This is the tenth volume in the series INDIA’S FOREIGN RELATIONS published annually in cooperation with the Public Diplomacy Division of the Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India.

Foreign policy of a country today plays out in the vast arena of global politics. Foreign relations are no longer just an instrument for interaction at diplomatic level but are now a means for procuring sinews for development and progress in trade and commerce, science and technology, education and agriculture and various other fields like energy, climate change, etc. Foreign policy is influenced by the domestic politics of a country, level of economic development, progress in science and technology and ability to compete in promoting trade and investment. In short foreign policy is the product and interplay of multiple forces impinging on and promoting the country's national interest.

The seven hundred and ninety-nine documents reproduced here are intended to make it easier for others to understand and assess India's initiatives in various fields of bilateral, regional and multilateral relations and possible reactions to developments in a given situation.

PREFACE

This is the tenth Volume in the series “India’s Foreign Relations” starting with the volume for year 2002. Published annually in cooperation with the Public Diplomacy Division of the Ministry of External Affairs, it seeks to put together all the official documents bearing on India’s foreign relations.

Given the enlarged scope of foreign relations in the globalised world in which we live today, several Ministries and Departments of the Government of India besides the Ministry of External Affairs contribute to the conduct of foreign relations. While the Ministry of External Affairs determines the broad framework and contours of the Foreign Policy and Diplomacy and is also the principal player in that field, several other Ministries and Departments complement its efforts in their respective spheres of activity. Foreign relations are no longer an instrument merely for interaction at diplomatic level. They are now an instrument for procuring the sinew for development and progress in trade and commerce, science and technology, education and agriculture, and various other fields, like energy, climate change, etc. Foreign policy of any country is influenced by its domestic politics, level of its economic development, its progress in science and technology, and ability to compete in promoting trade and investments. In short foreign policy is the product and interplay of multiple forces impinging on and promoting a country’s national interests.

Since foreign policy must play out in the vast arena of global politics, each country is interested in studying the foreign policy of the other to assess possible reactions to developments in a given situation. Therefore to understand the foreign policy of a country, the importance of documentation needs no emphasis. The need to make them available for easy access is obvious. The purpose of this exercise, being undertaken for the last ten years in the present form, is to make it easier for others to understand India’s actions and reactions in its dealings with other countries either bilaterally or multilaterally on issues confronting them.

As has been pointed out in previous volumes, the increased interaction among nations both bilaterally and multilaterally, at regional or intra-regional levels generate a plethora of documents, thus adding to the bulk annually. To take care of the bulk, we have experimented with electronic technology successfully in the last two years. The same pattern is being followed for the 2011 volume too. The printed volume provides the text of the selected and frequently used documents, along with the reference to all other documents, the full texts of which have been placed in the accompanying CD. It is our expectation that the users would find the arrangement convenient and practical.

The documents, as in the past, have been first arranged thematically and region-wise and then put across chronologically. Those which do not fall in any particular category or deal with multiple subjects/countries have been placed in the general text
list with cross referencing where considered necessary.

I have used the facilities of the Library of the India International Centre extensively and found the Librarian Mr. Majumdar and his able staff led by Shafali very helpful and cooperative which greatly facilitated my work. I remain grateful to them for their helpful attitude. In the selection of documents that have gone in the making of this volume, or in adding footnotes to them or for the introduction, I have been guided by the experience gained during the three-decade of my service in the Ministry of External Affairs. However, I remain fully responsible for the views expressed or for any deficiency that may be found in the volume.

INTRODUCTION

In the emergence of Asia-Pacific as the centre of Global politics in the first decade of the second millennia, India found itself in the locus of international competitive politics. The changing nature of global economic and financial order and emerging geo-political dimensions, enjoined upon India to sharpen new tools to meet the emerging challenges. Greater engagement with Asian centres of power both in the east and west was a natural corollary. Another centre of greater activity was the region of Africa, where India’s involvement since independence has matured into a full-blooded relationship. India’s neighbourhood calls for priority attention and provides no less challenge. India cannot also ignore the challenges emerging from the fast developing architecture of global powers for which it seeks to work with various regional and intra-regional groupings since the diplomacy today transcends the frontiers of bilateralism and the problems of the world need global solution whether it is climate change, nuclear or conventional energy security, or food security or financial crisis which engulfed the world a few years ago or even control of weapons of mass destruction and terrorism.

2. The message is clear. While conventional approach to international relations continues to be valid, the challenge of the globalised world can only be effectively met by working closely with regional and intra-regional groupings spread across the globe. This idea may not be new since there are already in existence such groupings like NAM for some decades. But such groupings were mostly of a political character to promote international understanding. The idea that has now emerged in the new avatar is of promoting economic and social wellbeing to uphold peace. The new trend gave birth to inter-continental gatheings like the RIC, BRICS, and IBSA, EAS, G-4, ASEM, G-20, etc. which promote economic and social wellbeing. Closer institutional interaction with successful groupings like the ASEAN, EU, GCC, G-8, Africa’s Regional Economic Communities like COMESA, SADC, ECOWAS and EAC etc., has been strengthened. Carrying the same idea a little further, New Delhi hit upon the strategy of interacting with the countries of Africa at large through the regional African forums on the platform of India – Africa Forum Conference.

II

AFRICA

3. In the realm of India’s foreign relations Africa has been the toast of the year. Even otherwise right since the independence and even before India had developed substantial and substantive interaction with Africa in several areas. To give a fillip to this relationship India took a major initiative in 2008 to turn the existing relationship into one of partnership and organised the India – Africa Forum Summit. It used the various platforms on which the African countries were interacting among themselves to launch its initiative. The Indian approach has been one of strengthening South – South linkages and promoting self-reliance through transfer of technologies appropriate to the needs of African partners. In monetary terms India has spent over a billion dollars on its technical cooperation programme for Africa and continues to provide training annually to almost 1000 officials in various capacity building programmes. This is apart from the hundreds of African students who join Indian universities and colleges every year. In a major initiative India has shared the benefits of satellite-based technology with the African countries. India’s Space Research Organisation developed, installed and operationalised an ambitious plan which linked 53 countries of Africa through a net-work that used satellite fiber optic and wireless links. It has joined learning centres, universities and hospitals in every African country with the counterpart institutions in India. It is in the background of this existing relationship that the initiative for the India – Africa Forum Conference has to be seen. It was attended by the leaders of 14 African countries and heads of the continent’s regional economic groupings. The joint declaration issued at the end of the first New Delhi Conference identified food security, high oil prices, and climate change as the top concerns of the developing world. At the Summit New Delhi pledged easier access to African exports to the Indian market. The India – Africa Framework of Cooperation agreed at the Summit pledged to boost trade and investment and share expertise in agriculture, science and technology, water management and education. India agreed to provide preferential markets to the 34 “Least Developed” African nations, besides committing 500 million US dollars as grant assistance to projects in Africa during the next five years.

4. The success of the first conference propelled India to launch another initiative in the same direction and hold another similar conference this time in Africa itself and chose Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia and headquarters of the AU for the venue. The Prime Minister and the External Affairs Minister, the National Security Advisor along with the Foreign Policy establishment travelled to Addis to underline the importance New Delhi continues to attach to its relations with that continent. This comprehensive paradigm of cooperation is premised on Africa’s own aspirations for development.

