhi on 29 March 2012. The Delhi Summit, which was the Fourth in the series so far, took place under the broad rubric of ‘BRICS Partnership for Global Stability, Security and Prosperity’. What the five BRICS nations have in common is a focus on eradicating poverty, securing food and energy supplies, developing infrastructure and gaining new technologies. The BRICS countries seek political dialogue towards a more democratic multi-polar order, in a world that is undergoing major and swift changes that highlight the need for corresponding transformations in global governance. The BRICS are brought together by their shared capacity and will to engage with each other as well as with the rest of the world in the global quest for meaningful, sustainable solutions to contemporary challenges of regional as well as global ramifications.

21. In another setting, India, Brazil and South Africa as democratic nations have created IBSA. The relative importance of these groupings may increase over time and it is unlikely they will remain exclusive.

Conclusion

22. Security remains an important prerequisite for supporting the freedom of our societies and in providing a just and equitable system for our people. I have looked at security through the prism of power but it cannot be so limited. While noting the caveats in NSA’s description, security cannot finally be seen in a narrow sense. Instead it should be embraced in the broadest possible way to include access to food, managing and arresting climate change, arresting the degradation of environment, and the need for the respect of harmony between human beings and the natural world. These are themes for another larger address; but it seems clear that a balance and harmonious existence between the two would go a long way in enhancing global security in our time and the ages to follow.

013. Press Release of the Ministry of Defence on the Address by the Defence Minister at the Commanders’ Conference.

New Delhi, April 16, 2012.

Describing the situation in the Af-Pak region as a ‘continuing cause of concern’, the Defence Minister Shri AK Antony today called upon the top brass of the Indian Army to be vigilant and take all appropriate steps keeping in view the developments in Afghanistan in the last couple of days. Addressing the Army Commanders’ Conference here, Shri Antony said, India remains steadfast in its commitment to provide support and assistance to Afghanistan so that it evolves into a stable country, strengthened by pluralism and free from external interference. He called upon the Defence Forces and all other Security Agencies to remain prepared to tackle the entire range of security challenges. “Balancing the imperatives of engaging globally with other powers and maintaining autonomy in decision-making, is one of the most important challenges of our times,” he said.

Referring to sharp increase in the defence spending by China for the modernization of its Armed Forces, Shri Antony said on our part we will continue to bolster our infrastructure and strengthen our capabilities along the border areas.

“However, our efforts are focused on safeguarding our security interests and not dictated by what other nations are doing. Several of the proposals of the Army are under implementation. Some others are expected to be cleared in the days ahead. We will provide all the support to modernize and enhance our defence capabilities to successfully meet any challenge,” he said.

Describing the situation in Jammu and Kashmir as stable, Shri Antony said, this is a direct consequence of the untiring efforts of the security forces. He, however, said the peace process is extremely fragile and the Armed Forces need to operate with maximum restraint and control without dropping their guard.

Turning to modernization of the Armed Forces, Shri Antony said the Government’s endeavour has been to provide the desired impetus to modernization in a systematic manner. He assured that the Government will continue to improve and fine-tune procedures whenever and wherever necessary, to ensure that the Army meets its modernization goals in an acceptable timeframe. Shri Antony observed that the acquisition of critical technologies from foreign countries will no doubt get subjected to various technology denial regimes and post-procurement dependencies. There is clearly an urgent need, he said, to achieve self-reliance in the field of critical defence equipment.

“This can be made possible only with the continuous cooperation of the Armed Forces, the scientists and other participants in the Defence Industry,” he said.

Shri Antony also called for strengthening further the Jointness in various operational, training and administrative facets among the three Services and the Ministry of Defence.

“The various security challenges before our Armed Forces require a concerted effort by all the wings of our Armed Forces. No single service can achieve the national goals all by itself,” he said.

The Defence Minister also ‘strongly urged’ the Army Commanders to adhere to the highest standards of personal behaviour and professional probity in their day-to-day dealings.

“I wish to emphasize that any act of corruption will not be condoned and we will take the strictest possible action against any wrongdoer,” he said.

I am happy to speak at the National Export Control Seminar today, which is being organized jointly by the Ministry of External Affairs and the Institute for Defence Studies and Analysis. I would like to thank DG IDSA for the excellent arrangements his Institute has put in place and for bringing together a wide range of participants - government officials from all Departments dealing with export controls, representatives from industry, analysts and scholars from the research and academic communities as well as foreign experts who will be participating in today’s deliberations. I would like to recognize the presence of members of the diplomatic corps, in particular representatives of countries currently chairing the various multilateral export control regimes.

Let me begin by addressing a simple but fundamental question. Why are export controls important for India?

We have for long recognized the challenge proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery poses for our national security and world order. The danger of terrorists gaining access to WMDs has added another facet to this grave threat. At the same time as a responsible member, India is committed to promoting and working with the international community in advancing the common objectives of global non-proliferation and international security.

Flowing from these considerations of national and international security and as a state possessing advanced and sensitive materials and technology, we are conscious of the need for responsible handling of these sensitive items from the point of production or manufacture, to their use internally or export abroad and eventual safe and secure disposition. India has no interest what so ever in aiding or abetting proliferation of WMDs, the misuse of dual use items or in non-state actors or terrorists gaining access to sensitive items. On the contrary we view a strong and effective national export control system as an essential link between our broader national security goals and our wider foreign policy objectives.

There is a second and equally compelling rationale for export controls. Just as export controls are vital for national security and global non-proliferation objectives, they are also essential for the pursuit of growth and national development by harnessing the benefits of globalization. Export control standards are increasingly the norm for global trade in sensitive material, equipment and technology and thus necessary if we are to increase the quantum of high technology items in our external trade and commercial exchanges. As India’s integration with global trade patterns and supply chains deepens, it would increasingly become an important hub of manufacturing and export of high technology items. Foreign investment including through offsets for governmental procurement will strengthen our global links. Our export control system would add to the reliability and credibility of Indian companies in the global market and thus increase their competitive edge. High technology companies would invest in India confident that apart from favorable commercial returns, access to a huge market and skilled workforce and protection of IPR, there would be no risk of unauthorized diversion or re-exports. That export controls are an added burden on industry is a mistaken and short sighted notion. At the same time, Government is conscious that there be no unreasonable restrictions on legitimate trade and commercial activities and export control procedures are clear and implementable without undue delays.

Let me describe briefly India’s export control framework. India has a law based export system covering about 9 different legislations. I will mention only the most important: the Foreign Trade Development and Regulation Act or FTDR of 1992, the Atomic Energy Act of 1962, the Customs Act of 1962 and the Weapons of Mass destruction Act of 2005. Systematic dual use control lists in India were first notified in 1995 and were named as SMET - “Special Material, Equipment and Technology”, published under our Foreign Trade Act. This list has subsequently been revised in 1999, 2005 and 2007 and is widely known as “SCOMET” - Special Chemicals, Organisms, Material, Equipment and Technology - List.

I would like to highlight a few points with respect to more recent developments. Our WMD Act of 2005 incorporated into national legislation key international standards in export controls, covering technology transfers, end-user or “catch-all” controls, brokering, transshipment and transit controls. In 2010, these changes were translated into our Foreign Trade Act through an amendment adopted by our Parliament which widened the ambit of dual-use controls. Second, the harmonization of SCOMET controls with the Nuclear Suppliers Group and Missile Technology Control Regime guidelines and annexes was notified in 2008. Our export controls are thus in line with the highest international standards and in some cases, in view of the generic coverage of controlled items or controls at the stage of manufacturing, they extend beyond the controls of the multilateral regimes. Third, our regulatory framework is updated regularly, for example following adoption of UN Security Council resolutions 1874 and 1929. Fourth, we have increased engagement with various countries and our participation in international and regional export control seminars and conferences. This engagement includes the four multilateral export control regimes, which I will return to a bit later in my speech.

In terms of implementation, an Inter-Ministerial Working Group coordinated by the Directorate General of Foreign Trade administers the SCOMET regulations. The regulations outline the procedure, process and factors relating to the licensing of controlled items. The licensing process is rigorous and involves assessment of export applications by various departments. Due restraint and responsibility in the transfer of sensitive systems and technologies is exercised based on a dynamic risk assessment system and changing proliferation trends.

It is true that any export control system is as good as its enforcement on the ground. Our national enforcement mechanisms cover prevention, detection and penalization of unauthorized exports. Customs and other enforcement agencies are active participants in these efforts. These activities are coordinated through an inter-agency Core Group which meets periodically to review these issues. As part of our regular review of implementation of export controls, we are looking at updating our control lists, strengthening national capacity through training for enforcement officials, commodity identification support and installation of detection equipment at ports and border checkpoints and other measures. The DGFT is in the process of introducing by June this year an online application system that would not only further ease the application process but also facilitate implementation.

We believe that industry is the first line of defence in terms of effective export controls. Industry outreach is an important area not only to enhance understanding about export controls among producers and exporters of controlled items but also share best practices in internal control systems for due diligence at the level of companies. This requires a continuous effort in various parts of the country, involving even small and medium enterprises. Industry leadership is important and the Ministry of External Affairs was pleased to support a Confederation of Indian Industry (CII) event last month on export controls. I am glad to note that the CII is working on a voluntary “Code of Conduct” on export controls, which can be a useful guide as companies work on strengthening their internal compliance systems. India is also open to cooperating with other countries in sharing of experiences and best practices in export controls.

With this brief survey of the national scene, let me return to the international aspects of export controls. India shares global non-proliferation objectives and supports strengthening the non-proliferation regime. Since 2002, we have been piloting a UN First Committee resolution on “Measures to prevent terrorists from acquiring WMDs” which is traditionally adopted by consensus. We supported the extension of the mandate of the 1540 Committee pursuant to UNSC resolution 1540. An eminent Indian expert worked as part of the Expert Group of the 1540 Committee from 2007-09. We have also announced our intention to host a UNSCR 1540 workshop to strengthen the implementation of the resolution. India has contributed to the success of the Nuclear Security Summit process. Our Prime Minister has participated in both the Summits held in Washington in April 2010 and in Seoul in March 2012. In January this year, I hosted a Sherpa meeting involving more than 50 countries in New Delhi to prepare for the Seoul Nuclear Security Summit. India has joined the Global Initiative to Combat Nuclear Terrorism and participates in all its activities. India has also participated in the preparatory process for negotiating an Arms Trade Treaty at the UN. India is in full compliance with its obligations as a State Party to the Chemical Weapons Convention and the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention.

India’s impeccable non-proliferation record has been widely recognized and was reflected in the milestone NSG decision of September 2008 on Civil Nuclear Cooperation with India. With respect to India’s implementation of the Statement on Civil Nuclear cooperation, I would like to mention the following:

- India concluded the Safeguards Agreement with IAEA which entered into force in May 2009.
- An Additional Protocol was also approved by the Board of Governors in March 2009 and signed in May 2009. India is committed to its ratification as soon as necessary internal preparatory work is completed.
- With respect to implementation of the Separation Plan, we have already put 12 out of 14 reactors under IAEA Safeguards. Only two more reactors are required to be notified by 2014.
- India has signed civil nuclear cooperation agreements with France, US, Russia, Canada, Argentina, UK, Namibia, Mongolia, Kazakhstan and ROK. Negotiations are taking place with Japan on a bilateral Nuclear Cooperation Agreement. India and the United States signed an Agreement setting out Arrangements and Procedures for Reprocessing pursuant to their bilateral Nuclear Cooperation Agreement in July 2010.
- India has adhered to the NSG and MTCR guidelines and will maintain adherence. India has continued with its policy of refraining from transfer of enrichment and reprocessing technologies to states that do not possess them and supporting international efforts to limit their spread. We supported the establishment of an IAEA fuel bank resolution contained in Gov/2010/68 adopted by the IAEA Board in December 2010 and resolution GOV/2011/16 adopted by the Board of Governors in March 2011. India has the capabilities to be a supplier state.

- India has a longstanding commitment to complete, universal, non-discriminatory and verifiable elimination of nuclear weapons in a time bound manner- a vision that was set forth in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan. We remain committed to a voluntary and unilateral moratorium on nuclear explosive testing. We are also committed to work together for the commencement of negotiations in the Conference on Disarmament on a multilateral, universal, non-discriminatory and verifiable Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty.

- To sum up, India has consistent record of implementation of its voluntary commitments and has made progress since September 2008 in the implementation of the Civil Nuclear Initiative.

In November 2010, India expressed interest in taking forward this engagement with the international community to the next phase of seeking membership of the four export control regimes - NSG, MTCR, Australia Group and the Wassenaar Arrangement We are aware that there are regime specificities. Each regime has its own membership criteria, control lists and methodology of work. But at the same time, there are underlying objectives and principles which are common to all the regimes to which India subscribes to fully as it has demonstrated responsible non-proliferation and export control practices and has shown the ability and willingness to contribute substantially to global non-proliferation objectives. In this sense, India is a ‘like-minded’ country that shares the same objectives and goals. Further, in a material sense given the size of India’s industry and its projected growth, it is clear that India has the ability to produce, manufacture or supply a vast majority of items that are controlled by these regimes. As India’s integration with the global supply chains moves forward, it would be in the interest of the four regimes that India’s exports are subject to the same framework as other major supplier countries. Third, India has the ability to enforce a legally based domestic export control system which gives effect to the commitment to act in accordance with the respective guidelines of the regimes. Finally, India has developed considerable experience in the implementation of its export control system. We have witnessed instances of would be proliferators targeting India to source or route their supplies; our agencies have taken appropriate preventive action in such cases. We believe that India’s participation in discussions relating to proliferation assessments, trends, licensing experiences, enforcement issues, etc. will be mutually beneficial.

We appreciate the support extended by a number of countries for the objective of India’s full membership of the four export control regimes, in particular the United States, Russian Federation and France. While we wish to move forward in tandem on all the four regimes, our engagement with NSG is seen by observers as the most important. India cannot be a target of regime based restrictions. The logical conclusion of partnership with India is its full membership of the four multilateral regimes.

India has engaged actively with all the four regimes through outreach meetings. This year, we have already completed outreach meetings with NSG in Vienna where I led the Indian delegation (March 1), and in Delhi with MTCR (30 January) and the Wassenaar Arrangement (21 March) and plan the next outreach meeting with the Australia Group in the coming weeks. From India’s point of view, the main purpose and primary objective of India’s enhanced and sustained engagement with these regimes is full membership. We will take forward this process of engagement and apply for membership when the necessary preparations have been completed and the ground has been prepared for India’s full membership. We believe that India’s membership of the four regimes will be mutually beneficial on grounds of common non-proliferation objectives, India’s ability to contribute to the fulfillment of those objectives, global industry cooperation and linkages, transfers subject to the highest export control standards, sound commercial considerations and the contributions that the Indian industry can make with its expanding capabilities and highly qualified work force.

Let me conclude by quoting from Prime Ministers’ statement at the Seoul Nuclear Security Summit last month. He said

“India has never been a source of proliferation of sensitive technologies and we are determined to further strengthen our export control systems to keep them on par with the highest international standards. We have already adhered to the guidelines of the NSG and MTCR. As a like-minded country with the ability and willingness to promote global non-proliferation objectives, we believe that the next logical step is India’s membership of the four export control regimes.”

Seminars like this are most valuable in bringing together policy makers, administrators, experts and industry to assess various dimensions of export controls, as listed in the Programme. You have a full agenda for today’s seminar and I wish you success in your deliberations.

Thank you.
Ladies & Gentlemen

I am delighted to join you to launch this publication on “Doing Business with Eurasia”. We in the Ministry of External Affairs find this exercise commendable and timely, since we are ourselves engaged in working out ways of intensifying our economic and commercial contacts with this extended neighbourhood. This volume provides a wealth of information which, I am sure, businessmen on both sides would profit from. One of the reasons, often cited, for low levels of trade and economic engagement between India and many countries of the region, is the information deficit: we lack credible and authentic information on key business data, like rules and regulations, finance sector details, export/import tariffs, or procedures for setting up businesses. This publication is bound to competently fill this gap. I am also glad to see that this project is the fruit of cooperation between an apex chamber- CII- and the Ministry of External Affairs, the Ministry of Commerce, our Missions and local Missions of the countries in the Eurasia region. Such cooperation between the business sector and representatives of governments is vitally important not just to bring out a reliable publication, but also for the larger cause of finding ways of increasing our economic engagement.

The year 2012 marks the twentieth anniversary of diplomatic ties between India and the countries in the region, and with Russia we have just marked the 65th anniversary of bilateral relations. While our diplomatic relations with Eurasia may be only two decades old, our links with the region go back centuries. Our economic ties too, are as old as the legendary Silk Route. The common challenge before us all is to revive the magic of our silken bonds.

With Russia, our bilateral relations continue to progress on a positive trajectory. The 12th Annual India-Russia Summit between our leaders was held in Moscow in December 2011 and they met again during the BRICS Summit in New Delhi in March. We have also seen multiple bilateral visits at the Ministerial level, meetings of Intergovernmental Commissions and visits of numerous expert delegations. These exchanges reflect the multifaceted and dynamic nature of our time-tested and historical ties, which are now characterized as a “special and privileged” strategic partnership. We have close political coordination and robust cooperation in key sectors like defence, civil nuclear energy, space, hydrocarbons and S&T. But this very special political and Government-to-Government relationship is not yet matched by a strong enough Business-to-Business relationship. Our trade stands at less than 10 billion dollars and we have a long way to go to meet our target of 20 billion dollars by 2015.

India today enjoys a warm and growing relationship with each of the Eurasian countries but is not a significant enough economic partner, largely due to the political and geographical constraint of connectivity. This however has not dampened India's interest in cultivating stronger multi-dimensional ties with these countries. With Armenia, Azerbaijan and Georgia the trend of consolidation & gradual strengthening of bilateral relations continues. High level exchange of visits with Ukraine and Belarus have served to intensify bilateral relations. But with each of these countries, the vast economic potential remains untapped.

In Central Asia, with which we share deep civilizational links, India's presence may not be very visible but is prominent in several niches. To name a few, the IT sector, capacity building under our ITEC programme, pharmaceuticals, lines of credit and projects under our Eurasia Aid program. We have set up IT Centres of Excellence in Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, as also in Belarus and Armenia, and are planning one in Kazakhstan. There are several other projects on the anvil covering e-networking, health, education, connectivity and development assistance and we hope through them to strengthen and enhance India's presence in the region.

Yet it is clear to all of us that on the ground, our levels of economic engagement in this area have a great deal of room for growth. The true potential of bilateral trade and commercial relations is yet to be explored and tapped. The Eurasian region today constitutes only 2% share in India's total global trade. This is hardly an impressive number. The Government and industry need to clearly identify problem areas and work together for solutions.

One way to energize the trade basket can be by exploiting each other's comparative advantages, and bridging the information gap regarding new and emerging areas of opportunities- this compilation today is an effort in that direction.

The Eurasian region is endowed with vast resources and opportunities. Rich in mineral resources, the Eurasian countries also have well-developed agri-business sectors. Eurasian countries are also keen to adopt agri-business solutions that are affordable and vital to SMEs. In the Energy sector, there are obvious complementarities between energy surplus Eurasia and energy deficient India. These spell profitable opportunities in a wide array of businesses.

Eurasian countries have also demonstrated expertise in research and development in scientific and technological sectors and in transport services.
The two regions could also consider building a strong platform for sharing views on innovation and research and development in these areas so as to learn and benefit from each other’s competence.

We also need to work together on several areas like trade barriers, conformity of standards and measures of quality, trade linkages, financing SMEs, and mobilizing lines of credit. We need to further look at simplified work permits and business visas to reduce its growing trade imbalance with the region.

India also has a lot to offer to Eurasia. India is ranked third globally for factors favouring FDI investment, (with China and the US being the other two leading destinations). Sectors in which India has shown high export growth over the last few years are information and communication technology, professional services such as medical health, engineering, travel and tourism, as well as certain financial services. All these have markets in Eurasia.

India is considered the ‘Pharmacy of the World’ and India has emerged as the most reliable supplier of quality generic drugs to Eurasian region, and the potential for further cooperation is promising. There are significant opportunities for companies in Eurasia to invest in India in the area of Construction and Engineering services. Most of the Eurasian countries are net importers of food items, but India’s share in their imports is at present not very significant.

We can enhance our exchanges through visits by trade and industry delegations / economic missions. These trade/economic missions could focus on specialized and industry specific fairs and exhibitions; organizing buyer-sellers-meets; joint venture facilitation; organizing specialized ‘Made in India’ exhibitions showcasing Indian expertise; and preparation of product catalogues in electronic form. We also need to look at increasing direct flights to cover more cities in the Eurasian region and also increase the frequency of destinations to which flights are already operating.

Lack of direct surface transportation routes has hampered trade relations between India and the region. We are hence placing importance in developing the International North South Transport Corridor project as also the Trans Afghan Corridors, which would link India to the Central Asian region, Russia and beyond, through sea ports/surface routes in Iran. We also need to look at air links to cover more destinations and increase frequency of present flights.

The Eurasian economic space is fast unifying. The Russia-Belarus-Kazakhstan Customs Union is already a reality and may integrate newer members. We are looking at a possible Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement with this Union.

In conclusion, we see tremendous potential for India’s steadily rising engagement with the countries of the region. This engagement will be driven by a desire for general peace and prosperity. We look forward to working together with cooperation from the public and private sector, thus strengthening opportunities both for growth, prosperity and security.

I once again congratulate CII and all those who contributed to the publication of this important information tool. I would like to say on behalf of the Ministry of External Affairs that we welcome suggestions that will help boost trade and economic relations between India and the Eurasian countries.

Thank you.
016. Press release of the Ministry of Home Affairs regarding Institutional Mechanism Required to Tackle Terrorism.

New Delhi, May 11, 2012.

The threat perception of terrorism in the country continues to be high and we need an institutional mechanism to tackle it. Given the gravity of the situation, everyday we delay NCTC, we increase our risk. This was stated by the Union Home Minister P. Chidambaram while replying to the Consultative Committee Members here today. Naxalism and insurgency in North East are now becoming terrorist in nature and we need institutional mechanism to deal with it. He said that we need to counter terrorism not just as a police operation but we need a counter terrorism organization that mobilizes all elements of national power; diplomatic, financial, investigative, intelligence and police. Therefore, he said we need counter terrorism body like NCTC or similar organization.

Members expressed concern over growing terrorist activities and cross border terrorism and smuggling and circulation of fake currency notes. They emphasised the need for a strong mechanism to deal with terrorism which has now taken global dimensions. Some members suggested early finalization of NCTC in this context. Member also suggested stopping of Hawala funds. Members expressed concern/highlighted spread of opium and other drugs and growing terrorism in Punjab, linking it with Pakistan and suggested strong measures to counter these.

Earlier while initiating the discussion, the Union Home Minister said that Counter-terrorism structure in place consists of Multi Agency Centre (MAC) & Subsidiary Multi Agency Centres (SMAC), National Investigation Agency (NIA) and National Security Guards (NSG). Those being put in place are NATGRID and Crime & Criminal Tracking Network System (CCTNS). The Centre for Counter terrorism is not in place. He explained that apart from subversive activities of militant groups in North East and violence perpetrated by Left Wing Extremist Group (LWE) in some States, the growing concern remains on combating cross border terrorism. He said the Government is committed to ensure that perpetrators of terrorist activities and their masterminds and conspirators are brought to justice and that prosecution and sentencing to the fullest extent of the law is ensured.

Scheme for Modernization of State Police Forces (MPF) is being reviewed and extended by the Central Government beyond 31.3.2011 and work for conceptualizing the next phase of the Scheme has also commenced. Since 2009 to 2011, under the MPF Scheme, 745 new police stations have been constructed. In addition, 17824 vehicles, 26465 bullet proof jackets and 107786 weapons have been provided to the State and UT police forces. Integrated Action Plan (IAP) is being implemented with series of developmental schemes to deal with poverty in naxal affected areas.

The policy of the Government is to undertake intelligence-based operations to neutralize terrorist/espionage cell/modules. This is done in a coordinated and sustained manner by the Central and State Security and intelligence agencies.

As a result of the coordination action by the Central and State intelligence and security agencies, 51 Pak backed terrorist/espionage modules have been detected/neutralized in various parts of the country.

Answering queries of Members, the Union Home Minister said that there are only two terrorist bomb blast cases which are not completely solved as yet i.e. Mehrauli bomb blast case of March 2010 and Sheetala Ghat Varanasi case of December 2010.

Sh. H.K. Dua, Nominated, Sh. Mohd. Ali Khan, INC Andhra Pradesh, Sh. Vinay Katiyar, BJ P, Uttar Pradesh from Rajya Sabha. Shri Bhisma Shankar alias Kushal Tiwari, BSP, Uttar Pradesh, Sh. D.B. Chandre Gowda, BJ P, Karnataka, Dr. Thokchom Meinya, INC, Manipur, Sh. Mahabal Mishra, INC, Delhi from Lok Sabha. 017. Keynote Address by the National Security Advisor Shivshankar Menon at the Release of the IDSA Report on "India's Cyber Security Challenge".

New Delhi, May 16, 2012.

Dr. Arvind Gupta, DG, IDSA,
Shri Nitin Desai, Chairman of the Task Force, Members of the Task Force,
Ladies and Gentlemen,
Friends.

I am delighted to speak at the release of the IDSA Task Force report on India's Cyber Security Challenge. The wealth of experience and expertise in the task force is impressive, as is the quality of the report that you have produced on a subject that should be of wide interest. I therefore, wish to thank the IDSA and the Task Force members for this very useful initiative.

The report is also topical, coming as it does when Government is in the final stages of preparing a Whole-of-Government cyber security architecture. There is also considerable and increasing concern in the strategic community and the general public about cyber security. Your report is therefore well timed.

Our increasing dependence on cyber space and the internet is evident. We had over 100 million internet users in India over two years ago. Add to this the 381 million mobile phone subscriptions with internet connectivity and the increasing seamlessness with which all sorts of devices connect to the internet. There are well over 2 billion internet users in the world — a number that doubled in the five years between 2005 and 2010. These numbers are growing exponentially and give one some idea of the increasing reach of the internet and our growing dependence upon cyber space. Most of us in one way or other use and depend on cyber space in the performance of our work and in our daily lives.

Public concern about cyber security is rising, partly because of the weight of anecdotal evidence that is building up about cyber war and attacks. Stuxnet and Ghostnet, for instance, appear to most citizens as unseen forces having apparently magical effects in the real world. It is also fear of the unknown, because most persons lack a conceptual framework or understanding that would enable them to deal with the issue. The Task Force Report is therefore welcome as a significant contribution to increasing understanding of the issue of cyber security and of what we should be worrying about in this field.
The other reason for public concern and anxiety is the anarchic nature of the domain of cyber space, glimpses of which naturally cause alarm. When this is combined with the potential effects of malicious attacks and disruptions in the cyber world upon such basic social necessities as power supplies, banking, railways, air traffic control, etc. it is only natural that people should worry about cyber security.

Nor do experts help to allay concerns in their choice of terms to describe these phenomena. We speak of cyber crime, when these acts are not a traditional law and order problem. Nor can they be dealt with as such, thanks to problems of attribution, lack of legal frameworks and without enforcement capabilities and punishment.

We also speak of cyber war, even though conflict or attacks in the cyber world do not follow the rules or logic of war as understood so far in other domains. In this new domain of contention war, espionage, surveillance, control and the traditional security functions, activities and crimes occur but differ from those in traditional domains. Here we have to unlearn some of the lessons we learnt earlier. Traditional deterrence hardly works in a battle-space like the cyber world where operations and attack occur almost at the speed of light. At these speeds there is a premium on attacking first, or offense.

The effect of ICT on warfare is evident in command and control, in the new surveillance and communication technologies and in cyber operations which have kinetic effects in the real world. We have seen a new way of warfare, a true RMA, since the early 90s, enabled by ICT.

The ICT revolution has also brought power to non-state actors and individuals, to small groups such as terrorists. It has given small groups and individuals the means to threaten and act against much larger, more complex and powerful groups. Since the technology is now available or accessible widely, and is mostly held in private hands, ICT has redistributed power within states.

We see the practical effects of these changes all around us. Look at the social and political effects of the new technologies in the turmoil in West Asia. The cocktail of social media, 24-hour television, NGOs and Special Forces create a virtual reality which soon has effects in the real world. These are not just law and order problems, and they are not amenable to the traditional responses that states are accustomed to. We have seen technology place increasingly lethal power in the hands of non-state actors. The effects can range from the benign to the dangerous, though the technology itself is value neutral. In West Asia today we see its use by popular movements to mobilise people and influence opinion against regimes across the Arab world. Autocratic regimes across the world now take the power of ICT very seriously.
Equally, intelligence and espionage increasingly rely on what are euphemistically called national technical means, namely cyber penetration and surveillance. The same technologies also empower the state in terms of its capacity for internal surveillance, interception and so on. Their power and reach raise fundamental issues about the lines that a democratic society must draw between the collective right to security and the individual’s right to privacy. What makes this more complicated is the fact that these technologies are not just available to the state, where laws and policies can control and limit their use. They are widely available in the public domain, where commercial and individual motives can easily lead to misuse that is not so easily regulated, unless we rethink and update our legal and other approaches.

Between states, information technologies and their effects have made asymmetric strategies much more effective and attractive. In situations of conventional imbalance between states we see that asymmetric strategies are increasingly common. Cyber war and anti-satellite capabilities are uses of technology by a weaker state to neutralise or raise the cost and deter the use of its military strength by a stronger country.

In the name of defence all the major powers are developing offensive cyber capabilities as well as using cyber espionage. So are smaller powers who see ICT as an equaliser. One estimate speaks of about 120 countries developing the capacity for cyber warfare. But by its nature, as Wikileaks showed, the threats in this domain are not just from states. These technologies have also enabled individuals and small groups to use cyber space for their own ends.

We in India are subject to unwelcome attention from many of them, state and non-state. Government are in the process of putting in place the capabilities and the systems in India that will enable us to deal with this anarchic new world of constant and undeclared cyber threat, attack, counter-attack and defence. We need to prepare to deal with both threats to cyber space and risks arising through cyber space. This will be a step towards the “coherent and comprehensive cyber security policy” that the Task Force Report rightly calls for on page 25. While NTRO is tasked to deal with the protection of our critical security cyber infrastructure, institutions like CERT-IN have proved their worth during events like the Commonwealth Games in defending our open civil systems. We are making a beginning in putting in place a system of certification and responsibility for telecommunication equipment and are working on procedures and protocols which will rationalise communication interception and monitoring. We need to harden our critical networks. And we will develop metrics to certify and assure that our critical cyber networks, equipment and infrastructure are secure. We also need to create a climate and environment within which security is built into our cyber and communications working methods.
As your report rightly points out, this clearly has to be more than just a whole-of-government effort. It must include the entire scientific and technological strength of the country, whether in laboratories, universities or in our private sector firms.

I therefore welcome the main recommendations of the Task Force as a useful contribution to the evolution of national cyber security policy. There is only one part of the Task Force’s recommendations with which I personally have a difference of emphasis. It speaks about “proactive diplomatic policy” on cyber security, and suggests that multilateral efforts for international internet governance are useful. The Report itself recognizes that most proposals for international internet governance are thinly masked efforts to control or shape the internet, and that some are ideologically driven. Inter-governmental rules of the road are certainly desirable. No one can argue against them. But in my personal view we must be clear that they will not have practical effect or be followed unless they are in the clear self-interest of those who should be following them.

One final point. I do hope that the Task Force Report will also bring some reason and proportion into our discussion of cyber security.

To cite one example, there is invariably a big hullabaloo when one of our websites is hacked. But websites are meant to be hit. Their success is measured by how many people access or hit them. So when a website is defaced by hackers, as happened to the CBI website, it is not necessarily a security breach, though it might hurt one’s pride. It seems to me that available resources would be better used to defend and harden our critical cyber infrastructure, expanding what is secure, from the known to the unknown. The Task Force report suggestions on how we could do so are very useful.

I therefore have no hesitation in commending the central messages in the report to those interested in cyber security in India as we work together to strengthen India’s cyber defences.

019. Inaugural Address by External Affairs Minister at the 28th All India Annual Conference for Haj - 2012.

New Delhi, May 22, 2012.

Chairperson of the Haj Committee of India Smt Mohsina Kidwai ji, Hon'ble Members of Parliament,
Secretary (East) Shri Sanjay Singh,
Ambassador of Saudi Arabia to India His Excellency Saud Mohammed AlSati
Ambassador Hamid Ali Rao, Distinguished Guests and Invitees,

It is indeed an honour and privilege to address the Haj Conference 2012. I welcome the dignitaries on the dais and the distinguished audience from all over the country to discuss the issues of concern and collectively consider the solutions and improvements to make Haj 2012 successful.

Chairperson Smt. Mohsina Kidwai ji personally wrote to me that Haj 2011 was a relatively smooth and efficiently organized operation. But I must emphasize that it would not have been possible without the close cooperation of all the stake holders including the Chairperson of the Haj Committee herself and her team of officers in the forefront apart from the officials of the Ministry of External Affairs, our Embassy in Riyadh, the Consulate General in Jeddah and, last but not least in importance, the Haj Mission of India comprising over 500 doctors, paramedics, Assistant Haj Officers, Haj Assistants etc., and others. Having said that I would like to alert all the officers dealing with Haj 2012 not to let their guard down and remain alert and ahead of the plans and programmes for Haj 2012. Haj is such a complex and tedious operation that we can ill-afford complacency at any point in time.

This year, we started the preparations for Haj very much ahead of time. As always, we have framed our Haj policy keeping in view the principle objective of the safety and security and comfort and convenience of our pilgrims. We had planned to announce the 2012 Haj policy in January or February itself. However, the Special Leave Petition filed by Government of India in the Hon'ble Supreme Court to seek a stay of the Order of the Mumbai High Court on the Haj PTO Policy 2011 was converted by the Hon'ble Court into a Public Interest Litigation to examine the entire Haj policy.

It was only after the interim verdict was announced by the Court on May 8, 2012 that the Haj 2012 Policy could be finalized and released and that was done on May 18, 2012. At this juncture, I would like to share with you the fact that representatives of Private Tour Operators, the Haj Committee of India and experts from the legal field were closely involved with the Ministry in the process of making the 2012 Haj Policy. Such a participatory and transparent procedure has been adopted perhaps for the first time ever by the Government.

I hardly need to reiterate the fact that Haj is one of the most complex tasks undertaken by Government of India outside its borders and involves close coordination with a large number of Agencies within India and in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. The principle objective of the Government is to ensure that the best possible service is provided to our pilgrims from the time they arrive at their respective embarkation points in India till they return home safely after fulfilling their dream of performing Haj.

At no point in time we must lose sight of the fact that it is a once in a life time chance in which a pilgrim expends the savings he would have painstakingly accumulated over his life time. It is the duty of the Government, therefore, to ensure that his hard earned savings are utilized carefully and optimally and every effort is made to ensure that the great journey of each pilgrim is made safe, affordable, comfortable and enjoyable and the collective and cumulative experience of every stake holder engaged in the management of Haj works towards that objective.

Ours is one of the largest Haj contingents to the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. A large number of Governmental and other Agencies in India and in Saudi Arabia are involved in planning, preparing and conducting the great annual exercise of the Haj pilgrimage. Problems will continue to be encountered and they would need to be constantly envisaged and addressed. The city check-in system introduced last year proved to be very effective in ensuring that Hajis do not lose their baggage and return happy, contented and with their baggage and the holy zam zam water cans. We therefore intend to continue to use the city check-in this year too.

We have introduced some new improvements this year too. At the outset, effective Haj 2012, a pilgrim can use the facility of performing Haj through the Haj Committee of India only once in his/her life time as against once in five years which was the case hitherto. Effective Haj 2012, Haj applications must have the proof of valid Passports. The Ministry of External Affairs has worked hard to bring about this significant change because of which every pilgrim this year will have an international Passport before proceeding on his pilgrimage. I am happy to state that the Haj Committee has received more applications this year than last year despite the Passport having been made compulsory.

The Haj Committee this year has come out with a very lucid and easy to understand Haj Guide which will be a great help to Hajis. We have also commenced the work to explore the possibility of permanent accommodation for our Hajis so that their stay can be made comfortable and affordable as and when the regime is put in place. I am informed that a Committee has been set up on this issue and it has already had its first meeting last evening.

In conclusion, I would like to request that all officers, officials and interlocutors involved in the preparation for Haj 2012 must keep in close touch so that we work as a closely knit team. The nearly six hundred Government of India Deputationists comprising Doctors, Paramedics, Haj Assistants and Assistant Haj Officers including Khadim ul Hujjaj must reach Saudi Arabia well in time and be ready to receive the Hajis. They must remember that they are the family for each pilgrim in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia away from his home in India and they must ensure that they are accessible immediately to any pilgrim who needs their assistance.

I wish our pilgrims a safe, successful and enjoyable Haj 2012.

Thank you.

020. Press Interaction of Prime Minister on-board his special flight en route from Yangon to New Delhi.

May 29, 2012.

Prime Minister of India (Dr. Manmohan Singh): Ladies and gentlemen, I have had a very productive and fruitful two-day visit to Myanmar. I had the opportunity of fairly detailed discussions with President Thein Sein. I also had the privilege of having a fairly long conversation with Daw Aung San Suu Kyi.

Our relations with Myanmar have taken a new turn after the visit of the President of Myanmar to India in October, and what we have discussed and agreed upon yesterday has further strengthened our multifaceted relationship with a friendly neighbour that Myanmar is.

I believe Foreign Secretary has briefed you about the details of what we have been talking, what we have agreed upon, and what is the way forward. I will be very happy to answer any questions that you may have.

Question: Good evening, Mr. Prime Minister. You seem to have had a historic visit. What do you say would be the single biggest message that you delivered to the Myanmar Government?

Prime Minister: That India is very appreciative of the efforts being made by the President of Myanmar for national reconciliation and democratization, and it is our fond hope that this process will be carried forward for the good of the people of Myanmar as a whole.

Question: Sir, is there a common thread between the discussions you had with President Thein Sein and Daw Aung San Suu Kyi?

Prime Minister: I had a whole range of issues being discussed between me and the President of Myanmar. But most of my discussion with Daw Aung San Suu Kyi was concentrated on the process of national reconciliation and how development can be made more inclusive, how the process of development can be really made people-friendly, and have greater transparency. She is now a legislator, and she was telling me the difficulties that the ordinary people find in accessing various services being provided by the Government. And I said we have the same problem, and despite long experience we do not claim that we have all the answers to these problems. I also said to her that our problems are very similar, judging from what she told me, and that we would be very happy to engage with the Government and people and civil society of Myanmar. Not that we have something to tell Myanmar what to do or what not to do but to work out joint common pathways to find productive, mutually acceptable solutions to these difficult problems of development and inclusion.
Question: Sir, in the North East there are four States which border Myanmar. There are lots of concerns about insurgent groups who operate from areas across the border in Myanmar. Was this issue discussed?

Prime Minister: I had a detailed discussion with His Excellency the President on this issue, the problems that Indian insurgent groups pose to us in taking shelter in Myanmar to evade arrest and to commit acts of violence. And I have assurance from the President of Myanmar that they would make every effort to ensure that Myanmar territory is not used for anti-Indian operations, and that we should strengthen cooperation in ensuring that our borders on both sides are as peaceful as is humanly possible.

Question: As you did during your visit to Dhaka when you carried with yourself Northeastern Chief Ministers, don’t you think similar venture this time would have given greater dividends because many states have common borders with Myanmar?

Prime Minister: I do recognize problems are very similar, and what I discussed would have been of interest to all the Northeastern States. I am conscious of that fact. But quite frankly, I felt that we had not prepared for this visit that fully as to find out practical, pragmatic solutions to the problems of border management. Therefore, I thought that we should first discuss basic principles and modalities and that should take place sooner or later.

Question: Rupee appreciation is alarming, oil prices are going up, your reaction on it? Are we going back to 1991 situation?

Prime Minister: The situation is a cause of concern, but I do not think we are anywhere near the 1991 situation. The fall of the Rupee is taking place against the background of what is taking place in the global economic scene, the Eurozone crisis. And, therefore, the Foreign Institutional Investors and the Foreign Direct Investors are hesitant to go to countries where they were earlier very positive in investing. I believe this is a phenomenon which is not going to last very long. One way or the other, European countries have come to terms with the crisis that prevails in Europe. The global economy is also facing challenges. And I sincerely hope that the G20 meeting next month in Mexico will come to terms with some of these issues. Hopefully some credible solutions about better management of the international financial system will emerge. But I do agree that the situation as it is, is hurting even the emerging economies. India and other emerging economies like South Africa are also affected by this turn of events.

Question: (in response to a question on insurgents from North East India using Myanmar soil-question inaudible)
Prime Minister: Yes, it was discussed with great seriousness. I do not want to say more than that. As I told you earlier the President of Myanmar assured me that their territory is not used for activities against India. He wanted us to tell Myanmar where these insurgents were located, they would cooperate with us against them.

New Delhi, May 31, 2012.

Hon'ble Shri Tarun Vijay Ji, Member of Parliament, Joint Secretary Shri Gautam Bambawale, Distinguished Pilgrims,

I am delighted to be amidst you today as you embark on a fascinating Yatra to the abode of Lord Shiva. This is a very special occasion. You are indeed privileged to be able to undertake this Yatra.

It is heartening to note that the Kailash Manasarovar Yatra has completed 30 years. During the last 30 years, our endeavour has been to work closely with the Government of People’s Republic of China and authorities in Tibet to improve the facilities offered to the Yatris and to ensure that the Yatra proceeds smoothly every year. We are informed that in the 12th Plan of China, special focus is being made to improve facilities in the Tibetan side.

On our part, we have also been working closely with the Government of Uttarakhand and the Kumaon Mandal Vikas Nigam to improve facilities. For this, the Ministry of External Affairs is even making financial provisions from time to time.

We are constantly introducing improvements and changes based on the feed back from Yatris. In this regard, we look forward to receive your suggestions as it will enable the Ministry of External Affairs to make improvements for the Yatra to be more convenient and safe.

India and China are commemorating this year as the Year of Friendship and Cooperation. The Kailash Manasarovar Yatra is a lasting symbol of this friendship and cooperation. I am thus pleased to be present at this send-off ceremony. I would like all of you to see yourself as cultural ambassadors of India to China, and be an important contributor for deepening people-to-people contacts.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Yatra is arduous and strenuous. However, to compensate for the difficulties, the nature will open its heart to you. You will traverse through numerous places of touristic and religious significance, which are also well known for their scenic and the breath-taking beauty.

Your journey will offer you the splendid views of mountain peaks and flora and fauna of the Kumaon region of Uttarakhand and mesmerizing beauty of Mount Kailash and Manasarovar. The Yatra, I am sure, will also give you an opportunity for spiritual deliverance.
As the Yatra route is difficult, I would urge you to take the prescribed precautions. Your personal cooperation is what we solicit for making the Yatra successful.

I once again felicitate you and I wish you all a safe and fulfilling Yatra.

New Delhi, May 31, 2012.

The Kailash Manasarovar Yatra conducted by Ministry of External Affairs in close cooperation with Government of Peoples’ Republic of China and State Government of Uttrakhand has completed 30 years. To commemorate the occasion as well as to mark 2012 as the Year of India-China Friendship and Cooperation, External Affairs Minister Shri S.M. Krishna hosted a function on 31 May 2012 at the Jawaharlal Nehru Bhawan to send off the Yatris of the first batch. The Minister congratulated the Yatris on their selection and wished them a safe and fulfilling Yatra.

2. In his remarks, EAM brought out the unique characteristics of the Yatra which takes the Yatris to the Holy Mount Kailash and Lake Manasarovar situated in remote parts of the Tibet Autonomous Region of the People’s Republic of China. The Yatra involves trekking at high altitudes of up to 19,500 feet under arduous conditions. He said that the Yatris were indeed fortunate to be able to undertake the Yatra which traverses through numerous touristic and religious sites known for picturesque, scenic and the mesmerizing beauty all over the world. The Yatra is also a lasting symbol of India-China cooperation.
Dr John Chipman, Director General and Chief Executive, IISS  Probably one of the most important subjects in the Asia Pacific is the idea of protecting maritime freedoms and the acceptance that this is an international and global role, not only a regional and particular role.

We have three speakers in this second plenary, from India, Indonesia and Japan, and I shall ask each of them to give their perspectives on the issue of protecting maritime freedoms in the order in which they appear on the agenda.

I would like to begin by welcoming very warmly A.K. Antony, the Minister of Defence of India. When he was first appointed Minister of Defence he honoured us with his presence here; we are delighted to see him back at the Shangri-La Dialogue at an extremely busy time in Indian domestic politics, and at a very busy time in the Defence Ministry as well. I am very grateful for his acceptance of our invitation. I think the Indian perspective on protecting maritime freedoms is becoming increasingly important to appreciate, so I look forward, Mr Antony, to your remarks.

A K Antony, Minister of Defence, India

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen, I am honoured to be amidst you today. Over the years, the Shangri La Dialogue has grown into an important forum, which enables wide-ranging discussion on security issues relevant to the regional and global community. The event brings together a wide spectrum of participants who play important roles in defence and security developments. It provides us with an opportunity to reflect on the major security challenges of our time, and contributes significantly to the strengthening of the process to address these important issues.

I must thank The International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS) for inviting me to share my thoughts on the important issue of maritime freedoms, which has attained a high and urgent resonance in the current global security paradigm.

I begin with a reflection on the genesis of the maritime freedoms debate, which has become so salient in our security discourse today. The interplay between the concepts of the closed seas and the open seas was linked to the changing needs of the powers which sought to control maritime trade. The revival of the concept of open seas gained relevance when the needs of the industrial revolution in the West had to be fuelled by supplies from Asia and Africa.
Unlike in previous centuries, maritime freedoms cannot be the exclusive prerogative of a few. Large parts of the common seas cannot be declared exclusive to any one country or group. We must find the balance between the rights of nations and the freedoms of the world community in the maritime domain. Like individual freedoms, the fullness of maritime freedoms can be realised only when all states, big and small, are willing to abide by universally agreed laws and principles.

It has been widely recognised that maritime security is an indispensable and fundamental condition for the welfare and economic security of this region and the global community. There may be different perspectives of maritime freedoms in history, but for us in the twenty first century, it is important to reaffirm the importance of maritime security and freedom of navigation for all, in accordance with the relevant universally agreed principles of international law, including the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea. This is the essence of maritime freedoms in the age of interdependence and globalisation. These freedoms are needed by all and their observance is in the interests of all, given the multifarious threats to maritime freedoms.

Today, the threats and challenges to maritime security and maritime freedoms arise from piracy, terrorism and organised crime, and also from the conflicting interests of countries. These may arise from the quest for political influence or military dominance, maritime territorial disputes, competitive exploitation of marine resources or environment challenges.

India’s own security and prosperity is intimately tied to the security and prosperity of the extended Indian Ocean Region, which also includes the Asia Pacific region. A significant percentage of our global mercantile trade – almost 90% by volume and 77% by value – is carried by sea. India has a coastline of over 7,500 kilometres: the chain of the Lakshadweep and Minicoy Islands to the west and the Andaman and Nicobar Islands on the east cover more than 600 islands, the northernmost tip being just 10 nautical miles from Myanmar and the southernmost tip 90 nautical miles from Indonesia. Our exclusive economic zone is more than 2.5 million square km and the mining areas allotted to us under UNCLOS are about 2,000 km from our southernmost tip. As in other parts of the world, the seas around us are now believed to have substantial hydrocarbon potential. As we seek to satisfy the growing demand for mineral resources to meet our growth and development aspirations, we will seek to increase our investments in the exploration of our maritime domain.

Given India’s geographical location, extensive maritime interest, dependence on the seas for trade and the evolving asymmetric threats in the form of maritime terrorism, piracy and drug trafficking, maritime security issues have become a strategic priority for us. There are two different aspects to this imperative. The first is the concern for safeguarding our territories and our adjacent waters against seaborne threats. The second is the desire to ensure that the traditional freedoms at sea ensure access for all.

As a matter of national policy, India has always championed and advocated adherence to the international regime that governs maritime freedoms, even while asserting our national sovereignty where it is applicable. We believe that in an era of globalisation and interdependence, the balance between the rights of states and the freedoms of the larger global community, to which I referred earlier, is vital for international trade and global security.

In the light of the challenges we face, and the security and economic interests at stake, it is natural for all countries to enhance their capabilities to protect their national interests. In our own case, particularly in the aftermath of the Mumbai attack, we have taken a number of measures to develop our coastal and maritime security capabilities.

However, as countries seek to bolster their capabilities to respond to perceived challenges in the maritime domain, there also arises a need to avoid conflict and build consensus. In this connection, keeping in view the issues that have arisen with regard to the South China Sea, India has welcomed the efforts of the parties concerned in engaging in discussion, and the recently agreed guidelines on the implementation of the 2002 Declaration on the Conduct of Parties between China and ASEAN. We hope that the issues will be resolved through dialogue and negotiation.

The growing menace of piracy needs to be thwarted and suppressed by robust anti-piracy operations, as well as through speedy prosecution of the guilty. A permanent solution to the threat of piracy will require sustained and concerted efforts by the international community, at sea and on land.

I am encouraged by the cooperative approaches we have seen between nations when it comes to defending our collective freedoms against the activities of pirates, whether in the Malacca Strait or the Gulf of Aden. We have ensured that our navies have engaged in communication and dialogue to better coordinate anti-piracy operations. The Indian Navy, which has been operating in the Gulf of Aden, has provided escort to a number of ships of non-Indian flags. The same is true of some other navies operating in the region.

There is a need to extend this spirit of cooperation to de-conflict contentious areas in the maritime domain. This is possible only through the process of dialogue and consensus building within the framework of accepted principles of international law. In particular, it is essential to remain sensitive to the problems of smaller nations and ensure that their rights, as equal members of the global community, are not overlooked or compromised.
India is actively engaged in the process of constructive dialogue on security issues with a number of countries, especially with the ASEAN community, many members of which are our immediate maritime neighbours. We have wide-ranging bilateral exchanges with the ASEAN nations in the area of defence and security. We also support ongoing initiatives like the ASEAN Regional Forum (ARF) and the ASEAN Defence Ministers’ Meeting Plus (ADMM+) mechanisms in building an inclusive security architecture, which would foster a spirit of consensus on all issues that have common resonance. The Suez and the Gulf of Hormuz are also vital arteries of world trade. We also maintain regular dialogue with the countries of the region. We will continue to contribute to the strengthening of fora like the Indian Ocean Rim-Association for Regional Cooperation (IOR-ARC) and the Indian Ocean Naval Symposium (IONS) to promote cooperation among the IOR and rim countries.

To conclude, I will reiterate that India has vital interests in the maritime domain and we will make our contribution, as a responsible member of the international community, for the evolution of an open, transparent and inclusive maritime security architecture that will ensure the protection and preservation of maritime freedoms.

Thank you.

Answering questions raised at the conference Mr. Antony said:

Most of the questions raised issues mainly connected with sovereignty. In the Indian Ocean Region we are not that concerned. At the same time, we are very clear whether it be the Indian Ocean, the South China Sea or the Pacific, we believe in the freedom of navigation in international waters to all countries. At the same time, the right to passage should be as per the internationally accepted procedures and principles.

Coming to the question of surveillance, we are also willing to cooperate with countries and to share the information, but any mechanism of surveillance we strongly believe must be under the auspice of the United Nations. We do not support any other type of mechanism.

Regarding the issues concerning Saudi Arabia and the Middle East, we are developing closer relations with Middle Eastern countries, because our energy security mainly depends on energy from the Middle East. 20% of our energy comes from Saudi Arabia and nearly 12% from Iran, so we want peace and stability in the West Asian and Gulf countries. We believe our issues in the Middle East and the Gulf should be resolved through dialogue and discussions. We do not subscribe to the view of any approach of confrontation or destabilisation in the Middle East. That is our basic approach. The issues should be resolved through dialogue and discussions. We do not subscribe to any approach of confrontation.

We are very concerned about developments in Afghanistan. Before our independence, Afghanistan was our next-door neighbour. Even now, we have very close relations with Afghanistan – although more so with the people of Afghanistan than the government; it is the only way they will engage with us. Engagement is crucial to stabilisation in Afghanistan. We are also concerned about the possible fallout after 2014. But we believe any political process to find a solution to the Afghan problem should be led by the Afghan government and the Afghan people themselves. At the same time, it should be inclusive and transparent. After 2014, when the Afghan government and Afghan people take on responsibility themselves, we believe that we have to strengthen the Afghan national army. It is the responsibility of the international community to strengthen the Afghan army and defence forces. In the end, our aim should be to strengthen the Afghan government and the people of Afghanistan to have a democratic, pluralistic and peaceful Afghanistan. For that, whatever help is needed must be extended to the government and the people of Afghanistan. We must allow them to have their own way to find a solution to the Afghan problem. So any [Inaudible] to find a solution to Afghanistan’s problem and long-term prosperity should be left to the Afghan government. It should be entirely led by the Afghan government and at the same time it should be inclusive and totally transparent. That is the Indian approach.

Regarding freedom of navigation in the South China Sea, I have already stated our position. We believe in the freedom of navigation for all countries in international waters, including the South China Sea. Any issues regarding freedom of navigation or other [Inaudible] issues in the South China Sea should be settled between the concerned parties through negotiations and dialogue as per the accepted international law and practice. That is our stated position.

Regarding whether or not China is a threat to India, I do not think this is a relevant issue. China’s exponential military growth is a matter of concern to us. At the same time, even though we do not believe in an arms race, since China is increasing its capabilities and spending more on defence, in our own way, to protect our national interests, we are also strengthening our capabilities on our borders. At the same time, even though there are still unresolved border disputes between India and China, we believe both India and China have an interest in maintaining peace and stability, not only in Asia but beyond Asia. That is why of late we have started establishing military to military contact. The Indian Navy had also started cooperation with the Chinese Navy. At the moment, this is mainly in the area of anti-piracy. It is a beginning. In the area of anti-piracy we are sharing information and in coming years, wherever possible in the area of anti-piracy and also maintaining maritime security, we will try to have close relations with China. This is only the beginning. It has to evolve in the coming years, but between India and China military-to-military of late we have started a dialogue, joint exercises and relations. This is what I would like to say about this.

Meanwhile China news agency Xinhua responding to US plans to redeploy its naval fleet in the Pacific Ocean by 2020, said: “It is advisable for some to refrain from muddying the waters and fishing therein and for some others to desist from dancing behind a Pied Piper whose magic tone, as tempting as it is, might lead its followers astray.” Defence Minister A. K. Antony, however, stressed that India strongly “believes in unhindered freedom” of navigation in international waters as per universally agreed laws, principles and norms. Referring to his June 2 address at the 11 Asian Security Summit in Singapore, Mr. Antony said that he had made India’s position amply clear there while speaking on “Protecting Maritime Freedoms.” In an obvious reference to disputes in the South-China Sea where China’s presence was growing, Mr. Antony said that maritime disputes between nations should be settled through negotiations and discussions among themselves without any third-party intervention. Elaborating on India’s position on settlement of disputes between countries, Mr. Antony said: “Whenever any dispute arises between countries, we believe it should be settled through negotiations and discussions among the parties themselves and not by any third-party intervention. India does not believe in policy of confrontation. That is our approach in West Asia also.” “Regarding U.S. strategy, I do not want to comment much. I have explained our stand in Singapore,” Mr. Antony said. In Singapore, U.S. Defence Secretary Leon Panetta, who later visited India also, had announced that the U.S. would be moving the majority of its warships into Asia-Pacific region over the next few years.
Four ships of the Indian Navy's Eastern Fleet entered Shanghai today on a four day port visit. The four IN ships Rana, Shivalik, Karmukh and Shakti under the command of Rear Admiral P Ajit Kumar, Flag Officer Commanding Eastern Fleet are on an operational deployment to the South China Sea and North West Pacific. Earlier in the deployment, the first Bi-lateral maritime exercise between India and Japan ‘J IMEX 12’ (Japan India Maritime Exercise) was conducted, coinciding with commemoration of 60 years of diplomatic relations between India and Japan. Even as four ships of the Eastern Fleet are in the South China Sea, another ship viz INS Savitri is in Port Victoria, Seychelles. INS Savitri is planned to participate in the National Day celebrations of Seychelles and thereafter be deployed for about two months to undertake surveillance of the Exclusive Economic Zones (EEZ) of Seychelles and Mauritius. The IN continues to maintain one Dornier in Seychelles to provide aerial surveillance for the Seychellois EEZ. One Dornier is actively flying from Maldives to meet Maldivian requirements of EEZ surveillance and anti piracy patrols. The IN support to Mauritius, Maldives and Seychelles is provided on request of the respective government. INS Tabar continues its deployment in the Gulf of Aden on convoy escort and anti piracy patrol. The Western Fleet is set to deploy four ships on an overseas deployment to Horn of Africa, Red Sea and the Western Mediterranean under the command of Rear Admiral AR Karve, Flag Officer Commanding Western Fleet. Such long range deployments, covering the IOR and beyond, bear testimony to the blue water capabilities and operational readiness of the Indian Navy. It may be recalled that during the recent Naval Commander's Conference the Defence Minister Mr AK Antony, had said “India's strategic location in the Indian Ocean and the professional capability of our Navy bestows upon us a natural ability to play a leading role in ensuring peace and stability in the Indian Ocean Region.” He had also added that “Considering the challenges in the Indian Ocean Region, it is essential to maintain high levels of operational preparedness at all times.”
Statement by the Prime Minister at the Plenary of the United Nations Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20 Summit) at Rio de Janeiro.

Mr. President
Excellencies,
Ladies & Gentlemen,

Let me begin by congratulating President Dilma Rousseff for hosting this conference and for her outstanding stewardship of the negotiations. We thank the people of Brazil for their warm hospitality and the excellent arrangements made for this conference. Brazil, like India, is a confluence of cultures and peoples. I feel honoured to be among you.

Mr. President,

We meet at a time of serious economic crisis and political ferment in the world. The Rio+20 Summit on Sustainable Development is timely because it focuses our minds on “the future we want” and how to realize it. Difficult though it may seem, we have to summon the imagination to balance the costs that we will incur in the present with the benefits that will accrue to future generations.

Economic Development, social inclusion and environmental sustainability are all equally critical as components of sustainable development. The task before us is to give practical shape and content to this architecture in a manner that allows each country to develop according to its own national priorities and circumstances.

For developing countries, inclusive growth and a rapid increase in per capita income levels are development imperatives. The 1992 Rio Summit correctly acknowledged that poverty eradication must remain the over-riding priority for developing countries. Those living at the subsistence level cannot bear the costs of adjustment and their livelihood considerations are important in determining how scarce natural resources such as land, water and forests are used. The severe deterioration of land and water resources is already affecting the well-being of millions of people living on the edges of subsistence, particularly women and children.

Sustainable development also mandates the efficient use of available natural resources. We have to be much more frugal in the way we use natural resources. A key area of focus is energy. We have to promote, universal access to energy, while, at the same time, promoting energy efficiency and a shift to cleaner energy sources by addressing various technological, financial and institutional constraints. In India, we are implementing an ambitious National Solar Mission as a critical option for our energy security.

Moreover, current consumption patterns in the industrialized world are unsustainable. We need to find new pathways for sustainable living.

Environmental sustainability is the third leg of the sustainable development architecture. Economic activity invariably results in negative spinoffs, either by way of local pollution, or by way of global effects such as Greenhouse Gas emissions. We need to tackle both.

Local pollution can be regulated and such regulation may impose costs on various economic actors. To ensure equity, there may be a case for targeted assistance to small producers to meet part of these costs and this should be built into policy.

At the global level, our approach to the problem should be guided by equitable burden sharing. It is for this reason that the first Rio Summit enshrined the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities. I am happy we have reaffirmed this principle as well as the principle of equity during this Summit.

This does not, however, mean that countries should not take proactive actions to promote sustainable development. In India, our efforts over the last two decades have yielded positive results. Over the period 1994-2007, our emissions-GDP intensity, excluding agriculture, has declined nearly 25%. Looking ahead, we have set a target to further reduce the emissions intensity of GDP by 20-25% between 2005 and 2020.

Many countries could do more if additional finance and technology were available. Unfortunately, there is little evidence of support from the industrialised countries in these areas. The ongoing economic crisis has made matters worse.

One of the key challenges that demands urgent global action is the worrying depletion of bio-diversity across our planet. The Eleventh Conference of Parties on Convention on Biodiversity is being hosted by India in October this year at Hyderabad. We look forward to working with the global community to make it a success.

Mr President,

The future we want should be a future in which there is ecological and economic space for sustainable growth for all.

Let us work together to attain the future that we all desire. With these words I once again thank you Mr. President.
Media Briefing by Foreign Secretary and India's Deputy Permanent Representative at the United Nations (Mr. Manjeev Singh Puri): Mr. Akbar on Prime Minister's Bilaterals and Rio+20 Conference.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Good afternoon friends. Thank you very much for coming to this briefing. We have here with us Foreign Secretary who will brief us on Prime Minister's bilateral meetings. After that, if any of you would like any information on the ongoing Summit, we also have with us Mr. Manjeev Puri who is Deputy Permanent Representative of India to the United Nations, who has been involved in the entire process for the last several months on the Rio+20 Conference.

With that I will now first ask Foreign Secretary to brief you about the bilaterals that Prime Minister had.

Foreign Secretary (Shri Ranjan Mathai): Prime Minister had bilateral meetings with Prime Minister of Nepal Mr. Baburam Bhattarai and with President of Sri Lanka Mahinda Rajapaksa. During the session yesterday he also briefly spoke to President Waheed of the Maldives.

There is a possibility we are going to have a pull-aside both with the President of Maldives and with Prime Minister Thinley of Bhutan during the session this afternoon. As soon as I get something on those I will find the time to speak about them but I thought I will just mention the two meetings which took place first with Nepal.

Prime Minister and Prime Minister Bhattarai recalled the good meetings they had held last year both during Prime Minister Bhattarai's visit to India and the meeting they had on the sidelines of the SAARC Summit which was in November in Addu. Prime Minister Bhattarai did mention that subsequently after those two very productive meetings there had been a preoccupation with domestic politics in Nepal. But he underlined that they continue to attach very great importance to taking forward the bilateral relationship with India.

Referring to the internal security in Nepal, Prime Minister Bhattarai noted that on what is called the peace process and integration there had been great progress and the issues had been more or less settled. But the drafting of the Constitution was not completed by the May 27 deadline, and hence they had no option, since the Supreme Court had said that the Constituent Assembly could not be extended, so the decision was to seek another election.

As far as our Prime Minister is concerned, he reiterated that India wants the success of democracy in Nepal. And he expressed the hope that all parties would show the wisdom to work together so that acceptable arrangements are made to complete the Constitution-making process on time.

In terms of the bilateral relationship, PM said that as a friend of Nepal we are committed to support it in the development process and we would support Nepal in a manner which is sought by the Nepalese people, but we in India do have a vision of the working together.

The Prime Minister of Nepal referred to negotiations with Indian companies for hydropower projects. And our Prime Minister said he recognized that this is an area of particularly great importance in our relationship. But at the moment we are in the process of helping Nepal deal with some development challenges which include supply of power from India to Nepal. It was agreed that the Joint Commission which is chaired by the two Foreign Ministers should meet as soon as feasible and look at all areas including power, railways and other areas of our interaction.

The Prime Minister and Prime Minister Bhattarai also reviewed security matters and the working of our mechanisms to deal with security cooperation. Prime Minister Bhattarai recalled that he had invited PM to visit Nepal, and PM said that he would be very happy to visit at a mutually convenient time.

The two leaders also discussed the conference which is under way here, and had the sense that outcome was, as they could see it, favourable in terms of how both countries looked at it.

With President Mahinda Rajapaksa of Sri Lanka, PM started first with a one-on-one discussion and then in delegation-level meeting. They covered all bilateral relations. On security related issues, they noted that our dialogue would be taken forward on the 29th June when the National Security Advisor Mr. Menon would be visiting Colombo. There was a substantial discussion on our economic relations, and the Power Minister of Sri Lanka gave an update on Sampur Power Project which is one of the very big projects being undertaken in Sri Lanka as a joint venture between the Ceylon Power Board and the NTPC.

In terms of the overall relationship, both felt that the scope for progress was very great and we must now concentrate on dealing with those areas where we can make good progress.

The President also referred to the situation within Sri Lanka and mentioned the continuing discussions on the issue of devolution. But the large focus was on what is being done for the rehabilitation of Internally Displaced People. He quoted the figure of about 3,000 who now continue to remain in the camps compared to 300,000 when the war ended.
He also noted that the resettlement process was under way, and electrification of the Northern region of collapse given that the Madhesia Party and the Maoists have both split under their primary components. Is there any concern or any reassurance that the agreements that we have done with Bhattarai and the promises we have made to him or both sides have made to each other will stand even after his Government falls?

Foreign Secretary: There was no specific reference to the agreements which we signed apart from, as I said, the Bilateral Investment Protection Agreement and the Double Taxation Avoidance Agreement. Those are in place and they would be expected to continue. The point is that they at the moment are in a state where an election has been announced by the Prime Minister for November. Whether that election actually will be held on that date is still to be actually confirmed because the Supreme Court had actually made the conclusion of the Constituent Assembly on May 27, and an issue has been raised through a petition to the court that under the interim Constitution under which they were functioning, there is no provision for holding such an election. That the courts will decide on it. So, what I am trying to say is that there is a degree of political fluidity right now which I think we need to get through this period. But as far as all the bilateral mechanisms at the official level are concerned, those continue. As far as we are concerned, the agreements which have been signed are government-to-agreements, and those will be maintained.

Official Spokesperson: Since there are no further questions, I will ask Mr. Manjeev Puri to make his opening remarks, and then if there are any questions he will take them.

India’s Deputy Permanent Representative to the United Nations (Mr. Manjeev Singh Puri): Mr. Akbar, thank you very much.

I think most members of the group here were briefed yesterday by the Hon. Minister of State for Environment on the salient features of the Outcome Document which is likely to be adopted tomorrow here. I am quite prepared to answer anything in addition, if you wish to know.

But I think it is also instructive to note if any of you have followed the statement of the President of Brazil when she inaugurated the Plenary yesterday where she pointed out that in this particular conference, it is extremely important to note that developing countries have been able to re-emphasise not only the Rio principles but bring to the fore that in the year 2012 poverty eradication continues to remain our overriding priority, and that we need to do all that we can to tackle this particular thing especially in the context of MDGs and the future development goals.

I think it is also very important to note that we have an agreement which is a good and balanced agreement, perhaps the best that was possible under the circumstances that the world faces today and which are fairly well-known to all of you.

I want to stop here now. If there is something very specific which the Hon. Minister may not have addressed yesterday, please go ahead. Thank you very much.

Question: The question really is as far as the earlier goals of funding being made available to developing countries for meeting certain goals. Now there is no funding. The earlier commitments have not been met. Therefore, on what basis are we concluding that there is a significant success because the reportage from the developed world is actually slamming this entire exercise?

India's Deputy PR to the UN: I think we need to be of course very cognizant that we are meeting at a time when there are serious economic challenges in the world, and certainly you are well aware and familiar with what the developed countries are going through. The Rio Conferences in the past too, what have they reaffirmed in 1992 is the set of principles and the mechanisms. In this particular conference we have agreed in terms of the draft outcome document to set up two mechanisms - one to deal with the area of financing and the other to deal with the area of technology. This is a significant breakthrough especially considering the circumstances. These are the mechanisms which will then look at ways and means by which we can reach either figures or ways and means of reaching those figures.

So, this is a document which obviously has a certain degree of balance, certain degree of being rooted in the realities of the world today. But it is a document which recognizes very clearly that the developing world could do much more provided it was assisted both in terms of technology and in terms of finance.

In terms of what you are hearing from the developed world, again I think you need to recognize this, and I can perhaps just tell you what Dr. Pachauri said to me just a few minutes back when I saw him in the corridor that look when they could afford it, they were not willing to do anything, now that they cannot afford it, what is it that we can really expect. This is Pachauri to me but do not quote it as it is to you.

Question: Why are we saying that the document reflects a lack of political will on the part of developed countries when the document says that developed countries will part with 0.7 per cent of GNP? It also says that South-South cooperation will be complement to North-South cooperation and not the substitute to it? And will SDGs have specific goals like MDGs?

India's Deputy PR to the UN: The lack of political will is perhaps best reflected in the question that your colleague here just asked. This is a document which is in the process of negotiations. In these particular negotiations to get these paragraphs of old commitments on 0.7 per cent itself took a great deal of doing. So, these are reiterations. To hold people to their old commitments itself was a significant achievement on the part of the developing countries and the G77. In terms of political will, surely political will could have been shown by, as you have heard, promising funding or being much more broad on technology transfer. But best that could have been achieved at this stage was the setting up of mechanisms. The reasons are of course fairly obvious, rooted in the realities of today as you see it.

So, it is a balancing act. But I think from the perspective of developing countries it is a good balancing act because policy space for developing countries has been clearly recognized. Differentiated burden sharing and on the basis of equity has been clearly recognized, and the fact that mechanism for international cooperation have also been initiated. We need to now take this process further from here.

On SDGs, what has happened is the process has begun whereby the UN General Assembly will set up an Expert Committee, we will start discussing on how SDGs would look like. Just to recap, where the Millennium Development Goals, these were actually drafted by experts, the Secretary-General, and actually have never really been adopted, although they are accepted in common parlance and all of us are working towards them. For the Sustainable Development Goals, the idea really is that we would work in this for the post-2015 development agenda but in an inter-governmental setting. So, all of us, governments etc., would be deliberating within the framework of the United Nations General Assembly. How they pan out, how do they work out, difficult to say at the moment. The kind of broad areas are obviously food security, energy access. These are the kind of important critical areas for sustainable development for all.

Question: My question would be to you or to the Foreign Secretary. Could you give us a sense of Indian industry in this summit? They have been looking at various themes. So, industry being now very important and they are talking about poverty eradication and funding and other things. So, could you give us a sense of the participation of top industrialists and what are they committing, or what kind of delegation is here?

India's Deputy PR to the UN: At the opening time you may have heard Mr. Kris Gopalakrishnan spoke on behalf of global industry, and he has been around here. The Conference itself the way it works, is that major groups have an opportunity to speak and private sector is one of them. So, we have been very well represented in having an esteemed member and a very venerable member of the Indian industry speaking out here in terms of what the industry wants.
Let me just remind you of what Mr. Gopalakrishnan said. He said that we are looking forward to contributing and working towards inclusive green growth. In terms of what Indian industry is otherwise doing here, the conference of course is primarily inter-governmental with civil society and others participating including major groups. But I think Indian industry is rather active here in Brazil, rather active worldwide. And we see on our domestic side on various other aspects there has been a tremendous amount of positive response of the Indian industry as such towards sustainable development, towards environment protection, while working towards growth and inclusive growth in the country.

Question: What we are hearing here is just general kind of assurances and commitments. There are no concrete targets or something like that being set up. You yourself are saying that they are only reiterating the old commitments, they are again reassuring that they will be committed to all central points. What is the new theme being added in this conference?

India’s Deputy PR to the UN: In this conference the principal gain for the developing countries is a reaffirmation of the Rio Principles, and the commitments which were already there. There has been a great of effort and a great deal of action to try and dilute the commitments, to try and perhaps walk away from them, or as your colleague here mentioned, try and substitute them by something else whether it is South-South cooperation or any other form of this kind. What has this conference done? This conference has reaffirmed the validity of the Rio Principles, the validity that the cooperation amongst South-South countries is one of partnership, partnership in which both are equals and they work towards national priorities of the others, distinct from the aged paradigm of North-South which retains its validity and its importance. And what this particular conference has done is, it held them to their promises. We need to work to get those promises implemented. You are absolutely right. Critical deficit has been a deficit of implementation. But that is a deficit which we will have to recognize. The fact that we have been able to hold them to those promises itself is a particularly successful outcome of this particular negotiation process, and the fact that we were able to keep them together.

Question: In many ways US and Germany actually they ...(Inaudible)...moneybags. Now in the absence of Mr. Obama and Chancellor Merkel through the Conference, how does India view it? A disappointment? Lack of responsibility? How does India view this particular thing?

India’s Deputy PR to the UN: The facts are of course there for you to see. People give several reasons for it. The President of the United States is engaged in his elections, the Chancellor of Germany with the Eurozone crisis. I think in some senses what you are saying certainly does have a certain amount of validity. But let us remember, the United States is likely to be represented by the Secretary of State. The United States has been very active in the negotiations here. They have a high-level delegation here led by their Special Envoy in the State Department. And they have been extremely active in all elements of the negotiations which have taken place here. Similarly Germany. Not only as part of the European Union at its negotiating team here, the Germans have been here in their own way at a very high level here. So, I think the way I would look at it is that for whatever reasons the leaders may not have been able to come but Germany and the United States have been very actively engaged in the process, and actively engaged in the negotiations, and actively present politically in this particular meeting out here.

Question: You spoke about technology as one of the mechanisms. But then how do you look at resolving the IPR issues? And you spoke about this kind of developing centres of excellence. Will the centres be run on the CG model?

India’s Deputy PR to the UN: It is the India’s position for a long time that we need to have a kind of fair use of the IPR regimes, and allowing the best use of the existing modalities of the IPR regimes under the WTO in the TRIPS. We have also been very strong on collaboration. And you are right, the CG model is something that we often allude to and try and have that brought into place.
Our efforts here have basically been that the mechanism that we set up to work on technology are such that these models, the CG model as well as what we can do with IPRs gets brought into the fore and that we are able to discuss them in the context of sustainable development, not just in the very specific context where they have currently moved in the WTO. So, these are certainly areas that we will work on. These will be priority areas for our delegation as we work through the transfer of technology mechanisms which are due to be set up.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much. With that we come to the end of this interaction.

026. Speech of the Vice President at the launch of the book “Pax Indica: India and the World of the 21st Century”.

New Delhi, July 11, 2012.

“Dr. Shashi Tharoor has written a timely, interesting and thought provoking essay on a subject that is very much in the public domain.

His academic credentials are impressive. He brings to the subject a unique perspective of multilateral diplomacy. Above all, his knowledge of the actual conduct of foreign policy, at the political level, gives the volume before us significance beyond ordinary.

The dust jacket of the book does arouse curiosity. I refer to the elephant, the term Pax, and to the world of the 21st century.

The elephant, of course, is a noble creature, has an important place in our faith system and culture, has a well deserved reputation for longevity and sturdiness and has been honoured down the ages. In terms of history and strategic thinking, however, its role has been a mixed one. Since ancient times it has been used as an instrument of war, with different results. Is it necessarily the best symbol for our foreign policy aspirations in the 21st century?

Pax, again, has an established connotation in history and strategic literature. Our author wishes to impart a new meaning to it. Many years back Ezra Vogel had written about Pax Nipponica. It did not quite happen. And, of course, there have been other pax-es in recent and not-so-recent history. Each raises questions of durability and conceptual validity.

As for the 21st century, we have experienced it for over a decade. It is characterised by fluidity and impermanence. For this reason, futuristic projections beyond short periods do tend to become difficult. Multi-polarity is a reality, with each participant seeking strategic autonomy.

Dr. Tharoor has offered the term “Multi-Alignment”. Others have suggested “Nonalignment 2.0”. Both seek to depict a menu of options in a new, very complex, world. Both need to be debated seriously to avoid strategic confusion.

The author has rightly noted that “foreign policy is basically about fulfilling domestic objectives.” Some questions unavoidably come to mind:

What would be the contours and dynamics of our society in the coming years?

Would technological change – particularly in areas of food production, health and energy

- keep pace with our needs?
Would we improve upon our delivery mechanism to fulfil the requirements of an inclusive society?

What would be our capacity to deal with disasters like pandemics?

Would the external environment remain benign? If not, what would be the nature of external challenge? Would it hamper the achievement of our primary socio-economic goals? What would be the Indian impact on the external world?

I do hope this book would help scholars and policy makers focus on the perspectives and questions raised in it.”

027. Remarks by Foreign Secretary at the Launch of IDSA Report - “India’s Neighbourhood: Challenges in the Next Two Decades”

New Delhi, July 13, 2012.

Dr. Arvind Gupta, Director General, IDSA,

Distinguished Guests, Ladies and Gentlemen

It gives me great pleasure to be present amongst this audience to launch a document that is the result of an unique collaborative effort between the Ministry of External Affairs and the Institute of Defence Analyses.

We live during what has been called an Asian Century. This title was used by some academics in the international arena but today it is used mostly by Asians! Over the last few decades, Asian nations, including India, launched themselves along high-growth trajectories that have led to a discernible eastward shift of global political and economic centres of gravity. This has increased their weight and profile in international relations and enhanced their capacity to influence global events. Hence the new slogan. But this has also created unprecedented challenges for policy makers and strategic establishments that have to grapple with difficult and often unfamiliar problems. One is the need to put in place policies and measures that make the trajectory of high growth sustainable over time. Historical experience suggests caution in accepting projections of continuous growth. The second is the need to deal with an inevitable backlash. Shifts in the global balance are not necessarily welcome to those at the losing end even if they only lose in relative terms. The determined effort to choke our growth through environmental norms and regulations is an example.

These are challenges that cannot be overcome by any one organisation. Multiple strands of thought, multiple perspectives and multiple courses of action have to be taken into account and woven together into composite solutions. “India’s Neighbourhood: Challenges in the Next Two Decades”– the document that is being launched today, needs to be viewed in this perspective.

It is in many respects a path-breaking document that is the first output of the MEA-IDSA Strategic and Perspective Planning Research Group. This Group is itself the product of a sustained effort by MEA and by IDSA to draw upon the best available talent in the country to peer beyond the immediate policy and time horizon. In this report, independent researchers, with the full support of MEA and IDSA have made an effort to find out what lies, in military parlance, on “the other side of the hill”.

The intention is to focus attention on the challenging policy environment in our immediate neighbourhood. The intention is also to provoke a debate, and hopefully a lively debate, both within India and beyond its borders. We hope to generate ideas and solutions. We hope that we will be able to think out of the box. Mostly, we hope that this debate will allow MEA to find ways to strengthen, in practical terms, its forward-looking and proactive approach to engaging with our neighbours.

The promotion of a politically stable and economically secure periphery is a paramount foreign policy objective for India. This is essential to deal with the challenges of fostering sustainable growth and to ensure that regional differences cannot be exploited by those who would keep us absorbed in disputes. We have been hard at work in fostering inter-connectivity and mutual confidence in multiple areas, in promoting trade and investment, and in trying to leverage India’s rapid economic growth into win-win arrangements with our neighbours.

We are also conscious of the currents of globalization and of the need to take advantage of global trends in political economy. We believe that common South Asian interests must factor in the policy-making process of South Asian nations. A South Asian Economic Union is a distant dream; but even an expanded set of economic connections will not only transform the economies of South Asia but will be a force for political stability.

I would be stating the obvious in reiterating that there are very few areas of the world where the benefits or logic of regional cooperation are as obvious as in South Asia. But it is also a fact that there are very few regions where the challenges in creating the structures for regional cooperation are so daunting.

This places South Asian problems in a peculiarly difficult position. Even as we attempt to surmount the challenges that history has imposed upon us, we are being called upon to confront a new generation of problems, the problems of the 21st century. For example, the difficulties in demarcating borders are now accompanied by a completely different set of issues that arise from the growing irrelevance of borders in a globalized world. Demographic trends are producing a South Asia that is young and has high expectations. The so-called demographic dividend, if not managed properly, can turn into a demographic nightmare. Governments that are unable to cope with these expectations will turn their nations into “fragile” or “weak” states that will create challenges of the kind the international community is already struggling to cope with. The dividing line between terrorists and trans-national criminals is disappearing and access to technology is increasing the dangers that they pose. Even as South Asian nations struggle to bridge their internal digital divides, they have to divert resources to foil cyber-criminals who operate in a virtual world.

One of the major issues identified by the report is the rapidity with which change is taking place in South Asia. Policy makers and practitioners operate in an environment where the unexpected is the norm. Policy and responses have to be constantly updated to ensure that we do not apply 20th century solutions and mindsets to 21st century problems. The democratic upsurge mentioned by the Director General is one of them. We can best influence this by being an example – rather than trying any policy presumption.

We also have to be mindful of the fact that South Asia does not exist in isolation. This year marks two decades of India’s engagement with ASEAN and a commemorative Summit will be held in New Delhi in December this year. It also marks twenty years of India’s policy of connecting with Central Asia. Our exceptionally close ties to the Gulf region need no elaboration. We are also building an Indian Ocean Littoral community. Our engagement with all these regions is progressing rapidly and it is apparent that many of the problems and opportunities presented in this report need not just a South Asian perspective but have to be seen from a trans-regional angle. We would like our policy towards South Asia and towards these regions to present a seamless continuum.

The document ends by declaring that South Asia is at a cross-roads. We are presented with threats and opportunities, strengths and weaknesses. It is identifying these and suggesting a policy framework to address them that this report has added value to the ongoing discourse on improving linkages within South Asia. The recommendations of the report about the broadening of India’s foreign policy approach are being examined seriously and will be taken onboard in our internal deliberations.

I would like to conclude by noting that the Ministry of External Affairs has not been entirely reactive. Nor have we let the acute shortage of resources stop us from taking some proactive steps. We have created bureaus within our Ministry that deal with emerging issues. We have stepped up recruitment of personnel into the Indian Foreign Service. We have also increased the intake from other services and backgrounds to build in-house expertise on non-traditional areas. We are funding an increasing amount of academic research across India on foreign policy issues. We understand that domestic factors will influence policy towards our neighbours and have created a presence in State capitals through Branch Secretariats. We have created a Development Partnership Administration that will look into optimising the programmes that are being devised for development cooperation with our partners in the developing world, particularly with our neighbours. Visa regimes and consular issues remain a challenge but receive our constant attention.

We will continue with our efforts to be responsive to the needs of changing nation. As the world evolves so will we. But our first priority is and will be for some time the neighbourhood. That is why this is the right time to see how it will look over the next 2 decades and I commend this book to you for opening our debate.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): ...... the Foreign Secretary had Foreign Office Consultations with his counterpart from Bangladesh. These were held in a very cordial, warm and constructive atmosphere. The two sides had comprehensive discussions on the entire gamut of bilateral relations. This includes security related matters, border management, counterterrorism, trade and investment, water resources, power cooperation including renewable energy, connectivity, development cooperation, and increasing people-to-people ties.

That is what I have in terms of formal announcements. I am willing to take a few questions if any of you have any.

Question: Was it held in Delhi?

Official Spokesperson: Yes, it was held in Delhi this morning.

Question: You said water resources was also discussed. Was Teesta problem also discussed and has anything come up?

Official Spokesperson: When we mentioned all aspects I am certain that it includes the issue that you refer to. Yes, it was raised. You are aware of our position on this that we are in the process of working out an internal consensus on this, and when we are ready, we will take it forward.

Question: About Bangladesh, how big was the delegation from our side? Which Departments were represented? Has anything conclusive come out of this meeting? Is there going to be any high level visit between the two countries in the near future?

Official Spokesperson: Yes. Both the Indian and the Bangladeshi delegations were composite ones. That means they were not only from the Ministry of External Affairs but also from other Ministries - the Home Ministry, the Commerce Ministry, the Shipping and Transport Ministry, these are the ones which I can recall off hand. As regards the meeting and its outcome, first of all I would like to mention to you that this meeting is to take forward the policies that are already agreed to by the two Prime Ministers last year and the two Foreign Ministers at the JCM meeting which was held in May. So, it is more a policy implementation meeting than a policy formulation.

You have also asked about likely visits. We are expecting the Commerce Minister to visit Bangladesh in December for an India Trade Fair. And that will be a major activity that we intend to focus on during the rest of the year. There are also other smaller visits of various officials that are likely to take place. These are just being worked out. The major visit that we have next on the calendar is the visit of the Commerce and Industry Minister.

Question: There have been reports about Border Haats between Bangladesh and India? Was that issue discussed? has there been any expansion in bilateral trade between India and Bangladesh

Official Spokesperson: You are talking about Border Haats I think. These were opened in Meghalaya and both the sides seem to think that they have been very successful. As you are aware, since then we have suggested that these should be opened in other States. And careful attention is being given by both the sides to opening these elsewhere. We hope to have some good news at some stage in the future because the experience of both Bangladesh and India of these Border Haats has been a very happy one.

To respond to your second question, since the agreements came into being we have not completed a year. So, it is difficult to make an assessment of an increase in trade because you can only do it for a comparable period in the previous year. But yes there have been increases in various areas, for example readymade garments. Also there are various other areas where Bangladesh, as you are aware now Bangladesh enjoys duty free access to India in virtually every area except for alcohol and maybe one other thing. Therefore, there is likely to be an increase in trade activity. The figures will be known at the end of the year and we will certainly share them with you.

Question: Bangladesh is setting up a nuclear power plant close to Indian border. First of all, is this with the help of the Chinese? Has this issue been raised? What is the status of that? It is in the plan stage now.

Official Spokesperson: This is not a new story that Bangladesh, like India, is interested in nuclear energy. Nuclear energy we in India feel is a clean form of energy, it is also in the context of requirement of energy security various countries are looking at it. There are thirty countries in the world which have nuclear power plants including India. And Bangladesh has been looking at it. I do not want to get into the detail but my understanding is that they have signed memorandum of understanding with the Russian Federation on this, and perhaps they will be better placed to explain to you what type of reactor, where it is, etc. But I would just like to tell you based on my own experience of such matters that these things take a long gestation period. A nuclear power plant takes anything between six to ten years to come up. So, we are talking of a timeframe which is long, but I would suggest that you may like to address your question about the specifics of that to our colleagues and friends in Bangladesh.
Question: But the site is close to the Indian border.

Official Spokesperson: I think there are IAEA conventions on the location of nuclear sites and trans-boundary issues. We are very familiar with it because India is a very active member in the International Atomic Energy Agency and we understand what are the requirements for these and what countries need to do. At this stage, as I said, ten years in advance of something, let us not jump the gun on that. Let us wait for decisions and there will be discussions if they are required.

Thank you very much.
028. Speech of External Affairs Minister at the Inauguration of Passport Seva Kendras in Jammu & Kashmir.

Srinagar, July 26, 2012.

Hon’ble Chief Minister, Shri Omar Abdullah Saheb, Hon’ble Minister Dr. Farooq Abdullah Saheb,
Hon’ble Ministers, Members of Parliament,
Members of Legislative Assembly and Council,
Additional Secretary Shri B.K. Gupta,
Chief Passport Officer Shri Muktesh Pardeshi and Passport Officers from Srinagar and Jammu,
Ladies and Gentlemen,

May I, at the outset, extend my warmest greetings to you on the auspicious occasion of the holy month of Ramadan. May your life be filled with peace, prosperity and happiness!

It gives me immense pleasure to be present today in the serene surroundings of Srinagar to launch Passport Seva Kendras in Srinagar and Jammu, and also to lay the Foundation Stone for building a new premises of the Passport Bhavan.

Indeed, it has been a long journey – from a mere five Passport Offices in 1955 to 38 Passport Offices in the country at present. With India’s growing international profile and greater integration with the global economy, coupled with more disposable income, the number of Indians traveling abroad is witnessing phenomenal growth in recent years. In the 1950’s, merely 30,000 passports were issued in a year. Last year alone, the Ministry rendered over 73 lakh passport services.

Speaking of Jammu and Kashmir, during 2011, the Passport Offices in Srinagar and Jammu rendered 89,270 passport related services, which marks a remarkable 39% increase compared to 2010. Both these Passport Offices are also playing an important role in the implementation of the confidence building measures between India and Pakistan by way of facilitating travel of persons on either side of the Line of Control. I convey my deep appreciation to the Passport Officials based in Jammu & Kashmir for their hard work and dedication.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Ministry of External Affairs continues its sustained efforts to streamline passport issuance procedures, computerization of Passport Offices, decentralization of passport applications collection and reforms in the Central Passport Organization. The service delivery system still needs considerable reform to keep pace with steep rise in demand for passport services. The launch of Passport Seva Project, a flagship initiative of the Central Government as part of National e-Governance Plan, is specifically aimed at addressing these problems.

In a short time, we moved from Pilot Project mode in May 2010 in Bengaluru to the commencement of nation-wide rollout of Passport Seva Kendras in June last year. In June 2012 all the 77 PSKs were set up and operationalised in the country. This has been a remarkable journey over last two years. In this connection, I acknowledge the significant contribution of the service provider Tata Consultancy Services. I would like to commend the Passport Seva team for their devotion to public duty and to our service partner, TCS, for their earnest efforts in speedy implementation of the Project.

Passport Seva Kendras are extended arms of the Passport Offices and are integral to Government of India’s firm commitment to provide timely delivery of passport services to our fellow citizens. I take this opportunity to re-affirm the citizen-centric role of Passport Offices. In this endeavour, we will continue to adopt measures which facilitate speedier service, greater convenience and comfort to the public at large.

Innovative measures such as Passport Melas and Adalats have been undertaken to keep pace with the rising demand for passport services. We have also taken special steps for issuance of passports to prospective Haj pilgrims, including from the Kashmir Valley.

With the completion of 77 PSKs, the Ministry is working on setting up Passport Seva Laghu Kendras in North-Eastern States and other parts of the country. The Ministry is also working on integration of Indian Embassies and Consulates with Passport Seva Project.

Thanks to the Passport Seva Project, the Central Passport Organisation Cadre has been expanded and restructured, promotions fast tracked, office environment improved, and uniform and simple work procedures introduced. A unique Productivity Linked Incentive Scheme has also been notified last month for CPO employees. The Scheme will be supplemented by recognition given to outstanding employees through award of Passport Seva Puraskars, which will be implemented soon.

The Passport Officers and other officials of the Central Passport Organisation are crucial to help realize the vision of passport services going closer to the home of our citizens. I commend them for their diligence and dedication.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

We also recognize the need for increased coordination between the Passport Offices and the local police authorities for issue of requisite police clearances.
To address this aspect, I will be launching a pilot project next week in Bengaluru to link Passport offices directly with the police stations, which is expected to reduce the time taken for issuance of police verification, thus, speedier issue of passports.

I thank the Government of the State of Jammu & Kashmir for allotting a spacious site at Rajbagh for the Passport Bhavan, the foundation stone of which was laid today. I assure that the passport office would be a state-of-the-art building. I would request Hon’ble Chief Minister Omar Saheb to favour with a plot of land in Jammu as well for housing our Passport Office and Passport Seva Kendra there. We also plan to establish a Passport Seva Laghu Kendra in Leh for extending passport services in that region.

In conclusion, I express my deep gratitude to the Hon’ble Chief Minister Shri Omar Abdullah saheb and the Ministers present here for the whole-hearted support that we have received in timely execution of this citizen-centric Project.

Thank you.
029. Press Release on the External Affairs Minister’s inauguration of the Passport Seva Kendras in Jammu & Kashmir and the Foundation Stone laying of Passport Bhavan in Srinagar.

New Delhi, July 26, 2012.

External Affairs Minister Shri S.M. Krishna today formally launched Passport Seva Kendras (PSKs) in Srinagar and Jammu at a function organized at the prestigious Sher-i-Kashmir International Conference Centre (SKICC), Srinagar in the august presence of Hon’ble Chief Minister of Jammu & Kashmir Shri Omar Abdullah, Union Minister for New & Renewable Energy Dr. Farooq Abdullah, Union Minister for Health and Family Welfare Shri Ghulam Nabi Azad and other dignitaries. The PSKs in the State have already been operational for over two months and have combined capacity to handle 400 applicants per day. He also laid the Foundation Stone of Passport Bhavan Building planned at Rajbagh in Srinagar. The new building will be coming on an one-acre plot and will be housing the Passport Office, Passport Seva Kendra and staff quarters.

2. The setting up and operationalisation of 77 PSKs in the country has been envisioned under Passport Seva Project (PSP) - a high impact citizen centric e-Governance initiative as part of the National e-Governance Plan. The objective was achieved swiftly as the pilot projects had been launched in Bengaluru and Chandigarh in May 2010 and August 2010 respectively and after certification of the Project in January 2011 by the Standardisation, Testing & Quality Certification, the Third Part Audit Agency under the Department of Information Technology, the Project was cleared for launch across the country only in June 2011. More than 36 lakh passport related services have been rendered under the new system.

3. Speaking on the occasion, Shri Krishna underlined Government's firm commitment to providing efficient delivery of passport services to Indian citizens in keeping with the PSP’s vision “to deliver all Passport-related services to the citizens in a timely, transparent, more accessible, reliable manner & in a comfortable environment through streamlined processes and committed, trained & motivated workforce”.

4. The Project has been launched in Private Public Partnership mode. The intended benefits to common man are service provisioning in a transparent manner within defined service levels, closer and larger number of access points for services, easy availability of a portfolio of on-line services (www.passportindia.gov.in) with real-time status tracking and enquiry, availability of excellent public facilities at PSKs and an effective system of grievance redressal. For assistance one can call toll-free helpline 1800-258-1800.
5. The MEA has taken a big lead in the country in improving governance in Passport Offices by focussing on citizen-centricity, service orientation and transparency and setting up a new benchmark for project execution. The innovative measures like taking government decisions including verification of requisite documents and granting of passports are done in presence of citizens which require good co-operation and understanding of citizenry as well.
030. Response of the Official Spokesperson to a question on the Arms Trade Treaty Negotiations.

New Delhi, August 2, 2012.

In response to a media query on the Arms trade treaty negotiations, the Official Spokesperson said:

“A Diplomatic Conference was held at the United Nations between 2-27 July 2012 to negotiate an Arms trade treaty (ATT). Though considerable progress was made, it was not possible for the conference to adopt an agreed text. A number of delegations, including India, felt that the draft text needs further work and a treaty of this kind, which would be legally binding when in force, should not be rushed through. It is important to bring all stakeholders on board in a manner that promotes the prospects of a treaty that is practical and implementable and is able to attract universal adherence.

India believes that ATT should make a real impact on preventing illicit trafficking in conventional arms and their diversion to terrorists and other non-state actors. The Treaty should establish a balance of obligations of exporting and importing states and ensure that national implementation and domestic jurisdiction are fully respected. From India’s point of view, we are prepared to engage in further work in a consensus based process and outcome.”

New Delhi, September 14, 2012.

The fourth Conference of Indian Heads of Mission commenced today (14.9.2012) at Vigyan Bhawan, New Delhi. The salient features of the remarks made by the Prime Minister, External Affairs Minister and Foreign Secretary are provided below.

Remarks by the Prime Minister

PM in his address to the 4th Conference of Indian Heads of Mission emphasised that in the complex strategic environment that India confronts it is essential that senior foreign policy managers regularly take stock of policies and evaluate their effectiveness on the ground.

Our economy, our polity and our society are resilient enough to overcome the present adversities. India’s future growth and development depends substantially on a favourable external environment. There are also challenges thrown up by globalization, which has led to entirely new paradigms and discourses on issues ranging from the environment and sustainable development to international terrorism, piracy and crime.

We have worked towards establishing friendly and cooperative ties with our neighbours. We have also emphasized the idea of establishing greater connectivity in South Asia to promote the movement of goods, services, investment and technology so that India’s growth provides the engine of progress for our neighbours. HOMs in the region need to consider innovations that make the most effective and efficient use of our limited developmental resources.

Over the last two decades, our political and economic engagement with the major powers has increased manifold. While our interaction with major emerging economies like Brazil and South Africa in formats like the IBSA, and along with Russia and China in the BRICS, have grown in importance.

Africa is on the path of resurgence and it is our stated intention to become a close partner in this process through the India-Africa Forum Summit. I am glad that the Ministry of External Affairs has now established the Development Partnership Administration, which seeks to accelerate the implementation of our development assistance.

For foreign policy to effectively serve domestic growth needs, it is imperative that efforts be equally geared toward finding economic opportunities in trade and financial flows and assisting the search for privileged access to critical or rare natural resources - these could be sources of energy or other minerals vital for modern industries.

The imperatives of our foreign policy have not changed. Security against external threats, economic prosperity and sharing in global public goods remain the central impulses. A dynamic environment, however, demands constant fine-tuning of the instruments of policy. We must also not remain content with making the best of a difficult external environment, but instead attempt to actively shape a favourable external environment for India.

Remarks by External Affairs Minister

The External Affairs Minister while inaugurating the 4th HOMs Conference on 14.9.2012 at Vigyan Bhawan, New Delhi, described the gathering as consisting of “representatives of India’s finest civil servants and best diplomatic minds”. He acknowledged that many of the Indian envoys are called upon to respond to unusual crises in unusual circumstances and this requires innovative and affirmative interventions. Emphasising on the priorities of the government on the foreign policy front, the External Affairs Minister said that an important objective continues to be creation of an external enabling environment for country’s transformation through inclusive growth.

Our immediate neighbourhood is of paramount importance for our national interests and outlined the initiatives taken during the course of last year to enhance our interaction with neighbours. We remain committed to building a stable and prosperous South Asia. Our engagement in the SAARC process has gained momentum. The asymmetrical and result oriented approach adopted by us has pushed forward the SAARC process.

We are reasonably satisfied at the progress achieved in the last round of the resumed dialogue, given the complexities of the issues that we face, in our relations with Pakistan. We are also cognizant of the fact that there is a long way and the path ahead will not be easy. India-China relations, will be one of the most important bilateral relationships in the 21st century. The forthcoming commemorative 20th anniversary summit of our dialogue with ASEAN is a landmark event which would signify our extensive engagement with the region.

In the area of multilateral diplomacy, India’s global profile has been steadily growing. Its credentials for becoming a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council are gaining momentum. Engagement with like-minded countries in the Brazil-Russia-India-China-South Africa (BRICS) process on issues of mutual interest in the international arena provided opportunities to deal with issues of global governance.

India’s developmental cooperation has emerged as an important component of our foreign policy with a number of countries. The establishment of Development Partnership Administration (DPA) was a significant institutional development aimed at bringing all development assistance programmes under one umbrella.

The well being of overseas Indians is one of the core responsibilities and concerns of Indian Missions. Embassies and Consulates should be proactive in terms of mitigating problems faced by Indians abroad. Heads of Missions have a special responsibility to play a leadership role in taking up and resolving issues faced by Indian citizens abroad.

The operationalization of 77 Passport Sewa Kendras throughout the country in a period of two years is part of efforts to provide timely delivery of passport services to fellow citizens.

We are blessed with a heritage which is unmatched and unparalleled. It is not just the cultural aspect of India that is unique and special, it is our vibrant democracy, talented English speaking workforce our enterprises, our governance, our leadership role in international forums- that are special and needs to be portrayed in an appropriate way. Public diplomacy both in India and abroad needs to find its rightful place.

The emerging multipolar world and multiplicity of issues on the agenda of international relations require all to ensure that Missions are effective outposts of India abroad. Emphasis needs to be put on 4 Cs- ‘Commerce, Connectivity, Consular and Community’.

Remarks by the Foreign Secretary

Foreign Secretary Shri Ranjan Mathai briefed the 117 High Commissioners and Ambassadors from across the world, who had gathered at Vigyan Bhawan for the 4th Conference of Indian Heads of Mission (HOMs).

He welcomed the HOMs as representatives of India which is at its mid passage in its transformation. The country's economy is resilient enough to weather the worst global economic and financial crisis since the Great Depression, and continues to register one of the highest economic growth rates in the world. The world's largest democracy is still a role model of the enduring strength of democracy.

The continued integration into the global economy and the expansion of institutional linkages in political, social, academic and cultural spheres worldwide require greater sophistication in the way diplomats articulated their message. There was a demand for much vaster specializations of the foreign service in view of the accentuated public expectations of the conduct and implementation of India’s foreign policy. The need to present holistic answers to issues relating to political dialogue, security, financial flows, trade, economic relations, cyber matters and priorities, information, culture, science, etc has been accentuated.

In the attainment of Indian foreign policy objectives, a high priority has always been given to the development of close ties with the countries of our neighbourhood based on the fundamental principles of equality and mutual respect and mutual sensitivity to each other’s concerns. India’s engagements with major powers have also visibly and substantively increased in a more nuanced way than previously.

Other Interactions

The Home Minister Shri Sushil Kumar Shinde shared his thoughts on India’s security environment and challenges with the participants. He also interacted and responded to questions relating to visa issues.

In addition, National Security Adviser, Dy National Security Adviser, Finance Secretary, Secretary Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs also addressed the HOMs and responded to a number of questions on a variety of issues.

New Delhi, September 15, 2012.

The second day of the Fourth Heads of Mission’s conference witnessed discussions on a wide range of issues which focused on India’s immediate neighbourhood, its multilateral engagements, energy security, the Euro zone crisis, India’s development partnership programme, the passport seva project and consular services. Presentations were made on National Manufacturing Policy and on Delhi Mumbai Industrial Corridor (DMIC). Also discussed were the outcomes of the six regional Heads of Mission meetings that were held across the world during 2012.

Taking cue from the Prime Minister’s inaugural address calling for engaging with our neighbourhood with renewed vigor and a fresh outlook, developments in our neighbouring countries were taken stock of and some intense brainstorming on their potential implications on our current relations and outlook for future engagement was carried out.

Speaking on the Euro Zone Crisis, Minister of State for External Affairs Smt. Preneet Kaur drew attention to the fact that the economic situation in Europe is unlikely to return to “business as usual” on its own. Rising unemployment and recession induced by top down austerity measures has already begun to take a toll. However the euro zone leaders are fully committed to saving the Euro and the measures taken by them will help the Euro zone emerge stronger with greater fiscal integration. Highlighting the likely adverse impact of the persisting Euro Zone crisis on India’s economy given the strong trade and investment links between India and the EU, she called for greater vigilance in safeguarding India’s interests.

Earlier Secretary (Petroleum and Natural Gas) addressed the gathering, highlighting the steps being taken to strengthen the energy security for India and emphasized the important role played by Indian missions abroad in achieving this objective.

India’s engagement with multilateral organizations and groups and its complementarity and importance for our growing bilateral relations with various countries and regions was discussed at length. Permanent Representative of India to the UN, Mr. Hardeep Singh Puri provided an update on the ongoing process of UN Security Council reforms, including the approaches of the G4, C10, L69 processes and the current situation relating to India’s quest for permanent membership of the Security Council. Also discussed during the session were India’s Look East Policy in the light of the forthcoming ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit, strategic importance of engaging with Indian Ocean Rim Countries, and our relations with other important multilateral groups like BRICS, IBSA, India-Africa Forum Summit and CELAC.

The efforts to streamline passport delivery systems through enhancing awareness of online applications through PSK’s, improving the amenities at PSK’s, pilot projects for integrating the Passport Seva Project (PSP) network with state police across some states and union territories and establishing call centres and help-desks to facilitate citizens were deliberated in the session on passport and consular services.

The concluding day of the 4th Heads of Missions conference saw lively discussions on non traditional but nevertheless crucial aspects of foreign policy practice, including Public Diplomacy, role of think tanks and cultural diplomacy. In addition, commercial diplomacy and multilateral negotiations on environmental issues and climate change were also addressed.
Terming India a “Cultural Super Power” Dr Karan Singh, President of ICCR in his address to the Heads of Missions re-emphasized the role and importance of cultural diplomacy and public diplomacy tools in projecting India’s soft power. He also stressed on the message of universalism enshrined in our ancient philosophy of Vedanta. He compared cultural diplomacy to be ‘Saraswati’ which together with the ‘Ganga’ of political diplomacy and the ‘Yamuna’ of economic diplomacy completes the Triveni of India’s diplomatic engagement with the outside world.

He also pointed out the close civilizational links and common roots of culture and language between India and the rest of Asia and observed that Indian culture has the same reasonance in terms of Eastern philosophy that ancient Greek philosophy had for Europe and the West.

Minister of Commerce, Industry and Textiles Shri Anand Sharma in his address on Economic Diplomacy reiterated the need for strengthening our commercial engagements with emerging economies of Asia, Africa and Latin America and called for embracing the globe through sound trade and investment linkages that are mutually beneficial. He noted that economic engagement has become integral to bilateral and regional relations.

The Minister dwelt at length on Africa’s emergence as an important economic destination and called for firmly reinforcing the historical bonds that exist between India and Africa.

He explained the measures taken by the government to correct the current account and trade deficits and the policy changes that are being pushed to make India a favourable destination for much needed foreign investments. In this context he spoke of the ambitious National Manufacturing Policy, which aims at creating nearly 100 million new jobs and establish over a dozen world class manufacturing zones. He stated that this was an investment being made in the future of our country with the goal of increasing the share of the manufacturing sector in our GDP to levels comparable to that of other emerging economies.

Speaking on the challenges in the field of environmental diplomacy and climate change negotiations, Minister for Environment and Forests, Smt. Jayanti Natarajan said that among the three important debates on sustainability, development and environment, India’s priority is and should remain growth and development. Nevertheless given the fact that there can be no real growth without preserving the integrity of the environment, she contended that growth culture and environmental culture should go hand in hand.

On the debate on green economy and green growth, she stated that there cannot be a one size fits all solution and advocated the need to have an independent perspective and asked for working towards an Indian model for green growth.

Emphasising on India’s commitment to tackle Climate Change, she observed that India was the only developing country which has unilaterally committed itself to reduce intensity of green house emissions by 25% by 2020 and has diligently sent its 2nd National Communication to UNFCCC. She also recalled that India was the only developing country that has said its per capita emissions will not exceed those of developed countries.

She reaffirmed commitment to taking forward the Bali agenda at next Conference of Parties at Doha while ensuring the principles of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities.

Summing up the three day conference, Foreign Secretary called on the Heads of Missions to be always ready to take on the multifarious challenges facing us in the rapidly changing global environment.

Key-Note Address by Minister of State Smt. Preneet Kaur at the Inaugural Session of the Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs 7th Annual Conference of Heads of Mission.

New Delhi, September 17, 2012.

Hon'ble Minister for Overseas Indian Affairs Shri Valayar Raviji, Secretary Shri Parvez Dewan, Heads of Missions,
Distinguished Guests,
Ladies & Gentlemen,

1. It gives me great pleasure to be here today at the 7th Annual Conference of Head of Missions (HOMs). I thank the Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs for inviting me to deliver a key-note address.

2. This year, the 7th HOMS conference by Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs is organised so as to coincide with the MEA’s Conference of HOMs. I understand that there was a panel discussion on overseas Indian during the HOMs Conference organized by the Ministry of External Affairs on 14th September. The HOMs Conference by Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs has become an established forum for discussing matters relating to overseas Indian workers and address the concerns of Indian workers effectively. It also allows Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs to review its schemes designed for protection, welfare and security of Indian workers abroad and receive recommendations for fine-tuning its policy.

3. The Indian Diaspora is the result of various waves of migration over last century driven by a variety of reasons such as mercantilism, colonialism and globalization. Indian Diaspora constitutes a diverse global community representing different regions, languages, cultures and faiths. Overseas Indians share a strong bond with their country of origin. They represent a bridge between India and host country.

4. While the Indian workers contribute to our economy and spread our culture abroad, we should always remain conscious of their needs and concerns.

5. Our workers face various problems such as: False promises made by unscrupulous recruiting agents in India; Low salary and substandard living conditions in labour camps; Non-payment or under-payment of salary, delays in payment; Non-renewal of visa and labour cards on time; Refusal of their medical treatment by the employer; Arbitary changes in the terms of their employment; Problems of housemaids; and Delay or non-payment of compensation on death.
6. Government of India has taken several measures and initiatives to protect the rights of the Indian workers such as: Establishment of a dedicated Community Welfare Wing; Compulsory attestation of Service Agreement of all household workers; Open House sessions; Free legal counseling assistance; Provision of shelter to Indian women workers in distress; Labour Welfare Fund for the needy workers; Setting up of 24 x 7 helpline; Labour Welfare Fund to financially assist poor Indian workers; A new e-governance project for e-migrate linking the passport system, immigration system and emigration clearance; Pension and Life Insurance Scheme for India workers abroad.

7. The Indian Community Welfare Fund instituted by Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs enables HOMs to provide on-site relief measures for distressed Indian workers. I am sure the HOMs, who are implementing this scheme, would recommend many activities to be included in the Indian Community Welfare Fund.

8. I understand Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs has launched Skill Development Programme in this regard which would greatly help in reducing the labour dissatisfaction. Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs has also signed an agreement with the UAE Government for web-based attestation procedure which needs to be introduced in other GCC countries as well.

9. We need awareness campaign for the training and counseling of workers intending to go to Gulf countries.

10. I am pleased to learn that the Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs is implementing an e-governance project for e-migrate which would link the passport system, immigration system and emigration clearance thereby making the whole emigration process transparent and easy for everyone. I would expect HOMs take keen interest in successfully implementing this project.

11. Another initiative of the Government is the Pension and Life Insurance Scheme for Indian workers. I understand that this scheme is being implemented on a pilot basis and soon it will be taken up in all the 17 ECR countries and all over India. This scheme is very beneficial to the workers and I would urge the HOMs to take active interest in the scheme so that workers in large number take advantage of this scheme.

12. Our Mission in these countries plays a critical role in welfare of Indian workers. The initiatives and efforts made by Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs together with the Mission’s support would go long way to find solutions of the problems of overseas Indian workers.

13. I urge the HOMs to play a proactive role for satisfactory resolution of the problems of the workers in these countries and also to equip the community with the right information so that several issues could be resolve amicably at their level.

14. I thank the Hon’ble Minister of Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs for inviting me to give this keynote address.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Good afternoon friends and thank you very much for coming for this interaction. I would especially like to welcome all those who are going for the World Hindi Conference and who have been able to make it for today’s briefing.

I have one announcement to make and subsequently, in response to requests from several of you, we have something to display. But we will go with the announcement first. Please be patient. We are very transparent and everything that we say or display will be available for all of you to see. This was just sort of an appetizer for you to wonder what that is, but we will let you know.

The announcement that I have is about the Ninth World Hindi Conference which is going to be held in Johannesburg, South Africa, from 22nd to 24th September. The Conference will be held at Sandton Convention Centre, which will be named as ‘Gandhi gram’ for the duration of this conference. The main theme of the Ninth World Hindi Conference will be Bhasha ki Asmita aur Hindi ka Vaishvik Sandarbh. For those of you who are not able to understand Hindi, it means, “Identity of Language and Hindi in Global Context”.

The Conference has nine sessions on a variety of subjects. Rather than me speaking about it, I have requested my colleague Joint Secretary (Administration), Mr. Anup Mudgal, who will briefly talk to you about the Conference and will be able to respond to any questions that you have on that Conference. So, I would request him to speak a little bit about the Conference and then respond to questions, before we go to the next element of our interaction today.

Joint Secretary (AD) (Shri Anup K. Mudgal): Thank you so much for being patient to have this briefing on the World Hindi Conference. Since I am going to talk about Ninth World Hindi Conference, I will speak in both Hindi and English languages. If there is any issue where you feel that I should translate from one to the other, I will do it for you.

As my friend Shri Akbaruddin said we are going to have the 9th World Hindi Conference in Johannesburg, South Africa. This will at this week end from 22nd to 24th. Its tradition is very old. It started in 1975. The first conference was held in Nagpur in 197. Its initiative was from our National Language Organisation, Wardha. You will be happy to know that it was set up by Mahatma Gandhi himself.

Since this series started in 1975, we have had 8 such conferences. Out of the eight two were held in India, two in Mauritius, one in Trinidad and Tobago, one in Surinam, one in the UK and one in the United States. If you observe the way it has spread, it has grown in popularity.

With time, its theme have also gradually changed in the academic contents. New issues, new subjects were added. As Akbar said the theme this year is "Identity of Language and Hindi in Global Context". With this there will be eight academic sessions. We will run it for 2 ½ days. If you have a look at the academic sessions you will see how with time it has been given a contemporary touch.

We are having this conference in South Africa. This will be first conference in the African continent. I would give you the background of the issues that have been taken into account while deciding to hold the conference in South Africa. This did not happen at the mainland. In Mauritius we had two conferences, but in continental Africa there was none.

As you know we have old contacts with Africa and there are several reasons for that, there is history, there is a big diaspora, there are cultural links, and the main thing is that the economic contacts are increasing very fast. We deciding on Johannesburg, there was also the added consideration of its links with Mahatma Gandhi.

In that there is a theme, “the Language Vision of Mahatma Gandhi in the context modern context”. In fact what Mahatma Gandhi did for Hindi, is very important. Therefore Gandhi’s historic relationship with South Africa, and secondly his relationship with Hindi; Putting these two together, we decided that the main theme should be “The Language Vision of Mahatma Gandhi’s in the Modern Context”.

Apart from this other issues are very contemporary and modern, like, “Hindi Films, Drama and Drama Language.” There is one issue which we experience in our daily life: how Hindi is reaching our homes every day through this channel of films, drama and drama language.

Information Technology – Devnagri script and its capability— It has basically to do with technology. Today we all carry cell phone, iPods, and laptops. Adaptation of devnagri script in information technology is a major requirement. If the devnagri is not adapted to the IT tools, it will suffer handicap. That is why we have put it on the agenda, to eliminate this handicap and we are able to adapt the Devnagri script in our communication technology.

Next is, “Lok Tantra aur Media ki Bhasha ke Roop mein Hindi”(‘Democracy and Media in the Hindi language’. Of course, being the largest functional democracy we are aware why this theme has been kept.

“India and the Role Indian Epic Abroad”. Now, this was a subject which came from our South African interlocutors and partners. They were of this opinion that in many places the role of granth which means our epics and other books, those books have played in keeping the language alive. Whichever epic it may be it helped in keeping the language alive in foreign lands and there is a need to consider its importance.

One is Hindi as a language of the profession of Science and Technology. Whatever be the profession your language should not be a handicap. It should facilitate and not really become a hindrance. There is a special session on this theme for discussion — in terms of technology, in terms of tools, in terms of whatever is needed, are we up to the mark or not? So, this is an important subject.

The Role of Diaspora writers in the development of Hindi— For some of you really it might come as a surprise though of course we know there are foreign scholars who have taken interest in Indian culture, in Indian languages for ages in fact and some of those were somehow also role models for study of our own history and culture and our civilisational values. There are scholars abroad, they are not necessarily of Indian origin, who are working on Hindi, Sanskrit, other Indian languages and trying to understand what contribution they are making for the - what should I say because I somehow control myself and not use the term promotion and propagation because it looks like as if we are trying to promote some consumer goods - how to really carry this whole thing forward? So, there will be a session on the foreign scholars and their work in Hindi.

“Hindi broadcast and translation ...”. This is a very technical subject of course because the works are translated very regularly from one language to the other. So, they want to have a technical session on what is the role of translation in the promotion of a particular language.

Lastly, this has also come from the South African interlocutors, “Hindi Education in South Africa and Youth Cooperation”. In fact you will be again probably pleasantly surprised there is an organization called Hindi Shiksha Sangh, they are our partners for the Ninth World Hindi Conference, who run hundreds of language centres for teaching Hindi to interested locals. And they have done it on their own without anybody’s help, which means those students who go there, do so out of sheer interest and some of them are paying for those classes. So, this is important.

Then of course in addition to these academic sessions we are also going to have an exhibition there where we would have exhibition of literature, books, IT tools related to Hindi language. Then, also as part of the conference there is a tradition of awarding or recognizing scholars both from India and abroad.
So, normally up to twenty scholars are recognized at World Hindi Conferences. Before I round up, in fact we will also have some publications. One is called Smaarika which in fact brings out what we have done since 1975 as part of the World Hindi Conference. And then there will be daily newsletters. We will also have cultural activities in the margins.

We expect something about six to seven hundred people to participate in the World Hindi Conference. It is going to be a big event. Probably participants should come from about 25 to 30 different countries which will include of course the main diaspora countries also.

With this I will conclude, Akbar, I know you want to give time for questions. Thanks for being patient with me.

Official Spokesperson: Before we open the floor for questions, we will take you back in history to 1966. 24th January, 1966 was a sad day in Indian history. That was when the Kanchenjunga crashed in the Alps. There was much this talked-about diplomatic bag which was on that flight. Several of you wanted to know about this bag and wanted to see what its contents were. So, my colleague Mr. Bishwadip Dey has arranged for the contents to be brought here along with the bag. The bag is available there.

It was a C category bag which means that it had largely publications and newspapers. And to the credit of the newspapers of that period, they all survived. All of you can have a look at some of the newspapers which have survived for more than forty years in the snow at a height of 1830 metres on Mont Blanc. The idea was just to indicate to you that when you request information from us, we take it seriously and when the bag came back home we decided to make it available for you in full transparency.

For those of you who want to know about what this bag carried, it basically had calendars, it had the leading newspapers of that time both in English and in Hindi, it had magazines, also it had personal letters. It was travelling from here to France and then onwards to New York. So, there were some personal letters for our Consulate in New York. That is about what I have. When we end this, you are welcome to have a look at it. It still is wet with the snow and ice of the Alps. But you are welcome to use any information that is available, the dates of the newspapers and other items that we found there.

With that, I close this part. We are now open to questions. Let us begin in our usual way with first questions on the Hindi Conference and then we will have questions on the bag, and then questions on anything else that you would want me to answer. So, let us begin with questions on the Hindi Conference.

Question: Who will inaugurate the Conference?
Joint Secretary (AD): In fact it will be jointly inaugurated of course. The Indian Delegation would be led by Minister of State Shrimati Preneet Kaur, and we expect a senior level Ministerial presence from South Africa for jointly inaugurating this. We also have some confirmation from other countries of Ministerial participation. Since we are still about four days away from the event, these things sometimes are really confirmed at the eleventh hour. But we expect from South Africa and from other countries some Ministerial presence. Then we will jointly inaugurate because this is World Hindi Conference, so it has to be done. But from our side we know it is the Minister of State Shrimati Preneet Kaur.

Question: What would be the cost?

Joint Secretary (AD): I will be able to tell you after the Conference is over because then only I will know how much we have spent. But I will tell you how much was spent on the Eighth Conference in New York. The total cost including everything was about six crore rupees. There also we had about seven hundred participants.

Question: Hindi is the mother tongue of about 40 crores of Indians living in the country. What is the estimate of Hindi speakers out of the 25 million strong diaspora? Do you have any figures?

Joint Secretary (AD): The question is how many would understand and manage speaking Hindi. I do not have to be a mother tongue Hindi speaker to speak Hindi. I cannot say Bishwadip’s mother tongue is Hindi. I think today with the media or with cable channels reaching right into our homes, I am very happy that most people, they may not be native Hindi speakers, have picked up Hindi. Thanks to Bollywood, thanks to the various TV programmes, they are able to speak and understand Hindi. But, when we talk about for example these major diaspora countries like Mauritius, Fiji, Guyana or Surinam where in fact the population of Indian origin people is huge, they also speak a slightly different Hindi. When you talk to them probably you will say it is a slightly different Hindi because they took their Hindi with them long ago. These are slightly different dialects but they do understand and are able to speak Hindi.

Question: Just wanted to know how much was the fund outlay the MEA set aside for promotion of Hindi language. Secondly, you said the whole process of World Hindi Conference started in 1975. It has been 37 years now and we have only had nine conferences so far. How do you explain that?

Joint Secretary (AD): In fact World Hindi Conference is probably the largest international event that we have on Hindi. Normally it is done every three-four years. But that is not the only thing that we do. In between two World Hindi Conferences, we also have several countries organizing what is called the Regional Hindi Conferences. For example recently over the last about year and a half, we had a Regional Hindi Conference in UK, we had one in Japan, we had one in Spain, and just before that we had one in Budapest. For example, I was asked to go to Madrid. I could not go. But then I was told it was a very successful Regional Hindi Conference. There, a large part of the participation was local scholars. So, in fact we do not only have World Hindi Conferences, we also have in between the Regional Hindi Conferences.

Then it comes to for example our standard activities in terms of supporting those organizations and institutions. We have a very regular practice of, for example, supporting with books, literature, IT tools, software. Though we have a relatively small budget, it works very effectively. Something which is very important here is we receive a large number of requests from our Missions and universities and centres abroad asking for books for children, those small tiny, tiny bedtime story books. And we send a large number of those books to various centres so that the children are able to appreciate and are able to relate to their own languages.

We have about a little less than three crore rupees of budget every year on such activities like books and software and IT applications, and also for Hindi classes abroad. If there is a place where they want to organize Hindi classes for locals and they need some help in terms of paying to the teacher some small honorarium, we help in that also. So, while the overall budget is small, it is a very effective tool of helping those who want to be in touch with the language.

Question: Are there many people who speak Hindi in South Africa and are we getting their participation in this conference and how many from India?

Joint Secretary (AD): From India we have about three hundred persons have registered. I have a list of South African delegates who will participate in our academic session. Their names are (1) Prof. Rambhajan Sitaram, (2) Dr. Veena Lakshman, (3) Dr. Usha Desai, (4) Shri Faqir Hassan, (5) Shrimati Shiva Shrivastava, (6) Shrimati Bhavani Pratipal, (7) Dr. Dhruv Pande. These six experts who will participate in our academic session.

When we last met two days ago, I had expressed my hope that the 9th World Hindi Conference would be successful in realizing its objectives. In the academic sessions spread over the last two days, there have been in-depth deliberations encompassing various aspects of Hindi. Over a hundred papers were presented and reports were submitted based on the deliberations and recommendations in those sessions. A resolution incorporating certain action points has been formulated based on the issues highlighted during the conference. Now we all have to work together to implement those action points. I am very happy to see that this conference was like a celebration in which along with writers and scholars others also participated undertaking a long journey merely for their love for the language. People of Indian origin and others from Johannesburg, Durban, Pretoria and other cities of South Africa came here, artists from South Africa and India performed cultural programmes, and a composite exhibition on diverse aspects of Hindi was put up. All this turned this conference into a celebration, a festival. Our's is a country of festivals. There is a festival for every occasion; every region has its own festivals which lend color to the Indian culture and give it a unique identity. This conference also was no less than a festival which was made more beautiful by your smiling faces. Our languages have always taken the message of love, peace and brotherhood to far off places. We got to see a glimpse of that in this conference. We are happy to honour Indian and Foreign Scholars at this conference. It is my belief that the foreign scholars would work together sincerely for promotion of Hindi in their respective countries. I would like to thank the scholars and Hindi lovers who have come from India, South Africa and other countries to participate in this conference. This conference has come to an end but this is not an end of our work. It was just another milestone covered; the journey ahead has only just begun. Speech by External Affairs Minister on “India’s Foreign Policy Priorities for the 21st Century” at launch of the “India Initiative” by the Brown University.

New England (USA), September 28, 2012.

Distinguished Provost Mark Schlissel, Ambassador Nirupama Rao
Professor Ashutosh Varshney,
Dear Students,

It is a privilege for me to be here at one of America’s earliest and most prestigious Universities. Brown, I understand, will soon celebrate the 250th anniversary of its founding.

I thank President Paxson and Provost Schlissel as well as Professor Ashutosh Varshney for giving me the opportunity to visit a university of such great repute.

Nations’ progress and societies prosper on the foundations laid in the institutions of learning and research. The great universities of this country have not only benefited the United States, but also drawn students and scholars from across the world, including more than a 100,000 students from India today.

Over the past decades, through the vicissitudes of relations between India and the U.S., our engagement in higher education, science and research was a strong bridge between our two countries. This has contributed in immeasurable terms to the close relationship that our two countries share today.

Friends,

The ongoing India-U.S. Higher Education Dialogue is now a key pillar of the India-U.S. Strategic Dialogue. Our educational institutions, scholars and students are brought into closer partnership through this Dialogue. Our two governments place a strong emphasis in our relationship on the youth, which not only easily embraces the future, but will also have the responsibility in shaping it.

I want to congratulate Brown on launching an ‘India Initiative’. I hope it will focus on India’s heritage and its progress, its achievement and its challenges, its engagement with the world and, equally important, on the growing India-U.S. strategic partnership. I do hope the India Initiative will become an important part of Brown’s story in this century.

Friends,
I would now like to share my thoughts on India’s foreign policy priorities in the 21st century.

It is hard to predict what the century will turn out to be, but we live in a time when our inter-dependent and networked lives co-exist. As our world is globalizing, our societies and communities are becoming more diverse. We now have unprecedented possibilities to spread prosperity, but we are also bound deeply by shared vulnerabilities.

Friends,

Our economies and security are being shaped increasingly outside national boundaries, in the domain of outer space, seas or cyber space. The era of globalization and growing power shifts between and within societies call for greater cooperation among nations and new models of global engagement and governance.

India is in an exciting transition. A nation constituting one sixth of humanity is undergoing economic and social transformation on an extraordinary scale. It is taking place in a democratic and federal framework; in the midst of growing political pluralism and social diversity; and, in the context of continuing debate on equity, opportunity and sustainability.

Our policies are not only concerned about the growth of the aggregate, but also by the welfare of the individual. It is a complex political and economic challenge. We need to continue with a high growth trajectory and also make it more inclusive. This calls for an innovative, dynamic and sustainable engagement with the world around us.

Today, the world is troubled not so much by the specter of a major war, but by conflicts within and between societies, cultures, religions, peoples and nations. Promoting the values of pluralism, mutual respect and understanding is a great challenge of our times, and one that is vital for global stability and security.

India has been guided since ancient times by the ideals of Vasudhaiva Kuttambakam – the world is one family - and Sarva Dharma Sambhava – all faiths are equal. India has been challenged forces of intolerance, discrimination and violence, but time and again, when they have been tested the most, Indians have spoken as one people and one nation.

As a pluralist democracy that stands at the cultural cross-roads of Asia and many of its fault lines, India will serve as a bridge across the region’s – and, indeed, the world’s - great diversity.

India’s commitment to internationalism, independence of judgment in the conduct of external relations, support to the democratization of world order, and contributions to the maintenance of international peace and security are enduring legacies of our national movement. This enjoys strong support across the political spectrum in India.

Friends,

India’s foreign policy in the 21st century will remain rooted in these core values, but it will continuously adapt to the changing external circumstances and the shifting domestic needs.

As we look ahead, I would identify few more major priorities for India’s foreign policy.

The foremost priority of India’s foreign policy will be to create a favourable external environment for the pursuit of collective prosperity and the individual welfare of all the Indian people. Our interests are firmly anchored in a stable global order and a peaceful neighbourhood. We need an open and equitable international trading system; a stable financial system; reliable, affordable and secure energy supplies; and, food security.

We will need bilateral as well as international partnerships of technology and innovation to meet the extraordinary scale of our development challenges. In turn, India’s own progress will, in its own modest way, affirm the values of democracy and pluralism; contribute to peace and stability; and provide one of the pillars of the global economy.

Our foreign policy will, therefore, be an instrument of our development, but also a vehicle to fulfill our global responsibilities.

Friends,

Another major priority of our foreign policy will be the creation of an area of peace and prosperity in South Asia. For more than three decades the northwestern parts of the Subcontinent have seen much turbulence, and conflict has affected not only India but the entire world.

India is determined to work with its neighbours in the region as well as major powers in the world to defeat the scourge of violent extremism that has taken root there. India is committed to support the efforts of the Afghan people to reconstruct their war-ravaged economy. Our commitment to Afghanistan has been reflected in the Strategic Partnership that was signed last year.

Our pursuit of normalization of relations with Pakistan is evident from finalization of a road map for normal trade relations, and also from liberalizing the visa regime to promote greater people-to-people contacts.

Our vision seeks political stability, economic modernization and regional integration of the region. This will enable India to reconnect more closely with Central Asia, and also contribute to stability and prosperity in inter-linked South and Central Asian regions.

India is also asymmetrically opening its markets to other countries in South Asia, contributing to internal stability and actively resolving outstanding bilateral issues. India has demonstrated the political will in leading South Asia in a positive direction. We are keen to transform South Asia as a peaceful and prosperous region.

Friends,

A stable and secure Asia, Indian Ocean and the Pacific Region is a key requirement of India’s own security and prosperity in the 21st century, and yet another key priority of our foreign policy.

The idea of an ‘Asian Federation’ deeply animated the Indian national movement. Promoting political solidarity and economic cooperation within a newly liberated Asia was one of the independent India’s diplomatic initiatives. These ideas were way ahead of their time.

More than six decades later, many of these ideas have become a reality. Greater integration of Asia has generated unprecedented levels of prosperity in Asia. Asia’s extraordinary accomplishments in the last few decades could be reversed if great power rivalry, national chauvinism and arms race take hold of the region.

India is determined to avoid such an outcome by contributing actively to the deeper economic integration of the region and construction of a stable and inclusive political and security order for Asia and the Pacific.

Too often, the idea of balance and stability in Asia, Indian Ocean and the Pacific Region is seen in terms of the paradigms of the past century, but that is neither inevitable nor feasible or desirable. We will work to build a regional architecture that promotes cooperation and reinforces convergence, reduces the risks of confrontation and conflicts, and draws all countries of the region into a common framework of norms and principles of engagement.

Friends,

It applies as much to the challenges of maritime security, which is so crucial to stability and peace across the region. We will work with others to foster an environment of shared acceptance of the principles of freedom of navigation, unimpeded lawful commerce, peaceful resolution of maritime disputes, and access to resources, in accordance with international law. A durable order in the region requires not only the participation of, but also enduring commitment, from all countries.
Our engagement in the Asia Pacific region is characterised by strong bilateral ties extending from Myanmar to Australia; deepening linkages with regional organisations, especially ASEAN; a web of comprehensive economic partnership agreements and ambitious plans of connectivity.

While our Look East Policy began with a strong economic emphasis and content, it has expanded to encompass strategic and security engagement in the region. Two decades of engagement with ASEAN will be celebrated through the India-ASEAN Commemorative Summit in December this year. We will use this occasion to chart a road map for intensifying our engagement with ASEAN.

We will continue to invest in building a stable and cooperative relationship with China that is mutually beneficial, and also a source of regional stability and prosperity.

Friends,

Today, West Asia is home to six million Indians and a key source of energy and export earnings. Apart from a major source of energy, it will always remain our near neighborhood, with strong cultural and religious ties to our country, and of great significance for our economy and our security.

In the Indian Ocean region, we are assuming greater responsibility for security and stability, through bilateral engagement with countries in the region, but also through regional initiatives like the Indian Ocean Rim-Association for Regional Cooperation.

Our special and privileged strategic partnership with Russia has not just withstood the test of time. It has helped shape a balanced and inclusive world order, and it has contributed to the rapid growth of both the economies. It is geared for next level of engagement with greater economic content in the coming decades.

The strategic partnership between India and European Union is on a strong footing with annual Summit-level meetings. This engagement will be further strengthened with greater EU participation in India’s development agenda. It will assume greater global significance in the years to come.

Friends,

India’s vision for a partnership with Africa is premised on making the people of Africa its primary beneficiaries. This is why the India-Africa Forum Summit process was initiated in 2008 with a view to develop pan-African institution-building. These initiatives will assume greater salience in the coming years.

Our engagement with Latin American countries has grown into a multi-faceted one. The newly formed Community of Latin America and Caribbean States (CELAC) held their first-ever Ministerial meeting with India in Delhi last month. We look forward to enhance it to Summit level, on the lines of similar Summit level meetings with European Union and Africa.

As a country that has lived in the shadows of the arc of proliferation, India will not only maintain its impeccable track record on non-proliferation, but will play a more active role in building international partnership to combat proliferation and pursue the goals of nuclear disarmament.

Finally, we will seek to further reform multilateral institutions such as the United Nations, including the Security Council, World Bank and IMF to reflect contemporary realities and to improve their ability to address new challenges.

Friends,

As we look at the priorities for India’s foreign policy in the decades ahead, we see not only convergence of interests with the United States, but also a belief in the importance of a strong partnership between our two great democracies in achieving our shared goals.

It is this recognition that has led to an extraordinary political investment in the two countries in transforming India-U.S. relations and in establishing a durable and broad-based framework of a global strategic partnership.

Our political dialogue is at an unprecedented level and our strategic consultations have expanded to cover every major region and challenge in the world. We have a strong and growing defence relationship characterized by security dialogue, regular military exercises and expanding defence trade and collaboration. Our intelligence and counter-terrorism cooperation reflects our strong strategic partnership. We have redefined the framework of our engagement to pursue our shared goals of non-proliferation and disarmament.

Friends,

The United States is an important partner in our development efforts. Our rapidly growing ties of trade and investment constitute a strong underpinning of our relationship. Our businesses, universities and laboratories are creating exciting new partnerships of innovation, not only to pursue global competitiveness and leadership, but also address societal challenges in infrastructure, clean energy, education, agriculture, health and delivery of services.

Indeed, the enduring strength of our relationship comes from the public goodwill in our two countries and the warmth of ties between our peoples.

We come from different circumstances, history, location and levels of development, but we are united by shared values. We deeply value the independence of our choices, but also have a fundamental stake in each other's success. We sometimes differ in our approaches, but we seek the same future for our people and our world. Our collaborative achievements tell us of the enormous potential that lies ahead of us, but also inspire us to pursue it.

The success of India-United States partnership will not only contribute to the prosperity in our two countries, but, in a world of great flux and diversity, it will be a model of international partnership and a factor of global and regional peace, security and stability. For India, it will remain a relationship of great priority and importance in the 21st century.

Thank you.

At the outset, allow me to convey my profound gratitude and appreciation to President Turner and Dean Prof. Attanasio for giving me this wonderful opportunity to return to my alma mater. It is, indeed, a happy home coming for me, though after a gap of over five decades.

As I entered the campus of SMU today, I cannot but reminisce the wonderful and eventful time I had spent in very formative years of my student life. I owe a great deal of my success to the knowledge that I acquired in this great University.

I am greatly indebted to President Turner and Dean Prof. Attanasio for inviting me to address this gathering on a topic of great interest, namely- ‘India Now’.

Friends,

It was not so long ago that India was considered a mere idea! For over one and a half century, India was subjugated by colonial powers. Emerging independent in 1947, India transformed in diverse ways and in diverse sectors.

In the past decade or so, the global interest on India has increased by leaps and bounds. This new mindset globally is borne out of a realisation rooted in rapid economic transformation of India and the emerging role of India as a stabilizing power in the new global strategic architecture.

This is further amplified by the fact that a large number of countries, including the Permanent members of the United Nations Security Council, have entered into strategic partnerships in the last decade. Most salient aspect of such partnerships is that they are not targeted against any country; the sole aim is to bring most optimal mutual benefit to the peoples of India and other countries in such partnership.

In the last decade, India has been among the fastest growing economies of the world, next only to China. India’s GDP grew roughly by 8% over the past decade and has more than doubled in this period. It is poised to touch 2 trillion US Dollars this year. This actually translates into 5 trillion US Dollars in Purchasing Power Parity (PPP) terms, a measure more commonly followed by the World Bank and IMF. In this period, India managed to reduce poverty levels at twice the pace seen in the decade of the 1990s. Of course, a lot of work still remains to be done on the poverty alleviation front.

Friends,

The world saw India even more admiringly when it staved off the disastrous effects of the worst recession after the Great Depression which shook the global economy in 2008. India’s average annual GDP growth in 2008 to 2010 was close to 8%. After the 2008 global financial crises, most analysts had predicted that India would succumb to the deleterious effects of the global financial meltdown.

No doubt, there is an economic blow back but India has so far shown remarkable strength to stay afloat due to its domestic economy and its sheer diversity. But the embedded resilience of the domestic economy to deal with the blow back surprised foreigners and Indians alike.

It appears that Europe is in the throes of a recession. The Western world is watching India with even more interest as it is becoming clear that the developing economies led by China, India and others will have to become the engine of global economic growth over the next few decades.

Already the fast growing developing economies in Asia, Latin America and Africa account for over two thirds of the incremental global output. This relentless shift in the axis of economic power is also witnessing a fascinating transition in the global institutions of economic, security and political governance, of which India is a major part. The world, including the United States, wants to see India to play a substantive role in this seminal transition taking place in the institutions of global governance. India would be a focus of attention from this perspective also.

Friends,

India and the United States have built a strong global strategic partnership. President George W. Bush showed great vision and made an extraordinary political investment in the transformation of the relationship between our two great democracies. I am, therefore, pleased that my Alma Mater will host the President George W. Bush presidential library.

President Obama has carried the process of deepening the strategic partnership forward as a key factor of global stability and prosperity in the 21st century. In India, successive governments have pursued the relationship as a strategic priority. Our relationship has met the test of broad, bipartisan political support and public goodwill in both countries.
Friends,

Our relationship is anchored in democracy and diversity. Our partnership covers not only political, defence, counter-terrorism and other security-related issues, but also economy, energy, science and technology, healthcare and agriculture.

Our relationship is blessed with enormous enterprise and skill, and endowed with synergies drawn from India’s rapid growth and U.S. global economic leadership. We have a natural partnership for enhancing mutual prosperity and stimulating global economic recovery and growth. We see our partnership not only as a tool for growth and global competitiveness of our two economies, but also as a means for social transformation and empowerment of people.

I have just outlined why the world has focused so much of positive attention on India. All this attention has also raised expectations of India hugely.

Friends,

Currently, India is under some criticism from the world media for not doing enough to derive economic growth through better governance and institutional changes. I must gently remind the critics that India is a civilisational entity and change occurs sometimes at a very slow pace. But history has shown how India has always proved its critics wrong.

To delve a bit into history, at the time of independence from British rule, Sir Winston Churchill famously pronounced that India was ungovernable and soon it would descend into social and political chaos. That was some 65 years ago. If Churchill were to be revisiting this issue now, I am sure he would watch in amazement how India has not only survived but also done well, all these years.

India is, no doubt, very large and contains one sixth of humankind. Its territory is astonishingly diverse, with its people differentiated by religion, language, caste, ethnicity, as well as by ecology, technology, dress and cuisine.

Friends,

But beyond its size and diversity, what truly makes India interesting, it is undergoing change on extra-ordinary scale in several ways, that it is simultaneously witnessing an urban revolution, industrial revolution, social revolution, and democratic revolution. Of course, all this is also creating a new sense of national identity among the diverse peoples of over 28 Indian states.

The political culture of India was once feudal and deferential; it is combative and participatory now. All this is changing, even if slowly, the institutions of governance within the framework of the remarkable Indian constitution, which drives the critical pillars of democracy namely the Legislature, Judiciary and the Executive.
Friends,

It is remarkable that India is witnessing these changes simultaneously. In the United States, national independence came in 18th century, industrialization in the 19th century and it became a full democracy in the 20th century. So these seminal events were staggered. In India it is occurring together, which is why modern Indian society is a true melting pot!

For instance, American capitalism had a free, unhindered run without many regulations imposed by democratic institutions for much of the 19th century. Indian capitalism is taking its roots within a robust democratic framework, often in the midst of democratic protests in nook and corner of the country. Simultaneous self-correcting mechanisms are operating within this democratic framework. This may be frustrating for foreign investors, but they gradually understand the process when they look closer.

For instance, India is currently in the process of implementing major reforms in foreign investment in multi-brand retail, which has the potential to transform the country economically. Foreign investment in multi-brand retail is capable of changing the way agricultural economy works in India.

Friends,

The United Progressive Alliance (UPA) government has come up with a unique democratic model by allowing each of the 28 States to choose whether they want to invite foreign investment in multi brand retail. In my view, it is a landmark experiment in calibrated decentralization of federal powers.