5. The Summit held on May 24 – 25, 2011 was preceded by the Foreign Ministers’ meeting on May 23 and a Senior Officials’ meeting on May 20-21 also in Addis Ababa. The President of Equatorial Guinea, Mr. Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, in his capacity as Chairperson of the African Union, co-Chaired the Summit along with Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh. Fifteen African countries participated in the Summit on behalf of the African continent. The choice of the countries was decided by the African Union on the basis of the Banjul format adopted by the African Union for the participation of African countries in Summits. The countries that were asked by the African Union to participate in the Summit were: Algeria, Burundi, Chad, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, Kenya, Libya, Malawi, Namibia, Mauritania, Nigeria, Senegal, South Africa and Swaziland. The Chairperson of the African Union Commission, Dr. Jean Ping, also took part in the Summit.

6. It was for the first time that Indian leaders joined so many African leaders at the African soil and it was indeed an historic occasion. Taking partnership between the peoples at the core of the India-Africa relationship, a number of outreach events were organized before or concurrently with the Summit. Some of these were:

- A trade exhibition called the India Show and a Business Conclave,
- An India Africa Media Partnership Symposium
- Handcrafting Hope – a programme for interaction amongst Indian and African craftspeople,
- Rhythm of Life – a series of joint cultural performances by Indian and African artistes showcasing fusion of Indian and African cultures,
- From Tradition to Innovation, a multimedia exhibition tracing the long journey of our partnership; and
- A film festival showcasing the best of Indian commercial cinema.

7. Significantly for the first time ever India-Africa Academic Conference was held on May 11-12, 2011 also in Addis. The Indian and African Scholars discussed different aspects of India-Africa relations with a view to enhancing them further.

8. It will be recalled that the First Summit adopted two far-reaching documents, the Delhi Declaration and the India-Africa Framework for Cooperation. These served as the contours for India’s systematic engagement with Africa.

9. At the Second Summit, Prime Minister in his address announced significant programmes of economic cooperation which will take the bilateral relationship to greater heights. These are:

   A line of credit of 5 billion US dollars for the next three years to help Africa achieve its development goals. An additional 700 million US dollars to establish new institutions and training programmes in consultation with the African Union and its institutions.
(a) Under the first line of credit offered in 2008, New Delhi had sought to specifically promote regional integration through infrastructure development. On the advice of the African Union President, India announced support for the development of a new Ethio-Djibouti Railway line to the tune of 300 million US dollars.

(b) Following the success of the Pan-African E-Network Project, the Prime Minister now proposed the establishment of an India-Africa Virtual University to help meet some of the demands in Africa for higher studies in Indian institutions. He also proposed 10,000 new scholarships under this proposed University for African students.

(c) To make education in India an enriching experience for the African students, Prime Minister announced a substantial raise in the number of scholarships and training slots for African students and experts, including under the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation Programme. It was announced that total commitment for the next three years by way of scholarships to African students will stand at more than 22,000.

(d) The Prime Minister also announced the establishment of the following new institutions at the pan African level:

(i) An India-Africa Food Processing Cluster - This would contribute to value-addition and the creation of regional and export markets;

(ii) An India-Africa Integrated Textiles Cluster - This will support the cotton industry and its processing and conversion into high value products;

(iii) An India-Africa Centre for Medium Range Weather Forecasting - This will harness satellite technology for the agriculture and fisheries sectors as well as contribute towards disaster preparedness and management of natural resources;

(iv) A request to support the establishment of an India-Africa University for Life and Earth Sciences. India would be happy to support this important venture;

(v) An India-Africa Institute of Agriculture and Rural Development.

(vi) To over come the deficiency in air connectivity between India and Africa, Prime Minister agreed to accord priority in this direction and said New Delhi will be happy to increase the access of African airlines to Indian cities in a significant manner over the next three years.
(vii) Taking note of the strong regional organizations in Africa, the Prime Minister said India will play an important role in supporting development activities by working with Regional Economic Communities to establish at the regional level, Soil, Water and Tissue Testing Laboratories, Regional Farm Science Centres, Seed Production-cum-Demonstration Centres, and Material Testing Laboratories for Highways.

(viii) To promote human resource development at the bilateral level he proposed the establishment of institutes for English language training, information technology, entrepreneurship development and vocational training. As part of the new initiatives in the social and economic sectors he announced the establishment of Rural Technology Parks, Food Testing Laboratories, Food Processing Business Incubation Centres and Centres on Geo-Informatics Applications and Rural Development.

(ix) Prime Minister said that to encourage trade and investment flows as well as transfer of technology, the private sectors should be fully involved in the efforts to integrate the economies of India and Africa and proposed the establishment of an India-Africa Business Council to bring together business leaders from both sides.

(x) India has consistently supported the development of African capacities in the maintenance of peace and security. As a token of India’s commitment to supporting Africa’s endeavours for seeking African solutions, India offered to contribute 2 million US dollars for the African Union Mission in Somalia.

10. At the political level the significant outcome of the Summit was that while India took note of “the common African position and the aspirations of the African countries to get their rightful place in an expanded UN Security Council as new permanent member with full rights as contained in the Ezulwini Consensus,” Africa too took “note of India’s position and its aspirations to become a permanent member with full rights in an expanded UN Security Council.”

11. India’s major concern on terrorism found the fullest expression in the Addis Ababa Declaration which “unequivocally” condemned “terrorism in all its forms and manifestations”, and accepted the Indian contention that “an act of terrorism anywhere is a threat to the entire international community.”

12. A new form of terrorism on the high seas in the shape of piracy was accepted as of equal concern. The declaration accepted the need to address the threat “posed by piracy off the coast of Somalia and suffering caused by taking of hostages”, and called on all States to cooperate in combating and eradicating the menace of piracy. In this context, the Summit welcomed India’s support to efforts to safeguard shipping in the Gulf of Aden, Arabian Sea and the Indian Ocean from piracy.

13. With Africa there were a very large number of visits exchanged during the year. The Prime Minister after the India – Africa Forum Summit made a bilateral visits to Ethiopia and Tanzania. The President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil made a visit to Mauritius and Vice President attended the independence ceremonies of newly formed country South Sudan at Juba in July. On the way he made a visit to Kampala. The Prime Minister of Rwanda came at the beginning of the year in January. President of Uganda came on a private visit to New Delhi in September. The First Lady of Mozambique Mrs. Maria da Luz Guebuza visited New Delhi in November and the Defence Minister of the country came earlier in June and interacted with the Defence Minister A. K. Antony. Commerce and Industry Minister of Mozambique was in New Delhi in March. The Foreign Minister of Eretria visited New Delhi in June, a 5-Member delegation from Lesotho came in July. The Joint Commission meeting with Nigeria took place in New Delhi in March, and the Joint Commission meeting with South Africa took place in Pretoria in July. The Additional Secretary in the Ministry of External Affairs Gurjit Singh made a first visit by an Indian official to Comoros Island.

14. This to and fro visits kept the traffic between India and Africa quite hectic and relationship warm and cordial.

III
SOUTH ASIA

15. South Asia despite the SAARC has some distance to go to integrate in comparison to other regions. This is not surprising when we go back a little into history, when South Asia was a single unit of geography. The subcontinent of India out of which emerged the three largest members of the SAARC was an integrated whole. Partition was a disintegrating process that cut linkages built over the centuries. Separated by political differences, integrating them into SAARC has not been easy. India’s initiatives to build network of interdependencies in the region has slowly been showing some positive results. The countries of this region need peace, security, education, healthcare and sustainable development in equal measure. India, being the largest of the countries both in area, population and resources has always demonstrated its willingness to go the extra mile for the sake of peace and security, even on a non-reciprocal basis. This has created an atmosphere of trust and confidence among the neighbours enabling to expand the dialogue on cooperative security. However, there is the need to change the mindset of the peoples and their governments before the region could really reap the benefits of mutual cooperation.

16. There is of course, the problem of asymmetry among countries in South Asia but does it need to stand in the way of regional cooperation? Asymmetries in size, resources and military capabilities must be used as building blocks to enhance cooperation and not block the much needed cooperation to create the area of shared prosperity.

17. It is this spirit that animates India in its relations with the countries in its neighbourhood comprising the SAARC region. Relations with Afghanistan are the shining example of this policy. External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna while attending the two international conferences on Afghanistan in Istanbul (November) and Bonn (December) and another ASEM in Hungary (June) sought to send out this message to the international community at large by extending support to the objectives of the conferences which he identified as bringing regional countries together on an inclusive platform to address the common challenges facing the region and working towards cooperative confidence building measures and solutions. That there is reciprocal trust in Afghanistan’s leadership in Indian approach was underlined by the two visits of President Karzai to India (in February and November) and Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh’s visit to Kabul (in June) to enable interaction between the top leadership of the two countries on a regular basis. The high watermark of this relationship has been the conclusion of a Strategic Partnership Agreement between them in October.

18. To strengthen Afghan capabilities to face the challenge of internal conflict, India reiterated its commitment to the Afghan Defence Minister when he came calling in June that India was committed to building the defence capabilities of the Afghan security forces besides assisting Kabul in its development efforts.

19. Since the return of Sheikh Hasina’s Awami League to power in Dhaka, there has been a marked cordiality in the relations between India and Bangladesh. There has been a series of visits from the Indian leaders to Dhaka starting with the Vice President’s in May, followed by External Affairs Minister’s in July and finally Prime Minister’s own visit in September. In between Foreign Secretary too made his visit to Dhaka. The Prime Minister’s visit to Bangladesh and signing of a clutch of agreements including the Boundary Agreement and the broad-based Framework Agreement on Cooperation for Development were marked by great bonhomie between the leaders of the two countries. Both the countries are motivated by the shared values of democracy, secularism and social justice and the two prime ministers availed the opportunity to reiterate them. It is hoped that the agreement on the sharing of the Teesta waters, which could not be finalised during the PM’s visit, would also be signed soon.
New Delhi also assured Dhaka on several occasions and at several levels including at the level of Prime Minister that it would make sure that in pursuing the Tipaimukh project, India would not take steps that would adversely impact Bangladesh. To further promote Bangladesh’s trade with Nepal, India readily agreed to amend the existing MOU to further facilitate overland transit traffic between those two countries. Another goodwill gesture that marked the Prime Minister’s visit was the announcement to open the access route of Tin Bigha for visits to Bangladesh’s enclaves of Dahagram and Angarpota round the clock. To express her happiness at this gesture, Sheikh Hasina herself made a visit to the enclaves through the Tin Bigha corridor on October 19, where she was received by Health Minister Ghulam Nabi Azad and Minister of State for Home Affairs Jitendra Singh.

20. Both Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh and External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna visited Maldives during the course of the year. The Prime Minister during his visit in November was accorded a unique distinction by the Maldivian Government when he was invited to address the People’s Majlis (Parliament) of the country. In its 78 years’ history, no foreign head of state or government had ever been shown this honour. The geographical contiguity and ethnic, historical and cultural ties create an abiding faith between the two countries highlighted in their commitment to democracy, development and peaceful co-existence. Their shared values give the two countries the confidence that “cooperation at the bilateral, sub-regional and regional levels will enable the two countries to realise their developmental aspirations, and contribute to peace, prosperity and security in the Indian Ocean Region and South Asia.” The visit provided the opportunity for the two countries to enter into a series of agreements/MoUs like Framework Agreement on Cooperation for Development, Combating International Terrorism, Trans-national Crime, Illicit Drug Trafficking and Enhancing Bilateral Cooperation in Capacity Building, Disaster Management and Coastal Security. India has extended US$ 100 million Stand-by Credit Facility to finance several infrastructural projects for accelerated development. The July visit of External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna to Male was predicated on a high trajectory with both sides embarking on comprehensive, forward looking, pragmatic and mutually beneficial initiatives.

21. India expressed its happiness while welcoming the 7-point agreement among the political parties on the settlement of the Maoist combatants’ rehabilitation issue, power sharing and constitution framing which it is hoped would end the long drawn stalemate in the constitutional process in Nepal. External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna as well as both the current and the former Foreign Secretaries visited Kathmandu. The Nepalese Prime Minister Baburam Bhattarai visited New Delhi in October. He is an alumni of several educational institutions in India including Jawaharlal Nehru University and has very close links with India.

22. Since the end of the ethnic war in 2009, Sri Lanka has been beset with the controversy regarding the violation of human rights by the Sri Lankan security forces towards the concluding phase of the war and at the time of the surrender of the Tamil militants. Apart from the report of the UN panel, video-graphic evidence by various voluntary organisations has surfaced to indict the security forces. This evidence has of course been challenged by Colombo. Sri Lanka on its own also appointed a Lessons Learnt and Reconciliation Commission (LLRC) to look into the various aspects of the ethnic problem and conduct of the war against the LTTE. The LLRC has in December submitted its 400-page report to the Government. The Government of India welcomed the publication of the report and took note of the assurances of the Sri Lanka Government that its recommendations would be implemented. The LLRC recommended various measures for addressing the issues relating to the healing of the wounds of the conflict and fostering the process of lasting peace and reconciliation in the country. The Government of Sri Lanka has expressed its intention to set up a mechanism to carry out further investigations relating to instances of illegal human rights violations and incidents involving loss of civilian life. The Government of India felt it important that “an independent and credible mechanism is put in place to investigate allegations of human rights violations, as brought out the LLRC, in a time-bound manner.” It was in this spirit that India chose to vote for the Resolution at the UN Human Rights Commission in Geneva in March 2012 calling on the Island country to implement the LLRC report to create a sense of reconciliation and amity in the Tamil community which was alienated during the years of its struggle for constitutional rights leading to a political solution to the ethnic problem. While Government of India remains concerned about violations of human rights, it has also concentrated its energies on the rehabilitation of the IDPs.

23. The relations with Pakistan which remained in a state of suspended animation during most of the year 2010, started looking up in 2011, thanks to the initiatives of Prime Minister. The ice was broken at Thimphu when the two foreign secretaries met there in February. The Prime Minister’s initiative in inviting Prime Minister Gilani to Mohali to watch the Semi-final cricket match between the Indian and Pakistani teams in the World Cup series was a gesture which received all round appreciation. The match provided the opportunity to the two Prime Ministers to talk and Mr. Gilani had no hesitation in congratulating Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh for his initiative and resuming the composite dialogue. Mr. Gilani was quite emphatic that he wanted “both
23. Dr. Manmohan Singh describing cricket as “uniting factor”, said whatever the differences between the two countries “we have to find pathways to resolve them”.

24. The appointment of Ms. Hina Rabbani Khar as the Pakistani Foreign Minister was a welcome message from Islamabad that it was interested in burying the rancorous approach of the past and “achieving the common goal of establishing friendly and cooperative bilateral relations” with New Delhi. When the two Foreign Ministers met in July the External Affairs Minister Mr. Krishna affirmed to her India’s desire to work with Pakistan “to reduce the trust deficit and move forward in a friendly manner.” He assured her of India’s “desire for a stable and prosperous Pakistan, acting as a bulwark against terrorism and at peace with itself and its neighbours”. While Mr. Krishna was full of optimism, no less was Ms. Khar who sounded upbeat with her remarks that Islamabad was willing to bend backward to improve relations with its neighbours. The New Delhi talks were fruitful in that they created a positive atmosphere at the working level.

25. Since then a lot of water flowed down the Yumana and the Indus. The dialogue process has stayed on course, which enabled Prime Minister to say in November, when the met again Mr. Gilani in Maldives on the sidelines of the SAARC Summit, that “I have always regarded Prime Minister Gilani as a man of peace. Every time I have met in the last three years, this belief has been further strengthened.” Talking of the people he said “I have always believed that the destinies of people of India and Pakistan are very closely linked”.