While these experiments are on, the fast expanding Indian middle class is naturally keen on timely and efficient delivery of various public goods and services. The gigantic challenge, which is also an opportunity, is how over 1.2 billion people of India will move up the consumption ladder.

For starters, how will they consume energy? Over 850 million people in India with less than 3 US Dollars a day earning are the right candidates to use clean energy. Thus, lifting these people out of relative poverty and making them consume clean energy will, in some sense, has to be achieved in a cooperative and collaborative framework between India and other technology rich nations like the United States.

Clean energy and carbon optimal urbanization is, therefore, at the core of the new strategic economic and technology-based partnership. President Bush and Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh made an enormous contribution to changing the global nuclear order, which led to the historic India-U.S. civil nuclear agreement in October 2008.

Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh and President Obama have broad-based our energy cooperation to include not only civil nuclear energy, but also promote cutting edge cooperation in clean and renewable energy, energy efficiency and hydrocarbons. We also hope that the U.S. would become a key supplier of hydrocarbons to India, which will be in our mutual economic and energy security interests.

Friends,

As I had said in the beginning, this is another reason why the world is watching the evolution and emergence of 1.2 billion people to prosperity in the vast and diverse nation called India. This process will need visionary thinking at the domestic as well as global level.

On the domestic policy place, India will have to soon take a more decisive call on what sort of consumption culture does it want to spawn for its people. A certain mode of consumption, such as excessively energy intensive, can be out rightly incompatible with the resources, local and global, available at our command. India is working out the optimal energy consumption pattern given the current and future realities in regard to energy availability.

India is already facing a difficult situation as high international crude oil prices have sent its oil import bill soaring to unprecedented levels. India’s import of oil, which accounts for nearly 80% of its consumption, has widened our current account deficit. In fact, paradoxically even as the global economy slows down sharply and the Western economies shrink, oil prices continue to rise.

The longer term solution for India is to gradually reduce dependence on hydrocarbons and move to renewable sources of energy. This is India’s biggest energy security challenge today.

Friends,

India has inherent democratic checks and balances to tackle the various social and environmental spin-offs of consistently high economic growth. As spelt out by me, it is not mere growth but an inclusive growth that is the objective of our developmental policies and programmes. This requires a deepening of dialogue within India, and also with other countries as we live in the age of globalisation.

India as a nation of over a billion people, driven by the energy and enterprise of its youth, living in a democratic framework, celebrating its unparalled diversity, pursuing sustainable and inclusive growth, and fulfilling its role as a responsible international citizen, will be a major factor of global peace, stability, development and prosperity in the 21st century.

038. Address of External Affairs Minister to the Sikh Community during his visit to the Oak Creek Gurudwara in Milwaukee, where in a shoot out some devotees were killed.

Milwaukee, October 4, 2012.

Distinguished Mayor Stephen Scaffidi,
Ambassador Nirupama Rao, Consul General Mukta Tomar
President of Gurudwara Dr. Kulwant Singh, Members of the American Indian Community and Members of the Sikh Gurudwara Community,

I have come here not only to offer prayers at this sacred temple but to express our deepest condolences for the tragic shooting here two months back that killed 6 innocent precious Indian and American citizens and caused injury to three others. I visited the hospital where I found one of the victims, one of the priests at the Gurudwara who is recuperating. I talked to the doctors there and they conveyed to me that they are providing the best medical treatment available at the medical centre. I would like to express our profound grief for the families of those who lost their loved ones and for the residents of Oak Creek and for the Sikh community of the United States. On behalf of the Government of India and People of India, I would like to convey our deep sense of pain and grief that we have also gone through after we received news of this shocking incident. I carry the message of symp

This senseless act of violence is more tragic because it took place in a place of worship which radiates the message of love, devotion and peace. People in United States, India and around the world have strongly condemned this barbaric attack. Incidents like this remind us of the challenges that we all face from perverse ideologies.

The United States and India are defined by pluralism, diversity and respect for religious freedom. People from all parts of the world have found home and enjoy rights and opportunities in the United States. The nearly three million people of Indian origin in the United States, including the Sikh community, form a vibrant part of U.S. society. Their enormous contributions in their professional lives and as members of the community have been widely recognized in India and the United States.

I wish to place on record the deep sense of appreciation from the Government and people of India for the quick and selfless response by local police officers in averting what perhaps could have been a much bigger tragedy. I am taking this opportunity to convey in particular our gratitude for the service of Lieutenant Brian Murphy and wish him speedy and full recovery.
We are thankful for the emotional support that has been provided to the affected families and the community by Governor Walker of Wisconsin, Mayor and other officials. We appreciate the support of the members of U.S. Congress from Wisconsin.

Let me record our deep sense of appreciation and thanks to President Obama’s strong and extraordinary gesture of ordering the U.S. flag to fly at half-mast. His message of support and sympathy is a source of reassurance to the affected community. First lady’s personal outreach to the families and the community will also add a healing touch at a moment of great anguish and grief.

President Obama spoke to Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh and Secretary Clinton and I also spoke after the incident. We agreed that as two democratic and privileged societies that have always upheld the highest ideals of pluralism, diversity and religious freedom, we must stand together against violence and hate. The world has to be rid of such intolerance because it perpetuates the culture of hate and culture of violence. In this effort all of us should be united. We are of different nationalities, different religious affiliations, different countries but all of us must unite to condemn and not be intimidated by such senseless violence. On the other hand we will continue to pursue faiths in which we have faith and nobody dare obstruct that culture.

Once again I would like to convey our deepest condolences and reassure the American Sikh Community that the entire Indian Nation and the Government of India is behind you and the United States government and its people are behind you. That should serve as a message of peace, good will and mutual respect for religious beliefs.

I came here to Milwaukee, I had no other commitments except to come to the Gurudwara and meet with the families that have been victims of this tragedy and convey how strongly the Government of India and the People of India feel about it.

Thank you very much.
Speech by Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai at the International Institute for Strategic Studies for the 5th Edition of Foreign Policy Dialogue.

New Delhi, October 4, 2012.

Director,

Ladies and Gentlemen

I am happy to be here for the 5th edition of our foreign policy dialogue with the International Institute for Strategic Studies. I have been to this Institute many times in my past avatar as DHC in London and I am happy to see that Asia remains a key priority of your focus, and that IISS continues to influence international discourse on strategic issues, relating to the rise of Asia.

Today’s one day dialogue will consider three subjects: Afghanistan and its neighbourhood towards 2015 and beyond; emerging Arab developments and implications; and India UK Strategic Relations - Can they be built further? The first two are themes in every discussion of broader trends in the globe. They are subjects of vital importance to us as they take place in our vicinity if not immediate neighbourhood. The third is also of special relevance to our outlook and our ability to handle the changes taking place at the international level.

Before touching on these I must re-emphasize that India’s approach to planning and articulating its foreign policy remains what it has been; for us foreign policy is an enabler in the transformation of India. India is increasingly plugged in to a globalized world and events worldwide will affect our future. We need a peaceful periphery; and a global environment which fosters constructive dialogue and cooperation around the world. In areas of tension we support the development of suitable architecture for discussion and the maintenance of stability. We are aware that almost half our GDP is linked to foreign trade; up from about 20% in the 1990s; foreign investment and technology continue to be significant inputs for our growth. We are a country poorly endowed with natural resources relative to our share of the world’s population and depend on energy and critical raw materials from abroad. Global communications, models and best practices influence the thinking of our people. How the world grows and develops and how our foreign policy navigates the shoals ahead and finds the appropriate channels for safe and rapid travel is therefore a matter of vital importance for India.

Since we began our foreign policy dialogue in 2007, the world has come through a major financial crisis which almost turned into an economic crisis. Measures taken through the institutional structure of the G-20, by regional groupings, and by individual countries have helped us stave off anything like the Great Depression of the 30s. But we continue to function in a difficult environment for growth with uncertainty in markets, worries about the Euro zone, and the overhang of fiscal difficulties in the US. Dealing with slow down in major economies at a time when there is increasing pre-occupation with domestic policies and priorities has made the task harder. Policy attention continues to focus on national level analyses, even though the processes of globalization and economic inter-dependence have been pushing in another direction. These processes are also bringing new subjects into the context of foreign policy management. As our Prime Minister remarked in a recent address to Indian Ambassadors

“There are also challenges thrown up by globalization, which has led to entirely new paradigms and discourses on issues ranging from the environment and sustainable development to international terrorism, piracy and crime. Two decades ago, the internet was regarded as a great enabler. Today, cyberspace is one of the most worrisome sources of threats to our national security.”

We have also seen an increasing polarization over developments in various parts of the world and new elements of discord in a number of sensitive spots around the world. Some of these are in what might be described as our extended neighbourhood – in the Gulf and in South East Asia. These weigh on us and we have sought to use our influence to support dialogue and reconciliation and negotiations for practical outcomes which meet the concerns of all parties. Actual progress has been slow and fitful. It is therefore against a somewhat somber background that I will take up the issues before us and which are also at the head of the international agenda.

Afghanistan and its neighbourhood - 2015 and beyond:

Afghanistan is passing through a critical phase as it transitions towards greater responsibility for its own security and governance and as NATO/ISAF forces move from a combat-role to an advise, train and assist role. Success or failure of this transition process will impact security and stability for many years to come, not just in Afghanistan but also in Afghanistan’s immediate neighborhood - particularly in Central Asia and South Asia. For many of us who are Afghanistan’s immediate neighbors, we have neither the luxury of a ‘withdrawal’ or a ‘draw down’ from the situation that prevails in that country today.

Against the backdrop of this ongoing transition taking place in Afghanistan, the continued support of the international community for Afghanistan remains vital. We have all announced our ‘commitments’ of support - at international fora like the Bonn and Tokyo conferences. and at various quadrilateral, trilateral and bilateral forums that we have been participating in. What is now essential is that we make good on these commitments - that actual technical and financial assistance begins to arrive on the ground in Afghanistan. We need to move from rhetoric to actual implementation.
For far too long, the tragedy in Afghanistan has been that the international community sees the country as a zone of conflict, competition, or to develop some notion of “strategic depth”. These zero-sum games, that have historically bedeviled the situation in Afghanistan, must come to an end. India’s vision is of an Afghanistan that will develop and leverage its resources for a better future; which will play the role of a transport and trading hub linking Central Asia with South Asia and beyond, and through which will flow trade, investment, energy and people bringing benefits not just to the people of Afghanistan but also to the wider region. This was the idea underlying the Delhi Investment Conference on Afghanistan held in June this year. This is also the idea underlying most of India’s aid programs in Afghanistan that focus on infrastructure and capacity building projects.

The continuing threat of terrorism, the safe havens across the border and the menacing narcotics trade remain the most immediate challenges facing Afghanistan. The role of Afghanistan’s neighbors in combating these pernicious evils assumes great importance.

In a number of conferences, but particularly in Istanbul, Bonn and Tokyo, the international community has reaffirmed its commitment to stay the course in Afghanistan and continue its support for the Afghan Government’s stabilization and developmental efforts. In Chicago in May 2012, the NATO also underlined that in the post 2014 era, Afghanistan would not be left without support.

Peace and stability within Afghanistan affects our entire region and we all have a stake in the success of the Afghan Government and its partners in ISAF. We believe that reintegration must be based on the approach endorsed by the international community in the international conclaves, which I referred to, namely, that the political process in Afghanistan should be Afghan led, and red lines must be adhered to. We must preserve the gains of the last 10 years. We have to take forward the training and equipping of the Afghan National Security Forces. Of course, Afghanistan will need to take further steps to reassure its partners about safety and proper management of the security training programme. We are cognizant of the serious stresses caused by the attacks on foreign security personnel.

India’s assistance programme is now estimated to involve a commitment of US$ 2 billion. It includes a number of large projects like the new Parliament building, Salma Dam etc. There are also medium-sized projects and many programmes of assistance for HRD which are spread out throughout the country and where we will continue to provide assistance through our Embassy in Kabul and the Consulates in the provinces. Our assistance programme is aimed at development partnership with the strategic objective of helping Afghanistan emerge as a self-reliant nation, and one which can play its part in the SAARC region and as a link between Central Asia and South Asia. This is why it is formalized in a Strategic Partnership Agreement.

We took the initiative to organize the Delhi Investment Summit for Afghanistan in June 2012 to underline that Afghanistan represents an opportunity for the entire region, and for international partners in the period 2015 and beyond. Afghanistan’s mineral resources and its potential for hydrocarbons could be a game changer in the way we all look at the prospects of collaboration rather than competition in that country. The work done to take forward the TAPI pipeline provide an opening for all of us in the region to take a re-look at the scope for intensified regional cooperation. This can be done under any name – whether the New Silk Route or simply Central Asia - South Asia cooperation.

If the vision of an inter-connected region investing in prosperity rather than in futile “Great Games”, is to become a reality, Afghanistan’s neighbours have to be stakeholders. We ourselves are committed to supporting an architecture of regional cooperation, and to engage on an Afghan policy founded on equal cooperation with all its partners. During academic dialogues there have been references to a policy of positive non-alignment which could provide a support for the kind of framework we have in mind.

Emerging Arab developments and implications;

The Arab Spring is historically unprecedented and has already brought in phenomenal changes and has altered the character of regional politics. While some countries have experienced the ‘Spring’ and are in the phase of transition (such as Tunisia, Egypt, Yemen and Libya,) others such as Syria are experiencing a winter of discord. We are engaging with the new leadership in Tunisia, Libya and Egypt and have conveyed our readiness to enhance our cooperation.

This region, which is part of India’s extended neighbourhood, is of vital and strategic importance to us. The wider region is home to more than 6 million Indians, many of whom have been there for generations and contribute more than US$35 billion in remittances. Our economic and commercial engagement with this region is more than US$150 billion a year. It is a source of more than 65 per cent of our oil and gas requirement and hence critical for our energy security. The region is also a major source of phosphatic and other fertilizers and hence a significant factor in our food security. Continued peace and stability in the region is therefore of immense interest to India.

Our policy on the Arab Spring and towards countries in the WANA and Gulf regions and our posture in the Security Council have been guided by our long standing ties with the region and our desire not to interfere in the internal affairs of States and being non-prescriptive. We have, however, called for restraint in the use of coercive measures against people who should be permitted to freely articulate their aspirations. We believe that societies cannot be re-ordered from outside through military force and that people in all countries have the right to choose their own destiny and decide their own future.

India has, as I said, welcomed democratic transitions in the Arab world and has been willing to share its experience in areas such as electoral management and practice. We are also of the view that sustainable change must take account of diversity and the quest for freedom, for equality, and identity. An inclusive approach is essential for dealing with the realities of multi-cultural societies and regional specificities. It should also be clear that democracy is for the long term; that change is the only constant in politics as in other walks of life. Constitutional structures and political practices should therefore take account of the possibility of change; of rulers finding themselves in opposition and vice-versa.

In the last few months, the situation in Syria has required particular salience in international politics. In 2011, India Brazil and South Africa engaged with the Syrian authorities in dialogue on reform and political progress. Regrettably, the situation today has become fraught, and one in which guns rather than political parties are doing the talking. The continued stalemate must give way to a Syrian led political process to bring about democratic change. The UN Security Council and General Assembly both dealt with the crises in Syria on a number of occasions during the last few months. We have supported every effort of the United Nations to play a mediating role and to operate a credible monitoring mission. Support for these instrumentalities has been the basis for our voting. We have been supportive of regional initiatives to calm the situation and provide good offices for advancing internal dialogue in Syria.

India UK Strategic Relations

India and UK are strategic partners since 2004. We greatly value our relations with UK and seek to strengthen and deepen our partnership in all areas. India-UK Strategic Dialogue helps to strengthen our strategic partnership and will have its next round next week. It will examine various areas of strategic importance to both countries, including counter terrorism, cyber security, defence cooperation, nuclear disarmament, as also issues of regional and global nature. In a globalized and fast changing world, cooperation in such areas between like-minded countries is of crucial importance. There is mutual interest in strengthening our relationship in these areas and a number of mechanisms have been put in place for taking our strategic relationship forward.

In the world after 9/11 in New York, after July 2005 in London, and after 26/11 in Mumbai, there is greater awareness of the international contours of terrorism.
Considerable work is being done on counter terrorism through the Joint Working Group on CT which was set up in 2000. Much more can be done by our two countries, for instance, by establishing mechanisms for exchange of actionable intelligence in real time.

Cyber security has emerged as a major challenge facing international community in the last few years. It requires close international cooperation to secure cyberspace, which is a borderless domain. India and UK both have a common interest in ensuring a secure and resilient cyberspace as major players in this field. Both are members of the UN Group of Governmental Experts on International Information Security. There is an active ongoing dialogue between the National Security Councils of the two countries. We are looking forward to starting a policy dialogue on bilateral cooperation in this field between the Foreign Offices in October this year. There are a large number of Indian IT companies based in UK, which is an additional dimension in our cooperation. India had participated at Ministerial level in the London Conference on Cyberspace organized by the Government of UK last year, which reflects the importance we attach to this domain for multifaceted human development.

On issues of disarmament India’s record and credentials need to be underlined and we count on the continued support of UK in ensuring India’s full membership of the four multilateral export control regimes. Such support would be consistent with our strategic partnership wherein our robust bilateral relationship reinforces the commonalities in our position on issues of global interest and concern. These commonalities do create space for working together in some critical areas such as space, nuclear energy, and high technology for defence, sectors in which our collaboration with some other partners has moved ahead in the past decade. I do believe that given the links between our technological institutions and scientific communities the scope for developing synergies could evolve in the decades to come. UK remains an important defence partner for India and we should look at building more strategic collaboration in defence industry.

It would therefore be appropriate to conclude that our strategic relations can be built further. Going beyond the subjects usually classified as “strategic”, we can already see a very extensive broad based relationship. Our business and industry already have established a basis of partnership on equal footing with prospects for growth. Along with our political dialogue, technological exchanges and defence collaborations, this provides us a platform for further strategic ties. There are of course obstacles in the short term. The policies intended to curb illegal immigration into the UK have led to the perception that there could be collateral damage in the fields of education and people-to-people relationships. Building up understanding of each other’s priorities necessary for forging new strategic links requires a regular and continuing dialogue, which requires travel facilitation.

It also needs to be said that in India’s approach we take due regard of the UK’s regional context and the state of its relations with other countries in this part of the world and do not find this limiting the scope for taking forward common interests.

There is a larger sense, however, in which our strategic relations could be made to grow. India is in many ways a part of the democratic world, an English speaking part of the world; we also share many of Europe’s civilizational values, a respect for scientific attitudes, and an understanding of the importance of a secular approach to issues in the domain of politics. That is to say, we share much in common in our vision for the world of tomorrow. If in addition to our common interests, we can build on this vision, Indo-UK strategic relations could have a beneficial impact well beyond our bilateral sphere.

Mr. Chairman, His Excellency Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs of Kuwait, Sheikh Sabah Al-Khaled Al-Hamad Al-Sabah

Excellencies,

Ladies & Gentlemen,

At the outset, I wish to thank the State of Kuwait, H.E. The Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs, Sheikh Sabah Al-Khaled Al-Hamad Al-Sabah for the gracious hospitality accorded to me and my delegation and for the excellent arrangement for this meeting. India congratulates State of Kuwait for providing dynamic leadership under its chairmanship for the last two years. We also extend our full support to the Republic of Tajikistan as the new chair in their endeavour to take ACD forward.

India warmly welcomes Islamic Republic of Afghanistan as the new member and looks forward to active participation of Afghanistan.

Excellencies

On the eve of First ACD Summit, I would like to share my views on some areas of cooperation which India considers important.

Transport linkages is a key area. As a prime mover, India is ready to extend its support for realising connectivity among ACD member countries linked by effective road, rail, air and shipping services through which there would be free movement of people and goods. On this occasion, I request members to provide their valuable comments on the Concept Paper on “Transport Linkages among ACD Countries” circulated in 2009.

India has established Regional Centre for Biotechnology which is carrying out biotechnology research of highest calibre and developing knowledge rich highly skilled human resource. We will be sharing soon the information on fellowships for training four young scientists (below the age of 40 years) for a period of 6-12 months in the agriculture and health care biotechnology areas.

We recognise that our shared cultural heritage and rich diversity of languages, arts, crafts and traditions provide ample opportunity for multi-dimensional cooperation within our region. We need to take forward the momentum generated during the 2nd Senior Officials Meeting on cultural cooperation held in April 2002 in New Delhi. We will be sharing the Concept Paper on “Publishing Anthology of Poetry of Eminent Writers of ACD countries”.

Excellencies

Among us we have the largest producers and simultaneously largest consumers of energy. Given our unique strengths and natural advantages in the energy sector we should provide new vigour in the area of energy cooperation.

Asia has been fortunate to witness elements of economic resurgence even in times of global economic slow down. The current scenario points to strengthening regional financial arrangements to offset the spiralling effect of financial down turn.

Majority of people in our region still depend on Agriculture. Despite rapid strides in economic growth in recent period, large number of people are still in poverty in Asia. We need to enhance cooperation in agriculture and poverty alleviation. Simultaneously, we also have to make health care affordable to our people. We need to focus on this area also.

Many activities have been undertaken in 20 areas identified. The time has now come to look at the working methods of ACD. We may strengthen the mechanism of national focal points in the respective foreign ministries of our member countries. We need to institutionalise the Senior Officials Meeting. We believe strengthening of the ACD process will result in substantive cooperation of long term nature with tangible benefits to our people.

Before concluding I would like to once again reiterate India’s commitment to ACD process.

Thank you.

042. Speaking Notes of National Security Advisor Shivshankar Menon at the Workshop on Kautilya - ‘Kautilya Today’.

New Delhi, October 18, 2012.

It is customary on such occasions to say how delighted one is to come to a meeting and how appropriate its subject is. Today, for once, I mean it in full measure. I am truly delighted to be here at the workshop on Kautilya organised by the IDSA. I must congratulate Director Arvind Gupta on this initiative.

I have three reasons to be so delighted. You forced me to read Kautilya again, and that gave me great pleasure. Secondly, the conference enables us to reconnect with the rich Indian tradition of strategic thought. And thirdly, it could contribute to the evolution of our own strategic vocabulary and thought.

Let me expand on that.

1. On Reading Kautilya Again

The Arthashastra meets one essential criterion for a great book. It bears reading again and again. Every time you read it you learn something new and find a new way of looking at events. But it is a very different sort of text from the Bhagwad Gita. This is not a book that you keep on your bedside table and turn to for daily inspiration. This is a serious manual on statecraft, on how to run a state, informed by a higher purpose (or dharma), clear and precise in its prescriptions, the result of practical experience of running a state. It is not just a normative text but a realist description of the art of running a state.

Reading the text again now, I was struck by how evidently Kautilya himself, (if indeed the author of the Arthashastra was one man and not a historical composite), is clearly the product of centuries of evolved strategic thinking. He cites several previous authorities differing views on many issues. Bharadvaja, Vishalaksha, Parasara, Pisuna and others are mentioned often. Kautilya argues with them, while presenting their views before his own. Sadly, what we know of many of them is limited to what Kautilya tells us.

Equally, Kautilya’s is only one voice, and the Arthashastra is probably meant to be a normative text, describing how the state should work. Ashoka’s imagining of the state’s place in the world, judging by his inscriptions, and his practice do not bear out what the Arthashastra says. Other Indian texts have different points of view, for instance the Buddhist Nikaya texts, on statecraft and defence. The Arthashastra and Kautilya are therefore one of several approaches to statecraft in Ancient India. It is also a text of its time and place, Mauryan to Gupta administration, and should be read as such.
I was also struck by the fact that Kautilya’s is more than just a power maximisation or internal dominance strategy for a state. He has an almost modern sense of the higher purpose of the state, and of the limits of power.

2. Reconnecting with Indian Strategic Thought

We are afflicted with neglect of our pre-modern histories, and many of us believe orientalist caricatures of India. India’s supposedly incoherent strategic approach is actually a colonial construct, as is the idea of Indians somehow forgetting their own history and needing to be taught it by Westerners who retrieved it. The version that they “retrieved” was a construct that was useful to perpetuate colonial rule and, after independence, to induce self-doubt and a willingness to follow.

Reading Kautilya and the other indigenous texts is one way to give the lie to these theories.

The other is to consider strategic practice in India over the ages. One only has to think of the Mahabharata, (our own Warring States period slightly later), the histories of the Deccan, Kerala, and Bundelkhand in medieval times, (to pick a few examples at random), and what we have undergone in the sixty-five years since independence, to see continuity in Indian strategic practice. Fortunately younger Indian historians are now working on these subjects with unblinkered minds. I have just read a book by Jayashree Vivekanandan called Interrogating International Relations (Routledge, 2011) which analyses Mughal grand strategy. It strengthened my faith that our scholarly tradition is alive.

But as a general rule, today our theory has yet to catch up with our rich historical praxis.

Reading Kautilya (and other texts like the Shantiparva of the Mahabharata) one is reminded that this was not always so. One is also reminded of the rich experience in our tradition of multipolarity, of asymmetries in the distribution of power, of debate on the purposes of power (where dharma is defined), of the utility of force, and of several other issues with contemporary resonance. In many ways it is India’s historical experience of poly-centric multi-state systems, plurality, and of the omni-directional diplomacy and relativistic statecraft that it produced, that is closer to the world we see today. (In contrast, the single-sovereign, universalist, and hierarchical statecraft and diplomacy of traditional China is easier to explain and attractive in its simplicity but fundamentally different.)

Let me be clear. I am not trying to idealize the Indian past. There is a risk here that the analytic tradition becomes the historical tradition, that we confuse cause and effect, and that imageries become the reality that they were intended to reflect. All I am saying is that some of the problems in IR and strategic studies that we think we are dealing with for the first time have been considered by great minds in India before. We are the poorer for ignoring them. We can, instead, use the past to learn ways of thinking about these problems, improving our mental discipline, as it were.

Besides, states behave in ways that cannot be entirely explained by rational calculation or logic. (If they were they would be predictable.) Studying strategic traditions and cultures gives us a better understanding of why this is so. And where better to start than with oneself. A little self-awareness cannot hurt.

Let me give you an example of what I mean. When we in India call for a plural, inclusive and open security architecture in the Indo-Pacific we are well within a tradition and culture of thought which was relativistic, idea driven and omni-directional. Other traditions, which are more hierarchical, claiming universal validity, find these ideas hard to understand. (And we are shocked when they do not espouse what to us are our eminently sensible views!) Friends tell me that Chola, Pandyan and Oriya manuscripts and inscriptions are early examples of what the free flow of goods, ideas and people could achieve — the ancient version of the open, inclusive architecture that we speak of today.

3. Creating our Own Modern Strategic Vocabulary

Some of you will groan and say, “There he goes again on his hobby horse”. But let me explain why this is important.

To be honest among ourselves, much of what passes for strategic thinking in India today is derivative, using concepts, doctrines and a vocabulary derived from other cultures, times, places and conditions. This is why, with a few honorable exceptions like the home-grown nuclear doctrine, it fails to serve our needs, impact policy, or to find a place in domestic and international discourse.

Jawaharlal Nehru made a beginning towards creating modern Indian strategic thought. But his work was incomplete, even though it was taken forward and developed by others like K Subrahmaniam. Besides, the world has evolved rapidly since Nehru’s time.

There is also no question that we live in a world that is different from Kautilya’s in terms of technology and experience. But human responses are still similar, as is the behaviour of the states that humans create and run. That is why reading Kautilya helps us by broadening our vision on issues of strategy.

It will, naturally, take time and practice for us to develop our own strategic vocabulary and doctrines. This will require patience, but must be done if India is to truly seek the broadest possible degree of strategic autonomy. After all autonomy begins in the mind. As I said earlier, fortunately the younger generation of Indian scholars shows signs of doing the necessary work and are thinking for themselves.

Strategic doctrines and cultures are not built in a day. I was, therefore, happy to see that this workshop is part of a broader Indigenous Historical Knowledge project by the IDSA. May I also suggest that this workshop be the first of a series that builds upon the beginning that you are making here? I assume that future workshops and work in the project on Indigenous Historical Knowledge will also cover other Indian thinkers and themes.

With these words, let me wish you and your workshop every success.

"It gives me great pleasure to address once again this annual conference of the leaders of our armed forces. India is proud, and rightly so, of the achievements of its officers and men and women in uniform. Be it in the line of fire or in aiding civilian authorities to carry out relief and rescue activities, the armed forces have regularly answered the call of duty and brought exemplary dedication to their task. For their bravery and their many sacrifices, the nation is eternally grateful.

In the year that has passed since we last met here, India has confronted persistent challenges on the external front. Global economic recovery has failed to materialize. The continuing uncertainty and weaknesses in the Eurozone economies have hobbled the pace of growth, including in Asian economies. Inevitably, India too has had to deal with the fallout of slowing growth, falling exports and expanding deficits.

Our security challenges, including cross-border terrorism, transnational crime and drug trafficking, remain diverse and serious. Added to these are new challenges in areas that constitute the ‘global commons’ - such as Space, the high seas and cyber-space. India has been a strong proponent of efforts to promote international peace, security and development and to act as a factor of stability in our region and beyond. Our size, technological capabilities and standing as a responsible state contribute to our ability to engage in regional and global efforts to shape responses to existing and emerging challenges.

In the political arena too, our neighbourhood remains complex with elements of instability. All around us, we see a churning of the political, economic and social systems of various countries with uncertain outcomes.

We cannot hope to develop and grow peacefully while our immediate neighbours struggle with poverty, strife and underdevelopment. Our external policies will therefore emphasize friendly and cooperative ties with our neighbours. We will also focus on establishing greater connectivity in South Asia and our expanded neighbourhood to promote the movement of goods, services, investment and technology so that we can act as a motor of growth in this region. The Services are an inalienable arm of our diplomatic outreach and I expect them to play a full and effective role in this national endeavour.

Our immediate geo-strategic environment comes with its own conventional, strategic and non-conventional security challenges. India’s strategic calculus has long encompassed the waters from the Gulf of Aden to the Straits of Malacca. Very recently, we have seen precisely these areas turn once again into fresh theatres of contestation.

We have consistently maintained that all issues must be resolved peacefully through dialogue. Wherever feasible, multilateral and international organizations such as the IAEA and the United Nations must be allowed to play their due role.

Even as we formulate responses to foreign and security-related challenges, concrete increases in our comprehensive national strength can come only if we solve our most pressing domestic problems. Affordable healthcare, quality education, remunerative jobs and reliable infrastructure for our people are fundamental to unlocking the human potential of India, which, to my mind, is limitless. The resources we need to do this can be generated only through economic growth at a faster rate than is the case today.

We need an aggregate growth rate of 8 per cent per annum to create new job opportunities for more than 10 million persons who are going to enter our labour force each year. This is not going to be an easy task, given the international economic environment. However, it is not unattainable if we make determined efforts to increase our investment rate to 37-38 per cent as was the case three years ago.

We also have to create an environment conducive for increased investment and savings rates, paying particular attention to investment in infrastructure sectors. Simultaneously, we have to work hard to improve the environment of internal security, ensuring communal harmony and control over disruptive forces such as terrorism, insurgency and left wing extremism. Our government remains committed to the achievement of these objectives.

As India grows, so will the responsibilities associated with protecting our newfound equities. For example, an expansion of our exports and a diversification of their destinations will call for equal measures to protect them from threats such as piracy. The security of our sea lanes would be equally vital in ensuring our energy security and access to other vital natural resources. Indian expatriates and our overseas investments, already present around the globe, are also going to be in need of assurances regarding their well-being. Security, therefore, will remain a pre- eminent and key pillar of our national strength. The Services, which are an important institution of our democratic and secular structure, will have to equip themselves to meet these evolving challenges.

Addressing these challenges will require addressing issues of joint-ness and skills, of training, doctrines and strategies, and of integrated decision-making structures and weaponry, all of which will need to be supported by indigenous research and production capabilities. These issues require constructive debate, not just about our strategic options, but also on our need to develop composite capabilities.

As commanders, you are all aware that growing complexities must be met by comprehensive responses. We should aim to abandon single service or segmented approaches and develop synergies across services. Compartmentalized views will only delay our response and dilute its impact.

In particular, there is a need to increase our capabilities in emerging areas like cyber and space, which can be the sources of new threats. We must therefore reorient our mindsets and define a long-term integrated perspective that aligns these capabilities with envisaged outcomes. It is my hope that the commanders will discuss these issues and not limit themselves to only material capabilities.

Preparedness is a function of modernizing and indigenizing our defence research, production and acquisition infrastructure. Our acquisition processes and procedures must stay abreast of global best practices. The Defence Public Sector Undertakings and Ordnance Factories too need to do more in absorbing technology and building capacities. They must also learn to adapt quickly in order to respond to changing needs and provide the required confidence to the users of their products.

Fortunately, the Indian private sector is now in a position to contribute to the defence industrial base and must be leveraged in the nation’s interest. Without this, the users’ levels of dissatisfaction due to time and cost overruns and technological obsolescence are bound to grow.

Many of the issues I have referred to above deserve greater debate and inquiry. You would all be aware that, in addition to the Task Force led by Shri Naresh Chandra on security structures and decision-making processes, we had also asked another Task Force led by Shri Ravindra Gupta to look into the issue of defence modernization and self reliance. Both these reports have been submitted and I understand they have made a number of very valid and relevant suggestions. It would be in our national interest to evolve an early consensus on their recommendations.

In this forum of leaders, I do not need to emphasize that leadership is the touchstone that will define the end result of any conflict and the outcome we are able to achieve. Technical excellence and domain knowledge are important in this regard. Equally, as leaders, your task is to grow more leaders. I am sure that adequate attention is being given to this aspect and that building the next generation of leadership is something that you are focusing on.

To conclude, let me re-emphasize the nation’s implicit trust in the professionalism, competence, commitment and dedication to duty of the Indian armed forces. The nation is fortunate to have military leaders like you. I wish your deliberations all success.”

New Delhi, October 28, 2012.

External Affairs Minister (Shri Salman Khurshid): Good afternoon to all of you. I would imagine that you know a lot more about this Ministry than I do. This is the beginning of my briefing. Foreign Secretary and his colleagues had a round of discussions with me. We have flagged the items on which formal briefings will begin tomorrow. It is a learning curve which will have to be steep because we have really hit the ground running. We have important visitors this week. I will need to get up scratch on everything that I need to know before I get into dialogue and conversations with them.

I would simply say this that it is indeed both an honour and a great responsibility to become part of one of India’s greatest traditions in modern times and that is the Indian foreign policy which is being admirably supported and implemented by generations of outstanding Foreign Service officers and experts and my predecessors who made contributions which I do believe are invaluable to India’s profile in the world and India’s engagement in the world for the betterment of its people, betterment of the entire country.

Some very difficult questions are thrown at us from time to time and we have to be prepared in very very difficult atmosphere in the world because of stress on the economy, because of the very contested claims on issues like climate change, on issues like restructuring of institutions, on issues like international security and terrorism, and all the issues that have continued to plague the world. We have I think managed to tackle all of them with great distinction providing leadership to the world, and that is the tradition that I would like to carry forward.

The Prime Minister and the Congress President have placed a very very important responsibility on my shoulders. It will be my endeavour to ensure that I live up to their very very high standards.

Thank you.

New Delhi, November 12, 2012.

Bismillah ir-Rahman ir-Rahim. Good evening and a very happy Diwali to all of you here today, ladies and gentlemen

Your Excellency Dr. Karan Singh,
Your Excellency Mr. Salman Khurshid,
Dr. Goel,
Mr. Rangarajan

I am so honoured to be given this privilege of talking in a lecture in the name of a personality so immense and great that transcends time proving his philosophy to be a flowing current of water nonstop. For someone like me who does not stand even close to a human being of that stature, it is indeed to bestow upon me an honour that I do not deserve. But thank you anyway.

Ladies and gentlemen, as a student in India and when we were reading about the Indian movement for Independence, inevitably all students of the subject or as a matter of fact all students in India, Indian or foreign, do come across the name of Maulana Azad and the other great leaders of India during the struggle for Independence here and there and often during their lifetime of study.

I was one of those students too, impressed by Gandhiji and the peaceful struggle and his associates from Maulana to Pandit Nehru, to Patel, to Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan the Frontier Gandhi, to all other leaders. But then as students since you are in history as a subject you come across these names in passing. And later in life there are occasions of course that confront you with the depth of these personalities.

My second encounter with Maulana Azad was in Mr. Jaswant Singh’s book on the Partition of India in which I read a speech, or the translation of a speech, that Maulana Azad probably gave at the Jama Masjid in Delhi perhaps right after the Independence of India. Then I began to get impressed by him and by the ideas and the vision that he had. When I learned last year or a few months ago that I would have the privilege of speaking in his name, I asked for his books and writings. And going through his writings and books I was amazed to see the scope of vision and the thoughts, and how deep Maulana’s thinking and knowledge of this region and of the world was.

A man who did not have a formal education but a man who learnt Persian language by the time he was 12, and a man who learned Arabic because he was born in Mecca and also because he was raised in a religious family of clergy and Mullahs and the Alim-e-Deens they are called, a man then who goes on to learn English though his preference was for French, as was mine for French but English of course is a colonial dominance now and we have accepted it. So, he did go to English too and he mastered in English in a manner that few of us at that time would have mastered having come from a religious family.

Reading through his book somewhere, he refers to the death of his wife while he is visiting Bombay three years before that and on his way of returning to his home he visits her grave site and he recites a poem from Wordsworth. Goes even into poetry in English! A journalist, he published newspapers, he published articles, he published books. A great Urdu writer, a great Persian writer, and a par excellent Arabic speaker and writer.

So, a journalist, a revolutionary man working for the Independence of India, a revolutionary man in the sense of the social reform that he was seeking for us all in this region. A politician, a practical person, a moralist who admits to his moralism along side the practical application of politics. A personality of many beautiful colours. Rarely you find an occasion where you find one man having such a variety of qualities assembled in him.

When you go through his life, when you read his work, during the struggle for Independence there was a remarkable episode of a conversation between him and Gandhiji. Right after the Independence of India, when the unfortunate events occurred and when the loss of life took place, when migrations took place East to West, and when Gandhiji goes on a fast unto death, and when the people of Delhi get together in their thousands and assembled to give Gandhiji the assurance that there will not be trouble any more or communal disharmony, even Azad goes to Gandhiji and says, “Well, what are your conditions?” And Gandhiji says that his conditions are that the Muslims who left Delhi must be returned back to their homes.

And Maulana Azad says, “Well, very good idea. But how about the Hindus who have taken residence now in Delhi who have been expelled from their homes?” A Hindu and a Muslim - one talking of the Muslims and the necessity of their return back to their homes. Then he says, “Well, right. It is a good thing. But how about the Hindus who have now settled in those homes?” It is like the most enchanting music especially at the miserly time of hours today to have people of that caliber, of that great humanism and humanity. Greatly impressed!

And on the issue of war, during the World War II, on whether India should join as a colonial power of the British force, for Gandhiji it was no, under any circumstances because he was against war itself, no matter who was fighting whom. There were no wrongs or rights on any side fighting a war. But Maulana Azad said, “No, I will join Britain or the democratic world, as he puts it, against the non-democratic world provided Britain assures that India will be given freedom”. Then he said, “Not fighting a war was not a matter of creed for me, but a matter of a political demand”. And yet he coexisted with Gandhiji’s high super morality. And he is heart broken when his own associates who agreed with him, like Ghafar Khan and perhaps Lal Bahadur Shastri, I do not recall all the names, they break rank with him eventually and side with Gandhi on not joining the war.

A man who is also at the same time a Maulana, a great educator of Islam, and Alim-e-Deen. There is no translation of this phrase – an Alim-e-Deen. Should we say theologian? No, no translation. So, let us say Alim-e-Deen, who in his pursuit of religion excels so much that he translated Quran. And a Mullah from Afghanistan who travels all the way from Afghanistan with businessmen to Lahore to Delhi follows him to Ranchi. And he writes that one day in Ranchi after the early morning prayers, cultural prayers, when he was I believe under internment, house arrest at that time, when he is going back home, he finds that someone is trailing him, fast, very close to him. And he turns back and sees a man there and says, “Yes, Sir, do you have some work with me?” And the man says, Yes, “Maulana sahib, I have something to ask you. I have been reading your translation of the Quran as it is called, the Tafseer, and I have some problems understanding parts of your translation.

He says, “Who are you? Where are you from?” The man says, “I am a Mullah from Afghanistan and I have come all the way here to Ranchi to ask you this.” And Maulana says, “Let us go home with me”. And they go home. And he stays a few days with the Maulana. The Maulana gives him the meaning as the understood of those translations of the Quran that he has done. And one day in the morning the Mullah from Afghanistan says, “Well, Maulana sahib, now I want to beg your leave and I want to go home.” And the Maulana says, “Wait a minute. I will come back in a second”. He goes home to bring some money to this very poor person who came all the way from Afghanistan to learn the Quran from Maulana, and the Maulana finds that the man has already left, has not waited. A great interaction! Beyond Delhi or beyond Ranchi. People knew him.

But for me, as I was reading Maulana Azad, the biggest moment came when reading ‘India Wins Freedom’ a Maulana’s work, his memoirs, on the fourth or fifth page of his book you come across the man Maulana. And if you want to know about him, there is no need to go further in this lovely book of hundreds of pages. You are stuck there with the whole meaning of Maulana and his philosophy.

A religious man, a Mullah, a Maulana who tells you that for me religions are to unite humanity. For me, religions are to unite people, especially the people of India and beyond. And that we as one nation of different religions and different varieties of groups live together. And, therefore, I shun away all those who speak for division – Muslims, non-Muslims, whoever. Here you find Maulana, a man who sees in God and the religions that God sent to earth to mankind a message of unity not of division. And that message of unity then he takes as his creed and moves forward.

Therefore, Dr. Karan Singh, your title “A Maulana for Our Time”, is exactly true to the spirit. He is a Maulana for Our Time, especially for our time today with all that radicalism, with all the brutality coming in the name of radicals and by the radicals, with all the terrorism in the name of religion, with all the violence perpetrated against innocent people in the name of religion.

Look at the story of Afghanistan of the past so many decades. Look at the destruction of schools in the name of religion. Look at the killing of teachers in the name of religion. Look at Pakistan, what is happening there. Look at the bigotry and the hatred spread there. Look at the shooting of a teenaged little girl. Malala Yusufzai going to school has been shot because she has been seeking education. And look at it before Malala in Afghanistan. Acid thrown on the faces of girls, teachers killed, Ulema killed, Mullahs killed, parents destroyed by the life of their children lost, all in the name of religion.

Who is representing Islam better? Is Maulana a true representative of Islam and of unity of religions and of people or all these extremists, the faceless extremists? They do not dare show us their faces. Or are they the representatives of Islam? Ladies and gentlemen, the representative of Islam is the Maulana of Our Times. And if you have to choose between what Maulana is teaching us and what these extremists are perpetrating, no doubt if we take a vote in this room the absolute great majority, unanimously will go for Maulana, the Maulana that is poetic in his writings as well.

I was going through his book “Ghubar-e-Khatir”, a beautiful title for a book. If you speak Persian, ladies and gentlemen, if you read the title of the book “Ghubar-e-Khatir, that title itself would take you to reading the whole book, just like I was attracted to the title of the book “God of Small Things” by a lady writer, Arundhati Roy. “The God of Small Things”, when I saw this title I was drawn to the book and read it first page to the last page. Maulana’s Ghubar-e-Khatir is equally romantic and yet with a message. Ghubar-e-Khatir perhaps means in English the “Dust of a Pensive Heart” or the “Mist of the Pensive Heart”. The mist of the Pensive Heart. If you go through it, I am sure lots of you read Urdu, it is a great mixture of Urdu prose and Persian verse. The same is the case in Tazkirah, another book of his where he speaks of his life and of his thinking and of his philosophy wherein he speaks of it in Urdu and relates it to beautiful Persian poetry.

In one of his those writings called Estederaq, the Maulana is talking about his education and his life. And then he goes to narrate a beautiful Persian poet perhaps by Bedil, I do not know by Hafiz or one of these great poets, he says, “Rahrawan ra khastage-e-rah nest. Those who are moving forward, who are in the movement, who are walking ahead, have no tiredness or exhaustion of the way they are following. “Ishq hamrah ast wa hum khud manzil ast”. The love of an objective, of a purpose is the way itself and also the end in it. This is what we should learn from Maulana and follow.

Whether Maulana achieved all of his objectives there or not, we must walk ahead the journey that he began and completed. And that journey is a journey of peace, a journey of togetherness, a journey of tolerance, a journey of us as a civilization, like Dr. Karan Singh referred to, being one and indeed we are one. We are one in the examples that Maulana set for us, we are one also in the many examples subsequently that came to us.

Just as I became the President eleven years ago, the second day of my arrival in Kabul, an elderly man from Kandahar who was a Headmaster for about fifty years called Headmaster Ibrahim Jaan came to me and stayed with me for fifteen days or twenty days. Suddenly one morning he came to me and said, “Mr. President, I beg your leave. Now I need to go home.” And I said, “Sir, Mr. Headmaster, but what brought you here and why are you leaving so suddenly?” He said, “Well, I have nothing else to ask you, Mr. President, but one thing.” And I said, “What is that?” He said, “That one thing is that the Muslims in Afghanistan will regain their lost properties and goods. But it is the Hindus of Afghanistan who you should pay great attention to. Call them back and give them their property.” This is the Maulana in the aam aadmi. So, the story continues. So, the story does not end.

Or, take an example much more recent, just in the past two or three months. When there was some atrocity committed in Pakistan against Hindus somehow, there was a gentleman called Advocate Khurshid who went to Gurudwaras and temples, and who began to polish shoes of the visitors of Gurudwaras and temples. I believe he also came to the Golden Temple in Amritsar to do the same. Take this by extension to others. There are hundreds of thousands of examples in our ordinary life of the pursuit of Maulana and his message.

So, the Maulana of Our Time lives on and inspires us. A man so great as him can only be given meaning in the words of great people like him. And I believe Tagore’s “The ocean of peace lies ahead of me. Sail the boat, Oh pilot!” is the best meaningful description of the purpose that Maulana had.

So, let us say, “The Ocean of peace lies ahead of us. Sail the boat Oh, Maulana!” That is our future.

Thank you very very much.

There can be few occasions in life more fulfilling than those on which debts of kindness and friendship can be repaid. These past few months have furnished me with many opportunities to thank peoples and organizations and governments for their staunch support for the democratic cause in Burma and for me personally. The sympathy and understanding we received from around the world enabled us to continue with renewed vigour along our chosen course in the face of immense difficulties. Words of thanks alone are barely an adequate return for encouragement and help given in generous measure when we were most in need.

Today, I wish to thank you for the Jawaharlal Nehru Memorial Prize that was awarded to me in 1995, the year that I was released from my first term of house arrest. The links between the independence movements of our two countries and my personal ties to India imbued the prize with a special meaning for me. The thoughts and actions of the leaders of the Indian independence movement provided me with ideas and inspiration. Our movement for democracy in Burma is firmly rooted in the principle of non-violence that Gandhi made into an effective political force even against the most powerful opponents. His influence on my political thinking is widely recognized. The influence of Jawaharlal Nehru on my life in politics is less well known.

"Panditji" was a name known to me since I was little past the toddler stage. My mother spoke of him as a revered friend, almost a father figure, both to her and to my father. I had little idea of his importance as a statesman beyond the fact that he was the Prime Minister of India. To my infant mind he was the kindly old man who had provided my father with two sets of uniform, the smartest he ever possessed. In January 1947 my father had stopped in Delhi for two days on his way to London for the Aung San-Attlee talks that were to be the first phase of formal negotiations for Burmese independence. He had left Burma in the thin cotton uniform of the People's Volunteer Organization. Panditji took one look at the flimsy khaki outfit and decided it would not do for the icy weather of London. (That was one of the coldest winters in the history of England.) He gave instructions that two sets of a warm and smart version of the PVO uniform be made immediately. He decided that my father would also need a heavy overcoat but since there was not enough time to have one made to measure, a British Army issue greatcoat was procured. The most widely known photograph of my father shows him wearing this garment in the garden of 10 Downing Street.
My father was still a university student when he first met Jawaharlal Nehru and other Indian leaders. The student unions were at the forefront of the independence movement in Burma and shared aspirations led to ties of friendship between anti-colonial forces in our two countries. However, as the Second World War approached, the paths to freedom chosen by the Burmese diverged from the non-violent way of Gandhi. My father led a group of young men, the 'Thirty Comrades,' to Japan for military training and this small pioneer force became the core of the Burma Independence Army.

During the years under Japanese occupation, 1941 to 1945, Burmese independence leaders had little contact with the leaders in India but came to know Netaji Subhas Chandra Bose and the Indian National Army. At the end of the war, when Netaji's brother Sarat Chandra Bose came to Burma to offer his services as a defence lawyer in the trials of members of the INA, my father delivered an address of welcome at a reception held in the City Hall of Rangoon. He referred to Sarat Chandra Bose as “one of the leaders of India... a great brother of a great Indian.” He went on to say:

- as far as the AFPFL (Anti-Fascist People's Freedom League) of which I am the President... is concerned, our policy towards India and Indians in this country is one of the broadest conception and generosity... We have no axe to grind, we nurture no feelings of racial bitterness and ill will. We stand for friendly relations with any and every nation in the world. Above all... we stand for more than friendly relations with our neighbours. We want to be not merely good neighbours, but good brothers... We stand for an Asiatic Federation in a not very, very remote future, we stand for immediate mutual understanding and joint action, wherever and whenever possible... for our mutual interests and for the freedom of India, Burma and indeed all Asia. We stand for these, and we trust Indian national leaders... implicitly. A few months ago... Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru stopped for one night in Rangoon on his way back to India from Malaya. At that time, I met him and we discussed these questions for about two hours.

The next and last time my father and Nehru met was in those few days in Delhi that acquired unexpected sartorial significance.

After my father's death, Nehru continued to keep an avuncular eye on my mother from afar. Whenever she went to India or whenever he came on official visits to Burma, he made her feel his concern for her well-being and the well-being of her children. I may even have been taken along to meet him during one of his visits but I can only remember seeing him for the first time at Delhi Railway Station when I was about sixteen.

My mother was then ambassador to India and she and I and a small group from the Embassy and the Ministry of External Affairs were waiting to welcome Prime Minister U Nu who was travelling up by train from Calcutta. Nehru also came to meet U Nu and onlookers spotted him as soon as he stepped into the area that was cordoned off from the teeming crowds in the station. Cheers went up and shouts of “Pandit Nehru ki jai” resounded. His lower lip protruding in that famous petulant look, Nehru ignored all the plaudits and all the people (including me) and walked up and down the empty platform with my mother and talked to her exclusively. His aristocratic disdain for public approbation filled me with both astonishment and admiration. I wondered if Nehru’s public liked his cool arrogance or whether there was a bond between them that made exchanges of mutual courtesies unnecessary. Then I remembered that my father had been notorious for his stern, almost scowling expression and for his lack of social graces. Our people loved him for these very defects, which they saw as proof of his honest, open nature. I should add that towards the end of his life my father acknowledged that as a national leader, he could not continue with the rough diamond manners of a young revolutionary.

The year I went to Oxford, 1964, was one of the most significant turning points in my life. It was also the year Nehru died. Next to the overwhelming grief of the people not just in India but in all parts of the world, I remember most vividly reports of the poem by Robert Frost found on his desk. Oxford did not take me away from India for I made many Indian friends there. After my marriage, my husband’s work in Himalayan studies took our family frequently to the north of the country. My last sojourn in India was spent as a research fellow in the Indian Institute of Advanced Studies in Shimla from 1987 to 1988.

The year of Nehru’s birth centenary, 1989, was the year I was placed under house arrest for the first time. It could be said to have been the year of my political coming of age. When I joined the movement for democracy in 1988 the whole country was in a state of upheaval and my major concern was to try to unite the myriad political groups that had emerged from the cracks in totalitarian rule into a strong, coherent force for democracy. Each day was more than eventful: discussions, debates, public meetings, founding the National League for Democracy, touring the country to explain the aims of our party to the people.

The State Law and Order Restoration Council had announced that elections would be held in 1990 and the election laws were made public in April 1989. The Central Committee of the NLD was divided over whether or not the party should contest the elections. I pointed out that the laws made no provision for the transfer of power and that I did not believe the military regime would step down unless the winner turned out to be the erstwhile Burma Socialist Programme Party. We were still undecided with regard to the election issue when I was placed under house arrest in July.
The Chairman of the Township Law and Order Restoration Council, an army major, appeared at my gate with a warrant and a group of officers, civilian, military and police, in the morning of 20 July and I thought I was going to be taken to prison. As all members of the NLD had to be prepared for such an eventuality, I had already packed a small bag with the necessities of life in jail. My sons had come for their summer holidays and they understood that I was going to be arrested. When the Chairman appeared at the front door, Kim asked him if I would be kept as an ‘A’ class prisoner or a ‘B’ class prisoner. Somebody must have been talking to him about colonial times when political prisoners were given ‘B’ status, better treatment and more privileges than the criminal ‘C’ class. (‘A’ class was reserved for Very Important Prisoners, such as retired prime ministers.) The Chairman was somewhat disconcerted by Kim’s question and replied that I would not be taken to prison. This was how I learnt that I would be placed under house arrest under a section of the law that had previously never been invoked.

House arrest meant that external activities suddenly came to a halt. It was also an indication that our struggle would be difficult and long. I would have to decide how I would chart the course of my life for the foreseeable future. Among the ‘maps’ I used to see me through the years that headed into the unknown were Nehru’s autobiography and Discovery of India.

“Time seems to change its nature in prison. The present hardly exists for there is an absence of feeling and sensation which might separate it from the dead past. Even news of the active, living and dying world outside has a certain dream-like unreality, an immobility and an unchangeableness as of the past.”

I read the above words of Nehru and made comparisons with my own situation. I certainly did not see the present and the past as inseparable, perhaps because I had access to a short wave radio that kept me in touch with the outside world and made it come vividly alive for me. Or perhaps it was an unlikeness in our attitudes to life that made us view isolation in different ways. Even when I was put into prison briefly during 2003 I never had the sensation that present and past had merged into one. There was of course a sameness to the days but each was separate and distinct, so many different stones in a string of perfectly matched diamonds. I use the diamond metaphor deliberately because each day had to be used to forge anew an adamantine resolution to continue along the chosen path.

There was, however, also much in Nehru’s books to make me feel we had many things in common. I was struck by the fact that the very first fragment of poetry he quoted in Discovery of India was from one of my favourite poems, one that had lodged itself in my memory almost instantly at my very first reading of it, Yeat’s An Irish Airman Foresees His Death. Yet even in our liking for the same lines there was a difference. Nehru wrote of wanting to experience again ‘that lovely impulse of delight’ that ‘turns to risk and danger and faces and mocks at death.’ I had remembered the words as ‘that lonely impulse of delight,’ and I could not check to see which version was correct as I did not have the poem to hand. To me, ‘lovely’ changed the entire meaning of the poem. I wished I could have discussed the matter with Nehru himself. Was it not essentially lonely, rather than lovely, to delight in what would seem at least inexplicable if not outright undesirable, to most of those around us? When, after the years of house arrest, I managed to look up the poem I found that ‘lonely’ was indeed the right word. Was ‘lovely’ a misprint in my copy of Discovery of India or had Nehru misread the line?

To mull over the meaning of a word, to build a whole philosophy on the interpretation of a poem, these are pastimes in which prisoners, particularly prisoners of conscience, engage, not just to fill empty hours but from a need to understand better, and perhaps to justify, the actions and decisions that have led them away from the normal society of other human beings. To begin with, what exactly is our conscience? My father once spoke about the need to be able to stand confidently before the court of his conscience. But this court, how broad is the range of its jurisdiction? Did it restrict its mandate to our convictions and our public commitments or would it also enquire impartially into the love and care we owe in our private relations, our obligations to friends and families? This is a question that must surely trouble all who, regardless of the condition of near and dear ones, accept distress and danger in the name of a cause or a belief.

Nehru explores this dilemma in writing about his wife Kamala. In 1934, while serving one of his many terms of imprisonment, it was suggested to him “through various intermediaries” that if he were to give an assurance, even an informal one, that he would keep away from politics for the rest of the term to which he had been sentenced, he would be released to tend to his ailing wife. This roused a deep indignation in the proud independence fighter.

Politics was far enough from my thoughts just then, and the politics I had seen during my eleven days outside had disgusted me, but to give an assurance! And to be disloyal to my pledges, to the cause, to my colleagues, to myself! It was an impossible condition, whatever happened. To do so meant inflicting a mortal injury on the roots of my being, on almost everything I held sacred. I was told that Kamala’s condition was becoming worse and worse and my presence by her side might make all the difference between life and death. Was my personal conceit and pride greater than my desire to give her this chance? It might have been a terrible predicament for me, but fortunately that dilemma did not face me in that way at least. I knew that Kamala herself would strongly disapprove of my giving any undertaking, and if I did anything of the kind it would shock her and harm her.
Early in October I was taken to see her again. She was lying almost in a daze with a high temperature. She longed to have me by her, but as I was leaving her, to go back to prison, she smiled at me bravely and beckoned to me to bend down. When I did so, she whispered: “What is this about your giving an assurance to Government? Do not give it!”

The above passages fascinated me. The monumental egoism: ‘my pledges,’ ‘my colleagues,’ ‘myself,’ ‘the roots of my being,’ ‘everything I held sacred.’ The briefest appearance before an impartial court of conscience before deciding that he would be doing Kamala more harm than good by doing what was repugnant to his principles. And of course Kamala’s own words put the seal of approval on his decision.

Yet in full awareness of the egoism and some possible self-deception on the part of Nehru, I have to confess that I wholly endorsed his stand on the matter. After my release from my first term of house arrest, I made public speeches to supporters who gathered in the street outside my garden at weekends. On one such occasion, I spoke of the above episode and urged the families of democracy activists to cultivate Kamala’s fortitude and dedication. Such are the exigencies of dangerous causes. The lesson I really learnt however was not to deceive myself, or others, with the claim that we are making self-sacrifices when we follow our conscience; we are simply making a choice and possibly an egoistic one at that. When we give up what is dear to our hearts is it not sometimes to make ourselves less vulnerable? The ones who make the real sacrifices are those who let us go free to keep our secret trysts with destiny.

Politics is about people and people are about relationships, whether at a private or public level. The two Indian leaders to whom I feel closest are undoubtedly Gandhi and Nehru because many of the challenges they faced along the path to independence are the ones we have been facing over the course of our struggle which will marked its quarter century next year. The survival of their relationship, which was both personal and political, in spite of their many differences is one of the triumphs of Indian politics. When Gandhi decided to withdraw the Civil Disobedience movement, Nehru was deeply distressed. He railed: “Why should we be tossed hither and thither for, what seemed to me, metaphysical and mystical reasons in which I was not interested? Was it conceivable to have any political movement on this basis?” The doubts that arose in his mind over Gandhi’s methods caused Nehru intense agony. In his cell in Alipore Gaol, life appeared to him “a dreary affair, a very wilderness of desolation. Of the many hard lessons that I had learnt, the hardest and the most painful now faced me: that it is not possible in any vital matter to rely on any one. One must journey through life alone; to rely on others is to invite heartbreak.”

The lesson Nehru learnt is one we have to learn and relearn, again and again, along the long and difficult journey to goals that can only be won through hard work and perseverance. At the same time, if our hearts cannot cleave to our colleagues, if our loyalty to those who share our values and aspirations becomes strained, or we have reason to doubt their loyalty, we are cast adrift into a wilderness of uncertainty. During one of my periods of isolation, I jotted down on a piece of paper that if I could be sure of one, just one, totally trustworthy, totally reliable, totally understanding, totally committed friend and colleague, who would keep faith with me and with the cause in which we believed throughout the vicissitudes of this existence, I could challenge the combined forces of heaven and earth. In isolation, one tends towards melodrama.

When I heard on the radio, suddenly and unexpectedly one day, that the Central Executive Committee had expelled me from the party for the simple reason that I happened to be under detention, I felt myself to be in a curious no man's land, far away from everything except my own volition. I realized that pressure must have been exerted on the party and that it must be going through a very difficult period. Finally I decided that it was for me to keep faith with my party as long as it kept faith with our cause, regardless of their official position with regard to me. I thought of Nehru's ability to keep true to Gandhi in spite of serious differences between them and it strengthened my conviction that we had to cleave to comrades and colleagues despite dissension and disagreement.

Law and order, we are told, are among the proud achievements of British rule in India. My own instincts are entirely in favour of them. I like discipline in life, and dislike anarchy and disorder and inefficiency. But bitter experience has made me doubt the value of the law and order that states and governments impose on a people. Sometimes the price one pays for them is excessive, and the law is but the will of the dominant faction and the order is the reflex of an all-pervading fear. Sometimes, indeed, the so-called law and order might be ore justly called the absence of law and order. Any achievement that is based on widespread fear can hardly be a desirable one, and an 'order' that has for its basis the coercive apparatus of the State, and cannot exist without it, is more like a military occupation than civil rule. I find in the Rajatarangini, the thousand-year-old Kashmiri historic epic of the poet Kalhana, that the phrase is repeatedly used in the sense of law and order, something that it was the duty of the ruler and the State to preserve, is dharma and abhaya – righteousness and absence of fear. Law was something more than mere law, and order was the fearlessness of the people. How much more desirable is this idea of inculcating fearlessness than of enforcing 'order' on a frightened populace!
Nehru’s words not only reflected my own sentiments exactly but were so entirely appropriate at a time when the State Law and Order Restoration Council was imposing rule by fear in Burma. I hung the sheet of paper in the entrance hall of my house at a place where the security personnel, usually members of the military intelligence, who were my only ‘visitors’ could not fail to see it. At the bottom of the sheet, I wrote ‘Jawaharlal Nehru’ in large red letters not just in acknowledgement of authorship but as a defiant name flung at all who had a warped view of law and order.

During the years of house arrest I felt closer to those with whom I could identify politically, intellectually or spiritually through their thoughts, even if they were complete strangers or figures of the past, than to those whom I knew well personally. This I imagined to be a predictable state of mind for those incarcerated with nobody except their own conscience for company. What I had not expected was that such a state of mind would become as firmly rooted as the tree of life that joins the ground of everyday activities to the heights of aspiration.

Gandhi once said that Motilal Nehru’s most striking quality was love for his son: “Motilal’s love for India was derived from his love for Jawaharlal.” This comment led me to wonder if my love for Burma derives from my love for my father, whom I do not really remember. His image for me is inseparable from his part in the independence movement of our country, which often in my mind merges with our present struggle for democracy that has not yet come to an end. In spite of the strong ties of love, temperament and blood between his father and himself, or perhaps because of it, Jawaharlal Nehru was able to accept Gandhi as a father also, a political, spiritual father whom he could regard as the light of the people of India. The nature of such political, spiritual kinship binds us with a fastness difficult to put into words, as cold as calculation (“we fall unless we stick together”) and warmer than any personal passion (“we need one another to keep the core of our being intact”).

Recently, in a tribute to Vaclav Havel, I tried to explain why he and other friends and mentors whom I have never met in person are a major driving force in my public endeavours, which are no longer separable from my private life, by referring to an article about me written many years back, Ann, a friend from Oxford days. She applied some lines Yeats wrote for the Irish revolutionary, Maud Gonne to me:

How many have loved your moments of glad grace,
And loved your beauty with love false or true;
But one man loved the pilgrim soul in you,
And the loved the sorrows of your changing face.

Ann omitted the last line, perhaps because she considered it inauspicious, but I am including it because the whole adds up to a most moving testament to friendship. To be loved for one’s questing spirit is to be loved in the best possible way and to be given understanding and support through the hardships of a long struggle is never to be alone.

Today, as I thank all of you for honouring me with the Jawaharlal Nehru Memorial Prize, I would like to express my deep appreciation for the leaders of India who became my most precious friends because their lives helped me to find my way through uncharted terrain. The discovery of Nehru was also a discovery of myself.

047. Press Release regarding the Passport Seva Project winning CSI-Nihilent e-Governance Award for Excellence.

The Computer Society of India (CSI) has adjudged Ministry of External Affairs’ Passport Seva Project as the most significant e-Governance initiative of the Government of India undertaken during 2011-12. The final selection for the award was done after a multi-stage evaluation, which included field visits to Passport Seva Kendras.

The Computer Society of India is the largest association of IT professionals in India. It joined hands with Nihilent Technologies in the year 2002 to institute CSI-Nihilent e-Governance Awards for recognising successful efforts in application of ICT for good governance.

The PSP, approved by the Union Cabinet and launched in Public-Private Partnership mode with Tata Consultancy Services as service partner, aims “to deliver all Passport-related services to the citizens in a timely, transparent, more accessible, reliable manner & in a comfortable environment through streamlined processes and committed, trained & motivated workforce”. The Ministry of External Affairs successfully completed setting up and operationalisation of 77 PSKs in the country in June 2012.

The Ministry is improving governance in Passport Offices by focussing on citizen-centricity, service orientation and transparency. The intended benefits to common man are service provisioning in a transparent manner within defined service levels, closer and larger number of access points for services, easy availability of a portfolio of on-line services with real-time status tracking and enquiry, availability of good public facilities at PSKs and an effective system of grievance redressal. The award is a clear recognition that enhanced usage of ICT as envisioned in the Passport Seva Project has brought about transformation in the functioning of the Passport Offices and delivery of public service to citizens.
Interview of External Affairs Minister to NDTV 24X7.

Interviewer (Ms. Nidhi Razdan): Joining us now is India’s Foreign Minister Mr. Salman Khurshid who has already had a rather interesting tenure in the less than one month that he has been at his new job.

Mr. Khurshid, thank you for joining us today. Like I said, you have only been at this new job for less than a month now. Do you feel it is a refreshing change from what you were doing? We are already seeing you generally wear more suits and ties than kurtas although today is an exception.

External Affairs Minister (Shri Salman Khurshid): I am trying to give a clear message that I am not breaking off from my other engagements. Of course, in sartorial terms you have to sometimes make adjustments, which I do. But more than that I think you have to make adjustments in attitudes and give up some preoccupations because this is a job with which you have to be extremely careful. You cannot afford to make mistakes. You do not make mistakes easily but even then you just have to be extremely careful that do not make mistakes because so much turns on what you are doing. So, yes, it is different, and it is exciting, and it is certainly very challenging. Now we will have to see how one does.

Interviewer: You have already faced some challenges. There are interesting and challenging things happening in the neighbourhood. I will start with Pakistan first because Kasab’s hanging just happened a few days ago. What is your assessment of the reaction to his hanging in Pakistan both officially and even in the media where everything seems to have been generally quite understated?

External Affairs Minister: I think that as far as Pakistan is concerned, there seems to be a reasonably acceptable level in terms of the response that we have had, and some signals have been I think particularly satisfying. It could not have been easy for them. And I am sure many many things that we expect of them are not easy looking at their ground conditions and the complicated politics that they have in their country. We certainly understand it. But at the same time we expect that they understand our compulsions and they understand our aspirations and our obligations. I think it is that balance between us that is called for and necessary and that is the balance that can allow us to move forward, mend the relationship whenever it has been damaged because of acts either of state actors or non-state actors, and then look at the positive side where we can, as we must, grow towards a more meaningful relationship.

Interviewer: I will come to that a little later in more detail. But there was also this rather contradictory sort of statements from both sides about whether Pakistan accepted the letter about Kasab’s execution. You said on record, the Government said, Mr. Shinde also said, that when we sent them the letter first in person with the Deputy High Commissioner they rejected it. Rehman Malik, the Interior Minister of Pakistan, has denied very categorically. He said that no we always accepted it. Who do we believe where both are saying opposite things?

External Affairs Minister: I think that was in process communication that we were offering to you as the media to keep you posted and informed about what the situation was at that time. It was important for us to underscore that as a country that believes in rule of law and the commitment that we have including human rights, it was important that the family of the person be informed and certainly the country, which is what we did. I think to go now into greater detail of whether they accepted, or was there an indirect way in which they discovered or the fact that we faxed that ...

Interviewer: But you stand by what you said on day one that they did not accept the initial letter.

External Affairs Minister: I do not want to get into an argument on that but I think we did what was the best and possible. We do not go back on what we said that day. The important thing is that the communication was complete. They knew what was going to happen and the consequences. Our concern that the family be informed, and that could only be informed by authorities in Pakistan, to the extent that we could indicate this we had done so.

Interviewer: Okay. So you are not going back on those words. But why do you think then they contradicted that? What would the possible logic be?

External Affairs Minister: If you read all their statements, I think by and large there is adequate convergence between what we are saying and what they are saying. But this is not an issue on which we should stand on ceremony and on any kind of rigid ego positions. The substance of it is that they were informed. They have accepted that they were informed. And I expect that they thereafter have done what was necessary for them to do which was to inform the family. We also had an address where it was indicated to us that the family would be available and we couriered to that address the information that we felt should be shared with them.

Interviewer: Has anyone claimed Kasab’s body? He has been buried there in Pune in Yerawada Jail. But has anyone come forward at all from the government, from his family, anybody?

External Affairs Minister: Not to my knowledge. And I would imagine that this is consistent with the position that was taken for those people who suffered fatal casualty during the operation. They were also buried in unmarked graves in our country because there were no takers for them. I assume that since it was the same group and the same operation, one would have thought that they would consistently do whatever they had done in the past. We have not had any other contrary information. Certainly we have had no signals whatsoever from any source seeking his body or his remains.

Interviewer: But if his family does seek his body, or Ansar Burney - who is a well-known human rights activist in Pakistan who said he is willing to take the body from India - would we be willing to consider that?

External Affairs Minister: This is a matter that will have to be considered on merits, if such a request was formally made. I request made by family or on behalf of a country of the citizen is one thing. But a request by any well-meaning third party is quite another. As I said, if there is a formal request, I am sure the authorities concerned would examine it as rationally and objectively as possible.

Interviewer: There has also been a threat from the Pakistani Taliban in the last 24 hours saying that if Kasab’s body is not handed over, then they will target more targets in India. How seriously are you taking that threat?

External Affairs Minister: I think any form of terrorism should not cause you undue anxiety but you have to be careful. You cannot be dismissive. We have had very unpleasant experiences in the past. So, we cannot be dismissive and that is the reason why we requested the Government of Pakistan to provide adequate security. And we would continue to do so as and when we feel that that is in the coming days or months found necessary according to our analysis. We would continue to make that request ...

Interviewer: So, you take that threat seriously. You have to, I guess.

External Affairs Minister: I think one should not take chances. As I said, we have seen some extremely unpleasant things happen in the past. So, one should not take chances. But this is responsibility of the Government of Pakistan. It is a law and order issue for them. It is a security issue for them as well. And I hope that they will take it seriously.

Interviewer: The families of the victims of Mumbai and many others have commented in the last few days that Kasab’s hanging does not really close the matter here, and I certainly think the Government would not think that either because the masterminds are still roaming free in Pakistan. On the question of Hafiz Saeed, do you think we have hit a dead end with Pakistan on even being able to detain him? There seems to be a sense that it has just become frustrating to deal with them on this and it is not going anywhere.

External Affairs Minister: No, we are not giving up and we have not given up. I think it would be unfair on many people in this country and on ourselves if we did give up. I think that there are some intractable issues on which you cannot expect immediate relief, response and reaction that you desire and you aspire to. But still you have to continue, you have to continue your struggle, and you have to continue striving. And we will continue to do so because it is not just about something that has happened in the past which was extremely hurtful and tragic, but it is also in a sense unraveling systems that can be put in operation against us in the future. And unless we know the entire story and we are able to make people accountable for what they did, there would remain a big question mark about our security, safety of our citizens in the future. I think that is why it is important in both dimensions that we get to what we believe is the logical conclusion.

Interviewer: So, you are saying you will not give up on that. I do not want to use the word precondition, but is it now fairly clear that the Indian Prime Minister’s visit to Pakistan is linked to 26/11 and concrete progress on that?

External Affairs Minister: I would not say that but at the same time I cannot say that it is irrelevant. Whatever is in totality different dimensions of our relationship with Pakistan and whatever is linked with our relationship with Pakistan will obviously every time we take a call has to be factored in. What the impact of each of those things will be at any given time in an evolving situation, will have to be decided at that particular moment. But our strategic, safety concerns and obviously accountability for what happened in Mumbai is not the only factor. There are other factors that you look at as well. It is a totality of those factors that makes you take a decision.

Interviewer: Is the Prime Ministerial visit looking, therefore, highly unlikely?

External Affairs Minister: I am not prepared to venture a guess on this. When the Prime Minister feels that he is ready to take a call he will probably ask us to provide analysis, inputs and suggestions, and then he will take a call. I do not think we should anticipate one way or the other, and we should leave it to the Prime Minister to take the call when he feels it is appropriate.

Interviewer: But is it a smaller window now? There are elections coming up in Pakistan.

External Affairs Minister: Yes, I think the window is closing in because of elections in Pakistan. And then our own elections will not be too far away once the elections in Pakistan are over. There are a lot of other things that are happening between now and then. Of course the window is a very small window but sometimes you can fly through a small window and sometimes there is a very large window and you still cannot go through. So, as I said, I do not want to be more specific than this.

Interviewer: Very diplomatic answer I must say, Mr. Khurshid. Let me turn my attention to China now with whom we have a rather complicated relationship. There has been a leadership transition that is going on there. And from time to time these irritants crop up between India and China. Today, as we have reported as well, a new row that has broken out over two Chinese passports that have been issued where they are stamping a map of China that includes Arunachal as part of China, Aksai Chin as part of China. The Indians have sort of given them back in kind, as one official told me, by stamping the Indian version of the map on visas that are given to Chinese nationals. What can you tell us about this latest map row?

External Affairs Minister: You know that sometimes you disagree and sometimes you agree to disagree. We have issues with China, everyone knows that. And we have a history with China and everybody can recall that history. But we as a nation, and this is not just successive governments but I think as a nation, have opted I believe for an enlightened view of a relationship between India and China as being imperative, as being desirable, and as being useful for both sides, mutually beneficial for both countries. I think both countries have come to this conclusion. But the fact that we have come to this conclusion does not mean that problems that have existed have disappeared. We have put in place resolution methods as well, conflict resolution methods and solving the issues that cause the problem in the first place. And that is quietly and discreetly moving forward. Inchling forward maybe, but definitely moving forward. Now there is a new generation of leadership in China. The signals we have had from them, the limited signals we have had from them, are encouraging, are positive, are good. Our response is, as it should be, that prima facie we should trust them, we should welcome them, and we should put forward our best foot.

Interviewer: But yet these things will happen that they will continue to draw maps showing Arunachal as their own.

External Affairs Minister: And we will continue to say what we say. Why should we get ...

Interviewer: Is this an agree-to-disagree situation? What do you think it is?

External Affairs Minister: We never sat down and talked about how much we can disagree. But some things are implicit and some things are explicit. Some things you get accustomed to because the other side is doing it for a while, some things they get accustomed to because you are doing it for a while. And you do not every time sit down and take a tally of where you disagree and where you agree. But I think ...

Interviewer: So, you are not planning to lodge a protest diplomatically over this issue. It is not just India that is concerned with this new Chinese map. They have claimed the entire South China Sea as their own. Vietnam and the Philippines have officially lodged a protest with the Embassies in Beijing. So, are we planning to do anything?

External Affairs Minister: Every country has its own style, and I think every country takes a call according to the circumstances as they exist at that given time. You know that we have participated in many different fora where freedom of navigation for the South China Sea is something that has been emphasized over and over again. There are different resolution methodologies that are being proposed by China. Largely they want to do it bilaterally with the countries involved. We have accepted much more of a multilateral approach. But ...

Interviewer: But on the specific issue of maps, are you saying in other words that this is something in a sense we have gotten used to over the years - you are right it is not the first time that the Chinese have come up with the map that shows Arunachal and Aksai Chin as their own - and, therefore, we have learned how to deal with it our own way?

External Affairs Minister: It is familiar. It is familiar, and in that sense you might say that one gets accustomed to it, but not by accepting it. We are not prepared to accept it and we would not. We, therefore, ensure that our flags of disagreement are put up immediately when something happens. Now you can do that in an agreeable way and you can do it in a disagreeable way. We think that nothing calls for us to be disagreeable. I think that what is being done is only one of the many things that we share and that we come across in our relationship with China. So, you do not want to let anything hold the rest of the relationship hostage unless it becomes something that at that given moment in the circumstances that exist becomes a very significant matter on which you then have to take a firmer opinion.

Interviewer: Since we are on the issue of the South China Sea, we have seen China far more aggressive with so many other countries and in the kind of conflicts that it has with the Philippines, with Vietnam, with Japan, what does India make of this highly aggressive China?

External Affairs Minister: We have noted it. It is aggressive in the sense that it is a pushy and a firm position they have taken, but they do that also with Japan where they do it with Japan over the islands, etc., but that is their style. We have a different style. All the countries involved in the region, each one of them, have a different style. I think it is all the styles put together that give you a sense of how Asia thinks and how Asia feels. I do not think that this should be seen as something to be unduly alarmed about. But that it is something on which we would wish to express our concern and would be concerned is certainly very clear. But I do not think these are alarm bell issues.

Interviewer: But issues of concern.
External Affairs Minister: But they are issues of concern and that concern has been consistently expressed. We do find the occasional opportunity and appropriate opportunity to show our concern and to share it with the other countries as well. I think that we should not rush into a very optimistic or a very pessimistic view of the final outcome as and when it happens.

Interviewer: I would just ask you, Mr. Khurshid, to wear your political hat for a few moments. There are lots of big political developments happening in the last few days. First let me ask you on today’s issue. There is a huge row over the 2G report and the CAG’s role with a former official in the CAG who was responsible for drafting the 2G report basically saying that he was forced to sign off on it, he did not agree with the final number, also accusing the BJP’s Murli Manohar Joshi, the Chairman of the PAC, of contacting CAG officials and trying to influence them on the 2G report. The BJP has called it a government’s conspiracy today. And they have asked serious questions about why Mr. Singh, the CAG official, suddenly appeared after one year and made these comments in the media when there were reports about his reservations even a year ago. Why did he give these interviews now? What would you say to them?

External Affairs Minister: I would ask the same question. I wish he had said it earlier. Why is he saying it now? And I would ask that question of the media why are you carrying these statements now, why could not you get the statement earlier. I do not think that it is fair for anyone of us to dissect the CAG. I know that some of my colleagues in Parliament may be doing so. But they perhaps have greater freedom than I have as a Minister. We do respect Constitutional authorities. Therefore, for us to dissect the CAG and actually look at and put them through a scanner to see what exactly was the difference of opinion between one official or another official, I think is not fair. You just take whatever is coming at face value, factor that into the preconceived notions and positions that people have had all these months, and then come to a conclusion.

Interviewer: But do you think that R.P. Singh’s statement discredits the CAG’s reports across the board, not just the 2G report?

External Affairs Minister: I do not want to use the word discredit at all. I am going to say it contradicts. Now, every time you have two positions, there is a thesis and there is an antithesis, then you have to find a synthesis. And when you contradiction on facts or you have contradiction on interpretations and on opinions, you have to choose. Frankly in our system when such a thing happens, with or without it happening, who is supposed to interpret and who is supposed to put a final stamp on it, accept or reject it? It is Parliament. So why do not we just allow Parliament to do this? If Parliament will not be permitted to decide an opinion of the CAG is to be accepted or not accepted, is to be treated as correct or not to be treated as correct, does it require modification, does it require moderation, if Parliament is not to be allowed to do this, then who else can do it?

Interviewer: But there has been this collision course between the Government and Vinod Rai the CAG for some time now. What do you think could have motivated Vinod Rai to put pressure on someone like R.P. Singh, as he alleges, to sign off on this report or to have this inflated figure of 1.76 lakh crore as the government claims.

External Affairs Minister: You cannot attribute anything or imagine anything that happens within an organization. You can only go by the product of that organization, what they finally produce. What are the internal mechanics and how the internal chemistry of how things happen and work, etc., really is not for people on the outside to assume or to ...

Interviewer: I am asking whether you feel that Vinod Rai has been politically motivated to do this because it has been suggested by people in the Congress.

External Affairs Minister: You can disagree, you can disagree with the CAG on what the CAG says, without attributing motives. The trouble we have now in our country is that if we disagree, we have to attribute motives. I believe that you can disagree without attributing motives. Just as I said ...

Interviewer: So, you are not attributing a political motive to him.

External Affairs Minister: No, I am not attributing any motive, forget about political motive. I think in this country we have to learn to disagree without questioning a person’s integrity and motive. This is true about the CAG just as much as it is true about us, or for that matter any other Constitutional authority. It is true about judges, it is true about investigative agencies, it is true about the police, it is true about Parliament. You can question and disagree, but to question and disagree should not automatically be seen as a politically motivated or a narrowly motivated attack on the person with whom you disagree. Equally, the person who takes a position that you disagree with should not immediately be painted with a brush of motive simply because you disagree with him. Is it not possible in a democracy to disagree? That is why we have an opposition in a democracy. You cannot say that every time you are in opposition you are dishonest and when you are in government you are honest, just as you cannot say simply because you were elected into government you must be honest. That is the kind of conversation in this country and discourse in this country that will destroy us and destroy our democracy if we do not learn to respect each other.

Interviewer: You are also facing a big political challenge on the FDI issue.
There is a sense we are getting today that the government may actually be ready for a vote and that everything will depend of course on how the resolution is finally worded. Is that a correct assessment?

External Affairs Minister: I know that my colleagues are working on it, I know that the Parliamentary Affairs Minister and the Commerce Minister have been working overtime to reach out to people, persuade them, take their genuine concerns on board, and certainly persuade them not to stand on their ego about concerns that are not as serious as could be.

Interviewer: But you are ready for a vote. External Affairs Minister: I do not know. I think this is something which you will see only when we get on to the floor of the House and give you our decision.

Interviewer: But not ruled out then.

External Affairs Minister: When you go into Parliament you do not rule out anything. But you go into Parliament hoping for the best outcome for yourself. What is the best outcome in the circumstances that prevail today is something that my colleagues are better informed upon. And I am not going to make their job more difficult by suggesting that the best option is or the best outcome is the one that I have thought of.

Interviewer: One final question, Mr. Khurshid, and this is on Rahul Gandhi. When he was appointed head of that election panel for the next election you said that now we know who our leader is, he is our commander. Is that a hint that he is also going to be the face of the party in the next General Election to lead the country?

External Affairs Minister: But he is the face of the party. In fact I do not even know why these questions are asked. He is the face of the party but he is not the only face. Mrs. Gandhi and the Prime Minister are also faces of the party.

Interviewer: I am asking whether he is going to be projected as Prime Minister. Is this one step towards that?

External Affairs Minister: The most important thing about what Mr. Rahul Gandhi will do is what Mr. Rahul Gandhi will do. It will be his decision and I can assure even now very clearly and categorically, this must be his decision. He is very clear in his mind how he wants to move forward. I think that it is important that we respect him for being very rational, very objective and very careful about step-by-step forward movement taking the party along.

Interviewer: But you have already declared him your commander. So, he is the leader.

External Affairs Minister: He is a commander. There can be not one, two, three, four commanders. There is also a commander-in-chief. I said he is a commander. And sometimes the field commander is more important for you and the commander-in-chief sitting somewhere else is not that important for you because you as a soldier are actually taking commands directly from your field commander. So, in that sense he is a commander. We are moving with him. The army will be listening to him, hearing him, taking commands from him, but he is part of the overall command which includes the Prime Minister and ...

Interviewer: So, you are not willing to say whether he is going to be commander-in-chief yet, too early to say.

External Affairs Minister: If I have said that he is commander, then when will he be commander-in-chief or would he like to be more than a commander or a special commander, we would like to hear from the commander himself. I think soldiers must not speak for the commander but speak when asked to speak by the commander.

Interviewer: Alright. Mr. Khurshid, it was a pleasure talking to you. Thank you very much for joining us.

External Affairs Minister: Thank you very much.

049. Remarks by Permanent Representative of India at the UN on the launch of the Aakash2 Tablet at United Nations.

H.E. Mr. Ban ki-moon,
Secretary General of the United Nations,
Excellencies and
Colleagues from Permanent Missions and Observer Missions, Dear Friends from the Media, and Most importantly, the architect of Aakash2, Mr. Suneet Singh Tuli, CEO of Datawind, who flew all the way from India to Canada and then here for this event.

On behalf of the Permanent Mission of India first let me extend to all of you a very warm welcome. We are gathered today for a special event that focuses on one of the principal goals of the UN, a better world for all.

Mr. Secretary General, you have kindly consented to unveil today an innovation that has the potential to fundamentally alter the development discourse. It allows millions of young people the opportunity to benefit from technology and move towards realizing the Millennium Development Goals for themselves. This innovation is unique, not just from the viewpoint of the technology, OR for being the world's most cost competitive tablet, as it is widely billed as,

BUT more importantly in actualizing the an idea of development innovation - and that's the reason why Government of India embarked upon the pursuit of this pioneering technology. With pricing determined through an open international tender, Aakash2 is the world's lowest cost tablet at end-user pricing. It harnesses top of the line technologies at costs, which the neediest can embrace. And believe me, the technologies and applications that have been put in it, are indeed the world's best.

It also bridges the digital divide within our societies. No doubt, Mr. Suneet Tuli has been recently voted amongst the world's top 15 education innovators by Forbes magazine. In India, the National Mission on Education through Information Communication Technology will equip 220 million students across the country with low cost tablets and internet access. The Government of India is subsidizing 50% of the cost of this device. With State governments and local institutions along with other development partners chipping, the devices would ultimately be, made available FREE to all students.

It may be pertinent to mention here Mr. Secretary General, that while outlining your 'generational imperatives and opportunities' in the beginning of this year, you had outlined that ‘harnessing the full power of partnerships across the range of UN activities’ was a key enabler.

It is our considered submission, that by partnering with key initiatives such as these, the UN development system would be able to ‘force multiply’ to achieve the MDGs of universal education and global partnership.

The development of Akash2 also reflects India’s continuing commitment to the principles of the United Nations Academic Impact, including those of educational opportunity for all and fostering global citizenship. It is just two years since you launched the Academic Impact, Mr Secretary-General, and we are delighted to commemorate its second anniversary with this innovative product.

The first Aakash2 was unveiled in India, on 11 November by the Hon’ble President of India. With devices such as Aakash2, Technology Enabled Learning, would be implemented to leverage the potential of ICT in providing high-quality, personalized, and interactive knowledge modules over the internet in a any-time, any-where mode, across all primary schools. Using Aakash2, teachers & students in the remotest corners of our country can join a classroom and benefit from lectures delivered by the best teachers.

Mr Secretary-General, in a knowledge economy, the wealth of a nation will not be measured in terms of its natural resources but in terms of its human capital. We need to promote research and innovation in national institutions and create an eco-system of excellence right from the elementary level upto the institutions of high-end research and innovation.

To us, Aakash2 is an epitome of such high end research, innovation and excellence. It is said that the taste of a pudding lies in its eating. Very soon this device would be unveiled and then you can yourself decide, whether this 20$ pudding, is worth its taste, for 220 million students who could have never ever afforded to see this pudding, lest alone taste it. ( 20 $ approx being the price at which GOI after 50% subsidy intends to give it to Indian students)

Aakash, to those here who dont understand Hindi - means SKY-something that many aspire to reach out for. It is our earnest hope that for students in India, and, indeed in time across the developing world, this device helps in getting them their ‘mouthful of the skies’.

Interview of External Affairs Minister Salman Khurshid to Bloomberg TV India.

December 6, 2012.

Interviewer: China's decision to include maps in its new passports that show its sovereignty of disputed territories in the South China Sea and regions in India appears to reflect a new assertiveness. Why do you think it has taken this move now, and has India formally protested the Chinese move and if so what was the response?

External Affairs Minister (Shri Salman Khurshid): These are things that we have encountered in our relationship over the years. Understandably, there is a difference of opinion. We have a Joint Working Group that is very steadily but slowly moving forward. I think over the years various propositions have come from both sides on how this matter can ultimately be resolved. But I think it is understood that there isn't a sense of urgency that it must be resolved right away. Knowing fully well that these are difficult issues, these are not issues that necessarily get resolve if you push them for a resolution in a very short space of time, I think you will need to let a lot of things evolve around these issues, which is what has happened in the developing relationship between China and India.

So, to take any specific thing in isolation and say, “Well, that means a very questionable, unacceptable act”, and give it disproportionate attention I think does not help on either side. And this is how we have learned on both sides to deal with each other. So, I think the caveat is that you cannot give an impression that it is something you do not accept, you cannot agree with, you will acquiesce in, and therefore, tomorrow be told you never raise any questions about this. But at the same time to get alarmed and begin to raise the ante I think is neither called for nor something that we do. Not just this, many issues arise from time to time. I think we are able to resolve them or able to bypass them so that the main thrust of our relationship with China continues to grow. It is an important relationship I think in this region and in the world. I think it is mutually beneficial for both sides to allow this relationship to grow and to become wholesome. China is in transition as far as its leadership is concerned. We have had good signals from the emerging new leadership, and we want to build on those signals rather than to detract or to dilute the positive impact of those signals. So, that is our position. There are issues that get resolved in due course. Nothing that today necessarily will stall what we believe is a truly beneficial relationship.

Interviewer: There seems to be an escalation in the last few months. I guess particularly in terms of confrontation between the Chinese and Philippines and the Vietnam in South China Sea and of course with Japan. It seems that there is a sense of growing pressure from China to actually get its way. ...

External Affairs Minister: That is one way of describing it but I think as the world evolves a lot of things are changing in the world. There is a growing demand for reform in the United Nations for instance of the Security Council. We are at the forefront of that demand for reform, and also claim to be beneficiaries of that possible reform. There are regional realignments taking place, there are regional adjustments taking place, regional assertions taking place. Many more barriers of the past are breaking down with greater communication levels, people moving to and fro a lot more.

At the same time the hotspots in the world that we know are worrisome for everyone. And some of them can be not too far away from India. But again even there we do believe that there are some positive signals of movement in the right direction, and some imponderables that obviously all stakeholders have to come together and find solutions to. And I think that is the attitude that people have taken towards some issues that concern, many immediate stakeholders but also a larger section of world community about navigation, freedom of navigation and the law of the sea. I think in that context no communications have broken down. That is the important thing. Communications have not broken down. There are of course positions that China has taken that others have not necessarily agreed with. China has also suggested a way in which it could be resolved bilaterally. Others think it may be better to resolve it multilaterally, etc. But I think let us wait and see how things move forward.

Interviewer: Are you able to give any details about how US Government have responded to the Chinese move? There are some reports that India is now stamping its own map on Chinese visas. Is that true?

External Affairs Minister: Whatever China does, I would not put it as necessarily something that is endorsed directly from the top. There are different levels that decisions can be taken that may not be necessarily against the Chinese interest but may at the same time not necessarily have been a well thought out strategic dipstick about getting a sense of how people would react. I think that is probably true about India as well that not everything goes right to the top. Important issues will go right to the top. If they are pronounced policy issues, then they would be considered right at the top and in the manner and through the methodology that we adopt.

But so long as you are broadly consistent with the ideological positions or stated principles of your governance, I think strategically or tactically doing something at a particular time would necessarily be endorsed all the way to the top, I do not think, is the way governments work. But at the end of the day, yes some decisions would be taken and those decisions may need to go right to the top. Whether you are reviewing something that has happened, you are diluting it, delaying it, beginning to negotiate on it, beginning to communicate on it, that may go to the top. So, I do not think we should rush into any judgment on this.

As far as the US is concerned, they have their own evolving policies. Over the years they have come up with different perceptions and different manner of engagement with China. We study it and we take it on board and see where it can be integrated with positions that we take. But we like to have an independent position with every country including with China. It may or may not necessarily at any given time match perceptions of any other country. We do believe that we have a great deal of substance of a direct relationship with China and we would like to keep it that way.

Interviewer: Japan is one country that sort of felt the impact of following China over these issues with its exports to China of his cars and electronics having fallen pretty sharply because of Chinese unwillingness to buy them. Is there a sense that India feels that China is using its economic muscle in its foreign policy and that is something that India is concerned about because they cannot match it?

External Affairs Minister: Do not we all use our economic muscle? What is economic muscle for if not to be used to greater advantage of your people so long as it is not illegitimate, so long it does not violate principles of international law? And so long as, in terms of a general perception of the comity of nations, it is reasonable and enlightened self interest, I think nobody can necessarily complain about it. Therefore, we cannot ask any country to set its economic muscle or its economic persuasive powers apart.

But if you are in the same market place and you are competing for space, then of course there will be an actual competition. India encourages competition. We have very profound competition policy. We have a Competition Commission. We encourage competition. We believe competition is good for human kind. Therefore, we will not make exceptions for competition. We will have to prepare ourselves if there is competition. We will perhaps better if there is competition. But competition obviously must be fair competition. That is what we urge in all multilateral fora and what is in fact WTO about. China is a member of WTO. We encouraged that decision to be taken because China should not have remained in isolation when the world countries were putting together a regime that is to be for the benefit of everyone. Therefore, if there is something to be discussed and something to be worked on, there are these international fora available. Interviewer: You mentioned earlier in response to the first question that you have had some good signals from the new leadership. Are you able to give us some detail on that? There is a sense I guess that two large countries, growing economies, have certain inevitable antagonism that would develop between the two countries and managing that is obviously your job. But you are saying that you received some signals from the new leadership.

External Affairs Minister: What happens is when there are changes taking place in a country you reach out to them and they reach out to you. You signal to your neighbours, you signal to your partners and signal to the rest of the world that you intend to go in a particular direction. And that is done through bilaterals, messages that are conveyed at the highest level through bilaterals, also important events within your own country where policy pronouncements are made, where statements are made which are supposed to cross borders and go to the rest of the world. Now of course we are living in a communication village. So, anything that you say anywhere is communicated immediately. I think the meetings that took place in the East Asia Summit and ASEAN, I think those are meetings at which very clear signals of positive role ahead for India and China were given.

Interviewer: ... (Inaudible)...

External Affairs Minister: I do not have information about specifics. But you talk of chemistry and you speak of basic signals. And I think the sense of those basic signals and the chemistry have been good.

Interviewer: Moving on to a separate issue which is the nuclear liability law here, we know that is a concern to a lot of American companies particularly who are looking to invest here. I think you have had discussions earlier this month with visiting State Department officials on this. Is there anything that the Americans can look forward to?

External Affairs Minister: As you know, we are completely committed. This was a landmark decision taken by the US Government and we believe a landmark success of the two Governments being able to come together on something that previous generations would ever imagine could be possible. Now, as far as we are concerned, the legislation is in place. We have put the structures in place. We have also made efforts to ensure that the nuclear industry in the US has comfort on the basis of what we have done. And we have had exchanges that we have tried to communicate. There are some related issues on which US and India have to work together and we are working together. I think that when you take a landmark decision of this nature, there are a lot of follow-up steps that you need to take. One of the follow-up steps that we need to take is to ensure that we carry conviction with US industry. I think we have done a fair amount of work there. If there are any more caveats or questions that remain, we will address them as we go along.

Interviewer: Could you put a date on when you think you would see the first American company?

External Affairs Minister: I am sure I could but not off hand. It is obviously a big step, the first investment that will come will be a very big step. And, therefore, I would not venture to suggest a date. But I hope that it happens soon. Every Government looks at milestones and accomplishments that you can show within the period, the tenure that you are given to perform. Obviously as we look ahead at 2014, that will be the end of our tenure, we would want to be able to say, “Look substantial progress has been made as we had hoped would be made”, and report back to the country that this is a success story.

Interviewer: But could that involve a watering down of the liability law or would it mean something like a waiver for US companies which are ...(Inaudible)...

External Affairs Minister: I am not sure that on that there is any major issue. What is important is, what should be understood is, what we have intended to do. But sometimes people interpret restrictively and sometimes people interpret in a liberal manner. And that is the reason why we have engaged technocrats and lawyers from the US firms. We have had direct communication with them and we have explained through our experts. We have explained that there is no cause for concern. But this is an ongoing dialogue. As and when something further needs to be done, of course it will be addressed. But I think that there is no reason to doubt or worry about engagement. I think we have got a very beneficial and a very attractive structure in place. I would urge industries from the US to make use of it. After all the purpose of doing all this was that we would be able to take the benefit of what US industry has to offer, and the US industry would be able to expand to areas in which they have not operated.

Interviewer: Vladimir Putin is coming to Delhi next month. Is there a commitment from India to sign the extra two reactors at Kudankulam? External Affairs Minister: Let us see. These are all matters that is part of the process. Whenever there is a big visit like this, you try to meet the deadlines on that big visit for the wish list that both countries have. Sometimes it is possible, sometimes it is not possible. But the people concerned would certainly work towards the wish list that both countries have.

Interviewer: On a separate energy issue which is Iran, I think the sanctions waiver that India got from the US expires at the end of this year, actually in January. Is there work being done on an extension to that? Have you got signals from the US that that will be extended?
External Affairs Minister: I think that the signals that we had, and I believe signals that others have had were largely that the US would take up these issues seriously once the elections were over. And I can understand that they are preoccupied putting in new Administration in place, new Secretary of State and so on. Therefore to expect a very quick and an advanced signal at this point of time would perhaps be unfair. But of course we are conscious of time running out. But we also have reasonable confidence that whatever US may be looking for is perhaps available in terms of how things have evolved. Our main of course concern is full compliance and commitment to the sanctions that have been imposed by the United Nations. I think India cannot be faltered in the remotest extent as far as that is concerned. Whether we measure up to the United States’ law and the principles that they apply for waivers etc., will have to be seen in terms of the facts as they have emerged. For instance, if there is a measure of your purchases of fuel from Iran going up or going down, I would think that they would be very clearly indicated as having gone down substantially. And that is despite the fact that India’s energy bills are going up, India’s demand for energy is going up, and our total import of energy is going up. So, I think that will be for the US to examine. But objectively I think that there should be no reason for them not to be able to move forward.

Interviewer: One last question about the Maldives. I know you have been asked this question several times. What are the options you have for arbitration?

External Affairs Minister: Let us very clearly distinguish the legal and commercial decisions they claim they have taken. And that is a legal commercial decision that will have to be countered by the commercial entity, GMR as far as India is concerned because of course there is a joint venture with Malaysia. They will have to handle it legally. It is already in arbitral tribunal in Singapore. I believe they have some orders from court that are still valid, and they will have to see what the implications are for the steps that have been taken by the Maldivian Government. In principle we support them. Our moral support is with them on this because they are an Indian entity largely. And we are proud of India’s investment, the biggest FDI investment in Maldives. I think as a message for investment in friendly countries, we would want that message not to be diluted or reversed by this action.

The other aspect of this is political. We do not want this matter to become a political issue between India and Maldives and to reflect upon what we believe is a very wholesome relationship and a relationship that we cherish and value. We have indicated this to the Government. They have repeatedly said that this should not be confused with any hostility on a bilateral plane. We take that at face value but we would want adequate substantiation of implications for our citizens who are there engaged in this project as well as elsewhere. Their safety and security is important. That this not be allowed to spill over and to spin into other dimensions of our relationship, is important. I think the Maldivian Government would certainly know what needs to be done and what needs to be done and what needs to be prevented. We have certainly had the right kind of assurances given to us, but frankly we would want to wait and see whether those assurances are substantiated. We have a duty, as any country would have, towards our citizens. We certainly have an expectation and hope that internal politics, or whatever be the pressures of internal politics, will not allow Maldives to put a question mark on relationship that, as I said, we cherish and value.

Interviewer: Going back to Iran, other countries in Asia like Japan and Korea are actually increasing their purchases of Iranian oil after the sanctions came in. ... (Inaudible)...

External Affairs Minister: I have not looked at what other countries are doing and how they will manage. We do know that we have an arrangement that allows us a certain amount of flexibility. That arrangement is under stress because Iran needs to import more permissible things from us. We hope that they would be able to buy some wheat from us, etc., because the arrangement that we have will not work unless that is a two way traffic of trade. But that is as far as we are concerned. What the others will do and what arrangement others will have, the impact of American sanctions as far as their banking arrangements are concerned and so on, is something for them to consider.

Interviewer: Thank you very much.

External Affairs Minister: Thank you.

051. External Affairs Minister’s interview to Sky TV.

December 7, 2012.

Interviewer (Mr. Alex Ross, Sky TV): Minister, I know that you met our Foreign Secretary William Hague not so many weeks ago and you discussed the issue of British aid to India. Now that is obviously being scaled down. Are you concerned about that? What is your reaction to that?

External Affairs Minister (Shri Salman Khurshid): Not at all. I think that this is a natural process of growing up, the Indian economy getting stronger, our profile worldwide beginning to change. I think we have moved, as I said to him, and he of course agreed, from the era of aid to the era of trade. So, we have to really concentrate now on economic relations. That is not to say, as some people were sort of concerned, we do not need to reach out to certain segments of our society that require assistance. But those are things that can be done through development programmes that we can cooperate. But the traditional concept of aid I think deserves to be eased out, faded out. Therefore, there is no issue there at all.

Interviewer: Was it right that Britain was giving aid for so long - I am thinking really over the last ten years ago I know that the former Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee described the aid as a peanuts, and India in many ways a very wealthy country - was it right that Britain was giving aid for so long, obviously a bit too long?

External Affairs Minister: That is frankly for Britain to consider ...

Interviewer: What do you think?

External Affairs Minister: Going by some reactions that we heard and saw at this time, I think perhaps it was right that it was sort of allowed to linger on for a while because people do not understand new things that happen. People do not take to them very quickly. There are a lot of questions being asked - is this a message to India that we are not happy or pleased, is it a drift away from India, etc. I think people have to get accustomed to changing profiles and changing relationships. In that sense, perhaps it was not wrong to let it linger on for a while. But as I said, in this evolving nature of economic relations in the world now and how our relations have matured, I think the need for aid is not as important and significant as looking at areas of economic cooperation.

Interviewer: You mentioned trade, not aid. Obviously there are very close links historically between the United Kingdom and India. How do you see the relationship changing?

External Affairs Minister: I think we both have to work on it. I think there is a natural advantage that our relationship has - language, institutions, history.

Obviously on both sides we have looked at new relationships and we need to.
European Union for instance is a very important factor now for the UK. As far as we are concerned, our Look East Policy, our engagement with Africa; and in a sense our traditional reliance on markets in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union obviously has disappeared. So, Rupee trade is gone. So, you have to look at a lot of new things. A lot of young Indians are looking at the United States of America for instance. A lot of Indian students are now going to American universities. During my visit to Oxford recently as indeed my conversation with the Foreign Secretary, I thought that it was important that we revive the strength of our relationship, the traditional strength of our relationship by adjusting and accommodating the change that has taken place in the world. There are issues about visas, there are issues about greater collaboration through private industry, and there are issues about work permits.
On both sides, it is not just one way. Perhaps the pressure is much greater on the UK. I think these are things that we can work out satisfactorily. I think the fundamentals of our relationships are very strong. What we need to do is the new generations have to discover that we have strong fundamentals and that they should take advantage of them.
Interviewer: Do you see Britain - you mentioned lots of other places, United States you mentioned Africa as well – just as another country, or do you see it as one that India has, because of the historical ties, a special relationship with? I am kind of framing the question in the context of the disappointment that there was in Britain suddenly in the political and military establishment when India awarded its defence contracts to French fighter jets rather than Euro fighter which obviously has a big interest in terms of its manufacture?
External Affairs Minister: I think that is sort of overstating the case. Yes, we have a very strong link with Britain. Of course, remember that the Harrier jets are from the UK and our Navy is heavily dependent on Harrier jets. So, I think that these are things that will come and we have to take them in our stride. We do have a relationship with the Europe, and that is not at the cost of our relationship with the US or North America and certainly not at the cost of our traditional relationship with the UK. But there is a relationship with other countries, bilateral as well as through your Union. And I think you just need to find the right balance. It is a question really of how much effort both sides will make because they believe that their relationship has a particular value that needs to be enhanced and needs to be reiterated.
Interviewer: So, what would be the message to British politicians coming to India? We just have Boris Johnson here and David Cameron, the Prime Minister, is planning to come next year. The message to them is, do not come with just expectation, you need to come and work.


External Affairs Minister: Let us work together. You understand the game of cricket. If you do not make runs in the first innings, there is always the second innings to follow.

Interviewer: Moving on to the relationship India has with Pakistan, how do you see that moving on in light of the Mumbai terror attacks? The surviving attacker has been hanged. Do you see that as still a very major problem to getting things on to a more stable footing?

External Affairs Minister: I think there are two dimensions of this relationship. I think that that is something which is obvious to both sides. One is that we have both agreed that issues that impede the growth of our friendly relations must not hold our friendly relations hostage, that we must continue and find ways in which we continue to work together on a host of avenues, confidence-building measures as we call them, and resolve those issues which we can resolve and which ought to be resolved. There are issues that are difficult and have traditionally been very difficult issues. We agree that we would bypass those issues. Amongst those very difficult issues is what happened in Mumbai. That is not something that you can bypass. That is something on which we are accountable to our people, responsible to our people. And we believe also it is important that you draw a line and say, this must not happen again. That will be possible if there is accountability. We have tried to impose accountability on our side when we had in our control people who were involved in that attack. And we expect the same thing to happen on the Pakistani side. I think something is happening but not enough and not quick enough. I think that is the message that we have gently and sometimes firmly conveyed to them, but again not making it conditional upon looking forward. We will look forward but how far and how quickly will obviously depend on the delivery that we have been promised or certainly delivery that has been indicated will come.

Interviewer: Are you talking about the delivery of certain individuals, the alleged masterminds behind the attack, people like the founder of Lashkar-e-Tayyiba, Hafiz Saeed?

External Affairs Minister: Yes, some of that, some of everything that is available with them so that we can complete ...

Interviewer: Those people are still free, and they are still holding political rallies, and they are still arguably inciting Pakistani nationalism at the very least.

External Affairs Minister: That is a worry. That is a concern. We cannot be seen as sort of callous about this issue or unconcerned and carry on with business as usual. I think both sides need to factor this in. We are still looking forward; we are still willing to explore possibilities of our friendship and our economic relations growing. But this does remain a little thorn in the side; and I think we need to take this thorn out.

Interviewer: Very briefly, can it move on without Hafiz Saeed being handed over?

External Affairs Minister: As I said, we do not speak the language of conditions but I think it is obvious that some level of accountability to reassure us is necessary, is important. And there is no point our moving forward as a Government, if we cannot carry conviction with our people. I think it is important that the people get convinced that we have not shut our eyes to that very harsh reality, and that our efforts have borne fruit, and that we are actually moving forward not only in mending our relations but also in ensuring that accountability.

Interviewer: One of your Ministers said over the last few weeks in the Indian Parliament that there were about 14 militant training camps along the border with India, which is obviously on the Pakistani side on the eastern front, and they are training militants to potentially carry out terrorist attacks in India. Firstly, that is presumably very worrying. But what are you doing about it?

External Affairs Minister: This is something that is going on for a long time. And there was a time when people would not even accept our assertion that there was such a thing happening across.

Interviewer: So, it is happening.

External Affairs Minister: I am not in a position to confirm the numbers but let me just say this to you that evidence has been submitted in the trial that has taken place of the perpetrators of Mumbai violence - and we know this through the media, and it would have got into the media not without the Pakistani authorities wanting it to get to the media - where admissions have been made that there are such training camps on the Pakistani side. Now, this is obviously a little better than the past. At least there are admissions coming forward. And I hope that if there is an admission of this reality, then there would be the next step of addressing this reality. Of course there are a lot of unanswered questions on the Pakistani side, not just for us but for the Americans who would have known that Osama Bin Laden would be in Pakistan and that is where he was found. There is no doubt about it, for instance. So, I think that we do know a lot of these are imponderables, these are difficult questions, we have not had satisfaction on them for a very long time, but there is movement forward. And that makes it hopeful that if there is movement forward and if we are moving in multiple directions but moving forward in all directions, we will finally get something that could be a certain level of satisfaction to us.

Interviewer: It sounds as though you are accusing the Pakistani state or at least some aspects of it of facilitating those camps or facilitating terrorists.
External Affairs Minister: We have not said that. We have heard them say that non-state actors are inflicting pain upon Pakistani society as well and this is true. We know of the bombings, we have seen what terrible tragedies have been caused by bombings in different parts of Pakistan, assassination attempts and how important leaders have been assassinated. So, obviously it is not something that is being done by the Pakistan Government to itself. They have problems. They have some very deep-seated issues within their society which is obviously lending itself to this kind of violence, and we sympathise with them. But there is not very much we can do. We cannot offer help to Pakistan to sort out their problems. So, they have to handle their own problems. But they have our understanding. We are willing to help and to understand what is happening there, but within the limits of our own tolerance and our own responsibility.

Interviewer: How big a role do you think the Pakistani security services are playing in the sterilization of those terrorist camps?

External Affairs Minister: It is a very complex governance structure. Obviously because they have moved from civilian to army rule, from army rule to civilian rule, I think to actually know the power structure within Pakistan is not easy. Of course there are experts who keep us posted about shifts of power, etc., that take place over a period. But I think it is very difficult to pinpoint exactly what happens when there is a power struggle within Pakistan between the judiciary and the executive, between the executive and Parliament, between Parliament and the army, etc. We have noted statements made periodically by their own leadership about undue interference of a particular part of government of the state in a manner which is unacceptable. So, we note those things. But frankly, to actually apportion blame, or apportion responsibility, or pinpoint who exactly is friendly and who is not, is difficult. But yes, obviously there is a peace constituency in Pakistan, and there are people who are hawks who think that there is some future in violence and some future in disagreement with India. We have been persuading them that the future lies in our being together, being friendly, cooperative. And certainly as far as India is concerned, it is in the best interest of India that Pakistan has a stable and a democratic government, that Pakistan is able to overcome violence within its own borders, and that the Pakistan will not in any way facilitate violence coming from within its borders to India.

Interviewer: You must be watching lots of countries in this region, what happens in Afghanistan with the drawdown of NATO forces gathering pace. What role do you see India play after 2014?

External Affairs Minister: It depends on what Afghanistan actually wants. I think that we have a very good relationship with President Karzai. He has been to India several times. He was in India recently. He has been talking about emerging roadmap beyond 2014. But I think the road signals are still not very clear or have not yet been mounted. What the milestones will be, I think is becoming apparent. There we are willing to help. We are willing to help with their election process. They have sought experts from us at an appropriate stage. We have promised that we will do so. We have been helping them with various issues in terms of capacity building for their own people, for their own security forces, capacity building, management, management techniques, looking at development issues in a major way. We have just cleared grants for putting up small projects in all the Districts of Afghanistan. Our commitment on the Salma Dam is there for you to see, or various other projects including the building of their legislative assembly. We are fully committed to do as much development cooperation as they seek. We have just had the Mines Minister of Afghanistan come to India yesterday. They are looking at collaboration on a corridor beyond Bamiyan and for excavation as well as evacuation of mineral wealth in that area. We will look at all possibilities. But I think the roadmap beyond 2014 must emerge before we can make a commitment to what we can do on that roadmap.

Interviewer: One last question very quickly. India’s policy on Iran has come under great deal of criticism in the West.

External Affairs Minister: Really! I would have thought that they would have patted us on the back for having played a balancing role given that, our understanding is, that there can be movement between the US and Iran on the issue which has been an intractable problem between them, given that there are signals that this might be possible and that they were waiting for the American Presidential election to be over - I am not saying it is going to be easy way out, but there are some hopeful signals that we see - and that for us to have been able to keep that balance between the expectations of the international community and our friendship with Iran at some cost to us - it was not that we did not have to sacrifice - I think it is something that we should be patted on the back for.

Interviewer: Does India care if Iran gets a nuclear bomb?

External Affairs Minister: I think it is very clear that our position on the nuclear bomb and Iran’s nuclear programme is in consonance with the rest of the world. And we stood by our commitment to the rest of the world. But at the same time for peaceful exploration, for peaceful experimentation, and nuclear energy for peaceful purposes is something that the world is not going to deny Iran. And I think it is only now a matter of ensuring that Iran continues to have the freedom to work for peaceful purposes. But the concerns about the world community that they should not be producing enriched uranium for purposes which will lead to weaponising their nuclear energy is something on which we have been very clear. We are a nuclear power ourselves. Historically, those who are nuclear powers in the world do understand that nuclear power is not a good thing. At least in terms of weapons, it is not a good thing. We all realize that. And it was Mr. Rajiv Gandhi who said, can we do something so that the world can rid itself of nuclear weapons? But the world did not hear him on this. We still hope that one day the world will and that we will get rid of nuclear weapons in the world. But while there are weapons, they should remain restricted to those who have them, and that there should not be proliferation of weapons is something that we have been very clear on.

Interviewer: Thank you very much, Minister, for your time.

External Affairs Minister: Thank you.
Good morning to you all.

It has been a full week and I expect that there will be a full week now. I must apologize right at the beginning to my distinguished colleagues here on the dais Prof. Mattoo, Dr. Yashpal Malhotraji, Special Secretary Pinak Chakravartyji, Nandita Behera and all the very distinguished colleagues that are present here this morning. The President of Ukraine will be received at Rashtrapati Bhavan at 10 o’clock and that is why I will make quite a brief appearance, and I hope a sensitive one, before I go on to do my duties.

I do believe that the very fact that you are here early morning is both symbolic and indeed a substantive measure of declaration and a dawning not only of the Asian century but indeed it is the dawning of the scholarship, special commitment of scholarship to international relations in our country that is taking place afresh. The thing about a dawn is that it comes every day. And for one to think you have a dawn today means that you have been in darkness all your life will not be correct. What you need to do with everyday and every generation and every epoch to dawn afresh with ideas, with light that you spread to the world and give to others, the heat and light that you generate is ultimately of use to someone else, not necessarily to yourself. But nevertheless you establish your case in the scheme of things in the universe, and that is what is essentially I believe is the purpose of scholarship in international relations.

I think that has been done remarkably well in recent times by the very fact that you had in this such a short period such a remarkable perspective given to you by Prof. Mattoo I think gives ourselves a very good beginning. It is true that I am said to be familiar with the working of the External Affairs Ministry having been here in the stewardship of giants from my party - people like Mr. Dinesh Singh and then of course I briefly worked with the present President of India when he was Foreign Minister. But in a decade and a half since I was last in Foreign Affairs things have changed so dramatically and not only is the geopolitics different, the geography itself is very different from those times. Multilateralism has taken over for us vigorously and then suddenly as we suggested multilateralism is beginning to find its own crisis points and question marks that are emerging on multilateralism.

Experiments of regional cooperation are now facing exceptional challenges.
You look at Europe for instance. The ambition of Europe in trying to unite itself first politically and then economically and then finally financially has led them now to a major, major crisis. And one begins to think is it good and better to break into smaller segments and smaller participants, or is it better to be cohesive and convergent to a larger whole. I think in a sense I have always thought that Europe has represented a mirror image of India, India that did what Europe is trying to do today but did that in 1915, 1947 and 1950. Yet today there are forces trying to pull India apart in a legitimate way when States and elected State Governments demand greater federal freedom as indeed you see the opposite happen in Europe where there is demand for greater cohesion of policies including budget making, monetary policies. Be that as it may, each society and each civilization must find its own solutions.

The important thing today for us is that we cannot but disagree that this century is to be the Asian century. When we said that in the previous century that the 21st century will be the Asian century, that was said with hope, aspiration, determination and confidence. But as we have moved into the 21st century, we have to ask ourselves is that really going to be true. Will we be the Asian century and in being the Asian century will India have its significant participation and deep determination of the path that we take in the 21st century. And I do believe that there are questions, there are questions that have to be answered. And in answering those questions we will conceive the idea of India in the 21st century.

Since we have the involvement of Public Diplomacy in this programme, I must add that I think it is the most important part of my idea of what the Foreign Affairs Ministry should be doing. There are traditional responsibilities of the Ministry of External Affairs, which is the outreach to the world, which is to conceive a world and to work towards a world that adds to India’s profile and adds to India’s comfort, and adds to opportunity for India’s teeming millions. But significantly what we do in this Ministry across the globe must indeed be understood first of all by our own people.

Quite often when people ask me as to what I think of India’s emergence once again at the high table of the world at G20 and demands across the globe of bringing on board for any important significant movement that is taking place either in the field of environment or in the field of economics or in the field of communications, in the field of security, India plays a significant role and must play a significant role. But I ask myself very silently, do we in India know this? Are we as a people in India prepared for the role the world wants to give to India, the aspirations the world has for us, the expectations the world has for us, are those understood in our own country?

I think of the play that I saw back many years ago in England which can be made into a wonderful film as well - “No Sex Please, We’re British”. We have equivalent of that in India - “No foreign affairs please, we are Indians.” We want to be so entrenched and so involved in domestic conflict resolution and domestic conflict creation that we have no time for international relations and the role that we can play in international relations. And we have had very important things that we have done in the world - in Africa, in West Asia, in Central Asia, in Europe, the eastern part of Europe, and indeed with the Southeast Asia. Why is it that? Is it left to the ruling elite, the people involve only at the higher levels? And are they higher echelons of governance who are concerned about our role in the world and not beyond some patriotic songs in the rest of the country? Therefore, I believe public diplomacy and indeed important events such as these conventions like yours are significant and important.

But if I was to be making a speech of an overt political kind, we would have had 15 cameras here, 15 television channels tracking what I was to say. But because something sensible is going to be done here there are two channels, which is very sad. Tell me of television programmes including programmes that say “The Nation Wants to Know”, whether the nation has ever wanted to know what India is doing in the world. I think this is something to reflect upon very seriously and a great challenge.

I think for public diplomacy that we need to excite the juices of an average Indian and tell the average Indian that there was for a time when his predecessors and ancestors or her predecessors and ancestors had played a role which was far more significant. And all you need to do is to see the pictures and film from the time when Pandit J awaharlal Nehru and visiting dignitaries to this country were received by average ordinary Indians by the aam admi of that time. So, the aam admi of 30 years ago and 40 years ago was far more interested in our international relations (IR) than the aam admi is today. So, that is something to do on the domestic end.

Indeed internationally I think that in many ways what we have been saying to the world at a time when the world would not listen to us on those issues. The world listened to us on a host of issues but did not listen to us on many issues. The world did not listen to us on terrorism. The world did not listen to us about how vicious and pernicious violence can be. And for years we kept screaming to the world, look this is not something that will destroy India’s peace and comfort, this is something that will spill over into the rest of the world. And that is what we see today. When it became a monster, the world woke up to it. And now the monster will not go back. The genie will not go back into the bottle, and indeed the genie cannot easily be destroyed. Yet, this is not for us to dwell upon and say to the people that see we were right and you were wrong. It is time for us to continue the same cooperative spirit in which we dealt with the world in the past. But the world is changing. Therefore, you expect different attitudes and different responses from us. And yet we are constrained by a strong, rooted, principled approach to international relations.

It is true that international relations are ultimately about your own welfare and it is about your own interest. But that same interest can be an enlightened self interest or it can be a narrow self interest. And I do believe that in spite of the changing balance between principles and pragmatism, India’s approach of enlightened self interest survives. And not only does it survive, but I believe that what will emerge in your deliberations undoubtedly will be a reaffirmation of an enlightened self interest for India, something that was given to us, articulated for us for the first time by our first Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru who in fact very categorically said that if these principles were organized in the mutual relations of all countries, then indeed there will hardly be any conflict and certainly no war.

Now of course today when we talk of no war, we speak of no war in conventional terms and also because the cost of war today has become forbidden for humanity. But we do know there are proxy wars; we do know there are conflicts that are not described as wars, and we do know that there is an immense questioning of the dominance of principles in terms of what pragmatic belief people can get away with quickly. And this is something that we will have to face as a challenge. I think that if we just look at the Asia that pans itself out in front of us today, the most critical conceptual idea for Asia I believe is in the Indian Ocean Rim area. This is the only emerging regional organization and growing regional organization that is linked with water. Every other regional organization is largely linked with land mass. This is the only regional organization that is linked with the seas. And in that sense, it is special because it is different. But it is also in a sense that gives India a point of a pivot which we have. We have Australia on our right, Southeast Asia, ASEAN countries and Australia again giving us a lead to the Pacific. We have the vast Indian Ocean that buttresses the pivot. If we get to the left, we have mineral rich countries of the GCC and also West Asia. And then above us we get China and Central Asia.

In a sense, if you look at the globe, this becomes a very critical centre and it is based on water. But it also has enormous historical linkages, it has historical pedigree of trade, how trade enhanced in the world and how trade grew in the world. It has interesting security issues. It has great potential for things that I want to happen in the future with Southeast Asia and with West Asia. And indeed it is a desperate place to reach for many countries that are a little bit further away than India. China for instance would give a right arm to be in the Indian Ocean as comfortably as India is placed in the Indian Ocean. Of course, China has advantages elsewhere and India has advantages in the Indian Ocean. But I do believe that this is an important critical factor for what we will see as the emerging Asian century.

And from here, the pivot that India provides to this concept is also the stepping stone for Southeast Asia to go to Central Asia, for Australia to get to Central Asia, for Central Asia energy lines to come down to India and from India possibly go beyond the Ocean. As we look at Southeast Asia, I think the fusion of Look East Policy given to us when I was last in government, and then very very admirably emphasized by Prime Minister I.K. Gujral who we sadly lost in the recent days, I think that again is something that you will see emerge. And a reaffirmation of that will take place in another ten days when the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit takes place in India to emphasize the twenty years of our relationship and association with the ASEAN countries.

Within this larger Asian reality, our own region, the SAARC region, including all the way up to Afghanistan and then a little bit beyond Afghanistan into Iraq, closer home Pakistan, Bangladesh, Maldives and Bhutan, all these are emerging realities that we have to reflect upon. We have to reflect upon because India cannot take standalone and standstill policy of all countries around us. Things will change. China is aggressive. China is a partner for us. China is a neighbor for us. China is a dialogue partner as we move forward to find a resolution for issues that in the past have made us ... (Inaudible)... path. And I do believe that we have come a long, long way in repairing a relationship and converting that relationship into a meaningful partnership.

But there is still a lot more to do. And in doing that, we will have to accept the new reality of China’s presence in many areas that we consider an exclusive playground for India and its friends. The games, the rules of the games will change. China will come in and add to the richness of the participation, but will also then provide greater competition. There are strengths as far as economic and political issues are concerned, the strengths that China has vis-à-vis India, and there are strengths that India has vis-à-vis China. A combination of these strengths is what is called for.

And I believe the real creativity in India’s foreign policy will come in being able to combine the strengths of China with the strengths of India without necessarily targeting the aspirations of anybody else in the world but to be able to provide a link between our strengths and provide greater cooperation and collaboration between these two great countries of Asia, to make that assertion come true that Asia’s role in the 21st century will be a remarkable role and that indeed the 21st century will be the Asian century.

As I say this, I am conscious of the fact that the things that we need to do for Asia, for our partners in Asia will be to look at how we can enhance cultural cooperation, how we can enhance capacity building for each other, how we can enhance more effective economic collaboration and cooperation, and indeed how we can work together to share the benefits of our collaboration and cooperation.

I believe this is going to be a very interesting conference. I wish I could spend more time with you, listen to you and be ...(Inaudible).... But unfortunately that will not be possible. I will hope that I will get a chance to read what you have produced and indeed to get a record of your deliberations here. My warmest congratulations in advance for success and my best wishes! I do hope that we see much more of this, and I do hope that the Indian media will gradually get attracted. And if they do not get attracted, create a little crisis ...(Inaudible)...

Thank you very much, ladies and gentlemen.

I am honoured to address the Second National Conference on International Relations, and have a second opportunity to interact with specialists in the field.

The first time was an occasion to reflect on one of MEA's pioneering Public Diplomacy ventures - by which we gathered specialists on International Relations from around the country in Delhi. This time around I will speak on our mutually reinforcing roles in the evolution of foreign policy of India.

Though the subject of International Relations as we understand it today is a relatively new discipline, its philosophical underpinnings and applications, are as old as state craft itself. From Kautilya's Arthasashtra - and the writings of ancient Greeks - down to the era of scholars who wrote on the emerging State systems, we have works which reflect the importance attached to the function of the State in relation to the international political environment.

The importance of study of International Relations cannot be over emphasised. The challenge for the subject, however, is to keep pace with the rapidity of change in the globalized, technology driven world of today, in which non-state actors have assumed in some domains as central a role as perhaps states themselves. And more seriously - we need to address the question of the different role of policy formulation and policy implementation. In the former there is place as Kissinger said both for the inspiration provided by political thinkers and leaders and for the bureaucracy which translates ideas into practical implementation frameworks. This divide remains today and affects us whether foreign policy is seen as the realm of the political and economic or whether you deal with new global challenges such as terrorism and radicalisation, piracy, food and energy securities, climate change, pandemics, cyber security. I would suggest the impact of these forces on inter state relations are an increasingly important area of study.

- This introduction allows me to make some further suggestions on areas of our common concern. Challenges also emanate from the fluidity of the global situation. Global macro economic imbalances, financial and sovereign debt crises, the place of the US in the post unipolar world, the rise of China and other emerging economies, the shift of power to the East and the "Arab Spring", have all had a profound impact on the geopolitical situation, and pose a challenge to us in assessing which way are we headed and what the future will look like.
Let me delve into some specific challenges which have a bearing on us and which I believe we will need to look at together.

The situation in Afghanistan post NATO/ISAF drawdown is of concern. India has been contributing to Afghanistan's nation building process. We are also engaged with Pakistan to evolve normal state-to-state relations. There have been some modest successes in our efforts with Pakistan in the form of moves towards trade normalisation and an easier visa regime. However, relations can only grow in an atmosphere free of terror and violence. The elimination of terror infrastructure in Afghanistan-Pakistan, therefore, is important for the region and the world at large. The challenge posed by the transition process in Afghanistan to security and stability in South Asia, remains a serious preoccupation. Continued support of the international community for Afghanistan remains vital. Furthermore the integration of Afghanistan into a South Asian cooperative framework would unlock new possibilities - both for SAARC and for cooperation between South and Central Asia. Attaining these goals will require a different approach from Pakistan.

With China, India has consciously practised a policy of engagement that has seen the relationship evolve. Although there is the unresolved boundary question, which needs to be settled on mutually acceptable terms, India has not held the rest of the relationship hostage to this complex issue. India and China have collaborated usefully on a variety of multilateral issues. With China's growing comprehensive national strength, there is need for dialogue on architecture of cooperation in Asia. There is a perception of greater assertiveness on the part of China. Concerns over developments in the South and East China Seas have been extensively covered in writings. Considerable scholarship exists on China's rise, including in India. The subject nevertheless will attract scholars as China-US engagement evolves.

Later in December this year we will celebrate two decades of our engagement with ASEAN with a Commemorative Summit. Two decades of India's Look East Policy have seen India's integration with South-East & East-Asia initially at economic, cultural and people-to-people levels, and subsequently at political and strategic levels. The ASEAN-India Agreement on Trade-in-Goods was a major step forward. India is looking forward to concluding the Agreement on Trade in Investment and Services and would work with ASEAN for a Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP) the negotiations for which were launched at the recent East Asia Summit. India's participation in the East Asia Summit is a natural corollary of its growing multi-faceted engagement with ASEAN. India's participation in the ARF and ADMM+ process has added depth to this relationship. One interesting idea you could examine in the context of Asia is whether there is scope to move beyond to an Asian security architecture. As the Prime Minister said in Phnom Penh: Indian would like to see the emergence of an open, balanced, inclusive architecture that provides peace, security and prosperity in the Asia-Pacific Region.

- While renewing this relationship with South East Asia, a special focus on Myanmar is entirely warranted. We have sought to expand and deepen our relations with that country. It links us with South East Asia and provides opportunities for strengthening those links.

- Lastly, the Arab Spring has thrown up new challenges for the international community. For India, the region of the Gulf is critical. We have 6 million expatriate Indians working there who repatriate 35-40 billion US $ annually. Over 60% of our energy imports are sourced from this region. The stability of the region is therefore critical for India. We are keeping a close watch on the developments in the WANA and Gulf regions.

- The regional challenges I refer to are central to us for reasons of geopolitics and economic realities. While looking at these regions together we cannot lose sight of the critical importance to India of Central Asia, Africa and Latin America. Nor can we take our eyes off the fundamentals that foreign policy is a tool in national transformation. And that our goal is to assist in that transformation through promotion of peace in or periphery, a global structure of political and economic cooperation, access to finance, technology and natural resources.

The study of International Relations, if I may say so, needs to be made more application oriented: (i) IR theories should be tested against real world happenings and developments; (ii) theoretical percepts should be continuously evolved and fine tuned to enable them to explain or predict developments against these specific requirements.

I would encourage greater interaction between think tanks and academic institutions of Asia. We in the Ministry of External Affairs plan to strengthen our engagement with think tanks and research bodies, to promote more research and scholarship in this important area.

Thank you

New Delhi, December 13, 2012.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Allow me to apologize that I will be here for a short while because it's a parliament day and in fact today on which our ministry has to respond questions MPs put before us. This is also a day which I would request you to recall the tragedy of the attack on the Indian Parliament. We remember and recall the services of the martyred security personnel who lost their lives to protect the temple of Indian Democracy. At this very moment in fact there is a memorial service at parliament. But you would appreciate that we have given no less importance to energy security as we have to.... the protection of Indian democracy. I will go back from here and pay tribute to our martyred security personnel. But do say a silent prayer for their families and their children.

With privilege to have with us here Mr. Adi Godrej, President of CII, Mr. Chandrajit Banerjee, Director General who have interacted with over the years with great benefit to me in terms of understanding of what's happening in the world of economy, my colleague, secretary of Economic Relations, Mr. Sudhir Vyas and very distinguished captains of the industry, particularly in the field of energy, ladies and gentlemen:

This is a gathering where I would imagine, as you have just been told by the president, all of you if not most of you, are familiar with the challenges that we face, the important strategic and economic importance of energy security, the opportunities that we have both in our country and the world and indeed the strategies and structured approaches that we have been working on over the years. Undoubtedly, no one can say that we haven't achieved anything. But at the same time it would be foolhardy to say that we are at a comfort level.

The demand for energy is growing at a terrific pace in the country and perhaps one might even say not fast enough because if you look at the per capita consumption of energy in our country we are still way behind the people that we share the high table of the world with. We do know that the standard of living goes up in this country as it must and that a large number of young people with great aspirations, more than 65% of our populations come into our market place and look for respectable and comfortable living standards for themselves even as they contribute to the world and the economy particularly our own country's economy.

The demand for energy will grow and we do know that the sources of the energy are if not drying up certainly being depleted at a very fast pace within the country. We are heavily dependent and this you all know very well that we are already 80% of our overall consumption oil is imported and that 25% of our gas consumption is imported. Every new project now in many many important sectors including the power sector are now talking about import of gas and we are looking at various ways in which gas can be provided, how much exploration that we can do ourselves. But I think the estimates are that we would have to import 35% to 57%, the figures that I have been given of our coal by the year 2030-31 and then 90-94% of our oil will be imported and 20-57% of natural gas will have to be imported and that's if we continue to grow at 8-9%. We have no option as Mr. Chidambaram often says we have no option but to grow at 8-9% because the vast emerging numbers looking for employment in this country cannot possibly be taken care of unless we have a growth rate of 8-9%.

Having said that and I know that you will be looking at specific areas both of acquisition of energy sources and across the world of better integration with the international markets get a better strategizing with the international markets, working on the mix including increasing the mix which is only at 1% of nuclear energy in the country, working on the mix to suit both our requirements as well as the supply. As we look at all this and remain stressed by the increasing cost of energy in the world and indeed many of our problems we know in this country today is certainly you know if not every consumer, is largely due to the cost of the imported energy in this country. So that's going to remain a problem though of course, we do know that while sources get depleted not necessarily as a panic station stage but certainly as they get depleted we also know that in the next 10 years USA will be energy self sufficient relying heavily on shale gas and therefore, the demand that America has for energy from across the globe would be eased tremendously. But also I think the geo-political attitude of USA might undergo a change and if that happens we can prepare for both new challenges as well as prepare for new opportunities. That's something that we need to think about and when I see this I was asking Mr. Sudhir Vyas just know, I put this question to myself as to who should be at the cutting edge of global negotiations and strategizing in these spheres. People often do not know the extent of which integration there is between ministries such as external affairs and the energy ministry specifically or the field of climate change, the Ministry of Environment and in whichever other sector that we are dealing with to have a ministry specific to that sector. But the understanding of the overall situation in the world and the challenges that we will face is something that has to be added and that has to be provided by the Ministry of External Affairs. That's the reason presumably why you thought it would be important for us to be adequately represented here this morning. But while we work on a strategy and on a global strategy for energy security we obviously have to take a different posture and a different attitude from that of USA for that matter or China or the Soviet Union took and now Russia takes which is that we have to deal with countries that are energy exporting countries in a manner entirely different from the manner in which other countries have dealt with them.

We neither have the option, the capacity I presume or for that matter an ideology that would persuade us to intervene in a manner which we have from the time of Mahatma Gandhi and Pandit Nehru, who gave us the structure for our foreign policy. We have considered wholesome, we do not interfere in the international affairs or internal affairs of any country. If you do not interfere in the internal affairs of any country there are 2 dimensions to it-

1. that you may lose some friends and,

2. that you may have some friends.

We are not completely aligned with many other countries on Syria today for instance. We are not entirely aligned with some countries on Palestine for instance because India has always had its exclusive and I believe, a principled position that does not give same importance to pragmatic approaches that many other countries do where they look at their immediate interests rather than the principle that's involved. India has sacrificed its immediate interests and stood by principles most of the time and when we have sought our interests it has been an enlightened self interest rather than self interest per se. I think that's very important and if India itself i.e. our people themselves doesn't appreciate this policy of India then who else will?

We hardly like to get appreciation from those whose interests don't get served because of the position India takes. So I think this is a very critical and an important factor that we need to keep in mind at this juncture in our country and the growth and development of our democracy is what India's self interest, what is India's enlightened self interest and why as a matter of principle India will not go beyond the red line that it draws for itself? Given this constraint of working within principles we cannot just throw our hands up and say there's nothing we can do, we are a principled, aesthetic and altruistic country and therefore don't ask us for food, don't ask us for energy. That also has to be provided. Now if we have that responsibility as well and we have to ensure that fulfilling that responsibility is not just for our present day Indians but also to generations to come we have got to sort out a few things for ourselves. One thing that we need to sort out is how to best use our own energy and how to exploit our own energy? I must say very sadly we don't have today clarity on what it means to invite people to invest in energy exploration. We don't have the clarity for the simple reason that this is converted into a political boxing match. We are happy to import gas at 14 dollars and not willing to give 7 dollars to someone who wants to explore within our own country. Now this is a major problem.

I think that we need to develop public opinion in this country which says take the decision that is best for the country and not a decision that serves a political party or a political movement and certainly not people who put up political retail shops in this country simply because the sound bites have replaced serious democratic discourse and debate.

Therefore, your responsibilities don't end where the technical aspects, the scientific aspects and the financial aspects, broad global financial aspects of energy and your responsibilities go beyond that to carry conviction with the people of this country. The world is willing to take us seriously. We must be convinced that we have to take ourselves seriously. That is an extremely important dimension and aspect of energy security for ourselves. Of course, that means that we must explore how we can enhance, develop and fortify our relationship with energy suppliers. How we can look at modern technology so that we can work even faster in the field of alternative energy. We should wake up to certain realities. If there are coal people here I hope somebody has an answer. I cannot believe that for 25 years India hasn't found a solution to put out the fires in the coal fields in Jharkhand. I cannot believe that this can happen in our country.

When I was out of politics I hadn't entered politics, I thought there was an absurd thing happening. I have been politics for 20 years and I still think that it's an absurd thing that's happening and nobody talks about it. Nobody talks about dowsing the fires that are consuming lakhs and lakhs of coal every year. Because somebody says that there is a problem in shifting a small population that lives under those fires, somebody else is just not interested because they are dowsing political fires. They are just not interested in dowsing coal mine fires and then they say that we don't have the technology. How can I believe that we don't have the technology to save the coal that's burning there? Of course, while we don't seem to be serious about technology there we are looking certainly at new opportunities at the coal bed, methane, shale gas, increasing the share of renewable energy where my colleague Mr. Farooq Abhdulla has been doing some outstanding work. But I do believe that there is much more that we can do there. In the nuclear field once again there has to be clarity in public perceptions. It is something which is worrying, it is worrying for anyone and for somebody who hasn't experienced what a nuclear holocaust is or somebody who hasn't experienced what happened in Chernobyl or who hasn't experienced what happened after the tsunami in Japan, is probably easy to say why don't we just have clean nuclear energy.

I think we have to be sensitive to the concerns of those who feel that this is dangerous. But it is no less dangerous than the pollution in the air which comes from coal. It is no more dangerous than the pollution which comes from fossil fuels. So we have concluded Nuclear Cooperation Agreements with number of countries, US, Russia, France, UK, Canada, Argentina, Kazakhstan, Mongolia, Namibia, Republic of Korea and are in discussions with Japan. I can understand that Japan has slowed down its own interest in nuclear energy because of the experiences it has had. But having said all this I believe that just as much we need to work with our partners across the globe we need to work within the country not just at conferences like these, very very important conferences like these but also in some way using the very powerful Indian media to reach out in simple terms to the people of the country and explain to them why and what we are trying to do is important. Why decisions that appear to be decisions that should not be taken are indeed decisions that are absolutely imperative if we have to secure the future generations and provide them with the opportunity that they would deserve. We will be making some very good progress on linking our electricity grids and then indeed making them the second largest grid in the world and then linking it to Nepal, Bangladesh and Sri Lanka. One thing SAARC needs to achieve is to provide connectivity as far as electricity grid is concerned. Within the country our very ambitious program of 15,000 kms of gas pipeline, increasing our handling capacity for LNG import from 13 million tons to 45 million tons during the 12th plan and also of course, the very ambitious Turkmenistan-Tapi pipeline project which we have targeted for 2017.

There are a lot of things to do and I am sure that you will look at every dimension and aspect. I look forward to the record of deliberations and the recommendations that you make and what you think that the Ministry of External Affairs should be doing, we look forward to working with CII as indeed with all of you and I hope that a little change in national sentiment that we are beginning to see over the last few weeks will take on a life of its own and will get more traction and more energy and that over the next one year some of our ambitions for our country will begin to look that they will be fulfilled. I am sure that your contribution there will be enormous.

Thank you.
055. Interview of External Affairs Minister with the MINT.

Salman Khurshid took charge as external affairs minister of India after the cabinet reshuffle in October. His first challenge since taking the job has been a setback for India’s economic engagement in the Maldives, traditionally seen as within India’s sphere of influence. He spoke in an interview about the challenges facing Indian foreign policy and the forthcoming Association of South East Asian Nations-India commemorative summit in New Delhi on 20-21 December. Edited excerpts:

You want industry to help you further India’s strategic interests in countries such as Afghanistan or regions like Central Asia. But when it comes to situations like in the Maldives, the Indian government seems reluctant to back business. Isn’t there a dichotomy here?