26. A breakthrough has occurred and it is in the realm of trade following the mandate of the two prime ministers in Maldives that the two side work on enhancing preferential trading arrangements as part of the shared vision to significantly expand bilateral trade. The Pakistani Cabinet not allowing the grass to grow under its feet mandated the Pakistani Commerce Ministry to achieve complete normalisation of trade with India.

27. On November 15, the commerce ministers of the two countries met and reminded themselves that, already in September, they had asked their commerce secretaries to lay down specific timelines for full normalisation of trade relationship, dismantling of remaining non-tariff barriers and full implementation of the legal obligations under the SAARC Agreement on SAFTA. All these jargons were euphemism for MFN trading relationship, a status which India had granted to Pakistan for several years. India welcomed the Pakistani decision to move towards the MFN regime in bilateral trade which will be to the benefit of both their peoples. According to Indian Commerce Secretary Mr.
Khullar without the MFN regime, while the formal bilateral trade is around 2.5 to 3 billion US dollars, the informal trade is at least twice that amount. With the MFN regime restored the informal trade would almost vanish and the bilateral trade can straight away jump to $8 billion.

IV

SOUTHEAST, EAST ASIA and PACIFIC

28. The southeast Asian region has emerged as the hub of Asia – Pacific security paradigm in the last decade. The emergence of China as the second largest economy replacing Japan, and its assertiveness in its dealings with the international community, has shifted the centre of gravity of international politics to Asia as never before. China’s claim to the entire South China Sea to the exclusion of the interests of other littoral states does not bode well for the future of the region. New Delhi with its Look-East policy is now firmly gravitated to the region’s economic and political fortunes. Its relationship with other institutions of the region like the ASEAN and EAS enjoins upon it to stay committed to the region. New Delhi is fully conscious of its new role and responsibility that comes with it.

29. Australia is an important country of the Pacific region and India – Australia relations are gathering the warmth of closer relationship. Australia’s decision to lift embargo on sale of Uranium to India was a landmark decision and recognition of India’s non-proliferation record. The visit of External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna to Australia at the beginning of the year, greatly contributed to better understanding between the two countries. Australian Defence Minister Stephen Smith’s visit in December helped to enhance defence cooperation between the two countries. The Defence Minister A. K. Antony described the relationship as “an important milestone in the evolution of India – Australia partnership”. However, New Delhi did not react positively to Australian Foreign Minister Kevin Rudd’s observation that India was positive towards joining in the trilateral cooperation in seeking to contain China in the Asia-pacific region. India looks at its role in the region as one of promoting peace along with other countries of the region than as a tool to promote any strategic interest of a third country.

30. India has developed active economic relationship with Australia. There is the mechanism of the Joint Commission to promote deeper economic relationship and the Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement (CECA) as an instrument of a “high quality, truly liberalizing” pathway to close economic integration between India and Australia. To deepen cultural relations between the two countries, the Indian Council of Cultural Relations has set up a Chair of Indian studies at the University of Sydney. To service the Western Australian region, and to increase the reach of Indian missions in that country, New Delhi has decided to set up a new Consulate General at Perth.
31. India’s relations with China are two pronged, as a neighbor in north and a stakeholder in East Asia region. In 2010 certain wrinkles had developed in the relations between the two countries over issues like denial of visa to senior Indian defence officers, issue of staple visa, or patrolling along the Sino – Indian border. But following the visit to China by Prime Minister Manmohan Singh to attend the BRICS Summit in April and his meeting with the Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao on the sidelines, a thaw appeared in the bilateral relations. The desire on both sides to iron out the difficulties paved the way for the successful and productive visit of an eight-member military delegation under the leadership of Major General Gurmeet Singh to Beijing, Shanghai and Urumqi (Xinjiang) in June. The Chinese quietly withdrew their practice of issuing staple visas to some Indian from certain areas. Message was clear that China was not keen on a fractured relationship and intended to mend fences. Toning down the rhetoric on the South China sea issue after the EAS summit in Bali raised the hopes in New Delhi that the ONGC prospecting of the oil in that region along the borders of Vietnam would go through without any hitch.

32. The Line of Actual Control along the Sino – Indian border, despite occasional misunderstandings hyped by the media, remained more or less peaceful and tranquil. The China — India agreement ensuring that heavy military equipment stay away from the border along with the agreement prohibiting military exercises very close to the LAC contributed a lot in this direction. Prime Minister’s steadfast refusal to share the apprehension articulated by a an opposition member in the Lok Sabha on December 13 that China was making all-out efforts to attack India, speaks of the confidence that the leadership of the two countries have built between them.

33. The launch of the Year of India – China Exchanges in 2011 at Sanya by Premier Wen Jiabao and Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh was the high water mark of the year in the relations between the two countries. The first India – China strategic dialogue on economic relations opens a new avenue to promote deeper and multi-faceted relationship between the two neighbours.

34. Apart from the meeting that Prime Minister had with Premier Wen in Sanya in April, he had another meeting with Wen on the sidelines of the ASEAN and EAS Summits in Bali in November. These two meetings created a fund of goodwill and generated the warmth in the relationship between the two countries. It was not without significance that Wen recalled Prime Minister’s observation at Bali that there was enough space in the world to accommodate the developmental aspirations of both the countries and went on to add that there were enough areas where India and China could enhance mutually beneficial cooperation, terming the 21st century as an Asian century beckoning the two to work hand in hand to promote economic development and growth. There was satisfaction at the robust economic interaction that had catalyzed in attaining the trade turnover of 70 billion US dollars which could the 100 billion mark by 2015.

35. In March 2011 Japan suffered the most unfortunate double whammy in a devastating earthquake and a Tsunami. In a letter to the Japanese Prime Minister Kan, Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh, expressed shock at the devastation caused by the earthquake and extended on behalf of the people of India the most heartfelt condolences and sympathies. In his statement to the Parliament while expressing deep shock at the loss of life and property, he acknowledged Japanese contribution to India’s development and said “we can never forget that India has been the largest recipient of Japan’s overseas development assistance”. In April Foreign Secretary travelled to Tokyo and offered personally India’s condolences and reiterated India’s offer to assist Japan in any way required. The Japanese Government expressed their appreciation for the assistance already provided by India for relief and rehabilitation including the sterling efforts of the 46-member team from the National Disaster Response Force of India. The consultations that the Foreign Secretary had with the Japanese Foreign Office during the visit, however, resulted in the agreement to establish an India-Japan-United States trilateral dialogue on regional and global issues of shared interest.

36. Following the commitment made by the Prime Ministers of India and Japan in October 2010, the two countries signed in February “the most ambitious agreement by India so far,” — the Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement (CECA) covering trade in goods, services and investment under its ambit.

37. The bedrock of India-Japan relations is formed by several levels of mechanism for dialogue apart from the annual summits between the two prime ministers since 2006. These are annual strategic, security and policy dialogues between the foreign ministers and defence dialogue between the defence ministers. There is also a high level policy and strategic dialogue on economic cooperation between finance ministers and planning agencies of the two countries. Another area where synergy in policy is being developed is Africa where both India and Japan have their wide ranging programmes of cooperation. Two rounds of such dialogues took place at the official level during the year.

38. This year’s Summit meeting in December between the two prime ministers also marked the 60th anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between the two countries and it was an occasion for them to note that in the last six decades the relations between the two countries have been marked by “deep mutual understanding and vibrant people-to-people contacts based on universal values such as democracy, human rights and rule of law, as well as wide-ranging strategic and economic interests”.

39. The relations between India and Indonesia had an auspicious start with the presence of President Yudhoyono and his wife as Chief Guests for the 2011 Republic Day celebrations. It is significant that when India proclaimed itself a Republic on January 26, 1950, it was honoured with the visit of the Indonesian President Sukarno and Mrs. Fatmawati Sukarno as the State Guests. Both the countries have been quite eager to provide greater economic contents to their two millennia old relationship and are now working towards concluding a Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement (CECA) so as to achieving a bilateral trade target of $25 billion by 2015. The investment by Indian companies have touched $3.50 billion and another $25-billion worth of investments are in the pipeline. It is hoped that the proposed CECA will not only break tariff walls on merchandise trade but also enable professionals from the two countries to take up short-term business assignments in each other’s markets. There is already a steady growth of bilateral relations in the political, security, economic, science and technology and cultural sectors.

40. There is already an active cooperation through numerous frameworks governing defense, science and technology, space cooperation, agricultural science, culture, tourism, and youth affairs & sports. There is the emerging cooperation in education, media, air services, energy resources including oil, gas, coal, and renewable energy, prevention of smuggling, prevention of illegal trade in narcotics, disaster management, cooperation in the area of small and medium enterprises, meteorology, climatology and geophysics including climate change, health, marine and fisheries. The common desire for accelerating the implementation of cooperation in these areas and monitoring such cooperation through the mechanism of Action Plan on Implementing the New Strategic Partnership drawn up during the Indonesia-India Joint Commission Meeting (JCM) in June 2007 together with the proposed CECA would take the relations between the two countries to new heights.

41. President of Korea had visited India in January 2010 as a Chief Guest at the Republic Day celebrations. In July 2011 President Pratibha Devisingh Patil made a State Visit to the Republic of Korea as part of the growing Indian integration with the Asia-Pacific region, the new hub of not only Asian but global activity. The visit gained particular significance with the signing of an Agreement for Cooperation in the Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy by the two countries. There is already a Comprehensive Economic Partnership Agreement with South Korea which is under revision to enhance its benefits. Trade with South Korea which stood at $7.1 billion in 2006 was propelled by CEPA to $17.5 billion in 2010 — an increase of 46 per cent over the previous year, with growth rates of exports being the same for both countries. As a result of the CEPA Indian IT companies are getting a foothold in South Korea. There is already a defence cooperation and social security agreements with South Korea.

42. As part of her tour of East Asia, the President Mrs. Patil also visited Mongolia to give impetus to the growing economic partnership with that country. The 20 million dollar Line of Credit for establishing an IT education and outsourcing centre in Ulaanbaatar is an endeavour to assist that country in creating new business and job opportunities. India is committed to helping Mongolia in capacity building and human resource development in all sectors required by them. The MoU between the Planning Commission of India and the National Development and Innovation Committee of Mongolia will enable our two countries to share experiences in Plan formulation and implementation. The Indian – Mongolian Business Forum is accelerating the process of economic and commercial cooperation. The Agreement on Cooperation in Defence matters signed during the President’s visit will strengthen security cooperation between the two countries and add depth and substance to their ties.

43. Myanmar with its 1600 KMs long common border with India provides not only India’s Northeast an important linkage to the Southeast Asian region, but is also emerging an important alternative route for linking the northeast with the rest of India. The Kaladan Multi-modal route when operational will provide the much needed alternative linkage. It is a new paradigm of development where foreign policy initiatives blend seamlessly into national economic and commercial initiatives. The high water mark of the relations between the two countries was the visit to India of Myanmar’s President U Thein Sein in October and the transition of the regime to an open and democratic framework, resulting in freedom for Aung San Suu kyi and her election to the Myanmar parliament. India offered the new-look regime all necessary assistance in further strengthening the democratic transition in an inclusive and broad based manner. In June the External Affairs Minister Krishna had visited Myanmar for an interaction with the new regime in the new political environment and prepared the groundwork for the Myanmar President’s visit. The visit offered him an opportunity to further vitalize the multi-faceted relationship in enhancing security cooperation as well as collaboration in the fields of Connectivity, IT, Energy, Agriculture, Power, Telecommunications and Infrastructure.

44. The visit of New Zealand Prime Minister John Key in June was an occasion to highlight Commonwealth ties, shared democratic values, people to people and sporting links which underpin the vibrant relationship between the two countries.

45. Singapore has emerged the focal point for southeast Asia. Both the Prime Minister and the External Affairs Minister visited this important country. The EAM was there in April and Prime Minister in November. Prime Minister had wide ranging discussions with his counterpart covering international, regional and bilateral issues. To underline the importance of Singapore to India’s southeast Asian policy, he emphasized to his interlocutor Singapore’s pivotal role in India’s Look East Policy. While there is a fruitful interaction with the island country in the economic field since the signing of the CECA in 2005, to make it more meaningful and forward looking a review of the same is underway. There is a MoU with Singapore for cooperation in the field of Personnel Management and Public Administration and an Executive Programme on Cooperation in the fields of Arts, Heritage, Archives and Library. The Parliaments of India and Singapore have also agreed to establish respective Parliamentary Friendship Groups. Both Prime Ministers took note of the strong intergovernmental links between the two countries that provide platforms for regular high level institutional exchanges such as the Foreign Office Consultations, Ministerial Meetings, the Defence Policy Dialogue and the Security Round Table.

46. In April the Thai Prime Minister Abhisit Vejjajiva accepting the invitation of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh paid a visit to New Delhi. In their discussions the two prime ministers accepted the need to energize bilateral institutional mechanisms, to enhance cooperation in security matters and to upgrade the bilateral dialogue on defence matters. Through the instrumentality of the joint commission the two countries have substantially enhanced their connectivity as well as bilateral trade and investments. The two countries also have rich interaction through the mechanism of ASEAN and BIMSTEC. The bilateral trade turnover which was about US$ 6.7 billion in 2010, as agreed to by the two prime ministers is to double by 2014. There are also ongoing negotiations on a Comprehensive Free Trade Agreement that would promote trade in goods and services, and investments.

47. The visit of the Vietnamese President to India in October was preceded by the visit of External Affairs Minister to Hanoi in September to co-chair the meeting of the India – Vietnam Joint Commission on Trade, Economic, Scientific and Technological cooperation. The Second India-Vietnam Strategic Dialogue and the Fifth Foreign Office Consultations had given the opportunity to the two countries to exchange views on current bilateral and regional issues of mutual interest. External Affairs Minister while in Hanoi inaugurated the India – Vietnam Advanced Resource Centres, financed by India at a cost of more than $ 2 million. This is a quality IT training centre.

48. Vietnam has always been a steadfast supporter of India’s permanent membership of an expanded UN Security Council.
WEST ASIA

49. The West Asia region is home to a large body of Indian diaspora, with historical, civilizational and cultural links and is a source of energy. The region is pulsating with new winds of change which are ushering in a new “spring”. While siding with the people of the region in their search for democratic aspirations, New Delhi is opposed to any imposed regime change from outside. The Government of India believes that “it is the responsibility of sovereign States to respond to the aspirations of its people through administrative, political, economic and other measures. At the same time, it is for the State to decide on the best course of action to maintain internal law and order and to prevent violence”. This policy has been appreciated by the countries of the region and India continues to maintain high level of interaction with them.

50. Bahrain Foreign Minister Shaikh Khalidin Ahmed visited New Delhi in March, Egyptian Foreign Minister came in May, UAE Foreign Minister came calling in June. The Syrian Foreign Minister’s visit provided an opportunity to discuss the situation first hand in Syria. The Special Envoy of Palestinian President came in August. New Delhi welcomed the agreement between Hamas and Fatah and expressed the hope that this would lead to the realization of the aspirations of the Palestinian people and lead to peace and stability in the region. Secretary General of the Saudi National Security Council visited New Delhi in March and briefed New Delhi of the situation in the West Asian region.