What can you do in a situation like in the Maldives? You are not going to send the troops in, that’s important. We have to respect systems in countries where we want to take our investment. That is important and systems mean their established norms, values, the principles of law that they pursue. When we took a position on the Maldives, we made it very clear that the legal processes must be observed and respected. Ultimately, we bowed to a legal decision that was taken as part of an agreed arrangement in the contract itself between GMR and the Maldivian government. You can’t change your position simply because the decision finally goes against you. As far as persuasion is concerned, every bit of persuasion that is possible and was called for, we employed as far as the Maldives is concerned.

Let me just make it very clear that at the end of the day, GMR has asked us to get a settlement, not help them stay in the Maldives. It maybe disappointing and its certainly disappointing that what we thought was a show-window example of what we could do for our neighbours and our friends in terms of investment didn’t work out.

It’s sad, we are disappointed, but we did pursue a consistent and principled position, and GMR, I understand, is happy in the circumstances to the extent they can be. What they want is that there was a provision for exit under certain circumstances and those circumstances should be observed. There was nothing to the nature of untoward conduct or something that could go beyond civilized behaviour and I think one should appreciate that.

Having said that, you do have to learn some lessons and I think even industry must understand that when they negotiate they must keep some things in mind. Political sensitivities are always factored in by business when they are establishing themselves anywhere beyond the shores of India. Indeed, political sensitivities are taken into account in our country as well.

So I think that's a limited factor, that cannot be the dominant factor. We hope that will be seen as a legal issue. We hope that this will be a decision that will entirely be a commercial decision between the Maldivian government and GMR and that is the way it seems to have panned out finally. But I can't say that I am not disappointed. So if you are disappointed by something that has happened you, need to analyse it and you need to be sure that when you move forward and do something similar, that you are adequately prepared for any future venture of a similar nature.

Are you thinking of making changes to India's economic diplomacy?

Not at all, we just need to go further, but India is not going to carry the responsibility of doing business. That is for the industry to do. India will facilitate, India will give moral support, India will give such economic support as we can through lines of credit, for instance, by being there where the industry needs us to be. We can't do business for them and in doing business we must take some strategic decisions in which we can be of help but we can't be a substitute for their own decision making.

How does the Indian government look to support businesses and investments abroad, especially in emerging markets and those countries where there are differences in interpreting rules governing business?

As far as industry is concerned, business is going to Africa, business is going to Europe, business is going to America, so I think it's a wonderful thing that this is happening. Why shouldn't Indian business be multinational? If we are opening up to multinationalis, why should we not become multinationals and go to the world. It must be a two-way traffic and I think it's a very good thing but yes, not at the cost of investment in India and not caused by, as you said, a dismal picture of investment in our own country. Not as a no-alternative measure, but as additionality and as an expression of strength of growing Indian economy.

What about an increasingly assertive China?

We have to understand that many of our neighbours have a relationship with China. You can't wish China away. China is also in the neighbourhood. They will have their relationship with China, just as we have our relationship with China, but I don't think that should be a cause of any concern. We need to note it because we need to match what we do in the region, what we do with our neighbours what we do with our traditional friends. We need to match that, it cannot be a static relationship. As the relationships in the region change and grow and evolve, we must be there to ensure that we retain our place under the sun with our neighbours and we will be there sometimes collaborating with China, sometimes cooperating, sometimes in competition.

What about Pakistan? What are the next steps to take ties forward?

Next steps with Pakistan are—let's watch, we have their home minister coming here, our home minister is I think in a positive mood about what is possible. We will have a new visa regime in place when the home minister of Pakistan comes here. I think we have been lucky with some decisions on our side. I think (Pakistan microbiologist) professor (Mohammad Khalil) Chishti's decision by the Supreme Court has come very handy. We cannot take credit for it except to say that our legal system prevailed, but it has come in terms of time and opportunity it's come as a very handy gesture of goodwill towards Pakistan. (The ailing 82-year-old Chishti, accused in a murder case, has been allowed to visit Pakistan.)

We have also had reports of Pakistan now giving a little more thrust to trials that are taking place for making people accountable for what happened in 2008 in Mumbai. I think that is a good signal. But I don't think we should get too elated or excited too soon. Let's watch carefully and move forward step by step.

What do you see as India's main foreign policy challenges today?

I think our foreign policy challenge essentially is that we must live up to the expectations people have of us today. If people are seriously going to talk about us being a permanent member of the UN (United Nations) Security Council, then India must live up to the expectations. You just can't have expectations from the world and not reciprocate. I think that's the important thing. It means you have to be investing a lot more in foreign policy in terms of time, in terms of calibre, in terms of capacity, in terms of money.

If you want to be all over Africa, it cannot be done on a small budget. If you want soft diplomacy, it's not going to be done on a small budget. And in times when budgets are going to be tight, India will have to make a tough choice about ensuring that we don't have a major cutback on our financial commitment to the world. We have things to do in Afghanistan and Bhutan, and things to do in other parts of the world which will require money. These are development projects but they have a lasting value in terms of relationships we are creating and an investment as well.

Your first bilateral visit since taking over as external affairs minister in October is to Myanmar. Clearly, your emphasis is South Asia and on creating the peaceful periphery that Prime Minister Manmohan Singh has been emphasizing as important for India.
Absolutely. And because Myanmar is opening up—they have been in the sense shut in their own internal world—they are opening up in a magnificent way, and a lot of things are happening inside Myanmar. I think we need to be there both as part of the celebrations and part of the participation. And we see a lot of good visible signs and we would like to build on that.

But except for Myanmar and, say, Bangladesh and Bhutan, our foreign policy seems to be going awry in other parts of South Asia. Especially the Maldives and maybe even Sri Lanka.

It is not awry, circumstances have not necessarily fitted into our dreams, but if there is a tough call and there are difficult issues to be resolved, we will attend to them. We are not going to be overwhelmed by difficulties. We are not insistent about everything happening our way. We will go the extra mile.

So how are you going to solve these problems with neighbours?

The solution is to keep in constant engagement with an open mind, with patience. Be a good listener and say the right things at the right place.

Coming to the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), India is hosting a commemorative summit to mark 20 years of our Look East policy. How do you assess our ties with ASEAN?

Overall, it's a very wholesome and a very promising picture. It's something one can only examine in terms of what more is achievable. The base is very good. The base brings a lot of promise I think for the greater integration of trade first in our region and then beyond the region into the Pacific. The important building block has to be SAARC (South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation), then ASEAN and then go into the larger Pacific area.

That's one way the Indian Ocean and the Pacific would get linked together. I think we had extremely wholesome and promising growth in our relationship with the ASEAN countries. Our trade figures look good. Our investment figures are good. We have already seen incremental growth in trade which has gone up to $80 billion and now we have targeted for $100 billion by 2015. So I think that's a very, very encouraging picture. It's not only in the economic front—in people-to-people contact, in the cultural front and better understanding of each other's aspirations—I think together it looks very satisfactory.

What about the free trade agreement in services and investments? Will that be signed in Delhi next week?

We are in the last mile of that. As we talk, we are trying to put finishing touches to the agreement on services and investment. The agreement on goods is what I think has given us this fillip in trade. There are some marginal issues that remain as far as the agreement on services and investment is concerned. The leaders have agreed that we need to push it and try and achieve it as soon as possible. There are meetings going on now. And we are very hopeful of an early conclusion. Some accommodation and some flexibility will have to be shown by all parties concerned. We can say with a certain amount of hope that that should happen.

There are some countries like the Philippines that have problems with opening up services because they are also strong in the business process outsourcing sector. How is India going to allay their concerns?

This is an experience that we all have, that we all have a little bit of concern or uncertainty over what may happen if things open up in an area where you have had some exclusive advantage. You feel that somebody else moving in would take away your advantage. I think that is only one way of looking at things. There are broader experiences that can show to anyone that this is not the way that it finally turns out. If you can collaborate and cooperate, you can actually get a force multiplier.

The people who are negotiating I think are the best people on both sides. We are hopeful, whatever it takes to persuade, inevitably it takes some accommodation on both sides. And as long as you go there with an open mind, willing to accommodate, I don't think this is an impossible thing. Overall, everyone knows this is good and important. If there are specific concerns like the Philippines has, we will address them.

At the recent Asean meeting in Cambodia, India expressed willingness to join the regional comprehensive economic partnership (RCEP). What about the trans-Pacific partnership (TPP) initiative? Is this a choice that India has made to join the RCEP over the TPP?

I don't think it's a choice. I think it was pretty clear at the East Asia Summit what we are launching and what we are moving forward on is the ASEAN region as a priority. Inevitably, that will become a stepping stone because they have an overlap with the Pacific initiative and we have a complete commitment to ASEAN, so we move forward to ASEAN, that is a step inevitably towards greater integration. But our focus is obviously ASEAN, so that is what we have launched as the first go. It is not this or that, all or nothing. It's a graded step-by-step forward movement ultimately integrating.

Coming back to ASEAN, last week when the national security adviser was in China, Chinese officials referred to intentions of some parties to undermine India-China bilateral ties without specifying who these parties were. One assumes the reference was to the South China Sea dispute. How does India balance ties with China and ASEAN?
We (India-China) have no differences over the South China Sea. There are issues that China has with countries in that region, and China has a perception of how those differences can be resolved-bilateral as against multilateral. We are not party to that dispute; we have a general position which is freedom of navigation. I don’t think China will disagree with that. Freedom of navigation and adherence to the law of the sea—I don’t think China will disagree with that. They have a sovereignty issue with their neighbours in that area and that they want to resolve in a particular way. We have expected that this will get resolved.

But there were reports that the Chinese have authorized the police in Hainan province to board ships and vessels seen to be violating their territorial waters? There was this instance of the INS Airawat being “buzzed” by a Chinese patrol ship.

The Chinese have said that, but that is not directly affecting us today. We have explained to the Chinese and told the Chinese that we are there in terms of the drilling that we are doing off the Vietnamese shore—that is something that goes back to 1995. It’s not something that we are doing today and that is something that they are aware of. So there isn’t a dispute so to speak, but yes, they have certain assertions of sovereignty. But that’s between them and the countries involved. As far as we are concerned, our articulation that there should be freedom of navigation is an articulation that we have made categorically and it is not an articulation that China would not have taken on board or factored into.
Interview of External Affairs Minister to Reuters.

December 18, 2012.

Interviewer (John Edward Chalmers): Sir, what are you hoping will come out of the India-ASEAN Summit which will take place later this week in Delhi?

External Affairs Minister (Shri Salman Khurshid): By its very nature it is a commemorative summit. Therefore, it is a summit that celebrates our relationship having reached this level at this stage. In that sense it is both symbolic and it is in a sense a milestone. It is a moment in which we celebrate, we look back to see what we have achieved, and also look forward to see what more needs to be done. It is a bonding moment. It is a moment when we come together not with very heavy agenda but the agenda that allows you to reflect and allows you to look forward. We do have the eminent citizens’ support which actually lays out the path ahead. So, essentially it will be a moment in which you have a vision about and a roadmap for how we proceed forward.

Interviewer: Sir, perhaps somebody who was looking at this cynically might say with the light agenda it is a talking shop. Is there really any real substance to this?

External Affairs Minister: You are not going to achieve everything even if you wanted to in one day except that there should be the right chemistry, right feel to get the bonding. Of course, on the sidelines the work that continues, which is growing, will obviously be noted, will probably be provided greater impetus. For instance, our preferential trade agreement with ASEAN in investment is still to be finalized. We hope that it would be done by the time the year runs out or early next year. These are things on which you can on the sidelines continue to give a push that you need. So, the substantive achievements obviously do not come only at the summit. You can take stock of what you have achieved and certainly give an impetus to what you want to do in the time to come.

Interviewer: How far is the US strategy in Asia pushing India into a greater involvement in the eastern part of Asia?

External Affairs Minister: We have our own Look East Policy. I think we are probably into the third phase of our Look East Policy. We consider our own future in many ways linked to what is happening in East Asia. That is why we were right there at the beginning of the East Asia Summit. We have the full commitment to ASEAN. We see ASEAN as the building blocks of the world of tomorrow - SAARC, ASEAN, and beyond ASEAN, Asia Pacific. So, that is a continuum that would fit in well with our region of the world. What we need is far greater connectivity, economic connectivity what we have been working on, physical connectivity which is road network in ASEAN followed by rail connectivity. Certainly while we are at it to ensure that we connect ourselves a lot better with the capitals of this region by air, I think there is still a lot that can be done. And we hope that over the next few months and years we will see considerable improvement.

Interviewer: As you know, there is a lot of tension in Southeast Asia over South China Sea with China's ambitions there. By joining hands very closely with the Southeast Asian nations, somehow India has been brought into this hostility and tension around that particular issue?

External Affairs Minister: I do not think that this is something that would reach levels of hostility or conflict. There are differences, obviously. China has a very clear perception about its sovereignty. It also has a very clear idea of how it wants to resolve these issues. But there are other countries that have a different point of view. I think that it is not something that cannot be resolved.
It is certainly not something in which we are directly involved. We have said categorically, and this is a statement that we made early on, and we will continue to adhere to this understanding, that there should be compliance and respect for the law of the sea, that freedom of navigation on high seas is something that we must all adhere to. But the sovereignty issues can be settled between China and the countries that they have a concern about. Whether it is done bilaterally or it is done multilaterally, I think there is ample scope for dialogue to settle these issues.

Interviewer: How far it is that India's foreign policy is shaped by energy security? I think you obviously see that as something that is important. Would you see that now as a critical priority?

External Affairs Minister: I think more and more. There was a time after Independence when India saw itself as part of a larger aspiration, Asian-African aspiration, for freedom, for expression of the human soul. We participated, therefore, in Independence movements in Africa. Our leadership felt that India's own Independence was incomplete without India's friends in Africa and Asia being free as well. But the world has obviously moved on from there. We have become far more resource-oriented because development is obviously dependent heavily on resources.

India is energy-deficit country. Eighty per cent of our fuel is imported.
Obviously to move to an alternative fuel source, to go into alternative energy, for instance solar energy, wind energy, is something that is very expensive.
There are across the globe, and certainly in India as well, great questions being raised about use of nuclear energy. We do know that in our energy mix if nuclear energy does not play a role, then depleting water resources, depleting coal, also environmental issues, immediate environmental issues, the environmental issues that are concerned with nuclear energy as well, all these things obviously make decision-making very difficult.

So, energy security is obviously very important for us. But so is the fact that we need to protect both ourselves and the rest of the world against the menace of terrorism. We were the first to have raised a voice against terrorism in the world. The world did not take us very seriously on that issue to begin with because there were obviously political complications. But we are very glad to report that today the world does take us seriously on this issue and that we are leading the battle against global terrorism. I think we have made enormous gains as far as that front is concerned, but enough still has not been done. We cannot say with absolute certainty that we are all secure against terrorism. There is a lot more still to be done. But these are two very major issues. Ultimately India's foreign policy has always been a principle-based foreign policy. You cannot in the real world not combine pragmatism with principles. But I think if you look at the range of foreign policy doctrines and foreign policy models that are used the world over, India stands in its own place as the country that follows principled foreign policy. And the mix that we give of self interest is an enlightened self interest mix. And I hope that this is what is actually appreciated about India.

Interviewer: You mentioned three major area of your foreign policy: energy security, counterterrorism and a principles-based foreign policy. I will be interested in hearing some of your ideas about, for example, how to better achieve India's energy security laws. That has in the past been more of a government-to-government approach. I think you have worked in Kazakhstan and some of those areas. Do you think there is space for more of that? Will India need to push for government-to-government agreements in places like Myanmar, etc.

External Affairs Minister: I think to an extent that is inevitable. We have a large public sector, a dominant public sector as far as the energy area is concerned. Therefore, whatever we do in the field of energy will have a lot to do with India's public sector. But we opened up to the private sector as well both within country as well as encourage private sector to engage abroad. We have a great private sector presence for instance in coal in Africa. We have private sector explorations in Central Asia, private sector reaching out to possibilities in Southeast Asia. And we will certainly encourage it. But we have an interesting mix of public and private sector. Obviously there is historical engagement that our public sector has done in various energy rich countries and that will continue. So, what we get is an ideal mix as possible. I think that we hope to complement strengths between public sector and private sector. It works well for us and I hope that we will continue along that path for a while.

Interviewer: Are you looking to get progressively into gas blocks from Myanmar or something which India lost out to China in the past? There is now opportunity as you get closer to Myanmar to be able to take some involvement in the gas.

External Affairs Minister: You might say it. If you are going to do principled global politics, you will have to make some sacrifices. We do not regret that. As far as Myanmar is concerned, I have just been there, we have had very good meetings with senior dignitaries in Myanmar. They have shown tremendous interest in India engaging in the energy sector possibly importing gas from Myanmar to India through a pipeline. I think there are great possibilities, and we would like to work on that relationship.

We do not have any problems about China being present. I think that we have engaged China in a meaningful way as a neighbor. We do take into account the strengths that China has in the field of commerce and international relations, and we will want to work together, cooperate, collaborate, and where appropriate compete as well. Why not? Competition is something that is a part of the marketplace. I think so long as the competition is sensible and reasonable, it should be encouraged.

Interviewer: Just a couple more questions. The United States is now proposing tighter sanctions on Iranian port facilities. This will affect India's trade with Afghanistan. How are you dealing with this issue?

External Affairs Minister: We are in touch with the United States on this. I think that fortunately the way things have panned out, we are well compliant with the expectations of the United States. Although our specific position is that we comply with UN sanctions, that we do not take into account sanctions of any other country, but if it converges and we are in a sense well within the parameters of the United States, I think it works well for us and it works well for them as well. They would probably look at it afresh in the months to come. We expect them to reexamine, and I hope that in the new effort of the Administration that comes now under President Obama, I hope the very dialogue level that it continues with Iran can also go forward. I hope that this is something that can get resolved and that it does not get further exacerbated or complicated because of intransigence on either side.

Interviewer: Just a quick follow-up on that. There is a new provision under US law which is coming in with effect from February. I am not sure how familiar you are with this which will effectively force banks to withhold payments from refiners like Indian refiners to the National Iranian Oil Corporation. So, no money will go back to Iran. How is India going to deal with that?
External Affairs Minister: We are factoring all this in. We have been in touch with the United States, as I said. We are looking at what their compulsions and what their positions are. We also obviously take into account that we need a lot more import of oil from across the world. But our import from Iran has been consistently going down. For various reasons it has been consistently going down. I think that this is something we will be able to manage. It is not something that will catch us by surprise.

Interviewer: Sir, do you see it continuing to fall next year?

External Affairs Minister: I think there has been a steady fall. We have also obviously been to buy it from somewhere else. For the present we do not have a problem. I think that a lot of things are in the pipeline. Who knows! There might just be a solution! And if there is not a solution, you will have to find some alternatives. But there are no ...(Inaudible)... I think on this. We are factoring in everything that is coming our way. For the present ...(Inaudible)... to say it is work in progress.

Interviewer: What involvement do you see for India in Afghanistan post 2014? Would you expect India to be training security forces on the ground in that country?

External Affairs Minister: We already have defence cooperation with them. We are not sure how much more we can add to that as of now. The reason is that whatever we do in Afghanistan, we would want that to be acceptable at a reasonable level to all other stakeholders in the region. There is no point trying to help Afghanistan, if that will create complications for them. We have had a very welcome and a very open-armed approach from Afghanistan including during the visits of President Karzai to India, and we are willing to help. Right now we are engaging them extensively in development projects giving them capacity building, institution building, helping them at every level, in each District with small projects that will help their communities to come together and to be more self contained and self confident. Beyond this what we can do by way of helping them on security is something that again is an ongoing dialogue with them. We are there already. But how far and how much would we able to do will depend only on their invitation but will also depend largely on our assessment of how useful it will be to them and to Afghanistan in the whole.

Interviewer: Specifically, India is now training some security forces in Afghanistan.

External Affairs Minister: Right now the training is done here. They come for training to India. We supply them with some vehicles, police training and so on. But this is something as I said that can only grow provided it has a comfort level for all stakeholders. Obviously a lot of that will be communicated to us by the Afghan Government. We want to see how things pan out for them in the next year. They are moving towards an election. We are going to help them with that election through our personnel from the Election Commission. They still have not given us any formal dates by which they want personnel to come there, engage and work out their election programmes, etc. But, as I said, we are friends to them and we are here. We will be willing to respond to any call. But we have advised them as well that it is best that we work together in a manner that is at a comfort level for everyone - for Americans, for other powers in the region, and even for Pakistan. We do not want to score points against anyone. We want to help Afghanistan in a meaningful way. That is something that we can work out mutually.

Interviewer: How worried are you about what is going to happen post 2014?

External Affairs Minister: They do not seem very worried. I see no reason if they are not worried why we should be worried. But we all have to be alert and we all have to be careful and take things as they come and be prepared for putting in extra work and extra energy.

Interviewer: One final question. India, as you describe it, is involved more than ever on the world stage. It is a very large country with very complex neighbours, extending its reach further and further, but has one of the world's smallest per capita diplomatic corps. Is that something that you are going to tackle?

External Affairs Minister: We have a plan. We have a plan for modernizing the Foreign Service adding some more expertise in those fields that are managed today of course by other Ministries in coordination with us, but to bring in more of those experts within the Foreign Service. We also have a forward-looking panel in the next ten years for a fairly impressive expansion of the Service. We are already into the first phase of that. Over the next ten years, we would have a much larger service than we have today.

Interviewer: Can you give us a sense of the numbers?

External Affairs Minister: I have numbers but it is going to be itself heavy and impressive.

Interviewer: Like double in ten years, triple?

External Affairs Minister: I would see it being doubled at least. But I think that is not one thing on which we will be short of effort. We are conscious that there is a very big challenge and we have enough resources. We would not be out of resources as far as dealing our international relations is concerned.

Interviewer: Thank you very much. I appreciate.

External Affairs Minister: Thank you.
What are your thoughts on Rehman Malik's visit?

I think he wanted to come and he came. The important thing is he has certainly taken it forward by talking about a timeline as far as the trial of the Mumbai accused in Pakistan is concerned. Too much time has passed and there, I think, his saying that at least the judgment in the present proceedings will be completed over the next two, three months is a welcome statement.

Malik tried to equate the 26/11 attacks with Samjhauta and even made a reference to Babri Masjid. Do you see any merit in the argument?

If I was there, I would say, so what? So what if Samjhauta happened, Babri Masjid happened; what has that got to do with Mumbai? Every time you ask somebody why they’ve done something wrong, they can't count everything that you’ve done wrong in your life. There's no relevance. None of these events are events that we are happy about. None of these events are events that are not in an appropriate manner being made accountable. What has that got do with something for which the responsibility rests very clearly, as is being shown in their legal proceedings, on somebody who is on Pakistan soil?

What about his claim that only information, not evidence, has been given on the 26/11 masterminds?

It's obviously very disappointing. That's not fair because we have given more than enough evidence to begin the process. If he were to say that you can't conclude the process on this, that's another matter. But I think there is more than enough evidence to begin the process of making them accountable.

In the light of all this, what is our overall approach towards Pakistan?

We have agreed in strategic terms that we will continue to engage with Pakistan and work on those dimensions which are within our reach, without compromising on those that would require much longer dialogue.

How keen are you to make your first visit to Pakistan?

See, I am trying to, over the next couple of months, do all our neighbours. I don't want to make an exception of Pakistan. I am not striking it off the list of places I have to go to, but in terms of priority, it will all depend on how things shape up.

What is the status of the land boundary agreement with Bangladesh, which has to be brought before Parliament in the form of a constitutional amendment?
We have had discussions over the last week with some political parties. I am convinced that we have to do it and we will get it done, but this is a national thing and we want to do it together. I don't want to take credit for it for our party. This is India's national handshake with Bangladesh, which goes back to our initial commitment in 1971. It's in the overall national interest of India as it is indeed of Bangladesh. This convergence of two national interests is something we should not be losing time on, and I am trying to convince all our colleagues in Parliament that they shouldn't look for something that's not there. This is not a one-sided bargain. This is not being done to score quick political brownie points. If we are to have a long-term relationship with Bangladesh, then something like this has to be the springboard for opening up vast avenues without which our Look East policy will remain truncated and disadvantaged.

What will India's next steps be after the setback in Maldives?

We have not had a setback. I call it an event that doesn't necessarily give us happiness, but not a setback. It's part of life. If you will do commerce in the world, not every negotiation or agreement will give you the returns you go seeking, and this is not anything directly to do with the Government of India. This is a contract that an Indian company won for itself independently of any government influence. It won it in a free and fair bid contest supervised by the IFC. That an Indian company succeeded was a matter of satisfaction for us. That the Indian company for various reasons was unable to continue that contract, it's disappointing. I don't see it at the level of a setback. GMR seems pretty comfortable. All they are looking for is entitlement they get for the cancellation of the contract. I think the Maldives government has made it very clear that their entitlements will be fulfilled.

And what is the way forward to restoring the balance in India-Maldives relations?

You can look at theoretical issues. Have they used their sovereign power, or have they used their rights as a contracting party? This is for scholars to analyse. End result is we are not there, and that's disappointing. I think there are lessons there - in many democracies, particularly growing democracies, there are public perceptions that must be addressed adequately in commerce. In some areas, in which people see a lot of symbolism, perceptions matter more. It's like your national airlines. Similarly, it's possible a gateway to Maldives is seen differently from any other contract. Having said that, if this became necessary because there were political influences being used in a coalition situation, then it would be sad and we have expressed hope that this will come to an end. That this will not spill over to anything more which is directed against India's interest. I hope that it will be contained and be limited to being directed against a particular company because of local politics, and the government of Maldives will be able to restrict it up to this point. They've scored a point with the opposition if that's what they wanted. It should not be allowed to influence their relationship with our country. There are still many other Indian companies invested in the Maldives.

Do you have any views on the first woman chief justice of Sri Lanka facing possible impeachment?

You know these are issues involving the judiciary of another country and are best taken note of, but not something on which we can express a view. Its implications as far as our relationship with Sri Lanka is concerned are virtually zero.
058. Press Release on the visit of UN High Commissioner for Refugees to India.

New Delhi, December 19, 2012.

1. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees, Mr. Antonio Guterres, currently on a visit to India, held the 4th round of open-ended bilateral consultations in Delhi today. The Indian delegation was led by Shri Navtej Sarna, Additional Secretary (International Organizations), Ministry of External Affairs. This is the 4th round of such consultations between UNHCR and Government of India. The discussions focused on the current policies and activities of UNHCR in several regions of the world as well as on specific situations relating to south Asia. The Indian delegation shared GOI's policies and practice in dealing with such situations in accordance with its own guidelines and legal framework.

2. UN High Commissioner for Refugees also called on the External Affairs Minister Shri Salman Khurshid, Home Minister Shri S.K. Shinde, Foreign Secretary and the Home Secretary. During these meetings, the High Commissioner expressed his high appreciation for India's age-old tradition of tolerance and understanding which manifested itself in its current policy of protecting and assisting refugees. India's strict adherence to the principle of non-refoulement and voluntary repatriation also came in for positive comment by the High Commissioner. The High Commissioner also appreciated India's gesture in extending long-term visas for refugees in addition to providing other facilities during their stay in India. EAM recalled his recent visit to Myanmar and India's pledge of US$ 1 million for the Rakhine State of Myanmar and India's cash assistance of US$ 200,000 towards the relief and rehabilitation effort for displaced persons in August 2012. The discussions with Indian dignitaries also focused on the handling of refugee situations in various parts of the world. The need for UNHCR to continue to focus on its core mandate of refugee protection and not allow it to be diluted by other concerns was also underlined.

3. Shri Navtej Sarna, Additional Secretary (IO), also hosted a lunch in honour of the visiting dignitary.

New Delhi, December 29, 2012.

External Affairs Minister (Shri Salman Khurshid): I will just make a very short statement.

These are our five countrymen who, as you know, were held hostage for over two years and ten months, almost three years. We have assiduously worked for a very long time, step-by-step, for their release. And we are very pleased to be able to say that their release has been through an operation that was very quietly and very successfully done. Obviously they now need to quickly get debriefed, and then they must go to their families as quickly as possible.

For the families this will be some cheer in a good year, in the new year. Some of them have to go as far as Kerala, some of them have to go as far as Uttar Pradesh (Balliya), Punjab. So, we would not want to delay them and keep them back any bit longer. We want to indicate through this our resolve and commitment to get the release of the other 37 hostages who are still held in various incidents, and we hope that all of them can be released also in the near future.

Along with these five of our countrymen, we have also been successful in getting their comrades from Pakistan released as well, who we carried to Oman where they were handed over to their Pakistani authorities who have made arrangements for them to be taken home as well. So, in that sense, in matters of such kind I think it is important that we cooperate and collaborate irrespective of our borders, and that is what we have done. I think this is for us a matter of some satisfaction that not only have we been able to successfully get the release of our own citizens but we have also been able to help in the release of citizens of our neighbouring country Pakistan.

As I said, our resolve and determination to get all Indian hostages who are still held - 37 of them - released, and we hope that we will be able to do it with the urgency that it calls for. The operations and the negotiations and the planning that goes into all this has to per se be very confidential. Since we are dealing with people on the other side who are not necessarily very friendly, we have to ensure that no chink in our armour, no weakness is exhibited at any stage. But a determination and commitment to doing whatever it takes to get our citizens released is the message that we hope will be carried once again with the release of these citizens of our country.

I welcome them back, and I say that we are proud of them. We know what they must have undergone for such a long time. That they kept hope alive and that they have come back safely is for us a matter of great satisfaction.

Thank you very much.

Question: Sir, in a span three weeks, two times the Sri Lankan Navy have arrested the Tamil fishermen.

External Affairs Minister: And released.

Question: And released. Today some of them have returned to Mandapam refugee camp.

Recently, Minister of State in the Prime Minister's Office Mr. Narayanasamy stated that the Centre is ready to find an amicable solution to get both Sri Lankan and Tamil Nadu fishermen communities to talks. But the Tamil Nadu Government is not cooperating in this task.

External Affairs Minister: I do not want to comment on something which is an ongoing process. There is in process now a dialogue to find some kind of acceptable arrangement both for ensuring that such incidents do not happen and also that if they happen there should be a system by which they can quickly be responded to and resolved. I think we would like to wait till some constructive proposals come forward on which there is agreement on both sides. This is a matter that is getting our urgent attention and we hope that we will have a solution. But we need cooperation from our own citizens also. The constraints have to be understood, and the responsibilities we have, how serious and how onerous those responsibilities are, have to be appreciated by our own people as well.

Question: Sir, about the rape victim who has died ...

External Affairs Minister: There are official spokespersons already giving you information. I do not have any information except to say that you have already carried the news that a plane has been sent and the mortal remains will be brought back to India. You know how tragic this whole event has been and how much sadness, distress and pain it has caused to all of us, all of us. I appreciate the anguish of the young people who today are sitting in silent solidarity and for the cause. I appreciate that and I think we all do. Together we as a society and a nation have to find solutions. They are not only legal solutions, they have to be legal solutions, they have to be social solutions, they have to be institutional solutions, but together we have to find them. And I will request you the media for help in this. The help that you are giving us in furthering this cause, in resolving these issues and finding permanent, sustained solutions, I would urge you to help us in that as well.
Question: Sir, the body ... (Inaudible)... which is being brought...?

External Affairs Minister: I have no news. I have no information I have told you what I knew... the aircraft has gone from India and will return, presently I have no more details.

Namaskar. Thank you.

INDIA’S FOREIGN RELATIONS - 2012

SECTION - II

CIVIL NUCLEAR ENERGY
Opening remarks by Foreign Secretary at media interaction after conclusion of the New Delhi Sherpa Meeting on National Security Summit.

New Delhi, January 17, 2012.

Thank you for attending this media interaction.

As you are aware, a meeting of the Sherpas for the 2nd Nuclear Security Summit was held in Vigyan Bhawan on 16-17 January and concluded its work just a few minutes ago. This meeting was attended by 49 participating countries and four international organizations. You are aware that 46 countries participated in the First Nuclear security summit that was held in Washington in April 2010. ROK as the host of the Second summit which will be held in Seoul in March 26-27, 2012 has invited three new participants - Denmark, Lithuania, and Azerbaijan. Of these, Denmark and Lithuania sent representatives to the New Delhi Sherpa Meeting. The four international Organizations are the UN, IAEA, Interpol and the European Union.

2. The main agenda of the Sherpa meeting, which was co-chaired by the next Chair ROK and the previous Chair the United States, was consideration of the draft communiqué that would be adopted by the Summit in Seoul. The draft communiqué is a substantive document that seeks to reaffirm the Washington communiqué and build on the momentum that has been generated since the last Summit. Since the draft is still under discussion, it would not be possible to share specific details. However, the discussion on the draft were productive and have reached an advance stage of consideration.

3. The main objective of the Nuclear Summit process has been to focus high-level global attention on the threat posed by nuclear terrorism and the measures required to address the global challenge of preventing terrorists and other non-state actors from gaining access to sensitive nuclear materials, technology and information. Security of nuclear materials is fundamentally a national responsibility but there is considerable scope for international cooperation to strengthen nuclear security objectives and standards. In this regard, there was considerable emphasis on the leading role of the IAEA in the international nuclear security framework and the need to strengthen multilateral instruments that address nuclear security such as the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material and the International Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism. India is a party to all major international instruments in the field of nuclear security.

4. Among the topics being discussed for considered for inclusion in the Seoul Summit outcome Communiqué include measures to secure the management of highly enriched uranium, measures to ensure radiological security, promoting transport security and combating illicit trafficking, security of sensitive information and increasing international cooperation and assistance. In this regard, you would recall that India had announced the setting up of the Global Centre for Nuclear Energy Partnership. The Seoul Summit will also give consideration to strengthening the synergy between nuclear safety and nuclear security, an issue which has become topical after the Fukushima accident of March, 2011. We feel that this issue merits Summit level consideration to enhance public confidence that measures are being taken to ensure that nuclear energy, which is an essential energy source is used in a safe and secure manner.

5. India is committed to the success of the Nuclear Security Summit process. Our Prime Minister will be attending the Seoul Summit in March this year. The holding of the Sherpa meeting in New Delhi, the first of its kind that we have hosted, is a clear demonstration of our commitment to the Nuclear Security Summit process.

Thank You.
You will recall that the first Nuclear Security Summit was held in Washington on 13th April, 2010, with the participation of 47 countries and three international organizations. A total of 58 leaders are expected at the Seoul Summit as some new countries will be attending for the first time. The Summit deliberations and results will be reflected in the Seoul NSS Communiqué.

As you aware, the draft Communiqué was discussed at the Sherpa meeting which we hosted in New Delhi on 16th and 17th of January 2012. There will be another Sherpa meeting in Seoul on the 23rd of March, which I would be attending, to finalize the Communiqué for the Summit.

The Programme of the Summit would be broadly patterned on the lines of the Washington Summit with an opening dinner for the leaders on March 26. The thematic discussions during the dinner would be ‘Review of progress made since the 2010 Washington Summit’. Thereafter, the thematic discussion during the morning and the afternoon sessions of 27th March would be on ‘National Measures and International Cooperation to Enhance Nuclear Security, including future commitments’. There will then be a working lunch with thematic discussions on the ‘Nuclear Security-Safety interface’ which would be between 12.30 p.m. to 2.00 p.m. The Summit is expected to close at 4.30 p.m.

The main objective of the Nuclear Security Summit process has been high level attention on the global threat posed by nuclear terrorism and the measures that are required to prevent terrorists and other non-state actors from gaining access to sensitive nuclear materials and technologies. While nuclear security is a national responsibility there is scope for international cooperation. The IAEA has a central role in strengthening the international nuclear security framework.

The Seoul Summit is intended to take stock of progress in implementation of the Communiqué and Work Plan, which was arrived at during the Washington Summit, as well as agree on new measures that would be reflected in the Summit Communiqué. A number of countries are expected to speak on the steps taken to strengthen nuclear security after the Washington Summit in the form of national progress reports. These will be made public during the Summit.
India is committed to the success of the NSS process. PM’s participation in the Seoul Summit as well as the First Summit in Washington is a demonstration of our high level commitment.

Thank you.

Official Spokesperson: As I suggested, please limit your initial set of questions to the Nuclear Security Summit and the Prime Minister’s visit to Korea.

Question: Would Iran be discussed? What about the bilaterals with Pakistan and the US? Is there a possibility of having bilaterals with them?

Foreign Secretary: The focus of the NSS is essentially nuclear security and the measures to prevent terrorists from gaining access to sensitive nuclear material for malicious purposes. So, it is not the theme of the summit. But Individual national statements may cover other issues including of the nature which you have mentioned.

As of now there are no plans for a bilateral meeting between Prime Minister and President Obama and the Prime Minister of Pakistan. As of now this has not been scheduled.

Question: Is a Nuclear Cooperation Agreement between India and Korea likely to be formally announced during the Prime Minister’s visit?

Secretary (East) (Shri Sanjay Singh): The two countries signed an agreement on peaceful uses of nuclear energy in July, 2011 during the visit of the hon. President of India.

Question: The Prime Minister at the First Summit had spoken about the Global Centre for Nuclear Energy Partnership. What is the progress on this and where is it going to be located?

Foreign Secretary: The Global Centre is under active discussion. We have discussed it with a large number of countries who have agreed to actually participate in it and join us. It is expected to come up on the outskirts of Delhi. It is making progress. Discussions with a large number of countries have indicated strong interest in cooperating with us in this regard.

* * *

Question: What measures will India propose at the Nuclear Security Summit to enhance the safety of nuclear materials and for a better audit? And what sort of concerns are going to be expressed by India?

Foreign Secretary: India is committed to the success of the NSS process, as I said, and we attach high importance to the measures which we take and the others take both at the national level and through the international cooperation to address this issue of nuclear terrorism. But the specifics will actually be spelt out in the PM’s address when he goes to the Summit. I think we will have to wait till he comes out with that.

Question: Will there be anything on negotiations to enter the NSG and all that? Are these issues likely to come up here?

Foreign Secretary: No, this is not the forum for that. What happens in these multilateral conferences is that one does meet counterparts from a number of other countries. So, one cannot rule out that in the pull-asides and informal discussions there would be further reference to this. But, no, this is not on the agenda. The last discussion with the NSG was held earlier this month when I went to Vienna when I met the NSG troika. That has already been done.

Question: If I am not mistaken, the recommendations of the Communiqué of the First Nuclear Security Summit are not binding on nations. They are voluntary in nature in terms of implementation. In that context, how relevant do you think such meetings are?

Foreign Secretary: I think the idea is to get people to commit. In fact the intention of having what they called National Progress Statements is to indicate the actions which have actually been taken. The fact that more countries that participated in the First Summit actually wanted to come to this Summit and the wish to declare their intention to add to the international efforts to curb the dangers of terrorists being able to lay their hands on the nuclear materials, is a very positive indication. I believe that on this particular issue, on the need to protect nuclear materials and nuclear installations from the threat of terrorism, there is a widespread consensus. There may be differences on specific measures and specific steps, but I think nobody disagrees that we need to be doing things. The implementation is more or less in a particular year, but the implementation has actually been taking place. I think when you get the Progress Statements, there is a plan in fact to have all the Progress Statements put together as part of the document which will be an outcome, I think it will reflect a fair amount of progress globally.

Question: Will Pakistan be discussed?

Foreign Secretary: In what context? They are a participant in the Nuclear Security Summit and they will be making their national statement also, I presume.

Question: What is the assessment of the clandestine proliferation networks active in the region? When we talk about threat of nuclear terrorism, what is the assessment of scale of threat that exists in the region? We are talking about the proliferation networks emanating from the neighbourhood.

Foreign Secretary: This is a subject which is discussed at many levels both in the general form of nuclear security, as well as you might have seen even the IAEA has referred to it. So, there are a number of fora in which this particular issue can be addressed.

062A. Nuclear Security Summit: National Progress Report

Seoul, March 27, 2012.

1) International Legal Instruments: India is party to all the 13 universal instruments accepted as benchmarks for a State’s commitment to combat international terrorism. India is party to the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material and is amongst the few countries which have also ratified the 2005 amendment to the Convention. India looks forward to early entry into force of the 2005 Amendment. India is also Party to the International Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism. India supports efforts for promoting the universality of these two Conventions.

2) International Atomic Energy Agency: India has consistently supported IAEA’s central role in facilitating national efforts to strengthen nuclear security and in fostering effective international cooperation. India is a member of the IAEA Commission on Nuclear Safety Standards and the Advisory Group on Nuclear Security. India has been actively involved in the preparation of the Nuclear Security Series documents produced by the IAEA. India has actively contributed to IAEA’s Action Plans on Nuclear Security, including third plan for 2010-2013. India as a partner to the IAEA-US Regional Radiological Security Partnership (RRSP) has been organizing international training courses in India under the aegis of the IAEA. India offered assistance through the IAEA for search and recovery of orphan radioactive sources in countries which were unable to effectively deal with them and had sought such assistance. India commends the Agency’s efforts to develop a Nuclear Security Information Portal and its efforts in developing a comprehensive set of guidance documents under the Nuclear Security Series.

We support the fifth revision of the recommendations contained in INFCIRC/225. We look forward to sustainable Agency activities in the area of nuclear security training and education and appreciate the assistance provided by the Agency to educational institutions in the area of Nuclear Security. India is a participant in the IAEA’s Illicit Trafficking Database (ITDB), which was established in 1995 and disseminates information on confirmed reports about illicit trafficking and other unauthorized activities and events involving nuclear radioactive materials to the States. India has been supportive of the 2003 IAEA Code of Conduct on the Safety and Security of Radioactive Sources and voluntarily adopted its provisions. India has also conducted 9 regional training seminars on nuclear security in cooperation with the IAEA. Conclusion of Practical Arrangements between GCNEP and the IAEA would reinforce India’s cooperation with the Agency.

3) UN and other mechanisms: Since 2002, India has piloted a resolution at the United Nations General Assembly on measures to prevent terrorists gaining access to Weapons of Mass Destruction. This resolution has been adopted by the General Assembly by consensus. India fully supports the implementation of United Nations Security Council Resolution 1540, its extension resolution 1977, and the United Nations Global Counter Terrorism Strategy. India is also a party to Global Initiative to Combat Nuclear Terrorism and has participated in its working groups on nuclear detection, nuclear forensics and response and mitigation. While nuclear security is being addressed at different foras, there is need to ensure that these efforts are mutually complementary and reinforce the related activities of the IAEA. We also cooperate with the Interpol’s Radiological and Nuclear Terrorism Prevention Unit and the World Customs Organization. India participated in the High Level Meeting called by the UN Secretary General on Nuclear Safety and Security on 22 September 2011.

4) National legal framework: The Indian Atomic Energy Act 1962 provides the legal framework for securing nuclear materials and facilities. Amendments to this Act are under consideration to further strengthen the legal basis for nuclear security measures. In June 2005, India enacted the Weapons of Mass Destruction and their Delivery Systems (Prohibition of Unlawful Activities) Act, 2005. Updating of the export control lists and related regulations are undertaken as a continuous ongoing process. India has adhered to NSG Guidelines and has expressed interest in full membership of the NSG and other international export control regimes. India is taking a number of measures to strengthen nuclear security. The Government has introduced a bill in Parliament for the establishment of an independent Nuclear Safety Regulatory Authority which will also enhance oversight of nuclear security and strengthen synergy between safety and security.

5) Reducing Nuclear Material: With regard to minimization of use of civilian HEU, the enriched uranium based fuel in the APSARA reactor was placed in a safeguarded facility in December 2010. APSARA will use indigenous fuel which is not high enriched uranium. However, there is a growing demand for large-scale production of isotopes for a range of applications- healthcare, industry, food and agriculture. India’s three stage nuclear programme is based on a closed nuclear fuel cycle, the principle of ‘reprocess-to-reuse’ and ensuring control over nuclear material at all stages. It is also important that technology is continually upgraded to develop nuclear systems that are intrinsically safe, secure and proliferation resistant. We have recently developed an Advanced Heavy Water Reactor based on Low Enriched Uranium and thorium with new safety and proliferation-resistant features.

6) International Cooperation: India has close cooperation with the IAEA’s Programme of Action for Cancer Therapy (PACT). India has signed tripartite Agreements with IAEA and Sri Lanka and Namibia to donate our indigenously developed Cobalt teletherapy machine (Bhabhatron II) to these two countries as a step towards affordable treatment of Cancer. A similar machine was donated to Vietnam in 2008.

7) Global Centre for Nuclear Energy Partnership (GCNEP): At the first Nuclear Security Summit, India announced that it would establish a Global Centre for Nuclear Energy Partnership. We visualize this to be a state of the art facility based on international participation from the IAEA and other interested foreign partners. (Cooperation MOUs/Practical Arrangements have been concluded with some countries and the IAEA). To begin with, the Centre will consist of four Schools dealing with Advanced Nuclear Energy System Studies, Nuclear Security, Radiation Safety, and the application of Radioisotopes and Radiation Technology in the areas of healthcare, agriculture and food. The Centre will conduct research and development of design systems that are intrinsically safe, secure, proliferation resistant and sustainable, as we believe such technological solutions will strengthen nuclear security in the long run. The Centre will carry out research and development in radiation monitoring including development of detectors and nuclear emergency management. The Centre will also have state of the art training facilities for Indian and international participants and research by Indian and visiting international scientists. We are interested in development and conduct of courses in association with interested countries and the IAEA. An “off-campus” training course on Physical Protection was organized under GCNEP auspices in November 2011 for 25 participants, including 17 foreign nationals. Further courses planned for 2012 include: Prevention, Preparedness and Responses involving malicious acts with radioactive materials, Medical Management, Safeguard Practices etc.

8) Nuclear Security Summit Process: India supports implementation of the Washington Summit Communiqué and Work Plan. India contributed to the NSS process, including by hosting a meeting of the Sherpas in New Delhi 16-17 January 2012.
063. Statement by the Prime Minister at the Plenary of Nuclear Security Summit.

Seoul, March 27, 2012.

Your Excellency President Lee Myung-bak,

Distinguished Heads of Delegations,

I would like to join others in thanking President Lee Myung-bak for hosting this Summit and for the excellent arrangements made.

India fully shares global concerns on nuclear terrorism and clandestine proliferation, which continue to pose serious threats to international security. At the same time, given India’s growing energy demands, we see nuclear energy as an essential component of our energy mix. Strengthening nuclear security, therefore, assists India’s objective of promoting a safe and secure expansion of civil nuclear energy. We must continue to harness the numerous developmental benefits that nuclear science and technology offer, especially for developing countries.

We are in the process of expanding our nuclear energy generation to 62,000 MWs by 2032. We are taking forward our three stage nuclear programme based on a closed fuel cycle, with new safety features and proliferation-resistant technologies.

We are also determined that our expanded nuclear power programme will follow the highest standards of nuclear safety and security, whose synergy is essential to restore public faith in nuclear energy, especially after the tragic events at Fukushima.

We have undertaken comprehensive reviews of nuclear safety measures at our nuclear facilities. India has invited the Operational Safety Review Teams of the IAEA to assist in its own safety reviews and audit. Nuclear safety evaluations are being put in the public domain to enhance transparency and boost public confidence. We are also in the process of setting up a statutory, independent and autonomous Nuclear Safety Regulatory Authority. We are strengthening emergency preparedness and response to nuclear accidents.

Nuclear terrorism will remain a potent threat as long as there are terrorists seeking to gain access to nuclear material and technologies for malicious purposes. India is acutely conscious of this threat. Our resolution at the General Assembly on measures to deny terrorists access to weapons of mass destruction has been adopted by consensus since 2002.

We support the extension of UN Security Council Resolution 1540 and the work of its Committee and we intend to host a 1540 Workshop during this year to strengthen its implementation.

India is party to the main international legal instruments on nuclear security - the Convention on Physical Protection and its 2005 amendment, as well as the International Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism. We support the universalization of these instruments.

Nuclear security is primarily a national responsibility but there are benefits to be gained by supplementing responsible national actions through sustained and effective international cooperation.

The Washington Communiqué and Work Plan set in place new benchmarks on nuclear security and new frameworks for international cooperation. We welcome the fact that this Summit will expand the scope of such cooperation by greater focus on minimization of High Enriched Uranium, information and transport security, nuclear forensics, preventing illicit nuclear trafficking, assistance for updating national regulations and building capacity for nuclear security.

India has contributed actively to the Nuclear Security Summit process, including by hosting a Sherpa meeting in New Delhi in January this year.

We have made good progress in the establishment of the Global Centre for Nuclear Energy Partnership, which I announced at the Washington Summit. The physical infrastructure for the Centre is being set up. We have commenced ‘off-campus’ courses. Such courses will be held more frequently in the future. We have signed documents for cooperation on the Global Centre with the United States of America, Russia, France and the IAEA.

India is expanding its technical assistance to developing countries, including by providing our indigenously developed Cobalt teletherapy machines - Bhabhatrons - for cancer treatment.

The IAEA has a central role in strengthening the international global nuclear security architecture. I am happy to announce that India will contribute 1 million US dollars to the IAEA’s Nuclear Security Fund for the years 2012-13.

India will participate in the Agency’s 2013 international coordinating conference of various nuclear security activities, including the Global Initiative to Combat Nuclear Terrorism and the Global Partnership.

The best guarantee for nuclear security is a world free from nuclear weapons. Our former Prime Minister, Mr. Rajiv Gandhi, put forward an Action Plan for global nuclear disarmament in a time-bound framework almost 25 years ago. This remains the most comprehensive and elaborate proposal to achieve this objective.
Attaining the goal of a nuclear weapon-free world will require commitments embedded in an agreed multilateral framework involving all states possessing nuclear weapons. This should include measures to reduce nuclear dangers by reducing the salience of nuclear weapons in security doctrines and by increasing universal restraints on the first use of nuclear weapons.

We also support the early commencement of negotiations on a Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty in the Conference of Disarmament in Geneva.

India has never been a source of proliferation of sensitive technologies and we are determined to further strengthen our export control systems to keep them on par with the highest international standards. We have already adhered to the guidelines of the NSG and MTCR. As a like-minded country with the ability and willingness to promote global non-proliferation objectives, we believe that the next logical step is India’s membership of the four export control regimes.

In conclusion, I would like to reiterate India’s commitment to strengthen and improve further the effectiveness of its nuclear safety and security systems and make a significant contribution to the enhancement of the global nuclear security architecture.

Thank you.
We, the leaders, gathered in Seoul on March 26-27, 2012, renew the political commitments generated from the 2010 Washington Nuclear Security Summit to work toward strengthening nuclear security, reducing the threat of nuclear terrorism, and preventing terrorists, criminals, or other unauthorized actors from acquiring nuclear materials. Nuclear terrorism continues to be one of the most challenging threats to international security. Defeating this threat requires strong national measures and international cooperation given its potential global political, economic, social, and psychological consequences.

We reaffirm our shared goals of nuclear disarmament, nuclear nonproliferation and peaceful uses of nuclear energy.

Committed to seeking a safer world for all, we also all share the objective of nuclear security. We recognize that the Nuclear Security Summit is a valuable process at the highest political level, supporting our joint call to secure all vulnerable nuclear material in four years. In this regard, we welcome the substantive progress being made on the political commitments of Participating States since the Washington Summit.

We stress the fundamental responsibility of States, consistent with their respective national and international obligations, to maintain effective security of all nuclear material, which includes nuclear materials used in nuclear weapons, and nuclear facilities under their control, and to prevent non-state actors from acquiring such materials and from obtaining information or technology required to use them for malicious purposes. We likewise recognize the fundamental responsibility of States to maintain effective security of other radioactive materials.

We reaffirm that measures to strengthen nuclear security will not hamper the rights of States to develop and utilize nuclear energy for peaceful purposes.

Noting the essential role of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) in facilitating international cooperation and supporting the efforts of States to fulfill their nuclear security responsibilities, we further stress the importance of regional and international cooperation, and encourage States to promote cooperation with and outreach activities to international partners.

Noting the Fukushima accident of March 2011 and the nexus between nuclear security and nuclear safety, we consider that sustained efforts are required to address the issues of nuclear safety and nuclear security in a coherent manner that will help ensure the safe and secure peaceful uses of nuclear energy.
We will continue to use the Washington Communiqué and Work Plan as a basis for our future work in advancing our nuclear security objectives. At this Seoul Summit, we agree that we will make every possible effort to achieve further progress in the following important areas.

Global Nuclear Security Architecture

1. We recognize the importance of multilateral instruments that address nuclear security, such as the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material (CPPNM), as amended, and the International Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism (ICSANT). We therefore encourage the universal adherence to these Conventions. We urge states in a position to do so to accelerate their domestic approval of the 2005 Amendment to the CPPNM, seeking to bring the Amendment into force by 2014. We acknowledge the important role of the United Nations (UN) in promoting nuclear security, support the UN Security Council Resolutions 1540 and 1977 in strengthening global nuclear security, and welcome the extension of its mandate. We will strive to use the IAEA Physical Protection of Nuclear Material and Nuclear Facilities (INFCIRC/225/Rev.5) document and related Nuclear Security Series documents, and reflect them into national practice.

2. We recognize the contributions since the 2010 Summit of international initiatives and processes such as the Global Initiative to Combat Nuclear Terrorism (GICNT) and Global Partnership against the Spread of Weapons and Materials of Mass Destruction, within their respective mandates and memberships. We welcome the wider participation in the GICNT and the Global Partnership and value its extension beyond 2012. Noting the importance of strengthening coordination and complementarity among nuclear security activities, we welcome the proposal of the IAEA to organize an international conference in 2013. We welcome contributions from the industry, academia, institutes and civil society that promote nuclear security.

Role of the IAEA

3. We reaffirm the essential responsibility and central role of the IAEA in strengthening the international nuclear security framework, and recognize the value of the IAEA Nuclear Security Plan 2010-2013. We will work to ensure that the IAEA continues to have the appropriate structure, resources and expertise needed to support the implementation of nuclear security objectives. To this end, we encourage States in a position to do so and the nuclear industry to increase voluntary contributions to the IAEA’s Nuclear Security Fund, as well as in-kind contributions. We also encourage continued IAEA activities to assist, upon request, national efforts to establish and enhance nuclear security infrastructure through its various support programs, and encourage States to make use of these IAEA resources.
Nuclear Materials

4. Recognizing that highly enriched uranium (HEU) and separated plutonium require special precautions, we reemphasize the importance of appropriately securing, accounting for and consolidating these materials. We also encourage States to consider the safe, secure and timely removal and disposition of nuclear materials from facilities no longer using them, as appropriate, and consistent with national security considerations and development objectives.

5. We recognize that the development, within the framework of the IAEA, of options for national policies on HEU management will advance nuclear security objectives. We encourage States to take measures to minimize the use of HEU, including through the conversion of reactors from highly enriched to low enriched uranium (LEU) fuel, where technically and economically feasible, taking into account the need for assured supplies of medical isotopes, and encourage States in a position to do so, by the end of 2013, to announce voluntary specific actions intended to minimize the use of HEU. We also encourage States to promote the use of LEU fuels and targets in commercial applications such as isotope production, and in this regard, welcome relevant international cooperation on high-density LEU fuel to support the conversion of research and test reactors.

Radioactive Sources

6. Taking into account that radioactive sources are widely used and can be vulnerable to malicious acts, we urge States to secure these materials, while bearing in mind their uses in industrial, medical, agricultural and research applications. To this end, we encourage States in a position to do so to continue to work towards the process of ratifying or acceding to the ICSANT; reflect into national practices relevant IAEA Nuclear Security Series documents, the IAEA Code of Conduct on the Safety and Security of Radioactive Sources and its supplementary document on the IAEA Guidance on the Import and Export of Radioactive Sources; and establish national registers of high-activity radioactive sources where required. We also commit to work closely with the IAEA to encourage cooperation on advanced technologies and systems, share best practices on the management of radioactive sources, and provide technical assistance to States upon their request. In addition, we encourage continued national efforts and international cooperation to recover lost, missing or stolen sources and to maintain control over disused sources.

Nuclear Security and Safety

7. Acknowledging that safety measures and security measures have in common the aim of protecting human life and health and the environment, we affirm that nuclear security and nuclear safety measures should be designed, implemented and managed in nuclear facilities in a coherent and synergistic manner. We also affirm the need to maintain effective emergency preparedness, response and mitigation capabilities in a manner that addresses both nuclear security and nuclear safety. In this regard, we welcome the efforts of the IAEA to organize meetings to provide relevant recommendations on the interface between nuclear security and nuclear safety so that neither security nor safety is compromised. We also welcome the convening of the High Level Meeting on Nuclear Safety and Security initiated by the UN Secretary-General, held in New York on 22 September 2011. Noting that the security of nuclear and other radioactive materials also includes spent nuclear fuel and radioactive waste, we encourage States to consider establishing appropriate plans for the management of these materials.

Transportation Security

8. We will continue efforts to enhance the security of nuclear and other radioactive materials while in domestic and international transport, and encourage States to share best practices and cooperate in acquiring the necessary technologies to this end. Recognizing the importance of a national layered defense against the loss or theft of nuclear and other radioactive materials, we encourage the establishment of effective national nuclear material inventory management and domestic tracking mechanisms, where required, that enable States to take appropriate measures to recover lost and stolen materials.

Combating Illicit Trafficking

9. We underscore the need to develop national capabilities to prevent, detect, respond to and prosecute illicit nuclear trafficking. In this regard, we encourage action-oriented coordination among national capacities to combat illicit trafficking, consistent with national laws and regulations. We will work to enhance technical capabilities in the field of national inspection and detection of nuclear and other radioactive materials at the borders. Noting that several countries have passed export control laws to regulate nuclear transfers, we encourage further utilization of legal, intelligence and financial tools to effectively prosecute offenses, as appropriate and consistent with national laws. In addition, we encourage States to participate in the IAEA Illicit Trafficking Database program and to provide necessary information relating to nuclear and other radioactive materials outside of regulatory control. We will work to strengthen cooperation among States and encourage them to share information, consistent with national regulations, on individuals involved in trafficking offenses of nuclear and other radioactive materials, including through INTERPOL's Radiological and Nuclear Terrorism Prevention Unit and the World Customs Organization.

Nuclear Forensics

10. We recognize that nuclear forensics can be an effective tool in determining the origin of detected nuclear and other radioactive materials and in providing evidence for the prosecution of acts of illicit trafficking and malicious uses. In this regard, we encourage States to work with one another, as well as with the IAEA, to develop and enhance nuclear forensics capabilities. In this regard, they may combine the skills of both traditional and nuclear forensics through the development of a common set of definitions and standards, undertake research and share information and best practices, as appropriate. We also underscore the importance of international cooperation both in technology and human resource development to advance nuclear forensics.

Nuclear Security Culture

11. Recognizing that investment in human capacity building is fundamental to promoting and sustaining a strong nuclear security culture, we encourage States to share best practices and build national capabilities, including through bilateral and multilateral cooperation. At the national level, we encourage all stakeholders, including the government, regulatory bodies, industry, academia, non-governmental organizations and the media, to fully commit to enhancing security culture and to maintain robust communication and coordination of activities. We also encourage States to promote human resource development through education and training. In this regard, we welcome the establishment of Centers of Excellence and other nuclear security training and support centers since the Washington Summit, and encourage the establishment of new centers. Furthermore, we welcome the effort by the IAEA to promote networking among such centers to share experience and lessons learned and to optimize available resources. We also note the holding of the Nuclear Industry Summit and the Nuclear Security Symposium on the eve of the Seoul Nuclear Security Summit.

Information Security

12. We recognize the importance of preventing non-state actors from obtaining information, technology or expertise required to acquire or use nuclear materials for malicious purposes, or to disrupt information technology based control systems at nuclear facilities. We therefore encourage States to: continue to develop and strengthen national and facility-level measures for the effective management of such information, including information on the procedures and protocols to protect nuclear materials and facilities; to support relevant capacity building projects; and to enhance cyber security measures concerning nuclear facilities, consistent with the IAEA General Conference Resolution on Nuclear Security (GC (55)/Res/10) and bearing in mind the International Telecommunication Union Resolution 174. We also encourage States to: promote a security culture that emphasizes the need to protect nuclear security related information; engage with scientific, industrial and academic communities in the pursuit of common solutions; and support the IAEA in producing and disseminating improved guidance on protecting information.
International Cooperation

13. We encourage all States to enhance their physical protection of and accounting system for nuclear materials, emergency preparedness and response capabilities and relevant legal and regulatory framework. In this context, we encourage the international community to increase international cooperation and to provide assistance, upon request, to countries in need on a bilateral, regional, and multilateral level, as appropriate. In particular, we welcome the intent by the IAEA to continue to lead efforts to assist States, upon request. We also reaffirm the need for various public diplomacy and outreach efforts to enhance public awareness of actions taken and capacities built to address threats to nuclear security, including the threat of nuclear terrorism.

We will continue to make voluntary and substantive efforts toward strengthening nuclear security and implementing political commitments made in this regard. We welcome the information on the progress made in the field of nuclear security since the Washington Summit provided by the participants at this Seoul Summit. The next Nuclear Security Summit will be held in [the Netherlands] in 2014.
Keynote Address by Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai at the Institute for Defence Studies and Analyses (IDSA) National Export Control Seminar.

New Delhi, April 18, 2012.

Director General IDSA,

Excellencies and

Distinguished participants,

I am happy to speak at the National Export Control Seminar today, which is being organized jointly by the Ministry of External Affairs and the Institute for Defence Studies and Analysis. I would like to thank DG IDSA for the excellent arrangements his Institute has put in place and for bringing together a wide range of participants - government officials from all Departments dealing with export controls, representatives from industry, analysts and scholars from the research and academic communities as well as foreign experts who will be participating in today's deliberations. I would like to recognize the presence of members of the diplomatic corps, in particular representatives of countries currently chairing the various multilateral export control regimes.

Let me begin by addressing a simple but fundamental question. Why are export controls important for India?

We have for long recognized the challenge proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery poses for our national security and world order. The danger of terrorists gaining access to WMDs has added another facet to this grave threat. At the same time as a responsible member, India is committed to promoting and working with the international community in advancing the common objectives of global non-proliferation and international security.

Flowing from these considerations of national and international security and as a state possessing advanced and sensitive materials and technology, we are conscious of the need for responsible handling of these sensitive items from the point of production or manufacture, to their use internally or export abroad and eventual safe and secure disposition. India has no interest what so ever in aiding or abetting proliferation of WMDs, the misuse of dual use items or in non-state actors or terrorists gaining access to sensitive items. On the contrary we view a strong and effective national export control system as an essential link between our broader national security goals and our wider foreign policy objectives.

There is a second and equally compelling rationale for export controls. Just as export controls are vital for national security and global non-proliferation objectives, they are also essential for the pursuit of growth and national development by harnessing the benefits of globalization. Export control standards are increasingly the norm for global trade in sensitive material, equipment and technology and thus necessary if we are to increase the quantum of high technology items in our external trade and commercial exchanges. As India’s integration with global trade patterns and supply chains deepens, it would increasingly become an important hub of manufacturing and export of high technology items. Foreign investment including through offsets for governmental procurement will strengthen our global links. Our export control system would add to the reliability and credibility of Indian companies in the global market and thus increase their competitive edge. High technology companies would invest in India confident that apart from favorable commercial returns, access to a huge market and skilled workforce and protection of IPR, there would be no risk of unauthorized diversion or re-exports. That export controls are an added burden on industry is a mistaken and short sighted notion. At the same time, Government is conscious that there be no unreasonable restrictions on legitimate trade and commercial activities and export control procedures are clear and implementable without undue delays.

Let me describe briefly India’s export control framework. India has a law based export system covering about 9 different legislations. I will mention only the most important: the Foreign Trade Development and Regulation Act or FTDR of 1992, the Atomic Energy Act of 1962, the Customs Act of 1962 and the Weapons of Mass destruction Act of 2005. Systematic dual use control lists in India were first notified in 1995 and were named as SMET - “Special Material, Equipment and Technology”, published under our Foreign Trade Act. This list has subsequently been revised in 1999, 2005 and 2007 and is widely known as “SCOMET” – Special Chemicals, Organisms, Material, Equipment and Technology - List.

I would like to highlight a few points with respect to more recent developments.
Our WMD Act of 2005 incorporated into national legislation key international standards in export controls, covering technology transfers, end-user or “catch-all” controls, brokering, transshipment and transit controls. In 2010, these changes were translated into our Foreign Trade Act through an amendment adopted by our Parliament which widened the ambit of dual-use controls. Second, the harmonization of SCOMET controls with the Nuclear Suppliers Group and Missile Technology Control Regime guidelines and annexes was notified in 2008. Our export controls are thus in line with the highest international standards and in some cases, in view of the generic coverage of controlled items or controls at the stage of manufacturing, they extend beyond the controls of the multilateral regimes. Third, our regulatory framework is updated regularly, for example following adoption of UN Security Council resolutions 1874 and 1929. Fourth, we have increased engagement with various countries and our participation in international and regional export control seminars and conferences. This engagement includes the four multilateral export control regimes, which I will return to a bit later in my speech.

In terms of implementation, an Inter-Ministerial Working Group coordinated by the Directorate General of Foreign Trade administers the SCOMET regulations. The regulations outline the procedure, process and factors relating to the licensing of controlled items. The licensing process is rigorous and involves assessment of export applications by various departments. Due restraint and responsibility in the transfer of sensitive systems and technologies is exercised based on a dynamic risk assessment system and changing proliferation trends.

It is true that any export control system is as good as its enforcement on the ground. Our national enforcement mechanisms cover prevention, detection and penalization of unauthorized exports. Customs and other enforcement agencies are active participants in these efforts. These activities are coordinated through an inter-agency Core Group which meets periodically to review these issues. As part of our regular review of implementation of export controls, we are looking at updating our control lists, strengthening national capacity through training for enforcement officials, commodity identification support and installation of detection equipment at ports and border checkpoints and other measures. The DGFT is in the process of introducing by June this year an online application system that would not only further ease the application process but also facilitate implementation.

We believe that industry is the first line of defence in terms of effective export controls. Industry outreach is an important area not only to enhance understanding about export controls among producers and exporters of controlled items but also share best practices in internal control systems for due diligence at the level of companies. This requires a continuous effort in various parts of the country, involving even small and medium enterprises. Industry leadership is important and the Ministry of External Affairs was pleased to support a Confederation of Indian Industry (CII) event last month on export controls. I am glad to note that the CII is working on a voluntary “Code of Conduct” on export controls, which can be a useful guide as companies work on strengthening their internal compliance systems. India is also open to cooperating with other countries in sharing of experiences and best practices in export controls.

With this brief survey of the national scene, let me return to the international aspects of export controls. India shares global non-proliferation objectives and supports strengthening the non-proliferation regime. Since 2002, we have been piloting a UN First Committee resolution on “Measures to prevent terrorists from acquiring WMDs” which is traditionally adopted by consensus. We supported the extension of the mandate of the 1540 Committee pursuant to UNSC resolution 1540. An eminent Indian expert worked as part of the Expert Group of the 1540 Committee from 2007-09. We have also announced our intention to host a UNSCR 1540 workshop to strengthen the implementation of the resolution. India has contributed to the success of the Nuclear Security Summit process. Our Prime Minister has participated in both the Summits held in Washington in April 2010 and in Seoul in March 2012. In January this year, I hosted a Sherpa meeting involving more than 50 countries in New Delhi to prepare for the Seoul Nuclear Security Summit. India has joined the Global Initiative to Combat Nuclear Terrorism and participates in all its activities. India has also participated in the preparatory process for negotiating an Arms Trade Treaty at the UN. India is in full compliance with its obligations as a State Party to the Chemical Weapons Convention and the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention.

India’s impeccable non-proliferation record has been widely recognized and was reflected in the milestone NSG decision of September 2008 on Civil Nuclear Cooperation with India. With respect to India’s implementation of the Statement on Civil Nuclear cooperation, I would like to mention the following:

- India concluded the Safeguards Agreement with IAEA which entered into force in May 2009.
- An Additional Protocol was also approved by the Board of Governors in March 2009 and signed in May 2009. India is committed to its ratification as soon as necessary internal preparatory work is completed.
- With respect to implementation of the Separation Plan, we have already put 12 out of 14 reactors under IAEA Safeguards. Only two more reactors are required to be notified by 2014.
- India has signed civil nuclear cooperation agreements with France, US, Russia, Canada, Argentina, UK, Namibia, Mongolia, Kazakhstan and ROK. Negotiations are taking place with Japan on a bilateral Nuclear Cooperation Agreement. India and the United States signed an Agreement setting out Arrangements and Procedures for Reprocessing pursuant to their bilateral Nuclear Cooperation Agreement in July 2010.
- India has adhered to the NSG and MTCR guidelines and will maintain adherence. India has continued with its policy of refraining from transfer of enrichment and reprocessing technologies to states that do not possess them and supporting international efforts to limit their spread. We supported the establishment of an IAEA fuel bank resolution contained in Gov/2010/68 adopted by the IAEA Board in December 2010 and resolution GOV/2011/16 adopted by the Board of Governors in March 2011. India has the capabilities to be a supplier state.
India has a longstanding commitment to complete, universal, non-discriminatory and verifiable elimination of nuclear weapons in a time bound manner- a vision that was set forth in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan. We remain committed to a voluntary and unilateral moratorium on nuclear explosive testing. We are also committed to work together for the commencement of negotiations in the Conference on Disarmament on a multilateral, universal, non-discriminatory and verifiable Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty.

To sum up, India has consistent record of implementation of its voluntary commitments and has made progress since September 2008 in the implementation of the Civil Nuclear Initiative.

In November 2010, India expressed interest in taking forward this engagement with the international community to the next phase of seeking membership of the four export control regimes - NSG, MTCR, Australia Group and the Wassenaar Arrangement. We are aware that there are regime specificities. Each regime has its own membership criteria, control lists and methodology of work. But at the same time, there are underlying objectives and principles which are common to all the regimes to which India subscribes to fully as it has demonstrated responsible non-proliferation and export control practices and has shown the ability and willingness to contribute substantially to global non-proliferation objectives. In this sense, India is a ‘like-minded’ country that shares the same objectives and goals. Further, in a material sense given the size of India’s industry and its projected growth, it is clear that India has the ability to produce, manufacture or supply a vast majority of items that are controlled by these regimes. As India’s integration with the global supply chains moves forward, it would be in the interest of the four regimes that India’s exports are subject to the same framework as other major supplier countries. Third, India has the ability to enforce a legally based domestic export control system which gives effect to the commitment to act in accordance with the respective guidelines of the regimes. Finally, India has developed considerable experience in the implementation of its export control system. We have witnessed instances of would-be proliferators targeting India to source or route their supplies; our agencies have taken appropriate preventive action in such cases. We believe that India’s participation in discussions relating to proliferation assessments, trends, licensing experiences, enforcement issues, etc. will be mutually beneficial.

We appreciate the support extended by a number of countries for the objective of India’s full membership of the four export control regimes, in particular the United States, Russian Federation and France. While we wish to move forward in tandem on all the four regimes, our engagement with NSG is seen by observers as the most important. India cannot be a target of regime based restrictions.
The logical conclusion of partnership with India is its full membership of the four multilateral regimes.

India has engaged actively with all the four regimes through outreach meetings. This year, we have already completed outreach meetings with NSG in Vienna where I led the Indian delegation (March 1), and in Delhi with MTCR (30 January) and the Wassenaar Arrangement (21 March) and plan the next outreach meeting with the Australia Group in the coming weeks. From India’s point of view, the main purpose and primary objective of India’s enhanced and sustained engagement with these regimes is full membership. We will take forward this process of engagement and apply for membership when the necessary preparations have been completed and the ground has been prepared for India’s full membership. We believe that India’s membership of the four regimes will be mutually beneficial on grounds of common non-proliferation objectives, India’s ability to contribute to the fulfillment of those objectives, global industry cooperation and linkages, transfers subject to the highest export control standards, sound commercial considerations and the contributions that the Indian industry can make with its expanding capabilities and highly qualified work force.

Let me conclude by quoting from Prime Ministers’ statement at the Seoul Nuclear Security Summit last month. He said:

“India has never been a source of proliferation of sensitive technologies and we are determined to further strengthen our export control systems to keep them on par with the highest international standards. We have already adhered to the guidelines of the NSG and MTCR. As a like-minded country with the ability and willingness to promote global non-proliferation objectives, we believe that the next logical step is India’s membership of the four export control regimes.”

Seminars like this are most valuable in bringing together policy makers, administrators, experts and industry to assess various dimensions of export controls, as listed in the Programme. You have a full agenda for today’s seminar and I wish you success in your deliberations.

Thank you.
Inaugural Address by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the National Outreach Conference on Global Nuclear Disarmament

New Delhi, August 21, 2012.

Shri Shiv Shankar Menon, National Security Advisor, Shri Mani Shankar Aiyar, Chairman, Prime Minister’s Informal Group on Global Nuclear Disarmament, Shri Gopalkrishna Gandhi,
Shri Rajiv Bhatia, Director General, ICWA,

Ladies and Gentlemen, and Dear Students,

I would like to thank Shri Rajiv Bhatia, Director General of the Indian Council of World Affairs, for organizing this National Outreach Conference on Global Nuclear Disarmament to mark late Shri Rajiv Gandhi’s birth anniversary. I would like to convey my appreciation to Shri Mani Shankar Aiyar and other members of the Informal Group which prepared a Report on the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan in August last year. It is indeed an honour that the Hon’ble Vice President of India will be addressing this Conference later this afternoon.

Our first Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru had a deep commitment to world peace, development and disarmament. He was aware that the power of the atom could advance human welfare but could also be used for destructive purposes. He was among the first world leaders to espouse the cause of nuclear disarmament and the cessation of all nuclear tests as early as 1954. During her tenure as Prime Minister Smt Indira Gandhi made untiring efforts to galvanize international opinion in favour of nuclear disarmament.

Ladies and Gentlemen, and Dear Students,

Shri Rajiv Gandhi strove during his lifetime to prepare India for the 21st century as a modern and technologically advanced country among the comity of nations in a nuclear weapon free and non-violent world order. Addressing the Third Special Session of the UN General Assembly on Disarmament in 1988, he proposed a visionary Action Plan which if implemented would have rid the world of all weapons of mass destruction by 2010.

While our quest for global nuclear disarmament has been an integral part of our independent foreign policy, it is a painful reality that achieving a nuclear weapon free world has remained a distant goal. Rampant proliferation in our extended neighbourhood and the persistence of nuclear weapons in the arsenals of other nuclear weapon states, even after the end of the Cold War, compelled India to exercise its nuclear option after showing exemplary restraint for over three decades.

Ladies and Gentlemen, and Dear Students,

Nuclear weapons today are an integral part of our national security and will remain so, pending non-discriminatory and global nuclear disarmament. As a responsible nuclear power, we have a credible minimum deterrence policy and a posture of no-first use. We refuse to participate in an arms race, including a nuclear arms race.

We have maintained our voluntary and unilateral moratorium on nuclear explosive testing and are prepared to negotiate an FMCT in the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva. We are committed to working with the international community to advance our common objectives of non-proliferation, including through strong export controls and membership of the multilateral export regimes.

As a nuclear weapon state, India’s support for global, non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament has not diminished. As Prime Minister Dr Manmohan Singh said “Despite changes in Government and changes in political leadership, we have always tempered the exercise of our strategic autonomy with a sense of global responsibility and with a commitment to ideals of general and complete disarmament, including nuclear disarmament. The possession of nuclear weapons only increases our sense of responsibility and does not diminish it.”

Ladies and Gentlemen, and Dear Students,

India has taken a number of measures including tabling a Working Paper on Nuclear Disarmament in the General Assembly in 2006. This Working Paper contains a number of proposals which retain the spirit and substance of the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan to take us closer, in a step by step process, for achieving nuclear disarmament in a time-bound, universal, non-discriminatory, phased and verifiable manner. There is need for a universal commitment and an agreed multilateral framework that is global and non-discriminatory. There is need for a meaningful dialogue among all states possessing nuclear weapons to build the necessary trust and confidence and for reducing the salience of nuclear weapons in international affairs and security doctrines. We believe that progressive steps are needed for the de-legitimization of nuclear weapons before they are eliminated.

Pending the elimination of nuclear weapons, it is necessary to reduce nuclear risks especially of terrorists gaining access to sensitive materials and technology and even nuclear weapons. India has contributed actively to the Nuclear Security Summit Process launched by President Obama in 2010. Our resolution on this subject in the UN General Assembly has received consensus support since it was tabled in 2002.

Global nuclear disarmament continues to be a priority in our interactions, be it at the UN Security Council, General Assembly or the Disarmament Commission, the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva or groupings such as the NAM. This subject is also discussed in bilateral dialogues with a number of countries across the spectrum- nuclear weapon states, non-nuclear weapon states, developed as well as developing states, states from afar as well as neighbours. India has a consistent position on nuclear disarmament and is heard with respect in world capitals.

Ladies and Gentlemen, and Dear Students,

The Report prepared by the Informal Group on the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan, under the Chairmanship of Shri Mani Shankar Aiyar has made a number of recommendations most of which are consistent with existing government policies. The Report underlines that there is no contradiction between India as a nuclear weapon state and its support for global nuclear disarmament. In fact, our message carries greater weight in global forums.

As a national priority, nuclear disarmament must combine principle and pragmatism in our foreign interactions based on careful analysis of global trends. At the same time, we must build public understanding and support within the country. When Shri Aiyar ji met me in January this year, I said that the Ministry of External Affairs would be happy to extend support to an ICWA National Conference to be held in Delhi, to generate discussion and debate in the country and encourage awareness and research about global nuclear disarmament. I am pleased that such a Conference is being held to mark Shri Rajiv Gandhi’s birth anniversary.

I am particularly gratified that students and scholars from a number of schools and universities are participating in the Conference and will have an opportunity to listen and debate key issues related to global nuclear disarmament. I would like to congratulate ICWA, the Chair and members of the Informal Group, various Ministries of the Government of India and of the Delhi Government as all participating schools and universities for their support and their commitment. I wish the Conference every success.

Thank you.
067. Address of Vice President at the National Outreach Conference on global Nuclear Disarmament”.

New Delhi, August 21, 2012.

“This is a timely initiative. It is doubly relevant because it is focused on the young people, on those who will shoulder in greater measure the consequences of action or inaction that can make or break dreams for a better, brighter, world of tomorrow.

All of you in this audience, and many more of our young citizens not present here, are familiar with the teachings of saints, philosophers and scientists about human nature. Each of the traits identified by them – that the human being is social, rational, moral - is valid; the difficulty is that they some time do not converge and thereby force us to choose.

These choices are made in space and time, in circumstances that vary, and in time spans that may or may not be adequate. It is also conditioned by a belief in some quarters that humans have a reservoir of aggressive energy.

These “givens” about human nature and human societies need to be questioned. A group of behavioural scientists who met in Seville in Spain in 1986 concluded that there is no scientific basis for the belief that humans are naturally aggressive and warlike. They and many others are of the view that external stimulation, rather than spontaneous internal impulses, leads to aggressive behaviour.

Despite this, the history of human societies does tell us that war is endemic; also that periods of perpetual peace have been few and far in between. Another unpalatable truth is that the inventive aspect of human genius has often excelled in improving the instruments of war-making, and by implication, of death and destruction.

This propensity touched its apogee in the twentieth century, described by an eminent strategic thinker as “mankind’s most bloody and hateful century” in which “cruelty was institutionalised to an unprecedented degree (and) lethality was organised on a mass production basis.”

The most potent instrument of death emerged in the form of atomic bombs, used on Hiroshima and Nagasaki in August 1945. Writing a few months later, in July 1946, Mahatma Gandhi said “the moral to be legitimately drawn from the supreme tragedy of the bomb is that it will not be destroyed by counter bombs”.

These words of Gandhiji became the foundational principle of India’s policy. As early as 1948 we called for the elimination of atomic weapons from national armaments and limiting the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes.

It was our late Prime Minister, Smt. Indira Gandhi, presiding over the Seventh Non-aligned Summit in 1983 in this very hall, who reminded the world that:
“The hood of the cobra is spread. Humankind watches in frozen fear, hoping against hope that it will not strike. Never before has the earth faced so much death and destruction.”

She called for universal, time-bound nuclear disarmament, describing the Non-aligned Movement as “the biggest peace movement in the world.”

In June 1988 Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi proposed an “Action Plan for Ushering in a Nuclear Weapon free and Non-Violent World Order”. Its great virtue was that it was realistic, time-bound, and non-discriminatory. He was the first world statesman to lay before the international community a detailed and workable plan for the elimination of nuclear weapons. An amazing quarter century later, he continues to be the only Head of State or Government ever to have done so.

The global debate in the past three decades has been characterised by both sophistication and sophistry. Much lip service has been paid to the need for nuclear disarmament. Public protest movements in the United States and several European countries emerged but failed to make a lasting impact. In the meantime, the number of declared and undeclared nuclear weapon powers has increased with the threat of further proliferation looming large on the horizon.

In 1996, and on a reference from the UN General Assembly about the “Legality of the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons”, the International Court of Justice at the Hague ruled by eight votes to seven that “it cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defence, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake”. The Court also held, unanimously, that there exists an obligation to pursue in good faith and bring to a conclusion negotiations leading to nuclear disarmament under strict and effective international control.

In its submission before the Court, India had contended that “the threat or use of nuclear weapons in any circumstance, whether as a means or method of warfare or otherwise, is illegal or unlawful under international law”.

In October 2006 India presented a Working Paper in the UN focused on building confidence in the international community for universal, non-discriminatory and verifiable nuclear disarmament.

Some other developments are worthy of note. In January 2007 four eminent American “Cold War warriors” stated publicly that reliance on nuclear weapons for purposes of deterrence “is becoming increasingly hazardous and decreasingly effective”. They suggested a set of specific measures that the United States should take to give shape to a vision of a world free of nuclear weapons.

In April 2009 in Prague US President Barak Obama outlined his vision of a world without nuclear weapons. Initiatives have also emanated from the UN Secretary General and the Inter-Parliamentary Union.

It has now become abundantly clear that the debate has progressed; also that its thrust has to move from whether to how.

Given this background, I am glad the Indian Council of World Affairs has chosen to celebrate the 68th birth anniversary of Shri Rajiv Gandhi in this befitting manner.

Indeed, now that India has become a State with Nuclear Weapons, its credibility to raise the issue of Global Nuclear Disarmament is even higher. India has thus become the first and thus far only nuclear power to be in the forefront of unambiguously advocating a detailed, eminently practical and comprehensive roadmap to rid the world of the danger of instant annihilation.

The validity of the case for non-proliferation rests essentially on the Nuclear Weapon States demonstrating their commitment to the processes envisaged in Article VI of the NPT to cap, reduce and eventually eliminate their capacity to make war with nuclear weapons. While these countries have been zealous in pursuing and enforcing the goal of horizontal non-proliferation, they have been regrettably tardy in preventing and reversing vertical non-proliferation.

It was in this context that Prime Minister Manmohan Singh constituted a Group of experts, headed by Shri Mani Shankar Aiyar, who had been associated with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi’s initiative in 1988, to examine ways in which the ideas contained in the Action Plan might best be pursued in contemporary times.

The Group, taking full note of the Working Paper circulated by the Indian delegation to the UN General Assembly in 2006, and subsequently to the Disarmament Conference in Geneva, has concluded that the several aspects of the diplomatic, political and military situation in the world are far more favourable today than they have been at any time since Hiroshima and Nagasaki to pursue India’s traditional nuclear disarmament agenda with all deliberate speed. It has found that although full commitment to the Indian goal of universal, time-bound, phased and verifiable nuclear disarmament is still to be endorsed in its entirety, more governments than ever before, especially governments of Nuclear Weapon States, backed by an unprecedented upsurge of public opinion and a host of Non-Governmental Organizations and think-tanks in these countries, is prepared to work towards ending the omnipresent threat to the survival of humankind and our Planet Earth by ridding ourselves of weapons of mass destruction.

Ironically, at this juncture that is more favourable than the since the onset of the Cold war to working towards meaningful disarmament, the permanent Conference on Disarmament in Geneva is deadlocked over the question of a Fissile Materials Cut-Off Treaty. Therefore, the Report of the Group has recommended that:

- India might initiate a series of bilateral dialogues with strategic and other partners, moving progressively outwards from the core States, that is, the United States and the Russian Federation, who between them hold about 90% of all nuclear weapon stockpiles, through a series of concentric circles of Nuclear Weapon States; then, States with Nuclear Weapons; to States with nuclear umbrellas; and Non-Nuclear Weapon States to advocating the cause of multilateral negotiations to secure an international convention on nuclear disarmament, even as earlier agreements have been secured to ban other weapons of mass destruction such as chemical weapons.

- As the time is not ripe for initiating multilateral negotiations in the Conference on Disarmament, India might initiate a series of mutually reinforcing bilateral dialogues aimed at eventually setting the stage for multilateral discussions in Geneva, leading from there, hopefully, to such a raising of the pitch of world opinion that the commencement of multilateral negotiations is facilitated.

- The importance be emphasised of harnessing the growing power of civil society, especially in the United States and other Nuclear Weapon States, in favour of sharp reductions in nuclear arsenals, leading, hopefully, to the eventual dismantlement of nuclear stockpiles and ending the manufacture of these dreadful weapons.

The Report is admittedly idealistic in its hopes and ambitions – but not impractical. From this arises the need to build public opinion in favour of a major thrust by India in this direction. This Outreach Conference, which has brought together over 1500 students and faculty from over 30 institutions of higher education, is the first step in a long voyage that will take these and other experts to campuses and think tanks all around the country to raise awareness among the youth of our country of the very important issues of the survival of our species involved in questions of nuclear disarmament.

A word of caution here would be in order. The distinction between nuclear weapons and nuclear energy for peaceful purposes must never be lost. The former is destructive while the latter opens doors to innumerable benefits for the good of mankind. The latter, if utilised prudently, can be of immense benefit to humanity.

We cannot allow the present and succeeding generations to remain content with our having become a State with Nuclear Weapons, but recognize that notwithstanding this immense scientific, technological and strategic achievement, an India with nuclear weapons remains as vulnerable as a world with nuclear weapons to error, accident or deliberate decision plunging all of us – belligerent nations or innocent bystanders - into unimagined disaster.

The fact is, as the Report states – and I quote:

There is need for public education on nuclear disasters and incidents including a nuclear attack, and the need for a scientific Indian evaluation of the long-term, indirect impact of a nuclear attack or war. There is an easy public acceptance of the need to keep nuclear weapons for India’s protection, but almost no awareness in the public mind of the specific consequences of a nuclear conflict.

And the Report then concludes:

India must continue to pursue its vision of a non-nuclear world since a Nuclear-Weapons-Free world would be good for the Planet, good for the region and good for India.

It is this perception that provides the rationale for today’s conclave involving so many young people. It is for you to imbibe the message, propagate it, enhance support for it and thereby lend a hand in the quest for a safer future. This objective goes beyond governmental policies and may even require some calibrated coaxing.

It is, after all, a matter of moral and practical necessity and leaves no room for wavering or tentativeness.

I thank the Indian Council for World Affairs for giving me the opportunity of sharing my thoughts with this audience. I wish them all success in their endeavour.

Opening Statement by Foreign Secretary at the 1540 Workshop on Building New Synergies on Nuclear Security.

New Delhi, November 30, 2012.

Excellencies
Ladies and Gentlemen,

It gives me pleasure to extend a warm welcome to all participants to this “1540 Workshop on building New Synergies on Nuclear Security” being hosted by India in cooperation with the UNODA. I am glad that the UNSG’s High Representative on Disarmament Her Excellency Angela Kane is participating in this Workshop.

We are pleased that all members of the UN Security Council, including the five incoming non-permanent members, the UNODA, a representative of the 1540 Committee and the IAEA as well as the three chairs of the Nuclear Security Summits are represented here today. India’s initiative to host this Workshop was announced by India’s Prime Minister Dr Manmohan Singh during the Nuclear Security Summit in Seoul, in March this year. It is intended to bring together important stakeholders for a brain-storming session for building synergies that would contribute to the overall objectives of nuclear security. This Workshop is an important event in the calendar of activities during this month when India is holding the Presidency of the UNSC.

This Workshop is in keeping with India’s support of international efforts aimed at addressing the challenges posed by nuclear terrorism to international peace and security. As a victim of terrorism for over three decades, we are fully cognizant of the catastrophic dangers that transfers of WMDs to non-state and terrorists could entail.

The international community must join hands in eliminating the risks relating to sensitive materials and technologies falling into hands of terrorists and non-state actors. The focus on non-state actors should in no way diminish state accountability in combating terrorism, dismantling its support infrastructure or its linkages with WMD. India has highlighted the need for early conclusion of negotiations on the Draft Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism at the UN.

India has supported the adoption of UNSC 1977 extending the mandate of the 1540 Committee until 2012. Full implementation of UNSCR 1540 would contribute significantly to international efforts to deny non-state actors the ability to carry out acts of nuclear terrorism or gaining nuclear weapons or other weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery. The UN Security Council has continued to be engaged on nuclear security including through a Presidential Statement issued in April this year.

UNSC resolution 1540 is in line with our own General Assembly resolution "Measures to prevent terrorists from gaining access to WMD", adopted by consensus every year since it was first introduced in 2002. This year it was co-sponsored by 67 countries in the First Committee, including several countries participating in this Workshop.

India has enacted a number of effective laws and regulations and has put in place institutionalized administrative mechanisms to prohibit WMD access to terrorists and non state actors.

India is committed to maintaining effective national export controls consistent with the highest international standards and is prepared to make its contribution as a full member of the respective multilateral export control regimes.

India filed its report on UNSCR 1540 in November 2004 and has submitted periodic updates. An Indian Expert participated in the work of the 1540 Committee between 2007 and 2009. India has participated in 1540-related activities such as a Workshop on UNSCR 1540 implementation held jointly by US and Sri Lanka in Colombo in June 2009.

It was my privilege to represent India at the High Level Meeting called by the UNSG on Countering Nuclear Terrorism with a specific focus on strengthening the Legal Framework held in New York on 28 September 2012. The objectives of this High Level Meeting were in accordance with the United Nations Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy and the IAEA’s Nuclear Security Plan.

We support the broadest possible adherence by states to the International Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism and the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material and its 2005 Amendment.

We welcomed the initiative of President Obama to host the first Nuclear Security Summit in Washington in April 2010 which in many respects set new benchmarks for international cooperation on nuclear security.

The NSS process, through the second Summit in Seoul in March this year as well as the Sherpa meetings held regularly, including the one in New Delhi in January this year have helped in building pragmatic and purposeful frameworks and in fostering international cooperation.

We support the fundamental and central role of the IAEA in strengthening the international nuclear security framework. The Agency must be given the necessary authority, resources and manpower to implement the goals and priorities enumerated by the DG in his Report on Nuclear Security 2012. The Agency can also play a central role in ensuring coordination of international activities in the field of nuclear security.

India supports the initiative of the Director General of the IAEA to hold a Meeting on Nuclear Security in July next year and intends to participate at the Ministerial level. India has contributed one million dollars for the Agency's Nuclear Security Fund. We are making progress in the establishment of the Global Centre for Nuclear Energy Partnership which will have international training in the field of nuclear security as one of its main activities.

India is also a participant in various activities of the Global Initiative to Combating Nuclear Terrorism since joining it in 2008. The GCINT has been doing useful work in the fields of nuclear detection, nuclear forensics and response and mitigation.

The Global Partnership against the Spread of Weapons and Materials of Mass Destruction has extended its mandate to 2021 and is active in a number of areas of relevance to nuclear security, including providing equipment, expertise and training.

The primary responsibility for ensuring nuclear security rests at the national level, but national responsibility must be accompanied by responsible behavior by States. We should respect national legal frameworks and national practices and processes but at the same time foster an enabling international cooperative framework.

The expressed need of states for assistance and capacity building should be promptly and effectively met. Assistance and cooperation for States requesting such assistance is a key element of the implementation process. Such assistance programmes should be suited to specific national or regional requirements. The focus of this Workshop is on building new synergies on nuclear security. While there are a number of international initiatives, there is no single silver bullet that would address the full range of challenges or needs of states. There is need to respect the different memberships and mandates of various initiatives but yet energize efforts towards our common and shared goals.

Optimal use and spread of resources will require not only avoidance of duplication but also ensuring that limited funds are used for maximum benefit. A science and technology based approach to nuclear security should go hand in hand with human resource development, training and sharing of best practices. The 1540 Committee based on its eleventh Programme of Work approved in August this year could play a useful role in raising awareness, providing assistance and cooperation with relevant international organizations in the field of nuclear security.
Our objective is to build an international norm of nuclear security that is universally shared and effectively implemented at the national, regional and international levels. An inclusive outreach process ensuring the involvement and participation of all states will be essential for long term and sustained progress on nuclear security. This question in particular was discussed most recently at the Istanbul Sherpa meeting in relation to the future of the NSS after the Summit in 2014.

The programme for the Workshop has been designed so as to provide ample opportunity for interactive and focused discussions spread over three sessions. Though formal agreed conclusions are not an objective for this Workshop we hope that all participants will make the most of this informal but inclusive setting for a free and frank exchange of views. Later this evening it will be my pleasure to host a reception to which all of you are cordially invited.

Once again a warm welcome to Delhi, and to the Ministry of External Affairs. Thank you.

Mr Yadav

Distinguished invitees, experts, members of media, ladies and gentlemen

I am really thankful to TERI and the Climate Change Forum for having given me this opportunity to talk to you today morning on an issue that deserves, commands and actually does engage considerable attention, as it should in our country and all over the world. It has become a focal point of intense national and international debate and will command special attention in the public discourse in our country in the coming years.

TERI is perhaps one of the most symbolic places in the country where we can focus upon the fact that climate change will and does impact upon virtually every aspect of life in our country, something that is vitally important for one country both internationally and in our relationships with rest of the world and further world at large. The very fact that so many of our colleagues from media are here shows how much public involvement and interest exists in this issue and I am really anxious that the debate should extend to the furthest possible space in our country so that everybody has an idea of what our country is doing. To that extent I am very grateful to TERI for having given me this opportunity because I know I have not addressed the media after our country went to Durban with the mandate of the cabinet. I believe that we, India, played an extremely constructive role both for India and as the voice of the developing world which was well received, still talked about and which I believe we will take forward in all future engagements.

The topic chosen by the Forum “From Bali to Durban and Beyond” is both topical and challenging.

I had made a statement in the Parliament on this subject immediately after my return from Durban. I am delighted that this Forum now gives me the space to express my views on the subject outside the Parliament.
I consider it critical that the public in our country understands clearly the issues underlying the decisions taken at Durban and is conscious of its implications and the possible approaches. To help this process, we have recently put out a list of Frequently Asked Questions (FAQ) in relation to Durban and Climate Change on the website of our Ministry. I recommend that you visit this website and read the material. Full clarity and a public debate on these issues are necessary in order to build a momentum for a sustainable and safer future for the coming generations both in India and across the globe. I welcome all inputs because we would like to understand what everybody is thinking on this. I firmly believe that our role is pivotal in what the world can do.

Durban was distinguished for various reasons. The intense and long-drawn negotiations in Durban ended with two major sets of outcomes. I would like to place, in the first stream of outcomes, the decisions relating to the Bali Road Map and the Cancun Agreements. The second stream relates to the new process initiated under the Durban Platform.

As for the first stream, we were able to operationalise many of the Bali and Cancun decisions. Amongst these, the most important were those relating to the Green Climate Fund, the Technology Mechanism and the Adaptation Framework. These were key decisions, particularly from developing countries point of view. These decisions address, not fully but in some measure, the long pending issues of finance, technology and adaptation agreed in the Bali Action Plan. We reinforced it, we created a structure, there are issues of undercapitalization, however we have to understand that the structure was created and Green Climate Fund was operationalized inspite of a global economic recession.

As part of the Durban package, we also put into place guidelines for transparency arrangements that were originally not a part of the Bali action Plan. These had been added to our Agenda in Cancun following the Copenhagen Accord in which our partners from developed countries had insisted on such confidence building measures in exchange for their promise to make emission reduction pledges and provide required finance to developing countries.

But, the most important gain from Durban and probably the least talked about in this stream was the establishment of the second commitment period under the Kyoto Protocol. It was only because of the stand taken by BASIC and like minded countries that this decision, which had been delayed for almost 4 years, could see the light of the day. The decision is still not fully operational; the emission limits under the second commitment period of KP will be finalized only in Doha. But, the gains from this decision on KP will be visible later when we begin negotiating on the Durban Platform. I know that Canada dropped out, however, this should not take away from the fact that second commitment period was established.
The decisions on the Durban Platform constitute the second important set of outcomes in Durban. At Durban, we began a process for negotiating on post 2020 arrangements. India emerged as a key player in these negotiations. This was evident from the last minute huddle formed by the CoP President to decide upon these arrangements. It would have been perhaps easy for us to let the talks break. But, this would have been disastrous for the Durban Conference and the planet at large. However, being a responsible member of the global community, India chose to play a positive and constructive role. It was also important to keep in mind the BASIC mandate as well.

As part of our commitment to the multilateral process, we agreed in Durban to launching a process whose objective is to develop a protocol, another legal instrument or an agreed outcome with legal force under the Convention applicable to all parties. Under the Convention is the most vital part. The process has to be completed by 2015 with an aim to adopt the protocol, another legal instrument or an agreed outcome with legal force from 2020. Under the Convention means CBDR and equity being very important.

India has a vital stake in the future arrangements as we are not only a major growing economy but also a society deeply vulnerable to climate change. We are committed to environmental sustainability. At the same time, we are conscious of the overriding priorities of poverty eradication which is a crucial objective of social and economic sustainability. It is critical for us to keep growing to give a chance to millions of poor lives in our country to come out of poverty. We need to ensure that our people get a fair share of global atmospheric resources, which allows them necessary space to grow and access to food, water and energy. Future arrangements therefore need to be equitable and not just fair and ambitious.

The decision on Durban Platform is part of the mutual assurances that we have exchanged with our developed country partners on enhanced and ambitious actions. The significance of this decision lies in the fact that we have ensured that the arrangements are established under the Convention. Being under the Convention implies that the arrangements are not only applicable to all parties as they must, they should also be anchored in the principles of the Convention. This is indeed a significant gain. Since we have to apply the principles of equity and CBDR in evolving these arrangements, the responsibilities/obligations in a post 2020 arrangement will clearly need to be built on the principle of equity and CBDR. Irrespective of the legal form of the final arrangements, the developing country targets under such arrangements cannot be binding. I repeat cannot be binding, until the principle of differentiation based on equity is defined and the conditions implicit in such definition of equity are met. The principle of equity will need to be elaborated through negotiations.
It is for this reason that I pleaded so strongly for equity in the Durban Conference. We managed to ensure that our three issues - equity, trade and technology related IPRs remain on the table. Equity is back on the table in form of a decision to hold a workshop. But, we will need to do substantive work on this issue. The results of the workshop should feed into the negotiations and we should press for a decision on a work-plan for equity.

With a view to move in this direction, my Ministry has organized a discussion on equity and climate change. This will take place tomorrow and the day after here in New Delhi. We have invited the BASIC countries as also a few other like minded countries from different regions of the world to deliberate on the importance of equity and the possible approaches.

Equity does not imply mere parallelism in the actions of countries in future. It is deeper than that and is linked to the potential for growth and sustainable development. At Durban we have agreed that, till 2020, the developing country targets under these arrangements will be determined on the basis of voluntary choice and with a guarantee that there will be no punitive consequences of shortfall in these domestic targets even if they are inscribed in an international document. There will be mutually agreed arrangements for verification (international consultation and analysis) of the domestic goals but the objective of such arrangements will be only to increase transparency and build confidence in mutual actions.

The post 2020 arrangements must therefore include not only binding emission reduction commitments for developed countries but also assurance that there will be no unilateral measures taken by any country in the name of climate change. Besides, the post 2020 arrangements must include commitments of developed countries in quantified and specific terms to provide financing and technology support to developing countries. Further, the arrangements should provide for a facilitative regime that ensures access to IPRs and transfer of climate friendly technologies. The arrangements may take the shape of a protocol or legal instrument, provided, always provided that above conditions are met.

Ultimately, everything rests on our ability to advance sustainable development agenda within the country even as we are willing to promote international cooperation. Without an international consensus on equity, unilateral trade measures and technology related IPRs, substantial movement under the Durban Platform will not be possible. These should be a part of an ambitious agenda if we are serious about international cooperation on climate change.

In the recent past, I have come across some references to green growth and sustainable development goals as ideas representative of equitable and sustainable growth. Some ideas relating to sustainable consumption or even sustainable prosperity have appeared as the likely solution to the questions of sustainable development. The Rio+20 process is being seen as an opportunity to integrate these objectives into the sustainable development paradigm. I would like to stress here that the SDGs should not be seen as uni-dimensional objective. They must be anchored in the paradigm of equity and CBDR and should be designed in a framework that respects the differentiated responsibility and capabilities of the participating nations.

The issue of an appropriate legal form for the future arrangements by 2020 was a matter of intense debate at Durban. Some parties led, in particular, by the EU pressed for a form of agreement that should be legally binding on all Parties. We have always believed that legal form should follow the substance. A legally binding agreement, by itself, is no guarantee for increased ambition or its implementation.

Some Kyoto Protocol Parties like Canada have recently made unilateral announcements to renounce their legal obligations under the Kyoto Protocol. This is a clear pointer to the fact that a legal form is useful only as long as the party is willing to abide by it. Moreover, we are also of the view that India cannot agree to a legally binding agreement for emissions reduction at this stage of our development. Our emissions are bound to grow as we have to ensure our social and economic development and fulfill the imperative of poverty eradication.

What would be the shape of an outcome with legal force? The contours of this notion will become clear in course of negotiations. Such an outcome may include some aspirational CoP decisions, some binding CoP decisions, and setting up of new institutions and bodies. It may even include new protocols or other legal instruments as necessary to implement the decisions covering various issues with various degrees of binding-ness as per domestic or international provisions of law under the Convention.

There have been some comments on the role of SIDS and LDCs in the negotiations and their stand. I want to say this that we understand the perspective of LDCs and SIDs as much or more than anybody else in same position. Even as we try to take everyone along, we need to be firmly rooted in our national perspective on these matters. We need to build coalitions that advance the global agenda and at the same time do not compromise on the domestic priorities of sustainable development and poverty eradication.

In the coming months, we have several tasks before us. We have to spell out our views on the possible structure of the post 2020 arrangements and also our views on equity. We have given initial indications of our approach in our recent submissions to the UNFCCC in the month of February. We will elaborate it further in the future submissions.
I would like to thank you for the attention and the opportunity given to me once again. I am confident that your discussions here will give us an insight into the emerging challenges and result in a fruitful and engaging conversation.

Thank you.
071. Workshop on Equity and Climate Change
New Delhi, April 12, 2012

Chair’s Summary

A workshop on Equity and Climate Change was hosted by India in New Delhi on April 12, 2012. The workshop was inaugurated by Mrs. Jayanthi Natarajan, Minister for Environment and Forests of India and was attended by senior negotiators/representatives of Argentina, Brazil, China, Egypt, Gambia, Mauritius, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, South Africa, Swaziland and Thailand. Mr. Martin Khor, Director, South Centre and Ms. Meena Raman from Third World Network also attended.

2. In the context of the decision of AWG-LCA in Durban to organize a workshop on ‘Equitable Access to Sustainable Development’ in Bonn in May 2012 and the launch of a new process under Durban Platform, the workshop was aimed as a brainstorming opportunity to discuss the continued importance of equity and its appropriate articulation in the context of the global response to climate change and how to address this important issue as part of the forthcoming negotiations under the Durban Platform.

3. The workshop was divided into three sessions namely: ‘Equity: Context, Interpretation and Approaches’, Equitable Access to Sustainable Development – a Dimension of Equity’ and ‘Equity and Durban Platform’.

4. Recalling that the Convention under Article 3.1 enjoins parties to protect the climate system ‘on the basis of Equity’, participants in the workshop were unanimous and emphatic in their view that Equity is central to the Climate Change negotiations. Participants stressed that the Bonn workshop should enhance parties’ understanding of Equity and its operationalization, and should not be an end in itself. They felt that discussions on timeframe for peaking and global goal should be guided by contextual considerations relating to implementation of actions and commitments of parties under the Convention and the needs of social and economic development and poverty eradication of developing countries. They also stressed that the outcome of the workshop should feed into the negotiations and also inform the deliberations under the Durban Platform, particularly the manner in which Equity, a key Convention principle, must be articulated in all elements of Durban Platform as also the arrangements to be devised under it. Participants also agreed that there should be more such workshops/consultations on the issue, including one during the upcoming session in Bangkok later this year.
5. Participants stressed that Durban Platform is unequivocally ‘under the Convention’, which implies that all the principles and provisions of the Convention would apply to the process and outcome of the Durban Platform in totality. It was strongly felt that Durban Platform should not seek to re-define or re-interpret the principles and provisions of the Convention. It was emphasized that consensus around Equity as a principle is critical for Durban Platform negotiations and a discussion on the various elements of Durban Platform must be preceded by an agreement on the principles on which it would be based upon. Many participants suggested that DP should have a workplan on Equity to address these issues.

6. Participants agreed on the need to discuss and coordinate further on the issue with other countries including at the upcoming Bonn session.
072. Media Briefing on Prime Minister’s visit to Mexico for the G-20 Summit and for the Rio 20 + Summit.

New Delhi, June 15, 2012.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Good afternoon friends and I welcome you to this media interaction. Thank you for being here with us this afternoon. We will focus today on the Prime Minister’s visit to Mexico and to Brazil. Let me run through a few details before I ask the Hon. Minister of Environment and Forests to take over.

As you know, this is the Seventh G20 Summit that is being hosted in Mexico on 18th and 19th June, 2012. This is being hosted in Los Cabos. In addition to the G20 members and Spain, which is a permanent invitee to the G20 summits, Mexico has also invited Benin as African Union Chair, Cambodia as the current ASEAN Chairman, Chile, Sri Lanka, and Ethiopia to attend the Summit.

The Mexican Presidency has emphasized on five priorities for their Presidency. Let me try and list them out for you.

1. Economic stabilization and structural reforms as foundations for growth and employment.
2. Strengthening the financial system and fostering financial inclusion to promote economic growth.
3. Improving international financial architecture in an interconnected world.
4. Enhancing food security, addressing commodity price volatility
5. Promoting sustainable development, green growth and the fight against climate change.

Since the discussions on the two tracks that the G20 generally undertakes have already commenced today - these are the Sherpa Track and the Finance Track - all those who are participating on our behalf in the G20 discussions are already in Los Cabos. The Deputy-Chairperson of Planning Commission Dr. Montek Singh Ahluwalia is the Sherpa from the Indian side. Shri R. Gopalan, Secretary in the Department of Economic Affairs is handling the finance track.

Hence, during the briefing today we will not be able to provide you with specific details on the substance of the discussions at the G20. However, I will share with you some details about other meetings that the Prime Minister intends to hold in Los Cabos.

As you know, apart from the G20 Summit there are usually bilateral meetings. My understanding is that the Prime Minister is likely to hold several such bilateral meetings, and I will try and indicate to you those which have been firmed up. These are with Mr. Felipe Calderon, President of Mexico; Ms. Angela Merkel, Chancellor of Germany; Mr. Vladimir Putin, President of Russia; Mr. Francois Hollande, President of France. And in addition, the BRICS leaders are to meet in Los Cabos. Apart from these there are a couple meetings that are being scheduled. Once we have the details, we will announce them in terms of timing etc.

I would also like to tell you about some of the other members of the delegation of the Prime Minister who are accompanying him there apart from the two that I have mentioned. They are: Shri T.K.A Nair, Advisor to the Prime Minister; Shri Shivshankar Menon, National Security Advisor; Shri Pulok Chatterjee, Principal Secretary to the Prime Minister; and Shri Ranjan Mathai, Foreign Secretary.

In addition, Prime Minister will also attend the UN Conference on Sustainable Development popularly known as the Rio+20 Summit. And we are fortunate today to have with us the Hon. Minister of State with Independent Charge for Environment and Forests, Shrimati Jayanthi Natarajan, who is our Principal Negotiator at the Rio+20. She is assisted by Dr. Tishya Chatterjee, Secretary, Ministry of Environment and Forests.

The Hon. Minister has kindly agreed to brief all of you on the Rio+20. After that, as usual, she will be available for a short question and answer session to clarify any issues that you may have.

With this introduction, I will hand over to the Minister so that she can make her brief opening remarks, and following that we will have the usual question and answer session.

The Hon. Minister.

Minister of State of the Ministry of Environment and Forests (Shrimati Jayanthi Natarajan): Thank you and good afternoon.

We stand on the eve of leaving for the very momentous and historic Rio+20 Conference which all of you are undoubtedly aware of. It is a very momentous conference because we celebrate twenty years of implementation of the goals of the First Earth Summit which was held in 1992.

The first Rio Conference, if you all will remember, was very significant because it laid out for the first time twenty years ago the concept of sustainability of the development process. I want to emphasize here that sustainability at that time and today is essentially a development ideal. Over the years it has been refined to further highlight also environmental concerns.

The first Rio Conference itself took major steps. Three conventions were set up - the Climate Change Convention, the Biodiversity and the Desertification. Therefore, at the Rio+20 Conference, where Heads of Government and our own
Hon. Prime Minister will participate, will focus upon reviewing how the commitments made at the First Earth Summit and the three Conventions have been implemented.

There is a Zero Draft text which is under discussion, which has been negotiated for some time now. Without taking too much of your time, I will give you the highlights of that Zero Draft. It is called, “The Future We Want”. It deals with several important ideas. The most important sections currently under discussion are those relating to our common vision, renewing political commitment, green economy, institutional framework for sustainable development, and framework for action and follow-up.

Two of the themes of all the themes that are there in the Rio Conference have generated particular interest. These are those relating to green economy and institutional framework. There is also an expectation that issue of sustainable development goals (SDGs) will be discussed as a deliverable of the Rio Conference under the framework of action and follow-up, that chapter.

These are not the only issues. A very important issue according to us is means of implementation. Most importantly, the principles on the basis of which actions have to be taken by countries and the manner in which the Rio principles are reaffirmed and implemented which will be key to whatever the outcome of Rio is.

I just want to tell you first about the concept of green growth. It is usually understood as a reference to low carbon growth or a climate resilient economy. This according to the Indian position, as mandated by Cabinet, is a very restrictive interpretation of green growth and of green economy. We are very particular that green growth should not be seen as a normative concept. We would like a discussion on green economy to focus on evolving and adopting policies that promote environmentally friendly economic growth while respecting national circumstances, and most importantly preserving national policy space for action.

The concept of green economy cannot aim to replace or supplant internationally agreed concept of sustainable development. And very importantly there should be a balance between the three pillars of economic growth, social equity and environmental protection. So, the Indian position focuses mainly upon a balance of the three pillars, namely, economic growth, social equity and environment protection.

And the particular thrust of our negotiating ideal would be to thrust upon the question of equity and the question of common but differentiated responsibilities (CBDR) which have already been articulated in the original Rio principles.

We are also very particular that Rio+20 outcomes should not result in any trade restrictive measures or protectionist policies in the name of green growth, and that sustainable development and poverty eradication are overriding priorities for the international community. Therefore, green growth must be seen as one of the means of achieving these overriding priorities.

We want the key message to emerge from the Rio Conference as follows. The Conference should commit itself to sustainable development. It should reaffirm commitment to the Rio principles and common but differentiated responsibilities which is essential to preserve global partnership on sustainable development. We want to reaffirm the right to food, to safe drinking water, sanitation, health and education, and respect human rights based approaches. We feel that existing commitments of developed countries need to be implemented and the declaration should be followed up with action. We also feel that there is a need for new, additional, predictable and public finance from developed countries.

If the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) have to be applied universally, there must be agreement on common but differentiated responsibilities. And Sustainable Development Goals, I would like to emphasize very strongly, have to be voluntary, aspirational, non-binding, and there should be no insistence on any thematic growth.

Finally, I just want to mention five quick steps which India has taken. It is not that we do not believe in green growth. We have taken important steps in the direction of green growth or low carbon development. We have agreed to reduce emissions intensity of our GDP by 20 to 25 per cent by 2020 in comparison with 2005. As part of the National Action Plan on Climate Change, a target of 20,000 MW of solar energy generation is being actively pursued under the National Solar Mission.

National Mission for Enhanced Energy Efficiency covers 478 industrial units in six sectors mandated to achieve specific benchmarks in terms of energy efficiency. National Mission on Sustainable Habitat includes plans to achieve energy efficiency in buildings, transport and urban planning. And the Twelfth Five-Year plan, which is now under preparation, will contain a separate chapter on climate change. And the strategy for lower carbon inclusive growth is expected to be integrated under the plan.

Thank you.

Official Spokesperson: The floor is now open for questions.

Question: Jayanthi ji, what kind of preparations have been done within BRICS countries in the lead up to the Rio+20 Summit, particularly on the nonbinding clauses regarding SDGs?

Minister of State of the Ministry of Environment and Forests: Very important steps. Not just BRICS, G77 plus China, we see our vision as being anchored in a shared vision of all developing countries. In the year-long or even longer negotiations, in the run-up, continuous meetings between all the countries of G77 and China and various other formations as well, friendly countries, BASIC, BRICS, all the countries separately but basically anchored in G77 plus China, so that the voice of developing countries is heard loud and clear and the principles of equity and CBDR are clearly enunciated and put forward just like we did in Durban. So, the negotiations have emphasized this very clearly, have also shown our unity and we intend to take that forward.

Question: Are you saying India and China ... (Inaudible)...

Minister of State of the Ministry of Environment and Forests: I am saying G77 plus China. We are anchored in a position with G77 and China, and we hope to take that forward.

Question: Madam, Prime Minister is going at a time when there is a lot of domestic pressure on because of recent political developments on who the President is going to be. Is there tension? Is this trip going to be tense because of domestic situation?

Minister of State for Environment and Forests: Absolutely not. This is a political democracy. The Congress is a party which is more than a century old. The Prime Minister has been the Prime Minister of this country, this is well into his second term. We honour and go forward with our international commitments. We have a robust Chairperson of the UPA. We have a party that functions, an alliance that functions. There is no tension.

Question: Just a follow-up to her question. Why did you all take so long to say that PM is not in the running?

Minister of State for Environment and Forests: But this is about Rio+20. Actually, I am here as a Minister. I would not be appropriate for me to ... She anchored it in the trip.

Question: What is this you explained about G77 and China? What is the stand of BASIC countries? And what are the non-negotiables for India at Rio?

Minister of State for Environment and Forests: I would not assert that G77 plus China have total agreement on all issues. It is an ongoing process. It is developing even as I speak. Our negotiators are there. We are trying to anchor a position of G77 plus China. We are also talking to the BASIC countries. I think that we have made substantial progress. As far as India is concerned, the non-negotiables are: any compromise on the question of equity, and CBDR; and any attempt to make these SDGs in any way binding upon developing countries, binding rather than voluntary or aspirational.

As you know, Millennium Development Goals were announced unilaterally and developing countries took it. We believe that sustainable development goals should be voluntary and aspirational, and most importantly supported by means of implementation (MOI) which includes, as you know, finance, no restrictive trade barriers and so on.
Question: Madam, you said your goal would be that the outcome of the Rio Summit does not lead to unfair restrictive trade practices in the name of green economy.

Minister of State for Environment and Forests: That is correct.

Question: Have you coordinated your strategy with the BRICS countries and other countries?

Minister of State for Environment and Forests: As I said, we have actually been negotiating as a group along with G77 plus China, not just BRICS, both BRICS, BASIC, several formations, including a larger formation of G77 plus China.

Question: For the past several rounds of negotiations, same stand has been taken by the developing countries and the US and other countries. There has been no movement forward. What prospects do you see?

Minister of State of the Ministry of Environment and Forests: I think there is movement forward. I think we have to continue to meet. I believe I am extremely optimistic that we will be able to take our vision forward. I do not accept any formulation that there is no movement forward. I believe that twenty years down the road we will be able to assert very strongly that the Rio principles must be reaffirmed.

Question: Can you list some of the things where you see a movement forward?

Minister of State of the Ministry of Environment and Forests: The very fact that developing countries (inaudible)………, the original Rio principles stressed upon means of implementation, upon fast-track funding, 30 billion. For example in climate change we have set up Green Climate Fund. So, we are very hopeful that the finance will be forthcoming from developed countries.

Question: … (Inaudible) ...

Minister of State for Environment and Forests: It hasn’t. But we keep talking about it. And we are very hopeful that at this forum we will be able to emphasize that unfair trade restrictions, unilateral trade restrictions will not be acceptable. So, we will continue to talk because the issues are very important. I think the most important step forward is the fact that we have highlighted that sustainable development consists of a balance between three pillars. Poverty eradication is the most important thing, and equity and CBDR are as important as anything else as far as developing countries are concerned.

Question: Madam Minister, this 20 to 25 per cent reduction in carbon emissions by 2020 we are offering to do that, but it should be voluntary or aspirational. You do not want any imposition or any particular binding. Number two, is India expecting any portion of the funds that developed countries are expected to put together to cope with the carbon question? And are the developing countries going to take a united stand on Europe’s decision to impose carbon tax on flights?

Minister of State of the Ministry of Environment and Forests: With regard to your first question, this is something that Prime Minister announced. And we have said very proudly that this is a declaration that shows our commitment, our very serious commitment to the rationalization of climate change and our commitment to sustainable development as well as the environment. This is a voluntary goal that we have set for ourselves. And we have gone, I think, a great way forward because we have introduced legislation that mandates that energy efficiency should be achieved within a particular time. We have gone a great way forward. This in fact reinforces my submission that the goals should be voluntary, aspirational, and nonbinding, because we have done far more than any developed countries have done, because this was a unilateral announcement by our Prime Minister in addition to saying that we will never exceed the per capita emissions of any developed country which he made in Heiligendamm. So, this is something that we have done voluntarily.

As far as EU ETS is concerned, Ministry of Environment has taken strong objection at the UNFCCC to say that this is a restrictive, unilateral trade measure disguised as climate change action, and that EU should not impose it. I have written to the EU Commissioner Connie Hedegaard and we have had talks about it even at the EU Summit. We have taken strong objection to introducing the EU ETS tax - I think they deferred it by about a year right now but we will continue to - and to the maritime levy if it comes forward. We are hoping for new additional funding. What the developed countries are saying is that it can be private. They are showing the recession as a reason. And they say it should be private, you should leave people to raise it. But we are insisting, and we have argued at the negotiating table, we are continuing to argue that it should be additional, predictable and public finance, that governments make commitments, they should also provide for realization – 30 billion USD per year from 2013 to 2017, 100 billion USD per year from 2018 onwards. In fact, we have pointed out at negotiations that United Nations studies have shown that we need at least 1.9 trillion US dollars per year, that is developing countries need, towards sustainable development actions if we are to fulfill it; and therefore, developed countries must set clear paths to achieve internationally agreed Overseas Development Aid (ODA) the target of 0.7 per cent of their GNP to indicate their seriousness. They have made a commitment earlier. We want to reaffirm that that commitment is translated into action.

Question: ... (Inaudible)...
Minister of State for Environment and Forests: 1.7 to 1.8. (Inaudible)

Question: Madam, we know that financial aspect is going to play a very important part so far as implementation aspect is concerned as you have very clearly defined as to what all is needed and the commitments made by developed countries in the past. Considering the Eurozone crisis we all are aware that the developed countries are trying to pull back on so many fronts. Keeping that in mind, to what extent is G77 ready to go ahead? And whenever we see these kind of discussions - we have seen in Durban, we have seen in Cancun - so many things are sacrificed in the last moment, so many compromises are made at the last moment. From India’s stand or stand of G77, if there is a roadblock on these aspects - we have said that we are going to stand by Brazil being a friendly nation to us - to what extent is India going to stay in that case because we have also heard that Brazil may dilute its stand too on the financial aspect?

Minister of State for Environment and Forests: I do not want to comment on Brazil’s stand because Brazil is our host. As the Chair of the Rio Summit they may have a particular way of dealing with the issue. As far as the Indian stand is concerned, it is crystal clear. It is what I outlined earlier. This is what Prime Minister has desired. This is what Cabinet has cleared. I have my redlines and this will be the basis of our negotiation, and this will be basis of the negotiation even within G77, within BASIC, within BRICS and at the table. I have my redlines.

Question: Madam, can you share with us what will be the agenda or the stance at the G20 particularly in the context of within BRICS Brazil had said that it might cap its funding for the IMF if there is no reform in the IMF quota? Are we going to endorse Brazil’s view? What will be our stance?

Official Spokesperson: I think you came a little later after I started the initial announcement. I mentioned, both our negotiators at the G20 are right now in Los Cabos and they are involved in the negotiations. So, at this stage we do not want to say anything which will prejudice the negotiations. However, those of you who are traveling with the Prime Minister will have occasion to interact with Dr. Montek Singh Ahluwalia as soon as you arrive there on the 17th. I am sure you can put this question to him and he will answer that. So, for the G20 all our negotiators are already there and they are the best persons to answer your question and we will leave it till then. If you are coming, you will have opportunity to ask that question there.

Question: Madam, since Earth Summit is happening when Eurozone crisis is getting rather complicated, don’t you think that the crisis and its impact on developing countries will derail the whole process of commitment to green economy, the commitment that you said?

Minister of State for Environment and Forests: As I said very clearly in my initial remarks, no carbon growth, green economy, all these are issues first have to deal with the issue of poverty as far as developing countries are concerned, have to deal first with equity, with poverty eradication, and we then take it forward from there. And I have listed out the measures that we have taken voluntarily for the green economy. As far as the developed countries are concerned, we do understand their compulsions in view of the Eurozone crisis. But the fact remains that as far as climate change is concerned, as far as sustainable development is concerned, they have gone ahead and they have made commitments even twenty years ago when the First Earth Summit was concerned. And I would like to remind all of you what our late Prime Minister Indira Gandhi said that poverty is the greatest polluter.

Question: This is about the G20. You mentioned the Prime Minister’s meetings which have been scheduled. Has any meeting been sought by either side between the Prime Minister and the President of the US, and the Chinese Head of State?

Official Spokesperson: As regards the Chinese, there is a BRICS leaders meeting. So, President Hu Jintao will be present there and he will participate in that meeting in Los Cabos. There are no other meetings with the President of the United States as of now under consideration.

I may just add one last point. I had mentioned these meetings, these were for Los Cabos. Maybe I should share with you the meetings that the Prime Minister will have bilaterally in Rio. These are: with the Prime Minister of Nepal Mr. Baburam Bhattarai; with the President of Sri Lanka Mr. Mahinda Rajapakse; Mr. Yayi Boni, the President of the Republic of Benin, who is the Chair of the African Union. In addition, the Prime Minister will also meet former President of Brazil Mr. Lula. We are also working on two other meetings. That will perhaps be worked out during the course of next few days. At this stage we are still trying to schedule these meetings.

That is all that we have for you today. Thank you very much.
073. Statement by the Prime Minister prior to his departure for Mexico to attend the G-20 Summit and Brazil to attend the UN Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20).

New Delhi, June 16, 2012.

I leave today to attend the G-20 Summit in Los Cabos, Mexico at the invitation of President Felipe Calderon. I will, thereafter, travel to Rio de Janeiro, Brazil to attend the UN Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20) at the invitation of President Dilma Rousseff.

G-20 Leaders will meet once again in the shadow of the economic crisis in the Eurozone and a faltering global economy. This situation in Europe is of particular concern as Europe accounts for a significant share of the global economy and is also India’s major trade and investment partner. Continuing problems there will further dampen global markets and adversely impact our own economic growth. It is our hope that European leaders will take resolute action to resolve the financial problems facing them.

The other issue of immediate concern is the need to revive global growth. It is imperative that the G-20 countries work in coordination to implement policies that promote sustained growth. India has been pursuing this objective in its capacity as the Co-Chair of the Working Group on the “Framework for Strong, Sustainable and Balanced Growth”. I will stress the need to ensure primacy of the development dimension in G-20 deliberations and the need to focus on investment in infrastructure as a means of stimulating global growth.

BRICS countries have been the new growth poles of the global economy. At the Fourth BRICS Summit in New Delhi in March this year, BRICS Leaders agreed to work with the international community to ensure international policy coordination to maintain macroeconomic stability conducive to the healthy recovery of the global economy. As current Chair of BRICS, India will host an informal meeting of BRICS Leaders prior to the commencement of the G-20 Summit to exchange views on the agenda of the Summit.

We have come a long way since the Earth Summit in Rio in 1992. Environmental concerns today occupy the centre-stage of global discourse. Yet, we are far from pursing a truly sustainable path towards development. The UN Conference on Sustainable Development is an historic opportunity to give meaningful content to the paradigm of sustainable development. At its heart lies the imperative of moving away from a resource intensive development path while ensuring inclusive and balanced development for eradicating the grinding poverty that afflicts millions.

The Rio+20 Conference is likely to debate complex and contentious issues such as green economy and Sustainable Development Goals. I will emphasize that we must not dilute the cardinal principles of Rio 1992, particularly the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities as well as equity, which have been at the core of global sustainable development efforts. We must acknowledge the continuing differences in levels of development across the world, and the need for provision of financial and technological support to the developing world if we are to work together as a global community to address our most pressing environmental challenges. India will work with like-minded countries to forge a consensus in this endeavour.

During my visit I look forward to separately meeting President Felipe Calderon, President Vladimir Putin, Chancellor Angela Merkel, President Francois Hollande, Prime Minister David Cameron, Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Premier Wen Jiabao, President Mahinda Rajapaksa, Prime Minister Jigmi Y. Thinley, Prime Minister Baburam Bhattarai, President Boni Yayi and other leaders.

I am very pleased to be interacting with friends from the media, in this lovely city of Rio.

Right at the outset, I must thank our host Brazil for their excellent arrangements for the Conference and also warmly congratulate them for their leadership in ensuring a speedy conclusion of the Rio+20 outcome document. I commend the Brazilian Presidency for the transparent and inclusive way this process was handled and the fine balance they were able to achieve in the outcome document which is key for its acceptance by all delegations.

As far as India is concerned, the outcome document takes into consideration our interests and concerns and we are satisfied with the overall package. India was constructive at Rio and, in addition to our own proposals, which met with widespread support, our delegation played a crucial role in bridging differences and building consensus on many important issues.

One significant development has been the restoration of the centrality of the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities in the environmental discourse. Equity and its manifestation, the principle of CBDR, are at the heart of international cooperation for sustainable development and we are glad that we have collectively agreed on this key issue, which is of great significance to developing countries, not least in the climate change context.

The outcome document also clearly recognizes poverty eradication as the greatest global challenge. In doing so, it places this squarely at the centre of the global development agenda.

The conference will also be remembered for kick-starting the process on Sustainable Development Goals. Since they are expected to become a part of the post-2015 global development agenda, SDGs will hopefully guide the international community towards inclusive sustainable development. We are happy that this process and its outcome will be guided by the Rio principles, respect national circumstances, priorities and capacities.

We are satisfied that no specific goals and targets have been agreed a priori and we look forward to engage constructively in the intergovernmental process to outline and develop goals that would be applicable to all countries, not just developed countries, integrate the three pillars sustainable development, respect CBDR and involve meaningful action by all parties and not constrain development.

We have also recognized Green Economy as one of the means to sustainable development and poverty eradication, and have firmly rejected unilateral measures and trade barriers under the guise of Green Economy.
While we remain disappointed with the weak political will in developed countries to provide enhanced means of implementation to developing countries, we are glad that we have agreed to set up two important mechanisms one for Technology Transfer and another for Finance. Both were Indian proposals, which received strong support from G77 countries, including from Africa, LDCs and small island states. We now keen to collectively ensure that these mechanisms are operationalized and deliver effectively for developing countries.

This evening I was invited to address a High-level round table, where I highlighted that it was ironical that we not only faced a global meltdown - but simultaneously staring at a total environmental meltdown. Thus we are here today to talk once again about the rights of Earth and her children not the rights of polluters, whoever they may be.

I mentioned that I represented 1.2 billion people and that our challenge was to create a robust economy and eradicate poverty while at the same time, ensure that our poor who are already deeply vulnerable to climate change disasters, are not further impacted.

Permit me to point out the difference between the environmentalism of the rich and the environmentalism of the poor. The rich countries grew, developed and polluted the world. Consequently, when the environment movements came, they had the money to clean up. Our nascent growth and economy start our growth trajectory with the problems of a polluted world.

Our fundamental challenge is to do more with less. Frugality and innovation will be our way to growth and our challenge will be to provide the gains of development to the vast majority of our people to make growth sustainable and affordable.

The efficiency revolution brought few results. The sufficiency revolution should begin. As Mahatma Gandhi said, we have enough to satisfy everyone’s need but not everyone’s greed.

When we talk of the Green Economy, India is committed to a Green World Economy but, I must hasten to add, a real green economy - not a Green Washed Greed Economy, as our environmentalist says.

We are committed to a green economy that does not commodity nature and one which protects local communities. Therefore, the market driven green economy - the old paradigm of trading in land, water and forests cannot continue in a business as usual scenario for this is a failed paradigm. Local communities have to be protected and involved. Local solutions have to be operationalised. Green Economy has to be bottoms up and democratized. Otherwise it will be no more than green-wash. Cost of Green Development cannot be unaffordable for the poor.
I also pointed out in the roundtable that India has already taken several steps to promote green growth in the context of sustainable development including plans for emissions intensity reduction by 20-25% by 2020 over 2005, for 20,000 MW of solar energy, Prime Minister’s National Missions for enhanced energy efficiency, sustainable habitat etc.

Thank you.
075. Statement of the Prime Minister at the Plenary of the United Nations Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20 Summit).

Rio de Janeiro, June 21, 2012.

Mr. President

Excellencies,

Ladies & Gentlemen,

Let me begin by congratulating President Dilma Rousseff for hosting this conference and for her outstanding stewardship of the negotiations. We thank the people of Brazil for their warm hospitality and the excellent arrangements made for this conference. Brazil, like India, is a confluence of cultures and peoples. I feel honoured to be among you.

Mr. President,

We meet at a time of serious economic crisis and political ferment in the world. The Rio+20 Summit on Sustainable Development is timely because it focuses our minds on “the future we want” and how to realize it. Difficult though it may seem, we have to summon the imagination to balance the costs that we will incur in the present with the benefits that will accrue to future generations.

Economic Development, social inclusion and environmental sustainability are all equally critical as components of sustainable development. The task before us is to give practical shape and content to this architecture in a manner that allows each country to develop according to its own national priorities and circumstances.

For developing countries, inclusive growth and a rapid increase in per capita income levels are development imperatives. The 1992 Rio Summit correctly acknowledged that poverty eradication must remain the over-riding priority for developing countries. Those living at the subsistence level cannot bear the costs of adjustment and their livelihood considerations are important in determining how scarce natural resources such as land, water and forests are used. The severe deterioration of land and water resources is already affecting the well-being of millions of people living on the edges of subsistence, particularly women and children.

Sustainable development also mandates the efficient use of available natural resources. We have to be much more frugal in the way we use natural resources. A key area of focus is energy. We have to promote, universal access to energy, while, at the same time, promoting energy efficiency and a shift to cleaner energy sources by addressing various technological, financial and institutional...
constraints. In India, we are implementing an ambitious National Solar Mission as a critical option for our energy security.

Moreover, current consumption patterns in the industrialized world are unsustainable. We need to find new pathways for sustainable living.

Environmental sustainability is the third leg of the sustainable development architecture. Economic activity invariably results in negative spinoffs, either by way of local pollution, or by way of global effects such as Greenhouse Gas emissions. We need to tackle both.

Local pollution can be regulated and such regulation may impose costs on various economic actors. To ensure equity, there may be a case for targeted assistance to small producers to meet part of these costs and this should be built into policy.

At the global level, our approach to the problem should be guided by equitable burden sharing. It is for this reason that the first Rio Summit enshrined the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities. I am happy we have reaffirmed this principle as well as the principle of equity during this Summit. This does not, however, mean that countries should not take proactive actions to promote sustainable development. In India, our efforts over the last two decades have yielded positive results. Over the period 1994-2007, our emissions-GDP intensity, excluding agriculture, has declined nearly 25%. Looking ahead, we have set a target to further reduce the emissions intensity of GDP by 20-25% between 2005 and 2020.

Many countries could do more if additional finance and technology were available. Unfortunately, there is little evidence of support from the industrialised countries in these areas. The ongoing economic crisis has made matters worse.

One of the key challenges that demands urgent global action is the worrying depletion of bio-diversity across our planet. The Eleventh Conference of Parties on Convention on Biodiversity is being hosted by India in October this year at Hyderabad. We look forward to working with the global community to make it a success.

Mr. President,

The future we want should be a future in which there is ecological and economic space for sustainable growth for all.

Let us work together to attain the future that we all desire. With these words I once again thank you Mr. President.
CLIMATE CHANGE

076. Media Briefing by Foreign Secretary and India's Deputy Permanent Representative at the United Nations on Prime Minister's Bilaterals and Rio+20 Conference.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Good afternoon friends. Thank you very much for coming to this briefing. We have here with us Foreign Secretary who will brief us on Prime Minister’s bilateral meetings. After that, if any of you would like any information on the ongoing Summit, we also have with us Mr. Manjeev Puri who is Deputy Permanent Representative of India to the United Nations, who has been involved in the entire process for the last several months on the Rio+20 Conference.

With that I will now first ask Foreign Secretary to brief you about the bilaterals that Prime Minister had.

Foreign Secretary (Shri Ranjan Mathai): Prime Minister had bilateral meetings with Prime Minister of Nepal Mr. Baburam Bhattarai and with President of Sri Lanka Mahinda Rajapaksa. During the session yesterday he also briefly spoke to President Waheed of the Maldives.

There is a possibility we are going to have a pull-aside both with the President of Maldives and with Prime Minister Thinley of Bhutan during the session this afternoon. As soon as I get something on those I will find the time to speak about them but I thought I will just mention the two meetings which took place first with Nepal.

Prime Minister and Prime Minister Bhattarai recalled the good meetings they had held last year both during Prime Minister Bhattarai’s visit to India and the meeting they had on the sidelines of the SAARC Summit which was in November in Addu. Prime Minister Bhattarai did mention that subsequently after those two very productive meetings there had been a preoccupation with domestic politics in Nepal. But he underlined that they continue to attach very great importance to taking forward the bilateral relationship with India.

Referring to the internal security in Nepal, Prime Minister Bhattarai noted that on what is called the peace process and integration there had been great progress and the issues had been more or less settled. But the drafting of the Constitution was not completed by the May 27 deadline, and hence they had no option, since the Supreme Court had said that the Constituent Assembly could not be extended, so the decision was to seek another election.

As far as our Prime Minister is concerned, he reiterated that India wants the success of democracy in Nepal. And he expressed the hope that all parties would show the wisdom to work together so that acceptable arrangements are made to complete the Constitution-making process on time.

In terms of the bilateral relationship, PM said that as a friend of Nepal we are committed to support it in the development process and we would support Nepal in a manner which is sought by the Nepalese people, but we in India do have a vision of the working together.

The Prime Minister of Nepal referred to negotiations with Indian companies for hydropower projects. And our Prime Minister said he recognized that this is an area of particularly great importance in our relationship. But at the moment we are in the process of helping Nepal deal with some development challenges which include supply of power from India to Nepal. It was agreed that the Joint Commission which is chaired by the two Foreign Ministers should meet as soon as feasible and look at all areas including power, railways and other areas of our interaction.

The Prime Minister and Prime Minister Bhattarai also reviewed security matters and the working of our mechanisms to deal with security cooperation. Prime Minister Bhattarai recalled that he had invited PM to visit Nepal, and PM said that he would be very happy to visit at a mutually convenient time.

The two leaders also discussed the conference which is under way here, and had the sense that outcome was, as they could see it, favourable in terms of how both countries looked at it.

With President Mahinda Rajapaksa of Sri Lanka, PM started first with a one-on-one discussion and then in delegation-level meeting. They covered all bilateral relations. On security related issues, they noted that our dialogue would be taken forward on the 29th June when the National Security Advisor Mr. Menon would be visiting Colombo. There was a substantial discussion on our economic relations, and the Power Minister of Sri Lanka gave an update on Sampur Power Project which is one of the very big projects being undertaken in Sri Lanka as a joint venture between the Ceylon Power Board and the NTPC.

In terms of the overall relationship, both felt that the scope for progress was very great and we must now concentrate on dealing with those areas where we can make good progress.

The President also referred to the situation within Sri Lanka and mentioned the continuing discussions on the issue of devolution. But the large focus was on what is being done for the rehabilitation of Internally Displaced People. He quoted the figure of about 3,000 who now continue to remain in the camps compared to 300,000 when the war ended.

He also noted that the resettlement process was under way, and electrification of the Northern Region, the Power Minister being present mentioned, was also making very good progress. They said that as much as 95 per cent electrification had been restored in Jaffna, and in the other areas in the Northern Province it was between 50 and 70 per cent.

Prime Minister once again underlined the great importance we attach in India to the ability of the Tamil people to lead a life of dignity and as equal citizens of that country. We expressed our intention to continue our assistance programmes. The housing project which India is undertaking will start actually disbursing funds to the beneficiaries for the houses in Sri Lanka by sometime next month because ...(inaudible)... And we also reiterated our intention to continue all our bilateral assistance programmes in the economic field.

That is about it. If there are any specific queries on it I will answer them. Otherwise, Manjeev will talk about the Conference.

Question: Sir, one question. There is a very big possibility in Nepal to produce power through hydro technology. Experts say that more than 40,000 MW can be produced. So, there is a good talk between our Prime Minister and Nepalese Prime Minister regarding the power also. Is there any possibility of any deal to construct any joint venture project to produce power? We are here in Rio+20, we are talking about the Green Economy and the way we are focusing on nuclear energy, these sources are really easy and really solvable.

Foreign Secretary: I fully agree with you. They are a tremendous resource. The Prime Minister mentioned that some discussions have already started with the Indian companies which are involved in specific project proposals. You are aware that even a few years ago some of the Indian private sector companies had gone in, and some of the public sector units had also started negotiations. But because of the security situation and the uncertain political climate, no progress was made.

The Prime Minister said that he hoped - the fact that now the Constitution-making process is at a very advanced stage - he did believe that the investment climate would improve. It was also noted that between India and Nepal, we have entered into both a Bilateral Investment Promotion Agreement and a Double Taxation Avoidance Agreement. These were done only end of last year, and they have been ratified. So, this would increase the confidence of potential investors. So, they expect to make some progress in this field and there was no specific project mentioned.

Question: There was a whole set of agreements between Bhattarai and the Prime Minister in the two meetings there, especially in Bhattarai’s trip to Delhi. Bhattarai’s Government is now in a severe danger of collapse given that the Madhesia Party and the Maoists have both split under their primary components.
Is there any concern or any reassurance that the agreements that we have done with Bhattarai and the promises we have made to him or both sides have made to each other will stand even after his Government falls?

Foreign Secretary: There was no specific reference to the agreements which we signed apart from, as I said, the Bilateral Investment Protection Agreement and the Double Taxation Avoidance Agreement. Those are in place and they would be expected to continue. The point is that they at the moment are in a state where an election has been announced by the Prime Minister for November. Whether that election actually will be held on that date is still to be actually confirmed because the Supreme Court had actually made the conclusion of the Constituent Assembly on May 27, and an issue has been raised through a petition to the court that under the interim Constitution under which they were functioning, there is no provision for holding such an election. That the courts will decide on it. So, what I am trying to say is that there is a degree of political fluidity right now which I think we need to get through this period. But as far as all the bilateral mechanisms at the official level are concerned, those continue. As far as we are concerned, the agreements which have been signed are government-to-agreements, and those will be maintained.

Official Spokesperson: Since there are no further questions, I will ask Mr. Manjeev Puri to make his opening remarks, and then if there are any questions he will take them.

India’s Deputy Permanent Representative to the United Nations (Mr. Manjeev Singh Puri): Akbar, thank you very much.

I think most members of the group here were briefed yesterday by the Hon. Minister of State for Environment on the salient features of the Outcome Document which is likely to be adopted tomorrow here. I am quite prepared to answer anything in addition, if you wish to know.

But I think it is also instructive to note if any of you have followed the statement of the President of Brazil when she inaugurated the Plenary yesterday where she pointed out that in this particular conference, it is extremely important to note that developing countries have been able to re-emphasise not only the Rio principles but bring to the fore that in the year 2012 poverty eradication continues to remain our overriding priority, and that we need to do all that we can to tackle this particular thing especially in the context of MDGs and the future development goals.

I think it is also very important to note that we have an agreement which is a good and balanced agreement, perhaps the best that was possible under the circumstances that the world faces today and which are fairly well-known to all of you.
I want to stop here now. If there is something very specific which the Hon. Minister may not have addressed yesterday, please go ahead. Thank you very much.

Question: The question really is as far as the earlier goals of funding being made available to developing countries for meeting certain goals. Now there is no funding. The earlier commitments have not been met. Therefore, on what basis are we concluding that there is a significant success because the reportage from the developed world is actually slamming this entire exercise?

India's Deputy PR to the UN: I think we need to be of course very cognizant that we are meeting at a time when there are serious economic challenges in the world, and certainly you are well aware and familiar with what the developed countries are going through. The Rio Conferences in the past too, what have they reaffirmed in 1992 is the set of principles and the mechanisms. In this particular conference we have agreed in terms of the draft outcome document to set up two mechanisms - one to deal with the area of financing and the other to deal with the area of technology. This is a significant breakthrough especially considering the circumstances. These are the mechanisms which will then look at ways and means by which we can reach either figures or ways and means of reaching those figures.

So, this is a document which obviously has a certain degree of balance, certain degree of being rooted in the realities of the world today. But it is a document which recognizes very clearly that the developing world could do much more provided it was assisted both in terms of technology and in terms of finance.

In terms of what you are hearing from the developed world, again I think you need to recognize this, and I can perhaps just tell you what Dr. Pachauri said to me just a few minutes back when I saw him in the corridor that look when they could afford it, they were not willing to do anything, now that they cannot afford it, what is it that we can really expect. This is Pachauri to me but do not quote it as it is to you.

Question: Why are we saying that the document reflects a lack of political will on the part of developed countries when the document says that developed countries will part with 0.7 per cent of GNP? It also says that South-South cooperation will be complement to North-South cooperation and not the substitute to it? And will SDGs have specific goals like MDGs?

India's Deputy PR to the UN: The lack of political will is perhaps best reflected in the question that your colleague here just asked. This is a document which is in the process of negotiations. In these particular negotiations to get these paragraphs of old commitments on 0.7 per cent itself took a great deal of doing. So, these are reiterations. To hold people to their old commitments itself was a significant achievement on the part of the developing countries and the G77. In terms of political will, surely political will could have been shown by, as you have heard, promising funding or being much more broad on technology transfer. But best that could have been achieved at this stage was the setting up of mechanisms. The reasons are of course fairly obvious, rooted in the realities of today as you see it.

So, it is a balancing act. But I think from the perspective of developing countries it is a good balancing act because policy space for developing countries has been clearly recognized. Differentiated burden sharing and on the basis of equity has been clearly recognized, and the fact that mechanism for international cooperation have also been initiated. We need to now take this process further from here.

On SDGs, what has happened is the process has begun whereby the UN General Assembly will set up an Expert Committee, we will start discussing on how SDGs would look like. Just to recap, where the Millennium Development Goals, these were actually drafted by experts, the Secretary-General, and actually have never really been adopted, although they are accepted in common parlance and all of us are working towards them. For the Sustainable Development Goals, the idea really is that we would work in this for the post-2015 development agenda but in an inter-governmental setting. So, all of us, governments etc., would be deliberating within the framework of the United Nations General Assembly. How they pan out, how do they work out, difficult to say at the moment. The kind of broad areas are obviously food security, energy access. These are the kind of important critical areas for sustainable development for all.

Question: My question would be to you or to the Foreign Secretary. Could you give us a sense of Indian industry in this summit? They have been looking at various themes. So, industry being now very important and they are talking about poverty eradication and funding and other things. So, could you give us a sense of the participation of top industrialists and what are they committing, or what kind of delegation is here?

India’s Deputy PR to the UN: At the opening time you may have heard Mr. Kris Gopalakrishnan spoke on behalf of global industry, and he has been around here. The Conference itself the way it works, is that major groups have an opportunity to speak and private sector is one of them. So, we have been very well represented in having an esteemed member and a very venerated member of the Indian industry speaking out here in terms of what the industry wants. Let me just remind you of what Mr. Gopalakrishnan said. He said that we are looking forward to contributing and working towards inclusive green growth. In terms of what Indian industry is otherwise doing here, the conference of course is primarily... inter-governmental with civil society and others participating including major groups. But I think Indian industry is rather active here in Brazil, rather active worldwide. And we see on our domestic side on various other aspects there has been a tremendous amount of positive response of the Indian industry as such towards sustainable development, towards environment protection, while working towards growth and inclusive growth in the country.

Question: What we are hearing here is just general kind of assurances and commitments. There are no concrete targets or something like that being set up. You yourself are saying that they are only reiterating the old commitments, they are again reassuring that they will be committed to all central points. What is the new theme being added in this conference?

India's Deputy PR to the UN: In this conference the principal gain for the developing countries is a reaffirmation of the Rio Principles, and the commitments which were already there. There has been a great of effort and a great deal of action to try and dilute the commitments, to try and perhaps walk away from them, or as your colleague here mentioned, try and substitute them by something else whether it is South-South cooperation or any other form of this kind. What has this conference done? This conference has reaffirmed the validity of the Rio Principles, the validity that the cooperation amongst South-South countries is one of partnership, partnership in which both are equals and they work towards national priorities of the others, distinct from the aged paradigm of North-South which retains its validity and its importance. And what this particular conference has done is, it held them to their promises. We need to work to get those promises implemented. You are absolutely right. Critical deficit has been a deficit of implementation. But that is a deficit which we will have to recognize.
The fact that we have been able to hold them to those promises itself is a particularly successful outcome of this particular negotiation process, and the fact that we were able to keep them together.

Question: In many ways US and Germany actually they ... (Inaudible)... moneybags. Now in the absence of Mr. Obama and Chancellor Merkel through the Conference, how does India view it? A disappointment? Lack of responsibility?
How does India view this particular thing?

India's Deputy PR to the UN: The facts are of course there for you to see.
People give several reasons for it. The President of the United States is engaged in his elections, the Chancellor of Germany with the Eurozone crisis. I think in some senses what you are saying certainly does have a certain amount of validity. But let us remember, the Untied States is likely to be represented by the Secretary of State. The United States has been very active in the negotiations here. They have a high-level delegation here led by their Special Envoy in the State Department. And they have been extremely active in all elements of the negotiations which have taken place here. Similarly Germany. Not only as part of the European Union at its negotiating team here, the Germans have been here in their own way at a very high level here. So, I think the way I would look at it is that for whatever reasons the leaders may not have been able to come but Germany and the United States have been very actively engaged in the process, and actively engaged in the negotiations, and actively present politically in this particular meeting out here.

Question: You spoke about technology as one of the mechanisms. But then how do you look at resolving the IPR issues? And you spoke about this kind of developing centres of excellence. Will the centres be run on the CG model?

India’s Deputy PR to the UN: It is the India’s position for a long time that we need to have a kind of fair use of the IPR regimes, and allowing the best use of the existing modalities of the IPR regimes under the WTO in the TRIPS. We have also been very strong on collaboration. And you are right, the CG model is something that we often allude to and try and have that brought into place. Our efforts here have basically been that the mechanism that we set up to work on technology are such that these models, the CG model as well as what we can do with IPRs gets brought into the fore and that we are able to discuss them in the context of sustainable development, not just in the very specific context where they have currently moved in the WTO. So, these are certainly areas that we will work on. These will be priority areas for our delegation as we work through the transfer of technology mechanisms which are due to be set up.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much. With that we come to the end of this interaction.
077. Communiqué issued at the end of the Rio + Summit.

Los Cabos (Mexic), June 20, 2012.

1. We, the Leaders of the G20, convened in Los Cabos on 18-19 June 2012.
2. We are united in our resolve to promote growth and jobs.
3. Since we last met, the global recovery has continued to face a number of challenges. Financial market tensions are high. External, fiscal and financial imbalances are still prevalent, having a major impact on growth and employment prospects and confidence. Clearly, the global economy remains vulnerable, with a negative impact on the everyday lives of people all over the world, affecting jobs, trade, development, and the environment.
4. We will act together to strengthen recovery and address financial market tensions.
5. We will work collectively to strengthen demand and restore confidence with a view to support growth and foster financial stability in order to create high quality jobs and opportunities for all of our citizens. We have agreed today on a coordinated Los Cabos Growth and Jobs Action Plan to achieve those goals.
6. Euro Area members of the G20 will take all necessary policy measures to safeguard the integrity and stability of the area, improve the functioning of financial markets and break the feedback loop between sovereigns and banks. We look forward to the Euro Area working in partnership with the next Greek government to ensure they remain on the path to reform and sustainability within the Euro Area.
7. We are implementing our structural and regulatory reform agenda to enhance medium-term growth prospects and build more resilient financial systems. We remain committed to reduce imbalances by strengthening deficit countries’ public finances with sound and sustainable policies that take into account evolving economic conditions and, in countries with large current account surpluses, by strengthening domestic demand and moving toward greater exchange rate flexibility.
8. Despite the challenges we all face domestically, we have agreed that multilateralism is of even greater importance in the current climate, and remains our best asset to resolve the global economy’s difficulties.
9. Recognizing the impact of the continuing crisis on developing countries, particularly low income countries, we will intensify our efforts to create a more conducive environment for development, including supporting infrastructure investment. Our policy actions will improve living conditions across the globe and protect the most vulnerable. In particular, by stabilizing global markets and promoting stronger growth, we will generate significant positive effects on development and poverty reduction across the globe.

Supporting economic stabilization and the global recovery

10. Strong, sustainable and balanced growth remains the top priority of the G20, as it leads to higher job creation and increases the welfare of people across the world. We are committed to adopting all necessary policy measures to strengthen demand, support global growth and restore confidence, address short and medium-term risks, enhance job creation and reduce unemployment, as reflected in the Los Cabos Growth and Jobs Action Plan (see Annex). We will implement all our commitments in a timely manner and rigorously monitor their implementation.

11. Against the background of renewed market tensions, Euro Area members of the G20 will take all necessary measures to safeguard the integrity and stability of the area, improve the functioning of financial markets and break the feedback loop between sovereigns and banks. We welcome the significant actions taken since the last summit by the Euro Area to support growth, ensure financial stability and promote fiscal responsibility as a contribution to the G20 framework for strong, sustainable and balanced growth. In this context, we welcome Spain’s plan to recapitalize its banking system and the Eurogroup’s announcement of support for Spain’s financial restructuring authority. The adoption of the Fiscal Compact and its ongoing implementation, together with growth-enhancing policies and structural reform and financial stability measures, are important steps towards greater fiscal and economic integration that lead to sustainable borrowing costs. The imminent establishment of the European Stability Mechanism is a substantial strengthening of the European firewalls. We fully support the actions of the Euro Area in moving forward with the completion of the Economic and Monetary Union. Towards that end, we support the intention to consider concrete steps towards a more integrated financial architecture, encompassing banking supervision, resolution and recapitalization, and deposit insurance. Euro Area members will foster intra Euro Area adjustment through structural reforms to strengthen competitiveness in deficit countries and to promote demand and growth in surplus countries. The European Union members of the G20 are determined to move forward expeditiously on measures to support growth including through completing the European Single Market and making better use of European financial means, such as the European Investment Bank (EIB), pilot project bonds, and structural and cohesion funds, for more targeted investment, employment, growth and competitiveness, while maintaining the firm commitment to implement fiscal consolidation to be assessed on a structural basis. We look forward to the Euro Area working in partnership with the next Greek government to ensure they remain on the path to reform and sustainability within the Euro Area.

12. All G20 members will take the necessary actions to strengthen global growth and restore confidence. Advanced economies will ensure that the pace of fiscal consolidation is appropriate to support the recovery, taking country-specific circumstances into account and, in line with the Toronto commitments, address concerns about medium term fiscal sustainability. Those advanced and emerging economies which have fiscal space will let the automatic fiscal stabilizers to operate taking into account national circumstances and current demand conditions. Should economic conditions deteriorate significantly further, those countries with sufficient fiscal space stand ready to coordinate and implement discretionary fiscal actions to support domestic demand, as appropriate. In many countries, higher investment in education, innovation and infrastructure can support the creation of jobs now while raising productivity and future growth prospects. Recognizing the need to pursue growth-oriented policies that support demand and recovery, the United States will calibrate the pace of its fiscal consolidation by ensuring that its public finances are placed on a sustainable long-run path so that a sharp fiscal contraction in 2013 is avoided.

13. Monetary policy will maintain price stability over the medium term while continuing to support the economic recovery. We will strengthen confidence in our banks, maintaining momentum on the financial sector reforms needed to safeguard our financial systems over the medium term while taking appropriate actions to protect credit channels and the integrity of the global payment and settlement systems. Healthy banks, with an ability to lend, are critical to the global recovery.

14. G20 members will remain vigilant of the evolution of oil prices and will stand ready to carry out additional actions as needed, including the commitment by producing countries to continue to ensure an appropriate level of supply consistent with demand. We welcome Saudi Arabia’s readiness to mobilize, as necessary, existing spare capacity to ensure adequate supply. We will also remain vigilant of other commodity prices.

15. A number of emerging markets are now also experiencing a slowdown in growth. In response, these countries are appropriately directing monetary and fiscal policies to support growth while ensuring stability and, in some cases, introducing new measures to boost their economies, in particular through strengthening domestic demand in a context of weaker external demand.

16. We welcome progress by countries with large current account surpluses to increase domestic demand and actions by countries with large current account deficits to increase national savings. Emerging surplus economies will carry out further actions to increase domestic consumption, including by removing price and tax distortions and strengthening social safety nets, while advanced surplus economies or those with relatively weak private demand will promote domestic demand, notably through the liberalization of service sectors and the promotion of investment, including through the removal of inefficiencies. Higher national savings in countries with current account deficits will contribute to a lasting reduction in global imbalances. We recognize the special circumstances of large commodity exporters with regard to current account surpluses. We reaffirm our commitment to move more rapidly toward market-determined exchange rate systems and exchange rate flexibility to reflect underlying fundamentals, avoid persistent exchange rate misalignments, and refrain from competitive devaluation of currencies. We also welcome the commitment by China to allow market forces to play a larger role in determining movements in the Renminbi (RMB), continue to reform its exchange rate regime, and to increase the transparency of its exchange rate policy.

17. All G20 members have put forward structural reform commitments to strengthen and sustain global demand, foster job creation, contribute to global rebalancing and increase growth potential. These include product market reforms to increase competition, measures to stabilize the housing sector, labor market reforms to boost competitiveness and employment, as well as steps to strengthen social safety nets in a way that is fiscally responsible, advance tax reform to raise productivity, increase investment in infrastructure, and promote inclusive green growth and sustainable development as appropriate to country circumstances. We ask Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors to consider ways in which the G20 can foster investment in infrastructure and ensure the availability of sufficient funding for infrastructure projects, including Multilateral Development Banks’ (MDBs) financing and technical support.

18. In all policy areas, we commit to minimize the negative spillovers on other countries of policies implemented for domestic purposes. We reaffirm our shared interest in a strong and stable international financial system. While capital flows can be beneficial to recipient economies, we reiterate that excess volatility of financial flows and disorderly movements in exchange rates have adverse implications for economic and financial stability.

19. Recognizing the importance of transparency and accountability in reinforcing credibility and confidence, we have agreed on the Los Cabos Accountability Assessment Framework that accompanies the Growth and Jobs Action Plan. This Framework establishes the procedures we will follow to report on progress in implementing our policy commitments. We welcome the first Accountability Report under this new framework. We task our Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors to present the second Accountability Report for the Leaders’ Summit in St. Petersburg in 2013.

Employment and Social Protection

20. Quality employment is at the heart of our macroeconomic policies. Jobs with labor rights, social security coverage and decent income contribute to more stable growth, enhance social inclusion and reduce poverty. We therefore endorse the recommendations of our Labor and Employment Ministers to urgently combat unemployment through appropriate labor market measures and fostering the creation of decent work and quality jobs, particularly for youth and other vulnerable groups, who have been severely hit by the economic crisis. We reaffirm our commitment to youth to facilitate their access to quality jobs, which will boost their life prospects. We welcome the work of the G 20 Task Force on Employment and extend its mandate for an additional year in the terms proposed by our Ministers. Consistent with the Los Cabos Growth and Jobs Action Plan, we consider that structural reforms, in full respect of the fundamental principles and rights at work, can play an important role in lifting economic growth to generate labor market opportunities, mobility and jobs. We also commit to intensify our efforts to strengthen cooperation in education, skills development and training policies, including internship and on-the-job training, which support a successful school-to-work transition.

21. Creating jobs and reducing unemployment, particularly among our youth and those most affected by the crisis, is central to all our countries. We welcome the report by the International Labour Organization (ILO), Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank on boosting jobs and living standards in G20 countries. We will continue to focus on measures to accelerate the pace of the recovery in jobs and the reduction in unemployment.
22. We recognize the importance of establishing nationally determined social protection floors. We will continue to foster inter-agency and international policy coherence, coordination, cooperation and knowledge sharing to assist low-income countries in capacity building for implementing nationally determined social protection floors. We ask international organizations to identify policy options with low-income countries on how to develop effective sustainable protection floors.

23. We commit to take concrete actions to overcome the barriers hindering women’s full economic and social participation and to expand economic opportunities for women in G20 economies. We also express our firm commitment to advance gender equality in all areas, including skills training, wages and salaries, treatment in the workplace, and responsibilities in care-giving.

24. We ask our Labor Ministers to review progress made on this agenda and we welcome consultations with social partners. In this regard, we appreciate the contribution of the Business-20 (B20) and Labor-20 (L20) to the process of the G20 under the Mexican Presidency.

25. We recognize the role of travel and tourism as a vehicle for job creation, economic growth and development, and, while recognizing the sovereign right of states to control the entry of foreign nationals, we will work towards developing travel facilitation initiatives in support of job creation, quality work, poverty reduction and global growth.

Trade

26. We are firmly committed to open trade and investment, expanding markets and resisting protectionism in all its forms, which are necessary conditions for sustained global economic recovery, jobs and development. We underline the importance of an open, predictable, rules-based, transparent multilateral trading system and we committed to ensure the centrality of the World Trade Organization (WTO).

27. Recognizing the importance of investment for boosting economic growth, we commit to maintaining a supportive business environment for investors.

28. We are deeply concerned about rising instances of protectionism around the world. Following up our commitment made in Cannes, we reaffirm our standstill commitment until the end of 2014 with regard to measures affecting trade and investment, and our pledge to roll back any new protectionist measure that may have arisen, including new export restrictions and WTO-inconsistent measures to stimulate exports. We also undertake to notify in a timely manner trade and investment restrictive measures. We uphold the inventory and monitoring work of the WTO, OECD and United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) on trade and investment measures and encourage them to reinforce and deepen the work in these areas, consistent with their respective mandates.

29. We value the discussion held by our Trade Ministers in Puerto Vallarta on the relevance of regional and global value chains to world trade, recognizing their role in fostering economic growth, employment and development and emphasizing the need to enhance the participation of developing countries in such value chains. We encourage a deepening of these discussions in the WTO, UNCTAD and OECD within their respective mandates, and we call on them to accelerate their work on analyzing the functioning of global value chains and their relationship with trade and investment flows, development and jobs, as well as on how to measure trade flows, to better understand how our actions affect our countries and others, and to report on progress under Russia’s Presidency.

30. In line with the Cannes Communiqué, we stand by the Doha Development Agenda mandate and reaffirm our commitment to pursue fresh, credible approaches to furthering trade negotiations across the board. We will continue to work towards concluding the Doha Round negotiations, including outcomes in specific areas where progress is possible, such as trade facilitation, and other issues of concern for least developed countries. We urge progress in streamlining WTO accession procedures for the world’s poorest countries.

31. We support strengthening the WTO through improving the way it conducts its regular business, and its dispute settlement system. We also direct our representatives to further discussions on challenges and opportunities for the multilateral trading system in a globalized economy.

Strengthening the international financial architecture

32. We recognize the importance of effective global and regional safety nets. We welcome the firm commitments to increase the resources available to the IMF. This is the result of a broad international cooperative effort that includes a significant number of countries. The commitments exceed $450 billion and are in addition to the quota increase under the 2010 Reform. These resources will be available for the whole membership of the IMF, and not earmarked for any particular region. These resources, which qualify as reserve assets, would be channeled through bilateral loans and investments such as note purchase agreements to the IMF’s
General Resources Account under the modalities which have been approved by the IMF Executive Board. This effort shows the G20 and the international community’s commitment to take the steps needed to safeguard global financial stability and enhance the IMF’s role in crisis prevention and resolution.

33. We reaffirm our commitment to implement in full the 2010 Quota and Governance Reform by the agreed date of the 2012 IMF/World Bank Annual Meetings. These reforms are crucial to enhancing the IMF’s legitimacy, relevance and effectiveness, and will support efforts to further strengthen Fund surveillance and to ensure that the IMF is adequately resourced to play its systemic role. As part of these reforms, we are committed to completing the comprehensive review of the quota formula, to address deficiencies and weaknesses in the current quota formula, by January 2013 and to complete the next general review of quotas by January 2014. We agree that the formula should be simple and transparent, consistent with the multiple roles of quotas, result in calculated shares that are broadly acceptable to the membership, and be feasible to implement based on timely, high quality and widely available data. We reaffirm that the distribution of quotas based on the formula should better reflect the relative weights of IMF members in the world economy, which have changed substantially in view of strong GDP growth in dynamic emerging markets and developing countries. We reaffirm the importance of continuing to protect the voice and representation of the poorest members of the IMF. We ask our Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors to review progress on this issue when they meet in November.

34. We agreed that the current surveillance framework should be significantly enhanced, including through a better integration of bilateral and multilateral surveillance with a focus on global, domestic and financial stability, including spillovers from countries’ policies. We welcome the work of the IMF to advance considerations for a proposed integrated surveillance decision and commit to support the decision process. We underscore the importance of rigorous surveillance on exchange rate policies and support a more ample coverage of surveillance activities, where relevant, including global liquidity, capital flows, capital account measures, reserve and fiscal, monetary and financial sector policies that could have an impact on external stability. We welcome the IMF’s ongoing work to produce an external sector report, which would strengthen multilateral analysis and enhance the transparency of surveillance. We also recognize that political ownership and traction is critical to effective surveillance, and that the International Monetary and Financial Committee (IMFC) has a role in facilitating the active involvement of all IMF members. We look forward to substantial progress by the next IMF/World Bank Annual Meetings.

35. We welcome the interim progress report and look forward to the joint annual progress report to support the development of local currency bond markets to be prepared by the World Bank, Regional Development Banks, IMF, OECD and the Bank of International Settlements (BIS). The full report will be presented at the November meeting of G20 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors. This issue is of great importance to emerging markets and developing countries, recognizing that the liquidity, efficiency and operation of these markets are being challenged by the current global financial situation.

Reforming the financial sector and fostering financial inclusion

36. We welcome the progress report by the Financial Stability Board (FSB) on taking forward the G20 commitments for strengthening financial stability and the FSB’s enhanced monitoring of implementation at the national level. We are committed to the timely, full and consistent implementation of agreed policies in order to support a stable and integrated global financial system and to prevent future crises.

37. We welcome the publication of the traffic lights scoreboard to track progress in the implementation of all our financial reform recommendations and pledge to take all necessary actions to make progress in the areas where difficulties in policy development or implementation have been identified.

38. In particular, we recognize the substantial progress to date in the priority reform areas identified by the FSB’s Coordination Framework for Implementation Monitoring (CFIM): the Basel capital and liquidity framework; the framework for global systemically important financial institutions (G-SIFIs), resolution regimes, over-the-counter (OTC) derivatives reforms, shadow banking, and compensation practices. We commit to complete work in these important areas to achieve full implementation of reforms.

39. We reaffirm our commitment that all standardized OTC derivative contracts should be traded on exchanges or electronic trading platforms, where appropriate, and cleared through central counterparties by end-2012. OTC derivative contracts should be reported to trade repositories and non-centrally cleared contracts should be subject to higher capital requirements. We welcome the FSB progress report on implementation. Now that substantial progress has been achieved in the four safeguards for a resilient and efficient global framework for central clearing, jurisdictions should rapidly finalize their decision-making and put in place the needed legislation and regulations to meet the G20 commitment for central clearing. We acknowledge the progress made to develop the key principles to promote internationally consistent minimum standards for the margining of non-centrally cleared derivatives and encourage international standard setters to finalize the proposed global margin standards by the end of this year, to match the implementation deadline for other OTC derivatives reforms and for the Basel capital framework.

40. We welcome progress in implementing Basel II, 2.5 and III and urge jurisdictions to fully implement the standards according to the agreed timelines. We welcome the Basel Committee’s consultative proposals for a fundamental review of the market risk framework. We welcome the FSB’s progress report on the implementation of the principles and standards for sound compensation practices, reaffirm our commitment to ensure that these are followed and ask the FSB to continue its ongoing monitoring.

41. We reiterate our commitment to make our national resolution regimes consistent with the FSB Key Attributes of Effective Resolution Regimes so that no bank or other financial institution is “too big to fail”. To this end, we also support the ongoing elaboration of recovery and resolution plans and institution-specific cross-border cooperation agreements for all G-SIFIs. We reiterate our commitment to strengthen the intensity and effectiveness of the supervision of SIFIs and ask the FSB to report on further progress in this area to the November 2012 G20 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors’ meeting.

42. We welcome progress on developing a set of principles as a common framework for the identification of, and policy measures relating to, domestic systemically important banks (D-SIBs) and ask our Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors to review recommendations in these areas at their meeting in November. We support continuing work for the strengthening of the oversight and regulation of the shadow banking system, and look forward to our Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors reviewing recommendations in these areas at their meeting in November. We ask the FSB in consultation with the International Association of Insurance Supervisors (IAIS) to complete their work on identification and policy measures for global systemically important insurers by April 2013. Towards reducing systemic risk, we look forward to the preparation by the FSB in consultation with International Organization of Securities Commissions (IOSCO) of methodologies to identify other systemically important non-bank financial entities by end-2012 and call on Committee on Payment and Settlement Systems (CPSS) and IOSCO to continue their work on systemically important market infrastructures. We also ask the IAIS to continue its work to develop a common framework for the supervision of internationally active insurance groups by end-2013.

43. We call for accelerated progress by national authorities and standard setting bodies in ending the mechanistic reliance on credit ratings and encourage steps that would enhance transparency of and competition among credit rating agencies. We support continuing work to achieve convergence to a single set of high-quality accounting standards. We welcome IOSCO’s report on the functioning of the credit default swap markets and ask IOSCO to report on next steps by the November 2012 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors’ meeting.

44. We endorse the FSB recommendations regarding the framework for development of a global legal entity identifier (LEI) system for parties to financial transactions, with a global governance framework representing the public interest. The LEI system will be launched by March 2013 and we ask the FSB to report on implementation progress by the November 2012 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors’ meeting. We encourage global adoption of the LEI to support authorities and market participants in identifying and managing financial risks.

45. We welcome the FSB study, prepared in coordination with the IMF and the World Bank, to identify potential unintended consequences of the agreed financial regulatory reforms for Emerging Markets and Developing Economies (EMDEs). We encourage continued monitoring analysis and reporting by the FSB and dialogue among the FSB, standard-setters, international financial institutions and national authorities of EMDEs, to address material unintended consequences as appropriate without prejudice to our commitment to implement the agreed reforms.

46. We endorse the recommendations and the revised FSB Charter for placing the FSB on an enduring organizational footing, with legal personality, strengthened governance, greater financial autonomy and enhanced capacity to coordinate the development and implementation of financial regulatory policies, while maintaining strong links with the BIS. We call for a full implementation of the recommendations by our next meeting and substantial progress by the November 2012 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors’ meeting. We call on the FSB to continue to keep under review the structure of its representation.

47. We welcome the ongoing work by the FSB on adherence to supervisory and regulatory information exchange and cooperation standards and look forward to a further public statement on progress under the initiative ahead of the Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors’ meeting in November 2012.

48. In the tax area, we reiterate our commitment to strengthen transparency and comprehensive exchange of information. We commend the progress made as reported by the Global Forum and urge all countries to fully comply with the standard and implement the recommendations identified in the course of the reviews, in particular the 13 jurisdictions whose framework does not allow them to qualify to phase 2 at this stage. We expect the Global Forum to quickly start examining the effectiveness of information exchange practices and to report to us and our finance ministers. We welcome the OECD report on the practice of automatic information exchange, where we will continue to lead by example in implementing this practice. We call on countries to join this growing practice as appropriate and strongly encourage all jurisdictions to sign the Multilateral Convention on Mutual Administrative Assistance. We also welcome the efforts to enhance interagency cooperation to tackle illicit flows including the outcomes of the Rome meeting of the Oslo Dialogue. We reiterate the need to prevent base erosion and profit shifting and we will follow with attention the ongoing work of the OECD in this area.

49. We support the renewal of the Financial Action Task Force (FATF) mandate, thereby sustaining global efforts to combat money laundering and the financing of terrorism and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. G20 members also welcome the adoption of the revised FATF standards and look forward to their implementation. We welcome the progress made by FATF in identifying and monitoring high-risk jurisdictions with strategic Anti-Money Laundering/Counter-Terrorist Financing (AML/CFT) deficiencies, using AML/CFT tools in the fight against corruption, improving transparency of corporate vehicles and increasing cooperation against tax crimes, addressing the risks posed by tax havens, as well as in increasing the reach and the effectiveness of AML/CFT measures by also considering financial inclusion efforts. We look forward to the completion in 2013 of the update of the FATF assessment process for the next round of mutual evaluations.

50. We welcome the progress made by the Global Partnership for Financial Inclusion (GPII) on implementing the five recommendations set out in its 2011 report and call on the GPII to continue working towards their full implementation. We endorse the G20 Basic Set of financial inclusion indicators developed by the GPII. Recognizing the key role that SMEs play in economic development, and poverty reduction, we welcome the launch of the SME Finance Compact that will support developing innovative models and approaches to address the specific access to finance challenges and constraints faced by developing countries with regards to SME finance. We welcome the forthcoming GPFI conference on standard setting bodies and financial inclusion as a means of helping to create an enabling regulatory environment, and we call on the GPFI to report progress to our Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors in November. Finally, we support the ongoing effort to create a fourth GPFI subgroup that will focus on consumer protection and financial literacy issues.

51. We acknowledge the efforts of those G20 and non-G20 countries committed to national coordination platforms and strategies for financial inclusion under the “G20 Financial Inclusion Peer Learning Program” and encourage similar efforts to advance effective implementation of the G20 Principles for Innovative Financial Inclusion such as the commitments to concrete actions to promote financial inclusion made by developing and emerging countries under the Maya Declaration, recognizing the ongoing efforts and the support by the World Bank Group and the Alliance for Financial Inclusion, and other stakeholders including the United Nations (UN), and bilateral donors to foster financial inclusion.

52. On financial education, we endorse the OECD/International Network on Financial Education (INFE) High Level Principles on National Strategies for Financial Education, and call on the OECD/INFE and the World Bank in cooperation with the GPFI to deliver further tools to promote financial education, with a progress report to the next Summit. For advancing the financial consumer protection agenda, we take note of the discussion on the Statutes of the International Financial Consumer Protection Network (FinCoNet) and on the issues of formal structure and financial support to ensure the exchange of best practices. We also endorse the Action Plan presented by the G20/OECD Task Force on Financial Consumer Protection to develop effective approaches to support the implementation of the High Level Principles on Financial Consumer Protection, and look forward to an update report by the Leaders’ Summit in St. Petersburg in 2013.

53. We recognize the need for women and youth to gain access to financial services and financial education, ask the GPFI, the OECD/INFE, and the World Bank to identify barriers they may face and call for a progress report to be delivered by the next Summit.

54. We welcome the launch of the Mexico Financial Inclusion Challenge:
Innovative Solutions for Unlocking Access, a call for innovations that address barriers to financial inclusion through the creation of valuable, affordable, secure, and comprehensive financial services.

Enhancing food security and addressing commodity price volatility

55. The Action Plan on Food Price Volatility and Agriculture adopted by the Ministers of Agriculture in 2011 underlined that to feed a world population expected to exceed 9.3 billion by 2050, agricultural production will have to increase between 50 and 70 percent, and by almost 100 percent in developing countries. We recognize that increasing production and productivity on a sustainable basis while considering the diversity of agricultural conditions is one of the most important challenges that the world faces today. The crisis in the Sahel and the Horn of Africa also underscores that strengthening emergency and long-term responses to food insecurity remains a pressing challenge. We also note that chronic malnutrition is an enormous drain on a country’s human resources, and we therefore support the Scaling Up Nutrition movement and encourage wider involvement of G20 members.

56. We welcome the considerable progress made in implementing the Action Plan and the food security pillar of the Seoul Multi-Year Action Plan on Development. We support the G20 Agriculture Vice-Ministers’ Report annexed to this Declaration, on the progress made on previous commitments and key recommendations on sustainably increasing agricultural productivity, containing inputs from several international organizations coordinated by the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) and the OECD, in addition to other recommendations from B20 and civil society.

57. To fight hunger, we commit to continue our efforts on our initiatives, including the Tropical Agriculture Platform, the Platform for Agricultural Risk Management, the GEO Global Agriculture Monitoring, research initiatives for wheat, rice and corn, the Rapid Response Forum, regional emergency food reserves, the Global Agriculture and Food Security Program and support for the Principles of Responsible Agriculture Investment. Recognizing the important contribution of greater transparency to reducing food price volatility, we welcome the progress made in the implementation of the Agricultural Market Information System (AMIS). We recognize that a more stable, predictable, distortion-free, open and transparent trading system, including as regards agriculture, has a critical role to play to promote food security.

58. We reaffirm our commitment to remove export restrictions and extraordinary taxes on food purchased for non-commercial humanitarian purposes by the World Food Programme (WFP). We encourage the implementation of the Voluntary Guidelines on the Responsible Governance of Tenure of Land, Fisheries and Forests in the Context of National Food Security.

59. We strongly welcome the launch of the “AgResults” Initiative, aimed at improving food security for the poor and vulnerable by encouraging private sector innovation of new agricultural products and systems constrained by market failures in agriculture. We look forward to the launch of the pilot projects focused on innovations in nutrient-fortified crops, post-harvest waste-reducing storage solutions and crop quality technologies in Sub-Saharan Africa. We commend those who have already committed or signaled their intention to commit funding to this initiative and encourage broader participation.

60. We recognize the need to adapt agriculture to climate change and we recognize the importance of improving the efficiency of water and soil use in a sustainable manner. To this end, we support the development of and a greater use of available technologies, well-known practices and techniques such as soil fertility enhancement, minimum tillage and agroforestry, and call upon international organizations to provide a report on science-based options to improve the efficiency of water use in agriculture including in ways particularly suitable for small farms.

61. We recognize the importance to the global economic recovery of maintaining stability in international commodity markets. We stress the importance of well-functioning and transparent physical and financial commodities’ markets and reduced excessive price volatility to achieve food security and strong growth that is both sustainable and inclusive. We recognize that excessive commodity price volatility has significant implications for all countries, increasing uncertainty for actors in the economy and potentially hampering stability of the budgets, and predictability of economic planning. We recognize that mitigating the negative effects of commodity price volatility on the most vulnerable is an important component of reducing poverty and boosting economic growth. We therefore endorse the conclusions of the G20 report on the macroeconomic impacts of excessive commodity price volatility on growth and its identification of policy options that countries could consider, taking account of national circumstances to mitigate any such effect. We also acknowledge and appreciate the participation and valuable inputs of the IMF, World Bank and UNCTAD. We ask our Finance Ministers to report in 2013 on progress on the G20’s contribution to facilitate better functioning of these physical markets, taking note of possible areas of further work outlined in the report. We reaffirm our commitment to enhance transparency and avoid abuse in financial commodity markets, including OTC, with effective intervention powers for market regulators and authorities and an appropriate regulation and supervisory framework. In this regard we look forward to IOSCO’s report on the implementation of its recommendations on commodity derivatives markets by November 2012.

62. We recognize that excessive price volatility in energy commodities is also an important source of economic instability. We remain committed to well-functioning and transparent energy markets. We will continue to work to improve the timeliness, completeness and reliability of JODI-Oil and look forward to a progress report next year. We will work on the JODI-Gas database on the same principles. We expect the International Energy Forum (IEF) report on improving the reliability of the JODI-Oil database and the report on transparency in international gas and coal markets submitted by the International Energy Agency (IEA), IEF, and Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) to be discussed by our Finance Ministers in November. We also look forward to IOSCO’s recommendations to improve the functioning and oversight of Price Reporting Agencies in November 2012, which will be produced in collaboration with other mandated organizations (IEF, IEA and OPEC), and task Finance Ministers to take concrete measures in this area as necessary.

Meeting the Challenges of Development

63. Eradicating poverty and achieving strong, inclusive, sustainable and balanced growth remain core objectives of the G20 development agenda. We reaffirm our commitment to work with developing countries, particularly low income countries, and to support them in implementing the nationally driven policies and priorities which are needed to fulfill internationally agreed development goals, particularly the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) and beyond.

64. We welcome the initiative of the Development Working Group to build upon the work of previous G20 presidencies, and its focus on three priorities during the Mexican Presidency - food security, infrastructure and inclusive green growth. We commend the progress achieved against our commitments in the Seoul Multi-Year Action Plan, and support the 2012 Development Working Group progress report annexed to this Declaration. We invite the Development Working Group to explore putting in place a process for ensuring assessment and accountability for G20 development actions by the next Summit.
65. Investment in infrastructure is critical for sustained economic growth, poverty reduction, and job creation. We therefore welcome the strong progress made under the Multi-Year Action Plan, including in implementing the recommendations of the Multilateral Development Banks’ (MDBs) Action Plan and the High Level Panel on Infrastructure.

66. While recognizing that public financing of infrastructure development projects in developing countries remains essential, we consider it should be complemented by private sector investment. We encourage MDBs to continue progress under the Action Plan, and welcome the report on addressing Misperception of Risk and Return in Low Income Countries. This contains important messages about properly perceiving the risks posed, as well as the opportunities offered, by long-term infrastructure investment in low income countries. Recognizing the challenge that rapid urbanization poses and the need to make cities more sustainable, we welcome the report on Best Practices for Urban Mass Transport Infrastructure Projects in Medium and Large Cities in Developing Countries, and support the follow-up actions as set out in the Development Working Group report.

67. We reaffirm our commitments to the global partnership for development, as set out in the MDGs, and welcome efforts to contribute to this end, including the Global Partnership for Effective Development Cooperation to be launched with voluntary participation under the auspices of the broad consensus achieved at the 4th High Level Forum on Aid Effectiveness held in Busan, Korea.

68. We recognize the value of Disaster Risk Management (DRM) tools and strategies to better prevent disasters, protect populations and assets, and financially manage their economic impacts. We appreciate World Bank and OECD combined efforts, with the UN’s support, to provide inputs and broaden participation in the discussion on DRM. We welcome the World Bank’s and Mexico’s joint publication on country experiences in this area with the support of G20 members, and look forward to the OECD voluntary framework to facilitate implementation of DRM strategies, to be completed by November.

Promoting longer-term prosperity through inclusive green growth

69. The long-term development and prosperity of current and future generations requires us to look beyond the immediate economic crisis. We acknowledge the importance of finding ways in which economic growth, environmental protection and social inclusion can complement and reinforce each other. Inclusive green growth in the context of sustainable development and poverty eradication can help achieve our development and economic goals, while protecting our environment, and improving social well-being on which our future depends. Inclusive green growth should not be used to introduce protectionist measures.

70. We commit to continue to help developing countries sustain and strengthen their development through appropriate measures, including those that encourage inclusive green growth. We will reaffirm our commitment to sustainable development at the 2012 United Nations Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20). We commit to maintaining a focus on inclusive green growth as part of our G20 agenda and in the light of agreements reached at Rio+20 and the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC).

71. Climate change will continue to have a significant impact on the world economy, and costs will be higher to the extent we delay additional action. We reiterate our commitment to fight climate change and welcome the outcome of the 17th Conference of the Parties to the UN climate change conferences. We are committed to the full implementation of the outcomes of Cancun and Durban and will work with Qatar as the incoming Presidency towards achieving a successful and balanced outcome at COP-18. We emphasize the need to structurally transform economies towards a climate-friendly path over the medium term. We welcome the creation of the G20 study group on climate finance, in order to consider ways to effectively mobilize resources taking into account the objectives, provisions and principles of the UNFCCC in line with the Cancun Agreement and ask to provide a progress report to Finance Ministers in November. We support the operationalization of the Green Climate Fund.

72. The Development Working Group discussed a broad set of practical, voluntary measures and actions that have the potential to help countries define their paths towards sustainable development based on their own circumstances and priorities. We believe that developing countries should have access to institutions and mechanisms that can facilitate knowledge sharing, resource mobilization and building technical and institutional capacity to design and implement inclusive green growth strategies and policies. We welcome international efforts in launching the Green Growth Knowledge Platform and will continue exploring options to provide appropriate support to interested developing countries. We welcome the delivery of a non-prescriptive, voluntary toolkit of policy options for inclusive green growth and encourage efforts to promote its implementation. We encourage further exploration of effective mechanisms to mobilize public and private funds for inclusive green growth investment.
We highlight that green growth and sustainable development have strong potential to stimulate long term prosperity and well being. We welcome the report prepared by the OECD, the World Bank and the UN on incorporating green growth and sustainable development policies into structural reform agendas, tailored to specific country conditions and level of development. We also acknowledge the G20 efforts to voluntarily self-report on current actions taken to integrate green growth and sustainable development into structural reform agendas. We will self-report again in 2013, on a voluntary basis, and ask appropriate officials to report back on countries’ efforts and progress on incorporating green growth policies in structural reform agendas and in relevant national plans to promote sustainable development.

We welcome the progress report on fossil fuel subsidies, and we reaffirm our commitment to rationalize and phase out inefficient fossil fuel subsidies that encourage wasteful consumption over the medium term while providing targeted support for the poorest. We ask Finance Ministers to report back by the next Summit on progress made, and acknowledging the relevance of accountability and transparency, to explore options for a voluntary peer review process for G20 members by their next meeting. We also welcome a dialogue on fossil fuel subsidies with other groups already engaged in this work.

In Cannes we committed to promote low-carbon development strategies in order to optimize the potential for green growth and ensure sustainable development in our countries and beyond. We therefore welcome the report on clean energy and energy efficiency technologies and acknowledge the G20 countries’ efforts to foster investment in these technologies through the sharing of national experiences regarding challenges for technology deployment.

We welcome the establishment of a Global Marine Environment Protection Best Practices Sharing Mechanism website, and look forward to its launch in accordance with the Cannes mandate.

Intensifying the fight against corruption

Corruption impedes economic growth, threatens the integrity of markets, undermines fair competition, distorts resource allocation, destroys public trust and undermines the rule of law. We call on all relevant stakeholders to play an active role in fighting corruption.
78. Closing the implementation and enforcement gap remains an important priority, and we continue to make significant progress towards the full implementation of the Seoul G20 Anti-Corruption Action Plan, and the commitments made in the Cannes Monitoring Report. We reiterate our commitment to the ratification and full implementation of the United Nations Convention against Corruption (UNCAC), and to more active engagement with the OECD working group on bribery on a voluntary basis. We welcome continuing engagement from the B20 in the fight against corruption and, in accordance with the Terms of Reference of the review mechanism, will involve the private sector and civil society in the UNCAC review process on a voluntary basis. We endorse today the G20 Anti-Corruption Working Group principles for denial of entry to our countries of corrupt officials, and those who corrupt them, and will continue to develop frameworks for cooperation. We also endorse the Working Group's principles for financial and asset disclosure systems for relevant officials to prevent, identify and appropriately manage conflicts of interest.

79. We commit to enforcing anti-corruption legislation, and we will pursue those who receive and solicit bribes as well as those who pay them in line with our countries' legislation. To help facilitate international cooperation among G20 and non-G20 governments in their investigation and prosecution of corruption, we will publish a guide on Mutual Legal Assistance from G20 countries, as well as information on tracing assets in G20 jurisdictions. We renew our commitment to deny safe haven to the proceeds of corruption and to the recovery and restitution of stolen assets.

80. We extend the mandate of the Anti-Corruption Working Group for two years to the end of 2014 and request the Working Group to prepare a comprehensive action plan, as well as a second Working Group Monitoring Report, both to be presented for consideration and adoption by Sherpas by the end of 2012.

Other paragraphs

81. In light of the interconnectedness of the world economy, the G20 has led to a new paradigm of multilateral co-operation that is necessary in order to tackle current and future challenges effectively. The informal and flexible character of the G20 enables it to facilitate international economic and financial cooperation, and address the challenges confronting the global economy. It is important that we continue to further improve the transparency and effectiveness of the G20, and ensure that it is able to respond to pressing needs. As a contribution to this, in line with the commitment made in Cannes, Sherpas have developed a set of evolving G20 working practices.
82. An informal meeting of G20 Ministers of Foreign Affairs was held in Los Cabos in February, which explored the ways in which G20 member countries could contribute more effectively to address key challenges in global governance.

83. Recognizing the far-reaching impact of G20 decisions, we welcome the extensive outreach efforts undertaken by the Mexican Presidency, including the meetings of Business-20, Labor-20, Youth-20, and Think-20. We will continue developing efforts with non-members, regional and international organizations, including the UN and other actors. In line with the Cannes mandate, in order to ensure our outreach remains consistent and effective, we welcome a set of principles in this area, developed by Sherpas.

84. We thank international organizations, including the UN, IMF, World Bank, WTO, FSB, ILO, FAO, and OECD, as well as civil society, for their input into the G20 process. Their reports and recommendations have provided valuable inputs to G20 discussions, in areas ranging from sustainable development to financial regulation.

Conclusion

85. We look forward to the rest of the work that will take place during Mexico’s Presidency until November 30. On 1 December, 2012, Russia will start chairing the G20. We will convene in St. Petersburg, under the Chairmanship of Russia. We thank Mexico for hosting a successful Los Cabos Summit.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I have been away from India to participate in the group of 20 meeting in Los Cabos and the last two days in Rio to participate in the current conference on Sustainable Development. My statements on both the occasions are already with you. I will be happy to answer any questions that you may want to ask.

Question: Sir, at G20 India indicated contribution of 10 billion US$ to IMF kitty to sort out Euro crisis but surprisingly even this well intentioned move has been wrongly interpreted in the country. Would you like to say something?

PM: We are members of the International Monetary Fund and we would like the IMF to play an important role in resolving various difficulties that are on the horizon in the international economy and financial system. And if this Fund has to play its requisite role then it has been agreed at Los Cabos that the member countries of the Fund will contribute 450 billion Dollars to enable the IMF to come to the rescue of countries in need. As a responsible member of the international community, it was our bounden duty also to make our contribution. And let me say that before making this announcement I had a discussion among the BRICS leaders and all BRICS leaders have made similar contributions. So I don’t think there is anything wrong in our contributing to the IMF. This contribution will be used only when needed and it will also continue to be part of India’s reserves.

Question: Sir, during your address in Mexico you spent a long time talking about the sharp slowdown in the Indian economy, putting in place transparent and stable policies, correcting some of the inherent constraints and taking tough decisions including controlling subsidies. Do you think equations have changed enough in the run up to the Presidential polls to push forward some of these tough decisions quickly?

PM: We owe it to our country to take all the necessary decisions which would return the country to a high growth path. There are problems with regard to the fiscal management. We will tackle that problem effectively and credibly. There are problems with regard to management of the balance of payments deficit on the current account. Those problems also we will tackle. It will not be proper for me to talk about these things in detail, but, you have my assurance that I recognise that we have to work our way to restore the momentum of growth that India needs and which the people of India want the Government of India to work for. Also, I think the events of the last couple of days convince me more than ever before that there are no international solutions to the problems of a country of India’s size, of India’s diversity. So it is obligatory on us, and here I would urge all political parties to work with the Government to restore the momentum of growth that this country is capable of and which this country needs.

Question: I have a question on black money. What was the sense during G20 on black money and has it become irrelevant or has there been any improvement?

PM: It is too early to say one way or the other. The problem is there but there are no magic solutions available. I think it is going to be a slow process.

Question: In Rio, you have mentioned that countries that are technically advanced are not transferring technology and are not cooperating. Could you elaborate this point?

PM: International gatherings are an essay in persuasion. The poor countries need more money, more capital to sustain high growth rates for their economies. They also need increased flow of technologies on favourable terms to accelerate the process of their economic growth. Lot of lip sympathy has been paid and is being paid by the developed countries to the idea that we are living in an increasingly interdependent world and that the developed countries have an obligation to help the developing countries. In practice, the overall situation on ground, as I have pointed out in my speech at the Rio Conference, is not very flattering. So as far as India is concerned, I have already mentioned we must plan our economy in such a manner that we cannot expect outside help on a scale which can see us through our difficulties. We have to raise our economy through our own good steps.

079. Press Release of the Ministry of Environment and Forests on the meeting of the ASEAN - India Environment Ministers’ meeting.

New Delhi, September 8, 2012.

The Ministry of Environment & Forests hosted the ASEAN-India Environment Ministers’ Meeting on September 7, 2012 at New Delhi. The Environment Ministers’ Meeting was preceded by a meeting of senior officials of ASEAN member states and senior officials of Ministry of Environment & Forest and Ministry of External Affairs on September 6, 2012.

The ASEAN-India Environment Ministers’ meeting was co-chaired by Mrs. Jayanthi Natarajan, Hon’ble Minister of State (Independent Charge) Environment & Forests, India and H.E. Pehin Orang Kaya Indera Pahlawan Dato Seri Setia Awang Haji Suyoi Bin Haji Osman, Hon’ble Minister of Development, Brunei Darussalam and attended by senior delegates from Cambodia, Lao PDR, Malaysia, Myanmar, Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and the ASEAN Secretariat.

Both sides discussed various aspects of biodiversity conservation. The meeting unanimously adopted the ‘New Delhi ASEAN-India Ministerial Statement on Biodiversity’ whereby both sides agreed to enhance awareness among all stakeholders, strive towards mainstreaming biodiversity concerns into development processes, and to strive towards enhancing priority in terms of resource allocation and mobilization for biodiversity conservation.

Both sides also agreed to work together for conservation and management of flagship species and enhancing conservation management & sustainable utilization of Coastal and Marine biodiversity. The statement further agrees to take preparatory national work as a sound and informed basis for ratifying the Nagoya Protocol on Access and Benefit Sharing.

The meeting called upon The Eleventh Conference of Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD) to discuss issues relating to biodiversity & livelihoods regularly and recommend concrete actions, considering the critical linkages of biodiversity with livelihoods and poverty alleviation.

Both sides agreed to meet and exchange views on issues of common interest at appropriate ASEAN Environment Ministers’ Meetings.

Remarks by the Prime Minister at the inauguration of the High Level Segment of the 11th Conference of Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity.

I am truly delighted to welcome each one of you to this historic city of Hyderabad. India is truly privileged to host for the first time the Conference of Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity. This is also the first such Conference since the launch of the United Nations Decade of Biodiversity last year.

The 11th Conference of Parties is being held at an important juncture. This year marks the 20th anniversary of the Earth Summit at Rio de Janeiro, when the world came together to adopt many far-reaching documents, including two legally binding Conventions.

In recent years, it has become increasingly more difficult to find common ground on environmental issues. This is, indeed, unfortunate given that there is today a much higher global awareness of environmental risks and concerns. It is this consciousness that should provoke us to greater action even as we cope with the pressures of the current global economic downturn.

I am, however, glad that negotiations regarding biodiversity have achieved remarkable success. India has recently ratified the Nagoya Protocol and formalised our commitment to it. I would urge all the Parties to do likewise because concerted global action is imperative and cannot brook any further delay. Despite global efforts, the 2010 biodiversity target that we had set for ourselves under the Convention on Biological Diversity was not fully met. This situation needs to change. The critical issue really is how to mobilise the necessary financial, technical and human resources, particularly the incubation, sharing and transfer of technology.

In our country, protecting and promoting biodiversity has always been an integral part of our ethos and our civilization. This can be seen in the thousands of sacred groves that are found all over the country. Our traditional systems of agriculture and medicine depend on plant and animal biodiversity. Conserving the wild ancestors and relatives of the cultivars we use today is of paramount importance to us.

In recent years there has been concern that this public knowledge may become restricted in its use because of the application of the modern intellectual property system. India has tried a unique approach to protection of traditional knowledge by establishing a Traditional Knowledge Digital Library. This database has 34 million pages of information in five international languages in formats easily accessible by patent examiners. This Library promotes the objectives of the Nagoya Protocol on the issue of protection of codified traditional knowledge systems such as the celebrated Ayurveda.

We decided to build this knowledge database because of the patent on the use of neem extract in Europe and another on the use of turmeric as a healing agent. Since then, because of this database, over 1000 cases of biopiracy have been identified and over 105 claims withdrawn or cancelled by patent offices.

We believe that the treasure trove of traditional knowledge should be used for the benefit of all humankind rather than for private profit. We will continue to work to strengthen our institutions to record this knowledge, to value its science and to provide benefits to its custodians. Multilateral agencies like the WIPO and some countries have approached us for assistance in setting up such libraries and our government will be happy to provide necessary assistance.

Indian farmers have always believed in the free use of seeds. The Protection of Plant Varieties and Farmers’ Rights’ Act of India confers intellectual property to farmers through registration of seed varieties. In our Patent Act we have adopted disclosure requirements on the origin of inventions based on biodiversity. But I believe a lot more needs to be done. We need to build on this experience and build living germplasm laboratories in our fields.

We know that food security is a key challenge for the world, particularly in an increasingly climate vulnerable world. Biodiversity, found in our forests and our fields, could provide us keys to the solutions of the future. So we need to build a movement to conserve traditional varieties of crops.

Our approach to protecting and promoting biodiversity has been guided by the belief that all three objectives of the Convention on Biological Diversity, namely, conservation, sustainable use and sharing of benefits from the utilization of genetic resources, should receive adequate and equal focus. This approach is the basis of India’s Biological Diversity Act of 2002. The 2008 National Biodiversity Action Plan further identifies specific action points by various government agencies.

Despite the pressure on land in our densely populated country, India has more than 600 Protected Areas, covering approximately 5% of the total geographical area of the country, in a network of National Parks, Wildlife Sanctuaries, and Conservation Reserves. We have special programmes for some high-profile endangered species like tigers and elephants. In 2010, the country level status assessment for tigers showed an increase in their number to an estimated 1706 from an estimated 1411 in the year 2006.

We recognise that we have to look beyond large animal species and take a more organic approach to conservation. We have, therefore, initiated work on species recovery programmes on 16 identified endangered species including the snow leopard, hangul and lion. Such country level efforts at preservation should be complemented by enhanced international collaboration to check wildlife crime.

The challenge going forward is to develop new models of inclusive conservation. In India, we have legislated a Forest Rights Act that lends legal sanctity to the rights of forest dwellers, who are often the best friends of the biodiversity that resides in these magnificent forests.

We will have to adopt similarly innovative approaches to deal with the issue of protecting fishermen’s livelihoods even as we negotiate a framework on sustainable use of marine biodiversity in the high seas.

There is a realisation that ecosystem services form a much higher percentage of the “GDP of the Poor” than of classical GDP calculations. Biodiversity based livelihood options form the basis of rural survival in many parts of the world. Living at the periphery of subsistence, the poor are the most at risk from biodiversity loss. They should not also be the ones to bear the cost of biodiversity conservation while the benefits are enjoyed by society at large.

India’s initiatives acknowledge this correlation between biodiversity conservation and poverty eradication. Our efforts have focused on biodiversity conservation while protecting and promoting livelihoods, particularly in our rural areas. Participatory approaches that encourage and incentivize the involvement of local communities is a key element in our efforts towards conservation.

We have also found that many development schemes can be realigned to provide biodiversity-related benefits. This is vital to protect habitats, including our water bodies, which are beyond our protected areas. The Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme for example, with an annual outlay of US$ 6 billion, aims to create legally mandated green jobs for every rural household in our country.

On the occasion of this conference, I am pleased to launch the Hyderabad Pledge and announce that our Government has decided to earmark a sum of US$ 50 million during India’s presidency of the Conference of Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity to strengthen the institutional mechanism for biodiversity conservation in India. We will use these funds to enhance the technical and human capabilities of our national and state-level mechanisms to attain the Convention on Biological Diversity objectives. We have also earmarked funds to promote similar capacity building in developing countries.

Humankind should understand the importance of preserving biodiversity. The diversity of life forms on Earth is the culmination of millions of years of the productive genius of nature. It is nature’s insurance against extreme events that may disturb the delicate balance of this planet. We need to work together and act before a catastrophe is upon us. India stands committed to work with all parties to reach the happy compromise that will secure a future that provides ecological and economic space for each one of us and sustainable growth for all of us. I thank you.”

"It is a great privilege to welcome you all to the High Level Segment of the Eleventh Conference of Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity. I congratulate you for the successful conclusion of the Sixth Meeting of Parties to the Cartagena Protocol on Biosafety. I am glad that the International Community is acknowledging the gravity of the issues pertaining to loss of Biological Diversity, and is willing to bring these concerns to the world center stage.

India has always taken a lead in global endeavors on various environmental issues. We played a very constructive role in achieving a successful outcome at the Durban Conference which delivered a breakthrough on the international community’s response to climate change and at the recently concluded Rio+20 Summit on Sustainable Development.

The past week has witnessed intense negotiations amongst Parties to arrive at concrete conclusions on critical issues in Biological Diversity conservation. I am hopeful that the deliberations in the High Level Segment during the next three days will facilitate consensus on important issues.

The four themes slated for discussion in the High Level Segment, namely Biodiversity for Livelihoods and Poverty Reduction; Implementation of the Strategic Plan of Biodiversity 2011-2020; Coastal and Marine Biodiversity and Implementation of Nagoya Protocol on Access to Genetic Resources and Benefit Sharing have been selected after much deliberation. These themes are most appropriate to address the key issues relating to biodiversity loss and strategies to find suitable solutions.

Friends, resource mobilization is the most important unfinished agenda that we have inherited from CoP-10 as we could not succeed in adopting targets for resource mobilization as a means to achieve the Aichi Targets. I urge the Parties to CBD to agree to some measures, commitments and targets on resource mobilization, even if on an interim basis so as to infuse confidence in Parties as also to generate momentum for implementation of the Aichi Targets. This is crucial because if we are not able to agree to any measures on resource mobilization at CoP-11, then four out of ten year period of Strategic Plan for the decade 2011-2020, would have gone, making it all the more difficult to achieve the targets by 2020. This would be our collective failure. We have failed once to achieve CBD’s 2010 biodiversity targets. Our future generations will not forgive us if we fail again in 2020. I am sure that you all will show the statesmanship and leadership which will help the negotiations on resource mobilization to reach a successful conclusion.

More than half of the world’s population lives in cities, and we are witnessing a fast pace of urbanization all across the world. Urbanization brings improvement in the quality of life of people. At the same time, it is associated with more intensive consumption patterns which invariably cause major impacts on biodiversity. It is estimated that half of India’s population will also be living in cities by 2045. I am happy that a parallel Summit on ‘Cities for Life’ has been held on the margins of CoP-11, bringing together sub-national and local authorities. I am confident that this will go a long way in bringing biodiversity back into the Urban Agenda.

Role of Communication, Education, Public Awareness is most critical to achieve the strategic goals and Aichi Biodiversity targets. The outcome document from the Conference on “Biodiversity conservation and Education for Sustainable Development”, held on the side line of the COP, has made very useful suggestions, that could greatly influence Communication, Education and Public Awareness plans.

I would specially mention of innovative communication through “Science Express: Biodiversity Special”- a mobile biodiversity exhibition train, which we have showcased as CoP brand ambassador, and is scheduled to run 18,000 Km in its first leg. It is creating unprecedented public awareness on biodiversity across the country, particularly, amongst children and youth, and has already been visited by over 1.5 million people.

In the end I would like to quote Mahatma Gandhi, the Father of our nation once again. He said, ‘You must be the change you wish to see in the world.’ Friends, we cannot loose time in arriving at consensus for conservation of Biological Diversity. We must strive to reach consensus now, when we all are sitting here on the negotiation tables.

I express my sincere thanks to the Chief Minister of Andhra Pradesh, Mr. N. Kiran Kumar Reddy and his Government for their tireless efforts and support in organizing this mega event. I hopethat your stay here in Hyderabad has been comfortable and you have also had a chance to see this beautiful city. The road ahead is tough, but we all need to stand united to address the challenges that threaten our very existence. “
082. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Environment and Forests on the High Level Segment of CoP - 11 held in Hyderabad.

New Delhi, October 19, 2012.

“The High Level Segment (HLS) of the Eleventh Meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity (CoP-11) convened between 16-18 October 2012 witnessed active and stimulating discussions on the four main themes of the HLS. Nearly, 120 Parties and others made statements including Ministers and Heads of Delegation of Parties, representatives of regional groups, International organizations and Multi stakeholder groups including non-governmental organizations, indigenous and local communities, women and youth have held active discussions revolving around four issues and related matters.

On the theme of status of biological diversity, it was recognized that biological loss led to livelihood loss resulting in persistence of poverty. Parties indicated the progress made in achieving Aichi targets through increase in the forests, coastal and marine protected areas. They also outlined the threats faced by various ecosystems.

On the theme of activities relevant to the conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity, participants noted the special programmes and projects initiated at national, sub-national and regional level and observed the need to document the wealth of traditional knowledge among indigenous and local communities. In - country initiatives for protection of biodiversity within a legal framework, development of community oriented programmes and activities for awareness and capacity building have been undertaken to educate stakeholders.
There is a need to undertake precautionary approach while adopting biotechnological innovations.

On the theme of implementation of the strategic plan on biodiversity, the need to implement biodiversity activities at different levels of governance within a country and the need to ensure substantial financial resources from developed to developing countries, particularly Least Developed Countries and Small Island Developing States and mobilization of domestic resources were underlined.
Countries indicated aligning their national plans with Aichi targets and the need to conserve biodiversity in the context of sustainable development and poverty eradication. Gender equity was identified as a cross cutting issue in biodiversity related efforts. Parties viewed that valuation of ecosystem services is an important tool in mainstreaming the biodiversity conservation, priorities in the programmes and activities.

On the theme of status on the ratification of Nagoya Protocol on access to genetic resources and benefit sharing, participants urged greater political commitment to expedite the process of ratification and the need for new and additional financial resources and technical support for capacity building initiatives, including innovative financing.

The four Panel discussions generated considerable interest. In the Panel on implementation of the Strategic Plan on biodiversity 2011-2020, mainstreaming of biodiversity into national policies, involvement of all stakeholders for planning and implementation and support for development of baseline data were emphasized. Substantial financial resources through conventional mechanisms were required.

In the Panel on biodiversity for livelihoods and poverty reduction, the need to integrate biodiversity with livelihood security conforming to the principles of inter and intra generational equity and justice, and right’s based approach was underlined. Parties agreed to continue discussions related to ‘Biodiversity and Livelihoods’, and ‘Biodiversity and Health’ and recommend concrete actions, considering the critical linkages of biodiversity with livelihoods, health and poverty alleviation.

In the Panel on coastal and marine biodiversity, the major challenges of conservation such as over fishing, ocean acidification, sea bed mining etc were mentioned and need to regulate such activities was underlined. A differential approach was necessary to deal with artisanal and commercial fishing. There was a suggestion to establish an International Research Centre on Ocean and Marine Resources under the United Nations.

In the Panel on implementation of Nagoya Protocol and access to genetic resources and benefit sharing, participants underlined the on-going domestic preparatory process in their countries and the benefits such ratification would bring, including addressing the issue of bio-piracy.
The world’s governments have agreed to increase funding in support of actions to halt the rate of loss of biodiversity at the eleventh meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Convention on Biological Diversity, which ended today.

Developed countries agreed to double funding to support efforts in developing states towards meeting the internationally-agreed Biodiversity Targets, and the main goals of the Strategic Plan for Biodiversity 2011-2020.

The Saragasso Sea, the Tonga archipelago and key corals sites off the coast of Brazil are among a range of marine areas to receive special attention by governments as part of renewed efforts to sustainably manage the world’s oceans agreed in Hyderabad. Many of the areas are beyond national jurisdictions and, as such, receive little or no protection at present.

Other key decisions taken at the 11th Conference of the Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD COP 11) include new measures to factor biodiversity into environmental impact assessments linked to infrastructure and other development projects in marine and coastal areas.

Braulio Ferreira de Souza Dias, Executive Secretary of the Convention on Biological Diversity said: “These results, coming in a period of economic crisis, demonstrate that the world is committed to implementing the CBD. We see that governments are moving forward in implementation and seeing biodiversity as an opportunity to be realized more than a problem to be solved.”

“We now need to move forward in the next two years, under the able leadership of India, the COP 11 president, to consolidate this work and to advance further. I look forward to other pledges in support of the Hyderabad call for Biodiversity Champions that will allow us to realize our goals” he said.

Smt. Jayanthi Natarajan, Minister for Environment and Forests for India, and President of the COP said: “The present economic crisis should not deter us, but on the contrary encourage us to invest more towards amelioration of the natural capital for ensuring uninterrupted ecosystem services, on which all life on earth depends.”

“The UN biodiversity conference in Hyderabad has taken forward the renewed momentum, forged two years ago in Nagoya,” said United Nations Under-Secretary-General and UN Environment Programme Executive Director Achim Steiner.
“Countries have sent a clear signal and delivered additional commitments underlining the fact that biodiversity and ecosystems are a development priority and central to a transition to an inclusive Green Economy,” added Mr. Steiner.

“Mobilizing the necessary financial resources from the public and private sector needed to ensure achievement of the 2020 targets remains a challenge - but here in India, many nations including developing economies have signalled their determination and sense of urgency to seize the opportunities by providing much needed additional support,” said Mr. Steiner.

Agreements on Funding

Developed countries agreed at the conference to increase funding to support efforts in developing states towards meeting the Aichi Biodiversity Targets.

Using a baseline figure of the average annual national spending on biodiversity between 2006 and 2010, developed countries said they would double biodiversity-related international financial flows by 2015. The COP also set targets to increase the number of countries that have included biodiversity in their national development plans, and prepared national financial plans for biodiversity, by 2015.

All Parties agreed to substantially increase domestic expenditures for biodiversity protection over the same period. These targets, and progress towards them, will be reviewed in 2014.

For the first time, developing countries at COP 11, including India and several African states, pledged additional funds above and beyond their core funding towards the work of the CBD.

The conference also saw the launch of the Hyderabad Call for Biodiversity Champions. The programme will accept pledges from governments and organizations in support of the Strategic Plan for Biodiversity. The government of India this week committed over US$ 50 million as part of the programme.

The Global Environment Facility, the financial mechanism of the Convention, for the first time, was provided with an assessment of the financial resources required to meet the needs of developing countries for implementing the Convention.

Marine Biodiversity

The 193 Parties to the CBD agreed to classify a diverse list of marine areas, some renowned for containing ‘hidden treasures’ of the plant and animal world, as ecologically or biologically significant.

Earlier this week, UNEP launched its Protected Planet 2012 report which found that half of the world’s richest biodiversity zones remain entirely unprotected - despite a 60 per cent increase in the number of protected areas since 1990.
To meet the Aichi Biodiversity Target of ensuring that 10 per cent of marine areas are protected by 2020, says the UNEP report, an additional 8 million square kilometres of marine and coastal areas would need to be recognized as protected - an area just over the size of Australia.

COP agreed to transmit the results of this classification work to the United Nations General Assembly so that they can be considered by relevant UN processes linked to the United Nations Convention on Law of the Sea, in particular the United Nations General Assembly Working Group which is considering the development of an international agreement for biodiversity conservation in marine areas beyond national jurisdiction.

Parties to the Convention also called for more research into the potential adverse effects of underwater noise from ships on marine and coastal biodiversity, and highlighted the growing concern on the adverse effects of marine litter. It also recognized the growing challenge of climate change impacts on coral reefs, which, Parties agreed, will require significant investment to overcome.

There was also a call to fisheries management bodies to play a stronger role in addressing the impacts of fisheries on biodiversity.

The series of agreements at COP 11 on oceans and coasts builds on the commitment of countries made at the United Nations Rio+20 summit in June to protect and restore marine ecosystems and to maintain their biodiversity.

National Biodiversity Plans

Much of the COP 11 negotiations revolved around practical and financial support for countries in implementing national biodiversity plans to meet the Strategic Plan for Biodiversity and the 2020 Aichi Biodiversity Targets.

In reviewing global progress in implementing such measures, the COP reaffirmed the need for enhanced technical and scientific cooperation among countries, while underlining the potential for enhanced cooperation among developing countries. To support such efforts, a new National Biodiversity Strategies and Action Plans Forum (NBSAP Forum) was launch at COP11 by UNEP, CBD, The Global Environment Facility (GEF) and the UN Development Programme (UNDP). The online forum provides easy-to-access, targeted information such as best practices, guidelines and learning tools for countries.

UNEP’s Economics of Ecosystems and Biodiversity (TEEB) Initiative also presented a series of practical guides for governments at COP 11 for integrating the economic, social and cultural value of ecosystems into national biodiversity plans.

COP 11 also agreed to a number of measures to engage the main economic sectors, such as business and development organizations, to integrate biodiversity objectives in their plans and programmes.
COP 11 developed new work in support of achieving Aichi Target 15 which calls for the restoration of 15% of degraded lands. This work was supported by a call, in the margins of the meeting, by the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC), the UN Convention to Combat Desertification (UNCCD) and other bodies for concerted action in support of the decision.

A decision on climate change and biodiversity called for enhanced collaboration between the CBD and UN climate change initiatives including Reducing Emissions from Deforestation and Forest Degradation (REDD+).

Given that forests are home to more than half of all terrestrial species, initiatives such as REDD+, where developing countries can receive payments for carbon offsets for their standing forests, can potentially help achieve international biodiversity targets, as well as those concerned with cutting carbon emissions.

The decision covers technical advice on the conservation of forests, sustainable management of forests, and enhancement of forest carbon stocks.

However the COP also noted discussions around the need for biodiversity safeguards relating to REDD+ and similar incentives. Actions such as afforestation in areas of high biodiversity value, or the conversion of natural forests to plantations, for example, may have adverse impacts on biodiversity.

The COP adopted recommendations for improving the sustainable use and management of species hunted for ‘bushmeat’ in tropical and sub-tropical regions, where large-scale hunting and trade of animals has led to ‘empty forest syndrome’, and is increasingly threatens food security, and the ecological stability of forests and other ecosystems. Together with FAO and other organizations, the CBD Secretariat will establish a global ‘Collaborative Partnership on Sustainable Wildlife Management’ to support developing countries in the implementation of relevant CBD provisions.

COP 11 adopted a decision on protected areas that provides a framework for achieving Aichi target 11. It calls for integration of national action plans for Protected Areas into revised National Biodiversity Strategies and action Plans.

A parallel summit of Cities and Local Authorities was convened with the support of ICLEI. Participants adopted the Hyderabad Declaration on Subnational Governments, Cities and other Local Authorities for Biodiversity, which supports the work of cities to achieve the Global Strategy for Biodiversity and calls for greater coordination between levels of government.

I am delighted at the privilege to be amongst all of you today at the Look East Economic Summit 2012. This initiative of the Indian Chamber of Commerce which has grown over the years and now brings together an extremely distinguished gathering to focus on a very important aspect of India's foreign policy. The “Look East Policy” of India is multi-dimensional. Its basis is the civilisational linkages between India and East Asia; similarity of views and concerns of our countries; complementarity of capacities and of our individual economies and business environments. And its long-term objective is to strengthen synergies at the people-to-people and business-to-business levels. All this requires deliberative endeavour, clarity of objective, optimisation of resources and a constant and dynamic interface between the opinion makers, end-users and decision-makers in our countries. It requires an on-going dialogue of ideas, mindful of both the objectives and the very real requirements in our countries. The Ministry of External Affairs is, therefore, happy to be associated with the Seminar today.

An important backdrop to our discussions here in Kolkata is the growing belief that this century would be an Asian century. Our collective effort thus far, therefore, to forge closer engagement and deeper economic integration need to be assessed in this context. Another aspect of considerable importance today is the growth in capacities and capabilities that we see across the region for undertaking such a mutually beneficial partnership. India in the early 1990s had initiated a “Look East Policy” not merely as a dimension of its external economic policy but as recognition of the strategic shift of global focus to Asia and India’s capacity to partner the processes in this part of the world. While the “Look East Policy” covers a wider area, today the focus of my address will be ASEAN and South East Asia.

Over the years, there has been a certain dynamism in bringing together the synergies between India and South East Asia in particular, in a mutually beneficial manner. This is reflected in our reiteration at the highest levels, including by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh in his remarks at the 9th ASEAN India Summit held in Bali, Indonesia on November 19, 2011 that, India’s partnership with ASEAN is one of the corner stones of our foreign policy and the foundation of India’s “Look East Policy”.

Since its specific formulation in 1991, and I say specific because elements of India’s Look East Policy could be found in our foreign policy even before but merely acquired a more deliberate character and formulation in keeping with the growing capacities of India and South East Asia at the time, India has been pursuing active constructive engagement with ASEAN, and South East Asia through its dialogue partnership with ASEAN and through fora such as ARF, the Bay of Bengal Initiative for Multi-Sectoral Technical Cooperation (BIMSTEC), the Mekong Ganga Cooperation (MGC) and now the East Asia Summit. Bilateral relationships with countries in these groupings have also strengthened over the years through regular and steady exchange of high level visits. The functional aspects of ASEAN-India relations are driven by the ASEAN-India Plan of Action, the latest version covers years 2010-2015. In order to service its financial requirements, India has announced a contribution of US $ 50 million to the ASEAN-India Cooperation Fund, an initial corpus of US $ 1 million to ASEAN-India Science and Technology Fund and US $ 5 million for the ASEAN-India Green Fund. In the last few months, India has suggested a number of projects proposals for ASEAN-India collaboration to the ASEAN Secretariat which will utilize a substantial part of this amount. We are awaiting concurrence from ASEAN countries to these suggested activities.

5. 2012 is being celebrated as the Commemorative Year for ASEAN-India relations and the Leaders would be meeting for a Commemorative Summit in New Delhi in December 2012. This is to mark 20 years of Dialogue Partnership and 10 years of Summit Partnership. Events that ASEAN and India are planning together include Delhi Dialogue IV on February 13-14, 2012 on the theme “India and ASEAN: Partners for Peace, Progress and Stability”. EAM would be inaugurating Delhi Dialogue IV which would have two sessions oriented to business and two towards security and political issues. An Eminent Persons Group to fashion a vision statement for India-ASEAN relations has also been formed. Heads of Space Agencies of ASEAN and India would meet at mutually convenient dates in the first half of this year. Given the increase in trade between ASEAN and India following the FTA on Trade in Goods, with total trade reaching US $ 57.87 billion in 2011, realistically close to the target of US $ 70 billion by 2012, efforts are now underway for the early conclusion of a commercially meaningful FTA in Services and Investment preferably by March 2012. The inaugural ASEAN-India Business Fair was held in New Delhi in March 2011 and the Commemorative Year will see the 2nd ASEAN-India Business Fair in December 2012, when the ASEAN-India Business Council and the ASEANIndia Business Summit meetings will also be held. ICC Kolkata and FICCI would partner with the Government of India in its initiative to take a Sail Training Ship “Sudershini” on an expedition to ASEAN countries and organise “marker” events in the different ports of call. CII is assisting the Governments of India and ASEAN countries in organising an ASEAN-India Car Rally 2012 which will start in Indonesia and reach India in time for the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit in December 2012 in New Delhi. DIPP would also be organising Investment Round Tables in some ASEAN cities during the Car Rally.
6. The first meeting of ASEAN and Indian Agriculture Ministers took place in October 2011 in Jakarta. The second meeting is planned to be held in New Delhi in October 2012. An Agri Expo is to be organised back-to-back with this Ministerial Meeting. The 1st ASEAN–India Ministerial Meeting on Environment is also planned to be held the same month. ASEAN-India Ministers of New and Renewable Energy are to meet in November 2012. We are also working towards organising the 1st Meeting of the ASEAN-India Ministers of Small and Medium Enterprises, given the significant potential to be explored between ASEAN and India in this field. All of these meetings would provide direction and an unprecedented fillip to building the business environment between ASEAN countries and India.

7. Special emphasis is being given this year to people-to-people linkages. As part of the Commemorative Year, ICCR is drawing up an intensive calendar of cultural activities. India would be continuing the over 600 scholarships extended to ASEAN nationals on a bilateral and multilateral basis under our ITEC programme. The Entrepreneurship Development Centres (EDCs) and Centres for English Language Training (CELTs) set up by India in CLMV countries have been appreciated. There is a request to set up additional centres. Prime Minister announced at the Bali Summit in November 2011 that given the enthusiastic participation by ASEAN students in the annual exchange programme, India would increase the number of students hosted from ASEAN countries from 100 to 250 per year. We are also looking to institutionalise the ASEAN-India Media Exchange Programme with India hosting two groups of 20 ASEAN journalists every year for the next 3 years and ASEAN countries hosting India journalists in return. The Foreign Service Institute of India conducts a special training course for 50 ASEAN diplomats annually. The last such month-long course was held in November-December 2011. India has also been participating as observer in the ASEAN Inter Parliamentary Assembly (AIPA) General Assembly and at the last meeting in September 2011 in Phnom Penh, Indian Parliamentarians extended an invitation for an AIPA Delegation to visit India in 2012. Most recently, at the ASEAN-India Tourism Ministers Meeting in Manado on January 12, 2012, we have signed an MoU to strengthen tourism cooperation between our countries. We are also seeking active participation of ASEAN countries in the Nalanda University Project. Connectivity issues and the various projects proposed therein, such as the extension of the India-Myanmar-Thailand Highway to Laos and Cambodia and the Mekong India Economic Corridor are to be approached in an integrated manner. 8. I have enumerated our ongoing efforts at some length to share with you a sense of India’s commitment to its Look East Policy and to the intensification of relations with ASEAN countries. We see ASEAN member countries as integral to our approach to meet our common concerns and objectives related to development, peace and stability in the wider region. Our approach is participative at the people-to-people and business levels, which is more sustainable for rapid progress over the long term. I look forward to listening to the very distinguished Speakers at this Seminar and to using their experience in the region and their expertise as valuable inputs to the process that we are following in the Ministry of External Affairs to strengthen ties between India and ASEAN under our Look East Policy.
Thank you.

Media Briefing on Delhi Dialogue.
New Delhi, February 6, 2012.

Official Spokesperson (Syed Akbaruddin):...next week we have an event planned here and that is the Delhi Dialogue. The year-long celebrations to commemorate 20 years of our relationship with ASEAN will be flagged off on 13th and 14th February at the Delhi Dialogue-IV with the theme “India and ASEAN: Partners for Peace, Progress and Stability”.

This is the fourth in the series of such annual events. It is a Track 1.5 event and it has been an annual feature organized by the Ministry of External Affairs with a variety of partners since 2009. The partners for the next edition of the Delhi Dialogue are the ICWA, the FICCI, and they are also supported by SAEA Group Research and the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies (ISEAS), Singapore as well as the Economic Research Institute of ASEAN and East Asia (ERIA), Jakarta.

For those of you who are interested, this event would be divided into four thematic sessions which would address Economic Cooperation, Regional Security, Nontraditional Security Threats, and Networks of Knowledge and Science. We understand that several Foreign Ministers and other senior officials from ASEAN states are expected to participate.

Thank you.

Official Spokesperson: ......... I will now ask Ms Renu Pal Joint Secretary ASEAN to talk a little bit on the Delhi Dialogue and Indo-ASEAN relations.

J S (ASEAN): Let me very briefly take you through some of the additional details on Delhi Dialogue-IV. As J S (XP) said, it is a calendar event for the last three years, this is the fourth edition, to bring together expertise and opinions for a proactive engagement at the Track 1.5 level between India and ASEAN countries. This year’s theme is “India and ASEAN: Partners for Peace, Progress and Stability”. The discussions, as he said, have been divided into four thematic sessions. We have launched a new website for Delhi Dialogue which is delhidialogue.org. An open page has been created on Facebook which is facebook.com/delhidialogue. You can access that even if you do not have a Facebook account and you would find most of the general information on these websites.

The External Affairs Minister had invited all his ten ASEAN counterparts to participate in the Inaugural Session. So far we have acceptances from the Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of Cambodia, His Excellency Mr. Hor Namhong; the Foreign Minister of Malaysia, His Excellency Dato’ Sri Anifah Aman; the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Thailand, His Excellency Dr. Surapong Tovichakchaikul; the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs from Singapore, His Excellency Mr. Masagos Zulkifli Bin Masagos Mohamad; the Deputy Foreign Minister of Myanmar, His Excellency Dr. Myo Myint; and the Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs of Vietnam, Her Excellency Ms. Nguyen Phuong Nga, would be representing their Foreign Ministers.

The Deputy Secretary-General for Community and Corporate Affairs from ASEAN, His Excellency Mr. Bagas Hapsoro would be representing the Secretary-General who is unable to attend on account of a previous commitment. Foreign Ministers of Brunei, Laos, Indonesia and Philippines are unable to attend because of prior commitments. But all the ten ASEAN countries have sent delegations or participation in the form of speakers and panelists to DD-IV.

The External Affairs Minister would also be launching a book on this occasion which is being brought out by ICWA on two decades of India’s Look East Policy. He would then be hosting a welcome dinner for select guests later that evening.

On February 14, the programme would be in the four thematic sessions, one after another sequentially. We hope that Sessions 1 and 4, which is on Towards Economic Integration – Prospects and Challenges, and Building Networks in Knowledge and Science, will further identify the trade complementarities, the investment opportunities, the potential for utilization of our human resources with a certain degree of synergy, and come up with ideas to strengthen the bridge of knowledge and scientific collaboration between ASEAN and India.

The encouraging collaboration that we have seen of capital and entrepreneurship between ASEAN and India in the last some years, which has brought up the trade levels to 57.87 billion dollars in the last year, needs to now resonate more intensively in the domains of science and technology, knowledge-sharing and human resource development.

Nontraditional security challenges and response strategies are issues that are finding expanding space on to the agenda of multilateral consultations and also Track 2 events. These issues are relevant at national, bilateral, regional and multilateral levels. So, we are looking forward to the discussions in the Session 2 on these subjects.

There is already ongoing collaboration between the ASEAN countries and India as also other countries in the East Asia region on many of these issues ranging from terrorism, piracy, money-laundering, climate change, humanitarian assistance, disaster relief, etc.

The security architecture in the Asia Pacific region and its evolution is another subject which is going to be deliberated, and the Third Session would focus on this aspect.
The former President of India Dr. A.P.J. Abdul Kalam will be giving the Valedictory Address on the evening of February 14.

As I said before, you would see that the programme which is available on the website, brings out the participation of all the ten ASEAN countries. There are nine think tanks from the region and a significant set of business representatives as well amongst the panelists. Therefore, we feel that there is a definite progression in participation compared to DD-III which was in March last year. And we are hoping to see an interactive audience across the different sectors as well.

The proceedings would be telecast live. So, we hope that the discussions would be followed by numbers beyond those which are present at the Shahjahan Hall in Taj Palace, which is the venue for DD-IV. As in previous years, there would be a report which will be uploaded on the website. DD-IV will also be the flag off event for the India-ASEAN Commemorative Year. This year, the 2012 is commemorating the 20th anniversary of ASEAN-India dialogue partnership and the tenth anniversary of the ASEAN-India summit level partnership. The summit which Prime Minister at Bali had proposed the dates of December 20, 21. The theme for the summit is India and ASEAN – Partners in Progress and Prosperity.

There would be, therefore, after DD-IV, an intensive calendar we hope of activities including conferences, Ministerial level meetings, and cultural events, which will all culminate in the commemorative summit. The details of these will be shared with you as and how these are organized. You already know about some of them such as the ASEAN-India Car Rally 2012, and its marker events in November-December this year for which CII is the lead agency on the Indian side. And the ... (Inaudible)... Training Ship Sudarshani Expedition to all the ten ASEAN countries, it will be having different ports of call in all the ten ASEAN countries and also related marker events.

We are also, at the same time as the Delhi Dialogue, receiving a ten-member delegation of the ASEAN Committee of Permanent Representatives. They will be here for a week starting February 12. They would attend DD-IV and then travel on to Bengaluru as part of a process which is followed by the ASEAN to enhance their understanding of the institutional set up in the partner country, in this case India. The CBRs, as they are called, facilitate the ASEAN concurrence to the collaborative projects which India and ASEAN are considering out of the ASEAN-India Cooperation Fund.

In Delhi they would be meeting Secretary (East) who would also host them a lunch. They will call on Secretary (Environment) and some of the other Secretaries in key Ministries here. We are still firming up the programme. And they will also visit the Centre for Development of Advanced Computing at NOIDA.

At Bengaluru they would go to ISRO, IIM Bangalore, and possibly Infosys. In addition to this, we are inviting a group of 20 ASEAN journalists at the time of DD-IV under the ASEAN-India Media Exchange Programme which we had mentioned to you a while ago. This is being institutionalized and we hope that this would be the first tranche under this programme. J S (XP) would be able to give you additional details a few days from now on this.

Thank you.

Question: Madam, I have two questions. First is, I believe that the push from India within the ASEAN to have more, better, faster trade purposes to have like new kind of organisation within this structure. How far has that progressed? Secondly, will there be any talks on cooperation, especially in the naval security in the event that America cuts its naval presence in the Indian Ocean?

J S (ASEAN): On the first, I would point you to the Ministry of Commerce and Industry which is really the lead on those negotiations. But I would say that, as you are aware, we have the trade in goods agreement which has been finalized and operated between ASEAN and India. And in fact, this has set the stage for one of the largest FTAs in the region. We are still working on concluding the services and investment agreement. At the last meeting in August last year when the Economic Ministers had met, our Commerce and Industry Minister had asked them for a meaningful offer so as to conclude these negotiations early. So, I would point you to Commerce and Industry Ministry on that.

On the discussions, I would not want to preempt what this Track 1.5 event is going to discuss because that is exactly what its utility is. In fact, we are as much waiting to see how the different panelists take the discussions, where do they take the discussions. And what the partners, including us, have tried to do is just set the broad themes for these discussions. So, I will suggest why don’t you attend the two political and security oriented sessions and then see for yourself where these discussions go.

Question: How is the changing situation in Myanmar ...(Inaudible)...

Official Spokesperson: We will limit ourselves to economic aspects of ASEAN. We could arrange a separate discussion on Myanmar. We are not focused on country-specific issues today. If you have a question on ASEAN in general, you can ask. We will have country-specific briefings separately.

Thank you very much.

Excellencies,

Distinguished Panelists & Guests,

Ladies & Gentlemen,

I am delighted to welcome you all to the inauguration of Delhi Dialogue IV at a moment when we are commemorating a significant milestone in the India-ASEAN Partnership. I extend a warm welcome to the ASEAN delegations who have honoured us with their presence. I also welcome the members of the ASEAN Committee of Permanent Representatives.

We are marking this year as the 20th anniversary of Dialogue partnership between ASEAN and India, and the 10th anniversary of our Summit level partnership. It also marks two decades of robust economic and commercial cooperation between India and ASEAN. It gives me great pleasure to flag-off this special ASEAN-India Commemorative Year with my ASEAN colleagues at the Delhi Dialogue IV.

The theme for this year’s Delhi Dialogue, “India and ASEAN: Partners for Peace, Progress and Stability” aptly sums up the fundamentals of India’s engagement with the ASEAN.

Our ‘Look East Policy’ has been a function of the interconnectedness that India has experienced over the centuries with ASEAN countries, our common developmental and strategic interests, and the processes of transformation and integration in our region.

In the current global economic situation, it is in the common interest of India and ASEAN to work together to enhance the prospects for prosperity in our region. We need to secure our region as an area of growth, a region which is home to more than 1.7 billion people, around one-fourth of the global population.

India and ASEAN need to enhance connectivity through the realisation of routes such as the Mekong-India Economic Corridor, which would have a beneficial effect especially for the eastern part of our country. India has contributed to ASEAN integration and supports the efforts towards the creation of an ASEAN Community. In this digital age, the way forward points to virtual networks and connectivity in addition to land, rail and air connectivity. ASEAN and India have the potential and the capacities to partner each other in such endeavours.

As we progress into the Asian Century, which is marked by a shift of the economic centre of gravity to this part of the world, we must also take cognizance of the global economic and politico-security environment. This requires us to build and strengthen mechanisms for communication and consultation between our governments, corporate sectors and our people. Our policies need to, simultaneously, safeguard our high rates of growth, enhance trade in goods and services, bring together our collective resources for mutual benefit, connect our spaces institutionally, increase investments for growth and enable our people to interact freely.

We already share common developmental and security perspectives. Nontraditional and trans-national security challenges like cross-border terrorism, money laundering, drug trafficking, energy security, food security, climate change, disaster relief and response, protecting sea lanes of communications, piracy, etc. are present day challenges with repercussions over national, regional and international security. They require our coordinated efforts and demand innovative approaches beyond what ASEAN and India are already doing together in various international and regional ASEAN led fora.

As we commemorate two decades of our partnership, we must take cognizance of the ground covered by ASEAN and India in a relatively short span of time and the very varied and rich agenda of cooperation which is being seen by many, even outside of our countries, as a stable anchor for the processes of integration and transformation in the Asia-Pacific region.

India and ASEAN have put in place one of the largest free trade agreements on goods. Efforts are underway for an early conclusion of a meaningful agreement on services and investments. We have also agreed to a structured private sector engagement in the five areas of pharmaceuticals, innovation and skills training, information technology, manufacturing and infrastructure. All of these impact our capacities, our processes of development and growth, and our people. India’s Ministry of Commerce & Industry is working towards the next set of meetings of the India-ASEAN Business Fair, Business Summit and Business Council.

We have given regularity to India-ASEAN Ministerial level meetings even as we seek to mark up firsts in sectors where our engagement has been bilateral rather than regional. Cooperation in the areas of environment, new and renewable energy, agriculture, micro, small and medium enterprises and space could easily sustain greater engagement between India and ASEAN.

The ASEAN-India Eminent Persons Group is in the process of finalizing an ASEAN-India Vision 2020 document. The ASEAN Secretariat is helping to give final shape to the implementation of the 82-point Plan of Action worth about 40 million US dollars till 2015. Education, training, capacity building and human resource development in various sectors remain in the forefront of our collective priorities. India’s Department of Space has begun discussions with its counterparts in ASEAN on a five-year project for engendering cooperation in space sciences.

We are examining how to enhance cooperation in Entrepreneurship Development Centres, English Language Training Centres, and Vocational Training Centres in the CLMV countries. ASEAN and India signed last month a Memorandum of Understanding on strengthening tourism. India would be hosting 250 ASEAN students, up from the annual 100, this year.

The ASEAN-India Media Exchange Programme has been institutionalized by bringing over a group of 20 ASEAN journalists to Delhi Dialogue IV. We look forward to the next batch of 20 ASEAN journalists coming to India in December 2012 at the time of the special ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit. Forty Indian journalists would be hosted over 3 years by ASEAN Member States.

We need to give a fillip to greater physical connectivity between ASEAN and India by looking at the various proposals suggested by ASEAN, India and ERIA in an integrated manner. The ASEAN-India Commemorative Year, therefore, has a rather full calendar ahead.

I am also happy that we are embarking on the ASEAN-India Car Rally 2012 to mark the Commemorative Year. India is also sending a Sail Training Ship Sudarshini on an interactive expedition to all the ten ASEAN countries to trace traditional trade routes. These two events, together with their respective ‘marker events’ would no doubt reinforce connectivity between India and ASEAN.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I am confident that your sessions tomorrow will result in quantifiable recommendations for a qualitative up-gradation in the ASEAN-India strategic partnership. The live webcast of these sessions is giving you an audience wider than the confines of this hall.

Many of our countries have had leaders and thinkers, scientists and statesmen who had pursued a global vision. Inaugurating this session of Delhi Dialogue IV, I wish it would acquire relevance and participation beyond the collective borders of ASEAN and India. Delhi Dialogue has seen steady progression in the last three years. I wish the Dialogue all success this year.

Before I conclude, I would like to compliment the Indian Council of World Affairs, the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry (FICCI), the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies and the SAEA Research Group of Singapore, as well as the Economic Research Institute in Jakarta, for their partnership in organizing and supporting Delhi Dialogue IV. I would also like to express my deep appreciation to all of you here in the audience for your participation. I also hope that our guests will have a pleasant stay and carry back warm experiences of India.

Thank you.
Speech by Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai on India’s Look East Policy at the 10th Meeting of the BCIM (Bangladesh, China, India, Myanmar) Cooperation Forum.

Kolkata, 18 February, 2012.

Excellencies,
Ladies and Gentlemen,
Friends.

It is a great pleasure to be with all of you this evening at the 10th meeting of the BCIM Process. It is appropriate that we meet in Kolkata, one of India’s most pre-eminent cities on our eastern seaboard from where rulers, merchants, sailors and adventurers looked East from ancient times. Tonight, I intend to speak about the new contours of India’s Look East Policy and this can best be done here in East India, where our policy initiatives have a direct and special relevance and significance.

India did not need to have a Look East policy. Even before our Independence Pandit Nehru travelled to the East and connected our fate with that of the people of SE Asia. But there was a hiatus in the 1970s and 1980s when preoccupations with security (in the widest sense) focussed our attention on our immediate periphery. We embarked on a ‘Look-East’ policy in 1992. This foreign policy initiative had a domestic dimension based in the economic restructuring and reform program that we had commenced in July 1991 wherein we placed emphasis on reducing licensing, giving greater play to private initiative and entrepreneurship and in general making it easier to do business in India. One aspect of this economic course correction was the relative emphasis given to trade and foreign investment. As a result, economic diplomacy became an integral part of foreign policy formulation and implementation.

India has long standing civilizational bonds with countries in East and South East Asia. In spiritual and cultural values, by name and language, through dance and art, there is a historical tradition of contact between India and the East. It is against this larger backdrop that we have located our Look East Policy or LEP. The essential philosophy of our LEP, which is now well established, is that India must find its destiny by linking itself more and more with its Asian partners and the rest of the world. We believe that India’s future and our own best economic interests are served by greater integration with Asia. This may seem unusual to those generations in our countries who grew up when India and the countries of East Asia were linked to different metropolitan centres in the West and later walked down different paths during the Cold War; but to those entering the age of employment and travel in our countries just now, this will be a rediscovery of their common Asian heritage. It is my belief that this shift that is taking place... and the kind of interaction that is emerging amongst Asian countries has deep historical and cultural roots and, therefore, can be a very powerful force for future peace and stability on our continent.

As I stated earlier, our interest in engaging with Asia has domestic roots. We are a vibrant democracy, quickly transforming ourselves with growth on an ascending trajectory. Despite some perturbations in our economic growth due to global factors, our economic development path is certain and full of potential and it is significant that we are in a part of the world still witnessing dynamic growth. Our policies relating to foreign trade, foreign direct investment, taxation, banking, finance and capital markets have evolved to make Indian industry more competitive globally. There is great confidence and optimism about the prospects for collaboration and constructive cooperation. What we seek as part of our LEP is to make our neighbors, partners in our development such that we can jointly seek and work on the opportunities that are coming our way due to the inexorable march of globalization.

It has been almost 20 years since India enunciated the Look East Policy (LEP). While this policy has yielded many benefits, including closer strategic contact between India and Asian countries, an impressive increase in the quantum of bilateral trade and increased people-to-people interaction, the success of the policy also needs to be viewed from the perspective of how far we have been able to interlink our eastern and north eastern regions to the rest of Asia, since this part of India provides a natural bridge between us and East Asia. Speaking in Kolkata from where Kunming is the same distance as New Delhi and Dhaka is barely a few minutes of flying, with Yangon just a little further away, our vision for the LEP acquires new meaning, depth and dimension.

India’s Look East Policy also aims at providing eastern India a platform for economic growth and social progress. It is critical that political leadership be exercised to leverage the opportunities that are presenting themselves in this part of the country which will assist in accelerating growth with equity. I believe that West Bengal can play an important lead role in this endeavor and provide a model for others to follow.

Essentially, we are looking at a new paradigm of development whereby our foreign policy initiatives blend seamlessly into our national economic development. Given that we have, over 20 years of pursuing our Look East Policy, put in place certain diplomatic and political structures, there is need now to make these structures work for our East and North Eastern Regions. Diplomatic initiatives need to be converted into commercial opportunities and investment flows. For this purpose, I reaffirm that MEA will work in close cooperation with the Ministry for the Development of the North Eastern Region, the Planning Commission, all economic Ministries and the State Governments of the region.
I would like to put forth before you the way India has sought to integrate within Asia in general. To begin with, we focused very much on SAARC and ASEAN. SAARC has been successful in moving from the declaratory to the implementation phase. Initiatives within SAARC are beginning to touch the lives of our peoples, a good example of which is the South Asian University or even special immigration counters for SAARC nationals at our airports. We in India have been providing access to the Indian market, to our partners in South Asia, even if this has to be done in an asymmetric manner.

With ASEAN, beginning from a sectoral partner, our association evolved into a Full Dialogue Partnership and finally to that of a Summit Partner. We have close relations with all countries in the region and our economic and cultural ties are getting stronger by the day as travel, tourism and business reinforce regional interaction. The FTA in Goods with ASEAN is already having its impact in expanding our commercial exchanges. These will be further enhanced once our FTA in Services is finalized. Another aspect has been the rapid growth in investment between India and South East Asian and East Asian countries. We will continue to improve the investment environment in India including through better infrastructure.

The biggest benefit of India’s ‘Look-East’ Policy has been that India has reengaged with its eastern neighbourhood closely and has gradually emerged as a significant player in the strategic dynamics of the region. Economically, India’s trade with ASEAN has grown impressively from US$ 2.3 billion in 1991-92 to US$ 58 billion in 2010-11. Growth of trade between India and China has also been very rapid where all the set targets have been broken time and again. In 2011, India-China trade recorded a figure of US$ 74 billion and we have set a new target of US $ 100 billion by 2015. However, our rising trade deficit with China is indeed a worry. India’s trade and investment ties with Japan, Australia and the Republic of Korea are also picking up fast with increasing momentum.

Our Strategic and Cooperative Partnership with China makes our engagement broad-based and multifaceted. Trade and investment are the great drivers of the new relationship. We are confident that the relationship will mature further and develop steadily. The leaders of both countries recognize that co-existence and cooperation is the best course of action, and sensitivity to mutual aspirations and concerns provides the underpinning for building confidence and trust. There is enough space and opportunity for both of us to grow and develop, and to bring benefit not only to us, but also for other partners in Asia.

With Bangladesh, the visit of PM Sheikh Hasina in 2010 crafted a new paradigm of our bilateral relations which was further consolidated by the landmark visit of PM Manmohan Singh to Bangladesh in 2011, after a gap of 12 years. Sizeable Indian investments have started to flow into Bangladesh and the pace is likely to pick up in the months and years ahead. Two-way trade has crossed five billion dollars in 2010-11, and Bangladesh exports to India have grown by 68 per cent in the last one year. We acknowledge that there is still a large trade imbalance favouring India, which we are determined to address by providing better market access into India for Bangladeshi goods. We are also thinking of other imaginative measures to achieve this objective.

Myanmar too is an integral part of our Look East Policy. Recent years have not only witnessed robust bilateral cooperation but also a number of highlevel visits. Our relations with Myanmar encompass a number of important areas like security, trade and investment, energy, capacity-building, health and education, science and technology, as well as infrastructure development. Enhanced connectivity between our two countries is of mutual interest. India and Myanmar in 2010-11 had a bilateral trade of 1.28 billion dollars which is much below the potential. We have established a target of three billion dollars by 2015. Indian pharmaceutical companies have a sizeable presence in Myanmar, providing quality pharmaceutical products at very competitive prices. Myanmar is also emerging as an important partner in India’s quest for energy security.

It is our perspective that in a globalized world, it is mutually gainful opportunity and not geography that defines and drives the processes of integration. India offers such opportunity here and now. That is why I firmly believe that an Asian economic community, that is open, transparent and inclusive, and provides a platform to create ever widening economic opportunities, is better for Asia and for the world, than a narrower or restrictive definition of Asian economic integration. In fact, recent studies have revealed a compelling case for a broader Asian economic community built in a phased manner. It has been demonstrated that economic integration could generate billions of dollars of additional output. The vision of Asian economic integration by coalescing the FTAs among member Asian countries into an Asian RTA is the pivotal step towards the integration of Asia into a common unit. It is precisely for this reason that our Prime Minister, Dr Manmohan Singh, envisaged the creation of a broader Asian Economic Community. This continues to be a longer term goal for us in India.

Therefore, India stands for greater cooperation and exchange between the countries of the region. Sub-regional constructs such as BCIM complement our Look East Policy and are, therefore, equally important and significant for us. Since this is the case we are ready to move forward at a faster pace in enhancing and promoting our interactions in the BCIM forum. I am confident that you will factor this into your deliberations here in Kolkata, and would like to assure you of our support.

I thank you all.

Opening remarks by External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna at the open session of the 10th ASEAN-India Ministerial Meeting.

Your Excellency Hor Namhong, Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of Cambodia,

Your Highness Prince Mohamad Bolkiah, Foreign Minister of Brunei Darussalam,

Your Excellency Dr. Marty Natalegawa, Foreign Minister of Indonesia,

Your Excellency Dato' Sri Anifah Aman, Foreign Minister of Malaysia,

Your Excellency Dr. Thongloun Sisoulith, Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of Lao PDR,

Your Excellency Dr. Surin Pitsuwan, Secretary General of ASEAN, Distinguished Leaders of Myanmar, Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam,

It gives me immense pleasure to join you at this very important ASEAN-India Ministerial meeting in Phnom Penh. My deep gratitude to Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of Cambodia and the Government of Cambodia for the very warm welcome and gracious hospitality extended to me and my delegation.

Excellencies,

This year marks two decades of ASEAN-India Dialogue Partnership. I take this opportunity to convey India’s sincere appreciation to Cambodia for its constructive and supportive role, in its capacity as Country Coordinator for India over the last three years. This period witnessed notable intensification and deepening of cooperation in ASEAN-India partnership. Cambodia, in its capacity as current the ASEAN Chair, played a pivotal role this year to take our engagement with ASEAN to the next high level. I also recognize the valuable contribution of the previous ASEAN Chair Indonesia, and we look forward to working closely with Brunei Darussalam, the Country Coordinator for India for 2012-15.

India’s relationship with ASEAN is a key cornerstone of our foreign policy and the foundation of our Look East Policy. We have attempted to anchor this within the larger context of Asia as an engine for global growth and prosperity. It is in this spirit that we have suggested project proposals to the ASEAN Secretariat covering multifaceted dimensions of our cooperation as envisaged under the Plan of Action for 2010-2015.

The people and Government of India look forward to the privilege of welcoming the ASEAN Leaders and Ministers at the special ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit in New Delhi from 20 to 21 December this year. I am particularly pleased at the enormous support and enthusiasm in ASEAN capitals to join us in observing this important landmark. Excellencies, the Commemorative Summit will present a special opportunity to pronounce together a new era in the ASEAN-India partnership.

I am happy to note that the ASEAN-India Media Exchange Programme has been institutionalized. I sincerely thank Cambodia and Vietnam for hosting the first group of Indian journalists, who are present with us in this room today. We look forward to host ASEAN journalists during the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit.

I look forward to your gracious presence at the launch of the Logo and the social network domain sites for the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit later today. After this open session, I will share further details of the Special Commemorative Summit and related activities.

Thank you.
Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the 10th ASEAN-India Ministerial Meeting.

Excellencies,

I have heard with great interest your views on furthering ASEAN-India partnership. Your valuable inputs and suggestions will be duly reflected in our future programmes. We will continue to engage constructively with ASEAN member States to achieve the full potential of our partnership.

The civilizational strengths and historical linkages between India and ASEAN countries need to be extended to further to improve road, sea, rail, digital and people-to-people connectivity in present times. This is an imperative if we are to reinforce the economic foundations in our region for collective progress & prosperity.

Prime Minister of India announced two projects in Myanmar during his visit in May this year, which would help establish connectivity from Moreh in India to Mae Sot in Thailand. I understand ASEAN and Indian officials discussed the connectivity agenda further at the ASEAN Land Transport Working Group Meeting last week, which was aimed at establishing connectivity from India to Vietnam via Myanmar and Laos. Strengthening private sector participation and crosscountry PPP linkages would help further reinforce our collaboration on "connectivity".

The last one year has seen important progression in our partnership. India became the first Dialogue Partner to sign a MoU on Strengthening Tourism Cooperation with ASEAN countries in January this year.

Your participation added tremendous value to Delhi Dialogue-IV in New Delhi in February 2012. The Delhi Dialogue has now emerged as a regular calendar event for track 1.5 level interface between ASEAN and India, with the next edition to be held in February 2013.

The ASEAN Committee of Permanent Representatives had a useful visit to India in February 2012. I am happy to note that the first ASEAN-India Network of Think Tanks meeting would be help in India on August 7, 2012. We would like to see such interface between our officials facilitate quick concurrence to the numerous proposals, which ASEAN and India are keen to implement.

The meeting of Heads of Space Agencies of India and ASEAN countries in Bengaluru in June this year made headway on the proposal for 'Establishment of a Tracking and Data Reception Station and a Data Processing Facility for ASEAN and the Training of ASEAN Personnel in Space Science & Technology'.
Our people-to-people interaction is on track. The work of ASEAN-India Artists was exhibited at the Civilizational Dialogue Conference held in Patna earlier this month. We would be inviting cultural troupes from all ASEAN countries to perform in different cities in November this year and, finally, to participate at a fusion cultural performance on the eve of the special ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit.

We are eagerly looking forward to the first visit of ASEAN Inter-Parliamentary Assembly delegation later this month. I personally believe that this visit would go a long way in strengthening the interface between our legislatures.

India will be hosting next month the 1st Meeting of the ASEAN-India Environment Ministers and also the first ASEAN-India Ministerial Meeting on New & Renewable Energy in November this year. In addition, the second ASEAN-India Business Fair would be held in Delhi from December 18-20, which will be back-to-back with the Commemorative Summit.

To reemphasize the close connectivity, ASEAN-India Car Rally would be flagged off from Yogjakarta in Indonesia in 24 November. We propose that Leaders of ASEAN and India to give a ceremonial flag down to the Car Rally in Delhi on December 20. Similarly, the sail training ship INS Sudarshini would undertake an expedition to ports in nine ASEAN countries. A number of business, cultural and people-to-people marker events have been planned. Some of my Ministerial colleagues and I would participate in these events and I would request, Excellencies, that ASEAN Ministers also lend the events their profile.

The story of economic growth in our partnership is meeting expectations despite the global economic downturn. Two-way trade between ASEAN and India in 2011-12 touched reached 80 billion US Dollars. We believe that the early conclusion of the ASEAN-India Services & Investment Agreements would give a strong fillip to our economic engagement. We welcome the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership initiative to accelerate regional economic integration.

We are awaiting the recommendations of the ASEAN-India Eminent Persons Group, which would be a valuable input for drafting the Vision Statement of the Special ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit. The ASEAN-India SOM meeting in May this year in Phnom Penh already started discussions on the elevation of the ASEAN-India partnership to a Strategic-level. I take back your views on ways to elevate the partnership.

Excellencies,

India remains committed to its partnership with ASEAN. We stand convinced of this partnership’s unique utility to the goal of the ASEAN Community by 2015, the Initiative for ASEAN Integration (IAI), the Master Plan on ASEAN Plus Connectivity (MPAC), the Declaration for a Drug Free ASEAN by 2015 and to the collective capacity building in our region.

Thank you.
094. Closing remarks by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the 10th ASEAN-India Ministerial Meeting.

Excellencies,

We are convinced about the growth potential between the two major economic entities within Asia: ASEAN and India. Our views for the future vision of the ASEAN-India partnership will be shared with you in the coming weeks.

The project proposals under finalization between ASEAN and India through the ASEAN Secretariat reflect the earnest desire of our two sides to deepen our engagement in diverse sectors. Geographic, institutional and people-to-people connectivity, e-linkages, capacity building across sectors, cooperation in frontier areas like space technology, agriculture, energy, environment and biodiversity are some of the areas that I would suggest for particular attention in the months ahead.

Some significant proposals from our side will include

• Setting up of the ASEAN-India Science & Technology Digital Library, • ASEAN-India Virtual Institute for Intellectual Property,
• ASEAN-India Technology Information & Commercialization Portal,
• Project for collaboration on Bio-Diversity between the ASEAN Centre for Biodiversity and the National Biodiversity Authority in India, • Establishment of Tracking & Data Reception Station and a Data Processing Facility for ASEAN in Vietnam and • Upgradation of the Biak II Telemetry Tracking & Command Station in Indonesia, and
• IT Centres in CLMV countries by Centre for Development of Advanced Computing based in India.

Inclusion of new sectors such as energy efficiency, food security and other areas mentioned during our deliberations would become the building blocks of our future vision.

Excellencies,

Before the end of July, we will share the logistical and other arrangements to host the Special ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit in New Delhi on December 20-21, 2012. As I said before, it would be our privilege to host the ASEAN Leaders and their delegations.
As I conclude, I would like to take this opportunity to invite you all to the launch of the ASEAN-India Commemorative Year Logo at the end of this meeting.

Thank you.

095. Launch of the Logo for the Special ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit: Note on the ASEAN-India logo.

The design cluster, an improvised five-spoked wind turbine, represents energy, motion, progress, connectivity and dynamism. The spokes have been stylised to symbolise the radiation of energy in an outward direction, and to reflect the spiralling motion of growth; as well as the expanding canvas of ASEAN-India partnership.

The wind turbine also represents the cleanest and most sustainable form of energy available to mankind and thereby reflects the sustainable nature of our partnership. The spokes have also been adorned in the colours of the Indian and ASEAN flags. The tagline ‘Progress and Prosperity’ captures the theme of the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit, linking it directly with the aims and objectives of the summit.
Mr. Chairman
Distinguished Colleagues

I would like to convey my gratitude to the Chairman for the excellent arrangements and kind hospitality extended to us. We are pleased that Cambodia, a country with which India enjoys very warm and friendly ties, is hosting the East Asia Summit (EAS) Ministerial Meeting.

At our first meeting last year, we all reiterated our support for the fundamentals of the East Asia Summit process. The relevance of the five core priority areas identified by EAS for our collective economic growth and development has become even more urgent. It is encouraging that we have begun to put in place the elements of a cooperative architecture in our region.

Mr. Chairman,

The East Asia Summit process has a great potential to bring synergy of effort to ensure peace, stability and economic prosperity in the region. We believe that in this era of global connectivity and economic inter-dependence, this can be achieved only if Asia strengthens itself in terms of economic growth, capacities and capabilities, all of which will enable it to contribute better to the global system. We continue to see ASEAN as the driving force in these processes.

Mr. Chairman,

We have seen useful progress at the 1st EAS Education Ministers Meeting in Yogyakarta on July 3-5, 2012. India has taken on 3 of the 13 projects recommended by the EAS Educational Task Force. On Nalanda University, I would like to inform that the Nalanda Mentor Group and the Governing Board held regular meetings. The University’s website and logo have been launched. The University Statutes have been published in the Gazette of India. The University has appointed a Steering Committee to oversee the Global Design Competition. We would invite companies from EAS member States to participate in this competition.

To further intensify collaboration in the priority area of disaster management & relief, India would be hosting an EAS Conference on Building Regional Responses to Disaster Management in New Delhi from 16 to 17 September this year. We hope to bring together National Disaster Management Authorities in EAS member countries for sharing of expertise and experience, as well as to build capacities.
The ongoing global economic crisis and the Eurozone crisis, in particular, continue to be worrisome. It is imperative for the Asian engines of growth to come together to offset this. There should also be greater interaction and cooperation between our financial authorities. We welcome the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership initiative and we look forward to our engagement with the ASEAN countries on this.

Mr. Chairman,

As we prepare for the 7th EAS, we should examine specific projects for improving infrastructure in the wider region, in line with the Declaration on ASEAN Connectivity adopted at the last Summit. India would welcome dialogue with like-minded countries on this important area of cooperation.

We have recently agreed, at Myanmar’s request, to undertake repair of 71 bridges on the Tamu-Kalewa Friendship Road and also upgrade the Kalewa-Yargi road segment to highway standard, thereby contributing to the connectivity from Moreh in India to Mae Sot in Thailand. We are also in discussion with Lao PDR on surface connectivity. Economic Research Institute of ASEAN and East Asia could be mandated to examine the economic feasibility of a few specific projects.

Asia needs a sustainable developmental architecture. I would like to suggest that integral to this would be greater focus on food security and energy security, including the use of energy efficiency technologies. These are, again, areas where East Asia Summit members bring complementary capacities, which I hope will be explored further in the EAS Energy Ministers Meeting to be held in Phnom Penh in September 2012. We must adopt a collaborative approach which transcends individual limitations on capacity.

We support Australia’s initiative for combating the emerging threat of drug resistant malaria and to improve cooperative approaches. There is an extreme urgency to this challenge beyond the greater Mekong region to all our countries.

The evolving asymmetric threats in the form of maritime terrorism, piracy and drug trafficking have made maritime security issues a strategic priority. We welcome the proposal for expansion of the ASEAN Maritime Forum. We are actively continuing our cooperation in the maritime area with ASEAN, ARF, ADMM+ members.

Excellencies, our collaborative agenda must reflect the East Asia Summit as not only the most comprehensive but also the most effective forum in the region, oriented to tangible outcomes, a futuristic vision and a dialogue process at a pace comfortable to all.

Thank you.
Mr. Chairman,
Dear Colleagues,
I would like to convey my gratitude to the Chairman for the excellent arrangements and kind hospitality extended to us. We are pleased that Cambodia, a country with which India enjoys very warm and friendly ties, is hosting the ASEAN Regional Forum (ARF) Ministerial Meeting.

We meet at a time when the Asia-Pacific region continues to witness growing economic interdependence, cooperation and increased linkages which contribute towards our shared goals of peace, security and prosperity. However, we must work together to address various challenges that cause instability and insecurity.

The ARF provides a venue for constructive dialogue on political and security cooperation in the region with the ASEAN continuing to play a central role in the process.

Terrorism remains a grave threat that must be addressed by all States through a comprehensive global approach and strengthened commitment to combat it in all its forms anywhere. The global regime against terrorism needs to be hinged on a holistic framework for which the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism at the United Nations requires early conclusion. We welcome the Statement that will be issued on Cooperation in Ensuring Cyber Security.

The international community should remain engaged in Afghanistan and extend support for a successful transition process. India is committed to assisting the people and Government of Afghanistan as they build a peaceful, pluralistic, democratic and prosperous Afghanistan.

We have committed assistance amounting to about 2 billion US Dollars to Afghanistan for projects identified in partnership with the Afghan government. We hosted a Delhi Investment Summit on Afghanistan on 28 June 2012 to attract foreign investment in the light of new opportunities opening up in various sectors in that country. Last week at the Tokyo Conference I reiterated once again India’s commitment to building a secure and prosperous Afghanistan.

The situation in the Korean peninsula has been a matter of concern in the region and beyond. India voiced serious concern at the attempted launch of 13 April 2012, which violated UN Security Council Resolution 1874 as well as adversely impacting on peace and stability in the Korean peninsula.

We support efforts to bring about peace, stability, reconciliation and reunification on the Korean Peninsula. We also support the goal of denuclearization of the Korean peninsula that has been endorsed by DPRK. We believe that the DPRK nuclear issue and establishing peace in the Korean Peninsula should be addressed through dialogue between the parties concerned.

Myanmar provides a land bridge for India to ASEAN and is a friendly neighbour. India has consistently emphasized the path of engagement with Myanmar to encourage the advancement of national reconciliation as well as socioeconomic development. The successful conduct of bye-elections in April 2012 represented a major milestone in the transition towards multi-party democracy.

Our Prime Minister visited Myanmar in May and we are committed to enhancing economic engagement and extending all possible assistance and support to the process of national reconciliation and further strengthening of democracy in Myanmar. We also look forward to Myanmar’s planned Chairmanship of ASEAN in 2014.

In the present era of interdependence, the security and economic prosperity of nations is vitally linked to safety and security of sea lanes of communication. States should work together to address common threats to maritime security. The menace of piracy has been expanding its reach and it should be addressed firmly through cooperative action.

We have been following developments in respect to the South China Sea. As we had stated earlier, India supports freedom of navigation and access to resources in accordance with principles of international law. These principles should be respected by all. We have noted that the parties concerned are engaged in discussions to address the issue, and we hope that progress will be made with respect to implementation of Guidelines to the 2002 Declaration of Conduct on the South China Sea.

There has been a steady evolution of the regional security architecture centred on the ASEAN in terms of the East Asia Summit, ARF and ADMM Plus. We fully subscribe to the view that ASEAN should continue to be the driving force for these forums. There is scope for greater synergy and complementarity between different forums.

Last November, our Prime Minister stated at the East Asia Summit:

“The resurgence of Asia is dependent on the evolution of a cooperative architecture in which all countries are equal participants. We will work with all other countries towards this end.”

I would like to reassure that India would continue to participate in and contribute to the success of ARF activities.

Thank you.

101. Inaugural Address by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the First Round Table on ASEAN-India Network of Think Tanks.

New Delhi, 7 August, 2012.

Deputy Secretary-General of ASEAN Mr. Nyan Lynn,
Secretary Shri Sanjay Singh
Chairman RIS Ambassador Shyam Saran,
Distinguished Panelists and Speakers
Members of the Think-Tank Community,

Ladies & Gentlemen,

I am delighted to join you today for the First Round Table of the ASEAN-India Network of Think Tanks, organized by Research and Information Systems for Developing Countries. I would like to commend Chairman RIS* and his team for taking up this significant initiative in this important year for ASEAN and India - a year in which we are commemorating 20 years of our partnership. It is also timely as India and ASEAN are seeking to break new ground in identifying the future roadmap and content of their partnership.

Prime Minister of India Dr. Manmohan Singh conceptualized the Round Table of ASEAN-India Think Tanks in 2009 India-ASEAN Summit to bridge the information gap and also to provide policy inputs to the Governments of India and ASEAN countries on future areas of cooperation. We will follow your discussions over the next two days with great interest.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

The ASEAN-India partnership is a natural one, founded on congruent ideas and a common vision of the region and the world, underpinned by strong civilizational linkages through the millennia. We are convinced of the unique ability of our partnership to further progress and prosperity, peace and security in the region.

Our strengths lie in the fact that we together constitute a 1.8 billion people, a market with resource and demand, a region with complementary capacities and resources. These have contributed to the tremendous resilience that our economies have been able to show since the time of the downturn in the global economy in 2008.

ASEAN-India trade has already crossed the target of 70 billion US Dollars to reach nearly 80 billion US Dollars, showing a very significant growth rate of 37% in 2011-12.

* Research and Information System
The ASEAN-India Free Trade Agreement in Trade in Goods has been a positive contributor in enhancing trade. We would now like to see early finalization of ASEAN-India FTA in Investments and Services. This would allow us to truly focus on our collective human resource development. It would also allow India and ASEAN to begin talks on the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP) initiative, to further accelerate regional economic integration.

ASEAN Secretariat is currently processing projects worth over 70 million US Dollars suggested by India under the ASEAN-India Plan of Action for the period 2010-15. These are across sectors to enhance people-to-people and institutional connectivity between ASEAN and India. The human resource in our countries, the demographic advantage, the potential in an expanding canvas for ASEAN-India relations are some of the drivers in these projects. This region’s future lies in its youth, the building blocks for the future, constitute 40% and 50% of the ASEAN and India populations respectively.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

India accords a very high priority to enhance physical connectivity with ASEAN. India began discussions with ASEAN at the Land Transport Working Group Meeting in early July. There are multiple ideas and possibilities, apart from India-Myanmar-Thailand Trilateral Highway wherein we have just recently taken on additional commitments at the request of Myanmar. There are ideas about extension of the Trilateral Highway to Laos and Cambodia and also a new highway linking India-Myanmar-Laos-Vietnam-Cambodia.

The study by Economic Research Institute for ASEAN and East Asia on a Comprehensive Asia Development Plan and the Master Plan for ASEAN Connectivity Plus adopted at the 6th East Asia Summit are also of interest and practical relevance. I hope your discussions today will cover practical aspects of these ideas and also examine the feasibility of PPP and joint venture route into the programmes of the concerned Governments.

We have endorsed ASEAN centrality in the geopolitical and economic architecture of the region. We wish to further enhance cooperation with ASEAN countries in confronting non-traditional security challenges before us, - fight against international terrorism, drug trafficking, maritime issues, climate change, disaster management, food and energy security. These trans-national issues require new and innovative responses. I hope AINTT would deliberate on these issues and come up with practical recommendations.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I am confident that your deliberations would come up with tangible and implementable suggestions to aid decision-making, which would help governmental efforts to further strengthen India-ASEAN partnership.
I also wish to see that the future Round Table meetings are held with regular periodicity in ASEAN countries as well as in India, propelling issues and opportunities to the attention of the Governments. The deliberations in these Round Table meetings covering ASEAN and India, the two significant regions in Asia, will have greater salience as we now witness a gradual geopolitical shift in gravity to Asia.

I take this opportunity to welcome members of the ASEAN Secretariat, who are on a special orientation visit to India. I hope their interactions here will give them a better understanding of the thinking that India has brought to its Dialogue Partnership.

I commend RIS for this initiative and convey my appreciation to the members of the Think-Tank community in India and ASEAN for their active participation. I wish you success in your deliberations.

Thank you.

Extracts from the Media Briefing by the Official Spokesperson on the forthcoming Mekong Ganga Cooperation Meeting.

New Delhi, August 31, 2012.

Official Spokesperson: The... announcement that I have is about the Mekong-Ganga Cooperation Meetings. India will be hosting the Sixth Mekong-Ganga Cooperation Meetings on September 3 and 4 in New Delhi. The Senior Officials would meet on the 3rd September, and this will be followed by the Foreign Ministers’ meeting on the 4th September.

As you are aware, the Mekong-Ganga Cooperation was launched on 10th November, 2000 in Vientiane. It sets up a vision for cooperation amongst India and the five Mekong countries - Cambodia, Lao P eople's Democratic Republic, Myanmar, Vietnam and Thailand. They had identified four priority areas for cooperation among these countries. The cooperation was focused on tourism, culture, education and human resources development, as well as transportation and communication.

This is the first time that the Mekong-Ganga Cooperation Meeting would be hosted by India in India. We have chaired the Fifth Ministerial Meetings on the sidelines of the ASEAN-India Meeting. This was in Manila I think in 2007.

The External Affairs Minister along with the visiting Ministers will review cooperation between these countries and will set out the future direction and pathways for this important mechanism for enhanced cooperation among these countries.

Question: ... (Inaudible)... since it was established. What has happened in between actually?

Official Spokesperson: I understand your point that it was established in 2000 - it is now twelve years - and you would like to understand what has been the progress. Briefly what we can mention to you is that the focus on some of these areas they have moved ahead, for example on connectivity. If you could recall, there are lots of projects which they are working on connectivity between India and Myanmar. These are not all the way through for all these countries but India and Myanmar. There is also a trilateral project which is between India-Myanmar and Thailand. There are a large number of ITEC scholarships which are being worked on between India and Cambodia, Laos and Vietnam.

You are also aware of Indian interest in Vietnam specifically, this is a favourite topic of all of you, so I will not go into further detail on that. But that said, the idea was to connect two civilizations which are along two major rivers of Asia.
You are right that since 2007 there has been a certain lull in the activities. The idea is to reinvigorate those activities. We will provide you with a more detailed briefing on that shortly.

New Delhi, September 1, 2012.

India is hosting the 6th Mekong Ganga Cooperation Meetings on September 3-4, 2012 at New Delhi. Senior Officials would be meeting on September 3, 2012 and the Foreign Ministers would meet on September 4, 2012.

In addition to the existing four areas of collaboration under the Mekong-Ganga Cooperation, namely culture, tourism, human resource development & education, and transport & communication, we have today identified various new areas for cooperation. These include health research relevant to the region and sharing of expertise on pandemic management.

The economies of India and the five countries in the Mekong region depend heavily on micro, small and medium enterprises. We have, therefore, discussed various ways of bringing together the complementarities that exist in micro, small and medium enterprises in our countries.
We have also focused on aspects related to food security and the responsibility to future generations in terms of protecting the rich bio-diversity of our region. Our Officials will establish more intensive channels of communication to be able to show progress in these areas before our next meeting.

We would be intensifying our collaboration for human resource development and education. Connectivity from Vietnam to India is a strategic priority for all of us and we have asked our Senior Officials to work towards specific projects.

We have tasked our Officials to accelerate action at national levels in setting up the Museum of Traditional Asian Textiles, which has been constructed by India in Siem Reap. We have suggested that the Museum develop a dynamic character by integrating a Textiles Centre and also showcasing performing arts, which are intrinsically linked to our textile traditions.

India has announced an annual commitment of USD 1 million for the India-Cambodia-Laos–Myanmar-Vietnam (CLMV) Quick Impact Projects Revolving Fund. This will be towards projects with short gestation and immediate benefit at a community level in the CLMV countries.

I am happy to inform that the Lao People's Democratic Republic has kindly agreed to Chair our next meeting. I wish Lao PDR all success in their efforts to take forward the MGC initiatives to the next high level.

115. Media Briefing by Secretary East Sanjay Singh on Prime Minister’s Visit to Cambodia for East Asia Summit and India-ASEAN Summit.

New Delhi, November 14, 2012.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Thank you very much for coming for this interaction, and I must apologize for the slight delay today. There have been some events which we will come to a little later and let you know about.

Let me introduce to you my colleagues on the podium. We have Mr. Sanjay Singh, Secretary (East), who will brief us about the Prime Minister’s visit to Cambodia, the East Asia Summit as well as the India-ASEAN meeting there. Along with him is Ms. Renu Pall, Joint Secretary (ASEAN Multilateral). She will assist Secretary (East) on issues relating to Cambodia and Prime Minister’s visit there. ..........

I will now request Secretary (East) to make a brief presentation and then we will go through the questions relating to East Asia before we move to the next topic on the agenda.

Secretary (East) (Shri Sanjay Singh): Good afternoon everybody.

Prime Minister would be visiting Phnom Penh, Cambodia from 18th to 20th November to attend the Tenth ASEAN-India Summit, and the Seventh East Asia Summit. National Security Advisor, and Principal Secretary to PM would be accompanying the Prime Minister to Cambodia.

India’s Dialogue Partnership with the ASEAN countries is one of the cornerstones of our foreign policy and the foundation of our Look East Policy. It is a partnership founded on civilizational ties, an identity of perspective and objectives, capacity building, and connectivity. We see this partnership as furthering economic growth and prosperity, peace and stability in the region.

From a Sectoral Dialogue Partnership in 1992 and full Dialogue Partnership in 1996, India’s partnership with ASEAN was elevated to annual summits in 2002, and Cambodia hosted the first ASEAN-India Summit.

Prime Minister will meet his ASEAN counterparts in the afternoon of November 19th for the Tenth ASEAN-India Summit. The Leaders will take cognizance of the intensification of relations since their last meeting in Bali in November 2011. The Leaders will discuss the Commemorative Summit which has the theme ‘ASEAN-India Partnership for Peace and Shared Prosperity’ and which India will be hosting in New Delhi on December 20-21, 2012 to mark the 20th anniversary of this relationship and the 10th anniversary of ASEAN-India summit-level partnership. The Leaders will also receive the Report of the ASEAN-India Eminent Persons Group.
In the last one-year, ASEAN and India have had an intensive calendar of meetings and events. Delhi Dialogue-IV on the theme “India and ASEAN: Partners for Peace, Progress and Stability” was held from February 13 to 14, 2012. Meetings were initiated this year between the Heads of Space Agencies from ASEAN countries and India in June. Our Ministers for Environment met in July; the Ministers for Agriculture in October; and Ministers for Renewable Energy in November. We have scheduled meetings ahead for our Ministers for Telecommunications, Science and Technology, and Commerce and Industry. This is to give a full gamut of the functional cooperation that we have with ASEAN countries.

The ASEAN-India Business Fair and Business Council meetings would be held from December 18 to 20, 2012. We are also beginning consultations this month, on this very day, in Hanoi, on identifying opportunities for cooperation in the SME sector. The first visit of the ASEAN-India Parliamentary Assembly Delegation to India took place in end July. The first Round Table of the ASEAN-India Network of Think Tanks was held in August. We have held a lot of events this year since this is the commemorative year and to launch a number of initiatives in our cooperative endeavours.

An ASEAN-India Expert Meeting on Climate Change took place in June; a Workshop on Adaptation and Mitigation Technologies in Agriculture in August; the launch of an ASEAN-India Newsletter on Agriculture and Forestry and an Agri Expo in October; a Workshop on Cooperation in Renewable Energy in November 2012. In addition, we have seen the institutionalization of the media exchange programme this year, with 20 ASEAN journalists visiting India in February 2012 and eight Indian journalists visiting Vietnam and Cambodia in July 2012. We expect 20 Senior Editors from ASEAN countries in December 2012.

The Committee of Permanent Representatives and a delegation from the ASEAN Secretariat visited India in February and August respectively. We would also be hosting 50 ASEAN diplomats from November 21 for a month, 30 ASEAN farmers and 250 ASEAN students in December this year.

ASEAN-India trade in 2011-12 was around $ 79 billion, crossing the target of $ 70 billion by 2012 set in 2009. We have a Free Trade Agreement in Goods, which was signed in 2009 which became fully operational in August 2011. Negotiations are underway on the FTA on Services and Investments.

This intensive sectoral cooperation between ASEAN and India had been identified under the Plan of Action for ASEAN-India Partnership for Peace, Progress and Shared Prosperity for 2010-15. The activities and collaborative projects under this Plan of Action are being met out of the $ 50 million committed by India to the ASEAN-India Cooperation Fund in 2009. Another $ 5 million are available under the ASEAN-India Green Fund set up in 2007 to promote adaptation and mitigation technologies in the area of climate change, and $1 million is being used from the ASEAN-India Science and Technology Development Fund also set up in 2007.

In the political field, India has been participating in the ASEAN Regional Forum, the ASEAN Defence Ministers’ Meeting Plus, and the Extended ASEAN Maritime Forum meetings, and our ongoing agenda includes cooperation to combat nontraditional threats such as anti-piracy cooperation, combating terrorism and drug trafficking.

India supports the Initiative for ASEAN Integration and has set up English Language Training Centres, Entrepreneurship Development Centres, and Vocational Training Centres in Cambodia, Lao PDR, Myanmar and Vietnam (CLMV countries). We allocate over 600 scholarships annually under ITEC for ASEAN countries. ICCR also extends fellowships to the CLMV countries.

Connectivity with ASEAN, in all its three dimensions - geographical, institutional and people-to-people - is a matter of priority. The Trilateral Highway under construction between India, Myanmar and Thailand would connect Moreh in India to Mae Sot in Thailand.

Two flagship events in this commemorative year are the ASEAN-India Car Rally 2012 which will be flagged off from Yogyakarta on November 26, an Expedition by INS Sudarshini, a sail training ship of the Indian Navy, which set sail for ASEAN countries on September 15, 2012 from Kochi on a six month long expedition....

As far as the East Asia Summit (EAS) is concerned, it started in 2005 as a Leaders-led forum comprising of 10 ASEAN countries, plus Australia, China, India, Japan, ROK and New Zealand. The United States and Russian Federation joined at the Sixth EAS in Bali, Indonesia in November 2011, taking the membership of EAS to 18 countries.

In a relatively short period of time, the EAS has emerged as an important dialogue forum in the region. It is a Leaders-led forum for dialogue on broad strategic, geo-political and economic issues of common interests, with the aim of promoting peace, security, stability and economic prosperity.

India has participated in all the six Summits held so far. We support ASEAN as the driving force in the EAS process.

The 7th EAS is scheduled on November 20 in Phnom Penh, Cambodia. EAS Leaders would hold discussions in Plenary and a Retreat. The five priority areas for regional cooperation within the framework of the EAS include energy, education, finance, natural disaster management, and global health and pandemics. The issues of connectivity and regional economic integration are also included in the EAS agenda as priority areas for the Sixth EAS. During the Retreat session, the Leaders will exchange views on regional and international issues.

During his visit to Cambodia, PM will also pay his respects to His Majesty late Norodom Sihanouk. India attended the Expanded ASEAN Maritime Forum meet in Manila on October 3 to 5, 2012. We support the efforts through the ARF, ADMM+, and EAS to evolve an East Asia architecture that is open, transparent and inclusive. At the Seventh EAS, Leaders are expected to consider adoption of the Phnom Penh Declaration on East Asia Summit Development Initiative. They would also consider a Declaration on Regional Response to Malaria Control and Addressing Resistance to Anti-malarial Medicines. They would witness the launch of the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP).

PM will also provide an update to the establishment of the Nalanda University. We have recently set up a Steering Committee to oversee the Global Design Competition.

At the Sixth EAS, Prime Minister of India announced India’s intention to host an EAS Workshop on disaster management and relief in the case of an occurrence of an earthquake. In fulfillment of this announcement India hosted the ‘EASIndia Workshop: Building Regional Framework for Earthquake Risk Management’ in New Delhi on November 8-9, 2012. In the six sessions spread over two days, participants discussed earthquake risk profiles of EAS member countries, lessons learnt from previous experiences, knowledge sharing on technologies and application of mitigation measures, multilateral coordination and support for recovery financing, capacity development challenges and post disaster longterm recovery and reconstruction.

At the First East Asia Summit Education Ministers’ Meeting held in Yogyakarta, Indonesia on 5th July, 2012, India endorsed the EAS Education Plan of Action 2011-15. We conveyed a proposal to establish an EAS Regional Leadership Development Programme and expressed interest in linking our National Qualification Framework (NQF) to regional framework development linking NQF for the whole region. India will also take the lead in drafting a theme paper for the project on Technical and Vocational Education Training (TVET) Teacher and Student Mobility. Finance Minister participated in the Second Informal EAS Finance Ministers’ Meeting in Tokyo on October 13, 2012. India has participated in the East Asia Summit Energy Ministers’ Meetings, including the sixth held at Phnom Penh, Cambodia, on September 13, 2012.

Prime Minister will also hold bilateral meetings with some of his ASEAN and EAS counterparts.

I thank you.
Question: Mr. Singh, you mentioned that negotiations are under way for the FTA on investment and services. By when do you think these negotiations are going to be complete and what is the status of the negotiations right now?

Question: If I may add, can you tell us something on the respective positions in the negotiations at the moment?

Secretary (East): Negotiations are being conducted by the Ministry of Commerce. They take the lead in this. I would not like to speculate on when they will be concluded and how long they would take.

Question: Sir, there is talk of a kind of a code of conduct being formulated in this upcoming summit for the way countries behave in the South China Sea. What is India’s take on this and how far do you think this is actually going to take place?

Secretary (East): The code of conduct that you are referring to is being formulated by ASEAN countries the guidelines of which were announced in Bali last year. This is something that is done between China and the ASEAN countries. India is not involved in that.

Question: Since many international leaders would be there in Phnom Penh during EAS and ASEAN-India summits, have any bilateral meetings been firmed up? What are the possible meetings?

Secretary (East): Yes, of course there will be bilateral meetings, they are being firmed up. I do not have the full details and a fix on those meetings at the moment. We will keep the press informed on that.

Question: What are the possibilities of PM meeting Chinese President and the American President?

Secretary (East): The Chinese Prime Minister normally attends the East Asia Summit. We will have to see. As soon as these are fixed up, we will keep the press informed.

Question: Any indication from Washington?

Question: Is the Prime Minister likely to be meeting President Obama?

Secretary (East): We do not have a fix on that as yet. I said we will keep the press informed as soon as we know about it.

Question: Could you just give one or two concrete deliverables by EAS in the past seven years which may suggest that it is actually the Leaders-led forum, as you said, and not a talk shop?

Secretary (East): In international affairs, ideas which are generated at Leaders-led conclaves are then put into practice and made functional in the course of time.
Among these is connectivity. There are things about dealing with pandemics and diseases. So, you have an initiative on malaria which is very important to all the countries of the region. You have an initiative on dealing with non-traditional threats such as piracy, terrorism, narcotics trafficking, trafficking of drugs, etc. All these have created greater cooperation among the countries of East Asia. And this is helping the people of this region. There are steps that have been taken on environment, there are steps that have been taken on issues, the most important being that negotiations have begun on East Asia-wide economic space which would have lesser trade barriers.

Question: Mr. Singh, my question was actually with reference to this RCEP. Could you elaborate on that a little bit more as to the framework of it, how do you see it emerging, and on maritime security cooperation as well?

Secretary (East): On RCEP, basically ASEAN has five FTAs - with Japan, ROK, China, Australia and New Zealand have a combined FTA, and India. All these ASEAN+One FTAs are thought to be converted into an ASEAN+Six arrangement in which all of them would pool in and create a common economic space. Negotiations for this had begun under the rubric of Comprehensive Economic Programme for East Asia (CEPEA), and this has now been subsumed into RCEP discussions. So, that is what it is.