51. The mechanism of Foreign Office Consultations helped to exchange views with countries in the region. Such consultations were carried out with Armenia, Iran, and Azerbaijan. The extension of the India-Oman Military Cooperation MoU signed in 2005 to 2015 underlined its utility to both the countries.

52. The visit of Uzbek President Islam Karimov in May provided an opportunity to renew and establish strategic partnership with Uzbekistan. The strategic partnership would encompass active cooperation in a wide spectrum of areas including political, economic, counter-terrorism, education, health, human resource development, science and technology, tourism and culture. This is an additional mechanism to the already existing ones to promote a wide range cooperation in diverse areas including Information Technology, Pharmaceuticals, Standardization, Small and Medium Enterprises, Coal gasification, Oil & Gas, Science & Technology, Textiles and Banking.

53. India too has strong and friendly relations with Kazakhstan. In 2009 the Kazakhstan President was Chief Guest at the Republic Day celebrations. In 2010, External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna visited Astana and in 2011 the Prime Minister paid an official visit to Kazakhstan, to strengthen India’s partnership with the all important country of Central Asia. Kazakhstan has also entered into an agreement with India for the supply of all important element in our civil nuclear energy programme, Uranium. There is convergence of views with Kazakhstan on political and global issues. As Prime Minister said India would like to give added thrust to its relations with Kazakhstan in the field of energy and hydrocarbons as well as atomic energy and space.

54. Another country in this region with which India has developed close interaction is Kyrgyzstan. The scope of India – Kyrgyz cooperation was widened in July when Defence Minister A. K. Antony led a high powered defence delegation to Bishkek and offered India’s cooperation to his counterpart Major General Abibilla Kudayberdiev in this sensitive area. As a first step, India offered to send a team to train Kyrgyz Armed Forces in UN Peace Keeping Operations and impart English language skills to them. There is already a joint working group on counter-terrorism between the two countries. India has also set up a Kyrgyz – India Mountain Biomedical Research Centre in Bishkek which was inaugurated by the Kyrgyz President during the visit of Defence Minister in July. India’s contribution to the project is Rs 6 Crores. As part of the annual foreign office consultation mechanism, this year the consultations took place in New Delhi in August.

AMERICAS

55. The high point of India – US relations was the 2nd Strategic Dialogue held in June in New Delhi at the level of External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna and U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. Besides pledging to continue and strengthen their cooperation in the already agreed upon areas, the two ministers agreed to initiate new areas of dialogue to expand their existing cooperation and consultations. The new areas identified were West and Central Asia and dialogue on UN matters. It was also agreed to initiate the dialogue process between India, the United States and Japan. The two Ministers reaffirmed their commitment for consultations, coordination and cooperation in Afghanistan and continue and strengthen their economic cooperation to promote capacity building and human resource development.

56. The Prime Minister had a one to one meeting with President Obama on the sideline of the East Asia Summit in Bali in November. Earlier they had talked on telephone in May to continue the process of dialogue and consultations between them. When Prime Minister met the President in Bali both reassured each other their commitment to continue with the programmes agreed upon during the President’s visit to New Delhi in November 2010. Dr. Singh conveyed to the President that it was a “privilege for India to find you and your administration as deeply invested in ensuring that India makes a success of its historic journey to have the social and economic transformation carried out in the framework of an open society, a democratic polity, committed to the rule of law, and respect for full human freedoms.”

57. In May the two countries launched the Homeland Security Dialogue, agreed upon during President Obama’s visit. It was a significant step considering India lives closest to the epicenter of terrorism and has been the victim of cross border terrorism for many years on the hands of groups operating from across the border in Pakistan, where the society has become highly radicalized, economy weakened and the state structure fragile.

58. New Delhi welcomed the elimination of Osama bin Laden as a “significant step forward” and Prime Minister in his message to Obama hoped that it would “deal a decisive blow to Al Qaeda and other terrorist groups”.

59. With the countries of Europe India has since independence worked out active and multifaceted relationship. Apart from trade and commerce, there is high level of technological relationship, which has contributed substantially to India’s progress in scientific and technological fields. These relations have found expression in many other areas like culture, tourism, education and last but not the least political. Active relations in all these fields naturally calls for maintaining contacts at several levels including the highest. The Indian and the European leaders frequently exchange visits between them. It was in the same spirit that the President Pratibha Devi Singh Patil in 2011 made a State Visit to two of the Central European countries—Austria and Switzerland. Both these countries shares with India their core values as well as strong historical ties of friendship.

60. With Russia since 2000 there is an institutionalised arrangement of annual summits. This year it was the turn of the Russian Federation to host the summit and Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh made his journey to Moscow in December. Through these summits both the countries have not only maintained momentum in their relations but have infused greater contents in their robust relationship. Preceding the Prime Minister’s visit, the External Affairs Minister had visited Moscow to hold talks with his counterpart to prepare for the Summit. During the year bilateral visits and talks with Russia took place at several ministerial levels, Home, Defense, Commerce, Health, Tourism, Steel and Power Ministers. In November the External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna had led a delegation to Moscow for the Inter-Governmental Commission Meeting.

61. The March 2010 Inter-Governmental Agreement had laid down the broad roadmap for partnership in the area of civil nuclear energy. The construction of Kudankulam 1 and 2 nuclear power plant units have been completed with Russian technology. Techno-commercial discussions for Units 3 and 4 of Kudankulam are almost complete. In June, India and Russia signed an MoU for setting up the Global Centre for Nuclear Energy Partnership, which will undertake advanced studies in the field of nuclear research. India’s defence cooperation has for long been a vital facet of this multi-faceted relationship, which has now matured well beyond a buyer-seller relationship to co-production through transfer of technologies. Cooperation in the space sector has matured into the Chandrayan-2 mission and manned space flight programmes, as well as adoption and applications of GLONASS technologies.

62. The annual summit helped in the conclusion of agreement on “the terms and conditions for the Russian credit for Units 3 and 4 of the Kudankulam nuclear power project”. Speaking of the similarity of views between the two countries Prime Minister said “We share similar views on threats to international security from terrorism, piracy and drug-trafficking. Our aims and objectives with regard to Afghanistan’s reconstruction and nation building efforts, and its ability to decide its own future without external interference are very similar. Both India and Russia have a strong interest in promoting stability and prosperity in the region, and we agreed to work closely toward this objective”. The Defence cooperation between India and Russia was reviewed in October when the Inter-governmental Commission on Military Technical Cooperation met in New Delhi. In short, India – Russia relations were described by the Prime Minister himself as “among the most substantive we have with any country”.

63. There have been a number of high level visits between India and Turkey in recent years. In November 2008, Turkish Prime Minister Mr. Recep Tayyip Erdogan visited India. The Turkish President came in February 2010. In continuation of this trend Vice-President Hamid Ansari visited Turkey in October when the entire gamut of bilateral, regional and international issues was discussed by him with the Turkish leadership. To promote business relations between the two countries a business delegation had accompanied him and a meeting with the Turkish businessmen was held in Istanbul.