As far as maritime security goes, in Philippines the first extended maritime forum took place, I think it was early in September this year, and they discussed various areas of cooperation. As you know around fifty thousand ships travel through this region every year carrying trade, and it is very important to ensure their security. All these issues about ensuring security of the ships, ensuring security of marine passage, etc., are the areas that were discussed.

Question: You mentioned about the Nalanda University. I understand that there is no inter-governmental agreement yet on this university. What is the update on that? And I understand also that as per the Government of India Business Rules, the Ministry of External Affairs cannot run a university unless there is an inter-governmental agreement like in the case of South Asia University.

Secretary (East): I would not like to enter into an argument with you there. The fact is that the East Asia Summit in its press statement took on board the fact that the institution of international stature would be created in Nalanda, and the Ministry of External Affairs has been given the job for doing so, and helping and servicing this institution which is being led by a very eminent Governing Board and is making progress slowly but steadily.

Question: Mr. Singh, could you tell us how soon this road which connects India to ASEAN is going to be ready? When can one hope to drive from India to Hanoi or wherever?
Secretary (East): We have a car rally going on, which will start on 27th of November. It will start at Yogyakarta and go to Singapore through Malaysia, to Thailand, to Vietnam, to Laos, back into Thailand, and then through Myanmar into Moreh in Manipur, and then through Nagaland into Guwahati. So, it is there. The whole idea of the car rally is to show that there is connectivity.

Question: Coming back to the question about code of conduct on South China Sea, do we at least support having such a code of conduct there? I am asking this because most of our trade with the ASEAN countries, at least 55 per cent of it, is through that region.

Secretary (East): The code of conduct is something that ASEAN and China are discussing.
116. Statement by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh prior to his departure for Cambodia to attend the 10th India - ASEAN Summit and the 7th East Asia Summit.

New Delhi, 18 November, 2012.

I am proceeding today on a visit to Cambodia for the 10th India-ASEAN Summit and the 7th East Asian Summit.

Our partnership with ASEAN is an important component of our “Look East” policy. This year marks the 20th anniversary of our dialogue partnership and 10th anniversary of Summit-level engagement with ASEAN. We are celebrating this milestone by hosting a special Commemorative Summit in New Delhi in December.

Over the past decade, our engagement with ASEAN has become strong, comprehensive and multi-faceted. The Summit in Phnom Penh will give us an opportunity to preview and prepare an ambitious agenda for the Summit next month to take the India-ASEAN relationship to a new level. In this context, my ASEAN colleagues and I will also have the opportunity to review in Phnom Penh the recommendations of the Eminent Persons Group of India and ASEAN.

East Asia Summit is the foremost forum for promoting peace, stability and prosperity in the Asia Pacific region. This year, we are preparing to launch the negotiations for a Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership among ASEAN and its FTA Partners, including India. This is a giant step towards creation of an economic community in the region. This forum also serves as a useful platform for enhancing cooperation in the region and discussing regional security issues.

On the margins of East Asia Summit, I will have the opportunity to meet other world leaders.

117. Opening Remarks by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at 10th India-ASEAN Summit.

Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Cambodia, Samdech HUN SEN, Sultan of Brunei Darussalam,
His Majesty Haji Hassanal Bolkiah,
Excellencies,

It is a great pleasure and privilege for me to join you for the 10th India-ASEAN Summit. I thank Prime Minister HUN SEN and the people of Cambodia for their warm welcome and generous hospitality, and for the excellent arrangements for the Summit.

A visit to Cambodia never fails to remind that India’s relations with South-east Asia rest on the foundations of historical links and ancient cultural ties. Today, they are invigorated by the recognition of our increasingly shared destinies. As we gather for our tenth summit in the country that hosted the first such Summit, let me reaffirm that India attaches the highest strategic priority to its relations with ASEAN.

Excellencies, a future of peace, stability and prosperity in the Asia Pacific requires increased cooperation and integration in the region. ASEAN has shown the way in this regard. We support the objectives of an ASEAN Community by 2015, the Initiative for ASEAN Integration and the ASEAN Master Plan on Connectivity.

ASEAN’s leadership in fostering cooperation and building better understanding in the larger Asia Pacific community is admirable. We believe that ASEAN centrality is essential in the evolving regional architecture for peace, stability, development and prosperity.

Excellencies, India’s relationship with ASEAN members and with ASEAN institutionally continues to grow in all dimensions. Commerce and connectivity are vital areas of this relationship and we have made good progress in both.

The India-ASEAN Agreement on Trade in Goods has served us well. Our trade was nearly 80 billion US dollars in the Indian financial year ending March 2012, exceeding our target of 70 billion US dollars. I would like to inform Your Excellencies that India is prepared to conclude the Agreement on Trade in Services and Investment Promotion before the Commemorative Summit in Delhi in December. This will be a strong signal of our deepening economic engagement, and will allow for rapid expansion in trade and investment flows in both directions.

Connectivity with ASEAN in all its dimensions - physical, institutional and people-to-people - continues to be a strategic priority for India. Two major Commemorative events this year - the India-ASEAN Car Rally and the ASEAN sailing expedition of the Indian Naval Ship Sudarshini - highlight the importance and the potential for connecting India and ASEAN by sea, surface and air links.

We have also held discussions with ASEAN in the Land Transport Working Group, the Maritime Transport Working Group and the ASEAN Connectivity Coordinating Committee. The Trilateral Highway Task Force met in New Delhi and resolved to establish connectivity from Moreh in India to Mae Sot in Thailand by 2016. These are welcome steps in implementing the vision of India-ASEAN connectivity. We await route alignments on the extension of the Trilateral Highway and the proposed new highway to Vietnam so that these can be examined in an integrated manner. I look forward to early completion of the feasibility studies.

I am also happy that our people are also connecting with each other. A large number of ASEAN students, Senior Editors, diplomats and farmers are visiting India in December 2012 and will join us at the ceremonial flag down of the Car Rally in New Delhi. India and ASEAN have signed a unique MoU on Strengthening Tourism Cooperation. Continuing liberalization of our visa regime for ASEAN countries is also inspired by the same desire to connect our people and expand mutually beneficial economic opportunities. I am especially pleased that this year, delegates of the ASEAN Inter-Parliamentary Assembly have exchanged visits for the first time with an Indian Parliamentary delegation.

Excellencies, our cooperation is growing rapidly across an increasingly wide range of sectors and fields. The meetings between our Ministers of Environment, New & Renewable Energy, Tourism, Agriculture and Telecommunications during the year reflect this growing momentum. We have begun consultations on deepening our linkages in the important sector of medium and small scale industries, which are engines of employment and innovation in our countries.

The launch of an ASEAN-India Newsletter on Agriculture and Forestry is a very important initiative and I am also encouraged by the level of ASEAN participation in the Agri Expo. We look forward to a successful India-ASEAN Business Fair in Delhi in December. I attach special importance to our ongoing cooperative programmes in the knowledge and skills sector. The first meeting between the heads of space agencies of India and ASEAN in Bengaluru in June 2012 should enhance cooperation in application of space assets and science for our mutual benefit. Finally, we are making tangible progress on the Plan of Action for Peace, Progress and Shared Prosperity for 2010-15.

Excellencies, India and ASEAN should not only work for shared prosperity and closer links between our peoples, but also to promote peace, security and stability in the region. We should therefore enhance our cooperation to address shared challenges. I am happy to note our growing engagement in areas such as defence, maritime security and counter-terrorism. We attach great importance to our consultation and cooperation in the East Asia Summit, ASEAN Regional Forum and ADMM+ forums. I am confident that, given our cultural affinity, physical proximity, shared values, convergent worldviews and similarities in our approaches to the region, our relationship will increasingly become more comprehensive and strategic in nature.

Excellencies, I would like to express my deep appreciation for the constructive and supportive role that Cambodia has played for the last three years as the Coordinator for India. I welcome Brunei, the current Coordinator for India, and assure them of our full support in taking our partnership to new heights.

Finally, I am grateful to all of you, Excellencies, for confirming your participation in the Commemorative Summit in New Delhi on 20-21 December, 2012. I look forward to receiving you for what will be an opportunity to celebrate the progress in India-ASEAN relations over the past decade and outline a vision for a future partnership for peace and prosperity, not only for our countries, but also for the wider region.

I thank you.
Response by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the 10th ASEAN-India Summit.

Excellencies,

I sincerely thank you for your support for India-ASEAN partnership and your commitment to further strengthen and broaden it. I am also grateful for your valuable thoughts and suggestions on the future direction of our relationship. I also look forward to meeting you bilaterally here and in Delhi.

I also thank the ASEAN-India Eminent Persons Group for its report on India-ASEAN Partnership. The Group’s recommendations provide valuable guidance for our deepening partnership, not only for mutual benefit, but also for peace and stability, growth and prosperity in the wider Asia-Pacific region.

I have no doubt that the conclusion of the Agreement on Trade in Services and Investments, together with our existing Agreement on Trade in Goods, will be a springboard for rapid expansion in our economic relations. The promising initiatives for cooperation in diverse sectors will add additional depth and range to our cooperation. India’s large markets and rapid growth offer enormous opportunities for investments. We are taking a series of steps to further improve investment environment and accelerate growth. We look forward to increased ASEAN investments into India. At the same time, India will offer its own resources, expertise and experience to support growth and development in ASEAN countries, where such needs exist. I am pleased that Indian private sector has increased its presence in the region. I would also like to stress the importance of creating an environment that makes it easier for our professionals, entrepreneurs, students and tourists to travel between India and ASEAN countries.

Improved connectivity between India and ASEAN will be vital for deepening our economic integration as well as our strategic partnership. India and ASEAN have a shared interest in maritime security, counter-terrorism, antipiracy and disaster management. We would like to see the emergence of an open, balanced, inclusive architecture that promotes peace, stability and prosperity in the Asia-Pacific Region.

This is a time of challenges in the region, but also of immense opportunities to shape its future. I am convinced that India and ASEAN can play an important and constructive role in building the regional architecture. Tomorrow, we will participate in the seventh East Asia Summit and launch the RCEP negotiations.

This 10th ASEAN India Summit in Phnom Penh is a significant milestone in our partnership. There is great expectation for the future. I am confident that India and ASEAN countries will build a comprehensive strategic partnership. The Commemorative Summit provides us an occasion to define our vision for the future.

Excellencies, I look forward to receiving you in New Delhi for the Commemorative Summit. Once again, I would like to thank our Host Cambodia and Prime Minister Hun Sen for their very warm hospitality and for Cambodia’s role in helping us to scale new heights in the ASEAN-India Dialogue Partnership.

Thank you.
119. Statement by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Plenary Session of 7th East Asia Summit.

Your Excellency Samdech Hun Sen,
Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Cambodia,
Excellencies,

I thank Prime Minister Hun Sen for his very warm hospitality and the excellent arrangements for the 7th East Asia Summit.

I would like to begin by complimenting ASEAN members, not only for their progress in creating an integrated ASEAN community, but for their leadership in launching wider regional initiatives such as the ARF, EAS and the ADMM+. For India, ASEAN has been the bridge to the East. It is also central to the evolution of a regional architecture and its different cooperative frameworks.

Excellencies,

India’s security and prosperity are vitally linked to the Asia Pacific region. Our vision for this region is rooted in cooperation and integration. Forums such as the East Asia Summit can help create a large economic community in this region that will accelerate development and enhance prosperity, besides reinforcing mutual understanding and confidence in the region.

This Summit is witness to important events and changes taking place in the Asia Pacific region. Concerted effort and collective action on the part of the countries gathered in this room can strengthen mutual understanding and help us address shared challenges. For this, it would be necessary to develop a common set of principles, establish cooperative mechanisms and deepen regional economic integration. We, therefore, welcome the launch of the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership negotiations today. We also support the Phnom Penh Declaration on East Asia Summit Development Initiative.

Connectivity is vital for increased commerce, contact and cooperation between our countries. We must quickly implement the EAS Declaration on ASEAN Connectivity, adopted at our last Summit. Early identification of specific projects and the evolution of innovative financing mechanisms for their implementation would also help move forward this important aspect of our cooperation.

Excellencies,

India has been happy to carry forward several EAS-related initiatives. Following the EAS Declaration on Malaria Control, we have proposed a programme on capacity building and vector control management systems to our ASEAN partners earlier this year and look forward to cooperating with other EAS members. Earlier this month, we held the EAS-India Workshop on Building a Regional Framework for Earthquake Risk Management in New Delhi. This will augur well for our cooperation in responding to natural disasters. Finally, the Nalanda University project, in which your support has been invaluable, is gaining momentum and we expect the first two schools to commence teaching in the academic year 2014-15.

Excellencies,

though EAS is still new, we have built an impressive agenda for economic cooperation and for addressing some of our common challenges. We should try and bring to bear the same spirit in addressing our differences. I have no doubt that, together, we can create an open, balanced, inclusive and rule-based architecture in the region for our collective security, stability and prosperity.

Thank you.

120. Opening Statement by the Prime Minister at the Plenary Session of India-ASEAN Commemorative Summit.

New Delhi, December 20, 2012.

Your Majesty Haji Hassanal Bolkiah, Sultan of Brunei Darussalam,
Your Excellency Samdech Hun Sen, Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Cambodia, Heads of State & Government of ASEAN Member States,
Secretary General of ASEAN, Dr. Surin Pitsuwan,

Excellencies,

It is a great honour and privilege for me to welcome you and your delegations to India. This is the first time that leaders from all ten ASEAN countries are with us here in Delhi. It is a historic moment for us and our region. We are commemorating not only twenty years of Dialogue Partnership and ten years of annual summits between India and ASEAN; we are also celebrating something more enduring and precious.

India and South-east Asia have centuries-old links. People, ideas, trade, art and religions have long criss-crossed this region. A timeless thread of civilization runs through all our countries. While each one of us has a unique and rich heritage, there are abiding linkages of culture and custom, of art and religion and of civilization, all of which create a sense of unity in the diversity and pluralism in our region. In addition, given that together we constitute a community of 1.8 billion people, representing one-fourth of humanity, with a combined GDP of 3.8 trillion U.S. dollars, it is only natural that India should attach the highest priority to its relationship with ASEAN.

We see our partnership with ASEAN not merely as a reaffirmation of ties with neighbouring countries or as an instrument of economic development, but also as an integral part of our vision of a stable, secure and prosperous Asia and its surrounding Indian Ocean and Pacific regions.

The breadth and intensity of India's engagement with Southeast Asia is unmatched by any of our other regional relationships. We have institutionalized annual summits; many of our sectoral dialogues have been elevated into ministerial consultations; and nearly 25 mechanisms for dialogue and cooperation between us cover virtually every field of human endeavour.

This engagement has flourished particularly in the area of trade. India-ASEAN trade has grown over ten times in the ten years since we launched the annual summits. Following the implementation of our FTA in Goods, trade grew by 41% in Indian fiscal year of 2011-12. Two-way flows in investments have also grown rapidly to reach 43 billion U.S. dollars over the past decade. As ASEAN investments into India have multiplied, ASEAN countries too have emerged as major destinations for Indian companies. From energy resources to farm products, from materials to machinery, and from electronics to information technology, Indian and ASEAN companies are forging new partnerships of trade and investment.

It gives me great pleasure, therefore, to see that our Commemorative Summit today coincides with the conclusion of negotiations for the FTA in Services and Investments. This represents a valuable milestone in our relationship. I am confident it will boost our economic ties in much the same way the FTA in Goods has done.

Excellencies, the India-ASEAN engagement began with a strong economic emphasis, but it has also become increasingly strategic in its content. Our political dialogue has grown, our consultations in regional forums have intensified, and our defence and counter-terrorism cooperation have expanded. Naturally, this partnership is important because our histories are intertwined. Equally, I feel, our future is inter-linked and a stable, secure and prosperous Indo-Pacific region is crucial for our own progress and prosperity. There is, therefore, mutual benefit in these aspects of our engagement.

The path to regional peace and stability is greater coordination, cooperation and integration among our economies. ASEAN has shown the way for the entire region, building a regional mechanism of cooperation and consensus that has become a great force for peace and prosperity. It has also emerged as the principal architect and driver of economic and security structures and institutions that are emerging in the region. ASEAN centrality and leadership are essential elements for the success of these forums and India fully supports ASEAN as the lynchpin of these efforts. We also support the objective of an ASEAN Community by 2015 and will continue to be an active participant in the Initiative for ASEAN Integration and the ASEAN Master Plan on Connectivity.

Excellencies, in so far as the broad lines of cooperation in coming years are concerned, I feel we should intensify our political and security consultations, including in regional forums such as the East Asia Summit, the ASEAN Regional Forum and the ASEAN Defence Ministers’ Meeting Plus. We should work together more purposefully for the evolution of an open, balanced, inclusive and transparent regional architecture. The growing role and responsibilities of ASEAN and India in global affairs also call for increased consultation on a broader range of international developments.

As maritime nations, India and ASEAN nations should intensify their engagement for maritime security and safety, for freedom of navigation and for peaceful settlement of maritime disputes in accordance with international law. We should also foster regional cooperation to counter piracy and respond to natural disasters.

Naturally, our ability to work together in regional and global contexts will be stronger if we are able to deepen our own engagement and cooperation. In this context, connectivity – physical, institutional, people-to-people, digital and by sea and air – holds the key to closer partnership between India and ASEAN. Tomorrow’s flagging down of the India-ASEAN Car Rally will not only celebrate a remarkable journey by brave men and women, but also symbolize how connectivity can link people, stimulate trade and generate prosperity across the region. We should, therefore, attach high priority to a quick implementation of the India-Myanmar-Thailand Trilateral Highway and its extension to Lao PDR and Cambodia. We should also launch the second track that would run from India through Myanmar, Lao PDR and Cambodia to Vietnam.

Similarly, the Indian Naval Ship INS Sudarshini, which is on a six-month expedition to nine ASEAN countries, not only draws attention to our maritime links, but to the economic potential of sea-based connectivity.

These infrastructure projects demand enormous finances. We should think of innovative ways of financing and executing these projects, which also draw upon the expertise and resources of the private sector.

Improved connectivity will lead to expanded commerce. I am optimistic that our trade will exceed 100 billion U.S. dollars by 2015 and we should aim for the milestone of 200 billion U.S. dollars ten years from now. We should also build on commendable initiatives like the annual India-ASEAN Business Fair and Conclave and energize our Business Council. Linkages between small and medium enterprises, which are central to our economies, should be promoted.

Many of us around this table share common challenges of energy and food security, rapid urbanization, climate change, the empowerment of people through education and skill development. We should use the opportunities available to work together in addressing these. I would like to state that, drawing on the experience of the India-ASEAN Plan of Action and the recommendations of the India-ASEAN Eminent Persons’ Group, we will expand our support for innovative mechanisms like the ASEAN-India Fund, the ASEAN-India Green Fund and the ASEAN-India S&T Fund to take our cooperation forward in diverse fields.

Excellencies, this is a time of great flux and transition, with several unsettled questions and unresolved issues in our region. Our responsibility to work for peace has increased and become more urgent. Our shared values, convergent world views and similarities in approaches to the region should help us make the India-ASEAN relationship more comprehensive and elevate it to a Strategic Partnership for the next decade and beyond.
With these words, I once again wish to thank you, Excellencies, for joining me here in New Delhi. Your participation has already made this Summit memorable. I very much look forward to hearing your valuable views on the future of our relationship.

I would now like to invite my co-Chair, H.E. Mr. Hun Sen, the Prime Minister of Cambodia, to share his views on the future of India-ASEAN partnership.

122. Media Interaction of External Affairs Minister Salman Khurshid on the conclusion of ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit.

New Delhi, December 21, 2012.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Good afternoon friends and thank you very much for being there this afternoon. We have here with us the External Affairs Minister Mr. Salman Khurshid. I would request the External Affairs Minister to make his opening remarks. Following that the floor would be open for you to ask any questions that you would like to. I now request the External Affairs Minister to make his opening remarks.

External Affairs Minister (Shri Salman Khurshid): Thank you very much.

Friends from the media both from our country India and from ASEAN countries, I am very pleased to address you for a second time on the occasion of the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit. You recall that we discussed briefly yesterday the outcome of the Commemorative Summit. I placed before you, as indeed you witnessed all of it and covered it as well yesterday. We have now formally concluded, just a little while ago, all the events associated with the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit including farewell lunch that the Prime Minister held for all our distinguished guests.

The Prime Minister and the leaders of ASEAN countries in the morning - I think some of you were there - ceremonially flagged down the ASEAN-India car rally. That was witnessed by 220 ASEAN students, 13 ASEAN journalists, 27 ASEAN farmers perhaps for the first time, 30 ASEAN diplomats who are visiting India under various initiatives for promoting ASEAN-India people-to-people connectivity. I think those of you who would have seen it or were there would have felt the immediate sense of bonding and the wonderful chemistry that we saw this morning.

Last night the President of India had hosted a banquet in the honour of all the visiting dignitaries. It was preceded by a really wonderful fusion cultural performance by cultural troupes from all the ten ASEAN countries and India. It showcased the rich cultural traditions that overlap and can beautifully be interwoven. That is the delightful experience that we had last night.

As I mentioned to you yesterday, the vision statement which was issued at the conclusion of the Summit provides a roadmap for realizing the strategic partnership. We have raised ourselves to a strategic partnership between India and ASEAN.

Another important outcome of the Summit was the announcement by leaders that the Economic Ministers of India and ASEAN have concluded negotiations on the ASEAN-India Trade in Services and Investment Agreement. Having signed the agreement on goods earlier, we were all anxiously waiting for the agreement on services and investment. This, as I said yesterday, would be signed shortly now that the formalities will be completed.

We are gratified that all the ASEAN leaders have appreciated India's continued support for community-building efforts and the initiative for ASEAN Integration Work Plan 2 towards narrowing development gaps and realizing truly an ASEAN community by 2015. Amongst the important steps that we hope to take now, we will continue to work towards ASEAN-India economic integration.

There will be, as you noticed yesterday, enormous emphasis on improving connectivity in all dimensions - the Prime Minister has repeatedly mentioned this - geographic, institutional, people-to-people including air, sea and digital connectivity in further strengthening our partnership.

There will be emphasis on the India-Myanmar-Thailand trilateral highway - for which we have a target of 2016 - its extension to Lao PDR and Cambodia, the India-Myanmar-Laos-Vietnam-Cambodia highway, the Mekong-India Economic Corridor which proposes to connect Chennai port with Dawei deep sea port in Myanmar, and further connecting it to the production centres in the Mekong region. So, it is a web of connectivity and it is an ambitious web of connectivity that we are all working towards, complete agreement on the different dimensions and aspects and complete commitment as a major step towards integration.

To sustain this momentum is obviously quite a task. I have invited all the Foreign Ministers of ASEAN countries to the fifth edition of the Delhi Dialogue, Delhi Dialogue V, which will be held in New Delhi from 18th to 19th February, 2013. India's relationship with the ASEAN is not just about economic development. It is also about our vision of a stable, secure and prosperous Asia, as was repeatedly emphasized by the Hon. Prime Minister.

The advancement in terms of concluding negotiations on the FTA in Services and Investment, as I mentioned, and the elevation of relationship to the strategic level will allow us to fast track our ambitious commitment to the process of integration between ASEAN and India. I think that for all of you and for us this is in that sense living history, an important milestone towards a vision that began with our great leaders, our first Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehruji, and subsequently translated into Look East Policy of Indian Government. And I hope that you all are equally part of it. So, congratulations.

I will take some questions.

Official Spokesperson: For the sake of order, you can ask first all the questions related to ASEAN. And then if you have any other questions, the Minister will be glad to take them.
Question: Sir, you were talking about the strategic dialogue. What level of strategic dialogue or partnership are you speaking of with so many countries associated with the ASEAN? Is this type of a strategic partnership possible with multilateral organizations like the ASEAN?

External Affairs Minister: Absolutely. We think it is entirely possible, which is not to say that when you engage in a multilateral strategic partnership you will do it at the cost of developing bilateral relations. The two-track process continues. Wherever there is potential, need and visionary necessity for building on bilateral relations, we will continue to do so, but with the hope that those will become building blocks also ultimately for greater multilateral engagement.

If ASEAN integrates, then you are dealing with not ten countries but you are dealing with one organization. That is the idea of partnership. Within the ASEAN region, in the process of integrating obviously they have different mechanisms and different groups and Committees that work towards integration. What we get is, when they speak with us in partnership mode they speak with one voice. What we hope to do is to provide resonance to that voice. So, the integration that is taking place within ASEAN can be fortified by our partnership. And the advantage that we can get by including ourselves in the larger sphere and contributing by becoming part of that larger area of engagement is what we would like to do.

Strategic partnership obviously has some elements that can be seen as important elements. The important elements relate to environmental issues, relate to connectivity, relate to ability to reach out in significant way when you are needed, to be able to reach out as in disaster management, on security dialogue issues. That is extremely important to understand each other and each other's aspirations and concerns in security dialogues are also very significant part of the strategic relationship. So, I think that there is no ambiguity, doubt or any confusion as far as the content of the strategic partnership is concerned.

Question: Any such examples existing?

External Affairs Minister: Do we have something similar elsewhere?

Question: Yes.

External Affairs Minister: Obviously, in the most concentrated way this is something that in principle we have in the SAARC region. But the difficulty in the SAARC region is that we do not have the same size of economies. If you do not have the same size of economies, your attitude and your mechanisms have to accommodate that. But it is different for dealing with the SAARC region. European Union for instance, we have a strategic dialogue with the European Union. Therefore, you could say that there are lot of overlaps and similarities. But the fact that we have such a relationship with the European Union means that there may well be difference in what we do with the European Union and what we do in this region.

The cultural and historical connectivity here is much stronger. The reliance on each other in terms of investment and trade is much stronger. I think the car rally and the sail ship that has travelled in a sense have brought this out very explicitly as to what close connectivity we have. So, we have to take advantage of that close connectivity rather than build on a connectivity. We must take advantage and fortify it. Otherwise you build a connectivity and that building of that connectivity is a longer process than an existing connectivity that needs to be fortified. This is a very specific advantage we have in the ASEAN region. That is why our Look East Policy in that sense becomes a very important dimension of our foreign policy.

Question: Mr. Khurshid, Vietnam is the only country which has mentioned China by name and has expressed concerns about Chinese policies vis-à-vis South China Sea region. I would like to know whether during the bilateral meetings other ASEAN leaders have also raised similar concerns with regard to China. Also, could you give your reaction to Indian Naval Chief’s remarks on South China Sea issue which have drawn a very sharp reaction from China?

External Affairs Minister: As far as the Indian Navy Chief is concerned, I would urge you to factor in the vocabulary, the style and the manner in which a person trained in the armed forces speaks. I think that you will be unfair to him if plain-speaking, which is what the armed forces are accustomed to doing, is taken on a level that creates ambiguity about how one approaches it in terms of bilateral relations. He is not responsible for bilateral relations. He is responsible for a specific job which he does well. He is an outstanding soldier. I think you must treat a soldier as a soldier; and you must treat a politician as a politician, and a diplomat as a diplomat. Do not confuse their roles.

As far as China is concerned, this or any other matter, we do not believe that there is for us vis-à-vis China any matter that comes anywhere near undermining what is an extremely beneficial, wholesome and a substantive relationship with China. And it has grown - if I cannot use the word by leaps and bounds - by steady steps towards the direction and a destination that we both share. We believe that good and wholesome relations between India and China are not only good for ourselves mutually but are also good for all of Asia and indeed for the rest of the world. A lot of people look upon us with great hope that India and China can collaborate, cooperate, and be strategic partners. This is an important dimension that we would urge you to keep in mind.

There will be from time to time issues that will arise on which it is possible that we have a difference of opinion, that we have a difference of emphasis. There may be issues that arise between China and some other country on which we may have an opinion if we are asked for it. But we do not have to go looking for intervention or interference where it is not called for. I think every country in the region is capable of dealing with its problems with all of us as and when they arise. If it is a bilateral issue, it should be dealt with bilaterally. If it comes in a multilateral frame, then of course we will look at it multilaterally to the extent the rules of the game permit looking at it multilaterally.

This was today a partnership for peace and prosperity between ASEAN and India where we were not looking at bilateral issues of either the countries involved in the ASEAN region, or other countries in that region or in the vicinity. So, this is not a matter that was on the agenda. Of course it was raised by Vietnam. We noted it. And I think that is the best that we can do. We have already stated our commitment to international law of the sea; we have stated our commitment to freedom of navigation; and we have very categorically said that what we have off shore from Vietnam in terms of prospecting for oil is something that goes back to 1988 and not something that we are trying to barge into now. ONGC has been prospecting for oil. It is a commercial arrangement with Vietnam. Sovereignty issues between Vietnam and any other country, between China and any other country, could be settled bilaterally. This has been our position. I think we do not think that issues such as that should necessarily detract from the larger canvas and picture that we are concentrating on in a summit of this nature. And that is the attitude we have taken.

Question: Sir, in your bilateral with Malaysia, was the issue of cancellation of the contract with GMR in Maldives taken up? If so, have they sought any assurance on the GMR airport project in the Maldives?

External Affairs Minister: The matter was mentioned. I would not say that it was discussed in great detail. It was mentioned and we wanted an update on their impressions because the Foreign Minister had visited Maldives briefly for day. I think that his takeaway was more or less the understanding that we have. There are two separate issues and we would rather the two issues were not confused and were not converged. One issue is a pure assessment of the contract and legal steps taken on that contract, which has now gone to arbitration in Singapore. Obviously the arbitration will come to some definite conclusions including what are the entitlements of GMR after the contract was terminated.

For the present, the rulings of the Singapore court relating to termination of that contract itself are binding on all parties. That is what we have been saying all along that whatever decision needs to be taken must be compliant with and consistent with decisions of courts whose jurisdiction has been accepted by both parties. This is the feedback we had from GMR that they have accepted that, the legal consequences of the judgment in Singapore. But they have obviously desired that there should be quick implementation of the subsequent consequences that arise from termination of the contract including compensation, damages, etc. We have no report that there is any negativity as far as that is concerned.

The other ground there was whether there were any political reasons for doing this. If there were and are any political reasons, we would like, and we suggested to Maldives that we would like them to be contained and not spill over into a very important, very valuable relationship that we have with Maldives. I think that point also has been taken. It was more or less a confirmation of this that we have got from the Malaysian side. The disappointment that we felt, I think we have a right to feel disappointed, was also felt by them. They have also been able to secure from Maldivian Government a letter in some form that indicates that quality of performance was not the ground at all for termination of the contract. I think this was necessary for Malaysia for its future prospects elsewhere. That was not something that we had asked for or called for. Therefore, we have not received any such letter.

Question: India has asserted repeatedly about the right of freedom of navigation in South China Sea. But China has ignored those statements and advised India not to engage in unilateral activities in South China Sea. Your reaction please!

External Affairs Minister: There is no unilateral activity in South China Sea. Our reiteration of the law of the sea is not something that has been directly questioned by China. As I said, the issue that China has raised bilaterally with some countries in the region is an issue about sovereignty. That would be sorted out presumably in appropriate dialogue between them. But obviously any dialogue of a bilateral nature between two countries takes into account the broad parameters that are laid down by international law and the backdrop of international law.

I have not come across any statement of China directly contradicting or repudiating anything we have said. They have reiterated their position and we have said our position, not once but several times. Whenever we have been called upon to articulate our position, we have articulated it. I do not think that this has caused any disquiet or any discomfort between us and China. We continue in a very meaningful, positive dialogue. That is at least my personal experience, and certainly the experience I can share with you that the Prime Minister has had in exchanges with their top leadership.

Question: Sir, could you please elaborate on the digital connectivity? What exactly is that?

External Affairs Minister: We do realize that there is a very active youth movement in different parts of the world but certainly in this case particularly in ASEAN where communications are being in a sense taken over by young people and they are communicating directly through cyberspace. Therefore, whatever we can do to encourage a wholesome exchange inside the space on issues that pertain to quality of life and the aspirations of young people in ASEAN countries, we have encouraged it and we will certainly be happy to participate in it.

The other thing of course about digital connectivity is to ensure that there is obviously broadband connectivity amongst these countries. It is a lot easier today to provide digital connectivity. You can do it sitting in a room with powerful enough equipment than to provide physical connectivity which actually means building the roads, infrastructure, putting the railway line, putting in all that it takes to maintain the road and railway line. But, as I said to you, we are committed to doing all of them. One is not going to be a substitute of another. One will complement the other and all of them will be in place.

Question: Sir, having talked about China’s influence over ASEAN and India’s disconnect with the issues, I want to ask you about the China’s influence on Nepal. There have been repetitive reports that India’s goods and services are continuously being replaced by Chinese ones in Nepal. What is your take on this? And what is India doing in this regard?

External Affairs Minister: India has never insisted that there is any exclusive area of operation to the exclusion of any other country. In modern times with modern connectivity and the internet, it is very difficult to claim any association or affiliation or any friendship to be exclusive. We look at the content and substance of our own relationships with our friends. We are not concerned about anybody else seeking also their attention. I think we should have the confidence to know that both in historical terms, cultural terms and in economic terms, what we offer is not in any way inferior to what anybody else can offer. I see no reason why we should insist on offering second-class services and expect that somebody who offers better services should not be given attention.

As far as Nepal is concerned, or for that matter any other country is concerned, Indian goods will have to compete in quality, in productivity and in price because there is an open marketplace. These are not government-to-government contracts. Government can facilitate for business to grow. The relationships that we have with other countries become basically the canvas on which business can draw its own pictures. But we cannot dictate, and we cannot restrict, and we certainly cannot contain anybody else coming into the market, particularly when we believe in open market competition. I would certainly urge all our friends in business who see Nepal - both in terms of their past experiences and in terms of their future plans - as a promising economic partner, to look at the expectations and demands of the market and meet those expectations and demands. There is no reason why we should be pushed out of the market in terms of supplying particularly when we know that a large number of Nepalese come to India, like to be in India, educate their people in India, and want to retain very strong connections with India. Why should people who have very strong connections with India not be interested in buying Indian goods and services?

Question: Sir, the two Italian marines who were accused of killing of the fishermen in Kerala were allowed by a court to go to their homeland for Christmas celebrations. But there is widespread criticism about the stand taken by the Central Government saying that it was a soft stand by the Centre in the court. How do you react to this?

External Affairs Minister: We took a responsible and objective stand when asked by court. We could not have taken any other stand. If a foreign government and a Foreign Minister of another country presents a documents, or presents a request, or presents guarantee to a court of our country, we can hardly say do not take it seriously. On the merits the court has to decide. We are no one to decide and nor should we be deciding. If we had to decide, the matter would not have gone to court. So, both in terms of jurisdiction, where the Supreme Court is still to pronounce, and also in terms of bail conditions where the High Court had imposed bail conditions, the variance in those bail conditions also has been done by the High Court. Of course we have been asked to respond on what according to us is the status of the guarantee given and the commitment made by another country. And we have done what under the understanding of international relations anyone would have done. If we had not done this, we would have been in violation of our commitments to international law.

Question: Sir, again a question relating to Nepal. As a friendly neighbor with huge leverage in Nepal, is India concerned with the perennial political stalemate in Nepal? If so, Sir, how do you observe the situation in Nepal? And do you see any kind of role India could play in Nepal in helping to end the stalemate, as India did in 2005 when forging the historic 12-Point Understanding between the political forces in Nepal?

External Affairs Minister: The President of Nepal is coming very soon. He is visiting India very soon on the invitation of the President of India. He is the Constitutional Head of State in Nepal. I think that from what I know he has been trying his best to get all the parties together, come back to the table, discuss. The only method that is now left to Nepal to move forward is to have, it seems, a consensual national government for which the contours and the structure has to be worked out by the political parties in Nepal.

We do hear what is happening there from time to time. Our Mission reports to us what kind of confabulations have taken place, discussions have taken place, if there has been movement, or there has been a stalemate. We also note that the Indian President has tried to push for a consensus by putting deadlines and there is now another deadline that has been made available.

But other than to morally support this movement for a consensual national government that can then organize fresh elections, there is not very much that we can do. Every time and every event has its own limitations and its own requirements. We have to respond to the requirements and limitations of the present event rather than go by a standard that was followed in some previous event in which our intervention to the extent possible may have been wholesome and successful. But not always can that be repeated.

I think right now people are engaged in very meaningful dialogue. We keep track of what is happening in the dialogue to the extent possible. But we would rather that the dialogue itself throw up the consensus that everybody knows - we know and Nepal knows and everybody else knows – that it is very important for future prosperity of our friendly neighbour.

Question: Sir, The Malaysian King had said that he would welcome the English teachers here; Did you have any discussion on this question?

External Affairs Minister: Yes, there was discussion; this is not only from Malaysia, but we have received similar messages from others as well. We expect Indian institutions and technical training centres provide such training to them, in this country against the fellowships and slots provided by us, we also provide training in centres in those countries, we are establishing. They particularly asked training in English language and we are making such efforts in this sector. We provide such assistance wherever we get such requests. We are not the only one for giving training in English, there are other countries also who can give them cooperation in English teaching. Wherever we get such requests we are always ready to cooperate. When they chose to give us preference to us to learn the language in the manner we teach and it is their preference for that, we are ever ready to cooperate.

Question: Sir, the Russian Ambassador has congratulated Narendra Modi on his electoral win. Earlier we have seen that the British envoy and some other European envoy had also visited him. How does the Centre view the end of the diplomatic isolation of Narendra Modi which forced the riots in 2002?

External Affairs Minister: We did not encourage any diplomatic isolation. We did not encourage a sovereign country to take a particular position on Mr. Modi. But they did take that position and we noted it. If they take another position, we will note that as well.

Mr. Modi is an elected Chief Minister of our country of the State of Gujarat and he would take his oath under the Constitution of India. Much as we may disagree with some of his policies and indeed some of the attitudes that he exhibits, he has an elected office and he has and he would have taken oath once again under the Constitution. So, we will respect that, obviously we are required to respect that. To have political differences with him and to join a campaign against him on issues that are we believe of far-reaching nature, is completely different from his service as a Chief Minister of the State. I hope that he makes the same distinction himself.

Question: Sir, could you tell us about the agreements that would be reached during the Russian President's visit? Any agreements on nuclear reactors 3 and 4?

External Affairs Minister: As far as the agreement on Kudankulam 3 and 4 is concerned, we have an umbrella agreement with the Russian Federation. Now for specific units of Kudankulam that will be directly negotiated and signed by the organization that is responsible for the power plant. But that is not something that needs to or would require to be done at the level of President Putin. There will be other agreements. We have a meeting of a Cabinet Committee this afternoon and I think that some of those will be finalized. It will not be possible for me to declare that at this stage. After their being finalized in the Cabinet Committee, we will then be able to disclose and then you would know as part of the programme as to what agreements he will sign. But there will be some agreements signed.

Question: Russian Ambassador Mr. Kadakin while addressing a press conference today was very critical of the treatment by the treatment Systema met in this country. He said the matter is more political than judicial. What is your reaction to that?

External Affairs Minister: My reaction is that I could be critical as well but it would not help. We are bound by judgments of the court. Because of the difficulty that we felt understanding the law of the land, we went for an advisory opinion. In my understanding of the advisory opinion that has been being given, there were several questions to be answered. The court had said they will answer four questions. According to the judgment itself they answered five. But close reading of the judgment indicates that they answered only four questions. So, there are important, significant questions, particularly the fifth question i.e., what in crafting relief should the courts do when there are international obligations? This answer is not specifically made available in the Supreme Court judgment. When the Supreme Court opens, and this is brought to the notice of the Chief Justice and the Supreme Court, they might want to take a fresh look at this.

In the absence of Supreme Court giving us very clear guidance on this, there is not any executive that can be taken. At the best I would presently simply say that there is a concern felt and that concern may have been expressed in this manner. We are sensitive to that concern. We are trying to address that concern.
In one way or the other we are hopeful that that concern will get addressed. I cannot put a timeline on it. I hope that when the Prime Minister meets Mr. Putin if this topic comes up, we will have some adequate reply ready which would bring some comfort I believe.

Question: Is India looking to buy more fighter jets from Russia? Has President Putin expressed his concern that contracts for defence deals are now going more to the US and Europe?

External Affairs Minister: I think that a lot of stories get written at the time of such a visit. I can only say this to you that there are some ongoing, work-in-progress issues that will be taken forward during his visit. Some agreements that have been signed will be taken forward, and some agreements will be signed when he is here. As far as issues of concern are to be taken up, they are on the agenda and they will be taken up. And we will prepare to ensure that those are addressed. I think we have done a fair amount of work to address those issues. There is not an insurmountable issue; there is not a roadblock. We may not have a very wide road at places. The road may be a little narrow at places but the road is an open road. I think both sides are clear of its destination. We are moving in that direction. We have a good relationship with Russian Federation. We want to strengthen it further. We want to enhance it further. On the economic side, on the trade side we believe our potential needs to be explored to a greater extent. The areas in which we are cooperating are areas in which we can take the cooperation much further. Because we have an annual summit, and this is an annual summit, it will be a chance to look back over the year to see how further we have come, what more we need to do, and lay out the roadmap for the next year.

Question: The Russian Ambassador was actually questioning about sovereign guarantee that comes in with the bilateral investment protection on both sides. How does that stand?

External Affairs Minister: The sovereign guarantee issue, the bilateral investment treaties, are all issues on which are extremely concerned because there are two things. One is the consequences of having to pay enormous amounts that may come by way of international arbitrations. The other thing is that a guarantee or a treaty is something that you sign because you are committed to that position. Now the structure of our government and the structure of our state, and the separation of powers that exists in our state under the Constitution is something we cannot wish away. It may not be exactly the same for other countries and other Constitutions. Therefore, something that is done by courts in our country may be seen by them as being done by the state.

We see courts as being autonomous and independent part of the state. Therefore, what they do are some things for which we cannot directly take responsibility.
But at the end of the day this can only be decided through a separate adjudication. That is the reason why I emphasize that the fifth question out of the questions that we gave to the Supreme Court to give us an advisory opinion on, related directly to this very issue. If we had an opinion of the Supreme Court on this issue, we might be today in a happier position provided that the opinion went along the lines that we would like to see it go. Since that question was not answered, although the court felt that it would be able to answer, we await the court's attention further and we will bring it to the notice of the court as soon as the court reopens. Of course the difficulty is that from the Bench of five judges who gave us that opinion, two may have retired or at least one would have retired, one may be on the verge of retirement. So, how will the court in these circumstances handle that Presidential Reference, we will only know once the matter comes before the court again.

Thank you very much. Thank you for your cooperation and congratulations for a good event.

Official Spokesperson: With that we come to the end of this event. Thank you very much, ladies and gentlemen.

Closing Remarks by Prime Minister at India-ASEAN Commemorative Summit 2012.

New Delhi, December 20, 2012.

Excellencies,

I sincerely thank each one of you for sharing your vision and views on the India-ASEAN partnership. Your thoughts accurately capture the themes of peace, progress and shared prosperity, which form the guiding principles of our partnership.

Our discussion today has demonstrated the unique strength of this partnership. I am heartened by the consensus in this room on the importance of this relationship to each one of us. We are united in our desire to improve connectivity, enhance commerce, promote cooperation among our institutions and deepen links between our people. We realize the strategic importance of this relationship in the regional and global contexts.

The Vision Statement lays out a comprehensive roadmap for political, security, economic, socio-cultural and development cooperation. It imposes on us the responsibility to work diligently and innovatively to fulfill the heightened expectations from this relationship.

The vitality and durability of our partnership will depend not only on what the governments do with each other, but also on how we facilitate greater interaction between our people, students, scientists, academics, intellectuals, media, entrepreneurs, agriculturists and artists. That is why this commemorative summit is particularly special. We have with us not just leaders and diplomats from the ten ASEAN countries, but also students, experts, farmers and artists.

On this occasion, I would like to record my sincere appreciation for the excellent recommendations made by the ASEAN India Eminent Persons Group, many of which we have endorsed today in our Vision Statement. We will explore others as we continue on our journey.

I am very happy that we have decided today to elevate our relationship to a strategic partnership. This is a historic step, and together with the conclusion of the negotiations on FTA in Services and Investments, defines a qualitatively new paradigm of our partnership. It is a natural progression of the journey we embarked on together in 1992 and it will serve our relationship well in the next decade and beyond.

Excellencies, I thank you once again for accepting my invitation to this special Summit. I must, at this moment, also recall with appreciation the support that India has enjoyed from all Members of ASEAN, at all times.
I thank Prime Minister Hun Sen for Cambodia’s role as ASEAN Chair in coordinating this Summit. I would also like to assure His Majesty Haji Hassanal Bolkiah that India will work with Brunei, our ASEAN Country Coordinator for the next three years, to give shape to the vision endorsed by all of us today. We will also work to make the 11th ASEAN-India Summit in Brunei Darussalam and related events a success.

Excellencies, I look forward to interacting with you in the series of celebrations over today and tomorrow to mark this milestone in the relations between India and ASEAN and I thank you very much once again for your participation in making this Commemorative Summit a great success.

Remarks by Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh at Flag Down of the ASEAN-India Car Rally.

New Delhi, December 21, 2012.

Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Cambodia, Your Excellency Samdech Hun Sen, Sultan of Brunei Darussalam, Your Majesty Haji Hassanal Bolkiah,
Heads of State & Government of ASEAN Member States,
Secretary General of ASEAN, Dr. Surin Pitsuwan,
President of CII, Mr. Adi Godrej,
Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

I would like to begin by conveying, on behalf of more than a billion people, a very warm welcome to the ASEAN-India Car Rally participants. I congratulate them on successfully completing a remarkable journey of 8000 km through eight countries in 22 days. They deserve our cheers for this feat of endurance.

I would also like to welcome the 250 students from ASEAN countries who have joined us this morning. Their presence has added special warmth to this cold December morning in Delhi.

We are also joined by many other special guests today – the 50 ASEAN diplomats training at our Foreign Service Institute in Delhi; the 30 ASEAN farmers who have travelled here and who will host reciprocal visits from Indian farmers; and the 20 Senior Editors from the media in ASEAN countries. I welcome them all.

Let me also add a special word of welcome for the performing artistes from the ASEAN countries, whose sparkling show last night enriched our celebrations and served to underscore our cultural links.

Your Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

This event is imbued with symbolism and content that go beyond the mere adventure of the sport. It highlights that India and ASEAN, joined together on land and by water, with shared borders and shared cultures, are neighbours. It is a tribute to earlier generations of merchants, monks and adventurers, who traversed this route in a quest for fortune, knowledge and spirituality. In the last three weeks, the Car Rally has rekindled these ancient bonds of friendship between India and ASEAN. It has also served to highlight the natural strategic imperative for our relationship in contemporary times.

Through the rally participants, we have seen the magnificent achievements reflected in Angkor Wat in Cambodia, Borobudur in Indonesia, Wat Phu in Lao, Sukhothai in Thailand and many other sites. The rally has helped millions of people in our countries to get a better sense of our heritage and progress, our cities and natural sites, our convergences and possible synergies, and our potential and challenges. The rally has, in the most vivid manner possible, reinforced the importance of strengthening connectivity in all its dimensions between India and ASEAN.

Ladies and Gentlemen, this rally symbolizes the vision of an ASEAN-India community where people, goods, services and ideas can travel freely between us. Whether it is by road from India to Myanmar, Laos, Cambodia, Vietnam and Thailand, or by air or sea to Indonesia, Philippines, Brunei, Malaysia and Singapore, our future will be driven by the bonds of connectivity we build in the coming years. These physical bonds will be strengthened by digital links, which will help our younger generations to network better. Together, this web of linkages will help unleash the vast economic potential of our region, accelerate development and deepen our strategic partnership.

For India, nowhere will this benefit be more pronounced than in our North-eastern states and I would encourage the establishment of institutions linked to the India-ASEAN relationship in the North-eastern states.

Even as we celebrate the Car Rally, there is another voyage of friendship taking place on the seas. The Indian Navy sail training ship INS Sudarshini, which is at present in Manila, is on a six month long expedition to nine ASEAN countries. It is yet another symbol, not only of our proximity, but also of our shared maritime interests.

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen

India-ASEAN relations are at an exciting stage. The past two decades have seen enormous progress in our relations in many areas. Yesterday, we framed a new paradigm for our relationship by elevating it to a strategic partnership and announcing the conclusion of negotiations on a Free Trade Agreement in Services and Investment. I am confident that this agreement could be as transformational as our agreement on Goods has been.

I wish to thank you all for joining us today for this ceremonial flag down of the India-ASEAN Car Rally. I would like to commend my colleagues in Government and the Confederation of Indian Industry for undertaking this remarkable initiative. I am deeply grateful to the Leaders of ASEAN for their active support and the facilitation provided by their Governments for making this Rally a success. While we flag down this Rally, we are also flagging off a new journey of closer cooperation and a deeper strategic partnership, not only for the benefit of our people, but also for peace, progress and prosperity in our region and the world. I have no doubt that a new era awaits us all.

I thank you.
Dear Leaders of ASEAN Member States and India,

The ASEAN-India Eminent Persons Group (AIEPG) was established to review the ASEAN-India Dialogue Relations and explore ways to widen and deepen existing cooperation towards a long-term strategic partnership between ASEAN and India.

We, the Eminent Persons of the AIEPG, are honoured with the tasks and responsibility entrusted to us. The AIEPG met on four occasions, namely on 2-3 August 2011 in Phnom Penh, Cambodia, on 20-21 October 2011 in New Delhi, India, on 9-10 March 2012 in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, and on 16-17 September 2012 in Kochi, India, to review the past and existing relations, and suggest various recommendations on the future areas of cooperation between ASEAN and India.

We envision the potential of ASEAN-India Dialogue Relations in the areas of political and security cooperation, sustainable economic development, sociocultural development, and connectivity, in the midst of changing global political landscape and the growing importance of Asia in the world economy. We believe that the elevation of the existing relations to a strategic partnership presents vast opportunities for stronger cooperation in maintaining peace, security and prosperity in ASEAN and India, thus strengthening economic relations between them.

We would like to acknowledge the support of our assistants and the ASEAN Secretariat in developing this report.

We hereby submit this report for your consideration.

Please accept Your Majesty, Excellencies, the assurances of our highest consideration.

ASEAN-India Eminent Persons’ Report to the Leaders

I. Introduction

1. The ASEAN Member States and India share a long and glorious history of friendly relations. They are both heirs to a cross-roads culture, situated as they are at the intersections of major land and sea routes. This enabled a dense and free flow of peoples, merchandise, cultures and ideas among them. Over the centuries, each country drew inspiration from the genius of the others and contributed to the cultural enrichment and advancement of our entire region. In contemporary times, they supported and sympathized with each other in their respective struggle for national independence and economic and social justice. This has reinforced the strong and abiding affinity they share since ancient times.

2. While peoples of ASEAN and India inhabit a shared geographical and cultural space, each country retains its distinctiveness and unique identity. It is this celebration of diversity, of plural yet related cultures, which underlies the ASEAN-India partnership. Our vision is to recreate, in a contemporary setting, the many linkages that have bound our countries together in the past and unleash a creative surge, which will impart even greater momentum to the Asian resurgence, of which we are a part.

3. At the 8th ASEAN-India Summit in Ha Noi in October 2010, the Leaders of ASEAN and India welcomed the establishment of an ASEAN-India Eminent Persons Group (AIEPG) to take stock of the 20 years of ASEAN-India cooperation and chart future direction of ASEAN-India Dialogue Relations. The AIEPG report was scheduled to be submitted to the 10th ASEAN-India Summit in Phnom Penh in November 2012.

4. The AIEPG met four times: August 2011 in Phnom Penh, October 2011 in New Delhi, March 2012 in Kuala Lumpur and September 2012 in Kochi. There were also two Intersessional Assistants Meetings of the AIEPG in January 2012 in Vientiane and May 2012 in Da Nang to facilitate the preparations of the final report.
II. Review of Past and Current Relations

5. ASEAN-India dialogue relations have grown rapidly from a sectoral dialogue partnership in 1992 to a full dialogue partnership in December 1995. The relationship was further elevated with the convening of the ASEAN-India Summit in 2002 in Phnom Penh, Cambodia. Since then the ASEAN-India Summit has been held annually. This clearly signifies the importance of the dialogue partnership to ASEAN and India and the progress made in the cooperation.

6. Since India became a Dialogue Partner of ASEAN, the collaboration has transcended the realm of functional cooperation to cover political and security dimensions. India acceded to the Treaty of Amity and Cooperation in Southeast Asia (TAC) in 2003. India has also participated in a series of consultative meetings with ASEAN under the ASEAN-India Dialogue Relations, which include Summit, Ministerial meetings, Senior Officials meetings, and meetings at experts level, as well as through dialogue and cooperation frameworks initiated by ASEAN, such as the ASEAN Regional Forum (ARF), the Post Ministerial Conference (PMC) 10+1, ASEAN Economic Ministers+1 Consultations, the East Asia Summit (EAS), ASEAN Defence Ministers Meeting Plus (ADMM Plus), Mekong-Ganga Cooperation and Bay of Bengal Initiative for Multisectoral Technical and Economic Cooperation (BIMSTEC), which help contribute to enhancing regional dialogue and accelerating regional integration. After the entry into force of the ASEAN Charter, India has designated its current Ambassador to Indonesia as concurrently accredited to ASEAN to interact with the Committee of Permanent Representatives to ASEAN in the framework of the ASEAN-India Joint Cooperation Committee (AIJCC). Currently, there are 25 mechanisms coordinating the ASEAN-India cooperation in the areas of political-security cooperation, economic and socio-cultural cooperation.

7. As a reflection of the interest of ASEAN and India to intensify their engagement, the ASEAN-India Partnership for Peace, Progress and Shared Prosperity, which sets out the roadmap for long-term ASEAN-India engagement, was signed at the 3rd ASEAN-India Summit on 30 November 2004 in Vientiane. A Plan of Action (2004-2010) was also developed to implement the Partnership. Subsequently, the new ASEAN-India Plan of Action for 2010-2015 was developed and adopted by the Leaders at the 8th ASEAN-India Summit in October 2010 in Ha Noi.

8. On the economic front, volume of trade and investment flows between ASEAN and India remained relatively low compared with other Dialogue Partners of ASEAN. Trade with India accounted for 2.9% of total ASEAN trade in 2011. The ASEAN-India Trade in Goods Agreement which was signed on 13 August 2009 is expected to boost trade and investment between ASEAN and India. However, the tariff liberalisation under this Agreement covers only 80% of the total tariff lines compared with ASEAN’s other FTAs which have a much higher ambition with tariff liberalisation covering at least 90%. At the drafting time of this report, the Trade in Services and Investment Agreements negotiations are still ongoing.

9. There have been significant developments in the agriculture, forestry and tourism sectors. There are also opportunities to significantly increase people-to-people relations. However, the promising potential in areas such as regional infrastructure development, ASEAN-India connectivity projects, small and medium enterprise development and energy security remains to be explored.

10. India has made a significant contribution towards the enhancing of ASEAN-India cooperation through the ASEAN-India Fund, the ASEAN-India Green Fund and the ASEAN-India Science and Technology Development Fund. India has also been actively participating in the Initiative for ASEAN Integration (IAI) Work Plan by implementing projects such as the Entrepreneurship Development Centres (EDC) and the Centres for the English Language Training (CELT) in Cambodia, Lao PDR, Myanmar and Viet Nam.

III. Guiding Principles

11. ASEAN-India’s future partnership should be based on the following guiding principles:

- ASEAN-India relations should be based on the principles contained in the Charter of the United Nations, the Treaty of Amity and Cooperation in Southeast Asia and other relevant regional instruments.
- ASEAN and India should continue to build upon existing ASEAN-India mechanisms and in line with mutually agreed processes and structures.
- India fully supports ASEAN’s efforts in building an ASEAN Community. India welcomes the vital and expanding role of ASEAN at the global level particularly after the signing of Bali Declaration on ASEAN Community in a Global Community of Nations (Bali Concord III) and looks forward to collaborate with ASEAN.
- While sharing common goals of regional peace, progress and shared prosperity, ASEAN and India should contribute to the strengthening of relations with other countries and organisations, as well as contribute to the community building in East Asia.
- India will continue to support ASEAN as the driving force of both economic and security structures and institutions that are currently emerging in this region, based on the centrality of ASEAN. ASEAN and India welcome and mutually support their increasing role at the global level. In this regard, ASEAN and India will collaborate in the solution of a number of regional and international issues of mutual concern.

- The two sides will work together to promote and strengthen inclusive and multi-track regional arrangements.

IV. Vision for the Future

12. ASEAN and India will build upon the achievements of the past and pursue enhanced cooperation within the framework of a new Vision for the Future based on a Strategic Partnership between ASEAN and India.

13. The ASEAN Member States and India welcome the growing role of Asia in the global economy and international affairs. This generates both significant opportunities for accelerated economic and social development of their countries as well as complex and difficult challenges which require their collaborative response. They are conscious of the fact that a new economic architecture is emerging in our region and new security arrangements are taking shape concurrently. It is in the common interest of ASEAN and India to work together to ensure that the evolving regional economic and security architectures will promote the goal of open regionalism and enhance the prospects for peace, stability and prosperity in Asia. As the global profile and impact of Asia over the international political and economic order increases, ASEAN Member States and India will also have to shoulder a greater responsibility for, and make their increased contribution to, the reshaping of this order. This, too, will become an important component of their expanding partnership.

14. The two sides are convinced that a strategic partnership can be sustained through establishing strong, multi-faceted and broad-ranging people-to-people relations, in particular, among the youth of our countries. A very significant increase in people and youth-centred activities is called for. These will include, inter-alia, cultural, sports, media, tourism, parliamentary and academic exchanges.

15. ASEAN and India declared that a stable and peaceful regional environment is essential for the pursuit of sustainable development in the region. To this end, ASEAN and India recognise that the centrality of ASEAN and the strengthening of ASEAN-led processes will continue to contribute to the creation of structures for dynamic cooperation for peace, security and development.

V. Recommendations

16. Over the past two decades, there has been a remarkable increase in ASEAN-India engagement and expanded cooperation across the board. As the two sides head towards the celebration of the 20th anniversary of their Dialogue Partnership in 2012, there are new and significant opportunities for forging an even closer partnership for mutual benefit. To this end, it is desirable for ASEAN and India to consider for adoption the following recommendations for 2012-2022:

A. Political and Security Cooperation

17. Declare ASEAN-India Strategic Partnership in the Vision Statement to be adopted by the Heads of State/Heads of Government at the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit to be held in New Delhi in December 2012.

18. India to establish its separate diplomatic mission with an Ambassador accredited to ASEAN residing in Jakarta to facilitate further the enhanced dialogue partnership cooperation in all three pillars of ASEAN Community.

19. ASEAN Member States and India being maritime nations whose prosperity throughout history has been linked to sea-faring and sea borne trade, to work together to ensure maritime security and freedom of navigation to all littoral and user countries, in accordance with international law and on the basis of open, inclusive, transparent and balanced multilateral arrangements in the region. The agenda for maritime cooperation must include combating piracy, dealing with maritime emergencies, establishing a collaborative early warning system and providing prompt and effective disaster relief.

20. Promote regular and high-level security dialogue and strengthen the implementation of the ASEAN-India Joint Declaration for Cooperation to Combat International Terrorism signed in Bali, Indonesia, on 8 October 2003 in order to confront the common challenge of international terrorism and threats to their societies from extremist and exclusivist ideologies, which are hostile to the respect for diversity and our culture of tolerance. A much higher level of security cooperation and information sharing would be required to overcome these growing threats.

21. India to fully support ASEAN’s strong commitment to realise a drug-free ASEAN 2015 and to pursue full cooperation with ASEAN in combating and eventually eliminating drug-trafficking. In this context, to convene regular bilateral consultations between ASEAN and India on drug related matters at the senior official level.

B. Economic Cooperation

22. Given the Asian resurgence and its relevance to the global economic recovery, it is incumbent upon our region to develop Asian perspectives on global issues. The ASEAN Member States and India will work towards shaping the new international financial and economic architecture in a proactive manner.
In this context, ASEAN and India should establish a multi-sectoral Strategic Economic Dialogue:

23. While ASEAN and India have concluded a Free Trade Agreement in Goods, negotiations are still ongoing in the areas of services and investment. These negotiations should aim to conclude at the earliest, bearing in mind the fact that the conclusion of such Agreements would serve to cement our existing ties and, subsequently, take our economic relations to a higher plane:

24. The volume of ASEAN-India trade in 2010 was US$ 55.4 billion and this has grown to US$ 74.9 billion in 2011, surpassing the target of US$ 70 billion set for 2012. There are, however, prospects for reaching a much higher level of trade and investment under the proposed strategic partnership, by improved air, sea, land and digital connectivity between the two sides, expanding trade facilitation initiatives, including through collaboration in the SME sector, which is vital to the economies of ASEAN as well as India and by fostering business to business relations:

25. Declare a target of US$ 200 billion for bilateral ASEAN-India trade by the year 2022 under the ASEAN-India Free Trade Area.

26. Harness and pool our resources together to ensure that there is constant supply of talent within the ASEAN-India region, in recognition that human resources and skills have become a key factor in modern economic and social development. Encourage governments to work towards providing such talents with the opportunity to move seamlessly between ASEAN and India in order to share their expertise and knowledge to the mutual betterment of our economic prospects.

27. Enhance private sector engagement and encourage business-to-business relations, including the reactivation of the ASEAN-India Business Council. Establish an ASEAN-India Business Portal to facilitate exchange of economic and trade information and promote easy interface between companies and business persons.

28. Facilitate a mutually beneficial business visa regime, including the grant of long-term, multiple entry business visas and stay permits for professionals and their families.

29. Establish an ASEAN-India Meeting of Ministers in charge of SMEs to promote cooperation in the SME sector, with a Joint Working Group (JWG) and Senior Officials Meeting (SOM) to prepare a detailed draft plan for the consideration of the Ministers.

30. Emphasise the importance of human resources development and, in this context, propose an ASEAN-India Knowledge Initiative which would include institution-to-institution linkages between their universities and their respective centres of excellence in different fields.

31. Launch an ASEAN-India Skills Initiative and establish a virtual network of existing, upgraded and new human resource and training institutions in identified strategic sectors. An ASEAN-India Centre for Skill Development and Vocational Education could be set up in Guwahati, India, where there is already a presence of the Indian Institute of Technology. This initiative should draw upon the strengths of ASEAN Member States and India in different sectors, including in the areas where ASEAN Member States and India have a rich reservoir of time-tested traditional skills such as in textiles, metallurgy, building architecture and medicinal herbs and holistic healing practices.

32. Set up an ASEAN-India panel of experts to draw up a Food Security Plan for the region.

33. Set up an International Centre for Water Management Technologies in India to facilitate transfer of technologies by bringing together all stakeholders including governments and corporate sectors between India and ASEAN in the sector of water, likely to be on the national and international priorities for the region in the coming years. The Government of India should announce its location in due course.

C. Development Cooperation

34. ASEAN and Indian economies are in the midst of a structural transformation and confront many common challenges such as climate change, energy security, rapid urbanisation, natural disasters and food security. Cities will become the engines of growth in the coming decades and will impact on each of the cross-cutting challenges identified above. ASEAN and India will need to work together to overcome these challenges both through regional cooperation as well as through their active participation in global initiatives:

35. Enhance cooperation in bridging development gaps among ASEAN Member States, including through enhancing capacity building, strengthening human resource development and encouraging involvement of private sector and academic institutions, to contribute to the ASEAN integration and community building. In this context, ASEAN-India Eminent Persons took note of the recently held 6th Mekong-Ganga Cooperation (MGC) Ministerial Meeting.

36. Enhance cooperation between the ASEAN Centre for Energy in Jakarta with the International Centre for Energy being set up by India in Bangalore, given that India and ASEAN confront a common challenge in ensuring energy security for their peoples. Such an initiative should draw together expertise across sectors such as urban development, energy management, use of renewable energy sources, energy efficient building materials and architecture, in particular the adaptation of the rich traditional technologies that our countries possess, to meeting contemporary challenges in each of the above sectors. The International Centre could serve as a platform for sharing knowledge, experiences and best practices for urban public service delivery and governance patterns. This initiative would be announced at the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit in December 2012.

37. Strengthen cooperation in disaster management to create disaster resilient and safer communities, enhance cooperation in addressing global environmental issues, and strengthen cooperation in responding to climate change and addressing its impacts.

38. Set up an International Centre for Natural Disaster Management and Relief in India which would collaborate with the ASEAN Coordinating Centre for Humanitarian Assistance (AHA Centre) in providing prompt, coordinated and effective disaster relief.

D. Socio-Cultural Cooperation

39. Collaborate in promoting corporate social responsibility (CSR) to ensure that CSR is incorporated in the corporate agenda and contribute towards sustainable socio-economic development in ASEAN and India.

40. Establish a regular exchange of visits by Parliamentary delegations between the Indian Parliament and the ASEAN Inter Parliamentary Assembly.

41. Promote online interactions for the active participation of youth in India and in each of the ASEAN Member States that would generate deeper understanding and friendship.

42. Undertake greater exchange in the area of sports through strengthened India on Open Skies.

43. Announce an annual ASEAN-India Essay Competition open to school/university students, on the theme of ASEAN-India relations in different fields.

44. Further intensify cooperation in media exchange including the exchange of resident correspondents of major media organisations and a Senior Editors Exchange Programme, whereby Senior Editor may spend a mutually agreed period of time as Guest Editors in major media organisations in India and in ASEAN Member States respectively.

45. Further support and leverage the establishment of ASEAN Promotional Chapter of Tourism (APCT) in Mumbai, India to further strengthen the tourism cooperation between ASEAN and India.
46. Pursue a sustainable programme of interactions in culture, which would include experts from ASEAN and India working together on the shared legacy in fields such as archaeology, linguistics, libraries, textiles, fine arts, performing arts etc. A regular film festival with the participation of popular film artists should be institutionalised. ASEAN and India should also hold exhibitions illustrative of civilisational links in arts and culture.

47. Further support the revival of Nalanda University as an icon of Asian renaissance and promote its networking with centres of excellence in the regions.

48. Consider establishing an ASEAN-India Centre in India to promote trade, investment, tourism, and cultural exchanges.

49. Encourage networking of existing ASEAN and India Study Centres in ASEAN and India, as well as think tanks and research institutes to promote studies on various aspects of economic, social and political development in ASEAN Member States and India.

E. Connectivity

50. As Asia becomes the engine for the growth of the global economy, ASEAN and India must leverage their recommended strategic partnership through enhanced connectivity to reap the benefits from this development. India is one of the two Dialogue Partners that shares both maritime and land borders with ASEAN. Given this close proximity, there is much potential for ASEAN and India to promote connectivity. To this end, India supports the implementation of the Master Plan on ASEAN Connectivity (MPAC), which encompasses physical, institutional and people-to-people connectivity. Such connectivity must be expanded to bring South Asia and Southeast Asia closer together.

51. Conclude as soon as possible the pending agreement between ASEAN and India on Open Skies.

52. Establish regular exchanges between ASEAN and the recently established Indian Inter-Ministerial Group on ASEAN Connectivity to explore ways and means to support the MPAC as well as come up with new practical initiatives to further deepen regional integration between ASEAN and India. The emphasis can be placed on promoting and upgrading regional infrastructure and inter-connectivity between ASEAN and India, combined with enabling policy framework to facilitate and promote goods in transit, multi-modal transport and inter-state transport, which would benefit both sides and a wider free trade zone.

53. While ASEAN utilises the Infrastructure Fund to finance priority projects, consider bringing in the public private partnership to support the MPAC and ASEAN Connectivity Plus. The proposed new highway project connecting India-Myanmar-Lao PDR-Viet Nam-Cambodia and the extension of the India-Myanmar-
Thailand trilateral highway to Lao PDR and Cambodia as well as the development of Mekong-India Economic Corridor connecting Southeast Asia to South Asia on the eastern part of India through the Andaman Sea should receive high priority in order to add greater momentum to the growing trade and investment linkages between ASEAN and India.

54. Work together to promote the development of information and communication technology (ICT) in ASEAN Member States. In this connection, India supports ASEAN’s efforts to realise the ASEAN ICT Master Plan 2015, drawing upon India’s expertise in the sector and including through sharing of best practices in policy, regulations and technological development and capacity building programmes. ASEAN and India should establish an ASEAN-India broadband high speed optical fibre network to enhance virtual connectivity. This could become an ASEAN-India Broadband Corridor.

F. Regional Architecture

55. ASEAN and India reemphasised that a stable and peaceful regional environment is essential for the pursuit of sustainable development in the region. To this end, India continues to support the centrality of ASEAN in the evolving regional architecture and the strengthening of ASEAN-led processes, which has contributed to creating a dynamic environment of cooperation in various areas:

56. Deepen coordination and cooperation between ASEAN and India at the regional and multilateral levels, particularly:

- Work towards contributing to the realisation of the goals and objectives as set out in the ASEAN Regional Forum (ARF) Vision Statement;
- Promote cooperation projects within the ARF;
- Continue to enhance the East Asia Summit as Leaders-led forum for dialogue on broad strategic, political and economic issues of common interest and concern with the aim of promoting peace, stability and economic prosperity in East Asia;
- Promote maritime cooperation through engagement in the future expanded ASEAN Maritime Forum to address common challenges on maritime issues, including sea piracy, search rescue at sea, maritime environment, maritime security, maritime connectivity, freedom of navigation, fisheries and other areas of cooperation; and
- Promote cooperation in the ASEAN Defence Ministers’ Meeting Plus to ensure the maintenance of peace, security, stability and enhancing prosperity in the region.
G. Institutional Support and Implementation Mechanism

57. The Eminent Persons Group is convinced that these recommendations will contribute significantly to the elevation of ASEAN-India relations to a strategic partnership. The Group recommends that a mid-term review be conducted by senior officials of ASEAN and India in 2017 on the progress in the implementation of the recommendations:

58. To ensure successful implementation of the recommendations, the institutional support and framework are necessary to closely coordinate, facilitate, monitor, review, and allocate resources effectively:

59. Recognising the important role played by other stakeholders, ensure inclusiveness of non-governmental agencies, private sector, academic institutions, think tanks, youth organisations, media groups, social and cultural foundations of ASEAN and India to support the implementation of these recommendations.

60. Streamline (i) the use of existing funds, such as the ASEAN-India Fund (AIF), the ASEAN-India Green Fund (AIGF), and the ASEAN-India Science and Technology Development Fund (AISTDF) and (ii) cooperation mechanisms under ASEAN-India relations to support the implementation of ASEAN-India cooperative activities contained in these recommendations.

VI. Conclusion

61. Taking into account the past twenty years of cooperation and achievements between ASEAN and India as well as the fast changing regional and global environment and evolving regional architectures, the AIEPG has looked at ways to elevate the comprehensive partnership between ASEAN and India to a strategic level.

62. In order to achieve and strengthen the strategic partnership, it is recommended that ASEAN and India should endeavour to implement the proposed recommendations as outlined in this AIEPG Report and continue to work together with the shared values of peace, progress and prosperity.

Excellencies the Leaders of ASEAN Excellency the Prime Minister of India

The ASEAN-India Eminent Persons Group (AIEPG), established pursuant to the 8th ASEAN-India Summit in October 2010, has the main task to take stock of the ASEAN-India relations over the past 19 years and explore ways to widen and deepen the existing cooperation between ASEAN and India as well as recommend measures to further strengthen ASEAN-India relations in the future.

We, the Co-Chairs of the AIEPG, have the honour to submit the Progress Report for your information and reference.

Please accept, Your Excelencies, the assurances of our highest consideration.

Dr. Kao Kim Hourn
Secretary of State
Ministry of Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation Kingdom of Cambodia

Amb. Shyam Saran
Former Foreign Secretary
Former Special Envoy of the Prime Minister of India on Climate Change
Progress Report of the ASEAN-India Eminent Persons Group to the 9th ASEAN-India Summit on 19 November 2011 in Bali, Indonesia

1. At the 8th ASEAN-India Summit on 30 October 2010 in Ha Noi, Viet Nam, the Leaders welcomed the establishment of an ASEAN-India Eminent Persons Group (AIEPG) to review the ASEAN-India relations and explore ways to widen and deepen existing cooperation towards a long-term strategic partnership between ASEAN and India.

2. The composition of membership of the AIEPG was completed in 2011 and the AIEPG has convened twice, namely on 2-3 August 2011 in Phnom Penh, Cambodia and on 20-21 October 2011 in New Delhi, India. The AIEPG is co-chaired by Cambodia as Country Coordinator of ASEAN-India Dialogue Relations, on behalf of ASEAN, and India.

3. The AIEPG had open and fruitful discussions on stocktaking the past and existing relations as well as on the various areas of cooperation between ASEAN and India. The Eminent Persons noted with satisfaction that the ASEAN-India relations have achieved significant progress in the past 19 years since the formalisation of ASEAN-India dialogue relations in 1992 and had stronger foundation of cooperation since convening of the first ASEAN-India Summit in 2002 in Phnom Penh, Cambodia.

4. In the effort of charting the future direction of ASEAN-India Partnership, the AIEPG took into account the documents that have been adopted/signed under the ASEAN-India dialogue relations framework as well as key ASEAN documents, which included the ASEAN-India Plan of Action to Implement the ASEAN-India Partnership for Peace, Progress and Shared Prosperity (2010-2015); the Framework Agreement on Comprehensive Economic Cooperation between the Republic of India and the Association of Southeast Asian Nations; the ASEAN-India Aviation Cooperation Framework; the ASEAN-India Joint Declaration for Cooperation to Combat International Terrorism; and the Instrument of Accession to the Treaty of Amity and Cooperation in Southeast Asia by India, the ASEAN Charter, Roadmap for an ASEAN Community, the Master Plan on ASEAN Connectivity and other relevant documents.

5. The AIEPG affirmed the importance of elevating the ASEAN-India partnership to a higher plane, namely from the current level which has been based on the ASEAN-India Partnership for Peace, Progress and Shared Prosperity to a strategic partnership. In this regard, the AIEPG will explore and recommend bold, resourceful, practical ideas and doable actions to enhance the relationship, create opportunities and address challenges while taking cognisant of the dynamic regional and global environment. The areas of cooperation will cover the three pillars of the ASEAN Community building covering the political and security, economic and socio-cultural pillars.

6. In accordance with its mandate, the AIEPG will prepare the final report to be submitted to the 10th ASEAN-India Summit to be held in Cambodia in 2012. In the meantime, the Co-Chairs of the AIEPG submit this progress report, as prepared by Cambodia and the ASEAN Secretariat, to the 9th ASEAN-India Summit in Bali, Indonesia on 19 November 2011 for its information.

7. The AIEPG is currently working on the final report to be submitted to the 10th ASEAN-India Summit, which will be visionary, concise, containing the recommendations that serve the elevation of the ASEAN-India relations to strategic partnership and enhancing the role of India to support the ASEAN Community Building, the implementation of Master Plan on ASEAN Connectivity, and the attainment of ASEAN Community by 2015, avoiding redundancy with the existing Plan of Action.

8. The AIEPG has scheduled two more meetings to finalise the report which will be submitted to the Leaders of ASEAN and India at the 10th ASEAN-India Summit in Phnom Penh, Cambodia in November 2012.
ASEM

126. Media Briefing by Official Spokesperson on the ASEM Meeting.

New Delhi, November 1, 2012.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Good afternoon friends and thank you very much for coming to this interaction today........

The first (announcement) is about the visit of the External Affairs Minister to the ASEM Summit in Vientiane. The External Affairs Minister, Shri Salman Khurshid, will lead the Indian Delegation to the Ninth Summit of the Asia-Europe Meeting in Vientiane on 5th and 6th of November. In the course of his participation at the Summit he will be speaking on a couple of issues. In one of the sessions he will speak on ‘Global Issues’ and in another session he will speak on ‘the future direction of the ASEM’.

The ASEM, as you know, is a dialogue forum of 46 member states and two international organizations that are the ASEAN Secretariat and the European Commission. It was set up in 1996. India joined the ASEM in 2007. It is our understanding that at present ASEM represents approximately 60 per cent of the world’s population, 50 per cent of global GDP, and 60 per cent of world trade.

At the culmination of the Summit it is expected that the Vientiane Declaration on strengthening partnership for peace and development would be issued. There will also be a Chair statement on the 9th ASEM Summit. As is usual on such occasions, the External Affairs Minister will also have various bilateral meetings, and we are in the process of finalizing those.

I have another announcement to make and that is that the Prime Minister of Canada, His Excellency Mr. Stephen Harper will pay a state visit to India from the 4th to the 9th of November. He will be accompanied by his wife Ms. Laureen Harper. Mr. Harper will be visiting New Delhi, Agra, Chandigarh and Bengaluru. He is accompanied by three Ministers. During his official engagements in New Delhi, apart from meeting with the Prime Minister he will call on the President and the Vice-President. He will also have meetings with the President of the UPA and the Leader of the Opposition. Minister of State Shrimati Preneet Kaur will call on him.

Mr. Chairman,
Excellencies,

We have deliberated over the last two days on a number of pressing issues that not only affect our two continents but also the entire world. Our discussions touched on diverse challenges and ways to address them on a range of issues including the changing politico-security and global economic environment, slower economic growth across Continents, the scourge of global terrorism, illicit narcotics drug trafficking, urgency to achieve sustainable development and inclusive growth, and the imperative of human resource development.

The one thing that seems to run consistently through our deliberations is that the future destinities of Europe and Asia are connected. We also believe that ASEM is today at a significant crossroads. We need to come together to address these issues.

ASEM, Excellencies, today needs to orient itself definitively in a direction that facilitates, accelerates and makes possible such cooperation. This, to my mind, is perhaps the most relevant issue on the agenda of ASEM, i.e. “The Future Direction of ASEM”.

Since our participation in ASEM in 2007, we have valued the Forum as an unique inter-continental connect between Asia and Europe. It has brought together key partners in Asia and Europe to deliberate on global issues of concern and identify specific areas for cooperation with developmental implications, which could assist growth in our countries.

The USP of ASEM is that it is a dialogue forum with capacity to discuss all issues of concern. Its strength lies in the fact that within its membership it includes the capacity to find necessary resources of intellect, knowledge, innovation, technology, best practices and all instruments necessary to meet challenges.

We perhaps need to accelerate its evolution towards making ASEM the inter-Continental bridge that it was meant to be, bringing together the strengths and capacities across our countries to contribute to global growth and development, peace and stability. We have been supporting such an approach since Godollo in particular.

We need to strengthen ASEM in this direction in each of its three pillars of cooperation i.e. political and security cooperation, economic cooperation and socio-cultural cooperation.

Over the last few years, there has been an intuitive movement towards identification and implementation of concrete cooperation in areas where Europe and Asia can assist each other. As we do so, we must certainly retain ASEM’s informality and its main function as a dialogue forum, but at the same time, also profile concrete functional projects to enhance ASEM’s relevance.

We see ASEM as having unique capacity to bring about greater focus on areas of relevance for developing countries and emerging markets. It can also make the global framework for economic governance more effective, given its varied participation consisting of emerging market economies, developed and developing countries. It is here that ASEM as a forum for dialogue and cooperation between Asia and Europe remains fundamentally relevant and can add substantive value.

There is considerable scope for cooperation and sharing of best practices, systems and technology between Europe and Asia. ASEM needs to develop as the bridge – a bridge for development, growth and the building of capacities; a bridge for bringing together expertise to tackle common challenges; a bridge of resources and ideas; a bridge founded on making connections between the people of EU and Asia.

I am confident that ASEM members would join and participate in the initiative proposed by China, Lao PDR, Poland and India to hold a Conference on the Future of ASEM next year. India stands ready to work with ASEM partners on this important agenda. I take this opportunity to invite the Foreign Ministers of ASEM to next meeting of ASEM FMM to be held in India from 14 to 15 November. We also look forward to your cooperation and partnership as we prepare to host the next ASEM Foreign Ministers Meeting.

Thank you.
128. Address by External Affairs Minister Salman Khurshid at the 9th ASEM Summit - Plenary Session II: Global Issues.

Vientiane, November 6, 2012.

Mr. Chairman,

Excellencies,

At the outset, I would like to place on record our deep appreciation to the Government of Lao PDR, and in particular to Your Excellency the Prime Minister of Lao PDR for your warm welcome, excellent arrangements and generous hospitality extended to me and my delegation.

I bring the best of wishes of my Prime Minister for the success of ASEM 9 under the Chairmanship of Lao PDR.

India is privileged to be part of ASEM. We join other members in welcoming Bangladesh, Norway and Switzerland to ASEM. We look forward to host the 11th meeting of the ASEM Foreign Ministers in New Delhi on November 14-15, 2013.

ASEM is an unique forum which given its inter-Continental nature endows it with great capacity to promote peace and development, particularly since it brings together a collective resource of around 60% of world’s population, 50% of global GDP and almost 60% of world trade.

The ASEM Finance Ministers at a meeting in October this year underlined the need for Asia and Europe to promote closer engagement in addressing the current global crisis as well as in creating stronger, more sustainable and balanced global growth. There is evidence that recovery and growth in the Eurozone could benefit from the growth in emerging economies of Asia.

According to the Asian Development Bank, Asia will account for 52 percent of global GDP by 2050. A mutually beneficial partnership is called for between Asia and Europe through increased trade and investment linkages. While Europe would get access to the markets of Asia, the developing countries of Asia can benefit from European investments, technology transfer, knowledge and innovation. It would be a win-win situation for employment generation and sustainable growth in both the Continents.

Non-traditional security threats such as terrorism, piracy, illegal drug and arms trafficking, threat of terrorists gaining access to Weapons of Mass Destruction continue to pose serious challenges to peace and security globally. We firmly believe that different multi-lateral processes, including various regional forums dealing with these issues, should consolidate international efforts to address these threats.
The scourge of terrorism, unleashed by terror groups with global reach, needs a comprehensive global approach. The global legal regime against terrorism needs to be hinged on a single comprehensive legal framework. India had, therefore, tabled the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT) at the United Nations in 1996. As the Chair of the UN Counter-Terrorism Committee since January 2011, India has worked to revitalize the activities of the CTC and to conclude negotiations on the CCIT. India is also engaged in international efforts to combat terrorism, including through the UN Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy 2006, the International Convention for the Suppression of Financing of Terrorism, and the Global Counter-terrorism Forum.

Maritime security is another important issue for the growing economies, particularly in Asia. We are concerned that despite international efforts, the threat of piracy continues to grow and has reached closer to our shores. In the face of growing threats of piracy and international terrorism, there is an urgency to increase functional cooperation and expand engagement among countries of the region.

India looks forward to a comprehensive and balanced outcome of the forthcoming COP-18 at Doha, Qatar in end November. A meaningful and effective 2nd commitment period of the Kyoto Protocol must be the single biggest measure of success at Doha.

Equally critical to the success of Doha is that we must have decisions on the outstanding issues of the Bali Action Plan and we must find a way to address issues that we are not able to conclude. Our continued efforts to address Climate Change must remain rooted in the basic principles of ‘equity’ and ‘common but differentiated responsibility (CBDR) and respective capabilities’.

The issues of food and energy security will impact critically on the development stories of many nations, particularly in Asia. India supports a participatory model to look at cooperation on diversification of energy sources, stability of energy supplies, security of energy transportation and creation of new energy infrastructure and its protection.

India would recommend that energy cooperation between Europe and Asia include sharing of best energy practices and promoting greater dialogue between energy exporter and energy consumer countries. This dialogue should also facilitate the promotion of renewable energy, development of energy saving industries, energy efficiency and clean energy technologies.

We also need to explore newer models for financing of energy infrastructure. All these issues are a matter of priority for India, an energy deficit country where half the population does not have proper access to commercial energy. For us and for much of Asia, energy security is not merely “economic growth” but more an issue of basic needs of sustainance and poverty eradication. We look forward to working with ASEM members to meet these concerns and challenges. Thank you.
129. Statement of the External Affairs Minister to the media on his return from 9th ASEM Summit in Laos PDR.

New Delhi, November 08, 2012.

External Affairs Minister (Shri Salman Khurshid): Good morning.

I am pleased to be back here with you. I am sorry that we still have not had time to spend more detailed conversation time with you, but I am sure that that will come as we go along.

I have just come back last night from a very fruitful participation in ASEM-9 the most significant dialogue between Europe and Asia. India obviously plays a very significant role in that process because of our very good relationship with Europe, with the European Union, and indeed with the ASEAN countries.

We were received extremely warmly by the Government and the leadership of Lao PDR. The arrangements were absolutely outstanding. I think that there is something there to celebrate in terms of the larger number of countries that are now joining the movement and providing it with value addition.

We had bilaterals as well with eight countries including of course the bilateral with Lao PDR. On my way back I had a bilateral with the Foreign Minister of Thailand. We had the opportunity of course to speak with the Prime Minister of Thailand at the meeting itself, a very gracious person with very warm feelings about India and very fond memories of her visit to India.

All in all we believe that a tremendous forward movement has taken place. We are looking forward to next year’s meeting of the Foreign Ministers of ASEM that will take place here in next winter and then further movement to Brussels which will be the 2014 meeting of ASEM, which will be the Tenth ASEM Meeting.

Meanwhile, while we were in Lao, we have had the good news from the United States of America of the election of President Barack Obama for a second term. As you are aware, the Prime Minister has already greeted the President of the United States. For the United States and India these are very important significant moments of reassertion and celebration of our respective democracies. The election of the President, fiercely contested as it was and reported widely in the media, has now reached a conclusion of reassertion of democratic choice. We look forward, as the Prime Minister has said, to deepening and widening our relationship with the United States of America. There are, in our relationship, very significant accomplishments that we have achieved over the last decade, and we would like that to move forward.

We have very good memories of President Barack Obama’s visit to our country, particularly his address to Indian Parliament. We hope in that spirit the United States and India will continue to move forward. There is a lot of work to be done in international cooperation, in the field of commerce, in the field of business, in the field of economics, and of course in the field of security. The common concerns that we have with the United States of America over security of cyberspace, security of all regions, is something in which we hope we look forward to a more meaningful dialogue as the President takes over his second term.

Thank you.

Question: Sir, there is also a leadership change which is happening in China. What are India's hopes and expectations of the new Chinese leadership?

External Affairs Minister: As you know, China has a very orderly and a very scientific system by which they have generational change, and this is a significant generational change taking place in China. We watch it closely. Of course as a friendly neighbour we look forward to a more meaningful and sustainable relationship with China under the new leadership. We wish them well, and we hope that the positive steps that we have taken together in the last few years will be taken further by the new leadership.

Question: Sir, you also had significant meetings with the Prime Ministers of Italy and of Denmark. With Denmark did you press for the extradition of Kim Peter Davy afresh?

External Affairs Minister: As far as Denmark is concerned, our effort was to explain to the honourable Prime Minister the concerns both of the Indian people and Indian Government, and the seriousness of the issue because it relates to India’s security. And I am pleased report the President was very receptive to the information that I gave, and also said that techno-legal examination afresh is called for and will be done by them. I think that is a positive indication. Let us keep our fingers crossed and hope for the best.

Question: Sir, do we take it that the case is being reopened for extradition of Kim Peter Davy?

External Affairs Minister: I think the expression used by the other side is an expression that I will continue to use that they would examine afresh the techno-legal aspects of the matter. As far as we are concerned, the information that we had we have given, in the light of that I got that response. So, let us wait for further movement on that.

Question: Sir, was the issue of the Italian Marines raised with the Prime Minister of Italy? External Affairs Minister: The issue was certainly raised and discussed. And it was for me to bring to their notice, as I am sure that they are aware, that the matter is pending now including in the Supreme Court where the matter has been heard and judgment is reserved. We reasserted and reaffirmed that India has an outstanding system of law, very transparent, and the rule of law prevails in our country, and all friendly countries should repose faith and would find that their faith is vindicated is the word we used. But, the free and fair system of adjudication in our country is something that we are committed to, and I believe is something that should be recognized and adhered to by all our friends. I think because the matter is sub judice, the matter has been heard in the Supreme Court, we should await the judgment of the Supreme Court before saying anything further.

Question: Sir, on UN Security Council’s move to blacklist Haqqani Network.

External Affairs Minister: As you know, our concerns on security as far as operation of some groups that are involved in cross-order terrorism is very clear and clearly known to all our neighbours, as indeed to all our friendly countries that we speak to. This is something that is a logical step forward. And I hope that this has an effective impact not just on that group itself but on other groups as well.

Thank you very much.

Excellencies,
Ladies and Gentlemen,
Friends.

It is a great pleasure to be with all of you this evening at the 10th meeting of the BCIM Process. It is appropriate that we meet in Kolkata, one of India’s most pre-eminent cities on our eastern seaboard from where rulers, merchants, sailors and adventurers looked East from ancient times. Tonight, I intend to speak about the new contours of India’s Look East Policy and this can best be done here in East India, where our policy initiatives have a direct and special relevance and significance.

India did not need to have a look East policy. Even before our Independence Pandit Nehru travelled to the East and connected our fate with that of the people of SE Asia. But there was a hiatus in the 1970s and 1980s when preoccupations with security (in the widest sense) focussed our attention on our immediate periphery. We embarked on a ‘Look-East’ policy in 1992. This foreign policy initiative had a domestic dimension based in the economic restructuring and reform program that we had commenced in July 1991 wherein we placed emphasis on reducing licensing, giving greater play to private initiative and entrepreneurship and in general making it easier to do business in India. One aspect of this economic course correction was the relative emphasis given to trade and foreign investment. As a result, economic diplomacy became an integral part of foreign policy formulation and implementation.

India has long standing civilizational bonds with countries in East and South East Asia. In spiritual and cultural values, by name and language, through dance and art, there is a historical tradition of contact between India and the East. It is against this larger backdrop that we have located our Look East Policy or LEP. The essential philosophy of our LEP, which is now well established, is that India must find its destiny by linking itself more and more with its Asian partners and the rest of the world. We believe that India’s future and our own best economic interests are served by greater integration with Asia. This may seem unusual to those generations in our countries who grew up when India and the countries of East Asia were linked to different metropolitan centres in the West and later walked down different paths during the Cold War; but to those entering the age of employment and travel in our countries just now, this will be a rediscovery of their common Asian heritage. It is my belief that this shift that is taking place and the kind of interaction that is emerging amongst Asian countries has deep historical and cultural roots and, therefore, can be a very powerful force for future peace and stability on our continent.

As I stated earlier, our interest in engaging with Asia has domestic roots. We are a vibrant democracy, quickly transforming ourselves with growth on an ascending trajectory. Despite some perturbations in our economic growth due to global factors, our economic development path is certain and full of potential and it is significant that we are in a part of the world still witnessing dynamic growth. Our policies relating to foreign trade, foreign direct investment, taxation, banking, finance and capital markets have evolved to make Indian industry more competitive globally. There is great confidence and optimism about the prospects for collaboration and constructive cooperation. What we seek as part of our LEP is to make our neighbors, partners in our development such that we can jointly seek and work on the opportunities that are coming our way due to the inexorable march of globalization.

It has been almost 20 years since India enunciated the Look East Policy (LEP). While this policy has yielded many benefits, including closer strategic contact between India and Asian countries, an impressive increase in the quantum of bilateral trade and increased people-to-people interaction, the success of the policy also needs to be viewed from the perspective of how far we have been able to interlink our eastern and north eastern regions to the rest of Asia, since this part of India provides a natural bridge between us and East Asia. Speaking in Kolkata from where Kunming is the same distance as New Delhi and Dhaka is barely a few minutes of flying, with Yangon just a little further away, our vision for the LEP acquires new meaning, depth and dimension.

India’s Look East Policy also aims at providing eastern India a platform for economic growth and social progress. It is critical that political leadership be exercised to leverage the opportunities that are presenting themselves in this part of the country which will assist in accelerating growth with equity. I believe that West Bengal can play an important lead role in this endeavor and provide a model for others to follow.

Essentially, we are looking at a new paradigm of development whereby our foreign policy initiatives blend seamlessly into our national economic development. Given that we have, over 20 years of pursuing our Look East Policy, put in place certain diplomatic and political structures, there is need now to make these structures work for our East and North Eastern Regions. Diplomatic initiatives need to be converted into commercial opportunities and investment flows. For this purpose, I reaffirm that MEA will work in close cooperation with the Ministry for the Development of the North Eastern Region, the Planning Commission, all economic Ministries and the State Governments of the region.

I would like to put forth before you the way India has sought to integrate within Asia in general. To begin with, we focused very much on SAARC and ASEAN. SAARC has been successful in moving from the declaratory to the implementation phase. Initiatives within SAARC are beginning to touch the lives of our peoples, a good example of which is the South Asian University or even special immigration counters for SAARC nationals at our airports. We in India have been providing access to the Indian market, to our partners in South Asia, even if this has to be done in an asymmetric manner.

With ASEAN, beginning from a sectoral partner, our association evolved into a Full Dialogue Partnership and finally to that of a Summit Partner. We have close relations with all countries in the region and our economic and cultural ties are getting stronger by the day as travel, tourism and business reinforce regional interaction. The FTA in Goods with ASEAN is already having its impact in expanding our commercial exchanges. These will be further enhanced once our FTA in Services is finalized. Another aspect has been the rapid growth in investment between India and South East Asian and East Asian countries. We will continue to improve the investment environment in India including through better infrastructure.

The biggest benefit of India’s ‘Look-East’ Policy has been that India has re-engaged with its eastern neighbourhood closely and has gradually emerged as a significant player in the strategic dynamics of the region. Economically, India’s trade with ASEAN has grown impressively from US$ 2.3 billion in 1991-92 to US$ 58 billion in 2010-11. Growth of trade between India and China has also been very rapid where all the set targets have been broken time and again. In 2011, India- China trade recorded a figure of US$ 74 billion and we have set a new target of US $ 100 billion by 2015. However, our rising trade deficit with China is indeed a worry. India’s trade and investment ties with Japan, Australia and the Republic of Korea are also picking up fast with increasing momentum.

Our Strategic and Cooperative Partnership with China makes our engagement broad-based and multifaceted. Trade and investment are the great drivers of the new relationship. We are confident that the relationship will mature further and develop steadily. The leaders of both countries recognize that co-existence and cooperation is the best course of action, and sensitivity to mutual aspirations and concerns provides the underpinning for building confidence and trust. There is enough space and opportunity for both of us to grow and develop, and to bring benefit not only to us, but also for other partners in Asia.
With Bangladesh, the visit of PM Sheikh Hasina in 2010 crafted a new paradigm of our bilateral relations which was further consolidated by the landmark visit of PM Manmohan Singh to Bangladesh in 2011, after a gap of 12 years. Sizeable Indian investments have started to flow into Bangladesh and the pace is likely to pick up in the months and years ahead. Two-way trade has crossed five billion dollars in 2010-11, and Bangladesh exports to India have grown by 68 per cent in the last one year. We acknowledge that there is still a large trade imbalance favouring India, which we are determined to address by providing better market access into India for Bangladeshi goods. We are also thinking of other imaginative measures to achieve this objective.

Myanmar too is an integral part of our Look East Policy. Recent years have not only witnessed robust bilateral cooperation but also a number of high-level visits. Our relations with Myanmar encompass a number of important areas like security, trade and investment, energy, capacity-building, health and education, science and technology, as well as infrastructure development. Enhanced connectivity between our two countries is of mutual interest. India and Myanmar in 2010-11 had a bilateral trade of 1.28 billion dollars which is much below the potential. We have established a target of three billion dollars by 2015. Indian pharmaceutical companies have a sizeable presence in Myanmar, providing quality pharmaceutical products at very competitive prices. Myanmar is also emerging as an important partner in India’s quest for energy security.

It is our perspective that in a globalized world, it is mutually gainful opportunity and not geography that defines and drives the processes of integration. India offers such opportunity here and now. That is why I firmly believe that an Asian economic community, that is open, transparent and inclusive, and provides a platform to create ever widening economic opportunities, is better for Asia and for the world, than a narrower or restrictive definition of Asian economic integration. In fact, recent studies have revealed a compelling case for a broader Asian economic community built in a phased manner. It has been demonstrated that economic integration could generate billions of dollars of additional output. The vision of Asian economic integration by coalescing the FTAs among member Asian countries into an Asian RTA is the pivotal step towards the integration of Asia into a common unit. It is precisely for this reason that our Prime Minister, Dr Manmohan Singh, envisaged the creation of a broader Asian Economic Community. This continues to be a longer term goal for us in India.

Therefore, India stands for greater cooperation and exchange between the countries of the region. Sub-regional constructs such as BCIM complement our Look East Policy and are, therefore, equally important and significant for us. Since this is the case we are ready to move forward at a faster pace in enhancing and promoting our interactions in the BCIM forum. I am confident that you will factor this into your deliberations here in Kolkata, and would like to assure you of our support.

I thank you all.

BRICS

New Delhi, March 5, 2012.

India’s Sherpa to BRICS New Delhi Summit and Secretary, Economic Relations in the Ministry of External Affairs, Mr. Sudhir Vyas, today asked scholars and experts from BRICS nations to strive for building the world’s default “go to” institutions and agendas to meet global challenges. “The way forward is not unhindered by challenges, but is simultaneously full of opportunities for enhancing our security, stability and growth,” Mr. Vyas said while delivering the keynote address at the Fourth BRICS Academic Forum meeting, hosted by Observer Research Foundation in New Delhi.

2. Mr Vyas said though the BRICS nations have inherently different development and growth trajectories, they all stand at similar crossroads of policymaking. Delivering the Inaugural address, Mr Vyas emphasized that government (Indian) will not offer answers to the experts on crucial challenges but would rather seek creative ideas and propositions from the experts who are gathered to discuss the key areas of cooperation amongst BRIC countries.

3. Welcoming over 60 delegates from think tanks and research institutions attending the three-day meeting, Mr. Sunjoy Joshi, Director, Observer Research Foundation, said that “had it not been for some of the BRICS economies, the decline in global GDP would have been far harder. Therefore it was no coincidence that the first forum took place in the backdrop of the global economic crisis”.

4. Mr. Joshi pointed out that when the BRICS was coined in 2001, it was neither a forum nor a community. “2008 changed not just Goldman Sachs, but also the world. It also changed the way in which BRICS viewed itself. And as we meet in New Delhi now, the idea of BRICS with South Africa joining in Sanya has not only gained traction. It has found a momentum that was hitherto unsuspected. It has come to signify the shift in global Power”.

5. Mr Joshi said “the trauma of 2008 gave birth to a strong undercurrent, the search for a new narrative that could replace the Bretton Woods diktats of yesterday. No wonder the repeated stress upon the need for a new global financial architecture that would make the global economy less prone and more resilient to future crises a greater need for a more stable, predictable and diversified international monetary system”.

6. “The intervening years actually beguiled and misled many world over by showing signs of an early recovery. But again the crisis in the Eurozone under the shadow of which this summit takes place, has changed all that. This forum therefore is gathered around the three themes of Stability, Security and Growth. And without stability and security there could be no growth”.

7. The delegation leaders – Ms. Luciana Acioly Da Silva of Brazil, Mr. Vladimir Davydov of Russia, Mr. H.H.S Viswanathan of India, Mr. Huang Huaguang of China and Mr. Aziz Pahad of South Africa all agreed that the BRICS are now ready to assume a more important role in global governance and must engage more deeply on key areas.

8. The South African delegation leader acknowledged that the BRICS must focus on opportunities for contextual policymaking rather than following the West. The Chinese delegation leader said that the BRICS must find ways to manage the fall out of the failure in financial governance and responding to crises such as the recent global financial crisis in a coordinated manner. The Russian delegate leader said that the BRICS must strive to become more active in responding to political crises. The Brazilian delegation leader emphasized on the need to coordinate BRICS positions on the upcoming Rio+20 Summit on Sustainable Development and to allow greater exchange of ideas and innovations amongst the countries.

9. The BRICS Academic Forum will release their recommendations for the BRICS Summit Leaders on Tuesday evening, after two days of discussions and debates, suggesting ways to meet the global challenges.
Remarks by Secretary (Economic Relations) on forthcoming BRICS Summit

New Delhi, March 26, 2012.

Good afternoon ladies and gentlemen.

The Fourth BRICS Summit will be held in New Delhi on 29 March 2012. Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh will host President Dilma Rousseff of Brazil, President Dimitry Medvedev of Russia, President Hu Jintao of China and President Jacob Zuma of South Africa. With this, India assumes the Chairmanship of the group for the coming year.

The Delhi Summit, which is the Fourth in the series so far, is taking place under the broad rubric of ‘BRICS Partnership for Global Stability, Security and Prosperity’. We attach the highest importance to this forum. The BRICS are brought together by their shared capacity and will to engage with each other as well as with the rest of the world in the global quest for meaningful, sustainable solutions to contemporary challenges of regional as well as global ramifications.

The original economic rationale put forward by Goldman Sachs in 2001 when they coined the term BRIC was the potential of these four countries to be drivers of global growth.

Indeed intra-BRICS trade is growing at an average of 28% annually and currently stands at about $230 billion. Intra-BRICS investment flows drawing from the complementarities in their economies are increasing. Consumer expenditure in BRICS countries as percentage of GDP ranges from 35-61% and there is strong and growing middle class with rising levels of income. The BRICS countries today present an opportunity as new growth poles in a multi-polar world, as demonstrated during the global economic crisis when they played a vital role that helped the world economy emerge from the shadows of the crisis.

Institutionalized in September 2006, at the initiative of Russia, with a foreign ministerial meeting of the four countries in New York on the sidelines of the UNGA, the BRIC grouping took shape with the first Summit in Yekaterinburg (2009), followed by Brazilia (2010). At Sanya (2011), South Africa joined the group to form BRICS.

The BRICS agenda is not a fixed one. It is a positive, forward-looking agenda that tends to reflect the main issues and challenges before the world community at a given point of time. It draws from the perspective of five major countries and economies with the capacities to contribute substantively to the global discourse for peace, security, stability and development for all. It is a perspective that seeks practical solutions and ways forward for global growth through cooperation and policy coordination. It seeks political dialogue towards a more democratic multi-polar order, in a world that is undergoing major and swift changes that highlight the need for corresponding transformations in global governance.

It works on the principle of consensus.

At the first Summit in Yekaterinburg, and in Brasilia as well, the agenda focused mainly on the international financial and economic situation and reform of the international financial institutions - unsurprisingly, given the salience of the global economic slowdown in 2008 and 2009. The central role of the G-20 and the role that the BRICS could play in this apex body were considered and emphasized, along with reform of the global political and economic governance architecture that meets the interests and developmental needs of emerging market economies and developing countries, with special focus on the interests of the poorest, towards building a harmonious world of lasting peace and common prosperity. Sanya continued and elaborated on these themes, still of high relevance, but also introduced paragraphs on emerging political issues in North Africa, and a more elaborate plan of action for intra-BRICS cooperation.

The Fourth Summit is taking place at a time the world is grappling with the challenges of ensuring a sustained recovery from the global slowdown, complicated by developments in the Eurozone, and bringing global growth back on track. The Summit follows the Durban Conference on Climate Change last December, and precedes another important UN Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20) in June this year and the Conference of Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity in Hyderabad in October as well, three conferences on interconnected themes, all hosted by BRICS members. On the political side, we are witnessing fast moving important developments in West Asia with far-reaching implications for the region and for the world.

The Leaders can thus be expected to have a rich and ambitious agenda before them when they meet in Delhi, and may focus their consideration on addressing these and other contemporary issues amongst the varied concerns and requirements for sustained, balanced development, food and energy security and inclusive growth that remain primary objectives for us to meet the poverty eradication objectives of much of the developing world.

In addition to regular meetings of Foreign Ministers and Finance Ministers, a number of cooperation forums and mechanisms have been developed for deepening intra-BRICS cooperation in identified relevant areas. Meetings of BRICS Trade and Economic Ministers, Agriculture Ministers, Health Ministers, Senior Officials on S&T, a Contact Group on Economic and Trade Issues and other such meetings have been useful in this regard. These are areas where synergies of BRICS technological and human capacities serve the cause of our peoples and those of much of the developing world.
A BRICS Delhi Declaration capturing the essence of Leaders’ deliberations and articulating BRICS shared positions of contemporary issues of mutual interest will be issued.

It is the BRICS practice to develop a mutually agreed Action Plan for BRICS consultation and cooperation in areas of common interest – including on the margins of multilateral conferences. The agreed agenda for these meetings over the course of our Chairmanship will be reflected in the Action Plan that will be annexed to the Declaration.

To give you a sense of the BRICS process and the diversity of its activities, I will quickly run you through a broad outline of Summit-related meetings in the run up to the Summit itself. Some have already taken place and some more will follow in coming days.

In chronological order, BRICS Statistical Authorities met in Delhi on 6-8 February to update the BRICS Statistical Publication for release at the Summit, BRICS Development Banks have held a technical expert level meeting in Kumarakom on 15-17 February to finalize texts of (i) Master Agreement for Extending Credit Facilities in Local Currencies, and (ii) BRICS Multilateral Letter of Credit Confirmation Facility Agreement, that will be signed at the Summit.

A number of BRICS Forums serve as academic think-tanks whose recommendations also feed into the Summit’s deliberations. They include two track-II groups that have both met recently, viz. the BRICS Economic Research Group (ERG), coordinated this time by the National Institute of Public Finance & Policy (NIPFP) that brings together economic think-tanks as well as economic editors of BRICS countries on 27 February, and the BRICS Academic Forum, coordinated by ORF, that met on 5-6 March.

These meetings, for example the Academic Forum, have come up with a number of innovative suggestions, such as creating a virtual academic community for dissemination of information & ideas, working together to create an identifiable brand value of BRICS, cooperative action in bio-diversity issues in BRICS and so on. These are invaluable in creating an inclusive approach to managing common concerns. The ERG has analyzed the relevance that BRICS as a group in the context of current global economic situation.

The BRICS Contact Group on Trade and Economic Issues, which is coordinated by the Department of Commerce, met on 6-7 March 2012.

BRICS Trade Ministers will meet the day after tomorrow, on 28 March to discuss and consider intergovernmental cooperation in the furtherance of global and intra-BRICS trade. The Trade Ministers will also open the proceedings of the Business Forum, which is being jointly hosted by FICCI, CII and ASSOCHAM the same day. The Forum’s programme, in which business delegations and apex business bodies from the five countries will participate, involves a series of sessions on themes such as enhancing financial connectivity for increasing trade and investment among BRICS, role of BRICS countries in ensuring global food security, cooperation for energy security with focus on Green and Renewable Energy and role of ICT and Innovation in improving business among BRICS member countries.

The BRICS Financial Forum will also be held on 28 March. It brings together Export-Import and Development Banks of the five. It will primarily focus on intra-BRICS Interbank Cooperation Mechanism.

The Summit itself will take place on 29 March 2012.

The Leaders’ programme in New Delhi will begin with a cultural event and banquet hosted by President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil for the BRICS Leaders on the eve of the Summit, on 28 March 2012.

On 29 March 2012, the Summit will start with a Restricted Session of consultations amongst the Leaders, followed by a Plenary Session which will be open to the media. After the Plenary Session, the Leaders are to witness the signing of two Agreements among the BRICS Development Banks that I referred to earlier, and then release The BRICS Report focusing on synergies and complementarities of our countries. BRICS Leaders had agreed at their second Summit in Brasilia, on PM’s proposal, to research and produce a compendium of the economies of the BRICS countries and the synergies and complementarities amongst them that could be put to use. This report, which is the result of detailed research over two years by a multi-national group of economists and experts under the supervision of Dr. Kaushik Basu, Chief Economic Advisor to the Finance Minister, is now ready and would be released at the Summit.

This will be followed by Leaders’ statements to the media. The Summit will conclude with a luncheon hosted by Prime Minister in honour of the other BRICS Leaders.

Prime Minister will also hold bilateral consultations with each of the visiting BRICS Leaders after the Summit.
133. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Commerce & Industry on Pre-Summit Trade meeting of the Trade ministers of the BRICS.

New Delhi, March 27, 2012.

India is hosting the Fourth BRICS Summit in New Delhi 29 March 2012. On the preceding day, i.e. tomorrow the trade Ministers of the five BRICS nations are meeting for the Second Trade Ministers Meeting. The First BRICS Trade Ministers meeting was held in Sanya, China on 13 April 2011 on the sidelines of the 3rd BRICS Summit. Trade Ministers also met on the sidelines of the 8th WTO Ministerial Conference in Geneva in December 2011. Highlighting the context of the meeting, the Union Minister of Commerce Industry and Textiles Shri Anand Sharma said “While the new risks to global economy emanating from euro zone debt crisis and uncertainty in global energy markets will have their impact upon economic growth in the BRICS countries, I am confident BRICS countries will continue to register strong growth.”

Elaborating on the growing momentum of BRICS cooperation Shri Sharma further stated “There is a large untapped growth potential of intra-BRICS trade and investments which we are presently focusing on for exploitation. BRICS Development Banks are in the advance stages of concluding Agreements on Extending Credit Facility in Local Currencies, and Multilateral Letter of Credit Confirmation Facility Agreement to facilitate further consolidation of trade and investment ties. Such intra-BRICS initiatives will not only contribute to enhanced intra-BRICS trade and investments but would also facilitate our economic growth in difficult economic times.” (A copy of last Ministerial Declaration by the BRICS Trade Ministers in Sanya can be seen at http://bricsindia.in/trade.html)

Contact Group on Economic and Trade Issues (CGETI) was established following BRICS Trade Ministers meeting in Sanya. The CGETI is entrusted with the task of proposing an institutional framework and concrete measures to expand economic cooperation both among BRICS countries and between BRICS countries and all developing countries, within a South-South perspective. The CGETI has met twice so far i.e. on 2 December 2011, in Beijing, China and on 6-7 March, 2012 in New Delhi.

A number of new areas for deepening intra-BRICS cooperation are expected to be discussed at the meeting of the Ministers on 28 March. The recommendations of the Ministers would feed into the Summit being hosted by India on 29 March.

The five Trade Ministers are also expected to jointly inaugurate the Business Forum that is being organized jointly by the three major India Chambers of Commerce and Industry ASSOCHAM, CII and FICCI). Over 500 business leaders from the five countries are expected to attend this forum.
As per UNCTAD data the share of BRICS economies in the Global Trade has been increasing over the years. In 2010 it stood at 15 per cent up from 13.7 per cent the year before. In 2010-11 India had total trade worth USD 7519 million with Brazil. During the same period trade with Russia was USD 5179 million, with China USD 63095 million and with South Africa USD 11,125 million.

The last BRICS Summit was held in Sanya, China in April 2011. The theme of the Third Summit was “Broad Vision and Shared Prosperity”. The Sanya Summit was the first after inclusion of South Africa in BRICS. A Framework Agreement on ‘Financial Cooperation within the BRICS Interbank Cooperation Mechanism’ was signed on 14 April in Sanya; the agreement envisages extending Line of credits in local currencies. An MoU was also signed at the Business Forum in Sanya establishing permanent business contact points; FICCI signed from India. A Plan of Action was endorsed at the Sanya Summit to strengthen cooperation among BRICS countries in areas of security, finance, business links, agriculture, health, culture, sports, science and technology and green economy.

The Delhi Summit is to build on these measures and also identify new areas for intensive cooperation. The theme of the BRICS summit is Partnership for Stability, Security and Growth.
Overview of Global Economic Developments and Impact on Trade and Investment

The BRICS Trade and Economic Ministers reviewed the global economic situation and noted with concern the continuing difficulty faced by many countries and underscored the need for greater policy coordination to ensure a stable and thriving global economy. In such a scenario, the Ministers emphasised the need to resist protectionist tendencies and to promote international trade as an engine of economic growth and development, while respecting the WTO consistent policy space available to developing countries to pursue their legitimate objectives of growth, development and stability. The Ministers noted that subsidies in agriculture by some developed countries continue to distort trade and undermine the food security and development prospects of developing countries particularly LDCs, and urge that such form of protectionism be shunned.

Current state of play of the Doha Round and the way forward

The Ministers of BRICS WTO members expressed deep concern at the current impasse in the Doha Development Round, and reiterated that they remain fully committed to an early conclusion of the negotiations based on the progress made in the Round since 2001. Towards this end, the Ministers expressed their willingness to explore outcomes in specific areas where progress is possible while preserving the centrality of development in the Doha mandate and within the overall framework of the single undertaking. It is of utmost importance that negotiations on any components of the Doha Round are consistent with the existing mandates. The Ministers did not support any plurilateral initiatives that go against the fundamental principles of transparency, inclusiveness and multilateralism. The Minister believed that such initiatives not only distract Members from striving for a collective outcome but also fail to address the development deficit inherited from previous negotiating rounds.

The Ministers reiterated that they attach great importance to an open and rule-based multilateral trading system, and in this context, they underlined the central role of the WTO in safeguarding and strengthening the rules with specific reference to the concerns of developing countries and in particular LDCs.

The Ministers welcomed Russia’s determination to participate in a constructive and active manner in the DDA negotiations once full membership is attained. A balanced DDA outcome will strengthen and further develop the multilateral trading system.
Cooperation in multilateral fora

The Ministers agreed to coordinate their positions at the WTO and in other multilateral fora such as the forthcoming meeting of the G20 Trade Ministers.

BRICS Ministers look forward to UNCTAD XIII next month in Doha. They reaffirmed the important role of UNCTAD in the area of trade, development and interrelated issues and believe that its mandate should be maintained and strengthened. At a time when the global economy is in crisis, the Doha trade round is at an impasse and multilateralism is under challenge, it is vital for UNCTAD to strengthen its role of policy dialogue, consensus building and capacity building for developing countries.

The way forward on BRICS

The Ministers took note of the discussions in the Contact Group on Economic and Trade Issues (CGETI) on Russia’s proposal for setting up BRICS Projects Platforms/technology pool for joint projects development.

The Ministers directed their officials to explore ways and means for enhancing and furthering intra-BRICS cooperation especially in the areas of customs cooperation, exchange of experiences in trade facilitation, investment promotion, SME cooperation and trade data collection and harmonisation, e-commerce cooperation and intellectual property rights cooperation.

Ministers also agreed that officials should work together to ensure that BRICS members enhance their trade, including of higher value added manufactured products, to support industrialisation and employment in their countries.
THE BRICS REPORT

by

135. Ministries of Finance, Central Banks and Economic Institutions of BRICS Nations

******

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The BRICS (Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa) account for more than 40 per cent of the global population and a share in world GDP that has increased from 16 per cent in 2000 to around 25 per cent in 2010.

The ‘BRICS Report’, which is a study supported by the Ministries of Finance and the Central Banks of the BRICS countries, focuses on the growth prospects, synergies and complementarities between the five large emerging economies that despite their cultural and geographical diversity, are expected to play a major role as growth drivers of the world economy. The emphasis is on best practices, areas of co-operation and strengthening economic links so that the BRICS could collectively play a more central role in the ‘new normal’ of the post-crisis global economy.

This is also perhaps the most opportune time for forging closer links, given that the world economy is in a state of flux and a rebalancing is taking place towards the emerging economies. Their pivotal position in the global recovery has already catapulted the BRICS into a leadership role, which needs further cementing through greater interface among economies.

The Report, divided into five chapters, is in the nature of a forwardlooking document that seeks to reinforce and strengthen the position of BRICS in the global economy. Chapter 1 of the Report provides an overview of the BRICS and their governmental, financial and regulatory frameworks. Chapter 2 examines the impact of the global crisis, the resilience of the BRICS economies, their use of fiscal and monetary stimuli, the process of recovery and their contribution to global growth. Chapter 3 looks at the best practices in the BRICS and the lessons they hold for one another and the world economy. Chapter 4 deals with the challenges that the BRICS could face in moving to a higher growth path. Chapter 5 explores areas of co-operation among the BRICS including initiatives that could propel the BRICS and the world economy to a higher growth trajectory.

New Delhi, March 29, 2012.

Your Excellency President Dilma Rousseff,
Your Excellency President Dmitry Medvedev,
Your Excellency President Hu Jintao,
Your Excellency President Jacob Zuma,
Distinguished delegates,

Let me once again welcome all of you to New Delhi. India is privileged to host the fourth BRICS Summit and assume the Chairmanship of this group.

The global situation facing us today presents a mixed picture. On the one hand, emerging market economies are growing at a healthy pace and increasing their share in global trade and output.

On the other hand, many obstacles have to be overcome if we are to sustain rapid growth in the years ahead. We are all affected by the global economic slowdown, the volatility in food and energy prices, the challenge of reconciling growth with environmental objectives, the political uncertainty in West Asia and the rise of terrorism and extremism. Our responses to these challenges may be different, but there is much common interest that binds us all together.

I would like to share some thoughts on ten specific issues that I believe concern us all.

First, each of our countries has a unique demographic profile that presents its own challenges. In India, for example, we need to create 8 to 10 million of jobs every year over the next decade to absorb the expected growth in the labour force. We are working on ambitious programmes of skill upgradation and education and creation of an environment conducive to an expansion of productive job opportunities. We would like to learn from the experiences of other BRICS countries on how they are dealing with these problems.

Second, the conceptual analysis that produced the positive BRICS narrative was based on a model of catch-up growth in which supply side constraints were not adequately addressed. Today, it is clear that constraints such as the availability of energy and food for countries that account for more than 40% of the world population can impede the entire story. Water is another critical area of scarcity which needs much greater attention than it has received thus far. We have much to learn from each other in how to handle these difficult problems, and there is also room to cooperate internationally.
Third, we are united in our desire to promote sustained and balanced global economic growth. As members of the G-20, we must together ensure that appropriate solutions are found to help Europe help itself and to ensure policy coordination that can revive global growth.

We should also cooperate closely to breathe life into the Doha Round, looking for innovative solutions to overcome barriers that have stalled progress.

Fourth, as large and diverse economies, we should make a special effort to find ways to exploit intra-BRICS complementarities. We should promote greater interaction amongst our business communities. Issues such as easier business visas must be prioritized. As large trading countries, BRICS countries have a strong interest in removing barriers to trade and investment flows and avoiding protectionist measures.

Fifth, to revive global demand and growth, developing countries need access to capital, particularly for infrastructure development. We must address the important issue of expanding the capital base of the World Bank and other Multinational Development Banks to enable these institutions to perform their appropriate role in financing infrastructure development.

We have agreed to examine in greater detail a proposal to set up a BRICS-led South-South Development Bank, funded and managed by the BRICS and other developing countries.

Sixth, BRICS countries must also work together to address deficiencies in global governance. Institutions of global political and economic governance created more than six decades ago have not kept pace with the changing reality of the world. While some progress has been made in international financial institutions, there is lack of movement on the political side. BRICS should speak with one voice on important issues such as the reform of the UN Security Council.

Seventh, each of our countries is grappling with how to pursue ‘green’ growth without compromising on current needs. At the core of this complex issue is the use of fossil energy and the impact that it has on the environment.

We must reduce energy intensity of GDP by promoting energy efficiency and developing clean energy sources. This calls for greater investments in research and development, sharing of best practices, and encouraging transfer of technology. A dialogue between energy producers and consumers would also help in ensuring greater stability in energy markets.

Eighth, as our countries experience significant increases in per capita income, we will also face issues related to income inequality within our countries. Inevitably, we will handle the problem differently, but it may be useful for us to share experiences in this area.
Ninth, urbanization presents common challenges for all our countries. We should encourage sharing of experience in areas such as urban water supply and sanitation, waste management, storm water drainage, urban planning, urban transport and energy efficient buildings.

Finally, the continued prosperity of BRICS countries is linked closely also to the geopolitical environment.

In our restricted session, we discussed the ongoing turmoil in West Asia and agreed to work together for a peaceful resolution of the crisis. We must avoid political disruptions that create volatilities in global energy markets and affect trade flows.

All of us understand the threat that terrorism poses to our societies. We must therefore enhance cooperation against terrorism and other developing threats such as piracy, particularly emanating from Somalia.

We have also agreed on the need to restore stability in Afghanistan, and the importance of sustained international commitment to its future.

Excellencies, we have drawn up an ambitious Action Plan that will be adopted today along with the BRICS Delhi Declaration. I hope that we will be able to collaborate and cooperate with each other to shape global developments and bring tangible benefits to our peoples.

India reaffirms its full commitment to work with BRICS in this endeavour.

Thank you.
137. Media Statement of Prime Minister on the Fourth BRICS Summit.

New Delhi, March 29, 2012.

Excellencies,

Distinguished Members of the Media Fraternity,

Ladies and gentlemen,

India is delighted to host the Fourth BRICS Summit in New Delhi and assume the Chairmanship of the group. I would like to convey my profound gratitude to my colleagues, the Presidents of Brazil, Russia, China and South Africa, for accepting my invitation to attend this Summit. I wish them and the members of their delegations a very pleasant stay in our country.

We have just concluded very enriching and fruitful discussions on issues related to global governance and sustainable development. We reviewed the global economic situation. We discussed ways to finance and promote sustainable development and address the challenges of energy and food security.

We had an in-depth discussion on the situation in West Asia. We agreed that a lasting solution to the problems in Syria and Iran can only be found through dialogue. We agreed that the international community should stay engaged in Afghanistan.

We have agreed on an intensive programme of consultation and coordination in areas of priority over the coming year. This is reflected in the Action Plan of the Delhi Declaration.

Going forward, we will examine the recommendations of the just released BRICS Report, which identifies focus areas for structured cooperation where synergies among the BRICS economies can be harnessed to our common advantage.

We are developing the institutional structures for building these relationships. The agreement signed today by development banks of BRICS countries will boost trade among us by offering credit in our local currencies.

A suggestion has been made to set up a BRICS Development Bank. We have directed our Finance Ministers to examine the proposal and report back at the next Summit.

We agreed to strengthen intra-BRICS trade and investment linkages. Our Trade Ministers met with the business communities at the Business Forum yesterday.

Ladies and Gentlemen,
The world is passing through uncertain times. The rapid recovery of the BRICS economies from the financial crisis highlighted their role as growth drivers of the global economy. Our cooperation is intended to explore meaningful partnerships for common development, address global challenges together and contribute to furthering world peace, stability and security.

I look forward to working with my colleagues to further these common goals.

Thank you.
138. Agreements between BRICS Development Banks

Development banks of BRICS (Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa) have today signed two Agreements - i) Master Agreement on Extending Credit Facility in Local Currency; and ii) BRICS Multilateral Letter of Credit Confirmation Facility Agreement in the presence of Heads of States/Governments of the BRICS countries. The five participating banks are Banco Nacional de Desenvolvimento Economico e Social - BNDES, Brazil; State Corporation Bank for Development and Foreign Economic Affairs - Vnesheconombank of Russia; Export-Import Bank of India; China Development Bank Corporation, and Development Bank of Southern Africa.

The Master Agreement on Extending Credit Facility in Local Currency is intended to reduce the demand for fully convertible currencies for transactions among BRICS nations, and thereby help reduce the transaction costs of intra-BRICS trade.

The Multilateral Letter of Credit Confirmation Facility Agreement envisages confirmation of L/Cs, upon receipt of a request from the Exporter or the Exporter's Bank or the Indemnifying Party or the Importer's Bank. This arrangement would help reduce trade transaction costs, besides promoting intra-BRICS trade.

These two Agreements are expected to enhance cooperation among the BRICS development banks and to significantly promote intra-BRICS trade.

139. Delhi Declaration on the Fourth BRICS Summit.

New Delhi, March 29, 2012.

1. We, the leaders of the Federative Republic of Brazil, the Russian Federation, the Republic of India, the People’s Republic of China and the Republic of South Africa, met in New Delhi, India, on 29 March 2012 at the Fourth BRICS Summit. Our discussions, under the overarching theme, “BRICS Partnership for Global Stability, Security and Prosperity”, were conducted in an atmosphere of cordiality and warmth and inspired by a shared desire to further strengthen our partnership for common development and take our cooperation forward on the basis of openness, solidarity, mutual understanding and trust.

2. We met against the backdrop of developments and changes of contemporary global and regional importance - a faltering global recovery made more complex by the situation in the euro zone; concerns of sustainable development and climate change which take on greater relevance as we approach the UN Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20) and the Conference of Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity being hosted in Brazil and India respectively later this year; the upcoming G20 Summit in Mexico and the recent 8th WTO Ministerial Conference in Geneva; and the developing political scenario in the Middle East and North Africa that we view with increasing concern. Our deliberations today reflected our consensus to remain engaged with the world community as we address these challenges to global well-being and stability in a responsible and constructive manner.

3. BRICS is a platform for dialogue and cooperation amongst countries that represent 43% of the world’s population, for the promotion of peace, security and development in a multi-polar, inter-dependent and increasingly complex, globalizing world. Coming, as we do, from Asia, Africa, Europe and Latin America, the transcontinental dimension of our interaction adds to its value and significance.

4. We envision a future marked by global peace, economic and social progress and enlightened scientific temper. We stand ready to work with others, developed and developing countries together, on the basis of universally recognized norms of international law and multilateral decision making, to deal with the challenges and the opportunities before the world today. Strengthened representation of emerging and developing countries in the institutions of global governance will enhance their effectiveness in achieving this objective.

5. We are concerned over the current global economic situation. While the BRICS recovered relatively quickly from the global crisis, growth prospects worldwide have again got dampened by market instability especially in the euro zone. The build-up of sovereign debt and concerns over medium to long-term fiscal adjustment in advanced countries are creating an uncertain environment for global growth. Further, excessive liquidity from the aggressive policy actions taken by central banks to stabilize their domestic economies have been spilling over into emerging market economies, fostering excessive volatility in capital flows and commodity prices. The immediate priority at hand is to restore market confidence and get global growth back on track. We will work with the international community to ensure international policy coordination to maintain macroeconomic stability conducive to the healthy recovery of the global economy.

6. We believe that it is critical for advanced economies to adopt responsible macroeconomic and financial policies, avoid creating excessive global liquidity and undertake structural reforms to lift growth that create jobs. We draw attention to the risks of large and volatile cross-border capital flows being faced by the emerging economies. We call for further international financial regulatory oversight and reform, strengthening policy coordination and financial regulation and supervision cooperation, and promoting the sound development of global financial markets and banking systems.

7. In this context, we believe that the primary role of the G20 as premier forum for international economic cooperation at this juncture is to facilitate enhanced macroeconomic policy coordination, to enable global economic recovery and secure financial stability, including through an improved international monetary and financial architecture. We approach the next G20 Summit in Mexico with a commitment to work with the Presidency, all members and the international community to achieve positive results, consistent with national policy frameworks, to ensure strong, sustainable and balanced growth.

8. We recognize the importance of the global financial architecture in maintaining the stability and integrity of the global monetary and financial system. We therefore call for a more representative international financial architecture, with an increase in the voice and representation of developing countries and the establishment and improvement of a just international monetary system that can serve the interests of all countries and support the development of emerging and developing economies. Moreover, these economies having experienced broad-based growth are now significant contributors to global recovery.

9. We are however concerned at the slow pace of quota and governance reforms in the IMF. We see an urgent need to implement, as agreed, the 2010 Governance and Quota Reform before the 2012 IMF/World Bank Annual Meeting, as well as the comprehensive review of the quota formula to better reflect economic weights and enhance the voice and representation of emerging market and developing countries by January 2013, followed by the completion of the next general quota review by January 2014. This dynamic process of reform is necessary to ensure the legitimacy and effectiveness of the Fund. We stress that the ongoing effort to increase the lending capacity of the IMF will only be successful if there is confidence that the entire membership of the institution is truly committed to implement the 2010 Reform faithfully. We will work with the international community to ensure that sufficient resources can be mobilized to the IMF in a timely manner as the Fund continues its transition to improve governance and legitimacy. We reiterate our support for measures to protect the voice and representation of the IMF’s poorest members.

10. We call upon the IMF to make its surveillance framework more integrated and even-handed, noting that IMF proposals for a new integrated decision on surveillance would be considered before the IMF Spring Meeting.

11. In the current global economic environment, we recognise that there is a pressing need for enhancing the flow of development finance to emerging and developing countries. We therefore call upon the World Bank to give greater priority to mobilising resources and meeting the needs of development finance while reducing lending costs and adopting innovative lending tools.

12. We welcome the candidatures from developing world for the position of the President of the World Bank. We reiterate that the Heads of IMF and World Bank be selected through an open and merit-based process. Furthermore, the new World Bank leadership must commit to transform the Bank into a multilateral institution that truly reflects the vision of all its members, including the governance structure that reflects current economic and political reality. Moreover, the nature of the Bank must shift from an institution that essentially mediates North-South cooperation to an institution that promotes equal partnership with all countries as a way to deal with development issues and to overcome an outdated donor-recipient dichotomy.

13. We have considered the possibility of setting up a new Development Bank for mobilizing resources for infrastructure and sustainable development projects in BRICS and other emerging economies and developing countries, to supplement the existing efforts of multilateral and regional financial institutions for global growth and development. We direct our Finance Ministers to examine the feasibility and viability of such an initiative, set up a joint working group for further study, and report back to us by the next Summit.

14. Brazil, India, China and South Africa look forward to the Russian Presidency of G20 in 2013 and extend their cooperation.

15. Brazil, India, China and South Africa congratulate the Russian Federation on its accession to the WTO. This makes the WTO more representative and strengthens the rule-based multilateral trading system. We commit to working together to safeguard this system and urge other countries to resist all forms of trade protectionism and disguised restrictions on trade.
16. We will continue our efforts for the successful conclusion of the Doha Round, based on the progress made and in keeping with its mandate. Towards this end, we will explore outcomes in specific areas where progress is possible while preserving the centrality of development and within the overall framework of the single undertaking. We do not support plurilateral initiatives that go against the fundamental principles of transparency, inclusiveness and multilateralism. We believe that such initiatives not only distract members from striving for a collective outcome but also fail to address the development deficit inherited from previous negotiating rounds. Once the ratification process is completed, Russia intends to participate in an active and constructive manner for a balanced outcome of the Doha Round that will help strengthen and develop the multilateral trade system.

17. Considering UNCTAD to be the focal point in the UN system for the treatment of trade and development issues, we intend to invest in improving its traditional activities of consensus-building, technical cooperation and research on issues of economic development and trade. We reiterate our willingness to actively contribute to the achievement of a successful UNCTAD XIII, in April 2012.

18. We agree to build upon our synergies and to work together to intensify trade and investment flows among our countries to advance our respective industrial development and employment objectives. We welcome the outcomes of the second Meeting of BRICS Trade Ministers held in New Delhi on 28 March 2012. We support the regular consultations amongst our Trade Ministers and consider taking suitable measures to facilitate further consolidation of our trade and economic ties. We welcome the conclusion of the Master Agreement on Extending Credit Facility in Local Currency under BRICS Interbank Cooperation Mechanism and the Multilateral Letter of Credit Confirmation Facility Agreement between our EXIM/Development Banks. We believe that these Agreements will serve as useful enabling instruments for enhancing intra-BRICS trade in coming years.

19. We recognize the vital importance that stability, peace and security of the Middle East and North Africa holds for all of us, for the international community, and above all for the countries and their citizens themselves whose lives have been affected by the turbulence that has erupted in the region. We wish to see these countries living in peace and regain stability and prosperity as respected members of the global community.

20. We agree that the period of transformation taking place in the Middle East and North Africa should not be used as a pretext to delay resolution of lasting conflicts but rather should serve as an incentive to settle them, in particular the Arab-Israeli conflict. Resolution of this and other long-standing regional issues would generally improve the situation in the Middle East and North Africa. Thus we confirm our commitment to achieving comprehensive, just and lasting settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict on the basis of the universally recognized international legal framework including the relevant UN resolutions, the Madrid principles and the Arab Peace Initiative. We encourage the Quartet to intensify its efforts and call for greater involvement of the UN Security Council in search for a resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. We also underscore the importance of direct negotiations between the parties to reach final settlement. We call upon Palestinians and Israelis to take constructive measures, rebuild mutual trust and create the right conditions for restarting negotiations, while avoiding unilateral steps, in particular settlement activity in the Occupied Palestinian Territories.

21. We express our deep concern at the current situation in Syria and call for an immediate end to all violence and violations of human rights in that country. Global interests would best be served by dealing with the crisis through peaceful means that encourage broad national dialogues that reflect the legitimate aspirations of all sections of Syrian society and respect Syrian independence, territorial integrity and sovereignty. Our objective is to facilitate a Syrian-led inclusive political process, and we welcome the joint efforts of the United Nations and the Arab League to this end. We encourage the Syrian government and all sections of Syrian society to demonstrate the political will to initiate such a process, which alone can create a new environment for peace. We welcome the appointment of Mr. Kofi Annan as the Joint Special Envoy on the Syrian crisis and the progress made so far, and support him in continuing to play a constructive role in bringing about the political resolution of the crisis.

22. The situation concerning Iran cannot be allowed to escalate into conflict, the disastrous consequences of which will be in no one's interest. Iran has a crucial role to play for the peaceful development and prosperity of a region of high political and economic relevance, and we look to it to play its part as a responsible member of the global community. We are concerned about the situation that is emerging around Iran's nuclear issue. We recognize Iran’s right to peaceful uses of nuclear energy consistent with its international obligations, and support resolution of the issues involved through political and diplomatic means and dialogue between the parties concerned, including between the IAEA and Iran and in accordance with the provisions of the relevant UN Security Council Resolutions.

23. Afghanistan needs time, development assistance and cooperation, preferential access to world markets, foreign investment and a clear end-state strategy to attain lasting peace and stability. We support the global community’s commitment to Afghanistan, enunciated at the Bonn International Conference in December 2011, to remain engaged over the transformation decade from 2015-2024. We affirm our commitment to support Afghanistan's emergence as a peaceful, stable and democratic state, free of terrorism and extremism, and underscore the need for more effective regional and international cooperation for the stabilisation of Afghanistan, including by combating terrorism.

24. We extend support to the efforts aimed at combating illicit traffic in opiates originating in Afghanistan within the framework of the Paris Pact.

25. We reiterate that there can be no justification, whatsoever, for any act of terrorism in any form or manifestation. We reaffirm our determination to strengthen cooperation in countering this menace and believe that the United Nations has a central role in coordinating international action against terrorism, within the framework of the UN Charter and in accordance with principles and norms of international law. We emphasize the need for an early finalization of the draft of the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism in the UN General Assembly and its adoption by all Member States to provide a comprehensive legal framework to address this global scourge.

26. We express our strong commitment to multilateral diplomacy with the United Nations playing a central role in dealing with global challenges and threats. In this regard, we reaffirm the need for a comprehensive reform of the UN, including its Security Council, with a view to making it more effective, efficient and representative so that it can deal with today's global challenges more successfully. China and Russia reiterate the importance they attach to the status of Brazil, India and South Africa in international affairs and support their aspiration to play a greater role in the UN.

27. We recall our close coordination in the Security Council during the year 2011, and underscore our commitment to work together in the UN to continue our cooperation and strengthen multilateral approaches on issues pertaining to global peace and security in the years to come.

28. Accelerating growth and sustainable development, along with food, and energy security, are amongst the most important challenges facing the world today, and central to addressing economic development, eradicating poverty, combating hunger and malnutrition in many developing countries. Creating jobs needed to improve people's living standards worldwide is critical. Sustainable development is also a key element of our agenda for global recovery and investment for future growth. We owe this responsibility to our future generations.

29. We congratulate South Africa on the successful hosting of the 17th Conference of Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and the 7th Conference of the Parties serving as the meeting of the Parties to the Kyoto Protocol (COP17/CMP 7) in December 2011. We welcome the significant outcomes of the Conference and are ready to work with the international community to implement its decisions in accordance with the principles of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

30. We are fully committed to playing our part in the global fight against climate change and will contribute to the global effort in dealing with climate change issues through sustainable and inclusive growth and not by capping development. We emphasize that developed country Parties to the UNFCCC shall provide enhanced financial, technology and capacity building support for the preparation and implementation of nationally appropriate mitigation actions of developing countries.

31. We believe that the UN Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20) is a unique opportunity for the international community to renew its high-level political commitment to supporting the overarching sustainable development framework encompassing inclusive economic growth and development, social progress and environment protection in accordance with the principles and provisions of the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, including the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities, Agenda 21 and the Johannesburg Plan of Implementation.

32. We consider that sustainable development should be the main paradigm in environmental issues, as well as for economic and social strategies. We acknowledge the relevance and focus of the main themes for the Conference namely, Green Economy in the context of Sustainable Development and Poverty Eradication (GESDPE) as well as Institutional Framework for Sustainable Development (IFSD).

33. China, Russia, India and South Africa look forward to working with Brazil as the host of this important Conference in June, for a successful and practical outcome. Brazil, Russia, China and South Africa also pledge their support to working with India as it hosts the 11th meeting of the Conference of Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity in October 2012 and look forward to a positive outcome. We will continue our efforts for the implementation of the Convention and its Protocols, with special attention to the Nagoya Protocol on Access to Genetic Resources and the Fair and Equitable Sharing of Benefits Arising from their Utilization, Biodiversity Strategic Plan 2011-2020 and the Resource Mobilization Strategy.

34. We affirm that the concept of a ‘green economy’, still to be defined at Rio+20, must be understood in the larger framework of sustainable development and poverty eradication and is a means to achieve these fundamental and overriding priorities, not an end in itself. National authorities must be given the flexibility and policy space to make their own choices out of a broad menu of options and define their paths towards sustainable development based on the country's stage of development, national strategies, circumstances and priorities. We resist the introduction of trade and investment barriers in any form on the grounds of developing green economy.

35. The Millennium Development Goals remain a fundamental milestone in the development agenda. To enable developing countries to obtain maximal results in attaining their Millennium Development Goals by the agreed time-line of 2015, we must ensure that growth in these countries is not affected. Any slowdown would have serious consequences for the world economy. Attainment of the MDGs is fundamental to ensuring inclusive, equitable and sustainable global growth and would require continued focus on these goals even beyond 2015, entailing enhanced financing support.

36. We attach the highest importance to economic growth that supports development and stability in Africa, as many of these countries have not yet realised their full economic potential. We will take our cooperation forward to support their efforts to accelerate the diversification and modernisation of their economies. This will be through infrastructure development, knowledge exchange and support for increased access to technology, enhanced capacity building, and investment in human capital, including within the framework of the New Partnership for Africa's Development (NEPAD).

37. We express our commitment to the alleviation of the humanitarian crisis that still affects millions of people in the Horn of Africa and support international efforts to this end.

38. Excessive volatility in commodity prices, particularly those for food and energy, poses additional risks for the recovery of the world economy. Improved regulation of the derivatives market for commodities is essential to avoid destabilizing impacts on food and energy supplies. We believe that increased energy production capacities and strengthened producer-consumer dialogue are important initiatives that would help in arresting such price volatility.

39. Energy based on fossil fuels will continue to dominate the energy mix for the foreseeable future. We will expand sourcing of clean and renewable energy, and use of energy efficient and alternative technologies, to meet the increasing demand of our economies and our people, and respond to climate concerns as well. In this context, we emphasise that international cooperation in the development of safe nuclear energy for peaceful purposes should proceed under conditions of strict observance of relevant safety standards and requirements concerning design, construction and operation of nuclear power plants. We stress IAEA's essential role in the joint efforts of the international community towards enhancing nuclear safety standards with a view to increasing public confidence in nuclear energy as a clean, affordable, safe and secure source of energy, vital to meeting global energy demands.