64. The Indo-Turkish Joint Commission on Trade and Economic Cooperation is Co-Chaired by the Commerce Ministers of the two countries to give direction towards further consolidation and development of economic and commercial cooperation between the two countries. Both India and Turkey also have signed an Agreement for Avoidance of Double Taxation as also an Agreement for Reciprocal Protection and Mutual Promotion of Investments. Agreements for development of Science and Technology and for cooperation in the IT sector also exist between the two countries. A Joint Study Group has also been commissioned to examine the feasibility of setting up a Free Trade Agreement between India and Turkey. Cooperation in the cultural and education sectors has also been fairly active. Since 1995 an Indian Professor has been on deputation to the Indology Department in the Ankara University to teach Hindi. Similarly, two Turkish language Professors have been deputed to the Jawaharlal Nehru University and the Jamia Millia. MoUs for cooperation have also been concluded between Universities in Turkey and India. Indian culture, including films, dance, yoga and Ayurveda and Indian cuisine obviously, have been drawing attention in Turkey.

65. India and United Kingdom had an institutional arrangement for dialogue on economic and financial matters and in pursuit of this arrangement Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee visited London in July for the 4th round of the dialogue which was established in 2005. As a result of these interaction the two countries have identified a number of issues for joint collaboration.

66. The Chancellor of Germany Angela Markel was awarded the Jawaharlal Nehru Award for International Understanding and she came to New Delhi in May to receive it. The visit coincided with the sixtieth anniversary of the establishment of diplomatic relations between India and Germany and it was a fitting tribute that German Chancellor, an ardent advocate of India – German strategic partnership should be receiving this prestigious award.

67. Prime Minister of Slovenia visited New Delhi in June. There was active interaction with other European countries too. The Foreign Ministers of Ukraine, Poland, Netherlands and Cyprus visited New Delhi. External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna visited Hungary in June and Minister of State Mrs. Preneet Kaur Lithuania. The Indian Council for Cultural Relations set up Indian Chairs in several European universities, Czech Republic (Charles University), Germany (Leipzig), Poland (Crakow) and Lithuania.

VIII

MULTILATERAL COOPERATION

68. As pointed out in the beginning, not only has the world become globalized, the problems too have become globalized and therefore need cooperation on a wider scale. While bilateralism will continue to be important mechanism to resolve specific problems peculiar between two countries, regional and intra-regional problems like terrorism, security, climate change, energy, etc would need wider mechanisms to resolve them. Even trade which has purely a bilateral character has under the WTO regime, become a multilateral problem to be resolved on wider considerations with its impact on other competing players and commodities.

69. In that context, membership of multilateral groupings become an important foreign policy instrument which India has fully appreciated and grasped. It is now member of wide variety of such groupings regional, intra-regional and even intra-continental.

70. Among the groups in the last category, the BRICS is one such group which span four continents—Africa, Asia, Europe and Americas. It has overlapping membership with two other groupings—RIC and IBSA. But each of the three is a different platform and has independent existence. India is the only common factor in all the three and therefore capable of playing a pivotal role. Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh participated in the 5th Summit of the IBSA countries at Pretoria in October, while its Ministerial meeting was held in New Delhi in March, attended by External Affairs Minister S.M. Krishna. Another Ministerial meeting of IBSA was held in September on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly session in New York. The first project financed by IBSA, a sports complex constructed at Ramallah, was formally handed over to Palestinian Authority in November as a gift of the peoples of IBSA countries to the people of Palestine.

71. India also attended the 3rd Summit of the BRICS at Sanya in China in April, with “Broad Vision and Shared Prosperity” as its agenda. South Africa joined in for the first time after its admission to BRIC in 2010. It is of no less significance that all the members of the BRICS are members of the G-20 and currently members of the UNSC. India has proposed creation of BRICS Science, Technology and Innovation Fund for BRICS countries with a corpus of US $10 million, announcing an Indian contribution of $2 million.

72. India is also member of the G-20 from the very beginning and Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh has regularly attended its summits. The last summit was at Cannes (France) in November which was held in the backdrop of the sovereign debt crisis in the Eurozone, which has emerged as the principal source of concern for the global economy. Prime Minister felt that this crisis must be resolved since in “Europe’s prosperity lies our own prosperity”. G-20 is important for resolution of international financial issues since conducive global economic environment is important for developing and emerging economies in an increasingly interdependent world.

73. Despite some limitations as pointed out in the narrative above over the last 26 years of its existence, SAARC has established itself as the leading mechanism for regional cooperation in South Asia. It has enabled enhanced cooperation within the region in a wide range of areas such as trade, connectivity, poverty alleviation, food security, women and child development, combating organized crime and terrorism, among others. It has also created new institutions to promote regional integration such as the South Asian Regional Standards Organization, the South Asian Development Fund and the South Asian University which is based in New Delhi. Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh underlining the importance of SAARC to the development of South Asia believes that “the fact that the global economy is not doing too well, is a further incentive for countries of the SAARC region to learn to cooperate with one another.”

74. The South Asian University is now a functioning entity, SAARC Development Fund is a functioning entity, and slowly but steadily the SAARC is moving forward to promote the cause of regional integration and regional cooperation. The four agreements signed at the Summit held in November at (Addu) Maldives, the SAARC Agreement on Rapid Responses to Natural Disaster, SAARC Agreement on Multilateral Arrangements on recognition of conformity assessment, SAARC Agreement on implementation of regional standards and SAARC Seed Bank Agreement are important milestones to greater economic interaction among the countries of the SAARC. But it has some distance to go to realise its full potential.

75. “Harnessing the positive contribution of South-South Cooperation for development of the Least Developed Countries (LDCs)” was the theme of the Conference of the Least Developed Countries (LDC) hosted by India in February. It was preparatory to the 4th Conference of the UN-LDC Conference which was held in Turkey in May. India was represented at this conference by the External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna.

IX

76. Superannuation led to attrition at the top echelons of the bureaucratic structure of the Ministry. The Foreign Secretary and three other Secretaries superannuated during the year. Shri Ranjan Mathai replaced Mrs. Nirupama Rao as Foreign Secretary. Shri Sanjay Singh replaced Ms. Viajaya Latha Reddy as Secretary (East) and Shri M. Ganapathi succeeded Shri Vivek Katju as Secretary (West). Shri Sudhir Vyas took over as Secretary (ER) on the superannuation of Shri Manbir Singh. On the appointment of Shri Jayant Prasad as Ambassador to Nepal, Pinak R. Chakravarty took over as Special Secretary (PD).

X

small measure. The Arab world has been in turmoil because of the upsurge of latent democratic aspirations among the people who ironically had never tasted democracy in their history, but found the taste of autocracy rather nauseating and cried for change. The Tsunami in Japan had a devastating impact on millions of people. The Fukushima nuclear disaster put in jeopardy the future of nuclear energy as providing energy security and clean energy at that. The fear of a Fukushima like disaster, created a sudden aversion for nuclear energy and in India too there has been public protests against nuclear energy. This creates new worries for the policy planners of nuclear energy sector as well as for those who looked up to this source as providing a guaranteed source of clean energy. This development puts a question mark on the investments that have already gone into putting up nuclear power plants and those in the pipeline for the future. One of the fundamental reasons for India securing civil nuclear energy cooperation with the United States and other countries in the last few years was to find this clean source of energy as a catalyst for rapid development in the years to come.

78. The ever deteriorating security situation in India’s neighbourhood particularly AF-Pak region is a great threat to “internal and external security which altogether can be viewed as the challenge of National Security”, the Prime Minister had said in his New Year message. The devastating waves of instability which unleash insecurity in the ocean of our hopes must be overpowered and not allowed to torpedo our efforts to find a secure future for our people. This is the challenge with which the Indian foreign policy planners had been grappling for quite some time. But security or insecurity is an international phenomena and not a one-country concern in today’s globalised world where the forces of insecurity have assumed international ramifications. The Prime Minister in his New Year message has given a call to inherent will and skill of the people of India to remain united despite grave provocations from extremists and terrorists. “They have not lost faith in our plural, secular and inclusive democracy. Across the world the people look to India for inspiration. Our model for inclusive growth in an Open Society inspires those who seek freedom from tyranny”, said the Prime Minister in his New Year message.