40. We have taken note of the substantive efforts made in taking intra-BRICS cooperation forward in a number of sectors so far. We are convinced that there is a storehouse of knowledge, know-how, capacities and best practices available in our countries that we can share and on which we can build meaningful cooperation for the benefit of our peoples. We have endorsed an Action Plan for the coming year with this objective.

41. We appreciate the outcomes of the Second Meeting of BRICS Ministers of Agriculture and Agrarian Development at Chengdu, China in October 2011. We direct our Ministers to take this process forward with particular focus on the potential of cooperation amongst the BRICS to contribute effectively to global food security and nutrition through improved agriculture production and productivity, transparency in markets and reducing excessive volatility in commodity prices, thereby making a difference in the quality of lives of the people particularly in the developing world.

42. Most of BRICS countries face a number of similar public health challenges, including universal access to health services, access to health technologies, including medicines, increasing costs and the growing burden of both communicable and non-communicable diseases. We direct that the BRICS Health Ministers meetings, of which the first was held in Beijing in July 2011, should henceforth be institutionalized in order to address these common challenges in the most cost-effective, equitable and sustainable manner.

43. We have taken note of the meeting of S&T Senior Officials in Dalian, China in September 2011, and, in particular, the growing capacities for research and development and innovation in our countries. We encourage this process both in priority areas of food, pharma, health and energy as well as basic research in the emerging inter-disciplinary fields of nanotechnology, biotechnology, advanced materials science, etc. We encourage flow of knowledge amongst our research institutions through joint projects, workshops and exchanges of young scientists.

44. The challenges of rapid urbanization, faced by all developing societies including our own, are multi-dimensional in nature covering a diversity of interlinked issues. We direct our respective authorities to coordinate efforts and learn from best practices and technologies available that can make a meaningful difference to our societies. We note with appreciation the first meeting of BRICS Friendship Cities held in Sanya in December 2011 and will take this process forward with an Urbanization and Urban Infrastructure Forum along with the Second BRICS Friendship Cities and Local Governments Cooperation Forum.
45. Given our growing needs for renewable energy resources as well as on energy efficient and environmentally friendly technologies, and our complementary strengths in these areas, we agree to exchange knowledge, know-how, technology and best practices in these areas.

46. It gives us pleasure to release the first ever BRICS Report, coordinated by India, with its special focus on the synergies and complementarities in our economies. We welcome the outcomes of the cooperation among the National Statistical Institutions of BRICS and take note that the updated edition of the BRICS Statistical Publication, released today, serves as a useful reference on BRICS countries.

47. We express our satisfaction at the convening of the III BRICS Business Forum and the II Financial Forum and acknowledge their role in stimulating trade relations among our countries. In this context, we welcome the setting up of BRICS Exchange Alliance, a joint initiative by related BRICS securities exchanges.

48. We encourage expanding the channels of communication, exchanges and people-to-people contact amongst the BRICS, including in the areas of youth, education, culture, tourism and sports.

49. Brazil, Russia, China and South Africa extend their warm appreciation and sincere gratitude to the Government and the people of India for hosting the Fourth BRICS Summit in New Delhi.

50. Brazil, Russia, India and China thank South Africa for its offer to host the Fifth BRICS Summit in 2013 and pledge their full support.

Press Release issued by the Ministry of Commerce on the BRICS Commerce Ministers’ Statement on Mexico’s initiative in holding a G-20 meeting at Puerto Vallarta (Mexico).

New Delhi, April 19, 2012.

BRICS Trade Minister’s Statement: Puerto Vallarta, Mexico 19th April 2012

Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa welcome the initiative taken by Mexico in hosting the first G20 Trade Ministers’ Meeting and expect it to achieve positive results, contributing to strengthening the multilateral trading system and ensuring strong, sustainable and balanced growth and development.

The BRICS countries take note of the increasing role of global value chains in trade. They note that many sectors, industries and even countries are not participating in global value chains as fully as some others. In order for global value chains to serve as instruments of growth and development, it would be important to develop a deeper understanding of their developmental impact and the conditions under which they can be used to achieve long term socio-economic gains. In addition, attention should be paid to not impose obstacles for the development and effective functioning of global value chains, for protectionist reasons. In this context, it would be useful to have a member-driven process, in the WTO, UNCTAD and other intergovernmental agencies, to examine this issue, including the identification of more accurate statistical methods to assess value addition.

The services sector plays an important role in economic growth and development. Nevertheless, experiences of many countries have shown that in order to benefit from liberalization of services and avoid unintended consequences of premature liberalization, opening services markets should be correctly sequenced, progressive and commensurate with a country’s level of development, strength in particular sectors and regulatory capacity. All countries, particularly developing ones, should be able to benefit from balanced and equitable services liberalisation, by gaining additional market access opportunities in sectors and modes of supply where they have a competitive edge.

Trade Facilitation can have a dynamic effect on competitiveness and economic integration. However, the costs of implementing trade facilitation measures can be a significant challenge for many developing countries, which have to be met through adequate financial and technical assistance. Due attention has also to be paid simultaneously to the development of export-related infrastructure, especially in LDCs, to obtain a win-win result.

Trade finance has an important role in promoting trade through access to affordable credit facilities. Trade cannot flourish without a stable international financial environment, on account of the interconnectedness of the financial markets. This calls for better and more effective regulation of financial markets and supervision of the banking system. Regulatory failures in financial markets can lead to financial crises and in turn adversely affect the availability of trade finance. Excessive liquidity in some countries impacts others as well.

Trade can create growth opportunities and trade reforms can reinforce an effective development strategy, but trade openness by itself is not sufficient to ensure growth, development and social inclusiveness. Other complementary policies are needed for this purpose such as sound macroeconomic management, efficient trade institutions, investments in human capital and infrastructure, adjustment support, and the rule of law. A level playing field, that addresses the current inequities in global trade, is also essential. In particular, trade rules and market opening should apply to all economic sectors, including agriculture, while incorporating special flexibilities and “policy space” for developing countries.

The net employment effects of increased trade may be positive if other country specific factors such as functioning of the labor and product markets, competitiveness of specific sectors and general macroeconomic framework, act in a favourable manner.

Bearing in mind the positive role that trade can play in boosting and sustaining global demand, fostering job creation and increasing the potential for growth and development, we emphasize the need to resist protectionism in all its forms and to promote international trade, while respecting the WTO consistent policy space available to developing countries to pursue their legitimate objectives of growth, development and stability. We encourage the WTO, UNCTAD and other international agencies to complement their on-going monitoring of trade and trade related measures with a deeper analysis of the impacts of these measures on trade flows.

We urge our fellow G20 Trade Ministers to strengthen coordination in promoting a concerted response to current economic uncertainties. "Win-win" trade policies will be central to global recovery. We, therefore, call upon our fellow G-20 Trade Ministers to identify ways to improve the multilateral trading system so that all economies may pursue a sustainable and "development-friendly" integration in global trade, including adjustment strategies for their industries and workforce, as well as the appropriate social and sectoral policies to respond to existing structural vulnerabilities. The conclusion of the Doha Development Round would be a significant step in this direction. The BRICS WTO members will continue their efforts for the successful conclusion of the Doha Round, based on the progress made and in keeping with its mandate, while upholding the principles of transparency, inclusiveness and multilateralism. We encourage all G20 economies to work constructively toward this end in pursuance of the collective decision taken at the 8th WTO Ministerial Conference.

In this context, we also look forward to a successful conclusion of the UNCTAD XIII in Doha which will provide a useful opportunity to highlight the central role of UNCTAD in the area of trade, development and interrelated issues. We reaffirm the need to strengthen UNCTAD’s traditional activities of consensus building, policy dialogue, research, technical cooperation and capacity building, so that it can continue to contribute effectively to its development mandate.
BRICS Leaders held an informal meeting on 18 June 2012 ahead of the formal opening of the G-20 Summit in Los Cabos.

All the BRICS Leaders agreed that the Eurozone crisis threatened global financial and economic stability and that it was necessary to find cooperative solutions to resolve this crisis.

The Leaders also agreed to increase resources available with the International Monetary Fund. In this context, they agreed to enhance their own contributions to the IMF. This is with the understanding that these resources will be called upon only after existing resources, including the New Arrangements to Borrow, are substantially utilized. This would promote adequate burden sharing amongst IMF creditors. These new contributions are being made in anticipation that all the reforms agreed upon in 2010 will be fully implemented in a timely manner, including a comprehensive reform of voting power and reform of quota shares.

The Leaders discussed swap arrangements among national currencies as well as reserve pooling. They agreed to ask their Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors to work on this important issue, in a manner compatible with internal legal frameworks, and report back to the Leaders at the 2013 BRICS Summit.

The Leaders also emphasized the need for increasing the resource base of Multilateral Development Banks, so that increased resources could be provided for development, particularly for investments in infrastructure and in the social sectors in developing countries. They felt that the G20 should pay importance to the development aspect in its agenda of work.

The Leaders emphasized that given the current global situation and the need to bolster market confidence, it was important that the G-20 Summit issue a strong statement of intent in combating the international slowdown and the effects of the Eurozone crisis.

The Leaders agreed that this process of informal consultations on the sidelines of multilateral events was valuable and contributed to closer coordination on issues of mutual interest to BRICS economies.
CICA

Statement by Minister of State for Communications and Information Technology Sachin Pilot at 4th Conference on Interaction and Confidence Building Measures in Asia (CICA) Ministerial Meeting.

Astana, September 12, 2012.

Your Excellency Mr. Yerzhan Kazykhanov, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Kazakhstan

Your Excellency Mr Ahmet Davutoglu, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Turkey

Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

At the outset, I would like to convey my gratitude to our hosts, the Government of Kazakhstan for the excellent arrangements for this meeting and warm hospitality extended to us. I am honored to participate in this distinguished gathering as the representative of India.

India is proud to have been part of CICA since its inception in 1992. CICA has made incremental progress towards its core objective of developing a cooperative and pluralistic security order in Asia, based on mutual understanding, trust and sovereign equality. It has emerged as an important forum for dialogue, allowing member States to exchange views on a range of issues that affect security and stability in this region. CICA serves a useful purpose as a truly Asian forum for dialogue, covering as it does 24 countries of the region, with several more as observers. We must use this forum effectively to address common challenges and priorities.

CICA has devised a range of confidence building measures spanning politico-military issues, the fight against new challenges and threats, economic, environmental and human dimensions. While these are of equal importance and need to be applied on a gradual and voluntary basis, we should accord priority to CBMs that are of common interest, enjoy wide support and are practical and achievable. As these measures bear fruit, we will undoubtedly be better equipped to address the pressing challenges of the day such as international terrorism, drug trafficking, illegal immigration and climate change. These challenges are complex and it is incumbent on us to develop solutions collaboratively. While we do so, we must take care to proceed on the basis of consensus and at a pace comfortable to all.

As has been done for the agreed CBMs concerning economic, environmental, human and new challenges and threats dimensions, we need to discuss modalities at the working level for CBMs in the military-political dimension also in the first instance. More work is needed before we can reach any common understanding on this matter.

We must also remember that CICA’s approach must be rooted in Asian realities, given the uniqueness of the Asian landscape. We should focus on that which unites us all and set aside issues that divide. This approach has worked well in other regional initiatives and should remain the guiding principle for CICA as well.

Mr. Chairman,

Terrorism remains a grave threat that must be addressed by all States through a comprehensive global approach and strengthened commitment, to combat it anywhere and everywhere. Many of our CICA member States are victims of terrorism and we must join hands to counter this menace effectively. All acts of terrorism, in all its various forms and manifestations, must be roundly condemned. No goal or grievance whatsoever can ever justify terrorism. We have, in CICA, already adopted a Declaration on Eliminating Terrorism and Promoting Dialogue among Civilizations under which we agreed to cooperate in combating terrorism and its linkages with other security threats like organized crime, narcotics, arms and human trafficking. Although this Declaration was adopted in 2002, we must work together to eliminate this menace. We must apply ourselves to this challenge if we are to dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism, which has developed strong cross border linkages.

The international community should remain engaged in Afghanistan and extend support for the successful transition process. We are committed to assisting the people and government of Afghanistan as they build a peaceful, pluralistic, democratic and prosperous Afghanistan. We have so far committed assistance amounting to about US$ 2 billion to Afghanistan for development assistance projects identified jointly with the Afghan government.

We are particularly concerned at the situation in the West Asia and North Africa region, which can have serious ramifications for the region and beyond. India supports popular aspirations for a democratic and pluralistic order. At the same time, we emphasize that such transformations cannot be prompted by external intervention, which exacerbate the suffering of ordinary citizens. We urge all parties to recommit themselves to resolving all issues peacefully through an inclusive political process that can meet the legitimate aspirations of all citizens of the countries concerned.

Mr. Chairman,

India has participated actively in CICA deliberations and activities. We have volunteered to coordinate CBMs in the area of energy security and transportation. We remain committed to the CICA process, believing as we do that CICA has an important part to play in promoting peace, security and development in Asia. We wish Turkey well as it takes on the CICA Chairmanship once more for another two year term and stand ready to extend all support in sustaining the tempo of progress at CICA during this time.

Thank you.

European Union

143. Statement by the External Affairs Minister at the joint media interaction with EU High Representative for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy.

Your Excellency, Baroness Catherine Ashton, the High Representative of the European Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy,

Distinguished Representatives of the Press

It is a pleasure to welcome Baroness Catherine Ashton and her delegation in this “Garden City” whose achievements in recent times in the fields of Information Technology and research and development have been considerable.

India and the European Union share common values of freedom, democracy and rule of law. It is in this spirit of cooperation and the convergence of interests that we became strategic partners in 2004. As strategic partners, India and the European Union hold annual Summits and Ministerial meetings as well as numerous official level interactions. These provide an opportunity to discuss bilateral issues and provide a robust framework for reviewing global challenges.

European Union is our largest trading partner and a significant source of investment and technology flows into India. We cooperate on a wide range of issues ranging from security, energy movement of people, culture, education and human rights.

Today, we have concluded useful and substantive discussions covering the entire spectrum of our relations. We exchanged views in a spirit of warmth and friendship. Our relationship and engagements in different areas have expanded over the years and will expand further as EU evolves.

India welcomes the enhanced role of the European Union on the world stage. Both India and the EU have important roles to play in the international arena. Keeping this in mind, we also exchanged views on various regional and global issues of common interest.

Our annual Summits are testimonies of the importance both sides attach to our relations. The successful visit of our Prime Minister to Brussels for the India-EU Summit in December 2010 has strengthened our strategic partnership which is a reflection of our shared commitment to democratic principles, respect for human freedom and the rule of law. During the past one year, we have intensified our dialogue on various aspects of our relations. We look forward to the visit of the leadership of the European Union to India for the next India-EU Summit, which is scheduled to be held shortly in New Delhi.
Through our discussions today, we have been able to take stock of what has been achieved in the last one year and prepared on a substantive basis to take our cooperation forward during the upcoming India-EU Summit meeting.

We have reiterated our commitments to intensify our cooperation in diverse fields including trade and investment, movement of peoples, energy, science and technology and counter-terrorism. The two sides also took this opportunity to review the progress made in the implementation of the Joint Action Plan, which remains the guiding force of our relations.

In the context of the continuing debt crisis in Europe, We are happy to note that European leaders have decided to take the required steps to contain the crisis and are confident that lasting remedies would be found and implemented. India believes that a revival of European economies and Europe’s continued growth is in the interest of the international community including India. We sincerely wish EU success in the efforts for combating the crisis.

India and the EU are two of the world’s largest peace loving democracies that share common values. India is therefore, committed to working with the European Union as a true and reliable partner to contribute to world peace, stability and prosperity.
144. Extracts relevant to the India - European Union Summit from the Media Briefing

New Delhi, February 6, 2012.

Official Spokesperson: Shri Syed Akbaruddin) ........the 12th India-EU Summit will be held on the 10th February. At this meeting the EU will be represented by the President of the European Council Mr. Herman Van Rompuy, and the President of the European Commission, Mr. Jose Manuel Barroso. This is the first summit to be held in India following the implementation of the Lisbon Treaty. On the margins of the summit there will be an India-EU Business Summit.

The process of annual summits between India and the EU dates back to 2000 when the first such summit was held in Lisbon. The EU as a block of 27 countries is India’s largest trading partner accounting for about 14 per cent of our foreign trade. It is also the biggest source of foreign direct investment accounting for about 21 per cent of foreign direct investment in India.

As you are aware, the broad-based trade and investment agreement is currently being negotiated. This holds the potential to increase trade and investment flows. The negotiations are currently critically poised and there is a shared desire to conclude them at an early date.

India and the European Union are partners sharing values of freedom, democracy, and rule of law; and have a strategic partnership established in 2004. During the past year there has been an intensification of dialogue on various aspects of our relations. We have had Foreign Office consultations and bilateral dialogues on human rights, science and technology, economy and security, apart from the meeting of the India-EU Energy Panel.

As you are aware, External Affairs Minister recently had met his counterpart Baroness Ashton in Bengaluru to prepare for the summit meeting which is to be held shortly.

Just to summarise, we have a vibrant and multifaceted relationship with the EU and the summit is expected to address all aspects of this strategic partnership from trade to security, energy to movement of people, cultural education and human rights.

145. Media Statement by Prime Minister during 12th India-EU Summit.

New Delhi, February 10, 2012.

Your Excellency President Herman Van Rompuy, President of the European Council,

Your Excellency Mr Jose Manuel Barroso, President of the European Commission, Distinguished delegates and members of the media.

I am delighted to welcome Their Excellencies Mr. Herman Van Rompuy and Mr Jose Manuel Barroso to the first India-European Union Summit in India after the entry into force of the Lisbon Treaty.

We have just concluded extremely productive and wide-ranging discussions in a very cordial and friendly atmosphere.

India and the European Union are strategic partners in a fast changing and complex world. The success of Europe’s political and economic integration is vital for global stability and prosperity. The European Union leaders informed me of the steps being taken by Europe to deal with the debt crisis in the Eurozone. I conveyed to them our best wishes for an early and sustained recovery. Given our rapidly growing links with Europe, this is in India’s interest. Europe’s recovery is also essential for ensuring the recovery of the global economy and bringing back market confidence.

Our trade with Europe has reached 107 billion US dollars in 2011. Both sides have made considerable progress in the negotiations on the Broad-Based Trade and Investment Agreement. There are complex issues involved, but we have both agreed to expedite discussions so that we can conclude an Agreement at the earliest. We seek solutions that are practical, mutually beneficial and acceptable to both sides.

I conveyed to the EU leadership the importance India attaches to EU’s participation in our growth agenda including in infrastructure development, clean energy technologies, innovation, research and skill development. Greater investment flows in both directions is a win-win proposition for both sides.

The signing of a Joint Declaration on Research and Innovation Cooperation and the Memorandum of Understanding on Statistical Cooperation are forward looking documents which will further integrate our economies.

I raised the issue of greater people-to-people exchanges and easier travel arrangements for tourism, businesspersons, professionals and other categories of travelers. We have agreed to continue our discussions on these matters.

India’s relations with the European Union go well beyond economic and commercial issues. We share common values of democracy, respect for civil liberties and rule of law. We have healthy and frank exchanges on political and security issues of bilateral, regional and global importance.

The India-EU Joint Action Plan which was adopted in 2005 and reviewed in 2008 is the template of our cooperation, and covers the entire spectrum of our relations.

We held substantive discussions on other areas of our engagement covering energy cooperation, science and technology, culture, counter-terrorism, piracy and cyber-security.

We exchanged views on the situation in West Asia, with particular reference to Syria and Iran and developments in our neighbourhood in Afghanistan and Pakistan. We have a common interest in promoting stability in these areas.

We discussed global challenges such as climate change, the global economic crisis and global governance reforms. We would like to work with Europe at the forthcoming international conferences on Nuclear Security in Korea, the G-20 Summit in Mexico, the Rio+20 Conference in Brazil and Biological Diversity Conference in India.

Our discussions today reinforce my belief that our partnership with the European Union will continue to grow in the coming years. India looks forward to working with the European Union on all issues. This is a partnership that will assume greater global significance in the years to come.

I thank you.

Leaders looked forward to the UN Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20) for a renewed political commitment to Sustainable Development based on the Rio Principles to advance progress in the implementation of the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, Agenda 21, the Programme for the further Implementation of Agenda 21, the Johannesburg Declaration on Sustainable Development and the Johannesburg Plan of Implementation. They welcomed the hosting of the Conference by Brazil on 20-22 June 2012 in Rio de Janeiro and pledged to extend all support to make it a success. Leaders agreed that green economy should be seen as a means to achieving the overriding priorities of sustainable development and poverty eradication and emphasized that Sustainable Development should be approached through a balanced integration of economic, social and environmental pillars.

32. Leaders reaffirmed that poverty eradication should remain the central focus of the global development agenda, called for a redoubling of efforts to push for maximum achievement of MDGs by 2015 and reaffirmed that inclusive and equitable global growth is fundamental in ensuring the attainment of the MDGs, particularly poverty reduction, and this would require continued focus on these goals even beyond 2015.

33. Leaders reaffirmed the importance of the implementation of the Strategic Plan for Biodiversity 2011-2020 and of strengthening global efforts towards preventing biopiracy and preserving genetic resources and traditional knowledge associated with their use. They committed their full support and pledged to cooperate closely for the success of the 11th Conference of Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD-COP11) to be held in Hyderabad, India in 2012. In this connection India and the EU agreed to actively work towards the early entry into force of the Nagoya Protocol on Access to Genetic Resources and the Fair and Equitable Sharing of Benefits Arising from their Utilisation (ABS).

34. Leaders discussed the outcome of the Climate Change Conference held in Durban, South Africa in December 2011, and called for continued dialogue between both sides with a view to enhancing cooperation on bilateral and international issues relating to Climate Change in accordance with the objectives, principles and provisions of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change.

35. India and EU reaffirmed their commitment to global and non-discriminatory disarmament and to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their delivery systems. They pledged closer cooperation aimed at providing a robust nuclear non-proliferation regime and supported a prompt commencement of negotiations on Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty in the Conference on Disarmament.

36. The parties reaffirmed their commitment to diplomacy to resolve the Iranian nuclear issue and expressed the need for Iran to take constructive and immediate steps to meet its obligations to the IAEA and the UN Security Council. Parties welcomed efforts by the EU High Representative, on behalf of the E3+3, aimed at engaging Iran into meaningful talks.

New Delhi

February 10, 2012

We have witnessed a great amount of economic and political turmoil over the past year. Volatility in commodity prices and disruptions to supply chains and high oil prices have added to global uncertainty and impacted businesses across the globe, slowing the recovery in both advanced and emerging economies. Even as the after effects of the global crisis continue to linger in many advanced economies, steeply rising sovereign debt in the absence of a quick return to trend growth is making markets nervous. Although actions by Euro zone countries and the ECB have stabilized the situation and calmed the market somewhat, the underlying structural problem remains and downside risks remain significant as manifest in recent movements in bond yields. While near term economic data has unexpectedly encouraging, economic conditions overall remain weak, and unemployment at politically unacceptable levels. We need to carefully deliberate our options going forward.

Developing countries and emerging economies are expected to continue as growth drivers for the world economy. The fact, however, is that even here growth has decelerated. The global economy is too interconnected for them to be insulated from the knockdown impact of developments in advanced economies. We are confronted with the unseemly situation of deflationary pressures in one part of the world, and inflationary pressures in a number of developing countries, including India. We need to get to the roots of this anomaly and take corrective actions in a coordinated manner through our Framework for Strong, Sustainable and Balanced Growth. We need to be mindful, however, that the capacity of most countries to deal with any fresh crises stands somewhat diminished, more so on account of the prolonged use of fiscal and monetary tools. As far as India is concerned, despite adverse conditions prevailing in our external environment, we are reasonably confident that the underlying growth fundamentals remain firm. We are intent on ensuring that the process of fiscal consolidation gains further momentum, with monetary policy remaining vigilant in dealing with inflationary pressures. We expect real GDP growth in 2011-12 to be around 7.0 per cent, and to gain further strength in the ensuing fiscal.

My Canadian colleague will be making / has already made a detailed presentation on the progress made by the Framework Working Group. I will limit my intervention to adding a few thoughts to facilitate our discussion today.
As we push the Framework process forward and work towards an Action Plan for Los Cabos, we need to ensure that the plan adopted by our Leaders is both credible and ambitious enough to put the global economy firmly on the path of recovery over the short run, and promote strong, sustainable and balanced growth and job creation over the medium to long-term. In this regard, I would like to emphasize that the action plan should pay greater attention to three important issues at this juncture.

First, as mandated by our Leaders, we will need to develop a framework to assess the progress made on G20 commitments. Since the time between the Cannes and Los Cabos Summits is quite short, this would be an important component of our Action Plan. It is also critical for our own credibility in the eyes of the world. The Framework Working Group has indicated that assessment in some areas is complicated by the lack of a common framework to assess progress. You would recall the Cannes Action Plan has both short-term and long-term policy commitments. Since assuring the ‘recovery’ continues to be our topmost priority, the focus of our assessment framework at this stage should be on short term commitments, while keeping in view that these should not be in conflict with our medium to long-term objectives.

Secondly, there is general concern over the global employment scenario, especially the falling labor participation rate and growing youth unemployment. Leaders had consequently tasked us to mainstream jobs and employment issues into the Framework exercise. Persistent high unemployment tends to have significant long-lasting detrimental impacts on the economy, holding back economic recovery further, adding to social tensions and adversely affecting productivity and growth in the medium to long-term. Credible action for both short and medium-term policy to create jobs and employment needs to be a cornerstone of the G20 Framework.

Thirdly, the world has been preoccupied with dealing with the problems in the financial sector, which was need of the hour. However, keeping in view the emergent situation, some members have been stressing the need to step up efforts to support investment in the real sector, and especially in infrastructure, at a global level to help revive global growth and support demand and job creation. This route to reviving global growth has not received the attention that it merits. To the extent that much of this investment, including in infrastructure, will occur in developing countries, it would also help rebalance global demand, as also, redirect savings. Some developed countries also need to increase investment and upgrade their infrastructure. While construction works would stimulate local growth and job creation, the large demand for capital goods created for modern infrastructure would also stimulate private investment and job creation globally. There are a number of ways in which investment and infrastructure could be dovetailed into the G20 finance work-streams, such as through the Working Groups on the Framework and the International Financial Architecture (IFA), and providing necessary incentives in the architecture of financial regulation. Credible actions to step up efforts in this regard could be a distinctive feature of the Los Cabos Action Plan.”

The global financial system continues to face a complex set of challenges. While some countries and regions are recovering from the crisis of 2008, others are confronting renewed turbulence. The uncertain and uneven recovery has led to calls in some quarters to weaken financial reform initiatives. While there may be some case for some back loading of difficult adjustments to strengthen the recovery of the financial sector, any weakness shown in our resolve and commitment to reform will sow the seeds of fresh crises down the line. The key task is to fully implement what has already been agreed in a cooperative manner.

There is a concern that unless the same standards are implemented in all jurisdictions simultaneously there would be scope for regulatory arbitrage that could result in financial activity migrating to less regulated jurisdictions elsewhere, as well as into shadow banking. While all countries are committed to Basel III, major jurisdictions have separately come out with their own regulatory standards. The disharmony would be confusing and expensive for the banks, which are spending significant amounts to prepare for and comply with the new standards.

Collaboration between financial authorities has never been so testing and yet never has collaboration been so important. Collaboration is difficult when it entails profound structural change in the face of volatile financial markets and anemic growth prospects worldwide. Yet it is precisely these challenges that make it so vital that the regulatory response should be well coordinated internationally to ensure that the new regulatory framework is effectively and globally implemented.

Going forward, while we push for the progress on implementing the reform agenda to update the global financial regulatory framework, we should be mindful that our reform agenda incorporate the main lessons from the crisis and that they address the challenges posed by current conditions.

In this regard, we look forward to the outcomes of the initiatives of specific concern to the emerging and developing economies including financial inclusion, consumer protection and the study to identify the extent to which the agreed regulatory reforms may have unintended consequences for EMDEs.

With the relaxation of control of foreign investments and foreign exchange by countries, there has been a great increase in cross-border transactions which bring into focus issues of tax evasion and illicit flows that pose serious challenges to the world economy and the efforts of the countries to raise revenue for development. India, like most of G20 countries, has signed the Multilateral Convention on Mutual Administrative Assistance in Tax Matters. To make the Convention really effective, the G20 should give a call that the Convention is signed by Offshore Financial Centers and countries traditionally believing in secrecy of bank laws and that country should not give exemptions which will eclipse the efficacy of the Convention.

India believes that the Automatic Exchange of Information is one of the most effective ways to improve voluntary tax compliance and decrease tax evasion and there is a need to make it obligatory. Members of the G20 can take a lead in this regard by exchanging information automatically with their treaty partners on a voluntary basis and then urging other countries also to do so. India would also like to suggest that an implementation of a country-by-country financial reporting standard, which includes the obligation for each multinational company to report in every country in which it operates, can increase transparency and reduce the scope of tax evasion.

Finally, Phase 1 and Phase 2 reviews of the Global Forum should not remain one off measures. An institutional mechanism may be established so that the reviews are done at periodic intervals. The effectiveness of the exchange of information should be monitored on a continuous basis by the Global Forum and reported to the G20 regularly.
As a major commodity importer, India is very concerned about the increase and volatility of commodity, and especially oil, prices, in recent times that seem to be not aligned with underlying economic fundamentals. These distortions are, inter alia, adding to inflationary pressures in a number of developing countries, including India.

Despite several studies, including one done by the G 20 itself, it is still not very clear as to what is driving this heightened volatility, which seems to be a mix of financialization of commodity markets, monetary policy actions, political uncertainties, and demand-supply imbalances.

We feel that improving information and transparency in commodity markets, including futures and over the counter markets would help alleviate the problem. We therefore welcome the G 20 initiatives in this direction. There is an urgent need for countries to put in place a mechanism for gathering commodity market information and creating a publicly accessible comprehensive data base on production, price, inventories, demand and supply forecasts, etc. An unfettered access to vital information on the commodity markets would discourage excessive speculation and exaggerated price movements.

In addition, there should also be a thrust towards increasing production and productivity of commodities through improved technology to relieve any demand-supply imbalances that may exist to maintain price stability. During our last meeting in February we had also felt that there is a need for a commitment by producing countries to continue to ensure adequate supply to mitigate supply shocks.
India welcomes the initiatives taken by Mexico on Green Growth. As G-20 Finance Ministers, we should recognise that our concerns on Green Growth and Climate Change require, inter-alia, new solutions and a closer discussion on various possible options, and that such discussions should ultimately feed into UN processes. The G20 can contribute in this area through the identification of best practices for sustainable development, provide researched inputs, sharing of technology and suggesting ways of raising resources to go forward.

We need to recognize that there is currently no internationally agreed definition of “green growth”. Our deliberations on the issue must therefore strike a balance between all the three pillars of sustainable development i.e. economic development, social development and environmental sustainability, on which there is consensus, and be consistent with the objectives, provisions and principles, including common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities, of the UNFCCC.

We note the proposal for setting up a new study group of co-facilitators with the objective of organizing and delivering a report on Climate Finance commitments. However, the criteria and the process as to how this Study Group of Co-facilitators will be formed are not clear. I would like to point out that the views and interests of all G 20 countries need to be reflected through a transparent and inclusive process. Further, I would like to point out that while technical analysis and researched inputs on these issues are welcome, a review of the progress on commitments on climate finance has to be done by the Conference of Parties to UNFCCC only. The study group might benefit by limiting its focus on specific areas and where finding common ground remains contentious but breakthroughs are needed, such as financing for sustainable development.

India appreciates the efforts of FATF in issuing the new international standards to combat money-laundering, terrorist financing and proliferation financing. These new standards would help better address new threats to the international financial system and provide stronger framework to act against criminals.

We are convinced that implementation of these new standards by the global community will make financial systems more transparent, safe and robust.

We fully share the view that due to integration of world economies and intermingling of the threats in the international business environment, no country can alone meet the threats of money-laundering and terrorist financing. There is an ever growing need for international cooperation to deal with these threats that are increasingly acquiring international dimensions. We hope the new standards will improve the domestic and international cooperation amongst the agencies to combat these crimes.

We have special concern that in cases of terrorist financing, stronger and faster international cooperation should be encouraged. It is also important that systems are put in place to prevent and detect the misuse of formal and informal channels irrespective of the size of fund.

The recommendations relating to transparency of legal entities and legal arrangements would help in promoting international cooperation in determining the controllers and beneficial owners of legal structures.

I am confident that FATF, while framing the assessment methodology, will take into account the diversities in the financial and legal structures of various countries and the implementation challenges that countries with lower capacities would have to face. India will fully contribute with member countries in developing suitable assessment methodology and procedures.

India is committed to implement these recommendations in an effective manner and contribute towards the global efforts to ensure integrity of the financial system.

With these few words I reiterate India’s support to FATF process and to the extended mandate being sought up to 2020.
154. Statement of Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee on Augmentation of IMF Resources at the Joint IMFC- G-20 Session.

Since January 2012, when the Managing Director made a proposal to augment IMF’s resources, several landmark developments have taken place which have brought about a welcome change in the global economic and financial environment. In view of these developments, a measure of calm has been restored. But, several uncertainties and downside risks continue.

We welcome the recent efforts by EU to raise the size of its firewall and we request that these efforts should continue to play the primary role in addressing the needs of members of the EU as and when the situation so demands. We also feel that IMF assistance should only underpin the EU’s efforts and play a catalytic role in order to provide confidence to investors.

Any bilateral financial contributions made should be voluntary. It should not be linked to reform of quota formula. Further these contributions should not be looked upon as a substitute to quota resources. It is important that innocent bystanders affected by the crisis, particularly the PRGT covered and low income countries are adequately protected and there should be sufficient resources available for them.

India has already ratified the 2010 quota increase. We have also confirmed that we will maintain our relative share of the new arrangements to borrow. Considering the gravity of the economic uncertainties we support the new funding initiative. Our exact contribution will be announced in due course.

India will continue to play its role to assist the IMF in its efforts to augment permanent resources. However, governance issues are also linked with this and we are disappointed at the pace of the reform on quota and governance issues. A dynamic process of reform is necessary to ensure the legitimacy and effectiveness of the Fund and the best possible means to improve governance and legitimacy is by ensuring that there is no slippage on crucial reforms.

The Quota Formula is due for review by January 2013 and it is important that there should not be any slippage in the target date in this regard. The quota formula is of central importance since quotas are the main determinant of the voting power of members. For the emerging and developing countries, GDP is the most important variable in the quota formula and the weight of the blended GDP variable should be substantially increased in the formula. Our objective is a simple formula with GDP blend as either the sole or predominant variable and with a higher share of GDP-PPP.
155. Final Communiqué issued after meeting of G-20 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors.

1. We, the G20 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors, met to assess progress on the fulfillment of the mandates given to us by our Leaders and to address ongoing economic and financial challenges and promote robust growth and job creation.

2. Recent economic developments point to the continuation of a modest global recovery, supported by some significant policy actions that have taken place since our last meeting. The tail risks facing the global economy only months ago have started to recede. However, growth expectations for 2012 remain moderate, deleveraging is constraining consumption and investment growth, volatility remains high partly reflecting financial market pressures in Europe and downside risks still persist. We remain committed to further reduce these risks. High levels of public and private indebtedness, the need for structural reforms, insufficient global rebalancing, and persistent unemployment and development gaps continue to weigh on medium-term global growth prospects. In the context of high unemployment and indebtedness in many countries, supporting growth and job creation, structural reforms, restoring medium-term fiscal sustainability and promoting global rebalancing remain at the core of our commitments. In addition, protecting investment is crucial for the global recovery and, in accordance to the mandate by our Leaders in Cannes, we reaffirm our commitment to avoid protectionism. Vigilant of high oil prices, G20 members stand ready to carry out additional actions as needed and welcome the commitments by producing countries to ensure adequate supply.

3. We have made progress in implementing the commitments established in the Cannes Action Plan for growth and jobs, as well as taken additional actions consistent with our shared objectives for strong, sustainable and balanced growth. These commitments remain fully relevant. Complete and timely implementation is critical, though more needs to be done. We agreed today on the main elements of the accountability assessment that will be carried out in order to enhance monitoring of the implementation of our commitments, as mandated by our Leaders in Cannes. We have also agreed on the main priority areas for further policy actions that should be reflected in the Los Cabos Action Plan that will be announced by our Leaders in June, including on fiscal, financial, structural, monetary and exchange rate, trade and development policies. We took note of a preliminary report by the international organizations on how the G20 framework can contribute to job creation, with the final report being presented at the Los Cabos Summit. These are important initiatives as increasing growth, infrastructure financing, employment and social inclusion are at the heart of all our actions.
4. We remain committed to take the necessary actions to secure global financial stability. We welcome the euro area members’ decisions in March to strengthen European firewalls as part of broader reform efforts and the availability of central bank swap lines. Together with the IMFC we have reached agreement to enhance IMF resources for crisis prevention and resolution. This is the result of a broad international cooperative effort that includes a significant number of countries. There are firm commitments to increase resources made available to the IMF by over $430 billion in addition to the quota increase under the 2010 Reform. These resources will be available for the whole membership of the IMF, and not earmarked for any particular region. The resources would be channeled through temporary bilateral loans and note purchase agreements to the IMF’s General Resources Account. Should it become necessary to use these resources, adequate risk mitigation features, conditionality and burden sharing among official creditors would apply, as approved by the IMF Board. This effort, together with the national and regional structural, fiscal, and monetary actions that have been put in place in the past months, shows the commitment of the international community to safeguard global financial stability and put the global economic recovery on a sounder footing.

5. We reaffirmed our commitment to fully implement the 2010 Governance and Quota Reform by the 2012 IMF/World Bank Annual Meeting. We will continue to contribute towards a comprehensive review of the IMF quota formula by January 2013 and the completion of the next general review of quotas by January 2014, fulfilling the commitments made in Seoul and Cannes. We reaffirm that the distribution of quotas should better reflect the relative weights of IMF members in the world economy which have changed substantially in view of strong growth in dynamic emerging markets and developing countries.

6. We welcome recent initiatives on IMF surveillance, and agree that the current surveillance framework should be significantly enhanced. This process should help achieve a better integration of bilateral and multilateral surveillance, with a focus on global, domestic and financial stability, including spillovers from countries policies. This could be achieved through a careful use of Article IV consultations. We welcome the progress by the IMF in advancing consideration of an integrated surveillance decision and commit to support the decision process. We underscore the importance of rigorous surveillance on exchange rate policies and support a more ample coverage of surveillance activities, where relevant, including global liquidity, capital flows, capital account measures, reserve and fiscal, monetary and financial sector policies that could have an impact on external stability. We welcome the ongoing work to produce an external sector report, which would strengthen multilateral analysis and enhance the transparency of surveillance. We also recognize that political ownership and traction is critical to effective surveillance, and that the IMFC has a role in facilitating the active involvement of all IMF members. We call on the IMF to address issues that constrain effective surveillance as identified by the IEO.

7. We assessed progress on the implementation of our financial regulatory reform agenda as outlined in our February 2012 Communiqué in order to deliver on our commitments looking ahead to the Los Cabos Leaders’ Summit, and reaffirmed our commitment to common global standards by pursuing the financial regulatory reform agenda according to our agreed timetable in an internationally consistent and non-discriminatory manner. We take note of the work to date by the FSB and BCBS on the modalities for extending the SIFI framework to domestic systemically important banks (D-SIBs), and look forward to the completion of this work by November 2012 and welcome the FSB progress report on strengthening the oversight and regulation of the shadow banking system to mitigate potential systemic risk and look forward to its final recommendations by end-2012. We support the work of the Working Group on FSB Capacity, Resources and Governance to put the FSB on an enduring organizational footing while preserving the strong links with the BIS and look forward to Leaders receiving the Group’s recommendations in June 2012; the work coordinated by the FSB to provide safeguards supportive of a global framework for central counterparties (CCPs) as an important element in achieving the agreed OTC derivatives reforms, so that authorities can make informed decisions on the standards and requirements of CCPs to meet by end-2012 their commitment that all standardized OTC derivatives be centrally cleared in CCPs with the appropriate safeguards; and the efforts of the IASB and FASB to achieve convergence to a globally accepted set of high quality accounting standards and urge them to meet their target of issuing standards on key convergence projects by mid-2013, at the latest, in order to achieve a single set of high quality international accounting standards. We look forward for the completion of the study, coordinated by the FSB with the IMF and the World Bank, to identify the extent to which the agreed regulatory reforms may have unintended consequences for Emerging Markets and Developing Economies. We support the work of the FSB on the global governance framework for the legal entity identifier and look forward to its recommendations in June on establishing a global LEI system. We support work on developing for consultation, internationally consistent standards on margining for non-centrally cleared OTC derivatives by June 2012.

8. We reiterate our call upon all countries to join the Global Forum on transparency and to sign on the Multilateral Convention on Mutual Assistance. We look forward to an interim report by the OECD for the Los Cabos Summit on progress made and on a new set of reviews and on necessary steps to improve comprehensive information exchange. We welcome the ongoing work by the FSB on adherence to supervisory and regulatory information exchange and cooperation standards. We support the renewal of the FATF mandate, sustaining global efforts to combat money laundering and the financing of terrorism and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

9. As an important complement of the G20 financial regulation agenda, we agreed to follow through on the five recommendations of the 2011 Global Partnership for Financial Inclusion report, endorsed in Cannes, and take the financial inclusion agenda forward towards concrete results and we agreed to present to our Leaders at the Los Cabos Summit the G20 Basic Set of Financial Inclusion Indicators, which will assist countries, policymakers and stakeholders in focusing global efforts on measuring and sustainably tracking progress on access to financial services globally. We acknowledge the efforts of those G20 and non-G20 countries willing to commit to national coordination platforms and strategies for financial inclusion under the “G20 Financial Inclusion Peer Learning Program” at the Los Cabos Summit as well as the ongoing efforts and the importance of coordinated support, policy advice and technical assistance by GPFI implementing partners, other stakeholders, including the UN, and bilateral donors and request their continued support to national strategic planning, implementation and data initiatives in support of financial inclusion. On financial education we recognize the importance and relevance of the work that the OECD, its International Network on Financial Education (INFE), and the World Bank have been doing in this topic and look forward for the OECD/INFE High Level Principles on National Strategies for Financial Education to be presented to our Leaders for their consideration at the Los Cabos Summit. For advancing our financial consumer protection agenda we recognize the importance of the International Financial Consumer Protection Network (FinCoNet) as a global network of market conduct financial authorities. We also ask the G20/OECD Task Force on financial consumer protection to develop with the FSB effective approaches to support the implementation of the High Level Principles endorsed in Cannes, and recognize the importance of an active participation in this process. We recognize the need for women to gain access to financial services and financial education, and call for the GPFI and OECD/INFE to identify additional barriers women may face.

10. We welcome the participation of the International Organizations on the assessment of the macroeconomic impacts of excessive commodity price volatility on growth and their identification of policy options that countries could consider as per their national circumstances to mitigate any such effects. We will report to Leaders in Los Cabos on these policy options and their implications for our national agendas.

11. We reaffirm our commitments to enhance the transparency and functioning of energy markets. We will work to improve the JODI-Oil database and work on applying the same principles to JODI-Gas, and to rationalize and phase out inefficient fossil fuel subsidies over the medium term, while providing targeted support for the poorest, and report on progress made to our Leaders in Los Cabos. We look forward to the IOSCO progress report on the implementation of its Principles for the Regulation and Supervision of Commodities Derivatives Markets at our next meeting in November. We welcome the consultation by IOSCO on the functioning and oversight of price reporting agencies and look forward to an update on their emerging recommendations for leaders in Los Cabos.

12. We received the preliminary report prepared by the OECD, the World Bank and UN on inserting green growth and sustainable development policies into structural reform agendas and look forward for the final version to be delivered to our Leaders. We welcome G20 countries voluntary self-reporting on current actions to integrate green growth and sustainable development into structural reform agendas.

13. We will continue to work on climate finance with the establishment of a G20 study group to consider ways to effectively mobilize resources and support the operationalization process of the Green Climate Fund taking into account the objectives, provisions and principles of the UNFCCC.

14. We appreciate G20 countries contributions and involvement in promoting Disaster Risk Management (DRM), and welcome the efforts made so far by the World Bank and OECD, with support from the UN to prepare a compilation of country experiences to be presented to our Leaders in Los Cabos, and towards having, by November, a voluntary framework aimed to facilitate the assessment of risk and financial strategies towards implementing DRM.

Statement by the Prime Minister prior to his departure for Mexico to attend the G-20 Summit and Brazil to attend the UN Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20).

New Delhi, June 16, 2012.

Please see Document No. 073
Media Briefing by Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission on G20 Summit.

Los Cabos, June 17, 2012.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Good evening friends and let me welcome you to this media interaction with the Deputy Chairman of the Planning Commission Dr. Montek Singh Ahluwalia. As we mentioned to you, he is also the Sherpa of the Prime Minister for the G20. What we will do is that we will ask the Deputy Chairman to make a few opening remarks, and then he is open to respond to any question that you may have. We hope that this interaction would last for about thirty minutes. With that I invite the Deputy Chairman to make his opening remarks.

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission (Shri Montek Singh Ahluwalia):

Thank you very much. I hope you all have a nice flight because you all look very bright and cheerful, much better than I did when I landed here a couple of days ago.

We are in the middle of the whole process of agreeing on a draft declaration. So, some of the key things are really going to be decided when the leaders meet at the Summit. So, all I can tell you at this point is that attempts are being made to refine issues, attempts are being made to find out how much agreement there is; and obviously people will be referring back to their principals who are only just arriving. I had an opportunity to brief the Prime Minister on whatever the situation in these discussions is only about half an hour ago, and other leaders are just about turning up.

So, I am not in a position to say what is happening in the Summit other than that a lot of very good preparatory work has been done. I think you know all the issues that are going to be at the top of the agenda. Many of them are continuing issues. But the basic thing on the G20 agenda is really what progress we are making in what was originally agreed to be a cooperative global action plan to restore growth and stability.

There is a very extensive process of peer discussion which is aimed at trying to identify what are the policy priorities before the different G20 members in order to achieve the common goal of getting the global economy back to some kind of reasonable growth. I think the general assessment clearly is that the global economy is extremely weak, and so something does need to be said and hopefully even further done. And that is really what the Los Cabos Declaration in the end will hope to do.

I think with those introductory remarks I will be happy to answer questions knowing that none of the questions actually answer what you really want to know which is, what is the declaration going to say? But to clue you in what the issues are, I would be very happy to respond. So, it is your interview.

Question: Since India's economic growth slipped below that of the global financial crisis period - in fact it was at a nine-year low - on that parameter can we assess that this time crisis is much more severe than global financial crisis period? And are the G20 leaders now better equipped to tackle the crisis?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: It is quite clear the financial crisis of 2008 is a very serious crisis, and the initial response to that was actually quite good. And ... (Inaudible)... the feeling was that actually the world would get back to normal. And what we now see is the second crisis. In some ways how serious this crisis is at the moment? It is more market nervousness and uncertainty rather than an actual crisis triggered by lots of weaknesses in the banking system of the Eurozone. We do not know how effectively these weaknesses can be handled. But there is no doubt that if they are not handled, then we will have a second crisis; and that will be more serious in the sense that most countries have exhausted firepower. So, in the first crisis there was, if you like, lot of fiscal room to respond. There is not that much fiscal room to respond now.

Also when you have a first crisis and you respond to it quickly, you kind of bring expectations back to some sort of positive zone. We have a second crisis. It is more difficult to bring expectations back. So, in many ways I agree with the view that this is a more challenging crisis in some ways. I would not say at the moment that it is more serious because we do not know whether it will be managed or not.

Question: Do you think that G20 has any trump card which can encounter the European Union economic crisis? Second, while the G20 Summit is going on and BRICS countries leaders are meeting, what is the agenda? And third, in our country RBI is in a dilemma because inflation is not coming down, and for growth it is much that interest rates should go down. So, what is the option?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: The last question is surely something you should be asking me in New Delhi, of course. I am out of touch with what is happening in the last two days. But let me address the first two.

You may have to remember bits of it because I would not necessarily capture them all. On the issue of whether the G20 has some kind of silver bullet, let us be clear that it is not as if the G20 deploys some firepower which is separate from the established system. I think what you have got is a global recovery that was faltering anyway. And there are lots of weaknesses everywhere. I think most countries were aware of what those weaknesses were and were trying to sort of put themselves in a position where basically they could give a better fillip to growth.
Then you were hit by the possibility of a very serious Eurozone crisis which initially was basically triggered by the uncertainty about what is going to happen in Greece. I assume you are all aware that what has happened in Greek election and the Centre Right party supported by Pasok looks as if they are likely to form a government. The likely elected leadership has made a very strong statement that they want to be within the Euro but that of course everybody was saying; but they also seemed to have made a statement that they want to continue with the programme of reform. Maybe it will get adjusted or not I do not know. So, on the whole, that outcome probably will calm markets a little bit.

But the biggest challenge really to solving the problem of the Eurozone is how the Eurozone is going to respond. It has been the view of all countries - and that is normally the case whenever there is a weakness anywhere - that the country or countries concerned have to respond in a credible manner and that the international community should stand ready to support them. That is basically the principle that is going to be followed here. So, the real issue is, what is it that the Eurozone should do; are they willing to do it?

And really the question of how far the Los Cabos Summit can go is something that you will have to judge from whatever the Declaration says two days from now. But I do not think we should look to these declarations as if they are going to be a detailed group interaction. After all, the Greek Government has just come in and the first statement made by the new Greek leader, which I have heard on TV, looked a bit reassuring. But you have to give them time to see what they are going to do.

The Europeans are going to meet on the 20th and 29th of June. No doubt we will have more detail about what they want to do available by then. So, I think it is not what the G20 is going to do. I think the G20 is creating an environment, providing a sort of global collegial support for the right action in terms of broad directions. People will want to see whether everybody is on the same page. And I think if everybody is on the same page what it means is that the Eurozone knows it is a problem, it is planning to handle it this way, and that the global community stands ready to provide support. It is that kind of outcome that we should expect to see when the leaders meet and discuss and so forth.

Question: The Eurozone question you have answered, but as far as India’s expectations are concerned, the sense that one picks up is that the Prime Minister’s statement on push for infrastructure development at previous summits has not come through as far as the G20 nations being able to deploy their surplus capital for infrastructure. My question at this stage is, as far as India’s expectations are concerned, given our particular economic concerns and the overall need for stability, what do you expect to go back home with?

we are not in a position right now where we have to be looking for any kind of emergency assistance. So, we are not posing to the G20 any specific thing that has to be done for India. We are basically saying, look the most important thing that the G20 can do for India is to put in place a credible reassurance of global financial stability. Because, if that does not happen and if there is contagion in Europe, it will be highly destabilizing given the size of the Europe and the importance of its banking system. So, quite frankly, if we can go back saying, the G20 has given a positive signal which suggests that the Eurozone crisis is likely to be handled well, that is something that we should be quite happy about. So we are not going back with sort of specific things for India, we are going back with an assurance of stability.

We do not actually need any support from the IMF or the World Bank or anything like that. World Bank of course we borrow from every year. But we have not come here looking for those kinds of things. But clearly the Prime Minister's statement on infrastructure, which he made earlier also, I think is finding resonance. It is not the case that we have other countries that have supported our position. We have to wait and see in the Declaration what comes out. But his point really was that, look in a situation where globally demand is weak for a variety of reasons, it makes sense that we should be supporting demand and we should be supporting the kind of demand that is consistent with generating growth in developing countries. That is our concern.

One of the things that has come out is that we have provided, the global community has provided, a huge amount of resources to build up the IMF firewall. That is a good thing because European markets and European banks need it and it is important for stabilization. But what we have been saying is that look, if we are providing so much resources from what are effectively rich countries, should we not also be doing something to strengthen the flow of finance towards developing countries? In that context he said, infrastructure investment is good for developing countries; is good for developing countries in a short run because it gives a demand impetus; it is good for developing countries in a long run because it increases their growth; it is also good for the global economy because in the short run advanced countries will gain from the stimulus because this is not something that would be limited only to domestic demand, and in the long run to the extent to which developing countries grow rapidly that will provide a stimulus to global growth also. So, as we think of it, it is a win-win situation.

Now what we need to get out of the Declaration is a recognition in the Declaration that this is an important point. And then it sends the signals down to the multilateral development banks and other working groups to do something about it. It is not a negotiated outcome where you will get a concrete result. I am hopeful, I should not say anything about the Declaration but I can assure you that we have found a lot of support amongst developing countries virtually universal. And I would also say amongst developed countries there is an appreciation that the this was the sensible thing to do.

Question: Sir, you said all these things about the need of infrastructure. How vulnerable are we, we meaning India when we look at the European Union, the major trading partners? Our IIP is down and the GDP is also down. In that situation, how vulnerable are we?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: It is a very familiar question, because every time I walk out of my office in the Planning Commission this is what they ask me.

I can assure you, after you have spent about half an hour here, my suggestion is you talk to all the other journalists you meet and you tell them that we are really very worried because the Indian growth rate is down to 6.9 per cent. And you will find that they will say, 'What!' very quickly.

Jokes apart, we are obviously concerned. PM has said and everybody else has also said that we have been affected. We clearly said that it is not just a global slowdown though the global slowdown was an important element. There are also domestic constraints which we are trying to address, and we hope that we will be able to address them. But in this environment, if China slows down to 7.5 and India slows down 6.9, they simply view this as the fact that when there is a big global crisis, the emerging markets are not left unaffected, the emerging markets are also affected. I think our own view perhaps is, and that is certainly my view, that a significant part of the slowdown can be attributed to the global downturn; we also have domestic problems that we need to address. But that is not something that is being discussed here.

Question: With Mamata walking out, that appears to be partly addressed.

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: You are all better informed than I am on that.

Question: Are we getting a new Finance Minister?

Question: Are we looking at the new Finance Minister?

Question: You have just mentioned that if G20 basically fails to come up with this positive stability statement for the markets, there is going to be a horrible, horrible outcome for the world. What is the contingency plan in India that is being worked on? There are some reports in the media that there is an entire crisis management group meeting this and next week to analyse the situation. Could you please give us some details about that?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: What management group in India?
Question: Crisis management group. What is the contingency plan in India?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: Contingency plan for a global crisis?

Question: Yes.

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: We expect to succeed in Los Cabos so that the contingency plan ... (inaudible)... But any sensible government always makes plans for extreme or ... (inaudible)... risk events. I am sure that the RBI and all these people have done that. When you say contingency plans, there are two kinds of situations. When you have a completely open capital account, then the contingency plan really has to do with the fact that you might suddenly see a massive, whatever, contraction, withdrawal of deposits. That is not possible in India. There is no point in having a contingency plan about what is going to happen if there is a global crisis and the world economy slows down. We are also thinking about that.

Internally in the Planning Commission right now we are in the last stages of completing our exercise on the 12th Plan. And internally one year ago we had said that we wanted to aim at a nine per cent growth. It is quite clear with what is happening in the global economy and with presently depressed levels of growth, that we cannot be unaware of this. So, we need to rethink for example how will we get back on to the right growth trajectory. So, those kinds of issues are certainly being looked at. More generally, my feeling is that we are not likely to be vulnerable to sudden outflow type of situations. The real question is that if the global economy does not improve, then clearly it has an impact on how rapidly India can grow and we have to build that into our contingency plans.

Question: The December figures put out by the Reserve Bank on credit falling due within one year is towards 137 billion dollars. Now that is the extent of foreign claims on India. If things do not go right, some or a large amount of that money is likely to be – it is going to out anyway but - go out a bit faster than it might otherwise have done. In that context, is there a contingency plan?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: Clearly, as I said, these are the kinds of things that the RBI and the Finance Ministry do, and they are not the kinds of things that the Planning Commission actually gets involved in. But look at it objectively. Yes, there is a debt volume which sort of ... (inaudible)... how much falls due for maturity. But the assumption that we may be hit by that shock actually is based on the assumption that certainly nobody wants to loan any more money to India. If you are a banker looking around the world, sure you would say, well maybe these guys are not on a nine per cent growth trajectory, and could it be that they are really down to seven or even 6.5. But suppose you have made a pessimistic conclusion that they are down to 6.5, then you looked around the other countries and you found that they were all growing, except for China, much more slowly. I am not clear that you would immediately decide to withdraw money from India. I do not think that is really a credible prospect. So, I personally think that both on the external front and on the financing front, we need not be excited to see such a huge, sudden shortage you are thinking of. And let us take an extreme case. Suppose you have such a shock, the reserves can actually take that and you will end up with 137 billion less dollars of debt and still quite a lot of reserves, and there will be very few countries which bankers would not then prefer to lend to because India would look like quite a good bet. Those mechanical calculations are not in my view as alarming as one thinks. It would be quite a different matter by the way if we had 137 billion dollars of short-term debt falling due and 50 billion dollars is reserves. That is all a different ballgame.

Question: Mr. Ahluwalia, can you throw some light on what the suggestions from our side are to overcome this economic crisis?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: Frankly, we are not making specific suggestions. In an inter-governmental meeting, I think decisions are discussed at a pretty high level, I mean aggregated level. First and most important in our view, most of the solutions to the Eurozone problem lies within the Eurozone. We do not view this as a situation where the Eurozone countries have no options and the entire gap that they may be experiencing have to be filled by the IMF. In our view, the answers lie very much in their own hands. And if they are clear about those answers and position themselves giving signals that they are actually going to do that, then there will be a much easier return to calm in the markets. That is different from whether they will get back at growth. You remember, there are two different issues here. The first issue is, are we going to have a banking collapse in the Eurozone, flight of capital, deposits flying out of this country’s banks and that country’s banks as has happened in the case of Greece. The second issue is that we know there would not be a collapse, but will the Europe grow at one per cent or half a per cent or 1.25 per cent? These are two separate issues.

I think that there is no doubt in my mind that Eurozone is perfectly capable of giving clear signals that it is going to prevent a financial collapse. No doubt at all. The ECB has enough firepower. There are a few rules etc., which they have to get around. But I think that if they are clear that they are going to use it, I think they have the ability to do that. The more difficult thing is that having done it, will Europe quickly get back to two plus per cent? Eurozone will experience negative growth in the current year. So, how early will they get back to reasonable growth? That is a big issue. That requires a lot of action.

I think if the leaders’ declaration comes out the way I think it will come out, then there is a very clear indication of what needs to be done in different countries.
Now we have to see finally what is actually said. But you know the logic of the mutual assessment process, which is what the G20 really started, was that for each of the G20 countries there will be an assessment that this is what you have to do in order to bring about restoration of growth in the world economy.

Now the G20 countries are 80 per cent of global GDP. So, there is 20 per cent left outside. But if you are talking about 80 per cent growth of GDP, you are talking about a lot. I think those policies, the longer term policies, will all be there in what will probably get called as Los Cabos Action Plan. The system is one which monitors performance against declared policy commitments. So, I mean the people are making commitments, then they will be monitored and hopefully. When people make commitments in international gatherings, these are not the legal enforceable type of commitments. They do represent a serious indication on the part of government. Each government is in effect making it public that this is what it is going to do that builds up some support domestically, although some opposition but build up that enables them to explain to their electorate that we are going to do this but that is because somebody else is also going to do something else and someone else is doing something else, and all together will be good for the world. So, that is what this mutual assessment process was meant to do. And I think you will see a lot of that in the Los Cabos Action Plan when it is unveiled day after tomorrow.

Question: Dr. Ahluwalia, while we continue to compliment ourselves for the fantastic growth rate, we compare it to the rest of the world, what is certainly a fact - and I would like you to clarify - is that India is way more vulnerable in 2012 than we were in 2008 when we were able to weather the storm. And talking about the firepower that is there with the G20 nations, isn’t it true that India also has a far limited firepower right now to actually battle any worsening global situation, no fiscal room whatsoever to provide any stimulus? In that sense also, isn’t the government continuing to be in denial of the sharp slowdown that we are seeing? Last year we started by talking of nine per cent, we ended at 6.9 per cent. We have a worsening global economic situation with government continuing to talk of 7.6 per cent growth for this fiscal whereas the rest of the world does not seem to think that we will grow at six per cent.

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: I am not aware by the way that the government has said 7.6 for this fiscal. I certainly never said it. I do not believe the Prime Minister said it.

Question: The Budget number is 7.6.

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: These numbers by the way are not what are at the top of the Budget-makers’ minds in the week before the Budget. These numbers come out of the Economic Survey. That document gets finalized sometime ...
Question: But all your revenue calculations would be based on that.

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: I am not disputing that. Let me come to that. First, is the Government in denial? Absolutely no. You do not have to look anywhere beyond the Prime Minister’s own statements. He has categorically said that we have slowdown, we are worried about it, and it is not just due to the global economy. That is why he has been having all these coordination meetings and this and that and the other which we hope are going to lead to some. So, I think you are just factually wrong to say that the Government is in denial.

It is factually correct to say that we have slowed down. That is true. We have slowed down from nine per cent before 2008 to about 6.9 last year. It is also true that the slowdown is more than we thought it would be. But please remember the global slowdown is also more than what anyone thought it will be. Unfortunately, it is not clear why but too much of our own discussions take place without an adequate appreciation of what is happening in the world. If you look at the IMF’s predictions about the world one year ago, and you look at the IMF’s prediction about the world today, there is a huge downgrade in virtually every category.

It is true that we did not forecast 6.9. It is true that the Budget said 7.5. I am not responsible for the short-term forecast. And I have said on a number of occasions that we will be lucky this year if we can be somewhere between 6.5 and seven. And I think that still remains a reasonable range to talk about. Sure, it is much below our long-term target but the world is growing much more slowly.

Of course, if your concern about denial is that the Government does not intend to do anything about it, I think that is not true. I do not know what happened in the last couple of days because I have been out of touch. But certainly in the week before that, the Prime Minister gave the very clear signal, which I think he has repeated what he said before taking off at least what I saw, that they are working to try to make sure that large infrastructure projects remain on track. I think one of the problems is, if you look at the data in India what has really happened is there is a big slowdown in investment. Investment we know is driven by what are called animal spirits. And animal spirits are affected by all kinds of things including the global economy. We cannot do very much about the global economy. But one of the things we can do is to address the nervousness on the part of investors that things are getting stuck, things are not moving, Ministries are not agreeing with each other, etc. That is a genuine problem which I think the Government has acknowledged. It has set up a mechanism to try to resolve. I think there has even been some progress there in the sense that very large projects that were stuck were made to come unstuck. But I think to be fair it will take six months before a fair-minded observer looks back and says yes things really started to move because we have set up these things. How effective the mechanisms are it will take six months.

And I am hopeful that if you interview me six months later and ask this question, even you would be compelled to say that I have to agree that some things move. At least that is what I hope.

Question: Hope we are going to be like the inflation numbers.

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: By the way, let us be clear, I got an inflation number, I made a forecast which turned out to be wrong in the next year. I said this time I am really to be right and I was. And nobody reported that.

By the way, anybody who thinks that making forecasts is a criticism of making forecasts if you get them wrong, then you should not make forecasts. Yogi Berra I think said it is very difficult to make forecasts especially of the future. I think there is a lot of wisdom in that.

Question: Is the vulnerability in 2012 versus 2008 ...(Inaudible)...

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: I agree with you in that. If you mean by vulnerability we have less firepower and less fiscal space, that is absolutely correct. That is also the general problem around the world, one of the weaknesses. That is why quite frankly, my view is that this slowdown cannot be handled by a quick fix, let-us-speed-up-expenditure type of thing. One message that clearly comes out is that fiscal consolidation has to be medium term oriented and not instantaneous. That is not just true of us, that is true of all countries. But we need to look at affecting the underlying factors that determine growth and determine investor expectation and welcome those. It is true that those things take a little bit longer. So, that is where when I said we are looking at what is a reasonable target of the 12th Plan, we are sort of assuming that we are going to take at least two years to try to get back to a reasonable growth rate, and then the average target has to be calibrated around that kind of assumption.

Question: This is the same issue which has been raised by my colleagues. In 2008 we survived the economic depression in some way. Now on the eve of this Los Cabos meet, what kind of reassuring words in the sense that India can insulate ourselves from the G20 or mainly the Eurozone crisis? Are you in a position to give something to people back in India on the eve of the meet tomorrow?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: The name of the game should not be to insulate ourselves. It is really easy to insulate yourselves from the world.

Question: The Prime Minister has categorically said that because there is a trading and business partnership between many European countries and India there is a major concern in India. That is why I am asking, is there any way we can insulate ourselves from this?
Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: It is part of the process of globalizing the economy and benefiting from globalization that you increase the potential vulnerability. The solution is not insulation. The solution is to be able to counter these negative effects. It is very easy to insulate ourselves. Just go back to two per cent growth. So, it is not our objective to insulate ourselves. I think we ought to work on one hand looking at a global solution which will stabilize the global economy and keep markets open. After all even in these countries frankly if it is mismanaged, you can see a rise of protectionism which is not good for them and it is not going to be good for us.

So, on the one hand at the global level what we are trying to do is to create a reassurance that countries are willing to cooperate, countries are willing to work with each other, they should keep their markets open, we keep our markets open, etc., etc., Then we have to counter, we have to protect ourselves. One of the important elements of protection is for example that we have fairly large reserves. Another element of protection is that we do not have a fully convertible capital account. And we have consistently maintained that we want to encourage capital inflows, long-term inflows, FII inflows, but not short-term debt. Otherwise TCA’s point about how many billion dollars would be maturing in a year, the number would be quite different.

So, I would not call this insulating but I would call this calibrating the nature of our globalizing process in a manner where we get a lot of advantages and when there is a downturn globally, we have instruments which can minimize the damage to us. That is what we should be doing.

Question: What is India’s specific message to Europe going to be? Are we going to give them any particular message? Secondly, the Prime Minister a few hours ago said that he hopes that the G-20 will arrive at a constructive solution to what he called the crisis. So, what is the desired outcome in the declaration? As you said, will it just be every country committing itself to certain deliverables, or they will be more specific on that?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: I do not want to prejudge what the Communique will be … (Inaudible)... partly because some of the key elements of it are still being negotiated. But I do want to anchor your expectations a little bit. What is going to happen out of this is not a global agreement to introduce a new global rescue fund of billions of dollars. It is more sort of coming to an agreement on how do you handle this problem. And if all the countries including the Eurozone countries agree that this is how we are going to handle the problem, then financial markets looking at individual countries will get a sense of what they are planning to do.

And you know, since this is a high profile meeting, international meeting, countries are making commitments, leaders are signing on declarations, there is going to be a reasonable expectation that they are going to act the way they said. Now you have to read the declaration and make up your own mind whether it is adding a little bit of information to what is currently being thought to be the likely attitudes or prejudices or knee-jerk reactions of individual countries. I think the key thing here is that countries would be more willing to commit themselves to sensible actions, if they know that all the other countries are actually going to be doing things that are supporting the global effort.

So, it is the totality of what comes out that actually makes sense. Take one of the simpler statements that have been made in the last two or three years by the G20, their promising not to increase protectionist measures. Actually if you think about it, that is quite a major commitment for countries to make. Historically if you go back to the Great Depression, the natural instinct whenever output is down and unemployment is high, the natural instinct is to raise protection. And so far they have avoided it. Here and there some little action may be but by and large there has been no, and this is the assessment of the WTO that although this has been in many ways the worst crisis since whenever the Great Depression and it has gone on now for some time, there has not been a relapse into protectionism. That is a good outcome.

I am sure that if you look at the industrialized countries, the fact that they signed up on these things conditions what is done domestically … (Inaudible)… although these are not legally enforceable. If somebody were to violate these things, there is nothing to do about it. But I do think that governments know that they are being watched by markets; governments know that they will be judged by whether they live up to what they say. And that is true for us also. So, we take very seriously what we sign up to in this and I think other countries do also.

Question: Do not you think this is one of our specific messages to Europe?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: No, this is not a case where India is giving a message. That is a bit presumptuous. I think all of us are giving messages to all of us together. Your best bet is, look at what the Prime Minister said before he left India. Look at what he says in his speech tomorrow, which will be circulated. There have been developments since then, so it would not be exactly I suppose what you said; and then you look at the draft declaration. And if you think that basically the declaration reflects what we have been saying, all we can say. It is not as if we are writing the declaration; twenty other countries are doing the same thing.

The interesting thing is that it is the same message. There was not much point in having a Declaration where page 32 is India’s message to Europe and page 33 is somebody else’s message to Europe. Europe has had enough messages.
The important thing about this ... (Inaudible) ... is that the Europeans are going to sign on to it. And I think we should look to see whether you will think that substantively.

Question: Just continuing from what you said, the Prime Minister would be having a bilateral with Angela Merkel. Will he be asking her to shed her position from austerity to pro-growth position like other governments?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: I do not actually know, in fact the Foreign Secretary will probably know, what the bilaterals are. However, they have lots of coffee sessions in between. So, even if there is not a scheduled bilateral, they will be meeting each other.

Question: The other thing is, IMF in March issued a Debt Assessment Report on Greece which argued that Greece is heading into insolvency because it was not fulfilling the IMF targets. Basically, if I understand correctly, that means the IMF Board has to make a vote as to whether they will continue their programme. Which direction will India vote on those?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: I do not think we have made up our minds on this and I would not even know. Let me say on the issue of Greece, first let us be clear that Greece is a not a member of the G20. Therefore, Greece and its problems are really not the subject of discussion. We of course wish the new Greek government well as we wish all governments that have come in a very difficult time. I think one thing should be very clear. Whatever happens in Greece, its impact on the rest of the world is going to be determined only by the contagion effect on the rest of Europe. I am not saying that what happens in Greece is not important. Greece has a large population, it is very important for them. But it is a small country.

The worry that people have was that any kind of extreme event in Greece would trigger a contagion which would lead to a collapse in the banking system in Europe. That is what would have huge affects around the world. So, most of our discussion is focused on how you stabilize the European financial system. I think it also should be said by the way that to say that the European financial system is that much affected just by Greece is a little unfair to Greece. The fact is, European banking system has come under a lot of stress because you have got huge sovereign debt problems and most of this debt is held by the banks, and the Eurozone countries are not in a position where they are going to grow rapidly. So, in the absence of growth and a very high sovereign debt, there is all sorts of doubts about how you stabilize that situation.

The Greek thing was only a trigger that might sort of lead to a contagion. And that is a genuine worry, and I think it is shared by all G20 countries. And I would hope that the Declaration tomorrow would give a very clear appreciation that this is how the G20 countries assess the situation and this is how they hope to handle it. And G20 here includes all the major countries in Eurozone.

Question: I just want to understand the functioning of G20 in terms that the larger issues which are discussed at G8 ultimately are discussed at G20 because of the larger participation. But what about the concrete steps which are also expected out of G20 like money laundering, black money, tax avoidance, etc. What is happening on that front?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: I think quite a bit. That is a continuing effort but you will see in the Declaration that the G20 has had an initiative basically aimed at disciplining what are called a combination of tax havens and non-conforming jurisdictions, plus the whole issue of money laundering, terrorist financing, etc. There are agreements that are being entered into, tax information sharing agreements. So, these are slowly being put into place and they are useful for countries when they are searching for people evading taxation.

Question: But I think there was a kind of agreement emerging that there will be automatic transfer of tax information so that even banks that... (Inaudible)... to a nonresident would automatically be accounted for. There was a proposal of this nature. Is there any concrete development in that?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: The details of these agreements and how they play out is something that our Revenue Department will be better able to tell you. But there is no doubt that as a result of pressure from the G20, institutionally the degree of exchange of information has improved quite substantially. Now different people have different expectations of what degree of tax information sharing there should be. And that is a legal issue that really has to be sorted out. I think the main issue is that most countries do not agree to what we call a fishing expedition type of exchange of information. But I think if you have actually taken action against someone based on information that you have for tax avoidance, I think we are much better armed today than we were let us say four years ago in trying to get information sharing to take place. Now there may be a few jurisdictions which do not comply with this and pressure is being brought to essentially bring them in line. But otherwise we are getting information that four years ago we were not getting.

Question: Dr. Ahluwalia, when you talk about India’s priorities at the G20 Summit, one thing of course that is coming up time and time again is the Eurozone and the worries around that and also protectionism. Apart from those two, what do you think can be ranked as one of India’s chief concerns at the G20 that Prime Minister Singh is likely to address tomorrow?

And if I can ask a question of Foreign Secretary Matai, could you just tell us a little bit more and confirm what the bilaterals are for Prime Minister Singh? Prime Minister Singh will also be meeting the new French President for the first time. You have served in France as well. What is the focus going to be in terms of that bilateral?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: On India’s concerns, I do not have anything to add. You have got a fair sense of what I think our concerns are.

Foreign Secretary (Shri Ranjan Mathai): The bilaterals tomorrow are with the President of Mexico and with Chancellor Merkel as you have just heard. On the 19th, on Tuesday, he will be meeting the Prime Minister of Canada, Prime Minister of the UK, President of France and President of Russia. You have mentioned of course President of France he will be meeting for the first time. I think the aim would be to confirm the kind of very substantive relationship which has been built up between our two countries. President Hollande has already been in touch with PM through an exchange of letters. But this would be an occasion to catch up with some of the major issues. I presume by then the election results in France would also be out. I think the first indications were that the President’s Socialist Party expects to win a substantial position in the National Assembly there. This would be an occasion I think to go over the main themes in our relationship, very strong relationship in the field of civil nuclear energy, space, counterterrorism, political dialogue. But also it should be an occasion to see what we need to do to advance the trade and economic relationship between the two countries which is still considered to be somewhat below its potential.

Question: Going back to the question that I had asked Dr. Ahluwalia which he had referred to the FS about what will you be asking Mrs. Merkel about …

Foreign Secretary: I think that he has already answered. There are a number of issues which they will be discussing. This is the sixtieth year of our diplomatic relationship with Germany. So, there is a lot going on in the bilateral field. I think some of those issues will be … (Inaudible)…

Question: On the issue of … (Inaudible)… austerity … (Inaudible)…

Foreign Secretary: I think on that the Deputy Chairman has already spoken. We will not be lecturing or proposing anything to any specific leader. But in terms of preferences of how we emerge and get back on to the growth path, I think that is what …

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: I do not know what the public image of different countries is, and I do not want to respond to those images. I think the issue of austerity versus growth is one of the central issues before the G20 because you have a situation where it is very clear that most of these countries have very high sovereign debt. If one country had such a high sovereign debt, there is no doubt in anybody’s mind that they will say you ought to do a little bit of austerity. But when all countries have very high sovereign debt, I think it can be argued that coordinated austerity across the board is not going to lead to a high growth. And I do not think there is any dispute on that. I mean do not think that because …(Inaudible)… style or caricature of position of one lot versus another lot.

This is all a matter of balance. And I think you have to wait for the Communique and try to look at it to see whether as a result of these discussions across countries something more like an agreed, common position has emerged. Nobody ever says by the way that fiscal prudence does not matter. We do not. We do not say that at all and I do not think the Prime Minister has ever said that. But the issue really is that if you have got a globally depressed situation, how do you orchestrate a return to fiscal consolidation? And the general view is, we all do it over the medium-term. Obviously countries that are in very deep trouble need to act more and countries that are not in very deep trouble maybe need to even expand. I mean that is what global rebalancing is all about. So, you need to wait and see what the Communique gives in terms of signals and to what extent does that, I would not say reflect a shift in position, but it might reflect a clarification of positions versus some caricature of position that will be spread in the markets.

Question: That is what you will be telling Merkel?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: No, I am not going to. Prime Minister will be speaking. By the way they have met before and they have very good relations. I very much doubt. There is so much bilateral for them to discuss that I doubt if these sorts of things which are being discussed in the summit as whole will be the principal focus of discussion.

Question: Where do the Chinese stand in all this? What is their position in G20 normally on such issues?

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: I feel uncomfortable, not that there is a problem but it is not proper for me to be speaking for the Chinese. Maybe they are having a press conference and you can ask them.

Question: What is India’s …(Inaudible)...

Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission: I think we have had very good and cooperative, I would say that the Chinese participation in G20 will be very constructive. Actually, if you look at it from their perspective, when G20 began the whole perception was that the biggest imbalance in the world is the China imbalance because they are the ones running huge surpluses and they are the ones whose exchange rate was too depreciated. And I think what they correctly pointed out is that their surpluses were down and their exchange rate is appreciating maybe not as much as some people want but they have certainly moved.

Earlier they were being criticized as wanting to extract an unreasonable amount of growth out of a global economy that could not support such growth without causing problems to others, and they have lowered their growth target. So, I think you could argue that if the name of the game was bringing about global balancing, the Chinese have in fact done what most people wanted. Now if you go into it in more detail and find for example more here and less there, etc. But I do not think their view is different from ours in the sense that in the main issues that I raise that the Eurozone crisis is an extremely important crisis, it is not just a European problem, bulk of the solution lies in the hands of Europe, but the global community must stand ready to support a credible European effort. I think like us they also feel that there has been a lot of focus on crises that actually are at the moment focused on richer countries. And in this process the needs of the developing countries which we talk about and they talk about I think they need to be given more attention. I think we are on the same page on all this.

Question: In the context of the telephone call which the US President had with our PM last week, is there a likelihood of a bilateral at the current summit?

Foreign Secretary: We have not scheduled one. But the possibility that they will meet on the margins and speak as they say either a pull aside or something, that is always open. But nothing has been scheduled.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much, ladies and gentlemen. With that we come to the end of this discussion.
Mr. President,

Let me begin by thanking you for the warmth of your hospitality and the excellent arrangements made for this Summit.

The global economic situation is deeply worrying. The economic recovery is faltering and even the fast growing emerging markets are slowing down. This calls for policy action on several fronts. Of greatest concern at present is the uncertainty affecting the Eurozone. The sovereign debt crisis and the banking crisis now on the horizon have grave implications for the health of the entire global economy.

A new government in Greece is about to take office. We wish them well and are encouraged by the early statements of intent.

However, the risks of contagion in Europe remain because they reflect weaknesses in the banking sector arising from excessive sovereign debt and low growth prospects. A crisis in the European banking system can choke trade finance quite quickly, and end up choking economic growth not just in the Eurozone but in the world in general.

This Summit needs to send a strong signal to the markets that the Eurozone countries will make every effort to protect the banking systems and the global community will back a credible Eurozone effort and response.

However, there are some problems I would like to mention.

There is concern that the firewall available may not be adequate to deal with contagion. The resources currently expected to be mobilized by Europe and the IMF are less than was estimated a year ago, and the crisis is actually more serious.

Part of the solution lies in providing liquidity to cope with loss of market confidence. But liquidity does not help when solvency is in question. To address this problem, liquidity must be provided in parallel with effective adjustment programmes that ensure an early return to debt sustainability. The adjustment programme adopted should lead to an acceleration of growth, so that countries can grow out of the debt trap.

This brings me to the contentious issue of the relationship between austerity and growth. It can be argued that austerity now will lay the basis for sustained... growth later. But there is also an alternative view that with growth impulses as seriously weakened as they are today, synchronized austerity across many countries may not be the right medicine.

Financial markets normally favour austerity, but even they are beginning to recognize that austerity with no growth will not produce a return to a sustainable debt position.

I am not suggesting that fiscal prudence is not important. I am only saying that given the large adjustment needs, not all of it can be front-loaded everywhere. This is especially relevant within a currency area. Austerity in the debt-ridden members of the Eurozone can work only if surplus members are willing to expand to offset contraction elsewhere in the currency area.

The International Monetary Fund has a critical supportive role to play in stabilizing the Eurozone. All members must help the Fund to play this role. I am happy to announce that India has decided to contribute $10 billion to the IMF’s additional firewall of $430 billion.

Mr. President,

While many rich countries face difficulties, the less developed and developing countries are also facing serious problems because of the negative impact of the global crisis. Infrastructure investment in developing countries assumes special importance in this context. It lays the foundation for rapid growth in the longer term, while providing an immediate stimulus for their economies and also for the global economy, by providing a robust source of demand.

An expansion of investment in infrastructure in developing countries is only possible if they can get access to long term capital to finance such investment. This is difficult at a time when capital flows are disrupted. The Multilateral Development Banks can play a major role in this context.

We have expanded the resources of the IMF enormously, largely to support programmes in rich countries. We now need to take steps to substantially expand the resource base of Multilateral Development Banks so that they have the firepower to help developing countries pursue their development goals. The G-20 Framework Working Group and the Financial Stability Board could examine how to enhance investment in infrastructure through country commitments and incentives in the regulatory framework.

Mr. President, let me say that I believe that the G-20 agenda is getting over burdened. We need to refocus on a few goals rather than dissipating energies on too many fronts.

Like other emerging economies, India too has slowed down. The global downturn and especially the impact on capital flows have played their part. Internal constraints have also affected performance and we are working to correct them.

Our growth rate in 2011-12 declined to 6.5% from the level of 8.4% in the previous year. This may look like a reasonable figure, given growth rates being experienced in the rest of the world, but our public is impatient for a return to high growth and faster jobs creation. The fundamentals of the Indian economy remain strong and we are confident of bringing back the rhythm of high growth of 8-9% per annum.

Investment has been affected by the adverse global climate which impacts both foreign and domestic investors. We are taking steps to revive investor sentiment. We are determined to create an environment that would boost investor sentiment and promote an atmosphere conducive to enterprise and creativity. Our policies will be transparent, stable and designed to provide a level playing field to both domestic and foreign investors.

We are focussing heavily on infrastructure investment and in this context we have set ambitious targets to keep infrastructure investment on track and also put in place a problem resolution mechanism to overcome implementation bottlenecks.

Like other countries, we too allowed the fiscal deficit to expand after 2008 to impart a stimulus. We are now focussing on reversing the expansion. This will require tough decisions, including on controlling subsidies, which we are determined to take.

In this context, I would like to mention a landmark effort underway in India to provide unique identity numbers for all residents with capture of biometric data. This massive database covering over a billion people will facilitate delivery of a whole range of financial and other services, through effective targeting and reduced leakages in subsidy schemes.

Thank you.
160.  Prime Minister’s Statement at Second Plenary session of G-20 Leaders on “Strengthening the international financial architecture and the financial system and promoting financial inclusion”.

Los Cabos, June 19, 2012.

We welcome the efforts to strengthen the IMF resources and as I announced yesterday, we will contribute US$ 10 billion.

I must point out however that progress in quota reform is proceeding more slowly than raising resources. I recognise that there are practical reasons why the quota reform agreed in 2010 will not be completed by the end of 2012, but it must be done expeditiously thereafter.

It is also important that the quota review schedule for January 2013 is completed in time. Quotas must reflect economic weights, in a manner that is simple and transparent.

These objectives can be best achieved by recognizing the predominant role of GDP on PPP basis in the formula without going into other variables. This basic position should not be compromised in any way and we need to reiterate our position strongly.

I welcome the progress made in financial regulatory reform. However much remains to be done. We discussed the need to move towards a banking union in Europe to help strengthen financial stability.

I am also concerned that prudential rules adopted in banking regulation do not discriminate against lending to developing countries.

161. Prime Minister’s statement to the Media at the conclusion of the G20 Summit in Los Cabos

Los Cabos (Mexico), June 19, 2012.

The G-20 Summit took place in very difficult circumstances. Faltering growth in most countries was overshadowed by the threat of uncertainty in the Eurozone arising from a combination of excessive sovereign debt combined with banking weakness. The Summit provided a very valuable opportunity for G-20 leaders to share their concerns.

My speech at the G-20 has been circulated and it indicates our view. My overall assessment of the meeting is that there was general agreement that policy in all countries must shift to strengthening growth. There are many things that have to be done to achieve this, but there was also general agreement that the most urgent problem we must tackle is to reduce uncertainty about the Eurozone.

Eurozone leaders have assured us that they are firmly committed to protecting the integrity of the Euro Area. They recognize the need to move beyond the present monetary union towards unified banking supervision and adoption of common and enforceable fiscal rules. However, this will necessarily be a gradual process. Making changes in treaties involving 17 Parliaments in the case of the Eurozone, and 27 in the case of the E.U., is a time consuming process. Eurozone leaders indicated their strong commitment to take whatever action is needed to protect the Euro-area as the longer term institutional structures are built up. They will be able to give more specific indications after the European Summit on 28th or 29th June. They also indicated their determination to push through structural reforms in both product and labour markets to enhance competitiveness.

The G-20 countries have responded to the need to enhance the resources of the IMF to enable it to play its role in the current situation. India has contributed $10 billion. BRICS and other countries have also contributed, taking the total commitments, including what was earlier agreed in April, to almost $460 billion. India’s contribution reflects our recognition that as a responsible player in the global community, we must play our part. The amount we contribute is entirely liquid, in the sense that the Fund assures contributors that it will be available whenever needed. It will, therefore, continue to form part of our reserves.

Many leaders emphasized the importance of accelerating governance reforms in the IMF, including a change in the quota formula to reflect economic weight.

The Summit also reiterated the standstill on new protectionist measures and extended it beyond the earlier commitment up to 2013 to 2014. This is an important statement of intent by the G-20 leaders to resist protectionist tendencies, which typically increase in periods of high unemployment and low growth.
The Los Cabos Declaration fully reflects our initiative that investment on infrastructure in developing countries can play a major role in strengthening development and in stimulating global recovery. The Declaration indicates that Multilateral Development Banks should be strengthened for this purpose. We would work with G-20 countries to transform their commitment to specific action.

The Summit also discussed a number of other important issues including especially the progress in regulatory reform, issue of food security and agricultural productivity, anti-corruption measures and issues related to green growth.

1. We, the Leaders of the G20, convened in Los Cabos on 18-19 June 2012.
2. We are united in our resolve to promote growth and jobs.
3. Since we last met, the global recovery has continued to face a number of challenges. Financial market tensions are high. External, fiscal and financial imbalances are still prevalent, having a major impact on growth and employment prospects and confidence. Clearly, the global economy remains vulnerable, with a negative impact on the everyday lives of people all over the world, affecting jobs, trade, development, and the environment.
4. We will act together to strengthen recovery and address financial market tensions.
5. We will work collectively to strengthen demand and restore confidence with a view to support growth and foster financial stability in order to create high quality jobs and opportunities for all of our citizens. We have agreed today on a coordinated Los Cabos Growth and Jobs Action Plan to achieve those goals.
6. Euro Area members of the G20 will take all necessary policy measures to safeguard the integrity and stability of the area, improve the functioning of financial markets and break the feedback loop between sovereigns and banks. We look forward to the Euro Area working in partnership with the next Greek government to ensure they remain on the path to reform and sustainability within the Euro Area.
7. We are implementing our structural and regulatory reform agenda to enhance medium-term growth prospects and build more resilient financial systems. We remain committed to reduce imbalances by strengthening deficit countries’ public finances with sound and sustainable policies that take into account evolving economic conditions and, in countries with large current account surpluses, by strengthening domestic demand and moving toward greater exchange rate flexibility.
8. Despite the challenges we all face domestically, we have agreed that multilateralism is of even greater importance in the current climate, and remains our best asset to resolve the global economy’s difficulties.
9. Recognizing the impact of the continuing crisis on developing countries, particularly low income countries, we will intensify our efforts to create a more conducive environment for development, including supporting infrastructure investment. Our policy actions will improve living conditions across the globe and protect the most vulnerable. In particular, by stabilizing global markets and promoting stronger growth, we will generate significant positive effects on development and poverty reduction across the globe.
Supporting economic stabilization and the global recovery

10. Strong, sustainable and balanced growth remains the top priority of the G20, as it leads to higher job creation and increases the welfare of people across the world. We are committed to adopting all necessary policy measures to strengthen demand, support global growth and restore confidence, address short and medium-term risks, enhance job creation and reduce unemployment, as reflected in the Los Cabos Growth and Jobs Action Plan (see Annex). We will implement all our commitments in a timely manner and rigorously monitor their implementation.

11. Against the background of renewed market tensions, Euro Area members of the G20 will take all necessary measures to safeguard the integrity and stability of the area, improve the functioning of financial markets and break the feedback loop between sovereigns and banks. We welcome the significant actions taken since the last summit by the Euro Area to support growth, ensure financial stability and promote fiscal responsibility as a contribution to the G20 framework for strong, sustainable and balanced growth. In this context, we welcome Spain’s plan to recapitalize its banking system and the Eurogroup’s announcement of support for Spain’s financial restructuring authority. The adoption of the Fiscal Compact and its ongoing implementation, together with growth-enhancing policies and structural reform and financial stability measures, are important steps towards greater fiscal and economic integration that lead to sustainable borrowing costs. The imminent establishment of the European Stability Mechanism is a substantial strengthening of the European firewalls. We fully support the actions of the Euro Area in moving forward with the completion of the Economic and Monetary Union. Towards that end, we support the intention to consider concrete steps towards a more integrated financial architecture, encompassing banking supervision, resolution and recapitalization, and deposit insurance. Euro Area members will foster intra Euro Area adjustment through structural reforms to strengthen competitiveness in deficit countries and to promote demand and growth in surplus countries. The European Union members of the G20 are determined to move forward expeditiously on measures to support growth including through completing the European Single Market and making better use of European financial means, such as the European Investment Bank (EIB), pilot project bonds, and structural and cohesion funds, for more targeted investment, employment, growth and competitiveness, while maintaining the firm commitment to implement fiscal consolidation to be assessed on a structural basis. We look forward to the Euro Area working in partnership with the next Greek government to ensure they remain on the path to reform and sustainability within the Euro Area.

12. All G20 members will take the necessary actions to strengthen global growth and restore confidence. Advanced economies will ensure that the pace of fiscal consolidation is appropriate to support the recovery, taking country-specific circumstances into account and, in line with the Toronto commitments, address concerns about medium term fiscal sustainability. Those advanced and emerging economies which have fiscal space will let the automatic fiscal stabilizers to operate taking into account national circumstances and current demand conditions. Should economic conditions deteriorate significantly further, those countries with sufficient fiscal space stand ready to coordinate and implement discretionary fiscal actions to support domestic demand, as appropriate. In many countries, higher investment in education, innovation and infrastructure can support the creation of jobs now while raising productivity and future growth prospects. Recognizing the need to pursue growth-oriented policies that support demand and recovery, the United States will calibrate the pace of its fiscal consolidation by ensuring that its public finances are placed on a sustainable long-run path so that a sharp fiscal contraction in 2013 is avoided.

13. Monetary policy will maintain price stability over the medium term while continuing to support the economic recovery. We will strengthen confidence in our banks, maintaining momentum on the financial sector reforms needed to safeguard our financial systems over the medium term while taking appropriate actions to protect credit channels and the integrity of the global payment and settlement systems. Healthy banks, with an ability to lend, are critical to the global recovery.

14. G20 members will remain vigilant of the evolution of oil prices and will stand ready to carry out additional actions as needed, including the commitment by producing countries to continue to ensure an appropriate level of supply consistent with demand. We welcome Saudi Arabia’s readiness to mobilize, as necessary, existing spare capacity to ensure adequate supply. We will also remain vigilant of other commodity prices.

15. A number of emerging markets are now also experiencing a slowdown in growth. In response, these countries are appropriately directing monetary and fiscal policies to support growth while ensuring stability and, in some cases, introducing new measures to boost their economies, in particular through strengthening domestic demand in a context of weaker external demand.

16. We welcome progress by countries with large current account surpluses to increase domestic demand and actions by countries with large current account deficits to increase national savings. Emerging surplus economies will carry out further actions to increase domestic consumption, including by removing price and tax distortions and strengthening social safety nets, while advanced surplus economies or those with relatively weak private demand will promote domestic demand, notably through the liberalization of service sectors and the promotion of investment, including through the removal of inefficiencies. Higher national savings in countries with current account deficits will contribute to a lasting reduction in global imbalances. We recognize the special circumstances of large commodity exporters with regard to current account surpluses. We reaffirm our commitment to move more rapidly toward market-determined exchange rate systems and exchange rate flexibility to reflect underlying fundamentals, avoid persistent exchange rate misalignments, and refrain from competitive devaluation of currencies. We also welcome the commitment by China to allow market forces to play a larger role in determining movements in the Renminbi (RMB), continue to reform its exchange rate regime, and to increase the transparency of its exchange rate policy.

17. All G20 members have put forward structural reform commitments to strengthen and sustain global demand, foster job creation, contribute to global rebalancing and increase growth potential. These include product market reforms to increase competition, measures to stabilize the housing sector, labor market reforms to boost competitiveness and employment, as well as steps to strengthen social safety nets in a way that is fiscally responsible, advance tax reform to raise productivity, increase investment in infrastructure, and promote inclusive green growth and sustainable development as appropriate to country circumstances. We ask Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors to consider ways in which the G20 can foster investment in infrastructure and ensure the availability of sufficient funding for infrastructure projects, including Multilateral Development Banks’ (MDBs) financing and technical support.

18. In all policy areas, we commit to minimize the negative spillovers on other countries of policies implemented for domestic purposes. We reaffirm our shared interest in a strong and stable international financial system. While capital flows can be beneficial to recipient economies, we reiterate that excess volatility of financial flows and disorderly movements in exchange rates have adverse implications for economic and financial stability.

19. Recognizing the importance of transparency and accountability in reinforcing credibility and confidence, we have agreed on the Los Cabos Accountability Assessment Framework that accompanies the Growth and Jobs Action Plan. This Framework establishes the procedures we will follow to report on progress in implementing our policy commitments. We welcome the first Accountability Report under this new framework. We task our Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors to present the second Accountability Report for the Leaders’ Summit in St. Petersburg in 2013.

Employment and Social Protection

20. Quality employment is at the heart of our macroeconomic policies. Jobs with labor rights, social security coverage and decent income contribute to more stable growth, enhance social inclusion and reduce poverty. We therefore endorse the recommendations of our Labor and Employment Ministers to urgently combat unemployment through appropriate labor market measures and fostering the creation of decent work and quality jobs, particularly for youth and other vulnerable groups, who have been severely hit by the economic crisis. We reaffirm our commitment to youth to facilitate their access to quality jobs, which will boost their life prospects. We welcome the work of the G20 Task Force on Employment and extend its mandate for an additional year in the terms proposed by our Ministers. Consistent with the Los Cabos Growth and Jobs Action Plan, we consider that structural reforms, in full respect of the fundamental principles and rights at work, can play an important role in lifting economic growth to generate labor market opportunities, mobility and jobs. We also commit to intensify our efforts to strengthen cooperation in education, skills development and training policies, including internship and on-the-job training, which support a successful school-to-work transition.

21. Creating jobs and reducing unemployment, particularly among our youth and those most affected by the crisis, is central to all our countries. We welcome the report by the International Labour Organization (ILO), Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), International Monetary Fund
(IMF) and World Bank on boosting jobs and living standards in G20 countries.
We will continue to focus on measures to accelerate the pace of the recovery in jobs and the reduction in unemployment.

22. We recognize the importance of establishing nationally determined social protection floors. We will continue to foster inter-agency and international policy coherence, coordination, cooperation and knowledge sharing to assist low-income countries in capacity building for implementing nationally determined social protection floors. We ask international organizations to identify policy options with low-income countries on how to develop effective sustainable protection floors.

23. We commit to take concrete actions to overcome the barriers hindering women’s full economic and social participation and to expand economic opportunities for women in G20 economies. We also express our firm commitment to advance gender equality in all areas, including skills training, wages and salaries, treatment in the workplace, and responsibilities in care-giving.

24. We ask our Labor Ministers to review progress made on this agenda and we welcome consultations with social partners. In this regard, we appreciate the contribution of the Business-20 (B20) and Labor-20 (L20) to the process of the G20 under the Mexican Presidency.

25. We recognize the role of travel and tourism as a vehicle for job creation, economic growth and development, and, while recognizing the sovereign right of States to control the entry of foreign nationals, we will work towards developing travel facilitation initiatives in support of job creation, quality work, poverty reduction and global growth.

Trade

26. We are firmly committed to open trade and investment, expanding markets and resisting protectionism in all its forms, which are necessary conditions for sustained global economic recovery, jobs and development. We underline the importance of an open, predictable, rules-based, transparent multilateral trading system and are committed to ensure the centrality of the World Trade Organization (WTO).

27. Recognizing the importance of investment for boosting economic growth, we commit to maintaining a supportive business environment for investors.

28. We are deeply concerned about rising instances of protectionism around the world. Following up our commitment made in Cannes, we reaffirm our standstill commitment until the end of 2014 with regard to measures affecting trade and investment, and our pledge to roll back any new protectionist measure that may have arisen, including new export restrictions and WTO-inconsistent measures to stimulate exports. We also undertake to notify in a timely manner trade and investment restrictive measures. We uphold the inventory and monitoring work of the WTO, OECD and United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) on trade and investment measures and encourage them to reinforce and deepen the work in these areas, consistent with their respective mandates.

29. We value the discussion held by our Trade Ministers in Puerto Vallarta on the relevance of regional and global value chains to world trade, recognizing their role in fostering economic growth, employment and development and emphasizing the need to enhance the participation of developing countries in such value chains. We encourage a deepening of these discussions in the WTO, UNCTAD and OECD within their respective mandates, and we call on them to accelerate their work on analyzing the functioning of global value chains and their relationship with trade and investment flows, development and jobs, as well as on how to measure trade flows, to better understand how our actions affect our countries and others, and to report on progress under Russia’s Presidency.

30. In line with the Cannes Communiqué, we stand by the Doha Development Agenda mandate and reaffirm our commitment to pursue fresh, credible approaches to furthering trade negotiations across the board. We will continue to work towards concluding the Doha Round negotiations, including outcomes in specific areas where progress is possible, such as trade facilitation, and other issues of concern for least developed countries. We urge progress in streamlining WTO accession procedures for the world’s poorest countries.
31. We support strengthening the WTO through improving the way it conducts its regular business, and its dispute settlement system. We also direct our representatives to further discussions on challenges and opportunities for the multilateral trading system in a globalized economy.

Strengthening the international financial architecture

32. We recognize the importance of effective global and regional safety nets. We welcome the firm commitments to increase the resources available to the IMF. This is the result of a broad international cooperative effort that includes a significant number of countries. The commitments exceed $450 billion and are in addition to the quota increase under the 2010 Reform. These resources will be available for the whole membership of the IMF, and not earmarked for any particular region. These resources, which qualify as reserve assets, would be channeled through bilateral loans and investments such as note purchase agreements to the IMF’s General Resources Account under the modalities which have been approved by the IMF Executive Board. This effort shows the G20 and the international community’s commitment to take the steps needed to safeguard global financial stability and enhance the IMF’s role in crisis prevention and resolution.

33. We reaffirm our commitment to implement in full the 2010 Quota and Governance Reform by the agreed date of the 2012 IMF/World Bank Annual Meetings. These reforms are crucial to enhancing the IMF’s legitimacy, relevance and effectiveness, and will support efforts to further strengthen Fund surveillance and to ensure that the IMF is adequately resourced to play its systemic role. As part of these reforms, we are committed to completing the comprehensive review of the quota formula, to address deficiencies and weaknesses in the current quota formula, by January 2013 and to complete the next general review of quotas by January 2014. We agree that the formula should be simple and transparent, consistent with the multiple roles of quotas, result in calculated shares that are broadly acceptable to the membership, and be feasible to implement based on timely, high quality and widely available data. We reaffirm that the distribution of quotas based on the formula should better reflect the relative weights of IMF members in the world economy, which have changed substantially in view of strong GDP growth in dynamic emerging markets and developing countries. We reaffirm the importance of continuing to protect the voice and representation of the poorest members of the IMF. We ask our Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors to review progress on this issue when they meet in November.

34. We agreed that the current surveillance framework should be significantly enhanced, including through a better integration of bilateral and multilateral surveillance with a focus on global, domestic and financial stability, including spillovers from countries’ policies. We welcome the work of the IMF to advance considerations for a proposed integrated surveillance decision and commit to support the decision process. We underscore the importance of rigorous surveillance on exchange rate policies and support a more ample coverage of surveillance activities, where relevant, including global liquidity, capital flows, capital account measures, reserve and fiscal, monetary and financial sector policies that could have an impact on external stability. We welcome the IMF’s ongoing work to produce an external sector report, which would strengthen multilateral analysis and enhance the transparency of surveillance. We also recognize that political ownership and traction is critical to effective surveillance, and that the International Monetary and Financial Committee (IMFC) has a role in facilitating the active involvement of all IMF members. We look forward to substantial progress by the next IMF/World Bank Annual Meetings.

35. We welcome the interim progress report and look forward to the joint annual progress report to support the development of local currency bond markets to be prepared by the World Bank, Regional Development Banks, IMF, OECD and the Bank of International Settlements (BIS). The full report will be presented at the November meeting of G20 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors. This issue is of great importance to emerging markets and developing countries, recognizing that the liquidity, efficiency and operation of these markets are being challenged by the current global financial situation.

Reforming the financial sector and fostering financial inclusion

36. We welcome the progress report by the Financial Stability Board (FSB) on taking forward the G20 commitments for strengthening financial stability and the FSB’s enhanced monitoring of implementation at the national level. We are committed to the timely, full and consistent implementation of agreed policies in order to support a stable and integrated global financial system and to prevent future crises.

37. We welcome the publication of the traffic lights scoreboard to track progress in the implementation of all our financial reform recommendations and pledge to take all necessary actions to make progress in the areas where difficulties in policy development or implementation have been identified.

38. In particular, we recognize the substantial progress to date in the priority reform areas identified by the FSB’s Coordination Framework for Implementation Monitoring (CFIM): the Basel capital and liquidity framework; the framework for global systemically important financial institutions (GSIFIs), resolution regimes, over-the-counter (OTC) derivatives reforms, shadow banking, and compensation practices. We commit to complete work in these important areas to achieve full implementation of reforms.
39. We reaffirm our commitment that all standardized OTC derivative contracts should be traded on exchanges or electronic trading platforms, where appropriate, and cleared through central counterparties by end-2012. OTC derivative contracts should be reported to trade repositories and non-centrally cleared contracts should be subject to higher capital requirements. We welcome the FSB progress report on implementation. Now that substantial progress has been achieved in the four safeguards for a resilient and efficient global framework for central clearing, jurisdictions should rapidly finalize their decision-making and put in place the needed legislation and regulations to meet the G20 commitment for central clearing. We acknowledge the progress made to develop the key principles to promote internationally consistent minimum standards for the margining of non-centrally cleared derivatives and encourage international standard setters to finalize the proposed global margin standards by the end of this year, to match the implementation deadline for other OTC derivatives reforms and for the Basel capital framework.

40. We welcome progress in implementing Basel II, 2.5 and III and urge jurisdictions to fully implement the standards according to the agreed timelines. We welcome the Basel Committee’s consultative proposals for a fundamental review of the market risk framework. We welcome the FSB’s progress report on the implementation of the principles and standards for sound compensation practices, reaffirm our commitment to ensure that these are followed and ask the FSB to continue its ongoing monitoring.

41. We reiterate our commitment to make our national resolution regimes consistent with the FSB Key Attributes of Effective Resolution Regimes so that no bank or other financial institution is “too big to fail”. To this end, we also support the ongoing elaboration of recovery and resolution plans and institution-specific cross-border cooperation agreements for all G-SIFIs. We reiterate our commitment to strengthen the intensity and effectiveness of the supervision of SIFIs and ask the FSB to report on further progress in this area to the November 2012 G20 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors’ meeting.

42. We welcome progress on developing a set of principles as a common framework for the identification of, and policy measures relating to, domestic systemically important banks (D-SIBs) and ask our Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors to review recommendations in these areas at their meeting in November. We support continuing work for the strengthening of the oversight and regulation of the shadow banking system, and look forward to our Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors reviewing recommendations in these areas at their meeting in November. We ask the FSB in consultation with the International Association of Insurance Supervisors (IAIS) to complete their work on identification and policy measures for global systemically important insurers by April 2013. Towards reducing systemic risk, we look forward to the preparation by the FSB in consultation with International Organization of Securities...
Commissions (IOSCO) of methodologies to identify other systemically important non-bank financial entities by end-2012 and call on Committee on Payment and Settlement Systems (CPSS) and IOSCO to continue their work on systemically important market infrastructures. We also ask the IAIS to continue its work to develop a common framework for the supervision of internationally active insurance groups by end-2013.

43. We call for accelerated progress by national authorities and standard setting bodies in ending the mechanistic reliance on credit ratings and encourage steps that would enhance transparency of and competition among credit rating agencies. We support continuing work to achieve convergence to a single set of high-quality accounting standards. We welcome IOSCO’s report on the functioning of the credit default swap markets and ask IOSCO to report on next steps by the November 2012 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors’ meeting.

44. We endorse the FSB recommendations regarding the framework for development of a global legal entity identifier (LEI) system for parties to financial transactions, with a global governance framework representing the public interest. The LEI system will be launched by March 2013 and we ask the FSB to report on implementation progress by the November 2012 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors’ meeting. We encourage global adoption of the LEI to support authorities and market participants in identifying and managing financial risks.

45. We welcome the FSB study, prepared in coordination with the IMF and the World Bank, to identify potential unintended consequences of the agreed financial regulatory reforms for Emerging Markets and Developing Economies (EMDEs). We encourage continued monitoring analysis and reporting by the FSB and dialogue among the FSB, standard-setters, international financial institutions and national authorities of EMDEs, to address material unintended consequences as appropriate without prejudice to our commitment to implement the agreed reforms.

46. We endorse the recommendations and the revised FSB Charter for placing the FSB on an enduring organizational footing, with legal personality, strengthened governance, greater financial autonomy and enhanced capacity to coordinate the development and implementation of financial regulatory policies, while maintaining strong links with the BIS. We call for a full implementation of the recommendations by our next meeting and substantial progress by the November 2012 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors’ meeting. We call on the FSB to continue to keep under review the structure of its representation.

47. We welcome the ongoing work by the FSB on adherence to supervisory and regulatory information exchange and cooperation standards and look forward to a further public statement on progress under the initiative ahead of the Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors’ meeting in November 2012.

48. In the tax area, we reiterate our commitment to strengthen transparency and comprehensive exchange of information. We commend the progress made as reported by the Global Forum and urge all countries to fully comply with the standard and implement the recommendations identified in the course of the reviews, in particular the 13 jurisdictions whose framework does not allow them to qualify to phase 2 at this stage. We expect the Global Forum to quickly start examining the effectiveness of information exchange practices and to report to us and our finance ministers. We welcome the OECD report on the practice of automatic information exchange, where we will continue to lead by example in implementing this practice. We call on countries to join this growing practice as appropriate and strongly encourage all jurisdictions to sign the Multilateral Convention on Mutual Administrative Assistance. We also welcome the efforts to enhance interagency cooperation to tackle illicit flows including the outcomes of the Rome meeting of the Oslo Dialogue. We reiterate the need to prevent base erosion and profit shifting and we will follow with attention the ongoing work of the OECD in this area.

49. We support the renewal of the Financial Action Task Force (FATF) mandate, thereby sustaining global efforts to combat money laundering and the financing of terrorism and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. G20 members also welcome the adoption of the revised FATF standards and look forward to their implementation. We welcome the progress made by FATF in identifying and monitoring high-risk jurisdictions with strategic Anti-Money Laundering/Counter-Terrorist Financing (AML/CFT) deficiencies, using AML/CFT tools in the fight against corruption, improving transparency of corporate vehicles and increasing cooperation against tax crimes, addressing the risks posed by tax havens, as well as in increasing the reach and the effectiveness of AML/CFT measures by also considering financial inclusion efforts. We look forward to the completion in 2013 of the update of the FATF assessment process for the next round of mutual evaluations.

50. We welcome the progress made by the Global Partnership for Financial Inclusion (GPFI) on implementing the five recommendations set out in its 2011 report and call on the GPFI to continue working towards their full implementation. We endorse the G20 Basic Set of financial inclusion indicators developed by the GPFI. Recognizing the key role that SMEs play in economic development, and poverty reduction, we welcome the launch of the SME Finance Compact that will support developing innovative models and approaches to address the specific access to finance challenges and constraints faced by developing countries with regards to SME finance. We welcome the forthcoming GPFI conference on standard setting bodies and financial inclusion as a means of helping to create an enabling regulatory environment, and we call on the GPFI to report progress to our Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors in November. Finally, we support the ongoing effort to create a fourth GPFI subgroup that will focus on consumer protection and financial literacy issues.
51. We acknowledge the efforts of those G20 and non-G20 countries committed to national coordination platforms and strategies for financial inclusion under the “G20 Financial Inclusion Peer Learning Program” and encourage similar efforts to advance effective implementation of the G20 Principles for Innovative Financial Inclusion such as the commitments to concrete actions to promote financial inclusion made by developing and emerging countries under the Maya Declaration, recognizing the ongoing efforts and the support by the World Bank Group and the Alliance for Financial Inclusion, and other stakeholders including the United Nations (UN), and bilateral donators to foster financial inclusion.

52. On financial education, we endorse the OECD/International Network on Financial Education (INFE) High Level Principles on National Strategies for Financial Education, and call on the OECD/INFE and the World Bank in cooperation with the GPF I to deliver further tools to promote financial education, with a progress report to the next Summit. For advancing the financial consumer protection agenda, we take note of the discussion on the Statutes of the International Financial Consumer Protection Network (FinCoNet) and on the issues of formal structure and financial support to ensure the exchange of best practices. We also endorse the Action Plan presented by the G20/OECD Task Force on Financial Consumer Protection to develop effective approaches to support the implementation of the High Level Principles on Financial Consumer Protection, and look forward to an update report by the Leaders’ Summit in St. Petersburg in 2013.

53. We recognize the need for women and youth to gain access to financial services and financial education, ask the GPF I, the OECD/INFE, and the World Bank to identify barriers they may face and call for a progress report to be delivered by the next Summit.

54. We welcome the launch of the Mexico Financial Inclusion Challenge: Innovative Solutions for Unlocking Access, a call for innovations that address barriers to financial inclusion through the creation of valuable, affordable, secure, and comprehensive financial services. Enhancing food security and addressing commodity price volatility.

55. The Action Plan on Food Price Volatility and Agriculture adopted by the Ministers of Agriculture in 2011 underlined that to feed a world population expected to exceed 9.3 billion by 2050, agricultural production will have to increase between 50 and 70 percent, and by almost 100 percent in developing countries. We recognize that increasing production and productivity on a sustainable basis while considering the diversity of agricultural conditions is one of the most important challenges that the world faces today. The crisis in the Sahel and the Horn of Africa also underscores that strengthening emergency and long-term responses to food insecurity remains a pressing challenge. We also note that chronic malnutrition is an enormous drain on a country’s human resources, and we therefore support the Scaling Up Nutrition movement and encourage wider involvement of G20 members.

56. We welcome the considerable progress made in implementing the Action Plan and the food security pillar of the Seoul Multi-Year Action Plan on Development. We support the G20 Agriculture Vice-Ministers’ Report annexed to this Declaration, on the progress made on previous commitments and key recommendations on sustainably increasing agricultural productivity, containing inputs from several international organizations coordinated by the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) and the OECD, in addition to other recommendations from B20 and civil society.

57. To fight hunger, we commit to continue our efforts on our initiatives, including the Tropical Agriculture Platform, the Platform for Agricultural Risk Management, the GEO Global Agriculture Monitoring, research initiatives for wheat, rice and corn, the Rapid Response Forum, regional emergency food reserves, the Global Agriculture and Food Security Program and support for the Principles of Responsible Agriculture Investment. Recognizing the important contribution of greater transparency to reducing food price volatility, we welcome the progress made in the implementation of the Agricultural Market Information System (AMIS). We recognize that a more stable, predictable, distortion-free, open and transparent trading system, including as regards agriculture, has a critical role to play to promote food security.

58. We reaffirm our commitment to remove export restrictions and extraordinary taxes on food purchased for non-commercial humanitarian purposes by the World Food Programme (WFP). We encourage the implementation of the Voluntary Guidelines on the Responsible Governance of Tenure of Land, Fisheries and Forests in the Context of National Food Security.

59. We strongly welcome the launch of the “AgResults” Initiative, aimed at improving food security for the poor and vulnerable by encouraging private sector innovation of new agricultural products and systems constrained by market failures in agriculture. We look forward to the launch of the pilot projects focused on innovations in nutrient-fortified crops, post-harvest waste-reducing storage solutions and crop quality technologies in Sub-Saharan Africa. We commend those who have already committed or signaled their intention to commit funding to this initiative and encourage broader participation.

60. We recognize the need to adapt agriculture to climate change and we recognize the importance of improving the efficiency of water and soil use in a sustainable manner. To this end, we support the development of and a greater use of available technologies, well-known practices and techniques such as soil fertility enhancement, minimum tillage and agroforestry, and call upon international organizations to provide a report on science-based options to improve the efficiency of water use in agriculture including in ways particularly suitable for small farms.

61. We recognize the importance to the global economic recovery of maintaining stability in international commodity markets. We stress the importance of well-functioning and transparent physical and financial commodities’ markets and reduced excessive price volatility to achieve food security and strong growth that is both sustainable and inclusive. We recognize that excessive commodity price volatility has significant implications for all countries, increasing uncertainty for actors in the economy and potentially hampering stability of the budgets, and predictability of economic planning. We recognize that mitigating the negative effects of commodity price volatility on the most vulnerable is an important component of reducing poverty and boosting economic growth. We therefore endorse the conclusions of the G20 report on the macroeconomic impacts of excessive commodity price volatility on growth and its identification of policy options that countries could consider, taking account of national circumstances to mitigate any such effect. We also acknowledge and appreciate the participation and valuable inputs of the IMF, World Bank and UNCTAD. We ask our Finance Ministers to report in 2013 on progress in the G20’s contribution to facilitate better functioning of these physical markets, taking note of possible areas of further work outlined in the report. We reaffirm our commitment to enhance transparency and avoid abuse in financial commodity markets, including OTC, with effective intervention powers for market regulators and authorities and an appropriate regulation and supervisory framework. In this regard we look forward to IOSCO’s report on the implementation of its recommendations on commodity derivatives markets by November 2012.

62. We recognize that excessive price volatility in energy commodities is also an important source of economic instability. We remain committed to well-functioning and transparent energy markets. We will continue to work to improve the timeliness, completeness and reliability of J ODI-Oil and look forward to a progress report next year. We will work on the J ODI-Gas database on the same principles. We expect the International Energy Forum (IEF ) report on improving the reliability of the J ODI-Oil database and the report on transparency in international gas and coal markets submitted by the International Energy Agency (IEA), IEF, and Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) to be discussed by our Finance Ministers in November. We also look forward to IOSCO’s recommendations to improve the functioning and oversight of Price Reporting Agencies in November 2012, which will be produced in collaboration with other mandated organizations (IEF, IEA and OPEC), and task Finance Ministers to take concrete measures in this area as necessary.

Meeting the Challenges of Development

63. Eradicating poverty and achieving strong, inclusive, sustainable and balanced growth remain core objectives of the G20 development agenda. We reaffirm our commitment to work with developing countries, particularly low income countries, and to support them in implementing the nationally driven policies and priorities which are needed to fulfill internationally agreed development goals, particularly the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) and beyond.

64. We welcome the initiative of the Development Working Group to build upon the work of previous G20 presidencies, and its focus on three priorities during the Mexican Presidency - food security, infrastructure and inclusive green growth. We commend the progress achieved against our commitments in the Seoul Multi-Year Action Plan, and support the 2012 Development Working Group progress report annexed to this Declaration. We invite the Development Working Group to explore putting in place a process for ensuring assessment and accountability for G20 development actions by the next Summit.

65. Investment in infrastructure is critical for sustained economic growth, poverty reduction, and job creation. We therefore welcome the strong progress made under the Multi-Year Action Plan, including in implementing the recommendations of the Multilateral Development Banks’ (MDBs) Action Plan and the High Level Panel on Infrastructure.

66. While recognizing that public financing of infrastructure development projects in developing countries remains essential, we consider it should be complemented by private sector investment. We encourage MDBs to continue progress under the Action Plan, and welcome the report on addressing Misperception of Risk and Return in Low Income Countries. This contains important messages about properly perceiving the risks posed, as well as the opportunities offered, by long-term infrastructure investment in low income countries. Recognizing the challenge that rapid urbanization poses and the need to make cities more sustainable, we welcome the report on Best Practices for Urban Mass Transport Infrastructure Projects in Medium and Large Cities in Developing Countries, and support the follow-up actions as set out in the Development Working Group report.

67. We reaffirm our commitments to the global partnership for development, as set out in the MDGs, and welcome efforts to contribute to this end, including the Global Partnership for Effective Development Cooperation to be launched with voluntary participation under the auspices of the broad consensus achieved at the 4th High Level Forum on Aid Effectiveness held in Busan, Korea.

68. We recognize the value of Disaster Risk Management (DRM) tools and strategies to better prevent disasters, protect populations and assets, and financially manage their economic impacts. We appreciate World Bank and OECD combined efforts, with the UN’s support, to provide inputs and broaden participation in the discussion on DRM. We welcome the World Bank’s and Mexico’s joint publication on country experiences in this area with the support of G20 members, and look forward to the OECD voluntary framework to facilitate implementation of DRM strategies, to be completed by November.

Promoting longer-term prosperity through inclusive green growth

69. The long-term development and prosperity of current and future generations requires us to look beyond the immediate economic crisis. We acknowledge the importance of finding ways in which economic growth, environmental protection and social inclusion can complement and reinforce each other. Inclusive green growth in the context of sustainable development and poverty eradication can help achieve our development and economic goals, while protecting our environment, and improving social well-being on which our future depends. Inclusive green growth should not be used to introduce protectionist measures.

70. We commit to continue to help developing countries sustain and strengthen their development through appropriate measures, including those that encourage inclusive green growth. We will reaffirm our commitment to sustainable development at the 2012 United Nations Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20). We commit to maintaining a focus on inclusive green growth as part of our G20 agenda and in the light of agreements reached at Rio+20 and the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC).

71. Climate change will continue to have a significant impact on the world economy, and costs will be higher to the extent we delay additional action. We reiterate our commitment to fight climate change and welcome the outcome of the 17th Conference of the Parties to the UN climate change conferences. We are committed to the full implementation of the outcomes of Cancun and Durban and will work with Qatar as the incoming Presidency towards achieving a successful and balanced outcome at COP-18. We emphasize the need to structurally transform economies towards a climate-friendly path over the medium term. We welcome the creation of the G20 study group on climate finance, in order to consider ways to effectively mobilize resources taking into account the objectives, provisions and principles of the UNFCCC in line with the Cancun Agreement and ask to provide a progress report to Finance Ministers in November. We support the operationalization of the Green Climate Fund.

72. The Development Working Group discussed a broad set of practical, voluntary measures and actions that have the potential to help countries define their paths towards sustainable development based on their own circumstances and priorities. We believe that developing countries should have access to institutions and mechanisms that can facilitate knowledge sharing, resource mobilization and building technical and institutional capacity to design and implement inclusive green growth strategies and policies. We welcome international efforts in launching the Green Growth Knowledge Platform and will continue exploring options to provide appropriate support to interested developing countries. We welcome the delivery of a non-prescriptive, voluntary toolkit of policy options for inclusive green growth and encourage efforts to promote its implementation. We encourage further exploration of effective mechanisms to mobilize public and private funds for inclusive green growth investment in developing countries, including through the public-private Dialogue Platform on Inclusive Green Investments. We welcome the B20's Green Growth Action Alliance.

73. We highlight that green growth and sustainable development have strong potential to stimulate long-term prosperity and well-being. We welcome the report prepared by the OECD, the World Bank and the UN on incorporating green growth and sustainable development policies into structural reform agendas, tailored to specific country conditions and levels of development. We also acknowledge the G20 efforts to voluntarily self-report on current actions taken to integrate green growth and sustainable development into structural reform agendas. We will self-report again in 2013, on a voluntary basis, and ask appropriate officials to report back on countries' efforts and progress on incorporating green growth policies in structural reform agendas and in relevant national plans to promote sustainable development.

74. We welcome the progress report on fossil fuel subsidies, and we reaffirm our commitment to rationalize and phase out inefficient fossil fuel subsidies that encourage wasteful consumption over the medium term while providing targeted support for the poorest. We ask Finance Ministers to report back by the next Summit on progress made, and acknowledging the relevance of accountability and transparency, to explore options for a voluntary peer review process for G20 members by their next meeting. We also welcome a dialogue on fossil fuel subsidies with other groups already engaged in this work.

75. In Cannes we committed to promote low-carbon development strategies in order to optimize the potential for green growth and ensure sustainable development in our countries and beyond. We therefore welcome the report on clean energy and energy efficiency technologies and acknowledge the G20 countries' efforts to foster investment in these technologies through the sharing of national experiences regarding challenges for technology deployment.

76. We welcome the establishment of a Global Marine Environment Protection Best Practices Sharing Mechanism website, and look forward to its launch in accordance with the Cannes mandate.
Intensifying the fight against corruption

77. Corruption impedes economic growth, threatens the integrity of markets, undermines fair competition, distorts resource allocation, destroys public trust and undermines the rule of law. We call on all relevant stakeholders to play an active role in fighting corruption.

78. Closing the implementation and enforcement gap remains an important priority, and we continue to make significant progress towards the full implementation of the Seoul G20 Anti-Corruption Action Plan, and the commitments made in the Cannes Monitoring Report. We reiterate our commitment to the ratification and full implementation of the United Nations Convention against Corruption (UNCAC), and to more active engagement with the OECD working group on bribery on a voluntary basis. We welcome continuing engagement from the B20 in the fight against corruption and, in accordance with the Terms of Reference of the review mechanism, will involve the private sector and civil society in the UNCAC review process on a voluntary basis. We endorse today the G20 Anti-Corruption Working Group principles for denial of entry to our countries of corrupt officials, and those who corrupt them, and will continue to develop frameworks for cooperation. We also endorse the Working Group’s principles for financial and asset disclosure systems for relevant officials to prevent, identify and appropriately manage conflicts of interest.

79. We commit to enforcing anti-corruption legislation, and we will pursue those who receive and solicit bribes as well as those who pay them in line with our countries’ legislation. To help facilitate international cooperation among G20 and non-G20 governments in their investigation and prosecution of corruption, we will publish a guide on Mutual Legal Assistance from G20 countries, as well as information on tracing assets in G20 jurisdictions. We renew our commitment to deny safe haven to the proceeds of corruption and to the recovery and restitution of stolen assets.

80. We extend the mandate of the Anti-Corruption Working Group for two years to the end of 2014 and request the Working Group to prepare a comprehensive action plan, as well as a second Working Group Monitoring Report, both to be presented for consideration and adoption by Sherpas by the end of 2012.

Other paragraphs

81. In light of the interconnectedness of the world economy, the G20 has led to a new paradigm of multilateral co-operation that is necessary in order to tackle current and future challenges effectively. The informal and flexible character of the G20 enables it to facilitate international economic and financial cooperation, and address the challenges confronting the global economy. It is important that we continue to further improve the transparency and effectiveness of the G20, and ensure that it is able to respond to pressing needs. As a contribution to this, in line with the commitment made in Cannes, Sherpas have developed a set of evolving G20 working practices.

82. An informal meeting of G20 Ministers of Foreign Affairs was held in Los Cabos in February, which explored the ways in which G20 member countries could contribute more effectively to address key challenges in global governance.

83. Recognizing the far-reaching impact of G20 decisions, we welcome the extensive outreach efforts undertaken by the Mexican Presidency, including the meetings of Business-20, Labor-20, Youth-20, and Think-20. We will continue developing efforts with non-members, regional and international organizations, including the UN and other actors. In line with the Cannes mandate, in order to ensure our outreach remains consistent and effective, we welcome a set of principles in this area, developed by Sherpas.

84. We thank international organizations, including the UN, IMF, World Bank, WTO, FSB, ILO, FAO, and OECD, as well as civil society, for their input into the G20 process. Their reports and recommendations have provided valuable inputs to G20 discussions, in areas ranging from sustainable development to financial regulation.

Conclusion

85. We look forward to the rest of the work that will take place during Mexico’s Presidency until November 30. On 1 December, 2012, Russia will start chairing the G20. We will convene in St. Petersburg, under the Chairmanship of Russia. We thank Mexico for hosting a successful Los Cabos Summit.

165. THE LOS CABOS GROWTH AND JOBS ACTION PLAN

Risks and uncertainty in the global economy have increased substantially. Our collective focus now is to strengthen demand, growth, confidence and financial stability in order to improve employment prospects for all of our citizens. We have agreed today on a globally coordinated economic plan to achieve those goals through our Framework for Strong, Sustainable and Balanced Growth. This plan, which incorporates and extends the Cannes Action Plan, significantly intensifies our efforts to achieve a stronger, more durable recovery. The Los Cabos Growth and Jobs Action Plan starts from the premise that cooperation and coordination will result in better economic outcomes. We are united in our commitment to take strong and decisive action to deliver on the commitments set out below.

We have agreed that, in light of what are perceived to be the most significant risks, our policy actions should focus on:

• Addressing decisively the sovereign debt and banking crisis in the Euro Area. The Euro Area authorities have taken a number of relevant and critical actions that have helped to stabilise the situation, however, significant risks remain and further action is required.

• Ensuring financial stability, including dealing with the potential impacts of deleveraging.

• Boosting demand and economic growth, and reducing persistently high and rising unemployment in many advanced economies, especially among young people.

• Ensuring the pace of fiscal consolidation in advanced economies is appropriate to support the recovery, taking country-specific circumstances into account and, in line with the Toronto Commitments, addressing concerns about medium-term fiscal sustainability.

• Dealing with the possibility that geopolitical risks might lead to a supply-induced sustained spike in oil prices, in an environment of limited spare capacity and modest inventories.

• Ensuring emerging markets maintain a strong and sustainable growth path that contributes to the global recovery and quality job creation.

• Resisting protectionism and keeping markets open.

Our ability to successfully address these risks is influenced by our ability to take stronger actions to promote stability and growth, and reduce ongoing imbalances, including by encouraging the rotation of demand from the public to the private sector in countries with fiscal deficits and from the external to the domestic sector in countries with current account surpluses. We are in full agreement that we need to intensify our efforts to reduce both internal and external imbalances.

As we agreed in Cannes, we have established the Los Cabos Accountability Assessment Framework (Annex A) to assess progress in meeting commitments toward our shared goal of strong, sustainable and balanced growth. This Framework is based on three pillars. First, guiding principles to ensure the assessments are: country-owned; based on a comply or explain approach; concrete; consistent across members; fair; open and transparent. Second, a peer review process that includes review and discussion of members’ policies and in-depth assessments from the international organisations. Finally, annual reports to Leaders summarising the outcomes of the assessments.

We have conducted our first assessment under this framework (Annex B). We have agreed that the commitments set out in the Cannes Action Plan to promote recovery and lay the foundation for robust growth and job creation remain broadly appropriate. The recent intensification of risks, however, has increased the importance of implementing and building upon the Cannes commitments. Progress has been good in meeting some elements of the Cannes Action Plan, but in several areas more progress is needed. We will undertake ongoing accountability assessments and improve our tracking of measures to assess progress as set out in the Los Cabos Accountability Framework.

The Los Cabos Action Plan, as set out below, includes a combination of policy measures, with short- and medium-term impacts, in order to ensure that policy credibility is enhanced and to reflect the different capacities of countries to respond in particular areas.

Addressing Near-term Risks, Restoring Confidence, and Promoting Growth

Central to this plan is a common agreement that the strongest actions to minimize risks and spur growth are those that promote the stability and proper functioning of our financial systems, supported by fiscal and monetary policy actions.

To address near-term risks, promote confidence, ensure economic and financial stability, and bolster the economic recovery, we have agreed on the following actions.

1. The Euro Area members of the G20 will take all necessary measures to safeguard the integrity and stability of the area, improve the functioning of financial markets and break the feedback loop between sovereigns and banks.
   - We welcome the significant actions taken since the last summit by the Euro Area to support growth, ensure financial stability and promote fiscal responsibility. In this context, we welcome Spain’s plan to recapitalize its banking system and the Eurogroup’s announcement of support for Spain’s financial restructuring authority. The adoption of the Fiscal Compact and its ongoing implementation, together with growth-enhancing policies and structural reform, are important steps towards greater fiscal and economic integration. The imminent establishment of the European Stability Mechanism is a substantial strengthening of the European firewalls.

- We fully support the actions of the Euro Area in moving forward with the completion of the Economic and Monetary Union. Towards that end, we support the intention to consider concrete steps towards a more integrated financial architecture, encompassing banking supervision, resolution and recapitalization, and deposit insurance.

- Euro area members will foster intra Euro Area adjustment through structural reforms to strengthen competitiveness in deficit countries and to promote demand and growth in surplus countries.

- The European Union members of the G20 are determined to move forward expeditiously on measures to support growth including through completing the European Single Market and making better use of European financial means, such as the EIB, pilot project bonds, and structural and cohesion funds, for more targeted investment, employment, growth and competitiveness, while maintaining the firm commitment to implement fiscal consolidation to be assessed on a structural basis.

2. Fiscal policies in all of our economies will focus on strengthening and sustaining the recovery in a manner which promotes fiscal sustainability and enhances policy credibility.

- Advanced economies are generally on track to meet their near term commitment to halve deficits between 2010 and 2013. Advanced economies are committed to meeting the medium term Toronto commitments by implementing credible medium-term fiscal consolidation plans.

- Recognizing the need to pursue growth-oriented policies that support demand and recovery, the United States will calibrate the pace of its fiscal consolidation by ensuring that its public finances are placed on a sustainable long-run path so that a sharp fiscal contraction in 2013 is avoided.

- Japan will implement reconstruction spending as expeditiously as possible.

- Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, Germany, Indonesia, Korea, the UK and the US are allowing automatic fiscal stabilisers to operate, taking into account national circumstances and current demand conditions.
Italy will deliver on its agenda of frontloaded fiscal consolidation accompanied by growth-enhancing measures.

Fiscal policy in Spain will remain focused on consolidation.

3. Monetary policies will remain focused on maintaining price stability and sustaining the global economic recovery. In this context, the actions taken by central banks in advanced economies have played an important role in promoting global economic growth and stability. Central banks will remain vigilant and take action as appropriate to achieve their objectives.

4. Our central banks, financial market supervisors and treasuries will remain in close dialogue and will cooperate through the FSB to maintain financial stability during this period of heightened uncertainty. We will maintain momentum on the financial sector institutional reforms needed to safeguard our financial systems over the medium term while taking appropriate actions to protect credit channels and the integrity of global payment and settlement systems.

5. Should economic conditions deteriorate significantly further, Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, Germany, Korea, Russia and the US stand ready to coordinate and implement additional measures to support demand, taking into account national circumstances and commitments.

6. Emerging markets will adjust their macroeconomic policies to support domestic demand, while ensuring price stability. When and where appropriate, macro-prudential measures will also be used to help manage domestic credit growth and liquidity.

7. Recognizing that geopolitical risks might lead to a supply-side induced spike in oil prices, in an environment of limited spare capacity and modest inventories, members stand ready to take additional actions as needed. We welcome the commitments by producing countries to ensure adequate supply. In particular, we welcome Saudi Arabia’s readiness to mobilize, as necessary, more than 2.5 million barrels per day of existing spare capacity.

8. In all policy areas, we commit to minimize the negative spillovers on other countries of policies implemented for domestic purposes. We reaffirm our shared interest in a strong and stable international financial system and our support for market-determined exchange rates. We reiterate that excess volatility and disorderly movements in exchange rates have adverse implications for economic and financial stability.

Strengthening the Medium-term Foundations for Growth

All members agree to build on the 6-point plan developed in Cannes to boost confidence, raise global output and create jobs, focusing on priority areas.

1. Advanced economies will ensure their fiscal finances are on a sustainable track.
Recognizing the importance of strengthening and implementing their medium-term fiscal consolidation plans, the US and Japan commit to actions that will lead to steady reduction in their public debt-to-GDP ratios:

- The US commits to placing its federal debt-to-GDP ratio on a firm downward path by 2016 through a balanced approach.
- Japan reaffirms its commitment to meet its primary balances targets for FY2015 and FY2020, and to reduce its debt-to-GDP ratio from FY2021 onwards.
- By our next Summit, members agree to identify credible and ambitious country-specific targets for the debt-to-GDP ratio beyond 2016, where these do not currently exist, accompanied by clear strategies and timetables to achieve them. These strategies will consider tax and expenditure reforms, including modifications to entitlements.

2. We will intensify our efforts to rebalance global demand, through increasing domestic demand in countries with current account surpluses, rotating demand from the public to private sector in countries with fiscal deficits and increasing national savings in countries with current account deficits.

- The reduction of structural fiscal deficits and actions to promote private savings in advanced economies with current account deficits will contribute to a lasting reduction in global imbalances (US).

- We reaffirm our commitment to move more rapidly toward market-determined exchange rate systems and enhance exchange rate flexibility to reflect underlying fundamentals, avoid persistent exchange rate misalignments, and refrain from competitive devaluation of currencies. We recognize the important decisions to increase the fluctuation bands for the exchange rates in China and Russia. China is building on its commitment to gradually reduce the pace of reserve accumulation, and to allow market forces to play a larger role in determining movements of the RMB and to increase the transparency of its exchange rate policy. We welcome China’s commitment to continue exchange rate regime reform.

- Emerging markets will take further actions to rebalance demand, including by: continuing to promote the liberalization of interest rates (China); and, increasing investment (Brazil) and savings rates (Turkey).

- Advanced surplus economies or those with relatively weak private demand will help promote domestic demand through the further liberalization of service sectors (Korea, Germany, Japan); encouraging investment through eliminating inefficiencies (Germany); and, creating new industries and new markets through innovation in areas such as environment and healthcare (Japan). The recent developments in private households’ real income in Germany will help strengthen domestic demand and accelerate internal rebalancing within the Euro Area.

• Oil-exporting countries will continue to pursue productive public investment and encourage private investment, which will have positive regional and global spillover effects, while ensuring fiscal sustainability given the volatile nature of revenues.

3. In Cannes, countries put forward structural reform commitments to boost and sustain global demand, foster job creation, contribute to global rebalancing and increase the growth potential in all G-20 countries. These remain core priorities going forward and are reflected in additional reforms and commitments made since Cannes. These reforms include:

• Labour market reforms to increase employment and increase labour force participation, such as: retraining long-term unemployed (US); skills development (Spain); increasing wage flexibility, such as decentralizing wage setting (Italy); reducing labour tax wedges (Brazil, Italy); reforms to employment insurance to make it more effective and efficient in supporting job creation (Canada); enhancing education, training and skills development (Australia, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Turkey, South Africa); encouraging the participation of females in the labour force by, for example, reforming benefit systems and providing affordable child care services (Australia, Germany, Japan, Korea); improving employment opportunities for targeted groups such as youth and persons with disabilities (Canada, Korea, UK); encouraging the participation of younger workers through apprenticeships (UK); and, encouraging formal sector employment through better education or skill development (Brazil, Indonesia, Mexico, South Africa).

• Product market reforms to promote competition and enhance productivity in key sectors (Australia, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Mexico; h Actions to promote the stabilisation of the housing sector (US).

• Providing targeted support for the poor or strengthening social safety nets (India, Indonesia, China, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, South Africa).

• Phasing out distortive subsidies in the medium-term where they exist in both advanced and emerging economies.

• Tax and benefit reforms to enhance productivity and improve incentives to work (Australia, Germany, Italy, UK);

• Planning regulation reforms to better support economic growth by reducing the burdens facing businesses wishing to expand (UK);
• Encourage further trade liberalization through unilateral tariff elimination in key sectors (Canada);
• Promote investments in infrastructure to increase productivity and living standards in the medium term by addressing bottlenecks (Argentina, Australia, Brazil, India, Indonesia, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, South Africa, UK); and,
• Commitments to promote green and sustainable growth (Australia, Korea, Germany, Mexico).

4. We have made substantial progress in strengthening financial sector regulation and supervision. Current global economic challenges underscore the need to reaffirm our commitment to the effective implementation of the agreed financial reforms in order to make the financial sector more resilient, stable and able to support economic growth. We welcome the FSB’s work, in conjunction with the IMF and the World Bank, identifying the extent to which agreed regulatory reforms may have unintended consequences for EMDEs. G-20 members continue to look to the FSB, in cooperation with standard setters, to monitor progress, reporting back on a regular basis. This will be complemented by efforts to increase financial inclusion.

5. We reaffirm our commitment to resist protectionism in all forms and promote open trade, and will take active measures to reduce the number of WTO inconsistent trade restrictive measures and resist financial protectionism.

6. Members reiterate the commitment on actions to maximize growth potential and economic resilience in developing countries, as well as the importance of fulfilling aid commitments by advanced countries, and mobilizing domestic, external, and new innovative sources of finance to meet development needs. These actions will complement the efforts of multilateral and bilateral donors, public and private partners to assist developing countries in achieving the Millennium Development Goals. Emerging market members will also promote a range of reforms to promote development, including improving the investment climate and enhancing infrastructure investment.

Details on country-specific reform commitments are posted on the Mexican Presidency’s website. We will continue to coordinate policy in the future as economic conditions evolve. We ask our Finance Ministers to work closely together in the coming months to address vulnerabilities and sustain the recovery. We will review progress against all of our commitments at the St. Petersburg Summit in 2013.
ANNEX A:

THE LOS CABOS ACCOUNTABILITY ASSESSMENT FRAMEWORK

G-20 members have developed an Accountability Assessment Framework based on three pillars. This Framework will be used to prepare reports on progress in meeting past commitments, which will inform the development of future action plans and domestic policies.

Guiding Principles

To make sure that the Framework meets the needs of the membership, members have agreed that it be:

- Country-owned and country-led, based on the members’ assessment and with the input of independent third-party evaluations (by the IMF and other international organizations).
- Based on a rigorous comply or explain approach, which recognizes that policy actions take time and policy priorities may need to change.
- Concrete, using quantitative measures where possible to help focus the discussion and assess progress.
- Consistent across members, to ensure comparability of treatment, while at the same time allowing for country-specific circumstances where relevant.
- Fair, by encouraging an open dialogue between members through self-assessments and by providing objective, third-party analysis.
- Open and transparent, with the overall outcomes communicated to the public after agreement by the G-20.

1. A Peer-Review Process informed by Third-Party Assessments

At the core of our accountability assessment is a peer review process, in which members will assess progress made in meeting past G-20 fiscal, financial, structural, monetary and exchange rate, trade and development policy commitments. To enhance the effectiveness and efficiency of the discussions, the process focuses on those commitments across all policy areas where the coordination of policies has the most impact in reducing near term risks, and promoting strong, sustainable and balanced growth.

The peer review discussions will include the following elements:

- A review and discussion of policy actions members have undertaken to meet their commitments.
A discussion of the global economic outlook to assess the progress being made in moving towards our objectives of strong, sustainable and balanced growth.

An assessment of members (approximately every 2 years) against the ‘Indicative Guidelines’ that we endorsed in Cannes in order to identify large and persistent imbalances. As well, discussions of the new (or updated) External Sustainability Reports prepared by the IMF for countries where the guidelines suggest imbalances require further analysis.

A review of reports from the international organisations (from the IMF, OECD, FSB, World Bank, ILO UNCTAD and the WTO) to enhance the objectiveness of the assessment process.

To ensure the Framework’s credibility and integrity, we task our officials with further enhancing the Accountability Assessment Framework, by looking at ways to promote peer review discussions based on a shared understanding of issues. We are committed to agreeing on a common approach to measure progress against previous commitments in the areas of fiscal, monetary, exchange rate, and other policies. As well we agree that commitments need to be specific, measurable and relevant to achieving strong, sustainable and balanced growth. We task our Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors to review progress by their meeting in Mexico City in November 2012.

2. Regular Reports to Ministers/Governors/Leaders

The culmination of the peer review discussions will be short progress reports prepared for Ministerial meetings and regular Annual Accountability Assessments for Ministers, Governors and Leaders. These assessments would also provide critical input to inform the range of concrete policy commitments that should be included in the G-20 Action Plans.

ANNEX B:

The Los Cabos Accountability Assessment

The G-20 launched the Framework for Strong, Sustainable and Balanced Growth in Pittsburgh in 2009 to promote the range of policy actions required to overcome the legacy of the 2007-08 financial crisis and put the global economy back on the path of strong, sustainable and balanced economic growth and robust job creation. The bold policy actions undertaken by G-20 countries in response to the crisis limited the loss of output and jobs, and launched the global recovery.
While significant policy actions have been implemented since then, our common goal of achieving strong, sustainable and balanced growth as agreed in Pittsburgh has remained elusive. It is clear that the rebuilding of public and private sector balance sheets across advanced economies will continue to constrain global growth for some time. Further, a number of risks continue to weigh heavily on global growth as outlined above. The recovery in private demand in most advanced economies remains muted. Although growth in emerging market economies has remained relatively strong, there are indications that it too is slowing. Reflecting the differential growth profiles, unemployment rates in emerging market economies have generally fallen below pre-crisis levels, while unemployment rates in advanced economies generally remain stubbornly high.

External imbalances have generally narrowed compared to the very large imbalances in the pre-crisis period. Structural policy adjustments have played a role in some countries, but the improvement also reflects cyclical effects, in particular the relatively weak cyclical position of many advanced economies and movements in terms of trade. Oil-exporting countries continue to run large and mounting current account surpluses.

On balance, developments since Pittsburgh suggest that a continued and more determined effort across all policy areas is required to meet the objectives set out when we established the Framework.

Fiscal Policy

Good progress has been achieved in meeting the Toronto fiscal commitments, although the weaker-than-expected economic outcomes has affected the fiscal adjustment paths of some countries. In some countries the credibility of fiscal policy needs to be bolstered through actions to place public finances on a sustainable medium-term path:

- Most members (Australia, Canada, France, Germany and Italy) are projected by the IMF to achieve the Toronto target to halve their deficits from their 2010 levels.1 In some cases, strong policy actions actually reduced the 2010 deficits below expected levels. Recognizing the need to pursue growth-oriented policies that support demand and recovery, the United States will calibrate the pace of its fiscal consolidation by ensuring that its public finances are placed on a sustainable long-run path so that a sharp fiscal contraction in 2013 is avoided. In the UK, the actual 2013 deficit projection meets the Toronto objective when cyclically-adjusted measure is used. Spain may miss its 2013 target, reflecting the significant weakness in the economy and the restructuring of its banking sector. Thus, a very significant structural effort and deficit reduction plan is being implemented.

1 For consistency across members, this assessment of the Toronto commitments is based on general government deficit, using the actual deficit in 2010 and comparing to the IMF’s projections for 2013, allowing a 0.5 percentage point confidence band around the projections.

- Most advanced economies are also on track to achieve the Toronto commitment to stabilise or reduce the debt-to-GDP ratio by 2016.2 The US is expected to meet this commitment in 2016 at the federal government level, but the federal government debt is expected to increase thereafter according to the IMF. Spain is expected to require additional actions to meet its target. Japan is on track to meet its own medium-term target of halving the primary deficit by FY 2015 from its FY 2010 level, but more action is needed to reach its long-term target to reduce its debt-to-GDP ratio from FY 2021 onwards. Finally, while advanced economies had agreed to promote sustainable fiscal finances over the medium term, debt levels are expected to remain high in many countries in 2016. Further policy efforts are required to achieve sustainable public finances in the medium term, particularly in the context of population ageing.

Member countries have made progress on their commitments to implement structural fiscal reforms. The Euro Area has strengthened its fiscal frameworks with the adoption of the Fiscal Compact. Some members have delivered on their commitment to reform the pension system (Italy) and others are making progress on pension reforms (France, the UK). Brazil has approved a reform of the civil servants’ pension system. Spain has implemented a major labour market reform. Further progress is required on a range of fiscal actions across G-20 members that would both promote sustainable public finances and facilitate global rebalancing: the Euro Area needs to complete reforms to fiscal governance; and, the US and Japan need to fully implement ambitious medium-term fiscal plans. India, Indonesia and Mexico need to continue their reforms of major subsidies. Further progress on tax reform is required in many emerging and advanced economies to reduce distortions.

Monetary and Exchange Rate Policies

In advanced economies, monetary policies have played an integral role in supporting the recovery while maintaining price stability. In emerging market economies, inflationary pressures have generally eased, largely as a result of slower growth.

Since the Pittsburgh Summit, emerging market economies with relatively inflexible exchange rate regimes, under the IMF’s de facto classification system, implemented a number of important reforms. In particular, both China and Russia have widened their exchange rate floating bands. China’s exchange rate has appreciated substantially since 2005, but progress towards greater exchange rate flexibility has been less clear since the Cannes Summit, particularly given the short time that China's most recent reforms have been in place. Reserves fell in China during the last quarter of 2011 partly owing to the narrowing in its current account surplus. Reserve accumulation resumed in the first quarter of 2012.

Emerging market countries expressed concerns that the easing in monetary policies in advanced economies is contributing to an increase in both the level and variability of capital flowing to their economies and volatility in other financial variables, complicating macroeconomic policy management. Members generally recognised that domestic monetary policies of advanced economies are appropriately targeted to achieve domestic objectives while at the same time recognising the need to remain vigilant against possible negative spillovers of their policies.

Structural Policies
The implementation of key structural reforms is critical to strengthening growth and creating jobs, and promoting global rebalancing, such as policies that affect social safety nets and investment patterns. However, members agreed that structural reform commitments are particularly difficult to assess, in part due to the length of time it takes to implement them and witness their effects. That said, members remain committed to pursuing structural reforms as not only are some reforms able to provide employment gains in the short-term, they also boost jobs and growth domestically and have positive spillovers via trade and other linkages to help rebalance the global economy.

The OECD estimates that implementation is underway for over three quarters of all structural reform commitments, with full implementation of about one-third of all commitments. Progress in implementing reforms is broadly similar for advanced and emerging economies. However, progress across the different categories of structural reforms has been uneven and greater ambition is needed to implement the reforms that will have the greatest impact on rebalancing, job creation, and promoting stronger growth.

Several advanced economies need to make more progress on product market reforms (Euro Area, Japan). Emerging markets, in general, need to further improve the business and investment environment, which will facilitate investment in infrastructure and enhance potential growth, and foster financial inclusion. To facilitate global rebalancing: the US needs to do more to encourage private savings; Germany should implement measures to promote domestic demand; and, some emerging markets need to increase domestic consumption and improve the efficiency of investment.
Trade, Financial Sector and Development Policies

The WTO, UNCTAD, World Bank and OECD continue to monitor progress countries have made in reducing tariffs and liberalizing trading systems, including reducing entry barriers in key sectors. Most members have maintained their commitment to resist protectionism, including by addressing unfair trade practices through WTO-consistent trade remedy measures rather than ad-hoc policy responses. However, the political climate in some regions appears to be more accepting of new forms of protectionist measures, which should be resisted.

The FSB is responsible for coordinating and promoting the rigorous monitoring of the implementation of the agreed G-20/FSB financial reforms and its reporting to the G-20 under the FSB’s Coordination Framework for Implementation Monitoring (CFIM) that was established last year. This process involves intensive monitoring and detailed reporting, in collaboration with the standard setting bodies, on national implementation progress in six priority reform areas (Basel III, policy measures for G-SIFIs, resolution frameworks, OTC derivatives, compensation practices, shadow banking) as set out in the FSB’s report to G-20 Leaders. The FSB, in coordination with relevant standard setting bodies, also reports on the implementation of other agreed regulatory reforms and publishes information on the steps taken by FSB members to implement them. The IMF reviews progress realized by its members via its Article IV surveillance and FSAP assessments. The FSB, in coordination with the staff of the IMF and World Bank, has prepared a study identifying the extent to which agreed regulatory reforms may have unintended consequences on emerging market and developing economies.

The World Bank, in conjunction with other international organizations, will continue to assess the growth and development agenda in developing countries, including the impact of the Framework policies and the external environment on promoting development and reducing the development gap. In addition, they continue to monitor the progress towards fulfilling commitments in this area.

Conclusion

Overall, progress has been made in moving ahead on the Cannes and previous summit reform commitments, but more progress and new actions are required in several important areas. In order to facilitate future assessments, members also recognised that policy commitments need to be as specific and concrete as possible, and need to substantively contribute towards the overall objective of strong, sustainable and balanced growth. We also agree on the need for a common approach to measure progress against previous commitments in all policy areas.

166. Opening Remarks of Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee at the G - 24 Finance Ministers’ Meeting.

Washington(DC), April 19, 2012.

“We are meeting at a time when the global economy appears to be strengthening gradually after suffering a setback. Although actions by Euro zone countries and the ECB have stabilized the situation and calmed the market somewhat, underlying structural problems remain and downside risks remain significant as manifest in recent movements in bond yields. Volatility in commodity prices, threats of disruptions to supply chains and high oil prices have added to global uncertainty and impacted businesses across the globe, slowing the recovery in both advanced and emerging economies.

Developing countries and emerging economies are expected to continue as growth drivers for the world economy. The fact, however, is that even here growth has decelerated. The global economy is too interconnected for them to be insulated from the knockdown impact of developments in advanced economies. This presents both a challenge as well as an opportunity for organizations like the G24 to take a lead role in creating a platform for exchange of ideas and to develop a consensus to arrive at solutions that are not only effective in the short run but also sustainable in the long run. The need for concerted action among the world nations for facing the volatility in the global economy was well articulated in our last meeting in September 2011 in this very same venue. Many of us who are gathered here today represent the voice of the masses of the poor and vulnerable populations who are adversely affected by the lack of jobs, infrastructure, food and finance and for whom we need to do more together.

The role of the IFIs today deserves to be viewed in this light. There are serious apprehensions regarding the governance structure of these IFIs, adequacy of their resources as well the flexibility of their lending procedures. These apprehensions have strengthened the trend of setting up new and regional financial mechanisms and institutions where the voice of these nations are heard, and adequate finance is forthcoming.

The present global juncture presents an opportunity for the G24 to devise strategies to enhance its effectiveness in the global policy making process. All international organizations today recognize the fact that none of them can be an active participant in the global economy unless and until EMDCs are taken on board and given a greater role. In this scenario, the G24 is uniquely positioned... as it is well represented by all major EMDCs. G24 is rightly making use of this opportunity by organising meetings on Infrastructure Financing and Financial Inclusion on April 22. As developing countries become major economic powers in global scenario, their responsibilities will also increase.

In today’s meeting, we will cover 3 issues, namely the Global Economy, reform of the International Financial Institutions and Infrastructure Financing. I look forward to your views on these agenda items. In view of the limited time available at our disposal, I would request you to cover all the agenda items in your interventions.”

167. Statement issued by the IBSA member-states on the situation between Israel and Palestine.

November 22, 2012.

India, Brazil and South Africa express their strongest condemnation of the ongoing violence between Israel and Palestine, that threatens the peace and security of the region. The IBSA countries deeply regret the loss of human lives and express their concern over the disproportionate and excessive use of force.

They urge the parties to immediately cease all violence, to exercise maximum restraint and to avoid taking any action that may further exacerbate the situation. They stress their expectation that the United Nations Security Council will do its utmost in the fulfilment of its responsibilities in regard to this serious situation.

They also stress the urgent need to lift the blockade on Gaza which continues to worsen the already dire socio-economic and humanitarian situation in Gaza.

The IBSA countries express their strong support to the mediation efforts of the Government of Egypt, the League of Arab States and the UN Secretary-General aimed at achieving a negotiated ceasefire.

The IBSA countries believe that only diplomacy and dialogue will lead to the resolution of the current crisis, which makes it even more urgent to resume direct talks between Israel and Palestine, leading to a comprehensive solution to the Palestinian Question i.e. the achievement of a two-state solution.

In view of the upcoming UN General Assembly discussion on the Question of Palestine, India, Brazil and South Africa express their support for Palestine’s request to be accorded Observer State status in the United Nations system.
IOR - ARC

168. Media Briefing by Secretary(ER) Sudhir Vyas on 12th IOR-ARC meeting.

New Delhi, October 30, 2012.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Good afternoon friends and thank you very much for coming to this interaction. I am particularly grateful for our colleagues in the media from the Indian Ocean Rim countries who are here. There are 31 of them and I would like to welcome them specifically to this first interaction that they are attending in the Ministry of External Affairs.

Our primary focus today would be a briefing on the Twelfth Meeting of the Council of Ministers of the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation. I have here with me Secretary (Economic Relations) Mr. Sudhir Vyas, who is India’s representative at the Senior Officials’ Meeting of the IOR-ARC. He will brief you today on the events leading to the IOR-ARC Ministerial meeting. After that we will open the floor for questions on IOR-ARC.

Along with Secretary (Economic Relations) we have Mr. Dinesh Bhatia who is Joint Secretary (Multilateral Economic Relations), and Mr. Charan Jeet Singh who is Director (Multilateral Economic Relations). Both of them will assist Secretary (ER) in case you have some questions which are of such deep value that he would require further assistance from others.

With that, I would request Secretary (ER) to make his opening remarks and then we will open the floor for questions.

Secretary (Economic Relations) (Shri Sudhir Vyas): Thank you, Akbar. Thank you all for joining us this afternoon. Thank you for your attention and your interest in the subject. My welcome also to those friends from the media who are here for this important event.

External Affairs Minister Mr. Salman Khurshid will be chairing the Twelfth Meeting of the Council of Ministers which is the apex body of the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation, which we refer to by its acronym IOR-ARC, on 2nd of November at the Oberoi Hotel in Gurgaon. This meeting is the culmination of a series of interactions of bodies of this Association. It will be preceded, therefore, by the Indian Ocean Rim Academic Group, the Indian Ocean Business Forum, the Working Group on Trade and Investment which is a group of government officials dealing with trade policy issues, and finally the Committee of Senior Officials which I will chair tomorrow and day after tomorrow.

The meetings have already begun with the Academic Group having met yesterday. Today the Working Group on Trade and Industry is deliberating issues of trade facilitation and so on. Tomorrow the Business Forum will meet to take up its agenda of business-to-business cooperation. The Committee of Senior Officials will meet alongside to pull the strings together and take stock of progress and decide upon its recommendations to the Council of Ministers, which will then meet on the 2nd and conclude this event.

A few words on the background to this Association. The idea of such an association actually goes very far back. You would be interested to know that our first Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, in his book ‘Discovery of India’ which predated Independence, had envisioned a group of countries bordering the Indian Ocean and helping each other in tackling common challenges. A similar idea was mooted by the then Foreign Minister of South Africa Mr. Pik Botha during his 1993 visit to India, and given a further fillip by Mr. Nelson Mandela in 1994. It was also mooted by the Shah of Iran in 1974, and subsequently explored by Mauritius in 1980s. So, there is a very strong political will that underpins this Association.

When this led to a group of seven countries, one from each side of the Indian Ocean - Australia, India, Kenya, Sultanate of Oman, Singapore and South Africa - the so-called seven meeting in Mauritius in 1995 was called M7 (Mauritius 7) to talk about enhancing cooperation on the rim. In a Joint Statement they agreed on - interestingly these words are relevant - “Principles of open regionalism and inclusivity of membership with the objectives of trade liberalisation and promoting trade cooperation”. This was expanded to the M14 with the addition of seven more members. The Association was formally launched, after five more members had joined, in March 1997. This makes it the fifteenth year of the Association’s existence.

IOR-ARC is the only pan Indian Ocean organization of its kind - a unique group of states on the rim of the Ocean which accounts for no less than two billion people, states that are characterized by diversities in size, population, culture and economic development. A notable feature is the number of overlapping regional organizations which have their rationale. Therefore, the members of IOR-ARC are also members of other multilateral groupings like ASEAN, GCC, SAARC or SADIC. Therefore, IOR-ARC has to increasingly position itself as an apex body which takes into account the differing perspectives, the differing approaches and binds them together into a unified whole in spite of the diversity.

Over the last few years, the countries of the Indian Ocean Rim have clearly come together on one account, that their strategic interests are served by the wellbeing and stability of the maritime domain. That is what brings this Association together and what has given it its increased relevance in the contemporary period.
The Indian Ocean is the third largest body of water on Earth linking the developed economies of the West to the burgeoning powerhouses of markets of Asia in the East. Seventy per cent of global traffic in petroleum products and energy and half the world's containers traffic transits across the Indian Ocean. Apart from its major reserves of oil and gas, the Indian Ocean Rim is rich in resources from fisheries to precious minerals, from agricultural wealth to valuable human technical expertise. And the Indian Ocean has its challenges. We know the threats in parts of the Indian Ocean to maritime security, the incidents of piracy that have taken place over the last few years, Indian Ocean region has been the victim of a tsunami in 2004, all these are issues that are of concern to the membership.

Therefore, the wellbeing and stability of the region has been and continues to be critical for the membership as well as for global economic growth. It is interesting that despite the global economic slowdown and the slow recovery, Indian Ocean Rim economies performed well in 2011. In 2011 the combined GDP of IOR-ARC members was estimated at US$ 6.5 trillion, up from 5.7 trillion in 2010, in just one year. From 2001 to 2010, regional trade more than tripled from US$ 1.1 trillion in 2001 to US$ 3.5 trillion in 2010. And the share of intra-IOR-ARC trade in global trade increased from 8.6% to 11.6% over the same period. Its regional investment trends have also shown a steady growth, both FDI inflows as well as outflows. FDI inflows into Indian Ocean Rim countries quadrupled to US$ 201 billion in 2011 from a mere 50 billion dollars in 2001. Share of IOR-ARC’s global FDI inflows increased from six per cent in 2001 to 13.2 per cent in 2011.

For India, the Indian Ocean occupies a particularly important position in our economic and strategic perspectives. Across the Indian Ocean move 90 per cent of our energy imports - it gives you a sense of the criticality of the wellbeing of this domain for us - and over 80 per cent of India's international trade. India’s total trade with the RIM states has grown more than eight-fold to reach 156 billion dollars during the period 2001 to 2010. It was 156 billion dollars last year. Our telephone and internet connectivity is largely dependent on quality under sea communication cable infrastructure in the Indian Ocean.

Let me talk a little bit about the Association itself. Today, IOR-ARC has 19 members. Seychelles has joined as the 19th member in the last Council of Ministers meeting at Bengaluru last year. The members are: Australia, Bangladesh, India, Indonesia, Iran, Kenya, Malaysia, Madagascar, Mauritius, Mozambique, Oman, Seychelles, Singapore, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Tanzania, UAE and Yemen. There are five Dialogue Partners for the Association, namely China, Egypt, France, Japan and the UK. There are two observer organizations, namely the Indian Ocean Research Group and the Indian Ocean Tourism Organisation based in Oman.
IOR-ARC has established three institutions so far. Institution-building, excellence in disciplines and areas of interest and relevance and value to the Indian Ocean Rim are a critical component, an important component of the work of our Association. Take for example the fisheries sector. The Fisheries Support Unit was established in 2005 in Oman for enhancing the cooperation in fisheries sector and an action plan is under finalization. And it is clearly realized by all members that action in such fronts cannot be handled by one country alone. Cooperation can augment individual resources and produce results.

The Regional Centre for Science and Technology Transfer in Tehran has the mandate for facilitating transfer of technology at a regional level in dissemination and commercialisation of knowhow and technology. Maritime Transport Council, established in 2010, is envisaged as a regional specialized agency for strengthening cooperation in maritime transport issues.

I had mentioned earlier that IOR-ARC is an association of tremendous diversities including in levels of economic development and financial capacity. Therefore, it has instituted a special fund at the Sixth Council of Ministers Meeting in Tehran, to help support Indian Ocean Association projects by some of its less developed members who may require additional financial resources to organize workshops, events or interactions. In fact, India was the first country to announce an initial contribution to this special fund and it has been followed by Iran, Oman, Yemen, China and others. Last year, India announced a further contribution of one million dollars at Bengaluru, and I am happy to state that this fund we would like to put to best possible use. We are also in the process of simplifying and laying out clear-cut procedures to enable this fund to be put to best use.

The contemporary situation. When India assumed the Chair of IOR-ARC first time incidentally at Bengaluru last year, at the 11th Council of Ministers, chairmanship is for two years, there was clearly an expectation and a sense in the air that this association needs to add much more value to its deliberations. There is so much at stake in the Indian Ocean region and we need to channelize it in a manner which can serve the interests and expectations of its membership. So, we made a beginning in Bengaluru last year by identifying six priority areas for the work of our Association. I should have mentioned this earlier. The Association’s primary objective is economic wellbeing, economic cooperation for the welfare of the peoples of the Indian Ocean. A lot of elements feed into this primary objective. The first of our priorities is one such – Maritime Safety and Security which includes anti piracy operations. Whether we can coordinate our efforts and put our individual efforts to best use on this? Capacity building in this area, and so on.

Secondly, the core area of trade and investment facilitation. Again as I mentioned earlier, IOR-ARC is not a monolithic body. It overlaps with other regional organizations and, therefore, has to find a means and a way of organizing its work of trade facilitation and liberalization that does not conflict or run into conflict with the priorities of the others. So, we follow a very deliberative approach. We can talk about it later. Third, fisheries. I mentioned this in the context of the Fisheries Support Unit. Many countries, particularly for example of the coast of East Africa, talked about the amount of poaching that takes place in their very rich exclusive economic zones of fish. How do we manage, monitor, conserve and make use of fish stocks? Do we know the requirements? This is the second area of priority cooperation.

Disaster risk reduction and humanitarian access. The region has suffered from a tsunami in 2004. Tomorrow if there is an oil spill considering the amount of crude that travels across the Ocean, it could be devastating for one of the smaller economies. Therefore, humanitarian access and disaster management is a critical area which was identified as a priority.

Academic and science and technology cooperation. I mentioned the Academics Group which has just met yesterday. Do we know our domain? Do we understand our domain? Do you know the monsoons? Do you know the hydrology, the oceanography of the Indian Ocean? Do you know the coastal zones and how they would be impacted by coastal erosion? All these issues, the patterns of trade, the history behind the Indian Ocean, all this is relevant to this priority area, academic and science technology cooperation.

Finally, tourism promotion and cultural exchanges. Tourism is a USP of the region. Cultural commonality exists across the region which goes back centuries. Therefore, this is a fit subject for priority.

As chair of IOR-ARC, our approach has been to take forward cooperation within each of these priority areas and I am happy to see that we are seeing some forward movement...

I will touch upon, if you are interested later, the kind of activities that we have initiated over the last year in pursuit of the objectives. But let me not take time in just reading about them. But I would want to mention that a lot of these have been extremely well attended, and I am happy to see that there is lot of interest in the activities. We are planning some major ones in early next year.

Future perspectives. Despite the enormous potential for cooperation in such a range of areas we feel, and I am sure this feeling is widely shared in other member states also, that IOR-ARC could do much more, and that is a challenge before us. That is what we have tried to do as the Chair to try and build body, build substance and value to this Association. As I said, this year marks the fifteenth year of the creation of IOR-ARC. We have chosen a theme for the Twelfth Council of Ministers Meeting, which is “IOR-ARC at 15 – The Next Decade”. We would like to discuss amongst ourselves what could be the focuses of cooperation under our Association, what could be the directions of its growth in coming years, ways and means to further consolidate our efforts so that IOR-ARC can cope with the fast-changing global economic and strategic environment, and in particular enhance its capacity to meet the contemporary expectations of its members and the challenges that this region is faced with.

This is by way of background. If you have any questions, we would try and answer them.

Official Spokesperson: Any of you who would like to ask a question, please raise your hand so that we can identify. Many of you are coming here for the first time. Maybe you should identify also on the mic before you ask the question.

The floor is now open for questions on IOR-ARC at this stage.

Question (Bangladesh Media): I want to know the state of cooperation between Bangladesh and IOR-ARC.

Secretary (ER): Between Bangladesh and the Indian Ocean Rim what I can tell you is that Bangladesh has been a very active participant in the affairs of the Indian Ocean Rim. It has brought value and substance to all our meetings and interactions. If you are looking for example for figures, like the ones that I mentioned, of trade between India and the other Indian Ocean countries, I think that question you probably will have to address to the Delegation of Bangladesh, which would be best placed to respond to that. But having said that, we value the Bangladesh’s contribution to all our deliberations, particularly in areas of scientific and technical cooperation and trade facilitation it has come up with some very useful suggestions and ideas and have been taken onboard.

Question (Iranian Media): I have one question. What is India’s plan to promote IOR-ARC’s status among other international organizations, for example, G8, G20 or SAARC? Do you plan to have a political body for this organization such as that organisations?

Secretary (ER): Thank you for that very interesting question. The Association’s objectives as defined in its charter are primarily economic and social wellbeing of the region. There is no proposal at the moment to give it a political content. However, when we talk about the strategic relevance of the Indian Ocean to all its membership, it is inevitable that some issues which are not necessarily purely economic in nature impact on the work of the Association. Take for example, I just mentioned this, maritime security, issues of piracy, issues of humanitarian access and disaster relief, these are not necessarily economic but they impinge and impact directly on the economic welfare of our region and the economic activities and objectives of our region. Therefore, they will certainly form part of the Association’s work. The other issue about its association with different bodies, given the value and the relevance of this Association not only to its members but also globally, because we are now talking of an oceanic domain which is a domain that is of interest and of relevance globally, we sense, and this is something that we are going to discuss, we would like IOR-ARC to position itself as an apex body for the region. It is the only association that brings together the entire rim. Therefore, as an apex body, should work with overlapping institutions like SAARC, like SADIC, like ASEAN to see whether we can build on commonalities. We would also for example like to work with the United Nations system, the ECOSOC, as we believe that we can bring value and substance to organizations like this. This is again a subject of ongoing debate and will be debated during this forthcoming meeting and I hope with positive outcomes. I cannot predict obviously what would happen. But my understanding is that it is very much in the minds of all the membership.

Question (Malaysian Media): I notice that IOR-ARC has steered clear of defence. Is this consciously done or given the fact that the increasing concern over American and Chinese presence in the Indian Ocean, which would of course affect all countries on the borders of the Ocean. Should this be on the table? And will it be on the table at this meeting?

Secretary (ER): Again the charter envisages this grouping as a primarily economic and social grouping. If there are needs and requirements, again I revert to this whole question of maritime security. We are not talking about defence here, we are talking about capacity building and cooperation, two hands being better than one in managing improved and improving maritime security environment in the Indian Ocean because that impacts on the work of the Association and that impacts on the wellbeing. You have piracy. Take for example, the incidents of piracy that have taken place. Today you see that rising insurance rates for shipping impact on the economic wellbeing of all our countries. Therefore, it is a fit subject and a relevant subject for it to be brought in. So, if you ask me directly a pointblank question whether defence is going to be brought in, I cannot give you an answer. If it is relevant to the charter, we will find a way to deal with it.

Question (Sultanate of Oman Media): When the Indian Embassy sent us the invitation for this conference, we did not know what this conference is about, even my boss. So we had to google it. I have heard that this was the case of many of the journalists in the group itself. So, do not you think that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs have to work more in promoting this conference and maybe make more fast and serious decisions that really make a difference in the Indian Ocean rim countries?
Secretary (ER): A splendid question! And you are spot on! I completely agree that the commonalities of the Indian Ocean and what we need to do should permeate very deeply into the thinking population, journalists, academics, because without that kind of awareness things are not going to move forward. Having said that, Oman is a founder member of IOR-ARC, you should have known what this conference is about.

Question (Bangladesh Media): I would like to know your organisation IOR-ARC...

Secretary (ER): Our organization please.

Question: Yes, our organization is working with various aspects. But especially maritime security is the most important part of this organisation’s work. I would like to know maritime boundary with Bangladesh has a complaint at international tribunal, which will be solved in 2014. Is not there any option or opportunity to solve the maritime boundary problem in discussion by this organization logically, reasonably we can resolve by this organization? Is there any opportunity? In this conference, can we discuss this?

Secretary (ER): I know there are mechanisms for dealing with these kinds of issues which routinely arise in many parts of the world. But no, this association as a conscious policy excludes bilateral or divisive issues. It is looking at areas where all the countries share a common interest and we can build capacities which will be of value to them. It excludes bilateral issues.

Question (Yemen Media): How do you look to the current economic cooperation that is going between Yemen and India as we have historical and business and investment right for centuries? And how do you look at the cooperation that is currently going on in the Association? When you discuss piracy, we know that Yemen has been affected badly by the piracy and the shipping to Yemen is the most expensive for security issues? You are helping us. What I know is that the insurance companies are not accepting to load the ships to Yemen when it comes to shipping. So, they rather go to Djibouti rather than going to Yemen. The prices are increasing tremendously because of the shipping costs. Can you just brief us on how you are helping Yemen to get out of this problem?

Secretary (ER): Very relevant. Yemen of course is at the forefront of this anti-piracy effort and has clearly been impacted very severely by what is happening. The whole challenge of piracy off the Horn of Africa which borders Yemen has clearly impacted very heavily. This has been identified as a priority for our efforts in IOR-ARC and will certainly be debated with some intensity, and some in-depth views will hopefully emerge. We are also looking at workshops and seminars for capacity building in this particular area. A couple have already been held and we are looking at organizing one in, if I am not mistaken, April next year on the whole issue of maritime security and piracy. We are planning to hold a seminar in India which can act as a focus for cooperation within IOR-ARC in this area. You ask me a little bit about bilateral figures of trade and investment between India and Yemen. I am afraid I do not think I have the bilateral figures with me but we can certainly get them for you. That is no problem at all. At this point of time I am not in a position to share this with you.

Question: ... (Inaudible)...

Secretary (ER): Of course, historically the relations between Yemen and the west coast of India go very very far back. Born on the monsoon winds, which blow in one direction for half of the year and the other direction for the other half, our traders have been moving back and forth between the Yemen coast and the west coast of India. There is actually a wealth of historical documentation and literature for that matter. It has spawned some superb literature, stories and so on in India, historically. We had an exhibition of archives under the Indian Ocean Association auspices recently. The archival material available with the National Archives of India should bring out vividly and beautifully the kind of exchanges that used to exist between India and Yemen historically. But the potential is growing.

Question (Singapore Media): You said that 90 per cent of economic imports and 80 per cent of international trade go through the Indian Ocean. Is that correct?

Secretary (ER): The figures that you mentioned pertain to India. Ninety per cent of India’s energy exports come across the Indian Ocean. Question (Singapore): Okay. You have also said that piracy is impacting the economies of the IOR-ARC nations. The melting ice in the North Pole is opening up new sea routes. Will this affect the economies of the IOR-ARC countries? If it does, what is the plan that the organization has?

Secretary (ER): That is looking very far into the future. But yes, that is an area of interest undoubtedly.

Question (Singapore Media): It has already started and the shipping lanes ...

Secretary (ER): The melting of ice has already started and there is a whole host of implications. One can debate them and study them. I would certainly like the Academic Group for that matter of IOR-ARC to take this on as a subject of its interest, very much. The Academic Group will deliberate on this. If not this time, it will do it next time. We meet every year.

Question (Iran Media): Do you have any special plans to enhance trade interaction with Iran within the framework of this Association given the fact that Iran is under sanctions and India needs Iran oil and we import goods from India?
Secretary (ER): I think that is a little bit outside the purview of the work of this association. Certainly the Association would be looking at matters of trade facilitation, ease of business and so on and so forth. But where it comes to bilateral issues, and these kind of issues, I think that is a little beyond the purview of this Association.

Question (Indonesia Media): As we know, Somalia is the host of these pirates. Is there any plan of the Association to include Somalia into this Association? Or is there any plan of a legal or political action against Somalia for this case?

Secretary (ER): The issue of piracy I do not think can be categorized in black and white terms. There are a whole host of elements that are behind the growth of this scourge in the western Indian Ocean. It is issues of livelihood, it is issues of governance, it is a whole host of factors that come into play. So, these are not easy issues for which you can find immediate answers. The issue of combating piracy will certainly be a subject and a very important subject, a priority subject in IOR-ARC discussions, workshops and seminars, but perhaps not in such a black and white manner in which you are putting it.

As far as Somalia joining the association, yes, at some point in future, if you are looking at an inclusive association of the Indian Ocean, when it is in a position to join, when it has a government – there is a transitional government of course – but a government that is in a position to contribute and benefit from this Association.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much. With that we come to the end of this part of the interaction.

Gurgaon, November 2, 2012.

Excellencies,

Distinguished Leaders and Delegates,

Representatives of the Media,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I extend a very warm welcome to all of you to the 12th Council of Ministers’ Meeting of Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation at Gurgaon. The city of Gurgaon is rightfully called the industrial and financial power house of the State of Haryana, and its vitality and dynamism perfectly complement those of India’s Capital, New Delhi.

I do hope that you are all comfortable and have had an opportunity for some rest after your arrival.

This is the second and last meeting of the Council of Ministers under India’s current Chairmanship of our Association. Over the last year, since we assumed the Chair at Bengaluru last November, India has worked closely with her IOR-ARC partners to further deepen and consolidate our cooperation in pursuit of our shared objectives.

We have taken our agenda forward and a number of activities have been successfully concluded in each of the six priority areas identified for IORARC at Bengaluru, namely maritime security and safety, disaster risk reduction, trade & investment facilitation, fisheries management, academic and S&T cooperation, and tourism and cultural exchanges.

It gives me pleasure to report that several programmes were undertaken under these priority areas. These include a professional course for diplomats from IORARC countries, a workshop on coastal zone management, a meeting of Heads of National Archives of our countries, a mobile exhibition of archival documents from IORARC countries and a separate IORARC segment in the forthcoming International Film Festival of India in Goa this month. The first meeting of the Core Group on Cultural Cooperation, the 13th Meeting of the Working Group of Heads of Mission and a meeting to finalize the Draft Constitution of the University Mobility in the Indian Ocean Region were held in South Africa earlier this year. The Regional Centre for Science and Technology Transfer hosted a number of useful programmes to further our cooperation in the arena of Science and Technology.
The IOR ARC Report on Trade and Investment prepared by the Indian think-tank ‘Research and Information Systems for Developing Countries’ (RIS) was released followed by two very useful workshops on Trade Facilitation and Customs Harmonization, and on Trade Policy, held in India and Australia earlier this year. The active participation by member countries in all these programmes is a reaffirmation of our collective commitment to our Association. These initiatives have helped further consolidation of the cooperative agenda.

A mid-term meeting of Committee of Senior Officials was held in Mauritius in May this year under India’s Chairmanship to take stock of the progress in our cooperation. India has made the payment of US $1 million towards the Special Fund as was committed by us at Bengaluru in November 2011.

These are a few highlights of the activities over the last one year. The Secretary General and the Chairman of the Committee of Senior Officials would provide details later in the day.

India, as the Chair, is committed to maintain the momentum gained by our Association during the last one year in pursuit of our aim to deliver tangible benefits to the peoples of the IOR region.

Excellencies,

Before I proceed further, I would like to place on record our appreciation for our officials, business chambers and academics, as well as the IOR-ARC Secretariat, for the hard work they have put in to prepare for our meeting today.

With these few words, I have the honour to declare open the 12th Council of Ministers’ Meeting.

I request the Secretary General to make his opening remarks.
170. Statement by External Affairs Minister Salaman Khurshid at the 12th Council of Ministers’ Meeting of the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation (IOR-ARC).

Gurgoan, November 2, 2012.

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

I now have the honour to begin the proceedings of our meeting.

We are meeting today at an important juncture. We launched IORARC in 1997, a decade and a half ago, with the primary objective of promoting sustained growth and balanced development of the region and of its Member States. IORARC has helped promote understanding and cooperation amongst our countries over these years, yet immense untapped potential remains.

The geo-strategic importance of the Indian Ocean cannot be underestimated. As focus of global economic growth shifts to Asia, it will occupy even greater salience in our strategic perspective. We envision IORARC as a regional body that can respond effectively to this need and enhance our individual and collective capacities to deal with contemporary challenges facing our common maritime domain. It must be strengthened to enable it to rise to our expectations.

We considered it appropriate, therefore, to focus our deliberations today on the theme “IORARC at 15 – the Next Decade”. In our view, the objective of this exercise should be to lay down a roadmap and agenda for our Association for the coming years that will eventually establish IORARC as an apex organization for the Indian Ocean region.

Our region is characterized by great diversities in size, population and levels of development. A prospective roadmap for our Association must therefore be inclusive, taking IORARC forward at a pace acceptable to all.

Secondly, in facilitating the creation of a regional climate conducive to peace and prosperity, IORARC should aim at opening as many channels of communication and cooperation amongst its membership as feasible. It must thus be comprehensive, an integrated effort bringing together governments, civil society and business and deepening people-to-people contacts.

And finally, its agenda must reflect common regional interests that hold value for its membership. We took the first steps when we last met in Bengaluru in November 2011, and identified six priorities for our Association’s work, including maritime security and safety, disaster risk reduction, trade & investment facilitation, fisheries management, academic and S&T cooperation, and tourism and cultural exchanges.
Each of these areas has its own relevance for us. Here I would like to touch on just three aspects.

IORARC follows an approach best defined as “cooperative regionalism”. IORARC does not impose binding conditionalities on its membership. Rather, it provides a platform for discussion and cooperative engagement on issues of common regional interest, and on which members can offer their capacities and facilities to regional partners for their benefit. Economic cooperation is at the core of our collective effort, and we need to consider appropriate initiatives aimed at meeting the developmental, energy and food security needs of our region, new infrastructural linkages with enhanced connectivity, and trade and investment facilitation that builds on the complementarities in our economic strengths.

Job creation for our growing youthful populations is an imperative across our region. Capacity building and skilling in all our identified priority areas is a cross-cutting need, which IORARC can also address.

Economic development cooperation requires a conducive environment to flower. Security of maritime commerce and safety of seafarers are of concern to all of us. There is a need, for example, to be more precise in defining High Risk Areas in the Indian Ocean, based on actual incidents of piracy, as this impacts adversely on insurance premiums and adds to the cost of shipping in our region. India will host an IORARC seminar on maritime security in early 2013, and we should consider its institutionalization as a regional forum for continuing exchange of views and monitoring of the situation.

Finally, we should consider ways and means of providing greater structure to the IORARC process, and enhancing the capacity of the Secretariat to support this effort. We could consider having a theme of contemporary relevance for future Council meetings, for example, as we have done for this one, which can help focus our discussions on the issues at hand.

Excellencies, I thank you again for your support. I look forward to hearing your views.

Thank you.

Gurgoan, November 2, 2012.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Good evening ladies and gentlemen. I welcome you to this media interaction. We have here with us the External Affairs Minister of India Shri Salman Khurshid. Along with him is Shri Sudhir Vyas, who is Secretary (Economic Relations) and was the Senior Indian Representative at the 12th Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation meetings.

As is usual, we will have opening remarks by the Minister followed by a few questions. May I now request the Minister to make his opening remarks?

External Affairs Minister (Shri Salman Khurshid): Thank you. Good evening to all of you.

Friends, it is a privilege to be addressing a very exclusive band of journalists who do the foreign circuit. You report on what I believe is a very important part of the profile of our country across the globe.

Foreign policy has a historical significance and I believe that the consensus in this country, if at all there is a consensus on anything, has always been on foreign policy. It is a tribute to the leaders of our country indeed and several generations of outstanding diplomats who have served this country with great distinction, that they have not only... (inaudible)... and given to our country a remarkable platform to project our national interests and to ensure that the world not only coordinates its efforts with the aspirations of our country but treats us truly as a responsible part of the international scene. With that sense of responsibility we have made our contributions, I believe, to some very important decisions in the world, and I hope that in the times to come we will continue to play that role effectively.

We have gathered here today to brief you on a very important event that has taken place which is the Twelfth Meeting of the Council of Ministers of the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation. Many years ago when I was Minister of State I saw this emerge as an outstanding initiative by countries that have a link not in the normal course by way of a landmass that they share but by way of common linkages, both historical and geopolitical, that they have through the high seas. It was in that sense a new initiative. We are now 15 years down the road and when we met today at a very important juncture, the theme being Looking Ahead to the Next Decade, having looked back with satisfaction over the last fifteen years.

I hope you guys have looked at the Gurgaon Communique. To my knowledge, this is the first time that on the international stage Gurgaon has appeared as a gathering for convergence of aspirations on an international plane, and that too for convergence of aspirations of the countries around the Indian Ocean Rim in which India both by size and its position plays a very significant role.

We have had extremely useful discussions. The environment I believe was marked with a remarkable amount of mutual trust, warmth, cordiality and friendship. We believe that we have achieved the right chemistry that we needed today to take the Association forward in line with members’ needs, their aspirations and expectations. You obviously are familiar that this is a gathering which has great diversity, not simply in terms of size, populations, significant associations with other regional groups. That diversity indeed is what we have tried to work into our strength.

The evolving strategic environment in the Indian Ocean is something that we cannot lose sight of. That is the backdrop in which we have made our endeavours. It is becoming increasingly critical to the world’s economic and energy security, even more so for countries, members of IOR-ARC, that are on its rim. This is the third largest body of water in the world connecting developed countries in the West to the rapidly-growing countries in the East. The sea lanes across the Indian Ocean are, therefore, critical to global economy. You know that 80 per cent of the world’s seaborne trade in oil for instance transits through the Indian Ocean.

So, fifteen years ago in 1997 this was set up, the only Indian Ocean Regional Organisation of this kind. It seeks to promote sustained growth, balanced development of the region, cooperation in development of human resources, economic and technical cooperation, expansion of trade and investment, strengthening of dialogue in international fora, and on global economic and other issues of mutual interest.

For us, under India’s chairmanship this is the second Council of Ministers’ meeting. You would recall that India assumed the chair for a period of two years at the Eleventh Meeting that was held in Bengaluru last year. We hosted that meeting in Bengaluru in November 2011. Of course there were obviously very high hopes and expectations of India. We had identified six priority areas which were: maritime security and safety which remains a matter of grave concern, disaster risk reduction, trade and investment facilitation, fisheries management, academic, science and technology cooperation, tourism and cultural exchanges.

As I said, fifteen years over and ten years ahead is what we are looking at. I believe some very far-reaching suggestions and proposals have come forward. Many will be worked upon. We are looking at out-of-the-box suggestions. Of course this is the time world over we are all very tight as far as finances are concerned. Yet, I do believe the important initiatives which have been taken must go forward and India would be willing to partner every possible effort to make sure that we succeed with the aspirations of IOR-ARC membership.

I want to share with you that today we have our twentieth member, a new member that has joined us today, the Union of Comoros. So, that is twenty members. We have also taken a far-reaching decision consensually, which is how all our decisions are taken, and the United States of America is welcomed as the sixth dialogue partner. The expansion of the IOR-ARC membership with Seychelles and the Union of Comoros joining as members and the US as a dialogue partner under India’s chair, is the manifestation of a growing interest that the world community has in our efforts. The Council has also welcomed Indonesia as the next Vice-Chair of the Association who would take over from Australia when Australia gets into the chair.

It has been my privilege and honour to host the Foreign Ministers, many of whom I had very useful bilaterals with, and Heads of Delegation of various members, dialogue partners, observers, in Gurgaon, a city which is fast turning into a global destination for corporate and multinationals. I hope that we have not only reciprocated adequately to the hospitality offered to us by Gurgaon and I thank the Chief Minister of Haryana on this occasion. I thank them all who participated, our delegates and the heads of delegations, for their constructive contributions. They help us make this a great success. We look forward now to the next meeting in 2013 in Australia when Australia will assume the Chair of the Association from us. I would once again like to thank the Government of Haryana as well as the administration of Gurgaon for facilitating, assisting with enthusiasm, warmth and making this an event worth remembering.

Thank you very much. I will be happy to answer your questions.

Question (Mr. Manish Chand, IANS): In an important step the United States joined today as the dialogue partner of the IOR-ARC. In what way does the US bring value to this regional body?

Secondly, we learned there was a proposal for renaming this body because many people feel the current name is honestly speaking unpronounceable or is not a fitting acronym. Was there any discussion on that?

External Affairs Minister: Yes, indeed, there was discussion on it. I did find it is a little bit of a tongue twister. You have to pause to be able to get it right. There is a sense that we could simplify it and make it user-friendly. I think that fifteen years is not so long that people get very attached to a particular phrase or a particular word. I think this was looked at very seriously. There are some issues that need to be examined, the Secretariat will have them examined, including issues on the legal position. I think once that is done we would be able to move forward. The sense was that it would be good to shorten it and make it more user-friendly. Hopefully, we will see this happen in the future.
As far as the United States of America is concerned, you know that the world's two largest and oldest democracies are India and the United States in a different way of defining ourselves. We do have a strategic relationship with the United States of America as far as India is concerned. Therefore, the consensual invitation and acceptance of the United States as a dialogue partner is obviously something to be welcomed. We are very pleased that this decision has been taken. The United States has a very important role in world governance and world institutions. Their participating as a dialogue partner will add value to the discussions and deliberations that take place here and certainly make our decisions more far-reaching and get endorsed more, in a sense, globally than we would be doing it only if we restricted to ourselves to the rim. But of course the thrust and the concerns and the priorities will remain that of the members of the rim. There are other dialogue partners and I think this is a positive step that has been taken. I do acknowledge and applaud the consensual manner in which firstly the Senior Officials and then the Heads of Delegations welcomed this decision.

Question (Mr. Venkat Narayan): Mr. Minister, in the morning you have made a remark to the effect that there should be a university which will deal with the issues concerning the whole Indian Ocean rim region. Was that discussed in any detail or is that just an idea floated by you? There is no reference to it in the Communique. What do you have in mind and what would you like to achieve through that?

External Affairs Minister: As you know, a university is not small project and certainly a University of the Indian Ocean would be I think on a scale that is not easily put together. My sense is that the idea was received well, I have only flagged the idea. It is a big ticket idea. We are today conscious that we should not as countries over commit ourselves to finances.

India is involved, as you know, in two very major universities that are now in the process of being nurtured - one is the Nalanda University and the other one is the South Asia University. I think both of them are very significant universities. But we all know that there is a growing need for multidisciplinary institutions and universities. There is a great thirst for knowledge and we are into the knowledge age. Therefore, the cutting edge is particularly in the Indian Ocean region. Looking at our historical, geopolitical, cultural and commercial dimensions a university of the Indian Ocean can be actually unique.

I just threw the idea at my colleagues to see who would want to snap up a university opportunity. I do not think we should pretend or try to be monopolistic and get every good idea for ourselves. This is a shared aspiration, and we would be willing to work with anyone who thinks that this university could be situated there. Of course, India is always ready and willing. It is just an initial idea. It is, shall we say a twinkle in the eye and we will wait a little bit longer for it to move forward. But I am convinced that the sense that I received was that this is an idea that will be pursued diligently and quickly.

Question (Mr. Archis Mohan): This question is a little unrelated. Your predecessor, at his press conference after he quit, seemed to suggest that your present job required experience. With your relative inexperience - and you are the youngest Minister on the CCS - is that a hindrance? How steep has been the learning curve? What have been the changes that you find compared to your last stint here? How are you coping with a very hectic weekend with all that has been happening outside and not just in Delhi?

External Affairs Minister: I hit the ground running and I must say I was pleasantly surprised with the remarkable number of initiatives and the speed at which we are moving forward. I was very pleasantly surprised with an exceptionally efficient foreign affairs office, the Ministry of External Affairs. The talent is no less than it was when I was last in this Ministry. I think it has actually grown and it is certainly looking far greater than I saw it last time. There is a lot more work to be done, but greater efficiency and competence is visible even at first sight. I would not use the word being in great awe, but I would be happy to use the word awesome. It is a word you understand I think and more people understand these days than understood in the past.

There will be a lot of learning to do because there are a lot of new things that have happened in the world. The world has changed while I was away from this Ministry. But since I was not asleep all these years, it is not that I was rubbing my eyes and discovering the world. A lot of this is frankly familiar to me. A lot of what you have been writing and telling people is something that I have been reading since there is no extra cost on reading what you write on external affairs. I was not sure I would never come back to External Affairs. But I will not pretend to say that I never wanted to come back to External Affairs. So, I am happy to be here. I feel greatly honoured that I was found fit and suitable to be in this office. But there are some very experienced Foreign Ministers around the globe. And some of them said that they welcome me to the travelers club. So, I know that I have a lot of travelling to do.

Let me just say that the first three days have passed somewhat pleasantly and I am very happy to see that I will be chased around by eminent and successful and wonderful journalists like all of you, and that it is going to be a little more difficult than answering questions in Uttar Pradesh. So, let us just take it a step at a time. I am willing to learn. I have been a teacher too. So, I will learn from those who can teach me and I will teach those who can learn from me. That is what I wish to do.

Question (Ms. Anchal Vohra, NDTV): Sir, this is also unrelated but something that I really wanted to ask and now that you are really... (Inaudible)... What is the update on the Kazmi case, on the attack on the Israeli diplomat in India because Kazmi has got bail. We found out that Israelis are very unhappy. Has Israel's Ambassador got in touch with the Ministry of External Affairs, has he expressed his unhappiness? What is happening on that?

External Affairs Minister: Let me just say this to you that of course people remain in touch all the time and people do not get in touch only when they are unhappy. People are in touch all the time because their messages have to tavel, and that is the whole point of having diplomatic missions and having Ambassadors that you ask questions and you give information and you seek assistance and you urge and persuade the host Government to pay attention to what is your concern. I can assure you that just as we remain concerned about issues that are of great importance to us which we convey from time to time to the diplomats representing other countries, we also certainly pay heed and attend to any concern that they may address.

In this context, which is after all a matter of rule of law, we do not and cannot interfere in the pronouncements of courts. We can assist the courts through best possible counsel and the material that can be supplied by agencies that are required to supply material to the courts. Our impression is that the evidence with which and the concern that we expressed in the investigation of the matter and ensuring that the people responsible are brought to book and produced before court, there was a great satisfaction expressed to us. I am not sure if that satisfaction level has come down, but if at all anyone has any concern, that concern will be factored in. And I am sure that the agencies under the law who appear in the matter would do their utmost that they have to. I think everyone understands that India has a very strong rule of law and that the courts are entirely autonomous, independent. We can at best assist courts. We are not always happy and necessarily satisfied with the decisions courts take, but the courts do take decisions that we have to respect. That is the final word. We do not have a system in which we can go beyond a decision that the courts can take. I think trust and faith in our courts is paramount for our democracy. And I hope that all our partner countries and friends will understand this as well, just as we understand decisions that are taken by their independent and autonomous courts of law.

Question (Mr. Saurabh Shukla): Mr. Minister, just two quick questions. India and Pakistan will be resuming the cricket ties. Pakistan cricket team is coming to India. There have been some reservations in certain quarters. Bal Thackeray has written about it. How does the MEA and you as the Minister view this?
And you said you would be a frequent traveler now. How will you cope up with people like India Against Corruption who are obviously taking up stuff in your Constituency Farrukhabad?
External Affairs Minister: I am not sure that anyone is moving residence to my Constituency. If they are, it will rid India of them because they would be concentrating on one Constituency. As far as I have responsibilities to fulfill I think the nation would be conscious that anyone that represents a nation abroad represents the nation and not a party, and not just the Government. We have a responsibility to speak for India, with our without banners my job is to speak for India. I speak for the whole country. I do not speak for one segment, one section or one group of people.

As far as issues about handling any dissent in our democracy or any disagreement in our democracy is concerned, there are Ministers and party officials who are obviously authorized and mandated to deal with subjects that come under their purview. I think that you would all agree that the Foreign Minister of India should be left to look after India’s interests globally rather than be distracted by dissent and disagreement on something that has happened within the country. We have a lot of very competent people both in the bureaucracy, the Council of Ministers and in the political parties - not my party alone - who can handle issues in a democratic manner.

On cricketing ties, I like watching cricket. These are issues that are decided from time to time by people who have the authority and who have the mandate to decide how far they should go. I think that we should have faith in them and we should trust them. It is not always that the matters require Government intervention. But as far as cricket is concerned, we are certainly concerned about issues that relate to accountability for a very unwholesome attack on our citizens. We expect all countries including our neighbouring country Pakistan to deliver on their frequently indicated promise, or for that matter an indication that they will make those people accountable. There is no question of dilution of our demand, expectation as far as that is concerned.

But my understanding of dealing with difficult situations with neighbours has been that we do put aside some issues on which there is an immediate resolution, and we continue with those issues on which consensually it is possible to have improvement of relations. I do not think isolation or cutting of any contact or any communication has ever helped. We do hope that this will be seen more as an attempt to persuade people that this is collaborative effort, and what was a conflict must be put to an end. It is a conflict on which there must be delivery of expectations that we have. But we do not want the clock to come to a standstill. The clock does move forward.

I think a degree of aloofness was called for, and I think that aloofness was shown by our cricketing bodies. If they in their assessment have come to the conclusion that there is now time to open a window, I think we should respect their decision for this. Of course, it is always possible to review any decision we take. This is not an irreversible or a permanent decision that they would have taken. And as and when they need advice from us or we need to advice them, I am sure that will be done. Not everything done is done publicly. A lot of this has to be done discreetly and has to be done behind closed doors because we do not want our attitudes to be projected in unfavourable light.

We are cautious, we are careful, we are committed to the security of our country and our people. We are committed to accountability for the wrong that has been done. But we do want to look at a possible future, a future that is not held hostage by the past.

Question (Mr. Sachin Parashar, The Times of India): Sir, my question is about Sri Lanka. In the past few weeks we have seen that there have been repeated calls by forces from within the Government including their Defence Secretary that Sri Lanka do away with the Thirteenth Amendment altogether. I want to ask you if you took up this with your counterpart who you met this morning. If yes, what was his response?

External Affairs Minister: Sorry, I do not understand the thrust of that question because my understanding is that we would rather support the Thirteenth Amendment and that we have been given indications from time to time formally, officially, even privately, we have been given reaffirmation of the Thirteenth Amendment. If anything, we have understood that there is a demand from one side for going beyond the Thirteenth Amendment and that the Thirteenth Amendment would not be adequate. This is my understanding of the distance between the two sides on moving forward. We have no indication whatsoever that there is an issue of dilution or a reversal of the Thirteenth Amendment.

The bottom line that we know is that the Thirteenth Amendment stands and the Thirteenth Amendment is reaffirmed, but that there is now an expectation that has been placed that there is need to go beyond the Thirteenth Amendment. How soon that is possible, if at all it is possible what will be the procedure and the process that will be undertaken to examine this further, what will be its impact on the deadlines and dates that Sri Lanka has set for itself for elections in the Northern Province which is sometime next year, this is the matter that we will have to watch and wait for. I think that it is an internal matter for that country. It of course has an implication for us, but it is an internal matter for that country and there are, I am sure, some very competent people and sensitive people.

I would like to share with you that my meeting with the Sri Lanka Foreign Minister was a very rewarding meeting. It so happens that he is a senior of mine from Oxford, and perhaps Oxford people speak the same language. So, I may have understood his language better than I might have understood anyone else’s language. I did have a very rewarding and very satisfying meeting with him. I must say that we had a very candid and a very frank exchange of views, and an extremely helpful exchange of views.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much.

With that, we come to the end of this interaction.
172. Gurgaon Communiqué issued on the conclusion of the 12th Meeting of the Council of Ministers of IOR-ARC - at 15 - The Next Decade.

Gurgaon, November 2, 2012.

We, the Ministers of Member States of the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation (IORARC), met at Gurgaon, India, for the 12th Meeting of the Council of Ministers on 2nd November 2012. Our meeting was held in an environment marked by warmth, cordiality and openness.

2. Our meeting followed the 14th meeting of the Committee of Senior Officials, the 18th meeting of the IOR Academic Group, the 12th meeting of the Working Group on Trade & Investment and the 18th meeting of the IOR Business Forum. Their recommendations enriched our agenda and supported our work.

3. We thank the Committee of Senior Officials and all those involved in the three forums for their efforts. We also appreciate the hard work put in by the Secretary General and his team and their commitment to furthering the activities of the Association.

4. Our Association turned 15 this year. Set up in 1997 with the primary objective of promoting “sustained growth and balanced development of the region and of its Member States, and create common ground for regional economic cooperation”, IORARC is the apex pan-Indian Ocean multilateral forum with its membership open to all sovereign States of the Indian Ocean rim that adhere to the principles and objectives of its Charter. Over the years, IORARC has helped build and expand understanding and mutually beneficial cooperation, and facilitated the creation of a regional climate conducive to peace and prosperity.

5. We feel that the time has come now for IORARC to take the necessary steps, through an inclusive approach and in conformity with its Charter, to strengthen its institutions and enhance their capabilities, to play its due role as the apex organization in the Indian Ocean region that can effectively deliver on issues of contemporary relevance to its Members.

6. At our last meeting in Bengaluru in November 2011, we had identified six priority areas for our cooperation agenda, maritime security and piracy, disaster risk reduction, trade & investment facilitation, fisheries management, academic and S&T cooperation, and tourism and cultural exchanges. We believe that the outcome of the Bengaluru meeting has helped bring greater focus on our Association’s work. We are pleased to note that a number of useful cooperation initiatives have since been and are being taken in each of these priority areas.

7. The geo-strategic importance of the Indian Ocean cannot be underestimated. Its stability and well-being are critical for global economic multilateral cooperation

We are convinced that we can augment our capacities to deal with our common challenges in a more effective manner by forging enduring partnerships amongst ourselves. We support closer interaction between our Association and regional organizations in the Indian Ocean, such as the African Union.

8. Piracy is an increasingly serious concern, posing a threat to maritime commerce and the safety of sea farers, making insurance costlier and adding to the costs incurred by the shipping industry in the Indian Ocean Region. Weak governance and instability in parts of the region have contributed to its degeneration into transnational organized crime. We welcome the emphasis that our Association has placed on cooperation in maritime security issues in the Indian Ocean and reaffirm the importance of maintaining freedom of navigation and safety and security of Sea Lanes of Communication in the Indian Ocean.

9. We note that several useful regional and multilateral initiatives to deliberate on various relevant aspects of the fight against piracy have been taken in the Indian Ocean region, and IORARC should consider ways of engaging with these where feasible and complementing each other’s efforts. We would like the IORARC seminar on maritime security scheduled for 2013 to consider concrete proposals of cooperation in this broad area, including institutionalization of a regional mechanism for continuing exchange of views and monitoring of the situation.

10. We believe that IORARC offers a useful platform for exchanging information on white shipping, and developing legislative frameworks and sharing best practices in coastal security and regulation of fishing activities in coastal waters.

11. We underscore the importance of better preparedness to fight natural and other disasters in our maritime domain. Cooperation in search and rescue and training in oil spill response are relevant areas for IORARC. We also acknowledge the need to develop cooperation among our agencies concerned to evolve regional disaster management strategies and operational processes.

12. Several Member States have experienced rapid economic growth. IORARC should consider ways to utilize this economic potential, including that offered by blue economy, for increased intra- and inter-regional trade for the benefit of all member states. While reiterating our commitment to free trade, we see trade facilitation measures as an important dimension in the context of regional trade and investment expansion. In this regard, we welcome the regional workshops on Customs harmonization and Trade Policy held this year as potentially contributing to ease of business, and direct the Working Group on Trade and Investment to take these initiatives forward.

13. The connectivity provided by the Indian Ocean has played an important part in our shared history and will continue to shape our collective destiny. Enhanced connectivity can have a catalytic effect on economic integration by drastically reducing the costs of doing business, and we must find ways of enhancing regional connectivity to realize the full potential of economic cooperation in our region.

14. In this context, development of port and harbour infrastructure in the region assumes critical importance. We direct the Working Group on Trade and Investment to explore the potential of cooperation in this sector, including investment in and upgradation of shipping infrastructure and logistic chains in the region. This would act as an economic multiplier, facilitating growth in individual rim economies.

15. We emphasize the need of building human connectivity through deepening cultural cooperation and promoting tourism in the region which is marked by diversity in social and cultural values.

16. IORARC has developed valuable assets in the form of institutions, such as the Fisheries Support Unit, Maritime Transport Council and Regional Centre for Science and Technology Transfer. We welcome the activities undertaken by them in relevant priority areas on our agenda. We would like these institutions to develop into nodal centres of excellence and to network with other institutions in their respective fields in the region.

17. We attach high importance to our cooperation in the academic and S&T area. The IOR Academic Group should continue to pursue well-thought out initiatives of relevance to our region and member states, implement them in a timely manner, and consider possibilities of promoting exchanges of scholars and scientific and technical experts in this context. We encourage studies on areas of contemporary and regional significance for member States such as climate change, marine biology, coastal management, capacity building in ICT, analysis in investment promotion, etc. We express our appreciation at the successful hosting of IORARC programmes such as the meeting of Heads of National Archives and the mobile Exhibition of Archival material, and the workshop on Multidisciplinary Oceanographic Observations for Coastal Zone Management in India and encourage institutions in our region to develop an agenda for cooperation for action in these and other relevant subjects. We encourage member States to participate in different programmes organized under the Association.

18. We emphasize the important role that the IORARC Troika can play in coordinating cooperation through regular interaction amongst its members. We also recognize the need to strengthen the IORARC Secretariat and enhance its capabilities to support the activities of our Association.

19. We welcome the simplified procedures for utilization of the IORARC
Special Fund and encourage all members to contribute to and make use of the Special Fund of IORARC for effective implementation of programmes in priority areas of the Association.

20. We welcome the Union of Comoros as the 20th member of our Association. We have also decided to admit the United States of America as the 6th Dialogue Partner of IORARC.

21. We thank the Minister of External Affairs of the Republic of India for the warm hospitality extended to us and our delegations and making excellent arrangements for hosting the 12th Council of Ministers and other meetings at Gurgaon. We look forward to continuing our engagement and meeting in Australia in 2013.
Media Briefing by Foreign Secretary on Prime Minister's visit to Iran to attend the XVI NAM Summit.

New Delhi, August 25, 2012

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Good afternoon friends and thank you very much for coming for this media interaction with the Foreign Secretary on the Prime Minister's visit to Tehran for the Non-Aligned Movement Meeting.

As is usual, we will begin with a few opening remarks by the Foreign Secretary followed by any questions that you may have.

Before I begin, I also wanted to mention that along with Foreign Secretary is Mr. Yash Sinha who is Joint Secretary (Pakistan, Afghanistan & Iran) and he will be assisting the Foreign Secretary in case there are any questions that you may like to ask on that matter too.

With that I request the Foreign Secretary to make his opening remarks, and then we will follow with the Question & Answer Session. Foreign Secretary.

Foreign Secretary (Shri Ranjan Mathai): Thank you, Akbar. Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh will be visiting Iran to participate in the Sixteenth Summit Meeting of the Heads of State and Government of the Non-Aligned Movement which is being held at Tehran on 30th and 31st August, 2012.

This will be the third NAM Summit in which Prime Minister Dr. Singh is participating. He had earlier participated in the NAM Summit held at Sharm el-Sheikh in Egypt in July 2009, and earlier at the Summit in Havana in Cuba in September 2006. PM will address the Summit during the General Debate on 30th August.

The theme of the Tehran NAM Summit is "Lasting Peace through Joint Global Governance". An interactive debate on this subject is expected at the Ministerial Segment of the Summit on 28th and 29th August.

As is customary in NAM Summits, the Tehran Summit will also have comprehensive discussion on major global regional and sub-regional issues as well as issues relating to social and economic matters. The Summit meeting is expected to adopt a Final Document, which is a rather lengthy document, listing the Movement's position on all important international issues.

The Summit level meeting will be preceded by a customary Ministerial meeting, to which I referred, which will be on 28th and 29th August, and a Senior Officials Meeting on 26th and 27th August. The External Affairs Minister Shri S. M. Krishna will represent India at the Ministerial Meeting. The External Affairs Minister will also represent India at the NAM Ministerial Committee on Palestine which is scheduled to meet separately in the evening of 28th August. I will be leading the Indian delegation for the Senior Officials meeting which starts tomorrow.

Non-alignment has been the bedrock of India’s foreign policy since it was enunciated by the first Prime Minister of India Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. In the post-Cold War era, when the world is no longer divided into two military blocs, the Non-Aligned Movement has a renewed role to play in the emerging world order. Today NAM seeks to articulate the concerns of the developing countries regarding the contemporary global challenges facing the international community such as food security, protection of the environment and the reform of the institutions of global governance.

As a founding-member of the Non-Aligned Movement, India has consistently striven to ensure that the Movement moves forward on the basis of cooperation and constructive engagement rather than confrontation, and that it straddles the differences of the traditional North-South divide. India’s commitment to NAM is firm and abiding and this will be the guiding principle for our participation at the Tehran Summit.

Prior to this multilateral event, Prime Minister will have bilateral engagements with the Supreme Leader and President of Iran on 29th August. This will be the first bilateral visit at this level after 2001. India shares historical and cultural links with Iran and in recent times the relationship has expanded to include cooperation in diverse fields like hydrocarbons, trade and economic matters, consultations on important international and regional issues, cultural and people-to-people contacts.

During the Prime Minister’s meetings with the leadership of Iran he will review the state of bilateral relations and discuss all issues of interest to us. The Prime Minister is likely to meet representatives of the Indian community based in Iran.

Finally, Prime Minister will also be meeting with some of the leaders from other NAM countries participating in the Summit. This is subject to scheduling arrangements because arrivals and departures of various leaders makes the time available somewhat limited. Many of the other leaders are arriving only late on the 29th and some on the 30th. But we expect to fix meetings with the leaders of Bangladesh, Afghanistan, Nepal and Pakistan. And we are scheduling a pull-aside meeting, subject to time constraints making it possible, with the President of Egypt.

Thank you.

Official Spokesperson: Before we open the floor for questions, may I request that all questions related to NAM and Iran be asked first. And if there is time, then Foreign Secretary will take questions on any other issue. We will begin with NAM and Iran.

Question: Sir, Susan Rice was here a few days ago. The US is obviously a factor when it comes to India’s relations with Iran in terms of their views and their perceptions on the bilateral engagement. Have they formally raised any concerns that they would like India to take to Iran when this visit does take place both at the NAM level and at the bilateral level with the leadership of Iran, America’s concerns and how India will sort of negotiate or navigate?

Foreign Secretary: Susan Rice was here on really what was a private visit, but we did have a full discussion. NAM as such was not a topic for discussion with Ambassador Rice. We did discuss matters relating to Iran and other issues in West Asia, but formally no such issues were taken up.

Question: Sir, there was a report just this week that the Iranians would be giving the green signal to the Chabahar port investment deal. In the same story there was this reference that Afghanistan might not be very keen on that. So, I was wondering, what is the Indian position? Is there a possibility of an India-Afghanistan-Iran trilateral meeting?

Foreign Secretary: Yes, in fact we are hoping to schedule a trilateral meeting, this is what the Iranians had suggested, in fact tomorrow. This would be a meeting at the level of the Foreign Secretaries or Deputy Foreign Ministers of the three countries. The discussions between India and Iran on this issue have been under way for some time now. We have just received a report analyzing various options in the light of what Iran plans for the port. And this report has been given to us, which we had commissioned by the Indian Ports Association. It has a number of different possibilities and we are studying it. So, at this stage it is a little premature to prejudge the outcome of how the discussions would take place. But we have been told that a trilateral meeting would be held at my level.

Question: What is the present state of bilateral, economic, trade relations between India and Iran, and how the US sanctions come in the way of deepening economic relations between the two countries?

Foreign Secretary: Relations between our two countries have been strong. Trade relations have in fact been improving over the last few years. The balance of trade is still decisively in the favour of Iran because of the large scale oil purchases and the relatively small level of Indian exports. It is around 11 to 12 billion dollars from one side and two or three billion dollars, give or take a little, depending which year’s figures we use. We would certainly like to expand Indian exports to Iran. To give you the exact figures, total bilateral trade in 2011-12 was around 15.9 billion US dollars, of which imports to India was 13.5 billion dollars and exports from India was around 2.4 or 2.5 billion dollars.

We have emphasized again and again that we formally accept only the sanctions which are those implemented by the United Nations. But given the fact that there are a number of sanctions which have been introduced by other countries, there are problems which arise in terms of banking arrangements for trade, for shipping, insurance, and so on. So, these have had an impact on the level of the trade, particularly in the level of oil imports from Iran.

Question: Sir, the Iranians are coming up with a Resolution on Syria to finding a peaceful solution to the crisis there. Does India have a stand on this? Could you elaborate a little bit on India’s stand on the current situation?

Foreign Secretary: Actually the position of the Non-Aligned Movement in the final outcome document, that is the Declaration, was concluded in Sharm el-Sheikh one or two months ago. After that, we have not been told of any formal intention to have a separate declaration on Syria. What was agreed at Sharm el-Sheikh was, in fact, “that the Heads of State and Government took note of the efforts of the international community to deal with the situation in Syria. They welcomed the efforts of Mr. Kofi Annan and called for full implementation of the Joint Envoys Plan and its six points as well as the Security Council Resolutions 2042 and 2043. And they welcomed the acceptance by the Syrian Government of this plan”. This is what is in the document as it has been negotiated at the Meeting of Senior Officials in Sharm el-Sheikh. We fully endorse this position.

Question: Sir, you spoke of the meeting with the Supreme Leader Khamenei. We hear from the Iranian side that India wanted the meeting. Can you tell us what the issues are going to be? Also, Victoria Nuland last night has said specifically that America would be happy if India expressed American concerns about peace and security to the Iranians. Can you react to that please? What kind of American concerns are these and what really would be expressed by the Indian side, if they are?

Foreign Secretary: First of all, let me say that we have indeed proposed to schedule a meeting with the Supreme Leader. We have been told that it is being arranged. The exact timing will be known very soon. During this meeting, Prime Minister will of course raise all issues of importance in India-Iran bilateral relations, and issues of interest and concern to us. Peace and security is indeed our primary concern given just how important the entire West Asian region and the Gulf region in particular is for India’s security for the very large number of Indian citizens who live in that region and for the Indian economy both in terms of our oil imports and our exports. So, this is our own concern and we do not have to take anybody else’s concern as being a priority over that. This is indeed our own very specific concern. Prime Minister will raise those and definitely discuss issues relating to West Asia and issues relating to peace and security in the region from our perspective.

Question: Sir, there was this case of some Indian students being expelled by Iran in an apparent retaliation of some Iranian students being expelled from India. This matter was raised at various levels. Will it be coming up at the bilateral with Iran? And what is the status on this issue?

Foreign Secretary: This issue has been discussed with the Iranian side during various meetings including what was called the Bilateral Consular Committee, which was held some months ago. We have not had a final outcome of that, but we will continue to discuss it, probably while we are there in Tehran, and we hope that this issue will be resolved soon.

Joint Secretary was there at the Consular Committee's meeting, maybe he will tell you.

Joint Secretary (PAI) (Shri Y.K. Sinha): There is this issue of certain Iranian students also who had left from here over the last two years and three Indian students were also asked to leave from there. We are seeing how we can amicably resolve this issue, as Foreign Secretary mentioned. It has been discussed in various fora and various bilateral meetings and we would be taking this up again in Tehran, and we hope for an expeditious resolution of this issue.

Question: Sir, US Ambassador to the United Nations Susan Rice was here a couple of days ago. I believe there were discussions on Syria and Iran. In the context of the bilateral meeting, does the US expect us to carry any message to the Iranian President? Second, what proposals are we carrying to reinvigorate Non-Aligned Movement? What will be our pitch at the Non-Aligned Movement?

Foreign Secretary: I have answered the question regarding my discussions with Susan Rice. She was here on what was essentially a private visit but we took the opportunity to raise issues. We discussed, let me just clarify this, issues in front of the United Nations. That is the basis on which I had a discussion with her and that certainly included both Syria and Iran, and I have already said what was discussed at that level.

In terms of reinvigorating NAM, I think we are looking at NAM focusing on issues which unite the entire movement and the membership of the Movement rather than divisive and contentious issues. What we would like is a greater focus on issues of global governance, how the balance in international institutions should be, including the reform of the United Nations, reform of international financial institutions at one level. We would also like a focus on food security, on energy, on issues of sustainable development. We have had these major conferences at Rio, and this issue will be coming up in a number of other conferences. The time has come for the members of the NAM, which includes almost all the developing countries in the world, to give greater emphasis to finding common positions in regard to these global issues so that they can subserve the common interest of all developing countries.

Question: Sir, there was the issue of the attack on the Israeli diplomat here in Delhi and of course a series of other attacks elsewhere that also linked with the Iranians, and also the Delhi Police team that went to Iran alleged that they actually were not given much cooperation, how will this issue play out? Will there also be message that New Delhi should not be turned into some sort of a chessboard between these forces?

Foreign Secretary: Let me start by saying that we have not received the report of the police team which went there. As soon as we receive it, we would be able to decide what needs to be done. But in general terms when we are in Tehran and we meet at various levels - at the officials level, Ministerial level - we will certainly emphasize to Iran our desire that they should cooperate fully with us so that we can get to the bottom of this attack and ensure that India is not drawn into other people’s conflicts. But as I said, at this moment, I cannot comment in greater detail as we have not received the Delhi Police report yet.

Question: Sir, the last two meetings of the Non-Aligned Movement attended by the Prime Minister saw very big news between India and Pakistan, as you know, in Sharm el-Sheikh and Cuba. Do we expect anything substantial coming out of the proposed bilateral? Can you tell us what the focus would be from where new news can come out? As you know, Sharm el-Sheikh was a kind of a milestone.

Foreign Secretary: All I can say is that, as I mentioned in the beginning, we are scheduling these meetings. As soon as they are over, I will do a briefing.

Question: You just said that you are not aware of the Delhi Police team’s report.

Foreign Secretary: I have not received it.

Question: Isn’t that unusual that they went there without keeping the MEA in the loop?

Foreign Secretary: Let me clarify. They went abroad in a meeting which was arranged by us. What we are saying is their conclusions at the end of their visit, normally there would be a report which has not been received yet.

Question: The US and Israel have suggested that Tehran is not an appropriate place for a UN Secretary-General to visit, even if it is for the NAM Summit. Does India have a position on this?

Foreign Secretary: This is a matter for the UN Secretary-General to decide.
Question: Sir, you mentioned that you are going to meet your Iranian and Afghan counterparts in a trilateral. I know it is sort of before the event happened, but what are the proposals for example that India would be looking at?

Foreign Secretary: The proposal is specifically for a discussion on Chabahar. And when I say my counterparts, I know that the Iranian counterpart is there. Whether the Afghan counterpart would be the same person who normally interacts with me, I am not sure. But they have said at Deputy Foreign Minister's level they will be represented. The idea is to take forward a kind of general discussion as to what we need to do about Chabahar, what is our common interest in the development of the infrastructure, the port, developing the use of Chabahar and the related infrastructure as an alternative route into Afghanistan which we certainly regard as being of very great significance. So, we will discuss it.

But as I said, there are a number of options which are on the table given that the Iranians have a certain amount of infrastructure, they have a two-phase plan for developing that infrastructure – Phase 1 and Phase 2 – and there are options of participating in these. Separately they have an idea of developing an industrial zone just on the side of it and they are inviting investments in that zone. Beyond that there is a road infrastructure which already links Chabahar to the border of Afghanistan. The Iranians have plans for developing also the rail lines which will go from Chabahar not only towards the Afghan border but further to the Turkmen border through Mashad. All these raise a number of very interesting possibilities in terms of the reconstruction at the industrial developments in Afghanistan in which we have a very large stake. Afghanistan certainly also finds it of interest being an alternative route into their country from which they can get vital supplies. So, I think this is a common interest, and we are going to look at it. But as I said, between these very interesting concepts and general matter of interest, there is always the nuts and bolts of how it works, how much it will cost, whether it can be cost effective, if not this model what is a better model which could be more cost effective, these are the kinds of things on which we need expert level advice.

As I said, we have received some expert opinion from the Indian Ports Association. I will be discussing some of those issues with the Iranians and with the Afghans and then we will take it forward. What we would probably need is a kind of a Joint Working Group at experts' level to take up what we mutually decide is probably the best way to go. But it's early days yet.

Question: Going back to the Syrian issue that will be one of the agenda items in Tehran,… (Inaudible)… Sharm el-Sheikh Summit but on the ground situation has evolved dramatically and a lot of things happened.…. (Inaudible)…. And on the other side, do you have any bilateral scheduled with any other delegation?

Foreign Secretary: Let me clarify. What I read out was not from the Sharm el-Sheikh Summit but it was from the Sharm el-Sheikh Senior Officials / Ministerial Meeting which was held I think two months ago. That Senior Officials Meeting prepared the document which should be now the document which is the outcome of the Tehran Summit. We have not been told that that language anyone is seeking to change. That language, as I read out to you, is based on the desire of the international community and the NAM itself that there should be peace and reconciliation in Syria, that the former United Nations and Arab League Joint Special Envoys Plan with its six-point agenda is endorsed and supported, and that the Syrian Government’s acceptance of the plan is a very positive development. So, that is the position.

Certainly during the general debate we expect that various leaders will express their own views. We would certainly express our view which is already known from our position which we have clarified every time the matter has come up for discussion, and we have said this also in our bilateral engagements that we would like to see a Syrian-led, inclusive process for reform and change in Syria to bring an end to the current conflict. We believe the international community’s role should be to assist that Syrian-led process. In that the United Nations has a particular role to play. And that is why if you look at the record of our voting, we have voted consistently in favour of the United Nations having a role, whether it was through a monitoring mission or through support to the Joint Special Envoys. We will continue to take that position and support it.

I have said that we would certainly like to schedule a meeting with the President of Egypt. We have been told that possibly Mr Halqi the Prime Minister of Syria, would also be coming to Tehran. The exact details we do not know. But when we are there we will see if there is a need and a possibility to have short meetings with other leaders. There would be one or two other leaders at Head of Government, Head of State level. In fact, in total we were told originally 30 countries are to be represented at Head of State, Head of Government level. We now understand the number may go up even higher. So, depending on who is there, what time available is, certainly Prime Minister would like to engage in discussions with this. Our position has always been in terms of trying to win support for an outcome which helps the Syrian people achieve their own objectives.

Question: So far as this nuclear policy of Iran, there is a lot of push and pull in the global scenario. I want to know what India’s position is before this visit. There is a theory that for nuclear deterrence it is better to be a nuclear Iran. It is a developing situation. So, I want to know the latest position of India before this visit?

Foreign Secretary: In the NAM itself there is no specific reference to Iran per se. There is a discussion relating to peaceful uses of nuclear energy. I will just mention it because this is significant and it leads on to the second part of your question.

Question: Sir, bilateral meeting also.

Foreign Secretary: Yes, but let me finish this, if I may because it leads on, as I said, to the bilateral. The Heads of State and Government took note of the adoption of what is being discussed in the IAEA Board of Governors, etc., etc., and then it says at the end, “The Heads of State and Government emphasize that decisions should be made by consensus with the participation of all IAEA member states, and that the decisions of the IAEA must be consistent with its statute without any prejudice to the inalienable right of its member states to research, develop and use for peaceful purposes, of nuclear sciences in all its aspect including the inalienable right of each state party, if it so decides, to develop for peaceful purposes a full national nuclear fuel cycle in accordance with its rights and obligations under the Treaty on the Nonproliferation of Nuclear Weapons”. This is the language which has emerged.

In effect, this is precisely the language we have used in all discussions relating to the Iranian nuclear programme. This has been our position, it has been explained in the IAEA, we believe that there is a right of each state party to use nuclear energy for peaceful purposes, and this has to be done in a manner which accords with both their rights and their obligations which they themselves have entered into.

Question: I want to seek two clarifications from the Secretary. The Chief Minister of Tamil Nadu Jayalalithaa has written a letter to the Prime Minister stating that two military personnel of Sri Lanka are getting training secretly at Nilgiri. Not only the Chief Minister of Tamil Nadu but all the political parties of Tamil Nadu demand that these two people be sent back to Sri Lanka immediately. Secondly, the Chief Minister of Tamil Nadu has demanded that Kutch island is the only solution for the Tamil fishermen, the Tamil fishermen being targeted by the Sri Lankan naval force on day-to-day basis. Now the political parties of Tamil Nadu feel that getting back Kutch island is the only permanent solution for the Tamil fishermen problem. Would you like to comment on these two issues?

Question: Sir, it is the Defence Services Staff College. That is where they are.

Foreign Secretary: I am not aware of this latest letter, but there were some letters which we have seen earlier, and these are addressed to the Prime Minister and not to our Minister. As far as we are concerned, this is a matter for the Ministry of Defence and we are in touch with the Ministry of Defence and whatever decision they take we will be supportive of that.

As far as the fishermen’s issue is concerned, the question of the India-Sri Lanka maritime boundary was settled in 1974. In MEA I am not aware of any proposal before the Government to reopen that question.

Question: I just wanted to know if the Iran-Pakistan-India pipeline is off the board because it is no longer talked about.

Foreign Secretary: I think it has been talked about. Would you like to mention it?

Joint Secretary (PAI): This issue was dealt in the Joint Working Group between India and Iran, which is having its next meeting next month in Delhi. It is the Joint Working Group on Hydrocarbons.

Question: Sir, you told us that there is a meeting scheduled between Prime Minister and Pakistan President on the sidelines of the Summit. What would be the issues the Prime Minister would like to flag in that meeting? And would Prime Minister like to raise concern about the recent hate campaign that was emanating from Pakistani soil on social networking media?

Foreign Secretary: As I said, we are in the process of scheduling meetings with various leaders including the leader of Pakistan. As soon as that meeting is over, I will do a briefing and I will give you all the details of what was taken up.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much. With that we come to the end of this interaction.

173A. Statement by the Prime Minister prior to his departure for Tehran for the XVI NAM Summit.

New Delhi, August 28, 2012.

I am leaving today to attend the XVI NAM Summit in Tehran at the invitation of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

India is a founder member of the Non-Aligned Movement. During the entire period of the Cold War and its ideological and military confrontation across the Iron Curtain, the Non-Aligned Movement constituted a voice of reason and sanity. Our grouping, while avoiding entanglement in a destructive and wasteful confrontation so as to be able to pursue economic and social development, was nevertheless at the forefront of promoting mutual understanding and lessening of tensions. I will emphasize at the Summit that those original wellsprings of our Movement continue to remain relevant, especially in a world where the global economy remains in crisis and the geo-political landscape continues to be transformed in uncertain and unpredictable ways.

There is widespread recognition that the outdated structures of global governance have not been able to keep pace with contemporary political and economic challenges. Many of these challenges, such as the worsening situation in Syria, a persistent global economic slowdown, and other new and emerging threats, require credible trans-national action. The theme of the XVI NAM Summit – Lasting Peace through Joint Global Governance – is thus extremely relevant. I will stress that our Movement should provide a strong political impetus to the ongoing efforts to reform and democratize global governance structures, which are critical to tackle these challenges more effectively.

The diversity and size of membership of NAM presents a tremendous potential for collaboration and cooperation amongst us to resolve shared developmental challenges. It is important that our Movement catalyzes such opportunities for mutual benefit. India will continue with its contributions in these endeavours of South-South cooperation.

During my visit to Tehran, I will also hold bilateral meetings with the Iranian leadership and with leaders of various other NAM countries participating in the Summit. I look forward to the opportunity to review our respective bilateral relations with these countries. I also look forward to exchanging views on regional and global issues with many of my counterparts.

Mr. Chairman,

Excellencies and Distinguished delegates,

At the outset, allow me to extend my warm congratulations to the distinguished Foreign Minister of Iran on his election as Chair of this meeting. I thank our Iranian hosts for their gracious hospitality and excellent arrangements made for this Summit.

As we deliberate today in Tehran, I also recall the shared civilizational linkages and interaction between the peoples of our two countries.

I also wish to convey our sincere appreciation to the Government of Egypt for their able stewardship of the Movement over the past three years, amidst a period of profound democratic transition in the country.

The theme of our debate is significant and timely. In today’s increasingly interconnected and interdependent world, the destinies of nations are more inextricably linked than at any other time in our history. While the process of globalization has offered us immense opportunities, it has also accentuated the challenges, which are much more complex, multidimensional and transnational in nature.

Mr. Chairman,

The central challenges of our times relate to management of the global economy and finance, securing stable food and energy supplies, poverty alleviation, eradicating hunger and deprivation, tackling pandemics, raising literacy levels, ensuring sustainable development and coping with climate change. Equally serious challenges are posed by terrorism, weapons of mass destruction, piracy, drug trafficking, organized crime and other threats to international peace and security.

Developing countries have been disproportionately impacted by the uncertainties in the current global economic environment. The global economic recovery continues to falter. The situation in the Euro zone has made matters even more difficult. At this juncture, enhanced international policy coordination is necessary to maintain macroeconomic stability conducive to the healthy recovery of the global economy.

With 80% of the world’s population and about 90% of the world’s youth living in developing countries, the challenges of growth and development facing us are immense. We need to impart our youth with the necessary technical skills. We need to create job opportunities to foster rapid economic growth.

Mr. Chairman,

Attainment of the Millennium Developmental Goals (MDGs) is fundamental to our quest for inclusive, equitable and sustained global growth. Given the halting progress that we have achieved so far, it would be important to maintain our focus on MDGs beyond 2015, entailing enhanced financial and technological support for developing countries.

Nowhere in the world are the development challenges as stark as in the African continent. The Movement must continue to work towards ensuring Africa’s primacy in the development Agenda. On our part, we are scaling up our development assistance bilaterally as well as within the framework of India-Africa Summits and South-South cooperation. We must work towards preserving the centrality of the development agenda in the Doha round of multilateral trade negotiations.

The imperatives of ensuring Sustainable Development and addressing Climate Change are greater than ever before. Recently, we had a successful conclusion of the RIO +20 Conference. It is important that we make all possible efforts to realize the outcome in letter and on the basis of the accepted principle of common but differentiated responsibility and equity. More importantly, we need to firmly anchor the role of the developing world in the decision making processes.

Mr. Chairman,

Terrorism is the biggest scourge of our times targeting the socio-economic fabric of our pluralistic societies. We need to raise the fight against terrorism to a higher level. There should be zero tolerance towards terrorism. It is high time that we demonstrate the necessary political will and agree on a Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism at the United Nations. Piracy off the coast of Somalia has brought immense human sufferings while posing a serious threat to sea-lanes of maritime commerce. We need concerted international action to combat this menace, preferably under the aegis of the UN.

The Movement needs to play a more active and advocacy role in efforts aimed at achieving universal nuclear disarmament and a world free of all nuclear weapons. The apparent failings of the present global governance architecture have further constrained our ability to respond to global challenges. The time has come for the developed and the developing countries to work together on the basis of universally recognized norms of international law and multilateral decision making to deal with the challenges and the opportunities before the world today.
Mr. Chairman,

We need approaches which are inclusive, transparent and firmly anchored in multilateralism to navigate these challenges. It is our considered view that the United Nations stands best placed to play a central role in this regard. We need to redouble our efforts towards a more democratic, equitable, and legitimized international architecture that reflects contemporary realities.

India remains convinced that until comprehensive reform of the UN Security Council is undertaken, the overall reform of the UN can only be regarded as piecemeal and incomplete. We also need a more representative international financial architecture, with an increase in the voice and representation of the developing countries. The current slow pace of quota and governance reforms in the IMF must be expedited.

Since the beginning of 2011, people’s profound yearning for playing a greater role in their political, social and economic lives has been sweeping parts of West Asia and North Africa. In dealing with legitimate aspirations, it is necessary that all sides shun recourse to violence. Changes brought about by non-violent, inclusive political processes are not only enduring but also promote social cohesion and stability.

In this context, we are deeply concerned at developments in Syria, which have the potential to spill over beyond Syria’s borders. Further militarization of the conflict must, therefore, be avoided. We reiterate our support for a Syrian-led inclusive political process that meets the legitimate aspirations of all sections of Syrian society and respects Syria’s independence, territorial integrity and sovereignty.

Mr. Chairman,

Developments in West Asia and North Africa should not sideline the Palestinian issue. We continue to support the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to a state of their own based on the pre-1967 border with East Jerusalem as its capital living side by side and in peace with Israel. We also continue to support Palestine’s application for membership of the United Nations.

The diversity of our Movement is our biggest strength. We respect each other’s paths to development, distinct cultural traditions and have an abiding faith in peaceful co-existence. India’s former Prime Minister Indira Gandhi quite aptly described NAM as the largest peace movement in the world.

For further strengthening our Movement, we need to build on areas of commonality and effectively exploit the synergies amongst its vast membership. I am confident that our deliberations during the course of this Summit would be helpful in evolving a contemporary and compelling vision for our Movement.
175. Intervention by External Affairs Minister at the Ministerial Meeting of the NAM Committee on Palestine.

Tehran, August 28, 2012.

Mr. Chairman,

Distinguished members of the Committee,

At the outset, let me thank the NAM Committee on Palestine for organizing this Ministerial Meeting. As you may recall, this meeting was originally scheduled earlier this month in Ramallah to demonstrate solidarity with the Palestinian people. Unfortunately, Israel prevented the meeting on the grounds that some members do not have relations with Israel. The NAM Committee had aptly condemned this blatant action of Israel in strong terms.

The Palestinian cause is of paramount importance to India. In fact, India was the first non-Arab country to recognize the State of Palestine on 16 November 1988, pursuant to the Algiers Declaration of 15 November 1988.

We believe that the conflict in West Asia is essentially political in nature and cannot be resolved by force. In line with our support for UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, India supports a negotiated solution resulting in a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine, with East Jerusalem as its Capital, living within secure and recognized borders, side by side at peace with Israel as endorsed in the Quartet Roadmap and UNSC Resolutions 1397 & 1515. In addition, we have also supported the Arab Peace Initiative.

Mr. Chairman,

India has always extended its unwavering support to the Palestinian cause in international fora. Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh in his address to the United Nations General Assembly in September 2011 announced that India looks forward to welcoming Palestine as an equal member of the United Nations. When I visited Ramallah in January this year, I, too, reiterated India’s firm resolve to continue to support the Palestinian nationhood.

The Government and people of India eagerly look forward to the visit of President Mahmoud Abbas to India next month.

India has called for an end to illegal Israeli settlements in the occupied Palestinian territories and for an early and significant easing of restrictions on the free movement of persons and goods within Palestine. The continuing settlement activities in West Bank and East Jerusalem are threatening the basic premises of the two-state solution. We think that freezing of illegal settlement activities by Israel should be the first step for resumption of direct talks.
Settlement activities have also exacerbated the humanitarian problems of the Palestinian people with increasing violence and aggravation of tension between the settlers and the Palestinian population. We, therefore, reiterate our call to Israel to stop all settlement activities.

Mr. Chairman,

India has been providing developmental support and assistance to Palestine. The assistance includes capacity building measures and support for the development of human resources. We would be regularly exploring ways to further enhance our developmental support to Palestine.

The political upheavals in the Middle East and North Africa and some other factors have unfortunately pushed the Middle East Peace Process to the background. We support the revival of the Peace Process. We had welcomed the ‘direct talks’ between the Israelis and the Palestinians. However, informal talks over the last two years have not resulted so far in any substantive progress towards resumption of direct talks.

In line with their commitment to democratic values and principles, reconciliation in Palestine is welcome. We hope that these efforts will bear fruit soon, leading to the formation of a Unity Government, holding of elections, re-unification of Palestinian state institutions and measures for reconstruction and development of Palestinian society.

Let me reiterate that India continues to support the legitimate right of the Palestinian people to an independent State living side by side and in peace and security with Israel.

We are hopeful that this collective endeavour of NAM will send a strong signal to all concerned and will lead to revival of the peace process to achieve a just, comprehensive and durable peace in the Middle East.
175A. Media Briefing by Foreign Secretary in Tehran on Prime Minister’s meetings in Iran.

Tehran, August 30, 2012.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Syed Akbaruddin): Thank you all for being very patient and waiting. Both our Ambassador and Foreign Secretary will make a brief opening statement each. After that, if you have any questions they will answer those. I will first ask Ambassador to make his opening remarks followed by which Foreign Secretary will make his opening remarks, so that you will get the entire picture of our activities.

Indian Ambassador to Iran (Shri D.P. Srivastava): Good evening; India-Iran relations go back to more than two thousand years. You may be interested to know that while it is well known that Urdu has Persian parentage, not many are aware that there is a strong belief, that the roots of Farsi can be traced to Sanskrit.

Coming to the visit, this was the sixth Prime Minister’s visit. The earlier visits were bilateral. This visit took place on the margins of NAM Summit. Before the Summit segment there was an official meeting and there was a Ministerial segment. Foreign Secretary had a trilateral meeting with Iran and Afghanistan on Chabahar. Our External Affairs Minister met Dr. Salehi. During these two meetings the entire spectrum of bilateral relations including commercial, economic, political, consular, were discussed. Prime Minister had made a call on the President. This was followed by meeting with the Supreme Leader.

During these two meetings, both sides recalled our historical relations, cultural links, and the Prime Minister expressed our support to Iran’s Chairmanship of NAM. I will stop here and I will request Foreign Secretary to speak.

Foreign Secretary (Shri Ranjan Mathai): I would just like to add one word and then I will come to Pakistan because I know that is of interest.

PM’s meeting with the President of Iran was in fact a full-fledged official meeting with delegations, a full bilateral meeting. It was not in the nature of a courtesy call. PM made a call on the Supreme Leader Ayatollah Uzma, Grand Ayatollah Khamenei. I would like to mention that in that call - it is, I think important to reflect on this - the Supreme Leader of Iran spoke about the deep-rooted civilizational ties between India and Iran which go well beyond the state of our bilateral relations. I know that Akbar has given you some briefing yesterday. But I thought there were two-three remarks which were very very significant in that. He recalled his own readings of Indian history, his appreciation for Gandhiji’s struggle, and his belief that Nehru was in fact the founder of the Non-Aligned Movement, and the wellsprings of that foundation really came from the beliefs and the struggles which were led by both Gandhiji and Nehru in India’s own Independence Struggle. So, that was the kind of background.
He also made a very interesting comment about contemporary India. He said, “We want sincere and deep-rooted relations”. Then speaking about his own experience he mentioned that he had been on a street called Ali Kabir Street here; he had seen members of the Sikh community who live in this country and who run businesses here. He had gone into one of those shops - this was many years ago - and he had been presented some books. So, he had some idea about the Sikh religion and the diversity of religions in India. He had in 1981 visited India and seen some of this for himself. He said that he believed that religious diversity was important and should not harm India’s national unity; sectarian feuds should be avoided; and there is a need for harmony among all groups.

He then made a very interesting statement. He said, “It is important and valuable to us in Iran for India to have stability and power”. I think this is the kind of background which reflects the deep-rooted civilisational ties between our two countries, and the deep understanding which the Iranian leadership has of the nature of Indian society, our polity and what we stand for.

I will now turn to PM’s meeting with President Asif Ali Zardari. PM and the President met. This was a meeting which took place at the Conference venue at 6 p.m. Iranian time today, so not so long ago. The two leaders recalled their last meeting in Delhi in April and both agreed that such meetings were useful not only for reviewing the state of bilateral relations but for giving an impetus to the ongoing dialogue process.

PM reiterated our desire to have a peaceful and cooperative relationship with Pakistan, and given the complexities of our bilateral relations, we have to be patient and move forward in a step-by-step graduated manner. Both leaders agreed that a step-by-step approach had the best chance of actually succeeding. They were both happy with the developments which have taken place in some areas of our bilateral relationship such as trade.

We have underlined our terrorism related concerns, and he pressed for an expeditious and successful conclusion of the trial relating to those involved with the Mumbai attacks, which is under way in Pakistan. And he mentioned that action in this sphere would be a major confidence-building measure, help in bridging the trust deficit, and help to build up public support for the kind of relationship we would like to see between the two nations.

The Pakistani President reiterated his country’s commitment to bring to justice those involved in the Mumbai attacks, and he agreed that terrorism poses a continuing threat to peace and security, and referred in this regard to some of the difficulties faced in his own country.

Both leaders reviewed the state of bilateral relations, as I said, and they expressed satisfaction that the round of talks which had taken place at Secretary level had concluded; and that EAM’s forthcoming visit to Pakistan next month - in fact it is going to be in about eight days’ time - would provide an opportunity to take stock of the progress in the resumed dialogue and chart the course for the next round. They expressed confidence that some achievements have been made and they would be able, during the External Affairs Minister’s meeting with his Pakistani counterpart, to prepare a kind of roadmap for the way forward.

Speaking specifically about the progress in economic and trade relations, they both felt that there is vast potential for cooperation. The Commerce Secretaries of the two countries are scheduled to meet and take forward the process of completing the three agreements which had been decided on earlier. These, as you are aware, relate to customs cooperation, dispute resolutions and standards. There was an appreciation by both the leaders of the good work done by the Ministers and their Secretaries in this field.

President Zardari mentioned also that there is great scope for regional economic cooperation; and he believes Pakistan can be a catalyst in this regard. And Prime Minister welcomed this approach.

President Zardari reiterated his invitation to PM to visit Pakistan, and PM responded thanking him for the gracious invitation and said he attaches great importance to normalizing relations with Pakistan, and he would like to visit Pakistan at a suitable time, that is to say he would like a well-prepared visit.

PM concluded that a stable and prosperous Pakistan acting as a bulwark against terrorism in its own interest would be in the interest of the region. India wishes Pakistan well, and we are willing to meet Pakistan more than half way in making efforts to normalize our bilateral relations for peace, prosperity and progress in our region.

Prime Minister also had a meeting with Afghan President Karzai. Both leaders reviewed the state of bilateral relations and the importance that the two countries attached to further strengthening our robust bilateral ties. PM conveyed that he looks forward to President Karzai’s visit to India. We are discussing dates in November. The two leaders underlined the importance of developing a close economic relationship between our two countries, and they agreed on the importance of Indian investments in Afghanistan.

PM also congratulated President Karzai on the processes under way in his country, and wished him success in his efforts to complete the ongoing transition process. The two leaders agreed on the importance of opposing extremism in any form. PM assured President Karzai that India was a friend of Afghanistan, and India would stand by the people and Government of Afghanistan in this critical time of transition.

Finally, PM also had a meeting with the Prime Minister of Syria, who called on PM and he explained in detail the ongoing situation in that country, the efforts made by the leadership of that country to undertake a reform process and the difficulties it faced because of the continuing violence, which the Syrian leader said, is instigated from outside. PM reiterated what he has mentioned already in his NAM address, which is that India believes in a Syrian-led, inclusive political dialogue is the only way forward. And he also expressed support for the efforts of Lakhdar Brahimi, who has been appointed as the Joint Special Envoy of the UN Secretary-General and the Arab League, to undertake a process of good offices and mediation.

Official Spokesperson: We open the floor now to any questions that any of you may have on either what Ambassador Dinkar Srivastava said or the Foreign Secretary.

Question: Sir, was the issue of prisoners raised by the Prime Minister, in particular of Sarabjit?

Foreign Secretary: Not that I recall. I was present through the meeting. But during the discussions between the Prime Minister and President Zardari, Sarabjit Singh I do not think came up. But there was a discussion on the need for closer consultations. And the Interior Minister of Pakistan mentioned the need for a regular institutionalized dialogue on matters relating to his Ministry. He also suggested in that context, the need for regular exchanges on Border Management. There have been some incidents on the border. He referred to that. In that context, he mentioned the need for a more institutionalized dialogue. And Prime Minister agreed with this and said that this would be our intention also, to have a regular dialog between the Interior Ministry of Pakistan and the Home Ministry.

Question: I have two questions, first one on the question of 26/11. When the Prime Minister mentioned that it would be a great CBM if things would move forward, there is this argument which we hear from Pakistan that their Judicial Commission was not given proper access and that actually was not accepted by the court subsequently. These technical issues, how do you cope up on that because that argument keeps coming back from Pakistani side? Second, when Mr. Zardari says Pakistan can be a catalyst for regional economic cooperation, did he elaborate on it? ...(Inaudible)...

Foreign Secretary: On the Judicial Commission, the Pakistani Interior Minister mentioned that Pakistan had made a request for the Commission to have permission to interview these three personalities. We have responded that this is a matter which is before our courts but we would be in a position to respond to them. As far as we the Government are concerned, we have taken a positive view of this request and we would be able to respond after completing the consultations within our country.
On the question of Pakistan as a catalyst for regional economic cooperation, the President did mention that there is a great scope for expanding trade and commercial relations between South Asia and Central Asia and it is in that context that he mentioned it.

Question: Sir, you said that the Home Minister of Pakistan suggested talks with the Indian Home Minister. Should we understand that there is going to be a mechanism for this purpose between the Home Ministers of the two countries. (unofficial translation).

Foreign Secretary: Yes, this is the intention, to have a dialogue at different levels. I am not saying it has to be at Ministerial level. For example, when I was answering the previous question I referred to the subject of border management. In that regard it was felt that it would be best to have the dialogue directly between the BSF and the Pakistani Rangers. In the same way, there is already a Home Secretary level dialogue with the Interior Secretary of Pakistan. What was felt was that you need these kinds of dialogues on a regular basis between the Ministries and agencies which are dealing with the kinds of issues which are the remit of the Home Ministry and the Interior Ministry.

Question: Sir, is there any estimated time when our Prime Minister’s visit is possible to Pakistan?

Foreign Secretary: As I said, the Prime Minister has said he would like to visit Pakistan but he would like to visit at a suitable time with a well-prepared visit.

Question: I have two questions. The Prime Minister was on the dais today. I do not know whether in Sharm el-Sheikh or in Cuba it is a normal practice as a founder member of NAM. Secondly, did Syria walk out? Al Jazeera and Reuters have done stories on that. Do you consider it... (Inaudible)... We do not have the information whether they have walked out or not walked out. Can you tell us for certain?

Foreign Secretary: I will answer the second question first. It is certainly not our business, but the Syrian delegation was sitting immediately behind us in the hall, and when we turned around we did not see them there during one of the speeches. So, clearly there was a walkout at one stage. But I do not want to make it an India issue at all. But I happened to be seated just in front of them. So, I noticed it.

As regards the seating arrangement and the fact that PM was on the dais, I was not present either at Sharm el-Sheikh or Havana. You would probably have been there. So, you have the advantage over me. What I know is that when the Iranian leadership was speaking to us prior to the actual meeting, we had actually no indication that this seating arrangement was going to be made. But they emphasized one thing that among the founders of the Non-Aligned Movement, India was the only country present in Iran at the Head of Government level. This was mentioned as a fact in appreciation of our presence. Sorry I need to clarify that. When I say that, it is apart from Egypt which is already in the Chair. So, these were the two countries along with Indonesia and Ghana and former Yugoslavia who were the founding members of NAM. But this is a decision that the Iranian Conference managers took.

Question: Sir, after the Sharm-el-Sheikh and Havan conferences joint statements were issued. This time there is no statement. What is the reason that you not consider the discussions in a positive sense that there is no need for a joint statement? (unofficial translation).

Foreign Secretary: There is nothing like this. I think there are occasions in which you have meetings and with adequate time, you do have joint statements. We have a large number of meetings which take place on the margins of international events in which you do not issue joint statements. So, I do not think there is anything to be read into the fact that there was no joint statement. I was in fact asked to come here to tell you what took place.

Question: The United States has declared 8 terrorists as global terrorists; out of which main Indians are Sajhid Mir, Tatha Saeed who is the son of Hafiz Saeed and Ahmed Yaku. Is this Indian victory at the global level?

Foreign Secretary: I was told about this decision of the United States only a short while ago. We obviously welcome any steps taken to improve international cooperation in the fight against terrorism, and the steps taken by the United States have certainly been in that direction.

Question: Sir, when you spoke about the need to expedite this trial in Pakistan, what was President Zardari's response that? And is it any way linked when you mentioned that the Prime Minister would look forward to a well-prepared visit, some movement forward ... (Inaudible)... on the trial?

Foreign Secretary: I would like to say that in regard to the trial the Pakistani President and the Interior Minister mentioned that they have had the processes taken up in the courts, and the courts had taken a different view and the trial had resumed. It was in this context that they mentioned the request for a repeat visit of the Judicial Commission, this time with the permission to carry out the interviews which they had wished to do last time with the right to actually examine the witnesses to have those discussions. So, that is the background in which he referred to the difficulties they are facing. Certainly we would like to see progress in this trial. But whether you are linking it directly to the Prime Minister's visit, all I can say is that we repeat that we would like a well-prepared visit with a substantive outcome.

Question: Sir, this is a follow-up question. You said that they wanted to cross-examine key accused. Who are these three accused? Secondly, how does the fact that the Supreme Court has upheld Kasab's execution impact this Judicial Commission's visit?

Foreign Secretary: I think you are going into very great detail right now. I would only like to say that there are three – the Magistrate, the Doctor and one more, there is a third individual, they had listed – and they wished to interview, because they are the ones who had conducted the examination in India. That is the background. The issue of Kasab did not come up in this particular meeting.

Question: Sir, given the fact that the two countries are now paving the way for some sort of a way for some banking arrangements, were any fresh cross-LoC CBMs on the table, Kashmir discussed? On the visa agreement, it is kind of ... (Inaudible)... watch we do not know of because there seems to be no difference. So, did that issue come up in the talks?

Foreign Secretary: I think the two leaders both felt that the meeting between External Affairs Minister and the Foreign Minister of Pakistan which would take place very soon and would be preceded by the meeting of the Joint Commission, which was probably why they did not discuss. But the meeting at the Ministerial level would provide an occasion to go into substantive issues on all the kinds of matters which you have just mentioned. So, this was not gone into in great detail. The banking arrangements, etc., was not gone into in great detail.

On the second question, as I said, we have already had one round of discussions, and in the next round of discussions we will have occasion to discuss this. As you are aware, this took place in two phases in the earlier segment. There was one discussion when I met the Foreign Secretary of Pakistan. And separately there was a meeting at the Joint Secretary level on cross border CBMs including trade and cross border travel. So, in the next round there would be occasion to take this forward.

Question: Sir, sorry if I have not understood it correctly, what is India’s take on Pakistan’s demand to send a Judicial Commission once again?

Foreign Secretary: The Judicial Commission has already come. Earlier, there was some question as to whether our processes would allow that Judicial Commission to actually question the three individuals - as I said, one is the Doctor, one is the Magistrate, the third, possibly another Doctor, I would be able to confirm to you in a few minutes. So, the Home Ministry had last time simply said that the visit should take place. This time round, we will have to get a judicial clarification before it actually takes place whether this kind of a cross-examination is valid and is possible. In principle we have said that we would be open to a repeat visit. Now, once we get the clarification on whether they can undertake the kind of cross-examination they wish, then we will allow some questions.
Question: ... (Inaudible)... clarification from and what is the timeline that you expect?

Foreign Secretary: I do not think there is a timeline on it but we are in discussions with the Home Ministry and they are in touch with the concerned judicial authorities.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much. With that we end this interaction.

Tehran

August 30, 2012
Statement by the Prime Minister at the XVI Summit of the Non-Aligned Movement.

Tehran, August 30, 2012.

I congratulate His Excellency Dr. Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, President of the Islamic Republic of Iran, on assuming the Chairmanship of the Non-Aligned Movement. Mr. Chairman, India will extend its full cooperation to Iran as it leads the Movement over the next three years.

I also express my appreciation to Egypt for its stewardship of the Movement since the last Summit, even though Egypt has been in the midst of profound domestic change.

Mr. Chairman, the Non-Aligned Movement, representing the large majority of humankind, has been a powerful force for the promotion of global peace, security and development. Our shared objectives of working together to preserve our strategic space, ensure our social and economic development and strive for a more just and equitable world order remain as true and relevant today as they were in the past.

Mr. Chairman, your chosen theme for our Summit – Lasting Peace through Joint Global Governance - is timely. Today’s structures for global governance remain driven by the power equations of the past. It is not surprising that they have proved inadequate in dealing with the economic and political crises of our present.

The deficit in global governance is perhaps most stark in the sphere of international peace and security and in restoring just and fair economic and financial mechanisms.

The West Asian and North African region is undergoing profound change. As the world’s largest democracy, India supports popular aspirations for a democratic and pluralistic order. Nevertheless, such transformations cannot be prompted by external intervention, which exacerbate the suffering of ordinary citizens. The deteriorating situation in Syria is a matter of particular concern. Our Movement should take a stand on the issue in keeping with universally accepted principles. We should urge all parties to recommit themselves to resolving the crisis peacefully through a Syrian-led inclusive political process that can meet the legitimate aspirations of all Syrian citizens.

The Non-Aligned Movement has always championed the cause of the Palestinian people. Today, we should renew our pledge to support an early resolution of the Palestinian question, so that the long suffering people of Palestine can live in peace and dignity in a state of their own.
Mr. Chairman, in the past, individually we may have had little economic and military clout but the collective voice and reasoned interventions of our Movement commanded respect and credibility. That voice should again find true expression on a variety of issues.

We need new instruments of global governance to confront cross-cutting and trans-national challenges through coordinated global action. These include international terrorism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, the menace of maritime piracy, the growing threat to cyber security and the growing challenge of pursuing ecologically sustainable development while ensuring energy, water and food security.

Our Movement should take the lead in building global governance structures that are representative, credible and effective. It is my sincere hope that the Movement can agree on action to reform institutions such as the United Nations Security Council, the World Bank and the IMF. Existing problems cannot be solved effectively without a greater voice for developing countries on issues such as global trade, finance and development.

Developing countries can be drivers of global growth. International financial institutions should therefore be encouraged to fund infrastructure development in the developing world in innovative ways. We should also urge that the current economic crisis should not lead to a dilution of development assistance flows from the developed world to the developing countries.

While we come together on the international stage, it is equally important for us to collaborate among ourselves in tackling problems and developing solutions that are best suited to our own circumstances.

For example, the developing world is rich in renewable sources of energy like solar power. We should use our financial and intellectual resources to develop renewable energy technologies that get less attention in the industrialised world where the resource base is different. Adoption of these technologies will also enable us to contribute to preservation of the environment. We can learn from each other in this effort.

Similarly, food security is a basic problem for many of our countries. Excessive speculation, structural bottlenecks and lack of coordination are fuelling food inflation at the global level. Our Movement should push for effective food policy coordination and cooperation at the global level in areas such as agricultural productivity, weather forecasting and research and development.

Perhaps most relevant for us is to focus on investing in the knowledge economy and building our human resources. When faced with our unique developmental challenges, our youth have the creativity and energy to find solutions that are innovative, frugal and affordable. However, we need to provide them skills and equip them to find productive employment in a rapidly changing and interconnected global economy. India would be happy to contribute to a NAM initiative on skill development, particularly focused on the knowledge economy.

Mr. Chairman, the African continent provided the intellectual wellspring for many of the leaders of the Non Aligned Movement. The growth of NAM and decolonization in Africa progressed almost hand in hand. Africa therefore has a special place in NAM. India’s own strategic partnership with Africa is premised on making the people of Africa its primary beneficiaries. The India-Africa Forum Summit thus provides for an ambitious programme of pan-African institution-building to enhance our multi-faceted cooperation. I invite interested NAM members to work with us in areas of priority to Africa.

Nearly two decades ago, India embarked on a “Look East” policy in an endeavour to learn and benefit from and contribute to the evolution of a new Asian economic community to our East. However, the progress, prosperity, well being, political stability and plurality of the Asia to our West has always been of equal historical and civilisational significance for us. A West Asian region that can realize its full developmental potential, live in peace and harmony and join the comity of democratic and plural societies will contribute enormously to human progress and peace in the 21st Century.

Mr. Chairman, let me conclude by thanking you for this opportunity to renew our Movement’s collective endeavour for peace and prosperity which is needed in our troubled planet today. Even as our members have differing views on different issues, our sense of common destiny and solidarity unites us and gives us a common sense of purpose. I am certain that our deliberations will be helpful in restoring this historic Movement to its rightful place on the international stage.

I thank you.
177. Extracts from the Interaction of the Prime Minister with the media on board the Special Flight en route from Tehran to New Delhi.

August 31, 2012.

Prime Minister of India (Dr. Manmohan Singh): Ladies and gentlemen, as you know, I came to Tehran to attend the NAM Summit. My speech at the Plenary Session of the Summit has already been circulated and you must have gone through it.

In addition I had a meeting with the Supreme Leader, and also with President Ahmadinejad to review the state of our bilateral relations. I was particularly struck by what the Supreme Leader told me about his interest and involvement in Indian affairs. He recalled the influence that Mahatma Gandhi had on him, the role that Jawaharlal Nehru played in India’s freedom struggle, his visit to India in 1980-81, meetings with Mrs. Gandhi, visiting various other parts of our country including Hyderabad.

And what I was more struck by was his statement that a country of India’s great diversity, different languages, different religions, has greater chances of achieving its national goals, if there is growing respect for tolerance and respect for diversity. He said that is the way of the future, human civilization is moving in that direction, and what India is trying to achieve is truly remarkable.

In addition, with President Ahmadinejad I reviewed the state of our bilateral relations. And there is lot of interest in doing business with India and getting Indian investment in infrastructure. There are of course difficulties imposed by western sanctions, but subject to that I think we will explore ways and means of developing our relations with Iran.

I had also on the sidelines meetings with President Zardari of Pakistan, the Prime Minister of Bangladesh, the Prime Minister of Nepal, the Prime Minister of Bhutan, President Morsi of Egypt, the Crown Prince of Jordan, and several other world leaders, including the new Prime Minister of Syria who called on me and explained to me his Government’s point of view about developments in Syria.

I think all these matters have been reported to you and you have been briefed about that by the Foreign Secretary. If there are any questions, I will be happy to answer them.

I am sorry I forgot to mention my meeting with President Karzai of Afghanistan.

Question: Foreign Secretary briefed us about your excellent meeting with the Supreme Leader. Sir, he was very appreciative of India’s 2000 year old relationship with Iran. Would you like to elaborate on your meeting with the Supreme Leader whether he sought your intervention in resolving issues with any other country?

Answer: There is no issue of India intervening to solve any problems in which Iran is involved. It was a philosophical discussion. The relations between our two countries which go back to centuries old ties of culture, civilization, language and religion; the continuing relevance of what India is trying to achieve - a country of composite culture trying to make a sense is of diversity of our people, to create a sense of unity amidst diversity. He was very appreciative of this.

Question: President Zardari again invited you to Pakistan and you had accepted it and you said that you will visit at a suitable time and would like a substantial outcome of that visit? In your opinion, what would be the substantial outcome and a suitable time?

PM: Well, I am very keen to visit Pakistan and am very grateful to President Zardari for inviting me to visit that country, but I also mentioned to him that we have to create a proper atmosphere. There must be a general feeling that Pakistan is doing all that it could do to deal with terrorism directed against India from Pakistani soil, and in this context the court trial of those who have been charged with this heinous crime of Bombay massacre. I think this is a crucial test of Pakistan's sincerity to bring the perpetrators of these horrible crimes to book. Now, on that point, President Zardari and Interior Minister Rehman Malik said they are doing all that is possible subject to the vagaries of the court process. I also said that there are issues like Sir Creek, which he himself had told me when he visited Delhi for going to Ajmer Sharif that these are 'doables'. I said that let us push that process further and in the meanwhile Foreign Ministers of the two countries will be meeting and they can explore the possibilities what can be achieved to facilitate a purposeful visit of my tour to Pakistan.

Question: In your NAM address you touched two points – one was food security and another was the cyber terrorism. On food security, you said that you would look for international cooperation. What kind of international cooperation are you looking for? For cyber terrorism on our domestic front, we need more domestic legal framework because we are not having any comprehensive cyber policy in our country.

Answer: Well I agree. You are right. I have been asking my National Security Advisor to zero in on the gaps in evolving a viable policy to tackle the menace of cyber terrorism. As far as food security is concerned, we would like the world to cooperate more in increasing agricultural productivity, particularly in the countries of Africa where there is enormous scope for increasing agricultural production and our India-Africa Forum Summit seeks to use India’s capabilities to help them increase productivity whenever there is demand. At the same time, technology can be an important source of increasing food production and also in weather forecasting, developing early warning systems in case of floods or droughts. Biotechnology also has an important role to play. Nations of the world should cooperate with each other to make a success of biotechnology in increasing food production. In the 21st century, use of water is going to be the most important issue and a critical input in development processes. How do we economise use of water? How to use modern technologies for irrigation like sprinkler irrigation as against flow irrigation? Israel has come up with new methods.
So there is a whole gamut of issues that the NAM countries may deliberate and cooperate and NAM countries can enlarge their mandate. They can cooperate with other parts of the world on the issue of increasing food production.

* * * *

Question: My question is limited to NAM Summit. The few conservative media block repeatedly claimed that Iran is a rogue state with nuclear capabilities. Do you see NAM Summit as a slap? If not, why not.

Answer: NAM Summit is not meant to be a slap to any one country. NAM has a set agenda. This was the 16th Summit. Iran has been chosen as the Chairperson. Therefore it is only appropriate that the Summit should take place in Iran which is a very important country in our region and in the developing world. The Iranians have a very proud civilization. They have many things to contribute to the world. Therefore, meeting in Tehran has no more or no less significance than the fact that Iran be a member of NAM in good standing.

* * * *

Question: Getting back to Pakistan, is India letting Hafiz Saeed off the hook.

Answer. We are not letting anyone off the hook. Whosoever is guilty of crimes, terrorist crimes directed against India should be brought to justice. So I am not saying that anyone should not be brought to justice.

178. 16th Summit of Heads of State or Government of the Non-Aligned Movement Tehran, Islamic Republic of Iran

26 - 31 August 2012

Declaration on Palestine Political Prisoners

1. The Heads of State or Government of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) expressed grave concern regarding the deteriorating situation of Palestinian political prisoners in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem. They condemned the continued imprisonment and detention of thousands of Palestinian civilians by Israel, the occupying Power, including at least 300 children as well as women and elected officials, and condemned the deplorable conditions under which they are being unlawfully held in jails and detention centers in both the Occupied Palestinian Territory and in Israel. They recalled the Ministerial Declaration on Palestinian Political Prisoners adopted by the XVI NAM Ministerial Conference held at Bali in May 2011.

2. The Heads of State or Government expressed grave concern in particular about the hunger strike by thousands of Palestinian prisoners, which began on 17 April 2012, annually commemorated by the Palestinian people as “Prisoners’ Day”. They expressed solidarity with the prisoners who have undertaken this massive hunger strike in protest of the occupying Power’s illegal practice of administrative detention, by which hundreds of Palestinians are being held without charge or trial, and in protest of the other inhumane, oppressive measures violating their most basic human rights. They expressed serious concern about the fragile health conditions of several Palestinians being held under administrative detention, who have been on hunger strike for more than two months and whose lives are at risk. They stressed that Israel, the occupying Power, must be held fully accountable for the well-being of all Palestinian prisoners, including the prisoners partaking in the peaceful, non-violent hunger strike protesting Israel's extreme abuses. The Heads of State or Government called on the international community to act urgently to address this critical situation in line with obligations under international law, specifically Article 76 of the 4th Geneva Convention, which defines the rights of protected persons faced with detention by an occupying Power.

3. The Heads of State or Government deplored Israel's continuing campaign of arrest and detention of Palestinian civilians and deplored the violent military raids, forced interrogations, intimidation, and all other brutal, dehumanizing measures used by the occupying Power in this regard. They condemned the extremely unhygienic, humiliating and, in many cases, life-threatening conditions under which Palestinian prisoners are being held, including vulnerable groups such as children, women, and ill, disabled and paralyzed Palestinians. They condemned, inter alia, Israel’s use of torture and all other forms of physical and psychological mistreatment and deprivation of Palestinian prisoners, including denial of family visits, denial of access to education and adequate medical care, and the inhumane use of solitary confinement. They also condemned Israel’s withholding of the bodies of Palestinian prisoners who were killed or died while in Israeli captivity and their burial in military graveyards.

4. The Heads of State or Government stressed that under Article 147 of the 4th Geneva Convention, which is fully applicable to the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, Israel’s policies and practices regarding the imprisonment and detention of Palestinian civilians constitute serious violations, in many cases amounting to war crimes and crimes against humanity which, pursuant to Article 146, should be subject to international criminal prosecution, in accordance with universal jurisdiction, and recalled relevant provisions of the Rome Statute of the ICC. They demanded that Israel, the occupying Power, fully comply with the relevant provisions of the Geneva Conventions and all other applicable international Conventions and Treaties and adhere to international standards for due process.

5. The Heads of State or Government reiterated the demand that Israel, the occupying Power, immediately release all Palestinian prisoners, and stressed the need for the return of the prisoners to their families and their speedy reintegration into their communities. They demanded that Israel cease forthwith the arbitrary arrest and detention of Palestinians in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem.

6. The Heads of State or Government expressed deep regret about the devastating impact of Israel’s illegal practices on Palestinian prisoners and their families and the Palestinian society as a whole. In this regard, they commended the valuable work of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), and called upon the occupying Power to grant it the necessary access. They also commended the valuable efforts of civil society to provide assistance, including legal and humanitarian support, to Palestinian prisoners and their families.

7. The Heads of State or Government commended ongoing efforts to raise awareness on the critical issue of Palestinian political prisoners being held by Israel, the occupying Power. They urged mobilization of support for the efforts of the Palestinian people and their leadership to address this crisis, particularly the deteriorating situation of hunger striking prisoners. They reiterated the call for international action in line with legal obligations, stressing that the plight of these prisoners should be addressed by, inter alia, the UN General Assembly, Security Council, and Human Rights Council. They recalled the proposal by the Palestinian Minister of Prisoners Affairs for a resolution by the General Assembly requesting an Advisory Opinion by the International Court of Justice on the legal status of Palestinian prisoners and detainees held by Israel, the occupying Power, and the legal responsibilities of the occupying Power and third parties under international law. Moreover, in accordance with common Article 1 of the Geneva Conventions, they urged the High Contracting Parties to the 4th Geneva Convention to uphold their obligations in this regard, and called for convening of a Conference of High Contracting Parties as a first step towards addressing this serious issue.
179. 16th Summit of Heads of State or Government of the Non-Aligned Movement Tehran, Islamic Republic of Iran
26 - 31 August 2012

Solidarity Declaration on Palestine

1. The Heads of State or Government of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) expressed their deep regret that, due to the deplorable measures of Israel, the occupying Power, the NAM Committee on Palestine was unable to convene the Extraordinary Ministerial Meeting in Ramallah, Palestine, on 5 August 2012, which had been planned as a demonstration of the Movement’s solidarity with the Palestinian people. They condemned Israel’s provocative action, in contravention of international law and its obligations as an occupying Power, which prevented the Members of the Committee from witnessing firsthand the grave situation in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, and from directly conveying to the Palestinian people and their leadership the Movement’s longstanding, principled support for the just cause of Palestine and commitment to the achievement of a just, lasting and peaceful settlement of the question of Palestine in all its aspects.

2. The Heads of State or Government regretted that Israel’s obstruction of the entry of NAM Ministers to the Occupied Palestinian Territory prevented the Committee on Palestine from meeting with H.E. President Mahmoud Abbas and the rest of the Palestinian leadership. They expressed deep appreciation to the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan for receiving the Members of the Committee on Palestine and for the efforts exerted to facilitate arrangements for the planned Extraordinary Ministerial Meeting. They recalled the Press Statement issued by the Committee on 5 August 2012 in Amman, as well as the related Statement by the NAM Coordinating Bureau in New York on 9 August 2012. They reaffirmed the Movement’s resolve to continue assisting the Palestinian people in their legitimate quest for dignity, justice and their inalienable right to self-determination in their independent State of Palestine, with East Jerusalem as its capital, based on the pre-1967 borders.

3. The Heads of State or Government reaffirmed the Declarations on Palestine adopted by the Committee and endorsed by the Movement, most recently in Sharm El-Sheikh in 2012 and Bali in 2011, and their commitment to the positions therein. They renewed the call for political, economic and humanitarian assistance in support of the Palestinian people and their efforts to achieve their legitimate national aspirations and inalienable human rights, including their right to self-determination in their independent State of Palestine, with East Jerusalem as its capital, and their right to return. They paid special tribute to the resilience of the Palestinian people throughout the many decades of hardship they have been forced to endure for over 64 years since the 1948 Al-Nakba, which dispossessed and rendered the majority of Palestinians as refugees, now constituting more than 5 million people, and for over 45 years since the 1967 Israeli military occupation of the remainder of the Palestinian land, including East Jerusalem.

4. The Heads of State or Government reiterated their grave concern regarding the critical situation in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, as a result of Israel's prolonged military occupation and illegal policies and practices. They condemned Israel's ongoing military raids and attacks against the Palestinian civilian population; blockade of the Gaza Strip; settlement colonization campaign involving, inter alia, land confiscations, construction and expansion of settlements and "outposts", transfer of Israeli settlers, construction of the Wall, home demolitions, and imposition of severe movement restrictions and hundreds of checkpoints; detention and imprisonment of thousands of Palestinians; forced displacement of Palestinian civilians; and all other measures of collective punishment against the Palestinian people, constituting grave breaches of international law, including humanitarian and human rights law.

5. The Heads of State or Government deplored the vast physical, economic and social devastation caused by the Israeli occupation, particularly the destructive impact of the illegal Israeli settlements and the Wall, in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem. They condemned all such illegal colonization activities deliberately aimed at altering the Territory's demographic composition, character, and legal status and at forcibly acquiring more Palestinian land in total contradiction of international law and the two-State solution based on the pre-1967 borders. They expressed grave concern at the situation in Occupied East Jerusalem, where the Israeli settlement campaign is most intense, and called for a complete end to all settlement activities, excavations, including near Al-Haram Al-Sharif (Noble Sanctuary), home demolitions, residency revocations, and closure of Palestinian institutions in the City. They condemned also the terror, violence and provocations by extremist Israeli settlers against Palestinian civilians and properties, including homes, agricultural lands, and Muslim and Christian holy sites, and cautioned that such actions are fueling religious sensitivities that risk further destabilization and must be brought to an immediate end by the occupying Power.

6. The Heads of State or Government reiterated their grave concern about the critical humanitarian and socio-economic conditions in the Gaza Strip due to Israel's blockade, by which it continues to collectively punish the Palestinian people and obstruct movement, humanitarian access, entry of essential goods, and the reconstruction of Gaza. They reiterated the demand that Israel respect international humanitarian law and fully end this illegal blockade, stressing the need to ensure the sustained, regular movement of persons and goods between Gaza and the outside world and to restore the link and unity between Gaza and the West Bank, reaffirming that the Gaza Strip remains an integral part of the Occupied Palestinian Territory.

7. The Heads of State or Government further reiterated the call for ensuring accountability for the crimes and violations committed by Israel, the occupying Power, during its military aggression against the Gaza Strip in December 2008-January 2009. They also reiterated the call to ensure accountability for the Israeli military attack on 31 May 2010 in international waters on the humanitarian convoy destined for the Gaza Strip, in which nine Turkish civilians were killed. They called on the international community, including the Security Council, to pursue serious efforts to end Israel’s impunity and realize justice for the victims, including via follow-up of the findings and recommendations of the UN Fact-Finding Mission on the Gaza Conflict. They reaffirmed the obligations of the High Contracting Parties to the Geneva Conventions regarding penal sanctions, grave breaches and responsibilities.

8. The Heads of State or Government expressed grave concern about the inhumane treatment of Palestinian political prisoners and detainees being held by Israel, including physical and mental abuse, reported torture and denial of access to proper medical care and family visits. They expressed concern about recent crises of prolonged hunger strikes by prisoners and detainees, in peaceful protest of the illegal practice of administrative detention, by which hundreds of Palestinians are held without charge or trial, and other human rights violations by Israel. They reiterated the call for the immediate release of all the Palestinians detained and imprisoned by Israel, including children, women and elected officials. They recalled the Ministerial Declarations on Palestinian Political Prisoners adopted in Bali (May 2011) and Sharm El Sheikh (May 2012), and urged the mobilization of efforts to address this critical issue.

9. The Heads of State or Government demanded that Israel immediately cease all of its illegal policies and practices in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, and cease its violations of the human rights of the Palestinian people. They reiterated the demand for the complete cessation of all Israeli settlement colonization activities, which constitute grave breaches of international law and flagrant defiance of UN resolutions, the 9 July 2004 International Court of Justice Advisory Opinion, and obligations under the Quartet Roadmap to freeze all settlement activities and dismantle all settlement “outposts”. They expressed grave concern that this illegal campaign is undermining the contiguity, integrity, viability and unity of the Occupied Palestinian Territory and jeopardizing the prospects for physically achieving the two-State solution for peace on the basis of the pre-1967 borders, prompting a search for alternative just solutions.
10. The Heads of State or Government reiterated their serious concern about the dangerous impasse in the Middle East peace process and called for immediate, practical efforts to salvage the two-State solution and advance a fair, credible peace process based on the relevant UN resolutions, including Security Council resolutions 242, 338, 425, 1397, 1515 and 1850, the Madrid terms of reference, including the principle of land for peace, the Arab Peace Initiative and the Roadmap. They stressed that the peace process must ensure an end to the occupation of the Palestinian Territory and the other Arab territories occupied by Israel since 1967, including East Jerusalem; the exercise by the Palestinian people of their right to self-determination in an independent, sovereign, and viable State of Palestine, with East Jerusalem as its capital; and a just solution for the plight of the Palestinian refugees based on General Assembly resolution 194 (III).

11. The Heads of State or Government recalled in this regard the historic role and obligations of the international community, in particular the UN Security Council and General Assembly, as well as the High Contracting Parties to the Fourth Geneva Convention to uphold their obligations and ensure respect of the Convention in all circumstances. They called on the Security Council, based on its Charter duty for maintenance of international peace and security, to act forthwith to implement its resolutions, to ensure compliance by Israel, the occupying Power, and to promote a just, lasting and comprehensive solution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the Arab-Israeli conflict as a whole.

12. The Heads of State or Government reaffirmed support for the Palestine Liberation Organization, the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, and the Palestinian National Authority under the leadership of President Mahmoud Abbas, and emphasized the importance of protecting and strengthening the national and democratic institutions of the Palestinian Authority, including the Palestinian Legislative Council, which shall constitute a vital foundation for the independent State of Palestine. They reiterated the urgency of Palestinian unity for realization of the legitimate national rights and aspirations of the Palestinian people. They thus welcomed the Reconciliation Agreement signed in Cairo, on 4 May 2011, aimed at ending the division since June 2007, as well as the Declaration signed in Doha, on 5 February 2012, aimed at overcoming the challenges to the agreement’s implementation, and called on the international community to respect and support the Palestinian reconciliation.

13. The Heads of State or Government called for continued support for strengthening Palestinian national institutions, in line with the plan launched by Prime Minister Salam Fayyad in August 2009, “Palestine: Ending the Occupation, Establishing the State”. They commended its completion in August 2011 with the implementation of the second phase, “Homestretch to Freedom”, stressing the importance of this initiative for laying the foundations for the independence of the State of Palestine, and called for efforts to preserve and advance achievements in this regard during this critical period. They further reaffirmed the importance of the official recognition extended to Palestine by 132 countries, and urged the Members of the Movement that have not recognized the State of Palestine to do so as soon as possible as a positive contribution to making Palestine’s independence a reality based on international law and UN resolutions.

14. The Heads of State or Government welcomed in this regard the application submitted, on 23 September 2011, by Palestine to be admitted as a Member State of the United Nations, consistent with the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and independence, convinced that realization of this objective will be a major step towards securing freedom, dignity, stability and peace for the Palestinian people. They also welcomed the admission of Palestine as a Member State of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO).

15. The Heads of State or Government called on the Members of the Movement to remain at the forefront of support for the historic march of the Palestinian people for freedom and peace. They called for intensified efforts in this regard, including at the UN Security Council, General Assembly, Human Rights Council and other relevant organs and agencies. They commended the members of the NAM Caucus of the Security Council for their serious efforts concerning Palestine, and urged them to remain active to enhance the Movement’s role in the peace effort. They stressed the importance of regular contacts by the Movement at the Ministerial level with the members of the Security Council, Quartet, League of Arab States and all other concerned parties for advancing Palestine’s recognition as a State and its admission as a Member of the United Nations at the earliest possible date as well as for reviving international and regional efforts to bring an end to the Israeli occupation that began in 1967, realize the long-overdue independence of the State of Palestine, with East Jerusalem as its capital, and inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, and achieve a just, lasting and comprehensive peace and security. The Ministers extended an urgent call for launching a plan of action, based on the longstanding terms of reference of the Middle East peace process based on international law and UN resolutions and in coordination with other relevant political and regional groups, for the achievement of these objectives as soon as possible.
179A. 16th Summit of Heads of State or Government of the Non-Aligned Movement Tehran, Islamic Republic of Iran

26 - 31 August 2012

TEHRAN DECLARATION

The Declaration of the XVI Summit of Heads of State or Government of the Non-Aligned Movement
Issued on 30-31 August 2012
Tehran, Islamic Republic of Iran

We, the Heads of State or Government of Non-Aligned Countries, gathered at our XVI Conference held in Tehran, the Islamic Republic of Iran, on 30-31 August 2012, undertook a review of the international situation with a view to making an effective contribution to the solution of the major problems of concern to all NAM Member States and to entire Humankind, and, Inspired by the vision, principles and objectives of the Non-Aligned Movement, articulated in Bandung (1955) and Belgrade (1961), and guided by the Declaration of Purposes and Principles in our efforts to achieve a world of peace, equality, cooperation and well-being for all, drawing upon the Movement’s experience in the past and its great potential today, Reaffirming the lasting validity and the continuing relevance of the NAM vision, principles and objectives in the contemporary international situation, Strengthened by our past achievements in the struggle against imperialism, colonialism, neo-colonialism, racism, apartheid and all forms of foreign intervention, interference, aggression, occupation, domination or hegemony, and staying away from power alliances and their confrontations, continue to be fundamental elements in the policy of non-alignment, Renewing our commitment to the NAM principles and objectives and our pledge to strive to make a constructive contribution towards building a new pattern of international relations based on the principles of peaceful coexistence, cooperation among nations and the right to equality of all States, Continuing to uphold the principles of sovereignty and the sovereign equality of States, territorial integrity, self-determination and nonintervention in the internal affairs of any State; taking effective measures for the prevention and suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of peace, to defend, promote and encourage the settlement of international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered; refraining in international relations from the threat or use of force against territorial integrity or political independence of any State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes and principles of the UN Charter, Declare that:

1. To build a fair, inclusive, transparent and effective system of joint global governance, based on justice and equitable participation of all countries and to address present challenges and risks stemming from global security threats, environmental hazards, climate change, migration, contagious diseases, extreme poverty, among others, the NAM Member States should coordinate their positions and join force in pressing on the interests of the developing world. To do so, a number of priorities are as follows:

   a. Global governance is broad in scope and encompasses many issues of global interest and concerns than merely economic issues. The world faces challenges in security, social and environmental fields. International peace and security still continue to be high on the priority scale of many countries. The current international decisionmaking architecture in the fields of peace and security is outdated and much more resistant to any change.

   b. The United Nations as the universal and inclusive multilateral body should play a fundamental role in the institutional and legal framework of global governance. Thus, the United Nations could and should have a major role in efforts undertaken to find common solutions to common problems, including a coordinating role among all international and regional agencies. Nonetheless, for the UN to remain at the forefront of any discussion on global governance, focus should further be on its strengthening and modernizing. Towards this end, it is especially essential to revitalize the UN General Assembly, including in the area of international peace and security, and reform the UN Security Council to reflect the realities of today's world.

   c. The growing importance of developing countries is yet to be sufficiently reflected in the governance structures of existing international key decision-making bodies. Key decisions concerning the issues of global governance can no longer be the preserve of a small group of countries. Policies are being made across a broadening range of issues, which affect all in world politics. Thus, it is imperative that developing countries could have a greater voice and participation in the major institutions, which coordinate policies at the international level.

   d. Crises in the past several years have exposed the shortcomings and failures of international financial institutions, which adversely affect their ability to address crises and achieve adequate macroeconomic policy coordination. As they were established following World War II, they fail to address appropriately current World challenges and, therefore, adversely affect developing countries.
e. In the international community not every nation shares similar values and opinions. To live in peace and harmony the diversity within the global society should be acknowledged and respected. Thus, the attempts to impose values on other members of the international community should be thwarted.

2. Occupation of Palestine lies at the heart of the protracted crisis situation in the Middle East. Any solution to this crisis requires the termination of the occupation, crimes and violations committed by Israel, the occupying power, restoration of the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and the establishment of their independent and viable State of Palestine with Al-Quds al-Sharif as its capital. The restoration of the national rights of the Palestinian people is a basic prerequisite for the establishment of an equitable, comprehensive and lasting peace in the area.

3. Racism and racial discrimination are affronts to human dignity and equality, and the resurgence of contemporary and new forms of such abhorrent crimes in various parts of the world is a matter for grave concern. Thus, it is imperative to address with greater resolve and political will all forms and manifestation of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance including new forms of slavery and trafficking in persons, wherever they occur.

4. All human rights are indivisible, interdependent and interrelated, and human rights issues must be addressed through a constructive, non-confrontational, non-politicized, non-selective and dialogue-based as well as cooperative approach, in a fair, equal and balanced manner, with objectivity, respect for cultural diversity and national sovereignty and territorial integrity, non-interference in the internal affairs of States, taking into account the political, historical, social, religious and cultural particularities of each country. Special attention should be paid to the rights of the youth and women and the way be paved for building capacity in this respect and facilitating their participation in the politico-social and economic processes.

5. Nuclear weapons are the most inhumane weapons ever conceived. The maintenance of strategic and tactical nuclear stockpile and their continued modernization, as well as new military doctrines setting the rationale for their possible use, particularly against non-nuclear weapon states (NNWS), represent the greatest threat to humankind. The Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) did not provide a right for nuclear weapon states to keep their nuclear arsenals indefinitely. States Parties to the NPT have obligations under Article VI of the NPT to destroy all nuclear weapons within a time-bound framework, which is yet to be fulfilled. It is imperative to conclude a comprehensive convention on nuclear disarmament.

6. All states should be able to enjoy the basic and inalienable right to the development, research, production and use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, without any discrimination and in conformity with their respective international legal obligations. Therefore, nothing should be interpreted in a way to inhibit or restrict the right of states to develop nuclear energy for peaceful purposes. States’ choices and decisions, in the field of peaceful uses of nuclear technology and their fuel cycle policies, including those of the Islamic Republic of Iran, must be respected.

7. The inviolability of peaceful nuclear activities should be upheld and any attack or threat of attack against peaceful nuclear facilities operational or under construction amounts to a serious danger to human beings and the environment, and constitutes a grave violation of international law, of the principles and purposes of the Charter of the United Nations, and of regulations of the IAEA. There is a pressing need for a comprehensive multilaterally negotiated legal instrument prohibiting attacks, or threat of attacks on nuclear facilities devoted to peaceful uses of nuclear energy.

8. Non-Aligned countries agree to refrain from recognizing, adopting or implementing extra-territorial or unilateral coercive measures or laws, including unilateral economic sanctions, other intimidating measures, and arbitrary travel restrictions, that seek to exert pressure on Non-Aligned Countries – threatening their sovereignty and independence, and their freedom of trade and investment – and prevent them from exercising their right to decide, by their own free will, their own political, economic and social systems, where such measures or laws constitute flagrant violations of the UN Charter, international law, the multilateral trading system as well as the norms and principles governing friendly relations among States; and in this regard, they agree to oppose and condemn these measures or laws and their continued application, persevere with efforts to effectively reverse them and urge other States to do likewise, as called for by the General Assembly and other UN organs; agree to request States applying these measures or laws to revoke them fully and immediately.

9. All acts of terrorism, in all their forms and manifestations, wherever and by whoever committed, are unequivocally condemned. All States should abide by their international obligations in addressing the threat of terrorism, which continues to adversely affect peace, security, stability and development of many NAM countries. All victims of terrorism, including the Iranian civilian researchers and scientists who have fallen victim to inhumane terrorist campaign, deserve the deepest sympathy.

10. Dialogue among religions, cultures and civilizations should be enhanced, through supporting efforts made at the international level, towards reducing confrontation, suppressing xenophobia and islamophobia, promoting respect for diversity based on justice, fraternity and equality should be promoted, and all attempts of uniculturalism or the imposition of particular models of political, economic, social, legal or cultural systems should be opposed, and promote dialogue among civilizations, culture of peace and inter-faith dialogue, which will contribute towards peace, security, stability and development.

11. The Non-Aligned Movement should mobilize all its capabilities in order to implement the decisions of its leaders, as expressed in its documents. Accordingly, the NAM should consider the possibility of creating necessary mechanism with a view to following up on its decisions.

180. Statement by Foreign Secretary at SAARC Business Summit.

New Delhi, January 30, 2012.

Hon’ble Minister for Commerce, Industry and Textiles;
Mr. Sahney; Mr. Annisul Huq; Mr. Kanoria and friends from FICCI;
Ladies and Gentlemen and delegates from the SAARC Region;

It is a pleasure to participate at this SAARC Business Summit, and to welcome friends from the SAARC region in New Delhi. I congratulate Mr. Sahney upon his assumption of the Presidency of the SAARC Chamber of Commerce and Industry, and I thank his predecessor Mr. Annisul Huq for his contributions during his tenure.

2. We stand at an important juncture in the evolution of a more integrated South Asian economic community. Our goal of enhancing regional economic integration, to complement existing historical and geographical commonalities, is well-known. We need now to speak more on the steps needed to achieve this objective. Today’s event provides us an opportunity suggest some clarity.

3. This meeting today is timely, because it takes place as the South Asian Free Trade Area Agreement (SAFTA) is beginning to show results. In the nearly six years since SAFTA’s entry into force, intra-regional trade under SAFTA has touched US$1.4 billion – some 10 per cent of intra-regional trade – but growth has been extraordinarily fast. There is potential for more. The challenge is to create an enabling environment that makes trade between our countries more free, thus raising trade within South Asia to a level more commensurate with its potential, while ensuring that it is a win-win proposition for all countries. We believe this kind of outcome has not just commercial and economic validity but could have positive spinoffs for a more conducive political climate for cooperation across the board in all fields of common endeavour.

4. Furthermore, your meeting comes at a time when our region stands out for relatively high rates of GDP growth. As a result, the South Asia region could emerge as a locomotive for the world economy if we ensure an environment for rapid growth, as also build on our complementarities to make the region a magnet for greater trade, investment and financial flows.

5. It was with this perspective, and in full recognition of India’s asymmetrical responsibilities, that our Prime Minister announced an initiative at the XVII SAARC Summit in Addu last November to virtually eliminate India’s Sensitive List for Least Developed Countries in the SAARC Region. By slashing this Sensitive List to just 25 tariff lines, we ensured that zero basic duty will now apply on almost all goods from the five SAARC LDCs. Similar measures from our partners to dismantle tariff barriers across our region would benefit all members in SAARC. We also need to address issues that are potential non-tariff barriers.

6. This process must be accompanied by an effort to enhance free trade in services, and to step up financial flows within the region, in particular, investment. A SAARC Investment Promotion and Protection Agreement is pending finalisation since 2007. There is need also for policy measures that make it possible - and indeed advantageous - for our businessmen to invest in each others’ economies.

7. I can assure Mr. Annisul Huq that there is no way other organization get higher priority than SAARC in our scheme of things.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

8. If our region as a whole has to achieve higher trade and investment levels, one cultural requirement is enhanced connectivity. We need to create better hardware, in the form of railways and highways, and also cheaper and more plentiful flight services, telecommunications facilities, and value-added IT enabled services for businesses to maximise competitive opportunities within the region. It was with this perspective again that at the Addu Summit last November, our Prime Minister called for a regional air services agreement, and offered to create enhanced and cheaper telecommunications and other associated linkages.

9. Mr. Annisul Huq has mentioned some practical points about visas and presence of officials in meetings. We will certainly take a look at these issues. We must ensure he does not have to be under water as he feared, if he waited to be present at the last Summit!

Ladies and Gentlemen,

10. There is clearly a historical opportunity before us that SCCI must assist regional businesses in seizing. To do so, however, SCCI may need to consider a practical focus in its efforts. I have a few suggestions for you to consider in the year ahead.

(1) An inclusive approach: SCCI must not only represent its members, but also the totality of South Asian business. This involves displaying a degree of flexibility and a willingness to reach out to all those involved with intra-regional commerce, including non-SCCI members. This will enhance SCCI’s unique position as a spokesperson for regional business.

(2) Institutional linkages with SAARC: SCCI and SAARC need to have closer interaction and coordination of events, recognizing the fact that intensified regional cooperation cannot be separated from enhanced economic and commercial partnerships. We had hoped that the SAARC Secretary General’s presence today would help us address this issue further.

(3) Regional production chains: A more integrated South Asia requires strategies to develop regional chains of production. Governments need to work with businesses to create policies to sustain such value chains, and SCCI should canvass for such policies in defined sectors with potential.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

11. Regional economic integration must become meaningful for the millions of South Asians who are not benefiting from our respective national developmental strategies. SAARC has established a number of institutions towards this end, but one that has significant potential to realize this objective is the SAARC Development Fund (SDF).

12. The SDF has done well so far in funding regional projects for social development. Its recently-opened social development window funds a number of useful projects. However, we must be more ambitious with regard to the SDF. In November last year, the SAARC Foreign Secretaries felt that the SDF needed to evolve into a regional development bank. For this, it will require managerial and financial capacity to source and channel finances for regional infrastructure and economic development projects. As mandated by the SAARC Standing Committee, India is providing technical assistance for the SDF, to link it with regional financial institutions and to devise ways for it to open the infrastructure and economic development windows. In the medium term, the SDF could become an important focal point for developing regional infrastructure. Corporate South Asia should have an interest in this process and I would encourage some dialogue with SDF. Ladies and Gentlemen,

13. In conclusion, the current challenging international economic environment could also provide SAARC a once-in-a-generation opportunity to catalyze the potential within the region. We could set the standard as a region that manages the transition from emphasizing tariff and restrictive measures as mechanisms for raising resources, to one in which economic development and infrastructure-creation generate significantly-enhanced employment, human capacity and state-of-the-art infrastructure. This has to be a public-private-partnership in the general meaning of that term. SCCI can be the standard-bearer of such change and the advocate of such a vision.

14. I congratulate you for this excellent initiative and I wish you all success in your endeavours.

Thank you.

Artists from India & SAARC countries,
the DG ICCR,
Excellencies,
ladies and gentlemen

I am happy to be present at the exhibition of paintings by artists from the SAARC countries. Many of you are more acquainted with the history of art in our region than I am. So I will be brief in my remarks. We are all deeply conscious that art is an expression of inner feelings – poetry has been described as “emotion recollected in tranquility” and so is painting. It is not, as sometimes alleged, a form of expression used because the artist lacks other forms of expressing emotion. Van Gogh said that – “the only time I feel alive is when I am painting” – and that this involved “moments of frightening clarity”.

Art has been a vital part of our self expression – in this region as much as anywhere else in the world. From pre-historic times from rock paintings at Bhimbetka – to the masterpieces at Ajanta and Sigiriya – and from the tradition of Nepalese paintings of the Lichchavi era, to the great modern works of paintings from Afghanistan to Bangladesh - we have been and are in the mainstream of the world’s artistic impulse. But there is much that is distinctive and “South Asian” in our expressions.

I am happy at the collaboration between ICCR & Seher which hosts the painters camps in various cities bringing artists together. Their collections – the “Jaisalmer Yellow, “Puducherry Blue” and “Kerala Greens” – have become the united colours. Hopefully today we are moving on to the full rainbow. I use the metaphor the rainbow because it highlights our individualities as well as our commonalities which become evident when we are put together.

I am delighted that ICCR is using art as a vehicle of SAARC cooperation. ICCR have cultural center in almost all SAARC countries and will have one in Iran. I am particularly happy to see the work created during the workshop for children. Art is one of the many manifestations of South Asian Cooperation – which transcends the boundaries of politics. It expands the scope of our collaborations from commercial, technical and administrative to the sphere of people-to-people contact.
Art unites us in common endeavour - to allow our people to express themselves and produce works of beauty and timelessness.

Thank you for being here.

183. Opening Statement by External Affairs Minister during Joint Media Interaction at the RIC Ministerial Meeting.

Moscow, April 13, 2012.

Excellency, Foreign Minister of the Russian Federation, Mr. Sergey Lavrov Excellency, Foreign Minister of the People’s Republic of China, Mr. Yang Jiechi
Friends from the Media,

I would like to thank Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov and the Russian Foreign Ministry for the warm hospitality and excellent arrangements for this trilateral meeting.

The current international environment is witnessing dynamic shifts and volatile trends, which shall eventually delineate the contours of the future global scenario. India, Russia and China believe that they have a major role to play in addressing the global challenges.

Our meeting today was yet another important occasion for the three sides to exchange views on several issues of common interest. We also reviewed cooperation among our three countries within the framework of other regional organisations such as BRICS, G-20, SCO and the East Asia Summit Process.

I am happy to note that the IRC Foreign Ministers mechanism has emerged as an important platform for close political coordination amongst the three countries. The dialogue, I felt, was stimulating and enriching.

Within the IRC mechanism, we also discussed the various thematic round tables and also ways to carry forward newer initiatives in areas where we share expertise and can harness potential benefits.

The Joint Communiqué issued today reflects our common understandings on a range of issues and the decisions taken.

4. The Ministers recognized that the world was undergoing profound changes, and the global trend towards multi-polarity was irreversible. Meanwhile, global challenges were becoming ever more serious and complex. In this context, they emphasized the need to find collective solutions to global challenges such as regional conflicts, WMD proliferation, terrorism, transnational organized crime, illicit drug trafficking, natural and man-made disasters, financial and economic destabilization, food shortages and climate change. They noted that the events in the Middle East and North Africa had shown that there was no alternative to negotiations and peaceful settlement of conflicts through concerted actions by the international community. The Ministers affirmed that Russia, India and China intended to closely cooperate in addressing these challenges, including by consulting among themselves in the framework of the UN and relevant multilateral fora.

7. The Ministers expressed deep concern over the continuing situation in Afghanistan and stressed the importance of the international community remaining engaged in Afghanistan. They welcomed the successful holding of the Nuclear Security Summit in Seoul in March 2012 and supported the implementation of decisions contained in its Communiqué.

13. The Ministers noted that the situation concerning Iranian nuclear issue could not be allowed to escalate into conflict, the disastrous consequences of which would be in no one's interest. Iran has a crucial role to play for the peaceful development and prosperity of a region of high political and economic relevance, and needs to play its legitimate part as a responsible member of the global community. The Ministers expressed concern about the situation that was emerging around Iran's nuclear issue. They recognized Iran's right to peaceful uses of nuclear energy consistent with its international obligations, and support resolution of the issues involved through political and diplomatic means and dialogue, including between the IAEA and Iran, and urged Iran to comply with the provisions of the relevant UN Security Council Resolutions and extend its full cooperation to the IAEA. the People’s Republic of China, the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea, Russia, the Republic of Korea, the US and Japan of 19 September 2005.

15. The Ministers reiterated strong condemnation of terrorism in all its forms and manifestations and stressed that there can be no justification for any acts of terrorism on any grounds. Acknowledging that terrorism is a common challenge that requires the strongest collective action by the global community to combat it, they reaffirmed the action must be taken not only against the perpetrators of terrorist attacks but also against their supporters and sponsors.

16. The Ministers underlined the necessity of assisting other UN member states in better implementation of the UN Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy and increasing the number of parties to the UN anti-terrorism conventions, and promoting the implementation of Security Council resolutions, in particular Resolutions 1373 (2001) and 1624 (2005). 23. The Ministers reiterated the role of the Group of 20 as the major forum for international economic cooperation. Comments by the member states on the work of the SCO and their positions and approaches regarding how to further improve practical cooperation have been incorporated into the Declaration of the Heads of State of the Member States of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization on Building a Region of Lasting Peace and Common Prosperity. In the declaration, the member states stated their shared vision for establishing a just, democratic and multi-polar world architecture and developing state-to-state relations on that basis. They expressed the resolve to build an indivisible world security space and the desire to pursue a path of innovation and sustainable development suited to their national circumstances and to promote global progress with their own development. They also spelled out specific steps for international cooperation towards these goals.

The heads of state approved the Strategic Plan for the Medium-term Development of the SCO. They stated that the SCO is an open and harmonious regional cooperation organization running steadily on a smooth and effective institutional basis, and it is conducive to enhancing the good-neighborliness and common prosperity of the member states.

The heads of state heard and approved the report on the work of the SCO delivered by the Secretary-General and the report on the work of the RCTS delivered by the RCTS Council.

Over the past year, the SCO held the Meeting of the Council of the Heads of Government (Prime Ministers) of the member states (St. Petersburg, 7 November 2011), the meeting of heads of departments responsible for the prevention and elimination of emergency events (Dushanbe, 28 September 2011), the meeting of economic and trade ministers (Dushanbe, 26 October 2011), the meeting of transportation ministers (Moscow, 28 October 2011), the meeting of heads of counter-narcotics agencies (Beijing, 2 April 2012), the meeting of secretaries of security councils (Beijing, 12 April 2012), the meeting of heads of supreme courts (Beijing, 23-25 April 2012), the meeting of heads of senior audit institutions (Shanghai, 23-24 April 2012), the meeting of defense ministers (24 April 2012), the meeting of the Council of Ministers of Foreign Affairs (Beijing, 11 May 2012), a session of the SCO Forum (Almaty, 23-24 April 2012), the meeting of ministers of finance and heads of central (national) banks (Beijing, 16-17 May 2012), the meeting of culture ministers (Beijing, 4-7 June 2012) and the prosecutors general conference (Dushanbe, 5-6 June 2012).

Since the meeting commemorating the 10th anniversary of the founding of the SCO, the member states have worked extensively in political, economic, cultural and other areas of cooperation and achieved a series of concrete outcomes.

The heads of state noted that as the threats of terrorism, separatism, extremism, illegal narcotics trafficking and transnational organized crimes became more acute and turmoil in some parts of the world persisted, to conduct active political and diplomatic work on crisis early-warning and emergency response and engage in security cooperation remains a highly urgent task.

The heads of state approved the revised version of the SCO Regulations on Political and Diplomatic Measures and Mechanism of Response to Events Jeopardizing Regional Peace, Security and Stability and the Programme of Cooperation in the Field of Combating Terrorism, Separatism and Extremism for 2013-2015, which broadened the legal basis for security cooperation among the member states.

The heads of state stressed the importance of cooperation among member states in safeguarding international information security and pointed out the need to prevent information and communication technologies from being used to undermine world peace, stability and security and to continue to promote the formulation of an “International Code of Conduct for Information Security” under the framework of the United Nations.

The heads of state supported resolving the Iranian nuclear issue through political and diplomatic means.

The heads of state pointed out that the strengthening of missile defense by a country or group of countries in a unilateral and unrestrained manner in disregard of the legitimate interests of other countries will cause harm to international security and global strategic stability. The relevant issue must be addressed by all countries concerned through political and diplomatic efforts.

The heads of state noted the important progress made in regional economic cooperation and the need to further promote trade and investment facilitation, strengthen economic and technical cooperation in non-resources fields, fight goods smuggling and protect intellectual property right.

The heads of state emphasized the need to continue to take concrete measures to develop multilateral economic and financial cooperation in the region. They pointed out that the mechanism of the meeting of ministers of finance and heads of central (national) banks plays an important role in helping countries in the organization share experience on safeguarding economic and financial stability and advance their fiscal and financial cooperation.

The heads of state commended the work that has been done on setting up the SCO Development Fund (Special Account) and SCO Development Bank, and instructed that the above-mentioned work be continued and completed as soon as possible.

The parties expressed their readiness to safeguard energy security in the SCO region.
The heads of state stressed that the Agreement among the Governments of the SCO Member States on Cooperation in the Field of Agriculture signed in June 2010 must take effect as soon as possible so as to raise the efficiency of agricultural cooperation.

The heads of state maintained that it is important to strengthen SCO cooperation in culture, science, technology, innovation, tourism and health and ensure sound sanitation and epidemic control in the SCO region.

The member states pointed out that the success of activities for the SCO Year of Good-neighborly Friendship has deepened the friendship and cooperation among the member states.

The heads of state spoke highly of the work of the SCO Secretariat and the RCTS, and believed that they provided effective safeguards for the smooth operation of the SCO, the Business Council and the Interbank Consortium and the SCO Forum, enabling them to play an important role in tapping into the potential of economic and academic cooperation.

The heads of state maintained that given the evolving international situation and increase in SCO activities, it is necessary for the parties and permanent bodies of the SCO to enhance the publicity campaign for SCO activities to foster an objective and positive image of the organization.

The SCO member states supported greater international coordination and stronger cooperation with the observer states, dialogue partners and international and regional organizations such as the United Nations and its specialized agencies, the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, the Commonwealth of Independent States, the Collective Security Treaty Organization and the Eurasia Economic Community.

The member states took note of the wish of the relevant countries to join the SCO. The member states will continue to have consultations on the legal, fiscal and administrative conditions for membership expansion and work for early completion of the work on the basis of consensus.

The member states will continue to follow the principle of expanding the SCO’s international exchanges and carry out cooperation with other multilateral organizations and mechanisms.

The heads of state decided to give the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan the status of SCO observer state and the Republic of Turkey the status of SCO dialogue partner.

The heads of state decided to appoint Mr. Dmitry Mezentsev (Russian Federation) Secretary-General of the SCO and Mr. Zhang Xinfeng (the People’s Republic of China) Director of the Executive Committee of the RCTS. Their terms will be from 1 January 2013 to 31 December 2015.

The heads of state applauded the work of China during its presidency of the organization and expressed appreciation to the Chinese side for the warm hospitality during the Beijing Summit.

In accordance with the SCO Charter, the Republic of Kyrgyzstan will hold the SCO presidency in the next stage. The next meeting of the Council of the Heads of the SCO Member States will take place in the Republic of Kyrgyzstan in 2013.

187. Statement by Secretary (East) Sanjay Singh at the SCO Heads of Government Meeting.

Bishkek, December 5, 2012.

Your Excellency Prime Minister Satybaldiev,

Distinguished Heads of Government of the Members and Observers of the SCO, Special invitees,

Secretary General of the SCO,

Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It is a great honour for me to join you in this beautiful city of Bishkek to represent my Prime Minister and my country at this august gathering of world leaders. At the outset, let me thank the Government and the friendly people of the Kyrgyz Republic for their gracious hospitality and warm welcome. I bring good wishes from my Prime Minister and the people of India to our friends in the SCO region.

India has been following closely, as an observer, the evolution of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation. We are impressed that the SCO has emerged as an important regional forum focussing on issues of regional importance that are relevant and contemporary. The SCO has played a constructive and valuable role in promoting peace and prosperity in our region. It has made significant contributions both to regional economic development and to regional stability.

India has proactively participated in various SCO fora since 2005, learning much in the process, as also sharing our experience of development and progress. As an Observer, India has always endeavoured to play a constructive role and stands ready to step up its engagement to contribute more meaningfully to the SCO.

The situation in Afghanistan poses a major challenge and opportunity for the SCO, which provides a promising alternative regional platform to discuss and reflect upon the changing security situation in Afghanistan. At the last SCO Summit at Beijing, SCO members agreed to play a larger role in supporting Afghanistan’s efforts to build itself into a stable, independent country on the path of peace and development, free from terrorism and drug trafficking. The SCO should grasp the opportunity to work on promoting peace, stability and economic development of Afghanistan and its integration into its neighbouring regions.

On its part, India seeks to strengthen the hands of the Afghan people in bringing peace and prosperity to their country. India’s assistance to Afghanistan has helped build vital civil infrastructure, develop human resources and capacity in areas like education, health, agriculture and rural development. The primary objective of India’s development partnership, covering the entire territory of Afghanistan and every development sector, is to build indigenous Afghan capacity and institutions. We have no doubt that other members of the SCO family share these values and objectives.

India has long been a victim of terrorism and we are acutely aware of the threat that terror poses. We thus value all the more the steady progress the SCO has made in building counter-terrorism efforts. The Regional Anti Terrorism Structure (RATS) based in Tashkent has contributed richly to this progress. We look forward to greater engagement with RATS and the SCO member States in co-ordinating efforts to deal with the threats emanating from terrorism and drug trafficking.

India strongly believes in promoting peace and prosperity in our common Asian region. India’s vision for its own growth and development has always been that our prosperity is linked to the prosperity of our neighbouring regions. This is the rationale underlying our efforts to step up economic cooperation activities in all our neighbouring regions, including Central Asia, South Asia and South East Asia.

A common vision and approach for rapid economic development of our nations and people should bind us together. The role of the SCO to achieve this objective can be crucial. We need to pool our efforts to surmount the physical barriers posed by high mountain ranges like the Pamirs and the Tien-Shan and create transport networks for the free flow of people, trade and energy through the region. The improved communication network would help strengthen multilateral cooperation in critical areas like energy, finance, infrastructure and telecommunications, and boost trade and investment in the region.

India is already engaged with several SCO member states in areas such as capacity building and human resource development, information technology, pharmaceuticals and health care, small and medium enterprises and entrepreneurship development. We would also like to share our experience in specific areas of economic endeavour such as banking, capital markets and micro-finance. India articulated its ‘Connect-Central Asia’ policy in Bishkek this year, to further our vision of a region connected closely by its common aspiration for a better life for its people.

Our leadership has made clear that, India stands ready to play a larger, wider and more active role in the SCO as a full member as and when the members of the SCO decide to take forward the expansion process. We have friendly ties with all the member states and we wish to bring to the table our technical expertise, markets and financial commitments, all of which equip us to fulfil greater responsibilities in this forum.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I once again thank the Government of the Kyrgyz Republic for the arrangements made in this magnificent setting and the warm hospitality. On behalf of the Government of India, I also wish you all success in organising the SCO Heads of State Summit here next year.

\Thank you
188. Statement by External Affairs Minister at the SCO Heads of State Summit.

Beijing, June 7, 2012.

Your Excellency, President Hu Jintao,
Distinguished Heads of State,
Secretary General of the SCO,
Excellencies, Ladies & Gentlemen,

It is a privilege for me to join you in the beautiful city of Beijing, at this august gathering of world leaders. I had the honour to represent India at the last two summits of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation and I am delighted to have this opportunity again. I thank the Government and the people of China for the gracious hospitality and warm welcome.

India admires the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) and values its contribution over the past decade, to peace, stability and prosperity in the region. As the SCO prepares for the next decade of its journey, we see a welcome process of introspection among members, on the challenges of the next decade and the role of the body in a fast-evolving world, strewn with multiple multilateral bodies, with intersecting agendas.

India, on its part, has been participating constructively at all SCO meetings open to the Observers. By doing so, we have shown our strong willingness to be meaningfully associated with this grouping. We believe the SCO can potentially play a much larger role in the future, both for the security and prosperity of our region. We also value the fact that most SCO member countries are our neighbours, or belong to our extended neighbourhood, with a strong historical and cultural legacy of centuries binding us together.

The most important security challenge we face today relates to Afghanistan, which lies in the heart of Asia and is a bridge, connecting not just Central and South Asia but also Eurasia and the Middle East. The SCO provides a promising alternative regional platform to discuss the rapidly changing Afghan situation.

The economic development projects of the SCO can be a meaningful additional effort for Afghanistan’s reconstruction. India has already committed over 2 billion US dollars towards reconstruction and developmental activities in Afghanistan. This is a reflection of our commitment to the prosperity of the Afghan people. We will be unwavering in our support to this cause.

The other major security challenge of our age continues to be terrorism, which is a common threat to the international community and particularly to our SCO space. India is a long-standing victim of terrorism emanating from our region and believes that there is need for stronger resolve and firmer efforts in tackling this scourge.

We appreciate greater cooperation within the Regional Anti Terrorist Structure as an important regional answer to this challenge. India looks forward to greater engagement with this structure. Illicit narco-trafficking and cyber security are other challenges in the region which deserve greater focus and stronger collective efforts.

Connectivity between SCO countries is crucial to bind us together. The SCO needs to address the problem of connectivity through regional solutions to encourage trade and investment flows between our countries. India is ready to cooperate with regional countries to find viable solutions to this problem and contribute to the endeavour to build bridges between Central and South Asia. The International North South Transport Corridor, which we are re-energising, is one such effort in this direction.

Members and observers of the SCO can prosper by mutual sharing of experiences and best practices. India is already engaged with the SCO member states in areas such as information technology, management, and entrepreneurship development. We will be happy to share with SCO countries our unique experience in specific areas of economic endeavour, such as banking, capital markets, micro-finance, small and medium enterprises.

Energy cooperation is another area of interest to us. The proposed TAPI Project within our region is an example of cooperation that can bind us in energy linkages.

As we have emphasized at various SCO fora, India would be happy to play a larger, wider and more constructive role in the SCO as a full member, as and when the organisation finalises the expansion modalities. We welcome the general trajectory of the SCO towards expansion and redefinition of its role. We feel a wider and more representative SCO will be able to deal more effectively with the common challenges of security and development in our region.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to once again thank our hosts for the excellent arrangements and gracious hospitality.

I also congratulate the leadership of the Kyrgyz Republic on taking over the chairmanship of this important organisation and wish them all the best in organising SCO’s activities in the year ahead.
Miscellaneous Meetings

189. Opening Statement by Minister of State E. AHAMED, at the plenary of the Post-Forum Dialogue Partner's meeting.

Rarotonga (Cook Islands), September 3, 2012.

Honourable Chairman and Prime Minister of Cook Islands, Mr. Henry Puna Honourable Secretary General
Excellencies, distinguished guests, Ladies and Gentlemen.

It is an honour to be here, amongst you today, on the occasion of the Post-Forum Dialogue Partners Meeting. I would like to compliment the Government of Cook Islands for the excellent arrangements, warm and gracious hospitality.

India has long established historical links with the Pacific region and identifies culturally and socially with communities in the region. We have also been associated with this august Forum since its inception and it is a matter of honour for me personally that I am representing my country 4th time in this Forum.

Excellencies,

We are committed to take our relations forward with each of the countries represented in this Forum collectively and individually. We are also committed to assist eligible Pacific Island countries in their movement towards greater economic and social development as well as in their struggle to counter external issues of climate change that affects them deeply.

India's "Regional Assistance Initiative" for Pacific Island Forum countries, is based on the priorities identified by their leaders in the Pacific Plan. In keeping with its desire to develop closer engagement with the Pacific region, India increased its annual Grant-in-Aid to One hundred and twenty five thousand US Dollars from 2009 to each of the Pacific Island Countries for their economic development.

The assistance offered by India covers a wide spectrum of economic and social needs as determined by the Pacific countries themselves. This includes supply of equipment and materials for social and economic programmes; sustainable development initiatives; capacity building measures on Small and Medium Enterprise promotion, training courses for diplomats by Foreign Service Institute of India and scholarships in higher studies in different centres of academic excellence in India. This year we have provided assistance for office equipment for the ACP-EU conference, supply of a special vehicle for the disabled a mobile library etc. We have also successfully completed a project worth around One hundred and ninety five thousand US Dollars for upgradation of access road from Jetty to a village and for upgradation of another Jetty.

There are several projects under consideration like supply of medical and dental equipment for Princess Margaret Hospital, renovation of clinics, installation of a Tsunami alert system, community development projects and Parliamentary Support Project etc.

We are committed to continue our development assistance. I would also like to mention that those countries which did not utilize the grant-in-aid of One hundred and twenty five thousand US dollars offered annually in previous years may avail of the same, along with the offer made this year. We also remain committed for greater integration of Pacific island economies with the Indian economy.

Excellencies,

India also offers wide ranging technical expertise in non-conventional energy sources, especially wind and solar energy, information technology and telecommunications.

We are also happy to share our experience in training programmes, disaster management, climate change, adaptation and mitigation and in other areas that are of your interest.

We keenly follow and appreciate the steady progress made by Pacific Island Countries Forum towards regional integration. This Forum provides an excellent opportunity to identify common areas of cooperation in different sectors for sustainable development. India has always stood for the cause of the developing countries at multinational forums such as the UN and the WTO and has been at the forefront of South-South cooperation. Further, we would like to have closer and more intensive India-PIF dialogue at Ministerial level.

Thank you.

Extract from the Media Briefing by Official Spokesperson on the Trilateral Meetings between India, Japan and the United States.

New Delhi, October 30, 2012.

Question: Could you give us something about the India-Japan-USA trilateral?

Official Spokesperson: The third trilateral dialogue between India, Japan and the US was held yesterday. For those of you who were very interested where it was held, it was held outside the MEA premises in a local hotel. I will not plug for the name of the hotel but it was held outside. Yesterday there was a lot of interest where it was going to be held. In terms of timing, it started around midday. By the time it ended, it was late in the night and that is why we could not brief you last night. It ended approximately by my understanding at around 9 o’clock last night.

At the end of this meeting we have completed one cycle of dialogues. If you would recollect, the first trilateral dialogue was held in Tokyo in December 2011; the second one was held in Washington in April 2012; and this is the third. With this, each of the three participant countries has hosted one meeting of the dialogue. As regards the discussions in that dialogue, each side shared their perceptions of the strategic overview of the Asia Pacific. And there were detailed discussions relating to the ASEAN Summit which is going to be held in Phnom Penh as well as the East Asia Summit. Each side expressed their views on what the issues were and how they are going to take this matter forward.

There was a very interesting discussion on Myanmar, Afghanistan and also Africa and the three sides felt that they should consider the possibility of working through development cooperation in a coordinated manner in these three places. This matter will be carried further.

Obviously there was a discussion on maritime security largely focused on anti-piracy operations. I think both the visiting delegations also, during the course of this dialogue, took time off and they called on the Foreign Secretary to have discussions with him.

Finally it was agreed that the next round of the trilateral dialogue will be held in the United States. The dates and the location will be worked out through mutually agreed diplomatic channels. That in a summary is for you the trilateral dialogue that took place.

Question: Sir, a report published yesterday in The Indian Express claimed that Tokyo has officially complained to MEA that the Survey of India map shows the sea between Japan and Korea as North Sea of Japan. Is it true? And what actually does the Indian Government call the sea?
Official Spokesperson: The issue of naming of the water body that you mentioned is not new. This is an issue which has been on the international agenda for about two decades. It has been discussed in various international organizations including the UN and also I think the International Hydrographic Organisation. As far as India is concerned, there is no change in our policy on addressing the water body by the name that we have always addressed it. And that name is for the record that we always have addressed it as the Sea of Japan. As regards your questions whether this was raised, yes, it was raised, and we have reiterated our policy on this matter and that is the policy that I have just explained to you. I hope that clarifies in adequate terms where we stand on this issue.

Question: Sir, South China Sea is a matter of concern for all the three countries – India, Japan and the USA. Was this matter discussed during this trilateral meeting?

Official Spokesperson: I mentioned to you that each side shared the perceptions of the strategic overview of the Asia Pacific. There are countries obviously which have this as an important issue and this was shared. I did not want to list out in detail what was discussed. But then Asia Pacific covers I presume the South China Sea, and if that is what you want to say, the answer is yes.

Question: US-Japan-India trilateral is a sort of follow-up of the strategic quadrilateral in which these three and Australia were involved. Was the inclusion of Australia on the table yesterday? Is there such a proposal yet again?

Official Spokesperson: Not to my knowledge.

Question: You said that during the meeting with Khaleda Zia and the External Affairs Minister today, Khaleda remarked that her visit makes a new beginning of looking forward. What is the response from the Indian side? How do you respond to it practically for resolving the outstanding issues? Will the new Foreign Minister visit Bangladesh immediately to expedite the ongoing dialogue and to resolve the outstanding issues? Is there any immediate plan for the new Minister’s visit to Bangladesh?

Official Spokesperson: The External Affairs Minister has said that he would like to visit all our neighbours including Bangladesh at an early opportunity. Given the priority that India places on relationship with neighbours, you can expect a visit at an early date. Of course, the dates are going to be worked out between Foreign Offices and we have an annual meeting of Foreign Ministers. Possibly they could meet on the sidelines of some of the multilateral meetings that are there on the calendar. So, do not be surprised if there are meetings in the not too distant future.

Question: Sir, Bob Blake has said that Narendra Modi, Chief Minister of Gujarat, is free to apply for a visa. He has also said that the United States will work with whoever is in office in India and of course that he wants good relations with the people of Gujarat. Does the MEA have a reaction as it is part of the Centre which is currently with the UPA?

Official Spokesperson: I do not know what sort of a reaction you would want that a representative of another Government says that they would consider granting a visa to a democratically elected representative of a State in India. This has been going on for several years. The Ministry of External Affairs view has been articulated previously and in Parliament. I will send those details to you if that is what you want.

Question: During the visit of Khaleda Zia, are we getting a sense of a broad bipartisan consensus emerging on the Indo-Bangla relations which were enshrined and mentioned in the two joint statements, one when Sheikh Hasina visited India and subsequently after Prime Minister’s visit to Dhaka?

Official Spokesperson: When we invited leaders of various political parties from Bangladesh to India. That is our hope that our relationship with Bangladesh is deep and abiding and transcends anything that is restrictive in nature. Therefore, there have been several visits of leaders from various other political parties also from Bangladesh to India. Ultimately Bangladesh and India are neighbours whose people will live with each other. We are neighbours, we cannot change that. Therefore, people-to-people interaction across the spectrum is what we hope for and we desire and cherish.

Question: When you spoke about the trilateral discussions you spoke about two countries and one continent – Myanmar, Afghanistan and Africa. Could you be more specific about what exactly you spoke about? Is it about South Africa, is it about Mali?

Official Spokesperson: The idea is that India, Japan and US all are interested in providing development cooperation to various countries in Africa as well as to Afghanistan and Myanmar. As far as India is concerned these are our major areas of development cooperation. Japan also has a huge development cooperation programme with these countries. So, the idea is that if we can try and see if there are commonalities that we can work together and reinforce each other's strengths in these areas. At this stage this is only a possibility, as I said. So, we have to get into detailed discussions a little later on that.

Question: We know that India is an emerging power in the world. Do you like behaving like an emerging power, for example, enter into the nuclear dispute between Iran and US and take a mediation role?

Official Spokesperson: I get your point. Your question is that you think India should mediate right now in the dispute between Iran and the P5+1. Our view has always been clearly stated that there are existing channels of communication, there are existing fora to discuss this. We do not feel that either Iran or the others have asked for any other mechanisms. So, if there are mechanisms which are working, nobody has asked for it. Why would one think of the thing that you are thinking of?

Question: Akbar, what is our position on US request to be a dialogue partner in the Indian Ocean? Do you think it complicates the region?

Official Spokesperson: This matter was discussed between India and USA at the Strategic Dialogue. We have indicated as the Chair of the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation that we will work with other members to try and see if this is possible. We have circulated the US request and this will be discussed at the forthcoming meeting, and we will take it from there.

Question: ... (Inaudible)...

Official Spokesperson: The meeting of the Senior Officials is slated for tomorrow.

Question: Akbar, are any new members likely to be admitted to IOR-ARC? Is Pakistan one of them? If it is not, why not?

Official Spokesperson: I think the IOR-ARC works on a principle of consensus, and the request that is now currently being considered or is on the agenda is that of Comoros.

Question: Over the last couple of months there has been a bit of scanty information about a possible closer economic tie between India and the Common Market for East and Southern Africa. There have been whispers about that. Could you shed light on this? Is there such an agreement to do something, possibly an FTA?

Official Spokesperson: I do not deal with whispers. I am pretty open. So, I do not know about the whispers that you are talking of.

Question: Will there be any briefing after the meeting tomorrow?

Official Spokesperson: We will have a briefing after the Ministerial Meeting and that briefing will be by the External Affairs Minister Shri Salman Khurshid. It will be on the 2nd in the afternoon once the IOR-ARC adopts its final outcome document.

Thank you very much.
192. Inaugural Address by Secretary (East) at the India-Japan-ROK Trilateral Dialogue

New Delhi, June 29, 2012.

Dr Arvind Gupta, Director General of IDSA
H.E Mr Akitaka Saiki, Ambassador of Japan
H.E Mr Kim Jong-Keun, Ambassador of Republic of Korea

Distinguished delegates participating in the Dialogue,

I would like to extend a special and warm welcome to the delegates from Japan and South Korea.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It gives me great pleasure and satisfaction in delivering the inaugural address for the 1st India-Japan-South Korea trilateral Dialogue. This event today is an important step in the evolution of our relationships. A trilateral forum such as this gives a significant message not only for the participants but also to the observers as it is a manifestation of greater degree of maturity, trust and mutual understanding amongst the partners. It means that the partners have been able to manage their relationship well and have developed the confidence to talk and find solutions to over-arching issues and concerns both bilateral and regional. This is the prime reason for the sense of contentment that I have alluded to.

2. The second and more personal reason is to see that an idea that was incubated by a few people only a few months ago, two of whom are here today namely Ambassadors Kim and Saiki, has seen fruition. With this Dialogue being held in Delhi today, many of us have a deep sense of achievement in being able to implement an idea whose time and moment I believe has arrived. It is now the responsibility of the three partnering institutions namely IDSA, Korea National Diplomatic Academy and Tokyo Foundation and their eminent scholars and academicians to take the process forward and provide it with meaning and substance. The way that this process will develop and evolve will depend on your imagination and efforts. Our expectation is to see this process generating ideas that will influence the wider relationship existing amongst the partners both at governmental level or at the people-to-people level and how we view our region and emerging Asian architecture. This impact will be good measure of the success of this process.

3. This Dialogue marks a milestone in the history of cooperation between our three countries. The foundation stone for this indeed is the robustness and dynamism of our respective bilateral relationships. Speaking for India, and I believe it holds equally true for Japan and Korea, is the deeply valued strategic partnerships with both Japan and South Korea. In India today there is wide ranging support for the strategic partnerships with Japan and Korea and it is indeed noteworthy that we have been able to constantly re-invent and re-invigorate the relationships. This has been possible because these partnerships are in turn based on something more profound i.e. shared values and goals. These elements are the driving force for the synergy required to propel this trilateral framework. Japan and Korea are already involved in some trilateral processes.
We are also involved in a trilateral dialogue with Japan and United States. Our experiences from these processes should inform this dialogue as well and we should from the very beginning calibrate this process to benefit the relationship amongst our countries and our peoples. We can never lose sight of the fact that this process has the unique character of a dialogue between three great democracies of Asia.

4. Being leading democracies of the world we share a common commitment to democratic values, open society, human rights and the rule of law. These shared values provide us similar perspectives and perceptions of the fast evolving regional and global environment. Similarly our strategic interests also coincide.
We seek a peaceful and secure Asia free from the threats of terrorism, proliferation, piracy and conflict between states. There is common commitment to maintaining freedom of the seas, combating terrorism and promoting inclusive economic growth. India, Japan and ROK depend heavily on the Sea Lanes of Communications (SLOCs) for their energy security. These are also the mainstay for trade and connectivity amongst our countries and other countries in the region. India has a valued geostrategic location straddling the SLOCs. The Indian Ocean Rim is characterized by large Exclusive Economic Zones and unexplored and untapped marine resources. Similar potential exists for example in the South China Sea which today is witnessing competing claims. Our common objective is to see that the seas and oceans become regions of co-operation instead of competition particularly as our energy security and trade depends on them. The primacy of our efforts must be to maintain maritime trade, energy and economic security in the seas around us. There is indeed a compelling case for us to cooperate on maritime security. From a nuclear security perspective as well there can be significant cooperation amongst us as not only we need to deal with the conventional risks associated with nuclear power but also confront the risks of nuclear and missile proliferation in our neighbourhoods. Deepening cooperation amongst our defence and security establishments will promote our mutual security.

5. In the twenty years since 1992, when India embarked on her “Look East” policy, we have become increasingly integrated with East Asia. The proportion of our trade and investment from East and South East Asia has risen dramatically. We are not merely a Summit Partner of ASEAN, but are integral to the economic and strategic processes underway in this part of the world. We actively participate in the ASEAN Regional Forum and are founder members of the East Asia Summit. India moored in East Asia through an ever enlarging web of relations with this most dynamic part of the world seeks to build even stronger partnerships with the Japan and Korea both trilateral and in the context of the new regional architecture emerging in Asia. At present, it is not surprising that two of our more significant relationships are with our trilateral partners. The Comprehensive Economic Partnership Agreements with Japan and Korea are already showing results with positive effects on trade enhancement, investments and opportunities for professionals. A case in point is the growing Indian IT presence in both countries. Even new areas of cooperation are now being explored such as creative industries with Japan.

It may sound incredible but it is true that Indian and Japanese partners are talking about cooperation in such diverse areas as fashion, gaming and manga comics. On the other hand Korean and Japanese firms are amongst the most successful in India, particularly in electronics and automobile sectors. Your brands are household names and the watchword in quality and excellence. States of Tamil Nadu, Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh are experiencing a very visible impact of investments from Japan and Korea. Our endeavour has been to further facilitate this process and engage in innovative projects to ensure a better business environment for investors. The Delhi Mumbai Industrial Corridor (DMIC) which is already under implementation and the proposed Chennai-Bengaluru Industrial Corridor are good example of how India’s infrastructure needs and requirements of foreign investors can be matched to produce world class facilities for both citizens of India as well for investors. In fact when we engage with our interlocutors from other countries we very often give example of the Korean model or the Japanese model of investment related trade creation.

6. The Comprehensive Economic Partnership Agreements have surely brought our economies closer. There is already movement on up-gradation of CEPA with Korea. These are healthy portents. Bilateral trade between our countries has been growing rapidly. I see greater potential in this area if our entrepreneurs and businesses collaborate and leverage the synergies. My advice to the forum would to be look closely at how cooperation between our three countries can increase trade and investment between our countries.

7. Before I conclude, I would like to wish this Dialogue all success. I am sure you will have enriching deliberations on the three major themes namely i) the evolving Asian Security Architecture; ii) non-traditional security Issues and iii) prospects and challenges for this process. I look forward to perusing the recommendations of this Dialogue particularly those with regard to how we can promote trilateral cooperation such that it benefits the foreign policy objectives of our three countries and brings our peoples even more close together. I wish you all success.

Thank you.
INDIA’S FOREIGN RELATIONS - 2012

SECTION - V

DIASPORA
Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh presided over the third meeting of the Global Advisory Council of Overseas Indians on January 8, 2012 at Raj Bhawan, Jaipur from 1200-1430 hrs. Also present were Shri Vayalar Ravi, Minister of Overseas Indian Affairs, Shri Jairam Ramesh, Minister of Rural Development, Dr. Montek Singh Ahluwalia and Shri E. Ahamad, Minister of State in the Ministry of External Affairs and senior secretaries to the Government of India.

The Council meeting was attended by eminent Overseas Indians including: Lord Karan F. Bilimoria, Shri Swadesh Chatterjee, Ms. Ela Gandhi, Lord Khalid Hamied, Dr. Renu Khator, Shri Kishore Mahbubani, Shri L.N. Mittal, Lord Bhikhu Chotalal Parekh, Dr. Sam Pitroda, Tan Sri Dato’ Ajit Singh, Mr. Neville Joseph Roach, Prof. Srinivasa SR Varadhan and Mr. Yusuffali M.A.

The Members of the Council unanimously thanked the Prime Minister for convening the third meeting of the Council at Jaipur and for allowing free exchange of views on matters concerning overseas Indians. The members appreciated that many of the suggestions made previously by them had been implemented for example merging of OCI (Overseas Citizenship of India) and PIO (Peoples of Indian Origin) cards and facilitating voting rights for Non-Resident Indians while certain other issues are under implementation. The members spoke on issues concerning higher education particularly faculty development, engaging second and third generation overseas Indians, Foreign Direct Investment in retail, issues pertaining to governance, and how India can take a more proactive role in the discourse on globalization. The members maintained that on balance, the tenor of reports about India in the international media showed that the global community maintained a healthy respect for India because of India’s strong fundamentals.

Prime Minister thanked the members for their constructive suggestions. With slowdown in the USA and Europe, Prime Minister noted that the growth centers may have to shift to the Asia-Pacific. He was confident that despite many constraints India would return to a sustained high annual growth path of 9-10 percent in the medium term. Prime Minister further assured that the Government would reflect on all the suggestions made by the Council members, and engage proactively on all of them.
Pursuant to the law that was enacted to enable non-resident Indians to vote in our national elections, the Government has issued notifications for registration of overseas Indians electors under the Representation of People Act, 1950. Addressing the inaugural function of the 10th Pravasi Bhartiya Diwas here today, the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh said that this constitutes the first major step to enable Indians resident abroad to participate in our election processes. He said in the last session of our Parliament we have introduced a Bill intended to merge and streamline the People of Indian Origin and Overseas Citizen of India schemes by amending the Citizenship Act. This will rectify some of the anomalies in the schemes and provide for an Overseas Indian Card which will be given to foreign spouses of such card holders as well.

Dr. Singh said that a large number of workers from Rajasthan are emigrating abroad. We have accordingly established an office of the Protector of Emigrants in Jaipur. I am told that the Government of Rajasthan proposes to build a Pravasi Bhartiya Bhawan in Jaipur. This Bhawan will house the offices of not only the Protector of Emigrants but also a Migrant Resource Centre to provide onsite help to overseas Indians and emigrating workers. The Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs is implementing the emigrate project that will provide end to end computerized solutions for all processes in the emigration system. The system will link all key stakeholders on a common platform which will be used by workers, offices of the protector of emigrants, recruiting agencies, immigration officials, employers and the Indian missions abroad. The scope of our Labour Mobility Partnership Agreements is being expanded to cover not only skilled workers but also students, academics and professionals. Such Human Resource Mobility Partnership agreements are being negotiated with the Netherlands, France, Australia and the European Union.

He said the government has decided to introduce and sponsor a new Pension and Life Insurance Fund for overseas Indian workers. The schemes will encourage, enable and assist overseas workers to voluntarily save for their return and resettlement for old age. It will also provide a low cost life insurance cover against natural death. The scheme fulfills a long pending demand of our workers abroad. We are acutely conscious of the safety and security of Indians living abroad, particularly in regions, of instability. There are over six million Indians living in the Gulf and West Asia. We need to be alert to the unfolding developments in this part of the world. We have conveyed to the countries of the region that we have a stake in the peace and stability of this region and that we expect that they would appropriately look after the interests of Indian communities in their countries.

Dr. Manmohan Singh said that following the upheaval in Libya last year, the Government undertook Operation Safe Homecoming to evacuate more than 16,000 people from the strife torn areas through special flights, passenger and naval vessels. Similar evacuations were carried out in Egypt and Yemen on a lower scale. We stand ready to extend such help elsewhere should the need arise. Last year, the Government constituted an inter-Ministerial Committee under the Cabinet Secretary to make recommendations on issues relating to repatriation, relief and rehabilitation of Indian nationals affected by recent developments in the west Asian region. The Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs has prepared an Action Plan to implement its recommendations.

He said that despite an adverse international environment, the Indian economy is expected to grow by about 7% this financial year. However, we hope to bring back the rhythm of our growth processes to sustain an annual growth rate of 9-10%. Our domestic savings rate which currently stands at 33-35 percent of our GDP will facilitate the realization of our growth objectives. Our efforts to battle inflation are producing results and there has been an improvement in the situation. We have attempted sincerely to address the rising expectations of our people with regard to governance and delivery of public services. The Right to Information Act has proved to be a powerful instrument of bringing in transparency in governance. I am confident that some of the other legislations on these issues, which are on the national agenda, will make a similar impact in the years ahead.

Shir Vayalar Ravi, Minister of Overseas Indian Affairs said that over 1800 delegates from about 50 countries are participating in this Pravasi Bhartiya Diwas. He said that there is an estimated five million Overseas Indian Workers mostly in the Gulf and Malaysia. There is a net annual outflow of over half a million workers from India, excluding returnees. He said these workers make a significant contribution to India and account for close to 40 percent of the total remittances that India receives each year. Last year, India received over 50 Billion US Dollars as remittances. Mr. Ravi said the vast majority of these workers are temporary contractual workers in the informal sectors. They often do not have the protection of labor laws in the host country. This makes them especially vulnerable to economic downturns and sometimes to exploitation. In particular, the often appalling conditions of work and the absence of social security protection for women domestic workers, needs strong governmental interventions. Even the International Labour Organisation has recently drawn attention to the urgency in this regard. He said that India has therefore concluded bilateral agreements with many of the GCC state to work together to ensure decent work and suitable safe guards for women workers.
The Chief Minister of Rajasthan Mr. Ashok Gehlot announced a new scheme, “Know Rajasthan” for non resident Indians. He said under this scheme 50 NRIs from 18-28 years of age annually would come on tour to the state. 90% expenditure of their Air Fare will be borne by the Rajasthan Government. He said that along with this, expenditure on internal transport and residence will also be borne by the State Government.

The Prime Minister Ms. Kamla Persad Bissessar, the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago said that India has been and continues to be a great friend of Trinidad and Tobago as we continue to be friend of India and has extended this hand of friendship by providing hundreds of scholarships for our nationals to train in world class Indian Institutions. In particular, India has a lot to teach the world in terms of how to attain food security, as well as to make affordable computers and I-Pads which are basic tools in generating creativity and international competitiveness. She said Trinidad and Tobago as a gate way to America has a number of trade agreements which will allow for market access into the 600 million Central and Latin American markets. For those of us who may be unaware to Trinidad and Tobago, we are the world’s number one exporter of methanol and at times urea. In fact the largest methanol plant in the world is located in Trinidad and Tobago. She said that a Mini Pravasi Bhartiya Diwas can be organized in Trinidad and Tobago.

Shri Shivraj Patil, Governor of Rajasthan and Shri Parvez Dewan, Secretary, Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs were also present on the occasion. Shri B. Muthuraman, President, Confederation of Indian Industry presented the vote of thanks.
195. Address by the Prime Minister at the tenth Pravasi Bharatiya Divas.

Jaipur, January 8, 2012.

I am very happy to welcome you all in this beautiful and historic city of Jaipur for this year’s Pravasi Bharatiya Divas. Rajasthan represents Indian hospitality at its very best. It is renowned for its culture, heritage and legends of valour, honour and sacrifice. Today, symbols of modern Rajasthan sit side by side with monuments of breath-taking beauty. I am sure that your stay in this beautiful city will renew your pride in the richness of India’s civilization.

This year we are privileged to welcome one of the most distinguished Pravasi Bharatiyas as our Chief Guest. Madam Kamla Persad-Bissessar created history by becoming the first woman Prime Minister of Trinidad and Tobago. She distinguished herself in her earlier careers in education and law. Subsequently, she responded to the call of public service and proved what a person of talent, dedication and commitment can achieve anywhere in this world.

In welcoming Prime Minister Madam Kamla Persad Bissessar today we also seek to honour the large Indian diaspora in the Caribbean. We are proud of their achievements. Their journey, often in very difficult circumstances, to those far-away lands began many, many years ago, but their links with India remain strong and deep. Our shared passion for cricket is well known. Which Indian sports fan does not know the names of cricketing legends like Brian Lara or Sonny Ramadhin.

This year’s Pravasi Bharatiya Divas marks the tenth anniversary of the event which was first held in the year 2003. This decade has been marked by a visible accretion in the influence and impact of the global Indian across the world. We have witnessed a steady growth in their numbers, levels of prosperity and their skills.

The government and people of India recognize and greatly value the important role being played by Indian communities living abroad. We believe that the Indian diaspora has much more to contribute to the building of modern India. We propose to facilitate, encourage and promote this engagement. Over the past year we have taken a number of steps towards this end.

Pursuant to the law that was enacted to enable non-resident Indians to vote in our national elections, the Government has issued notifications for registration of overseas Indians under the Representation of People Act, 1950. This constitutes the first major step to enable Indians resident abroad to participate in our election processes.

This Bhawan will house the offices of not only the Protector of Emigrants but also a Migrant Resource Centre to provide on-site help to overseas Indians and emigrating workers.

The Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs is implementing the e-migrate project that will provide end-to-end computerized solutions for all processes in the emigration system. The system will link all key stakeholders on a common platform which will be used by workers, offices of the protector of emigrants, recruitment agencies, immigration officials, employers and the Indian missions abroad.

The scope of our Labour Mobility Partnership Agreements is being expanded to cover not only skilled workers but also students, academics and professionals. Such Human Resource Mobility Partnership agreements are being negotiated with The Netherlands, France, Australia and the European Union.

I am happy to inform you that the government has decided to introduce and sponsor a new Pension and Life Insurance Fund for overseas Indian workers. The scheme will encourage, enable and assist overseas workers to voluntarily save for their return and resettlement and old age. It will also provide a low-cost life insurance cover against natural death. This scheme fulfills a long pending demand of our workers abroad.

The world is passing through a difficult phase. Many of you are experiencing first-hand the impact of the global economic slowdown. Employment opportunities have declined, there is greater protectionism and attitudes towards migration have also hardened. There is growing social intolerance even in more open societies.

Our country is also going through difficult times. Nonetheless, our economic fundamentals are strong and our constitutional processes are robust. We are up to the task of meeting these challenges we face as a nation. Despite an adverse international environment, the Indian economy is expected to grow by about 7% this financial year ending 31st March. However, we hope to bring back the rhythm of our growth processes to sustain an annual growth rate of 9-10% in the medium-term. Our domestic savings rate which currently stands at 33-35 percent of our GDP will greatly facilitate the realization of our growth objectives. Our efforts to battle inflation are producing results and there has been an improvement in the situation.

We have attempted sincerely to address the rising expectations of our people with regard to governance and delivery of public services. The Right to Information Act has proved to be a powerful instrument of bringing in transparency in governance. I am confident that some of the other legislations on these issues, which are now on the national agenda, will make a similar impact in the years ahead.

The theme for this year’s event is “Global Indian - Inclusive Growth.” Indian civilization and society have always been inclusive in character. It is only natural that our political and economic processes have also to be ‘inclusive’ in their orientation and in their outcome.

Over the past years, Indian democracy has deepened and gained in strength and vitality as more and more people from the disadvantaged sections of our society have secured their rightful place in our economic and political processes. We wish to unleash the vast human potential of the many millions, who for one reason or another, have been on the margins of our society in the past. Our government is committed to doing so by providing security of education, nutrition and health to every Indian so that he or she is empowered to live a life of dignity and well being. We are also committed to the pursuit of a development strategy which will protect our environment and the essential life-support systems of our planet.

We in India speak in different languages and follow different faiths. But Indian culture has a tradition of assimilating and accommodating diverse traditions, customs, beliefs and peoples. That is what makes Indian society, Indian civilization endure and flourish.

The ‘global Indian’ is a symbol of this diversity of our ancient land. Your individual prosperity and personal achievement are a symbol of what a diverse people like us can achieve.

Many of your forefathers were forcibly taken away from India as labourers; some migrated in distress. Yet, today, the People of Indian Origin are welcomed around the world for the values they represent – values of hard work, values of excellence and enterprise and respect for their communities, their families and their neighbours.

I welcome each one of you to India because I want each one of you to inspire our people with your creative example. May your path be blessed.
196. Address of Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee at the 10th Pravasi Bhartiya Divas.

Jaipur, January 8, 2012.

"Inclusive Growth: Two decades of Economic Liberalization."

It gives me great pleasure to address this distinguished gathering at the Pravasi Bharatiya Divas 2012. As we all know, this day celebrates the achievements of the ‘pravasi bharatiya’ or the non-resident Indians whose sterling role in nation building efforts of their adopted countries is recognized all across the world. This day also seeks to highlight and encourage their contributions to India’s social and economic development. Let me begin by welcoming you all to India on this special occasion.

I am glad that the tenth Pravasi Bharatiya Divas is being held in the culturally vibrant and entrepreneurially renowned state of Rajasthan. I commend the state government for partnering this event.

I feel proud of the achievements of our nation and of Indians. I am using the word "Indian" to mean much more than nationality. The gathering today is a symbol of the larger idea of Indian identity. This is an identity that goes beyond nationality. It refers to our common history and heritage. In that sense this is a gathering of family members who have spread all over the world but who nevertheless share a deep common bond. I welcome you to our motherland.

This larger concept of internationalism was repeatedly stressed by our founding fathers. In 1961 Pandit Nehru had reminded us: “Ultimately ... nationalism will prove a narrowing creed, and we shall all be citizens of the world with a truly international vision. ... The nationalism that we build in India should have its doors and windows open to internationalism.” Gurudev Rabindranath Tagore showed us how India might be intensely national and at the same time international with her thought and sympathy embracing the world.

Today India has begun playing a global role unlike ever in the past. Our economy had been relatively stagnant during the initial years after India’s independence. Then from the early 1980s the growth rate picked up. It rose further after the economic reforms of the early 1990s. And since 2005 there has been no looking back. The economy grew for three successive years at rates over 9 per cent. Even during the global recession of 2008-09, India’s GDP grew by nearly 7 per cent.

The year 2011 has been an eventful one. In terms of the time line in the economic history of the country its passage marks two decades on the path of economic liberalisation. Though we have witnessed ups and downs, this period has transformed our country and catapulted it into the centre stage in the world. India is viewed as belonging to the group of the fastest growing nations of the world. We are widely recognized as a major driver of global growth. India is a member of the G20 and, within the G20, it is considered a part of the systemically most important 7.

India’s integration into the world has had a long history. In the colonial era we had witnessed the migration of large numbers of our fellow Indians, often in pursuit of economic opportunities in agro-produce rich colonies. Others moved to pursue business goals. Then in the post-colonial era the trend turned to a movement towards the industrialised nations. When in the 70s a large number of highly qualified Indians were moving abroad, we were warned of the severe consequences of the brain drain. Contrary to conventional, and in hindsight myopic opinions, luckily we made no attempt to stop the flow. Today we are better off due to that.

The movement of the diaspora is no longer unidirectional as it was in the past. What started as a brain drain, has now become a brain gain, not just for India but the world as a whole. Today mobile Indian professionals and entrepreneurs are contributing across the global economy and enhancing its resilience in these troubled times. Many have also returned to the home turf and are engaged in its socio-economic fabric. Still others have set up enterprises or professional relations that span national boundaries.

This movement of global talent has had many consequences. First of all, it has brought in many global best practices into the Indian economy. At the same time, it has created networks and linkages which serve as channels for flows of ideas across boundaries. This has given the Indian economy an edge in the seamlessly connected global economic environment.

The global success of the Indian diaspora in the spheres of science, economics, education, business, public life and the arts is a matter of great pride for us all. The ‘pravasi bharatiya’ has contributed significantly to India’s ‘soft power’ and global image in a multidimensional manner. This has no doubt contributed to its attractiveness as an investment destination. The entrepreneurial skills of the Indian business community settled abroad are a matter of envy for other nations. Foreign firms are increasingly aware of the sharp business acumen of the Indian entrepreneur and managers. They have come to respect our business houses and practices.

I believe however that much still remains to be done. We have not yet reaped the full benefits of India’s great diaspora. The most obvious area remains that of investment and entrepreneurship. For instance, in China a large chunk of foreign direct investment has come from overseas Chinese. I am aware that there have been large ticket investments by non-resident Indian entrepreneurs. But I think it is far less than the potential and perhaps too concentrated on the formal sector. Rather, we must pursue an alternative model. One that is more balanced and holistic in a socio-economic sense.

For this we must rightly turn to the inspiration behind the Pravasi Bharatiya Divas. The 9th of January, marks the return of Mahatma Gandhi from South Africa to India. The subsequent new vigour he granted our freedom movement is well known. But the Mahatma also brought with him a new outlook and social vision: one that gave great emphasis to the dignity of labour, the importance of our rural sector and social equity. He was intensely aware of the need for social inclusion and had great faith in the ability of the rural economic system to provide a balanced, equitable and optimal solution to the issue of economic development and social equity. His model of development was based on the harmonious self sustaining village economy which put minimal pressures on scarce resources while maximizing livelihood and well-being. In today's parlance what he was aiming for was inclusive development coupled with sustainable growth.

India's economic achievements over the last few years have been commendable. The broad-based growth has brought improved opportunities for livelihood and employment across a wide range of skills. There is also a significant increase in public resources through better tax mobilisation. It has created, perhaps, for the first time in India's post-independent history, the means to bridge the chronic deficits in social and economic attainments and reducing the disparities across different population groups and between the regions. But on our social indicators much remains to be done. In his respect there is need to engage in social enterprises in a proactive manner.

We have tried to evolve a model of development, which is more inclusive and people centric. It has sought to improve the access of the poor and the vulnerable to vital public services by creating entitlements backed by limited legal guarantees. This includes the right to information, the right to work in rural areas, the right to education and the right to food which is in the process of being enacted. There is progress, in all spheres including education, healthcare, financial inclusion and financial literacy, skill development and mainstreaming of hitherto marginalised sections of society, but there is still a long distance to traverse.

It is here that the pravasi bharatiya can probably make the biggest contributions. This requires not just financial contributions, but rather dedication of time, ideas and endeavour. From the agenda of the pre-conference seminars I am aware that discussions have been held on ‘Solar Energy- Investment and R&D’ and ‘Social Entrepreneurship-Water’. These are extremely relevant topics for our development. I hope some new ideas will emerge from your deliberations.
The Indian inclusive growth model - within the framework of democracy and human rights and freedoms, within a diverse and heterogeneous culture - is being recognized the world over as a viable paradigm. The strong diversity also has to be 'included' in the agenda for reforms. And though, as we have seen, it may tend to slow down things a little, as long as the direction is positive and forward looking, we can derive some satisfaction. Every incremental step which comes about with consensus is better than imposing big bang reforms without consensus.

Let me conclude by reiterating that a strong foundation is being created through a pro-active policy framework in both economic and social sectors. It should help form the springboard for the inclusive involvement of the overseas Indian in India’s development and its destiny. India presents an opportunity for the world as a whole. Our overseas Indian family with its multifaceted talents, excellent capacity for adapting to and ability to operate within different cultures and environments should make a concerted effort to connect with India’s growth and its prosperity in the times to come.

I wish you all the best in your endeavours.

197. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs re: Indian Council of Overseas Employment- A think Tank on ‘International Migration’.

New Delhi, February 14, 2012.

Backgrounder

The Indian Council of Overseas Employment (ICOE) is a ‘not for profit’ society established by the Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs (MOIA) in 2008 to serve as a think tank on all matters relating to ‘International Migration’. The ICOE undertakes empirical, analytical and policy related research, implements pilot projects to document good practices and assists in capacity building of stakeholders at the sub-national level. The mandate of the Council is to devise and execute medium to long term strategies to enable Indian emigrant workers and professionals to move up the value chain and to position India as a preferred source of qualified, skilled and trained human resources across a wide gamut of sectors.

Vision: Lead ‘evidence based’ work on international migration to support informed policy making and enable strategic interventions for a coherent and harmonised response to the transnational movement of people.

Mission: Partner with individuals, institutions and governments to drive empirical, analytical and policy related research; enhance capacities and pilot good practices in international migration and its governance.

Governance Structure: The Council has a two-tier body comprising of a Governing Body and an Executive Directorate. The Governing Body provides the broad policy framework for the programmes and activities of the Council. The Governing Body is headed by Secretary, MOIA who is the Chairman while the other Members include the Secretaries or their representatives from the Department of Economic Affairs, the Ministry of Finance, the Ministry of Labour and Employment; Secretaries of three State Governments by rotation and four external nominees. The Chief Executive Officer, ICOE functions as Member Secretary of the Council and looks after the functions of the Council and its operations, assisted by a small team.

Key Partnerships: ICOE is building strong research partnerships with institutions of international repute as well as multilateral organisations. Some of the partner institutions include:

- European University Institute (EUI), Florence, Italy
- International Organization for Migration (IOM), India Initiatives of ICOE

i. Skill Development Initiative for Potential Migrants from the North-Eastern States of India is a pilot project currently underway in eight North-Eastern states in partnership with International Organization for Migration (IOM). The objective of the project is to provide job readiness and augment employability of the potential overseas migrants, in the international labour market, especially high demand sectors of hospitality & healthcare. The project will develop standards and an internationally recognized framework for skills up-gradation, assessment, accreditation & certification. The project will be scaled up at national level.

ii. Developing a Knowledgebase for Policymaking on India-EU Migration project is being implemented in partnership with EUI, Florence, with an objective to consolidate a constructive dialogue between the EU and India on migration covering all migration-related aspects. The project is co-financed by European Commission (EC). The objective of the project is to assemble high-level Indian-EU expertise in major disciplines that deal with migration (demography, economics, law, sociology and politics) with a view to building up migration studies in India and to provide the Government of India as well as the European Union, its Member States, the state governments, academia and civil society, with evidence-based policy-oriented research, capacity building, and outreach programmes at sub-national level.

iii. Study on Health of Migrant Workers from India in the Gulf is being undertaken by ICOE in collaboration with WHO and IOM in three major Indian states of origin (Kerala, Andhra Pradesh, Punjab), and in the UAE, Oman and Bahrain. The scope of the study is to understand the etiology of the high incidence of hypertension, gestational diabetes and depression amongst Indian workers, relative to their counterparts in India as well as in comparison with other ethnic groups.

iv. Empowerment of Women Migrant Workers in the Gulf is a pilot project instituted by ICOE in collaboration with UN Women for empowering women migrant workers in the Gulf. The project will be implemented over a period of two years in select districts of two major states of origin for women migrants workers; Andhra Pradesh & Kerala. The project aims to institutionalize ‘good practices’ in the entire cycle of migration from pre-departure to return and resettlement through a series of awareness and capacity building programmes covering all stakeholders in the migration process.

v. Labour Market Assessment (LMA) of six European countries was conducted by ICOE in partnership with IOM to present a market overview and sectoral opportunities in the labor markets in respective countries. The LMA also provided broad-based as well as short-term recommendations for potential improvement on the supply side of labour mobility in India. The second phase of Labour Market Assessment will be carried out in select EU Member States, Australia and Canada.

vi. Research Project on the Movement of Indian Capital, Goods and Labour in Africa in partnership with The Centre for Indian Studies in Africa (CISA) - Wits University to create the basis for a realistic assessment of Indian capital and labour in Africa; and inform policy and practice in India. The project will build statistical & data analysis systems and establish institutional links with think-tanks in Africa to support evidence based research. The research outputs will inform India’s engagement with matters of investments and management of overseas Indian labour with particular reference to skills needed. It will also provide recommendations for action to improve labour flows and to engage with the issue of entrepreneurial capital as opposed to direct investments.

vii. Second Employer’s Conference will be organized in 2012 with an objective to showcase India as a preferred country of origin for skilled and trained human resource. The conference will be hosted by Haryana Overseas Placement Assistance Society (HOPAS) and is expected to be attended by recruiters from EU member states, Gulf, South-East Asia and Australia.

199. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs on “UAE and India to Activate an Electronic Contract Registration and Validation System to Streamline the Employment of Indian Contract Workers”.

New Delhi, April 4, 2012.

The UAE Ministry of Labour and India’s Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs today signed a protocol at Abu Dhabi to streamline the admission of Indian contract workers by way of an electronic contract registration and validation system. A milestone in the efforts to upgrade rules and procedures governing contract employment of Indian nationals in the UAE, the new system heralds a joint endeavour by the UAE and India.

Mr. Saqr Ghobash, UAE Minister of Labour underlined the commitment of the UAE to exemplary co-operation with India in a range of areas, including the employment of Indian contract workers in the UAE, whose number has grown to approximately 1.7 million. In particular, the new system ensures the full transparency of the contracting process by mandating that the prospective worker be duly informed by Indian government-accredited recruitment agencies of the terms of the contract offer, including the scope of remuneration and employment conditions and benefits, prior to deploying to the UAE. Mr. Ghobash further elaborated that the system requires that the worker signs off on the terms of the contract and that the competent Indian government authorities approve these terms before the admission process is completed and a work permit is issued. These same terms are then electronically captured into the formal employment contract that is signed by worker and employer in the UAE. He stressed the importance of safeguarding and protecting the interests of both workers and employers under the provisions of the UAE Labour Law.

Shri Vayalar Ravi, Minister of Overseas Indian Affairs hailed the protocol, which would protect the interest of workers as well as the employers, as a leap in India-UAE relations in the field of labour employment. He stated that the protocol underlines the commitment of the Indian Government to the protection and welfare of the Indian workers in the UAE, in accordance with UAE legislation. Thanking the Ministry of Labour of UAE Shri Ravi said the new system safeguards the interests of workers and employers alike by validating the contract conditions of the Indian worker in the UAE. The Minister said that India is implementing a comprehensive e-governance system towards making the process of overseas deployment of Indian workers transparent and accessible to all stakeholders. The Contract Registration and Validation System is fully aligned with India’s e-governance system, allowing for a seamless application of the respective rules. and procedures of both countries. He cited many projects undertaken by the Indian government to ensure welfare and protection of the Indian workers. Shri Ravi stated that the interests of workers and the employers are complementary and that the new protocol is a commitment of both the governments to jointly work towards the same.

The new system is activated by an online application by a UAE employer for the granting of work permits that requires disclosure of the key terms of the employment offer. The UAE Ministry of Labour processes the application and provides access to the electronic record to Indian government-accredited recruitment agencies in India that are then required to obtain the worker’s attested consent; a duly designated Indian government agency also accesses the record for the purpose of reviewing the terms of the employment and granting an emigration clearance accordingly. This is followed by the registration of the electronic contract and the issuance of the work permit by the Ministry of Labour of UAE. This protocol emanates from a comprehensive UAE-India Memorandum of Understanding on Manpower, which was signed by Shri Vayalar Ravi, Minister of overseas Indian Affairs and Mr. Saqr Ghobash, UAE Minister of Labour in New Delhi on September 13 last year.

The protocol mandates the informed consent and approval by the worker, the employer and the Indian competent authorities of the full terms of the work contract prior to the worker’s deployment to the UAE. The contract terms are, in turn, captured in the contract document that is eventually signed by worker and employer in the UAE and duly registered with the Ministry of Labour of UAE.

201. Statement by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the shooting incident at the Gurudwara in Wisconsin, USA.

New Delhi, August 6, 2012.

“I am deeply shocked and saddened to learn of the shooting incident that has resulted in the loss of precious lives and injuries to devotees attending a prayer service at a Gurudwara in Wisconsin, U.S.A.

That this senseless act of violence should be targeted at a place of religious worship is particularly painful. I send my deepest condolences to the families that have been bereaved in this incident. Our thoughts are with them in this moment of their grief.

India stands in solidarity with all the peace-loving Americans who have condemned this violence. We welcome the U.S. President's statement on the tragic incident. We hope that the authorities will reach out to the grieving families and ensure conditions that such violent acts are not repeated in the future.”
202. Media Interaction of External Affairs Minister on the shooting incident at Gurudwara in Wisconsin, USA.

New Delhi, August 6, 2012.

External Affairs Minister (Shri S.M. Krishna): I was deeply shocked on hearing the sad news of the shooting that took place in a Gurudwara in Oak Creek in the State of Wisconsin, United States.

This incident tragically has taken away six precious human lives, and there are three who are injured. I offer my sincere condolences to the families and friends of those who lost their lives, and also to the entire Sikh community in the United States of America.

The Sikhs who live in the United States of America have earned the respect of both the administration as well as the people by their harmonious outlook and their commitment in whatever walk that they are pursuing a career there. I condemn this incident, and I think every right-thinking person has to condemn this. This is an attitude which does not fit into the proclaimed policies of the United States.

In the United States there is religious liberty just like in our own country. Anyone, regardless of his beliefs is entitled to pray, is entitled to pursue the religion of his choice. Any attempt by outsiders to interfere in this very sacred freedom has done a great injustice not only to that country but to the entire people.

We have seen messages of condolences by President Obama, Governor Walker of Wisconsin, Ambassador Powell, and their leaders including Mitt Romney. They have emphasized that the United States attaches importance to religious freedom and tolerance, respecting and protecting the people of all faiths; and the Sikh community’s rich contribution to that country has been recognized by all sides.

This incident took place around 10:15 am local time on Sunday, August 5. Our Embassy in Washington DC maintained contact with the US Government throughout the day. A senior officer from the Embassy in Washington DC and two officers from our Consulate in Chicago have already left for the place of the incident. They are in constant touch both with our Embassy as well as with the US administration.

I would like to assure the Sikh community that Government of India would do everything that is in our power to ensure that their places of worship are going to be protected at all costs.

I am trying to get in touch with Secretary Clinton. I believe Secretary Clinton is somewhere in Africa. We have sent a message to the State Department conveying my intention to talk to her at her earliest convenience.
Question: Sir, you said ... (Inaudible)... that everyone has a right to their religion and to pray and so on. Does that indicate to you that this was indeed a hate crime because the police there have not really specified what the motive was. But is that the information we have?

External Affairs Minister: I think the Federal Bureau of Investigation has swung into action right away and perhaps the United States administration and the Wisconsin State authorities are awaiting the report of the investigation. Our Ambassador Shrimati Nirupama Rao has been in constant touch with the State Department and the White House officials. I spoke to Ambassador Nirupama Rao this morning, which was late last night American time. She has already registered her sense of disturbance and concern about the developments.

Question: Sir, have the officials of the United States conveyed any ... (Inaudible)... of the possible ... (Inaudible)...

External Affairs Minister: Motives and who is responsible for this is all going to be revealed once we get the preliminary report by the investigating agencies in the United States. Only then perhaps we can come to some conclusion.

Question: Sir, ... (Inaudible)... gun culture in the United States, if you have seen, come up again and again. Is there something that you think the US authorities really need to do about it?

External Affairs Minister: I think they will have to certainly take a comprehensive look at this kind of tendency which certainly is not going to bring credit to the United States of America. But we will not certainly interfere in the internal affairs of the United States of America. I think it is for them to decide what is the next course of action.
203. Press Release issued by the Prime Minister's Office on the call received by the Prime Minister from the US President Barack Obama regarding the shooting in the Gurudwara in Wisconsin.

New Delhi, August 8, 2012.

US President Barack Obama called the Prime Minister today to convey condolences over the shooting incident at a Gurudwara in Wisconsin, USA on August 5, 2012. He appreciated the contributions made by the Sikh community in American society. He said that the tragic incident would be investigated.

The Prime Minister thanked President Obama for the support extended by the government and people of the United States. He hoped that measures would be taken to avoid recurrence of such incidents. He stressed that India and USA, as two pluralistic and open societies with respect for religious freedoms, should continue to work against ideologies of violence and hatred.

in large numbers. He also said that the next Pravasi Bhartiya Divas (PBD) will be held at Kochi, Kerala in January 2012 and the Regional PBD will be held at Mauritius in October this year.

On the occasion, Smt. Preneet Kaur, Minister of State, Ministry of External Affairs and Shri. Parwez Dewan, Secretary, MOIA were also present. The conference is being attended by Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) countries as well as Jordan, Yemen, Malaysia, the Maldives Angola, Thailand, Nigeria, Iraq and Libya. There are approximately 7.5 million semi-skilled and unskilled overseas Indian workers in the GCC countries and Malaysia on temporary employment/contract visas, predominantly in the construction, healthcare and household services sectors. The Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs (MOIA) is the nodal Ministry for protection and welfare of Overseas Indian workers.

(iii) CENTRAL AND WEST ASIA
(i) SOUTH ASIA
Speech by National Security Advisor on “Transforming South Asia” at the Third Asian Relations Conference.

New Delhi, March 9, 2012.

Shri Sudhir Devare, DG, ICWA,
Professor Swaran Singh,
Distinguished participants,
Ladies and Gentlemen.

Thank you for giving me the honour of speaking at the inaugural session of the Asian Relations Conference (III) on “Transforming South Asia; Imperatives for Action”. You have an impressive list of participants and speakers and a full and extensive agenda. I am sure that your conference will contribute meaningfully to the transformation that South Asia is undergoing.

I thought that I would speak about the present situation in South Asia, in terms of the economy and political and security issues, and of what the way forward might be.

1. The Present Situation

We in South Asia tend to be modest (which is a good thing) and to underestimate ourselves (which is not such a good thing) when we speak of South Asian integration and the present situation in the sub-region. We often speak of the South Asian paradox that a region which has so many cultural and other affinities should be so lacking in integration and connectivity. My own view is the minority view. Many of you have heard me say before that there is more to what is happening in South Asia than is described by the (now traditional) narrative of pessimism of which we South Asians ourselves are the major retailers.

That narrative goes something like this: South Asia is one of the least integrated regions of the world, with itself and with the rest of the world. It is also one of the regions most beset with irreconcilable political and security issues and disputes. With 22% of the world’s population it has only 6-7% of the world’s GDP. Intra-regional trade accounts for only about 6% of its own total foreign trade. It is resource poor with only 8.3% of global water resources, and so on and so forth.

All of which might be true but it misses the point that reality is far more complex, that empirical performance by South Asia, particularly in the last five years, has shown us how to deal with these limitations; and, that we have a moment in history which we should seize if we wish to transform South Asia.

Let us first look at the South Asian economies. South Asia has emerged as one of the fastest growing sub-regions in the world with an average rate of growth of 8% sustained over the past five years. Intra-regional trade within South Asia has begun to grow and has doubled over the past five years. We are therefore at a point where it is increasingly evident to all the countries in South Asia that there are substantial costs to not moving forward by lowering tariffs, minimising sensitive lists, and tackling non-tariff barriers. Each government has taken significant actions in the recent past. India has reduced the sensitive list under SAFTA in a dramatic fashion last year for LDCs. As a result, I am told that Bangladesh’s exports to India will cross the $1 billion mark in a twelve month period in July for the first time in history. The India-Sri Lanka FTA has already quadrupled trade between the two countries, and we are now working to improve it. Pakistan has decided to grant India Most Favoured Nation treatment, gradually moving to a negative list system. I could cite bilateral and multilateral examples of positive steps taken recently by each of the countries in the region.

When we speak of South Asia as the least integrated region in terms of trade, we ignore the wide variation in our experiences. The fact is that intra-regional trade as a proportion of total trade varies widely for the countries in South Asia. For Nepal it is as high as 60.5%, for Sri Lanka 18.9%, for Pakistan 6.6% and for India only 2.7%. But this variation also tells us how great the potential is, and why intra-regional trade is growing faster than South Asia’s trade with the rest of the world.

The other caveat that we should bear in mind is the fact that official figures certainly underestimate the real magnitude of trade that is taking place between South Asian countries, whether clandestinely or through third countries. Anecdotal evidence suggests that the real figure for India-Pakistan trade could be almost three times greater than the official trade figures of almost $3 billion. It is an open secret that most India-Bangladesh trade is not reflected in the official figures. South Asia has the dubious distinction of a relatively high level of informal trade flows unrecorded and unreflected in official trade statistics. This suggests that natural complementarities do exist between South Asian economies and have already been identified and acted upon.

Several years ago in 1999 RIS carried out a study of the costs of non-cooperation in SAARC. They found that in 1994 Sri Lanka and Pakistan imported many items at higher unit values than would have prevailed if they had imported them from within SAARC, paying on an average twice what they would have paid in South Asia, and losing $266 million in the case of Sri Lanka and $511 million in the case of Pakistan. (Incidentally, these were relatively high values at that time.) If anything the costs of not doing business with each other have risen since then. Products are being exported by countries in the region to the rest of the world but not to other countries in the region! But it is heartening that there is a much wider realisation of these costs within the region. It is probably time that we updated the study today.

The other opportunity comes for the fact that as our economies have diversified and become sophisticated in the last decade similarities in production structures across countries could also offer opportunities for intra-industry trade. Several sectors such as processed foods, rubber products, plastics, pharmaceuticals, textiles, apparel and light engineering goods are amenable to this kind of trade. If the governments are successful in removing non-tariff and other barriers, this sort of trade should flourish in the region.

As for the nay-sayers’ argument that South Asia is resource poor and doomed to poverty and even conflict over resources, we also have our strengths. We are population rich, and have a healthy demographic profile which should last well into the 21st century, giving us the markets and the demand we need to keep growing. And despite these constraints we have maintained a healthy growth momentum in the recent past.

2. Politics and Security

But all this economics ignores the real political and security issues that enable outsiders to call this one of the most dangerous places on earth, I sense you saying to yourselves. We may have got the economics right recently, but can we get the politics right?

Perhaps, would be my answer. South Asia has more than its fair share of issues with insurgencies, radicalism, terrorism, and extremism. But none of these issues has prevented this from being one of the fastest growing sub-regions in the world in the last decade, and outperforming other sub-regions. But it is an open question whether we in South Asia have the institutions and habits of working together to address the real issues of political instability and the security challenges that we face. This is not to question anyone’s sincerity. The great advance that we have made in the last decade is in the common realisation throughout the region that we all need a peaceful environment to concentrate on what really matters, seeking to provide security and prosperity to our citizens. Those who argue otherwise are a small minority in all our countries. But there are serious questions about the capacity of state structures and their ability to deal with terrorism and extremism in some cases. And vestiges of zero-sum thinking on political and security issues remain influential in some circles.

Empirically speaking, there has been an improvement in the security situation in important parts of South Asia. The elimination of the LTTE’s armed forces in Sri Lanka, Bangladesh’s successful actions against terrorists and extremist elements in the last three years, and Nepal’s steady progress in its double transition to multi-party democracy and mainstreaming the Maoists are some practical examples.

But overall one would have to conclude that our politics have lagged behind our economics.

3. The Way Forward

There are two possible ways of dealing with this imbalance between our economics and our politics.

One would be to directly attack the laggard sector, politics and security issues, head on. But these issues which divide us have done so for a long time and there are reasons why they have done so.

Let me tell you a story about the other way.

When Chanakya/Kautilya first met Chandragupta Maurya in Taxila around 330 BC, Chandragupta had just failed in his fifth or sixth attempt to overthrow the Nanda dynasty by a coup in their capital Pataliputra in Magadha/Bihar and fled to the North West. Kautilya then asked him, when you eat a hot dish of rice do you plunge your fingers into the centre or do you start at the cool fringes. Chandragupta changed his strategy to the indirect approach and the rest is history.

I think we should learn the same lesson and should build the economic and other links that we can, while attempting to resolve the political and security issues that divide us.

This does not mean that we ignore the political and security issues. In fact it means the opposite. It certainly means that we must not let political differences and fears stop the processes of South Asian integration. At the same time states in the sub-region must begin to meaningfully address and resolve the political issues and disputes that divide them. Speaking personally I would go further. It may be time for those of you who are scholars and intellectuals to start considering cooperative security frameworks and architectures for this sub-region, and what conditions would be necessary to make them successful. There are a host of issues such as terrorism, maritime security and cyber security which require cooperative solutions and which bear consideration by groups like yours.

In meantime, we should also move forward much more rapidly on the connectivity, including energy and grid connectivity, tourism, people to people, trade and economic links that can make such a major contribution to improving our future.

I am confident that if we do so we will be able to transform South Asia. I am old enough to remember South Asia as it was. Some of us were called “basket cases” and have proven those prophets false. Others told us that we should forever remain hewers of wood and drawers of water. They too have been proved wrong. Just in my lifetime the sub-region has undergone a transformation of its economy, society and polity that is unparalleled in its own long history for its range, depth and speed. What has happened, and what continues to happen, is nothing short of a revolution in the lives and aspirations of our peoples. Our societies and polities have shown the ability to work with unprecedented change. Given our record, I am sure that we can transform South Asia, working together.
I trust that your exhaustive agenda will give you a chance to consider these and other ideas for the transformation of South Asia.

I wish you every success in your deliberations.

Address of Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee at the International Conference on ‘Co-Operative Development, Peace and Security in South and Central Asia.

“I am happy to be here today at this gathering of experts from South and Central Asia, a region of which we are a part and with which historically we have had friendly ties. I offer my welcome to those who have taken the trouble to be here today, in the quest for closer regional friendship and cooperation.

India has entered a new era of economic progress in the last couple of decades. The foundations so carefully laid by the country’s first leaders, and the labour of the early years, have now begun to yield results. When we set out as an independent country, we received the priceless gift of democracy that underpins all else, and at the same time we began acquiring the elements of a modern state: education, technology, economic advancement, an open and free society and several institutions. We all know that the race is only half run and much remains to be done. All the visible signs of progress on every side cannot, and do not, blind us to the harsher realities of poverty and its attendant ills. Yet the overwhelming recent story of India is of a great nation finally coming into its own.

In this interconnected world, no nation, least of all ours, lives in isolation from the rest. India has always been outward looking and has maintained an active engagement in global affairs, driven by the internationalist vision of our first Prime Minister, the great Jawaharlal Nehru. That vision has never faltered. Not the State alone but its children have reached out to lands abroad, in friendly and peaceful association, and today the growing communities of persons of Indian origin living in different parts of the world reinforce India’s search for closer international ties.

India’s geographical position provides the country with unique opportunities and drives many of our aspirations. From time immemorial we have been in close touch with the lands in our vicinity, and have engaged in the commerce of material goods and, even more so, of ideas, that has brought benefit to all those involved. Developing ties with countries and regions with which we have such old associations is the larger purpose of this meeting organized by CRRID. It is a task of importance, and the Government attaches high value to it.

A successful quest for accelerated development and making collective efforts in that direction requires a peaceful and tranquil environment. Strengthening of peace is the basic focus of India’s external policy. India has always been careful to keep clear of alliances that have any military overtones. We seek cooperation, and just as we reject domination by others, we do not seek domination for ourselves. We do not aspire to establish any sort of regional hegemony. Our military perspective is defensive; we seek to reinforce our own security, not threaten that of others. Our neighbourhood is a troubled one, as we all know. A prolonged war has been waged in our neighbour and friend Afghanistan, and this can have damaging fallout in the entire region. We all have strong interest in bringing to an end the troubles there and in the restoration of peace.

The region represented here today is rich in resources. Most prominent among the regional resources are oil and natural gas which have already drawn the attention of the world. There are others, such as precious metals, rare earths, and other natural endowments that are in demand everywhere. There are also ample resources for agricultural growth to help meet the world’s expanding need for food and for other produce.

To live and prosper within the narrow bounds of our respective national domains is obviously not a productive option for any of us. India is very much aware that it must look to the region represented here to meet a good part of its needs as a rapidly developing nation. Among the proposals in this context that have already drawn serious attention is the proposed pipeline to bring natural gas from Turkmenistan to India across Afghanistan and Pakistan, something that offers great benefits to all the parties concerned. Similarly, there is also the possibility of bringing hydro-electric power from Central Asia to consumers in South Asia. There could be mutually beneficial engagement in the field of agriculture as well. Such farsighted schemes are now well within our reach. It is within the purpose of this meeting to think creatively and to think big, for that is where the challenge lies.

Today, we see a growing demand among our neighbours for access to Indian medical and educational services. Our progress in these fields is one of the success stories of modern India.

The Government of India has earmarked substantial funds to promote technical cooperation with partners abroad. A fund for Central Asia has been established which should do much to promote economic interchange between the two sides. Our own neighbourhood has been identified as a priority area for technical cooperation. There are however some constraints that inhibit the progress that we all desire. Political inhibitions that remain need to be overcome. There is the matter of connectivity in the region. Not so long ago, there was relatively free and unrestrained movement across the length and breadth of the region. People and goods moved from one end to the other, most evocatively in the traffic associated with the famous Silk Road. But that is no longer the case and there has been a progressive closing down of land routes from and across India. The reasons for and the costs to the countries in the region, of the failure to address this issue, merits study. I hope this conference will go into this issue and provide encouragement to further liberalization within the region.

India has taken some steps in recent times through the newly developed concord with Bangladesh on connectivity issues. Bold and imaginative statesmanship by both countries has overcome their previous reserve and opened several fresh possibilities of physical access to each other’s territory in a manner calculated to bring considerable benefit to both. I would also like to refer to the important decision by Pakistan to trade with India on MFN basis. This is a welcome development and it can be hoped that it will lead before long to the opening of the land access from India to Afghanistan and Central Asia that has been blocked for so many decades. Economic logic has brought about decisions that had for long been held hostage to political considerations. We must try to ensure that becomes the path of the future.

India’s ‘Look East’ policy has driven this country, for twenty years now, to look creatively towards the great expanse of Asia lying to its east. Improved connectivity as it is now taking shape will give an important boost to this dimension of India’s foreign policy. China has taken huge strides to establish road, rail, and river communications with South-East Asia. This is something worth studying and perhaps, for India, worth emulating.

Before concluding, I should like to say a few words about the development of maritime routes and the opening up of access across the seas. This process is currently somewhat shadowed by security considerations, notably that of piracy. Collective action to keep the sea lanes open and accessible to all is being taken internationally and all the countries along the Indian Ocean littoral are making their contribution. For commerce to thrive there has to be security of sea transit, so this subject should not be too far removed from the principal concerns of this meeting.

India will play its full part in strengthening ties within its neighbourhood and its region. The watchword for gatherings like the present one is to look to transcend barriers, surmount long standing difficulties, and develop a new vision for the future. We need bold thinking. We need a clear view of what the region must undertake to achieve its true potential. Gatherings of experts like this one can do much to develop initiatives and chart the way ahead.

I wish CRRID all success and I look forward to receiving from the organizers their report on the deliberations of the conference.”
207. Speech by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the UNESCO Madanjeet Singh Institute for South Asian Regional Cooperation.

Puducherry, June 29, 2012.

It is a pleasure for me to be here at the UNESCO Madanjeet Singh Institute for South Asia Regional Cooperation for peace and development. I am sorry that ill health has stood in the way of Shri Madanjeet Singh being with us this evening. I extend a warm welcome to Madame France Marquet, his companion of many years and Trustee of the South Asia Foundation. I request her to convey to Madanjeet our felicitations and good wishes for a speedy recovery to normal health.

In a few weeks from now we will celebrate the 65th anniversary of India’s Independence. The struggle for freedom from colonial rule was infused with high sense of idealism that joined together the people, not only of big sub-continent of ours, but also those in other parts of Asia and Africa. But the euphoria and excitement of freedom was tempered by the human tragedy that accompanied it. As a young man, Madanjeet Singh witnessed with his own eyes the trauma and horror of partition as did many of us of that generation.

Whenever I meet South Asians from different walks of life, they always speak of their desire to see our countries live together in peace and work together for our common progress. I can think of no other individual who has invested more to achieve these cherished goals than my friend Madanjeet Singh.

In the year 2000, Shri Singh set up the South Asia Foundation to provide a platform for well-meaning men and women from all the countries of our region to contribute their might to the vision of a progressive South Asia.

The South Asia Foundation seeks to promote regional cooperation through the UNESCO Madanjeet Singh Institutions of Excellence that have been established in various countries of South Asia. Each of the chapters is headed by an eminent personality from that country, six of whom are present here in Puducherry. I extend a very warm welcome to each of the distinguished citizens of South Asia.

I was delighted to learn that very soon Myanmar will also have a chapter of the Foundation. I was in Myanmar recently and was impressed by the enthusiasm and interest of the people of Myanmar to strengthen and promote links with other countries of South Asia.

This Institute in Puducherry was set up as one of the centres of excellence nearly three years ago. I commend the University of Pondicherry for hosting a centre that will focus on South Asia studies. It is ironic that many universities in the West have chairs or centres that focus on South Asia but here in our own region, we have so few of them! I have often felt that the citizens of South Asia have to start communicating and understanding each other through direct contact rather than through western academic constructs or prisms. The South Asia Foundation provides an excellent platform for doing precisely this.

The world is passing through troubled times. The financial and economic crisis that has gripped Europe in recent years has many important lessons and implications for us. The economic and political rise of post-War Europe was in no small measure due to the vision of thinkers like George Marshall and Jean Monnet. They believed that a stable, prosperous and united Europe was good for the world. That is as true today as it was then. I sincerely hope that the leaders of Europe will find in them the imagination and wisdom to preserve the European project that has served as a guiding light to regional cooperation elsewhere in the world, including South Asia.

The events in the Euro zone should not cast a shadow over our own efforts at building unity and eventually a South Asian union. If anything, we have not been ambitious enough in working towards building a united South Asia where each of our countries seeks its economic and social salvation through cooperative development within the region and by leveraging each other's strengths.

We have many men and women of talent and creativity among us. They should pool their wisdom and work to remove the mental and other roadblocks that are preventing the people of South Asia from realizing their true destiny.

India is fully committed to the idea of SAARC. In recent Summit meetings, I have found a genuine desire among South Asian leaders to write a new chapter in the history of this organization. I am happy that important initiatives that symbolize the idea of South Asia are taking shape. The South Asia University has started its work and will soon have its own full-fledged campus just outside Delhi. The SAARC Development Fund has become operational and has started implementing projects under its social window.

We however need to cooperate more closely to critically understand issues relating to food, energy and water security, disaster management health and education and address these issues from a holistic and regional perspective. Connectivity is also still lagging far behind where it should be. India stands fully committed to building a better-connected SAARC as a strong and effective instrument for regional cooperation.

Since I mentioned Jean Monnet earlier in my remarks, I am reminded that he once wrote: “Nothing is possible without men, but nothing is lasting without institutions.” In conceiving of and realizing the UNESCO Madanjeet Singh Institute for South Asia Regional Cooperation, Madanjeet Singh has given us an institution that I am confident will stand the test of time and provide a valuable service in our common goal of building a better and closer South Asia.”
Keynote Address by Foreign Secretary at the release of IDSA Book – India’s Neighbourhood: Challenges in the Next Two Decades

New Delhi, July 13, 2012.

Dr. Arvind Gupta, Director General, IDSA, Distinguished Guests, Ladies and Gentlemen

It gives me great pleasure to be present amongst this audience to launch a document that is the result of an unique collaborative effort between the Ministry of External Affairs and the Institute of Defence Analyses.

We live during what has been called an Asian Century. This title was used by some academics in the international arena but today it is used mostly by Asians! Over the last few decades, Asian nations, including India, launched themselves along high-growth trajectories that have led to a discernible eastward shift of global political and economic centres of gravity. This has increased their weight and profile in international relations and enhanced their capacity to influence global events. Hence the new slogan. But this has also created unprecedented challenges for policy makers and strategic establishments that have to grapple with difficult and often unfamiliar problems. One is the need to put in place policies and measures that make the trajectory of high growth sustainable over time. Historical experience suggests caution in accepting projections of continuous growth. The second is the need to deal with an inevitable backlash. Shifts in the global balance are not necessarily welcome to those at the losing end even if they only lose in relative terms. The determined effort to choke our growth through environmental norms and regulations is an example.

These are challenges that cannot be overcome by any one organisation. Multiple strands of thought, multiple perspectives and multiple courses of action have to be taken into account and woven together into composite solutions. “India’s Neighbourhood: Challenges in the Next Two Decades” – the document that is being launched today, needs to be viewed in this perspective.

It is in many respects a path-breaking document that is the first output of the MEA-IDSA Strategic and Perspective Planning Research Group. This Group is itself the product of a sustained effort by MEA and by IDSA to draw upon the best available talent in the country to peer beyond the immediate policy and time horizon. In this report, independent researchers, with the full support of MEA and IDSA have made an effort to find out what lies, in military parlance, on “the other side of the hill”.

The intention is to focus attention on the challenging policy environment in our immediate neighbourhood. The intention is also to provoke a debate, and hopefully a lively debate, both within India and beyond its borders. We hope to generate ideas and solutions. We hope that we will be able to think out of the box. Mostly, we hope that this debate will allow MEA to find ways to strengthen, in practical terms, its forward-looking and proactive approach to engaging with our neighbours.

The promotion of a politically stable and economically secure periphery is a paramount foreign policy objective for India. This is essential to deal with the challenges of fostering sustainable growth and to ensure that regional differences cannot be exploited by those who would keep us absorbed in disputes. We have been hard at work in fostering inter-connectivity and mutual confidence in multiple areas, in promoting trade and investment, and in trying to leverage India’s rapid economic growth into win-win arrangements with our neighbours.

We are also conscious of the currents of globalization and of the need to take advantage of global trends in political economy. We believe that common South Asian interests must factor in the policy-making process of South Asian nations. A South Asian Economic Union is a distant dream; but even an expanded set of economic connections will not only transform the economies of South Asia but will be a force for political stability.

I would be stating the obvious in reiterating that there are very few areas of the world where the benefits or logic of regional cooperation are as obvious as in South Asia. But it is also a fact that there are very few regions where the challenges in creating the structures for regional cooperation are so daunting. This places South Asian problems in a peculiarly difficult position. Even as we attempt to surmount the challenges that history has imposed upon us, we are being called upon to confront a new generation of problems, the problems of the 21st century. For example, the difficulties in demarcating borders are now accompanied by a completely different set of issues that arise from the growing irrelevance of borders in a globalized world. Demographic trends are producing a South Asia that is young and has high expectations. The so-called demographic dividend, if not managed properly, can turn into a demographic nightmare. Governments that are unable to cope with these expectations will turn their nations into “fragile” or “weak” states that will create challenges of the kind the international community is already struggling to cope with. The dividing line between terrorists and trans-national criminals is disappearing and access to technology is increasing the dangers that they pose. Even as South Asian nations struggle to bridge their internal digital divides, they have to divert resources to foil cyber-criminals who operate in a virtual world.

One of the major issues identified by the report is the rapidity with which change is taking place in South Asia. Policy makers and practitioners operate in an environment where the unexpected is the norm. Policy and responses have to be constantly updated to ensure that we do not apply 20th century solutions and mindsets to 21st century problems. The democratic upsurge mentioned by the Director General is one of them. We can best influence this by being an example – rather than trying any policy presumption.

We also have to be mindful of the fact that South Asia does not exist in isolation. This year marks two decades of India’s engagement with ASEAN and a commemorative Summit will be held in New Delhi in December this year. It also marks twenty years of India’s policy of connecting with Central Asia. Our exceptionally close ties to the Gulf region need no elaboration. We are also building an Indian Ocean Littoral community. Our engagement with all these regions is progressing rapidly and it is apparent that many of the problems and opportunities presented in this report need not just a South Asian perspective but have to be seen from a trans-regional angle. We would like our policy towards South Asia and towards these regions to present a seamless continuum.

The document ends by declaring that South Asia is at a cross-roads. We are presented with threats and opportunities, strengths and weaknesses. It is identifying these and suggesting a policy framework to address them that this report has added value to the ongoing discourse on improving linkages within South Asia. The recommendations of the report about the broadening of India’s foreign policy approach are being examined seriously and will be taken on-board in our internal deliberations.

I would like to conclude by noting that the Ministry of External Affairs has not been entirely reactive. Nor have we let the acute shortage of resources stop us from taking some proactive steps. We have created bureaus within our Ministry that deal with emerging issues. We have stepped up recruitment of personnel into the Indian Foreign Service. We have also increased the intake from other services and backgrounds to build in-house expertise on non-traditional areas. We are funding an increasing amount of academic research across India on foreign policy issues. We understand that domestic factors will influence policy towards our neighbours and have created a presence in State capitals through Branch Secretariats. We have created a Development Partnership Administration that will look into optimising the programmes that are being devised for development cooperation with our partners in the developing world, particularly with our neighbours. Visa regimes and consular issues remain a challenge but receive our constant attention.

We will continue with our efforts to be responsive to the needs of changing nation. As the world evolves so will we. But our first priority is and will be for some time the neighbourhood. That is why this is the right time to see how it will look over the next 2 decades and I commend this book to you for opening our debate.

209. Keynote Address by Foreign Secretary at the International Conference on “India and her Neighbours: Revisiting relations with Nepal, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Myanmar, Sri Lanka and Maldives”.

Imphal, August 17, 2012.

Hon. Ministers of the Manipur Government, Vice Chancellor of Manipur University, the Jadavpur Association of International Relations, visitors from Myanmar, members of consular corps of Bhutan, Bangladesh, Nepal, Special Secretary (PD), MEA and our hosts the University of Manipur.

I am honoured to be present here with all of you on what is my second visit to Imphal. The first was in 1975 when I was on district training in Kohima and came here to see this wonderful place. Great changes have taken place in these four decades. I have been closely associated with this region as I have worked on our relations with neighbours since the late 1970s. I am happy at the opportunity this seminar has provided for me to return.

India’s relations with her neighbours occupy a central place in India’s foreign policy. We believe a peaceful periphery will enable us to focus on the essential task of development. It is also clear that a stable and prosperous South Asia, will contribute to India’s own prosperity. India is ready to walk the extra mile to strengthen bridges of friendship and create new opportunities for the growth, security and well-being of neighbours both bilaterally and through the SAARC mechanism. We believe this approach can provide a broad framework for each of our neighbours to complement their own national priorities.

SAARC has not achieved as much as we hoped. But we remain committed to fostering inter-connectivity and mutual confidence in multiple areas, in promoting trade and investment, and in trying to leverage India’s rapid economic growth into win-win arrangements with our neighbours.

The theme of today’s conference is aimed at our relations with some of our neighbours individually rather than in the multilateral framework. I will speak briefly on the state of play with these neighbours. But let me say that in general terms – India gives highest priority to our neighbours. It was said by Frost that “good fences make good neighbours” - that is true up to a point - but we know today that good neighbourly relations require people to people contact, trade and political understanding. India has a certain responsibility because we are neighbours to all – none of them are each other’s – except Bangladesh and Myanmar. Let me start by saying that our relations are dynamic and not static. What I say today outlines broad patterns – but some details may change by tomorrow!
Nepal

India and Nepal enjoy a special and unique relationship rooted in shared heritage, civilization, culture and extensive people-to-people relations. We attach the highest priority to our relations with Nepal and the government is fully committed to further enhance and expand this relationship. We believe that a peaceful, democratic, stable, strong and prosperous Nepal is not just in India’s interest but would also contribute to the prosperity of our region. It is for the Nepalese people through the elected political representatives to come to an agreement on the nature of the constitution they want. We do feel India-Nepal relations would be strengthened by establishment of a multi party democracy.

India continues to be a major trading partner of Nepal. Nearly 60% of Nepal’s foreign trade is with India and 48% of its FDI comes from India. Around 40% of Nepal’s tourists come from India and more than 5 million Nepalese find employment in India.

Our development cooperation, which covers a broad canvas, including physical infrastructure, water resources, human resource development, health, power, civil aviation, tourism, and agriculture, has now entered a new era. We will construct over 600 Kms of roads in the terai region of Nepal, establish two integrated check-posts and two cross-border railway links over the next three years. In the second phase, we will construct additional 800 Kms of roads, three cross-border railway links and two integrated check-posts. We believe these will contribute substantially to Nepal’s development efforts and facilitate trade, investments and people-to-people contacts between our two countries. The projects will go ahead on the basis of Nepal’s felt needs. We are committed to continuing our engagement and cooperation with utmost sensitivity and attention that it deserves.

Bangladesh

India and Bangladesh share a unique bond and a special relationship. We are bound by our common cultural heritage, shared principles and values and hopes for a bright new future. This relationship has been forged by our common aspirations and sacrifices. We wish to carry forward the mission of strengthening the historic bonds between us and impart a vision for the future that is durable and sustainable.

Exchanges of high level visits in recent times have added a new momentum to our bilateral relations. Our relations have entered a new phase, based on a pragmatic and practical approach which reaffirms our mutual commitment to sovereignty, equality, friendship, trust and understanding. This commitment is for the mutual benefit of the people of India and Bangladesh, and conducive for the collective prosperity of the region.
Bilateral relations between India and Bangladesh received a major boost through the landmark state visit of the Prime Minister of Bangladesh to India in January 2010 that laid the road-map for our interactions. The visit of Prime Minister, Dr Manmohan Singh, to Bangladesh in September 2011 opened a new chapter in the bilateral relationship and further cemented the active cooperation and engagement between the two nations.

Last year, India opened its market to all Bangladeshi products, except 25 sensitive tariff lines. Bangladeshi goods now enjoy zero duty access to the Indian market. This is an initiative of strategic significance. It has the potential of changing the economic landscape in Bangladesh. Exports from Bangladesh have increased substantially over the last few months.

The Framework Agreement on Cooperation for Development signed between our two Prime Ministers in September 2011 represents a new phase in our relations with Bangladesh and the region. India has committed itself to discussing sub-regional cooperation with Bangladesh in areas such as the power sector, water resources management, physical connectivity, environment and sustainable development.

India has welcomed the participation of Bangladesh in power projects in India, including in the North-Eastern states, wherever economic viability for such cooperation exists. At present Bangladesh has reservations about the Tipaimukh project and we have agreed to set up a JWG under the Joint Rivers Commission for discussions on the issue.

The exchanges at the highest levels have enabled us to put across our vision of an equal and mutually beneficial relationship with Bangladesh to the widest cross-section of its people. It is essential for us to develop and nurture a comprehensive partnership with that country. The Government remains committed to building a strong India-Bangladesh partnership, including assistance in developmental efforts and enhanced bilateral cooperation to our mutual benefit.

Bhutan

India and Bhutan share uniquely warm and special relations founded on mutual trust and understanding. Regular high-level exchange of visits, close consultations and mutually beneficial cooperation underpin relations with Bhutan. We were honoured to welcome Their Majesties Jigme Khesar Namgyel Wangchuck and Jetsun Pema Wangchuck, the King and Queen of Bhutan in India in October 2011 on their first visit abroad after the Royal Wedding on 13 October 2011.

India and Bhutan share a common perception of their strategic interests and cooperate closely on security issues and border management. We appreciate Bhutan’s commitment and its strong efforts to ensure that its territory cannot be used by forces inimical to India’s interest.
India is Bhutan’s largest trade and development partner, and source of supplies of most of the essential commodities required by Bhutan. As a Bhutan prepares its people for the information technology age, it is reaching out beyond its traditional sectors of agriculture and hydropower to expansion in tourism, IT, and education, and it offers considerable potential for mutually beneficial economic and business partnership.

Development of hydropower in Bhutan has been the centre-piece of our bilateral cooperation. It is an exemplary win-win partnership: surplus power generated from the hydroelectric projects (HEPs) is exported to India providing Bhutan a steady stream of revenue and providing Indian an assured supply of clean power. There is vast potential to be realised as out of Bhutan’s estimated potential of 30,000 MW (20,000 MW is technically and economically feasible), only about 1400 MW has been harnessed. Both governments have set the target of 10,000 MW of hydropower capacity by 2020; and have identified 10 hydropower projects to meet this target.

Myanmar

I believe that here in Manipur there is particular interest on how India’s relations with Myanmar develop. Myanmar is the only ASEAN Country with whom we share a land boundary. When we talk of a Look East Policy – we obviously know that we first look at Myanmar. From my own experience in the region in the 1990s I am aware that in Manipur you were already looking East and wanted a policy of greater engagement from decades ago. We share ties of culture, language, trade and tradition that binds us through the NE region. We are proud of these special relations. It is important that there is peace and stability both on our borders as well as inside Myanmar.

Over the past year, India’s close and multifaceted relationship with Myanmar has been further strengthened through an exchange of visits at the highest level. The State visit of the Prime Minister Dr Manmohan Singh to Myanmar in May 2012, the first visit by an Indian Prime Minister after a gap of 25 years, was a major milestone in bilateral relations. During the visit, 12 Agreements and MoUs were signed, including on the US$ 500 million Line of Credit; Air Service Agreement; setting up of an Advanced Centre for Agricultural Research and Education (ACARE); Rice Bio Park; an Information Technology Institute; border area development; Cultural Exchange Programme; and academic exchanges between Universities and Think Tanks. The visit laid a Roadmap for future cooperation between the two sides. Earlier, the President of Myanmar, U Thein Sein, had paid a State visit to India in October 2011.

We are working closely with Myanmar on various infrastructure development and cooperation projects, including in the field of roads, waterways, power, health, education and industrial training, telecommunications, and others. The development projects have to move in tandem with the progress of Manipur in these fields. By the end of this decade we expect that direct road connectivity to South East Asia will become easy and will facilitate trade, tourism and travel. We are deeply conscious of the need to have projects like the Imphal-Mandalay bus service as soon as infrastructure is ready and with approval of Myanmar authorities. We would like to work together for development of border regions; including essential infrastructure development.

The significant political and economic reforms instituted by the Government of Myanmar over the past year have led to an increased international interest in Myanmar. As a part of our efforts to promote the nascent democracy and its institutions in Myanmar, we have shared India’s experience in parliamentary democracy and facilitate regular exchanges between parliamentarians of the two countries. In this context, a parliamentary delegation led by the Speaker of the Lower House of Myanmar Parliament H.E. Thura Shwe Mann visited India from December 11-17, 2011; and now training programmes are being organised for Parliamentarians and Parliamentary staff. I was happy to interact with the first team and to learn that they found the course useful.

India remains committed to extending all possible assistance and support to the process of national reconciliation and the further strengthening of democracy in Myanmar. Our own experience is that in fact these processes are interlinked and democracy helps take national reconciliation forward both in the sense of bringing communities together and dealing with the gap between rich and poor.

Sri Lanka

We greatly value our relationship with Sri Lanka. The relationship is based upon shared historical, cultural, ethnic and civilisational ties and extensive people-to-people interaction.

This relationship has become multifaceted and diverse, encompassing all areas of contemporary relevance, including connectivity, development partnership, cooperation in agriculture, power, education, human resource development and culture, greater economic engagement. The relationship has been further strengthened through bilateral exchanges, including at the highest level in the recent past.

Today, India and Sri Lanka enjoy a robust trade and investment relationship, with bilateral trade growing rapidly in the last decade. Sri Lanka is currently India’s largest trade partner in South Asia and bilateral trade has reached nearly US$ 5 billion. India has also emerged the largest Foreign Direct Investment and as far as tourist arrivals are concerned.

Following the conclusion of the armed conflict in May 2009, India has partnered with Sri Lanka in programmes for reconstruction and rehabilitation of Internally Displaced Persons, with the objective of helping them return to normal life as quickly as possible. Our efforts have included all facets of human endeavour, including supply of family relief packs; deployment of emergency medical; housing, shelter; de-mining; revival of agriculture; housing; infrastructure development, including railways, ports, repair and renovation of schools and hospitals. India also continues to assist a large number of smaller development projects in areas like education, health, transport connectivity, small and medium enterprise development and training in many parts of the country through its grant funding.

Our consistent objective has been the achievement of a future for the Sri Lankan Tamil community in a united Sri Lanka in which all citizens can live in equality, dignity and self-respect. In this context, we continue to be engaged with the Government and the people of Sri Lanka in its efforts to reach a durable political solution acceptable to all sides, including through meaningful devolution of powers and the implementation of the 13th Amendment and beyond. It is important to address the issue in a time bound manner in order to arrive at a solution that meets substantially the aspirations of the Tamil community for justice, peace and dignity.

Maldives

India and Maldives enjoy close ties of friendship and cooperation. Both share an abiding faith in, and commitment to, democracy, development and peaceful cooperation. We share a common destiny and peace and stability of Maldives is of great importance to India.

Our relations have been further strengthened through the exchange of high level visits in recent times. The Prime Minister of India had paid a bilateral visit to Maldives in November last year and the President of the Republic of Maldives, Dr. Mohamed Waheed, paid an official visit to India in May 2012.

During Prime Minister Dr Manmohan Singh’s visit, which was the first bilateral visit after 2002 by our Prime Minister to Maldives, an MOU on Combating Terrorism, Drug Trafficking, Disaster Management and Coastal Security and an Agreement on Transfer of Sentenced Persons were signed. Both sides have agreed to enhance connectivity by air and sea, in particular through shipping links and ferry services. India has agreed to undertake several new cooperation and developmental projects, including the setting up of the Maldives Police Academy and renovation of the Indira Gandhi Memorial Hospital (IGMH) established by Government of India in Male.

Over the years, India has extended economic and technical assistance to Maldives including in the areas of health, education, human resource development, infrastructure development, capacity building. An Agreement extending a new Standby Credit Facility of US $ 100 million to Maldives was signed during Prime Minister’s visit. A line of Credit amounting to US $ 40 million for housing project has also been extended to Maldives.

Peace and stability in Maldives is of utmost importance to India and the region. Maldives is a nascent democracy and requires support through technical assistance and capacity building. In this context, we have remained actively engaged with all stakeholders in the reconciliation process in the wake of recent developments, in order to ensure that they continue to take the democratic process forward. India remains committed to assist the Government and people of Maldives in their endeavours to build a stable, peaceful and prosperous country.

It will be evident from this account of India’s relations with her neighbours that the overall objective of sustaining good relations has been significantly strengthened in recent months through several major initiatives. Most of these initiatives have been taken in an asymmetric manner. This asymmetry will have to continue simply because India has the largest economy. These initiatives are driven by India’s vision of a prosperous and integrated region, in which our citizens can interact with each other in various areas of socio-economic activity for our mutual benefit. Ultimately we need to work towards an association of neighbouring countries where our strengths are synergized and challenges overcome. There are examples from other parts of the world including ASEAN. None of the models can be exactly repeated; it may also not even be necessary to have elaborate structures; but I believe we will find our way to win-win arrangements in which we can all benefit.

We do this in the backdrop of global change – in which no region can be isolated. As H.E. the Education Minister noted Asia is now at the vortex of international growth. We must fit in. Let us work together for the prosperity of our region, the rise of Asia and peace in the world.

Thank you.

212. Opening Remarks by External Affairs Minister at the Joint Media Interaction during the visit of Foreign Minister of Afghanistan.

New Delhi, May 1, 2012.

Your Excellency Foreign Minister Dr. Zalmai Rassoul

Friends from the media

Foreign Minister Dr Zalmai Rassoul and I have today embarked on a landmark step in our bilateral relations by co-chairing the inaugural session of the India-Afghanistan Partnership Council.

Our meeting formally sets in motion the implementation of Strategic Partnership Agreement signed in October 2011 between the Prime Minister of India and the President of Afghanistan.

This event is also a reflection that India is unwavering in its commitment to assisting the people of Afghanistan in their endeavour to build a peaceful, stable, democratic and prosperous nation.

Mr Foreign Minister, let me assure you that while it is a time of change and transformation in the region, India's commitment to Afghanistan is neither ‘transitory’ nor in ‘transition’.

Our approach of high level political engagement and broad-based development assistance in a wide range of sectors, which have been identified by the Afghan government as priority areas for reconstruction and development, will not only continue but is set to intensify under the framework of the Partnership Council.

We will continue our engagement in reconstruction and rehabilitation projects in alignment with the Afghan National Development Strategy.

We will continue to partner the Afghan Government to ensure that Afghanistan is a source of regional stability and does not become a target for extremist forces.

As a measure of our on-going commitment to the long-term future prosperity of Afghanistan, I have informed Foreign Minister Dr Zalmai Rassoul of our intention to hold a meeting of regional investors on Afghanistan in New Delhi. He has kindly welcomed this initiative.

Dr Zalmai Rassoul and I reviewed with appreciation the outcomes of the first Joint Working Group on Political and Security Consultations held yesterday between the Foreign Secretary of India and the Deputy Foreign Minister of Afghanistan.
We have directed that the other three Joint Working Groups under the Partnership Council on Trade & Economic Cooperation; Capacity Development and Education; and Social, Cultural, Civil Society and people-to-people contacts meet at an early date. We are hopeful that these meetings will further enhance and deepen our bilateral cooperation.

Following our review of the entire gamut of our relations and discussions about a range of regional and global issues of common interest, both Foreign Minister Zalmai Rassoul and I are confident that India and Afghanistan have the vision and the intention to enhance our Strategic Partnership.
At the invitation of Shri S. M. Krishna, External Affairs Minister, H.E. Dr. Zalmay Rassoul, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan, is currently on a visit to India. The Ministers co-chaired the inaugural session of the India-Afghanistan Partnership Council which has been mandated to implement the Strategic Partnership Agreement signed by the Prime Minister and the President of Afghanistan in October 2011. The meeting of the Partnership Council was preceded by a meeting of the Joint Working Group on Political and Security Consultations headed by Foreign Secretary and the Deputy Foreign Minister of Afghanistan. During his visit the Afghan Foreign Minister called on Prime Minister and held meetings with Finance Minister and National Security Adviser on a range of bilateral, regional and global issues of mutual interest.

2. Prime Minister conveyed his best wishes to President Hamid Karzai and other leaders of Afghanistan. He welcomed the holding of the first session of the India-Afghanistan Partnership Council and expressed the hope that the strategic partnership between India and Afghanistan would be further strengthened in the critical period ahead. He reiterated India’s unwavering commitment to assisting the Government and people of Afghanistan in their endeavour to build a peaceful, stable, democratic and prosperous country. The Afghan Foreign Minister expressed Afghanistan’s deep appreciation for India’s friendship, generous assistance and the crucial role it is playing in the process of stabilisation, reconstruction and economic development of Afghanistan.

3. During the first meeting of the India-Afghanistan Partnership Council, the two Ministers welcomed the holding of the first meeting of the Joint Working Group on Political and Security Consultations and decided that the three Joint Working Groups on Trade and Economic Cooperation, Capacity Development and Education, and Social, Cultural, Civil Society and people to people contacts will meet at an early date to recommend further steps to deepen and enhance cooperation in their respective fields. The Foreign Minister of Afghanistan welcomed India’s initiative to host a Regional Investors’ Meeting in New Delhi to facilitate investments in Afghanistan.

4. The Ministers reaffirmed the determination of both the Governments to enhance and explore all avenues under the aegis of the India-Afghanistan Partnership Council to further strengthen the strategic partnership between the two countries.
Statement by Minister for Law and Justice Salman Khurshid at the Kabul Ministerial Meeting of the Heart of Asia Countries.

Kabul, June 14, 2012.

Excellency, Foreign Minister of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan, Dr. Zalmai Rassoul, Excellency, Foreign Minister of Turkey, Mr. Ahmet Davotoglu,
Special Representative of the UN Secretary General Mr. Jan Kubis

I am indeed very happy to be present at the first Ministerial Meeting of the Istanbul Process in the city of Kabul. I would like to thank the Government of Afghanistan for the warm hospitality extended to our delegation, and to both the Afghan and the Turkish Foreign Ministries for shepherding this important process over the past months. We believe that its movement from Istanbul to Kabul also marks full Afghan ownership of the process. We are pleased to be able to fully share the vision of the Declaration we shall be adopting today.

2. On its own, India shares a privileged, historical and civilizational relationship with Afghanistan. We have, however, always maintained that the economic viability of Afghanistan depends on its fuller integration into its neighbourhood, so that it can regain its historical role of a land-bridge between South Asia, Central Asia, the Middle East and Eurasia. We fully support the efforts for regional confidence-building as a critical component of international efforts to support Afghanistan as it takes forward the task of national reconciliation even while it assumes full responsibility for security.

3. Excellencies, today’s meeting and the Declaration we will be adopting takes some modest steps in the direction of regional confidence-building in a region that is afflicted by the phenomenon of terrorism, extremism and drug trafficking. We are happy to take the lead in the two CBMs, i.e. “Chambers of Commerce CBM” and “Commercial Opportunities CBM”. We do so while fully cognizant that these CBMs require an atmosphere of security in the country and in the region. It is important to recall that the principal problem in Afghanistan continues to remain the existence of terrorism, drawing upon ideological, financial and logistical support from beyond its borders. This problem, which not only threatens the future of Afghanistan, but also poses a danger to the region and the wider world, can only be addressed if its true nature is acknowledged. We recognize that the solution to this problem cannot be purely military, but also requires political approaches. The Istanbul Process underlines this political effort and seeks to underpin it with economic cooperation.
4. Among the various strands and processes animating the international dialogue on Afghanistan, one crucial missing component has been the role that private and foreign capital and entrepreneurship can play, not only in ensuring the economic future of Afghanistan, but also in countering the current narrative of anxiety of withdrawal and reversing it with a narrative of opportunity and hope. The prospect of economic progress among the region can create a political dynamic that would discourage external interference aimed at destabilising Afghanistan. I am happy that India has been able to propose an important initiative to address this gap, in the form of the Delhi Investment Summit on Afghanistan being organised in New Delhi on 28 June.

5. The idea for the Investment Summit was first mooted as a means of operationalising one of the economic CBMs of the Istanbul Process, and hence is fully embedded in our deliberations today. However, we also see it as a means to pull together the various parallel strands of dialogue about Afghanistan. By highlighting the opportunities of investing in Afghanistan, and providing foreign investors, from the region and beyond, with a forum to share their risks by venturing together, the 28 June event will, hopefully, lead to greater inflow of foreign capital and technology into this country. We believe there are very productive opportunities in the mining, infrastructure, telecommunications, agro-based and small-scale industries, health, pharmaceuticals, education and information technology sectors of Afghanistan. This, in turn, will make viable many governance and public investment possibilities that need to be funded through official development assistance. Thus, we see the 28th June event as a critical link between today’s meeting and the Tokyo Conference of 8th July. A situation where companies from the region and beyond have invested their resources in Afghanistan is also the best way to ensure that we work together as stakeholders with a vested interest in peace and stability in Afghanistan.

6. I would encourage all participating countries of the Istanbul Process, as well as the Supporting Countries, to ensure active participation of your companies in the Investment Summit in New Delhi. I also hope that today’s meeting will help to carry forward the excellent work done by our co-chairs, over the past six months, under the rubric of the Heart of Asia Istanbul Process and be able to meet next with a sense of achievement.

215. Address by External Affairs Minister at the Delhi Investment Summit on Afghanistan.

New Delhi, June 28, 2012.

Excellency, Dr. Zalmay Rassoul, Foreign Minister of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan, Excellencies Ministers of Commerce & Industry, Finance, Agriculture and Mines from Afghanistan,

Mr. Muthuraman, former President of the Confederation of Indian Industry

Mr. Chandrajit Banerji, Director General of the CII,

Excellencies, Captains of industry

Ladies and Gentlemen

It is indeed a great privilege and honour for me to welcome Excellency Rassoul and Ministers Ahady, Zakhilwal, Rahimi and Shahrani, other senior officials of the Government of Afghanistan and business leaders from Afghanistan, India, the region and beyond, to this important Investment Summit on Afghanistan.

I am happy to note that the Investment Summit on Afghanistan is taking place within two months after the first meeting of the Partnership Council held in Delhi. I am confident that this event will give strong impetus to the implementation of the Strategic Partnership Agreement signed during President Karzai’s visit to Delhi in October 2011.

Two of the central aims of that Agreement was to support Afghanistan’s emergence as a sovereign country capable of standing on its own feet with the help of similar partnerships with the international community, and to elevate our own bilateral relationship from largely one of development assistance to a full-fledged and self-sustaining partnership in which business and investment play a major role. This event is a step in that direction.

I believe this is the first ever investment meet in India for another country. The strong response of the Indian business community to the event is a sign of the closeness and solidarity we feel for a neighbour, with whom we share a long history and civilizational ties. We hope that it will be the first of many similar events by India and other countries aimed at strengthening Afghanistan and its economy through trade and investment.

By virtue of its contiguity and proximity, the countries in our region have a particularly important role to play in contributing to the security, stability and prosperity of Afghanistan and the region particularly as NATO forces draw down from a combat to a train, advise and assist role.
I especially call upon companies from the region to invest in Afghanistan for mutual benefit to create a virtuous cycle of healthy economic competition in Afghanistan.

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

The holding of a major investment meet on Afghanistan when NATO forces draw down by 2014 and terrorism continues to take a toll of lives, may at first sight appear counter-intuitive. Afghanistan may not be the easiest destination to sell to an investor. But India has ventured to do so.

This decision is based on certain fundamental insights.

Firstly, Afghanistan has suffered three decades of conflict and violence that have destroyed the structures of the State. Despite over 11 years of heightened international attention and foreign assistance, Afghanistan continues to remain a special case for development and technical assistance in years to come.

Secondly, this attention and assistance will be necessary not just for Afghanistan's good, but to our own security, that of Afghanistan, its neighbours, the region and the world at large. Let us not forget why the world returned to Afghanistan in 2001.

Thirdly, development, security and technical assistance alone is not enough. The Bonn, Chicago and upcoming Tokyo Conferences, and the Istanbul process on regional confidence-building, demonstrate the will of the international community to remain engaged in Afghanistan. But both military interventions and foreign aid are to a large extent influenced by public opinion and prevailing economic conditions. We need something more enduring, something based on self-interest rather than generosity that can move the country towards greater self-reliance and inter-dependence.

Fourthly, the military draw-down should not result in a political or security vacuum that will be filled by extremists once again. There should be something productive in its place.

Finally, we feel that foreign investment and domestic private sector development, both small and large scale, can play that role. Let the grey suits of company executives take the place of olive green or desert brown fatigues of soldiers; and CEOs, the place of Generals.

They can also play a larger stabilizing role.

Every investment is an investment in the future of a country, and an acquisition of a stake in its security and stability together with its own citizens and investors.

This will not be the security that comes from military operations but a security that comes from mutual interest and shared political commitment.
If companies invest together or in numbers, they will all benefit from the collective security of venturing together.

I call upon the investment community to act together in the interest of the collective security of Afghans and the international community.

We need to offer a narrative of opportunity to counter the anxiety of withdrawal, uncertainty, instability and foreign interference. Investments can provide that hope for employment, training and opportunity for the future. We encourage our industries to venture into Afghanistan in numbers together with Afghan partners.

India has relaxed customs duties for Afghanistan’s exports as part of an initiative for Least Developed Countries in the SAARC. We invite Indian and other industry to invest in Afghanistan to access the Indian market on these advantageous terms.

We visualize Afghanistan’s mineral resources, agricultural products and human resources as possible drivers of growth and regional economic development that together with the energy resources of Central Asia, Iran and the Gulf, the growing economic prowess and markets of China, Russia, Turkey and India, could knit the entire region between Turkey in the West, Russia in the north, China in the east, and the Arabian Sea and the Indian Ocean in the south, in a web of trade, transit and energy routes and economic cooperation.

This vision requires international support in the form of institutional finance and foreign investment. I appreciate the presence of the World Bank, the ADB and other international financial institutions at this event.

India has agreed to lead in developing the two commercial CBMs on meetings of regional ‘Chambers of Commerce’ and ‘Commercial Opportunities’ identified as priorities under the Istanbul process. I call upon CII and other Indian and regional Chambers of Commerce to identify obstacles to trade and investment in the region to step up trade promotion efforts with Afghanistan and exploit the full potential of Afghanistan as a land bridge connecting various parts of Asia and Eurasia, and particularly the vast market of South Asia.

Naturally there will be concerns of security, legal and regulatory regimes, investment protection, logistics, transport, transit, corruption, dispute resolution etc. These will have to be addressed in a spirit of partnership. This Summit may like to consider recommending a mechanism to develop a ‘mutual compact’ between the government and foreign investors where the interests of both Afghanistan and the international business community are protected. We look forward to this Summit coming up with recommendations for the upcoming Tokyo Conference on Afghanistan.

India will continue to pursue its vision to stabilize Afghanistan through trade and investment and regional cooperation. We invite international investors and regional countries to join in this vision for Afghanistan individually or in partnership with others.

I am confident that the Summit will attract investments into Afghanistan, and help forge partnerships between businesses in India, Afghanistan, the region, and the world.

I congratulate and thank the Confederation of Indian Industry (CII) for both the vision and willingness to respond to this enlightened cause and for organizing this event at such short notice.

May I once again welcome all of you to this Investment Summit and convey my best wishes for the success of your deliberations, which would be an important confidence building measure and act as a catalyst for peace, stability and economic growth in Afghanistan and the region.

216. Address by External Affairs Minister at the International Conference on Afghanistan.

Tokyo, July 8, 2012.

Your Excellencies the Foreign Ministers of Japan and Afghanistan,
Excellencies ladies and gentlemen,

Let me begin by thanking the Government of Japan for the excellent arrangements made for this important conference, which is critical to the future of Afghanistan. I echo the appreciation of other delegations for the warm welcome and hospitality that has been extended to us.

Seven months ago, at Bonn, the international community took the decision to stand by Afghanistan and to support it through its process of transition. We agreed to work with Afghanistan during the Transformation Decade with financial and security assistance commensurate with its needs. The Tokyo Conference is aimed at concretizing that pledge.

Excellencies,

While we assist Afghanistan in attaining its long-cherished goal of self-reliance, we must also acknowledge that despite our successes in Afghanistan, the basic ideological, infrastructural, logistical and financial infrastructure of terror is still intact in the region. Afghanistan continues to be a country that faces an existential threat from terrorism emanating from beyond its borders - a threat that it is fighting every day, and that it is ill-equipped to repel in the absence of substantial assistance from the international community.

It is this perspective that should animate our thinking when we commit to Afghanistan’s long-term future today. This perspective should not only determine the quantum of resources that we commit to Afghanistan, it should also temper the kind of conditionalities that are attached to assistance. Good governance is crucial to the building of a strong and legitimate state. But good governance also requires a strong state that has full control over its territory. This is not yet the case in Afghanistan. The Mutual Accountability Framework that has been drafted for this Conference is a noble effort, which we support and welcome. At the same time we believe that true mutuality can only be achieved at equal levels of capacity - and we would not need to have this Conference if that were already the case. Clear and visible support to Afghanistan is crucial in order to preserve the gains made by the international community and Afghan men and women in the past decade.

The figures that have been put forward as development assistance to Afghanistan represent a base-line or minimum requirement for a least developed land-locked country that has experienced externally-imposed conflicts for three decades that has shattered the structures of state and society and continues to face an existential threat of suicide terrorism from across its borders. These amounts give a fighting chance for success if they can be optimized and managed in a frugal way without excessive administrative costs. Indigenization of aid management while upholding best practices should be one of our aims in the Transformation Decade.

On our part, I would like to reiterate that India does not visualise its partnership with Afghanistan as conditions-based or transitory, nor are we looking to transition out of this partnership. In spite of not being a traditional donor country, we have shared significant resources for Afghanistan’s reconstruction and development. During his landmark visit to Afghanistan last year, our Prime Minister pledged an additional US$ 500 million to our development portfolio so far, bringing our total cumulative commitment to 2 billion dollars. A large portion of this assistance has either been disbursed or is committed to ongoing projects. We have also committed to begin a number of new projects over the course of the coming year. All these projects have been initiated on the specific request of the Government of Afghanistan, and hence are in line with the Afghan development priorities. Also, Indian projects avoid the multiple-levels of subcontracting and dependence on private security companies that add to the overhead costs of the work done by many other development partners of Afghanistan. As a result, we have managed to carry out some of the most economical and cost-effective projects in Afghanistan. The US$ 500 million assistance announced by Prime Minister of India in May 2011 will be spent from 2012 through 2015. The projects will be in line with the projects suggested under the National Priority Programmes of the Government of Afghanistan.

As India continues to grow economically, we will continue to share our resources and experience with friends in the region. India does not plan to limit its future development engagement in Afghanistan to a particular time frame or only to the presently planned projects. Our partnership is for the long-term. The pace and nature of the utilization of the present and future Indian assistance will be determined by the preference, comfort level and absorptive capacity of the Afghan government.

In line with our commitment to Afghanistan the Confederation of Indian Industry organized an Investment ‘Summit’ dedicated exclusively to attracting foreign investment and partnerships in Afghanistan. There are interesting prospects in the mining, hydrocarbons, infrastructure, agriculture and agro-industries, small and medium industries, health and education sectors. This was the first time that India has held a conference aimed at highlighting the investment potential of another country. The conference also came out with some notable recommendations, on behalf of the participating Afghan, Indian and international business representatives, for the Afghan Government, for our own government, and also for the international community. Some of these related to the facilitation of two-way transit and transport agreements and infrastructure connecting Afghanistan to major ports and markets in the region. There were also proposals for and creation of an international fund for SME development in Afghanistan with the active support of international development agencies, governments, and industry bodies. We will need active support of the international community to make a reality of the vision of a prosperous Afghanistan acting as a hub of the region; and with its resources and trading instincts, as a catalyst for wider regional cooperation.

Excellencies,

History shows that the proud Afghan people have always craved independence and self-reliance above everything else. India is ready to partner the international community and Afghanistan to achieve these goals within a globalized economic environment. A dynamic Afghan economy could make it a source of security as well as the heart of a cooperative region.

Thank you

A couple of days before the Conference on July 6, a Press Release issued by the MEA had emphasized the importance of the conference and India’s active interest in ensuring sustainable development of Afghanistan. It said India as an active member in the reconstruction and development efforts of Afghanistan, had a stake in the peace and prosperity of the Afghan nation. India and Afghanistan signed the Strategic Partnership Agreement in October, 2011 which reiterated India’s long-term commitment to the development and progress of Afghanistan. Towards this, India organized the Delhi Investment Summit with the objective to attract foreign investment into Afghanistan in the light of new opportunities opening up in the areas like mining, hydrocarbon and infrastructure and investments in traditional sectors like agriculture, industry, capacity building and health & services, etc, said the press release.
217. Remarks by Foreign Secretary at a Round Table during a regional conference on “Peace and Stabilization in Afghanistan: What can neighbours contribute?” organised by Delhi Policy Group

New Delhi, July 19, 2012.

Afghanistan is in the midst of a critical phase of transition wherein it assumes responsibility for security and governance as the NATO/ISAF draw down with the aim of withdrawing from a combat role by 2014.

2. The sustained commitment of the international community to Afghanistan is essential if it is to stand on its own feet. In the last year or so, the international community has reiterated its commitment to Afghanistan at conferences at Bonn, Chicago and Tokyo and at the regional level in Istanbul and Kabul. During these interactions it became clear that Afghanistan’s neighbours carry a special responsibility. So the first requirement is that neighbours must stay engaged with Afghanistan.

3. Secondly while the continued commitment of the international community is essential, a positive contribution by Afghanistan’s neighbours can play an important role in stabilizing the country. For too long Afghanistan has borne the brunt of overt and covert interference and has had to combat terrorist sanctuaries and safe havens that exist beyond its borders. Bringing an end to this dilemma is the critical contribution which some neighbours can make.

4. In addressing this issue we need to reflect on why Afghanistan is often viewed as an arena of conflict and competition. Why have actions of neighbours exacerbated the ethnic and tribal fault lines in the country. We need an environment in which neighbours do not seek ‘strategic depth’ or try to build firewalls to prevent a deteriorating security situation spill over into their territory. We believe that assisting Afghanistan cannot be reduced to a zero sum game and cooperation should replace conflict and competition. This can only happen if countries in the region join together to extend all possible assistance to Afghanistan so that it is able to tackle the manifold challenges of extremism, ethnic and tribal divisions, poverty and unemployment. Simultaneously there is need for some form of assurance that Afghanistan will not emerge as an area of political influence of only one country or group of countries. Neutralism is from a bygone era. But a policy of non-alignment is worth discussing.

5. In our view regional cooperation on projects of multilateral scope and benefit could give an impetus to this scenario. The path of regional cooperation is littered with road blocks and conflicting interests and the record so far not very promising. However, attempts to forge a common and inclusive platform to realise regional cooperation on Afghanistan continue to be made. The many bilateral, trilateral and quadrilateral dialogues in the region can contribute to narrowing divergences and building convergences, but by their very nature they tend to be restrictive and exclusive. Regional organisations like SAARC and SCO and the proposed arrangements for the “new silk road” - perhaps with a different name - could have an important role to play in Afghanistan and region. However, for Afghanistan to develop its potential and to emerge as a hub connecting Central and South Asia and indeed the entire region, a wider engagement involving Afghanistan’s neighbours and other regional countries, stands a better chance of success as it is able to bring together all important stake holders in the process. The Istanbul ‘Heart of Asia’ process seeks to achieve just that.

6. The Istanbul Conference of November, 2011, brought together a large number of stake holders, including Afghanistan’s neighbours, on a single platform to address the very issues that the international community has been grappling with for over a decade. Since then, while progress has been modest, the Kabul Ministerial Conference of June 14, 2012 has succeeded in evolving a common set of confidence building measures ranging from political and security cooperation to economic cooperation, disaster management and education. The listing of these CBMs and seeking participation of member and supporting countries of the Istanbul process has been a comparatively easy task. But the real challenge before all of us is the implementation of these CBMs in a comprehensive manner.

7. These CBMs, while they may seem ambitious in the context of Afghanistan’s tortured history, bear reiteration. They are as follows:

(i) Development of joint guidelines for cooperation in the field of disaster management (the ‘Disaster Management CBM’);

(ii) Enhanced cooperation for fighting terrorism, including through exchange of information (the ‘Counter Terrorism CBM’);

(iii) Cooperation and interaction among regional countries in the area of counter-narcotics, including through countering the production, trafficking and consumption of opium and other narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances, and their precursors, as well as through enhancing bilateral efforts to prevent illicit cross-border movement of personnel and material (the ‘Counter Narcotics CBM’);

(iv) Establishment of a framework for enhanced cooperation among Chambers of Commerce (the ‘Chambers of Commerce CBM’);

(v) Improvement of the exchange of information on commercial opportunities and specific trading conditions (the ‘Commercial Opportunities CBM’);
(vi) Development of a coherent strategy to develop and maintain a regionally connecting infrastructure, with support from international partners (the ‘Regional Infrastructure CBM’); and

(vii) Broadening cooperation and exchanges in the field of education and science on a short or long-term basis (the ‘Education CBM’).

8. While all these CBMs are important, the salience of the Counter Terrorism and Counter Narcotics CBMs needs to be underlined as both terrorism and narcotics have over the years proved to be the most destructive factors in the security architecture of Afghanistan and the region. The role of Afghanistan’s neighbours in combating these pernicious evils assumes great importance. Unless the menace of cross border terrorism and the narcotics trade, which often go hand-in-hand, are tackled comprehensively Afghanistan and the region cannot be stabilized. Misguided policies of the past have to be jettisoned for lasting peace and stability in the region.