I would like to invite the External Affairs Minister to make his opening remarks and thereafter he will be happy to take a few questions.

External Affairs Minister (Shri S.M. Krishna): Friends from Media, Good morning to all of you.

At the outset, I would like to convey my greetings and very best wishes to you and members of your families for the year 2011.

As you are aware, 2010 was an eventful year in which Indian diplomacy scored on many fronts. We had intensive and productive high-level exchanges, to build synergies and deepen partnerships with friendly countries, both to our East and West, besides of course, our neighbourhood, which has always been a foreign policy priority. I would like to reiterate that the objective of Indian diplomacy is to foster an international environment which is conducive to our economic growth, strengthens our security and enhances our strategic options.

But MEA's activities are not restricted to external diplomacy alone. There is another and equally important dimension of looking after the interests of the common man or aam adami. Our youthful and aspirational population, representing a large and educated middle class, is taking excellent advantage of better connectivity and mobility, to travel abroad in ever increasing numbers. Over 11 million Indians travelled abroad in 2009 as against 4.42 million in 2000. They naturally expect and deserve efficient and quick services.

My Ministry's most public face is the passport office. We currently have 37 of them across the country. There are over 50 million Indian passport holders. Over five million passports are issued every year. This gives us an idea of the scale of the operations for issuing passports. In order to provide our citizens a world class service, we are in the process of completely transforming the manner in which passports are issued. Earlier in 2010, we started the Passport Seva Project which brings together the best of technology, government and the private sector. Seventy seven Passport Seva Kendras (PSKs) and 14 mini PSKs will be set up all over the country gradually in three phases. This will triple the number of passport counters to 1250, making the process of applying for passports convenient. PSKs in Bengaluru, Mangalore, Hubli, Chandigarh and some other places are already operational. Site selection for over 25 PSKs has been completed for Andhra Pradesh, Tamil Nadu and Kerala.

I have also mandated my officers to bring down the number of pending passport applications. Two main reasons for pendency of passport applications are incomplete applications and the lead time in securing police verification. My Ministry is introducing a practice of monthly Passport Adalats at all the 37 passport offices across India to speed up the process of issuance of passports. The first batch of Adalats will take place tomorrow. We are also committing additional manpower and technical resources to assist in this endeavour.

By the same token, we have now some 25 million people of Indian origin living and working abroad in the Gulf, UK, USA, Canada and Australia, among over 110 countries across the globe. They make significant contribution to the countries of their adoption, as well as to India, by building bridges in the knowledge sector and bringing investment and remittances. The cross-section of Indian community abroad includes technocrats, industrialists, businessmen, students and skilled and unskilled workers. I am happy and proud to note that the Indian diaspora is diligent, law-abiding and has seamlessly assimilated in the countries of domicile. Yet they do face occasional difficulties when they need my Ministry to provide them every possible and speedy assistance.

Take the case of unrest in Kyrgyzstan last June in which more than a hundred Indian students were affected. Our small Embassy in Bishkek rose to the occasion and arranged quick and safe evacuation of the students to Bishkek, their lodging and boarding and onward journeys back home.

On my instructions, a new Parliament and VIP Division has just been set up in the Ministry, to deal with all the important issues relating to MEA that come up in the Parliament or are raised by Hon'ble Members of Parliament with me. The Division would ensure that such issues are handled promptly and efficiently.

India is fortunate to have the second largest Muslim population in the world. Every Muslim dreams of undertaking Haj pilgrimage at least once in life time. One of the significant public responsibilities of my Ministry pertains to facilitation of this pilgrimage. In 2010 a record number of over 1,71,000 pilgrims went to Haj from India to Saudi Arabia. We managed to streamline the systems and arrangements, introduce transparency, efficiency and objectivity. Passports, accommodation, medical facilities and travel were arranged for the pilgrims. Nearly 900 flights were organized. For the first time ever, elections were held for zonal representatives of the Haj Committee. Here I would like to specially thank the Government of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia for their unstinted support in facilitating Haj pilgrimage by Indian citizens.
Let me now briefly turn to some of the recent and anticipated developments in our foreign relations.

In South Asia, the 25 year old SAARC process is maturing and gaining greater salience. Discharging our responsibilities in an asymmetrical and non-reciprocal manner, India has contributed pro-actively to initiating most of the major SAARC programmes and projects. The South Asia University in Delhi began its first academic session in 2010. Such initiatives, including in the spheres of connectivity and people-to-people relations, have served to catalyze intra-regional engagement as well as our bilateral relationships. We would like to see SAARC contribute more robustly to our vision of building a peaceful and prosperous neighbourhood.

India seeks cordial, cooperative and friendly ties with all its neighbours and would remain steadfast in this pursuit. We are very clear that first and foremost, every attention has to be paid to our immediate neighbourhood, as our destinies are interlinked. I am pleased that this sentiment is amply reciprocated with most of our neighbours. In successive public opinion surveys in Afghanistan, for example, India has consistently been rated very highly by the people of Afghanistan. This is a reflection of how India-assisted projects, worth US$ 1.3 billion, are changing the lives of ordinary Afghans. As you know, I will be paying an official visit to Afghanistan from tomorrow.

The resettlement of the Internally Displaced Persons in Sri Lanka has been high on our priority. During my visit to Sri Lanka last November, I inaugurated the pilot project of building 1,000 houses near Jaffna for resettlement of IDPs, as also the railway line project at Medhawachiya. I also inaugurated our Consulates General in Jaffna and Hambantota which, I am confident, will greatly enhance people-to-people contacts between our two countries. We continue to urge the Government of Sri Lanka to initiate a structured dialogue with all communities, especially the Tamils and other minority communities, to address the issues that concern their future.

Our relationships with Bangladesh, Myanmar and the Maldives have witnessed an upward swing over the last several months. As a close and friendly neighbour, India remains committed to the successful completion of peace process and establishment of multi-party democracy in Nepal. Last year also saw a further consolidation of our traditionally strong relations with Bhutan.

With Pakistan, as the Prime Minister has repeatedly said, we stand ready to resolve all outstanding issues through a peaceful dialogue. We expect Pakistan to fulfill its repeated assurances given to us at the highest level to not allow the territory under its control for fomenting terrorism aimed against us, and to bring the perpetrators of the Mumbai terrorist attack to justice expeditiously. I have extended an invitation to my counterpart to visit India and earnestly hope that we can take the process of dialogue forward.

In our quest for enhanced energy security and greater regional cooperation, we signed on December 11, 2010 at Ashgabat agreements related to Turkmenistan-Afghanistan-Pakistan-India (TAPI) gas pipeline project, during the TAPI Summit. The project involving construction of the 1680 kms pipeline, at an estimated cost of US$ 7.6 billion in 2008, is expected to be completed by 2015. Besides making available 3.2 billion cubic feet of gas daily to three recipient countries, the initiative would also become an important confidence building measure among our countries and enhance mutually beneficial economic linkages.

We will continue to pursue our 'Look East Policy' with vigour during the year, which should see finalization of our comprehensive economic partnership arrangements with Japan and Malaysia as well as a Free Trade Agreement in Services and Investments with ASEAN. I am pleased that the Comprehensive Economic Partnership Agreement, which was operationalized with the Republic of Korea on 1st January last year, has led to a 50% rise in bilateral trade in 2010, to about US$ 18 billion. Early this year we look forward to welcoming President Yudhoyono of Indonesia - a strategic partner and traditional friend with which we have shared two millennia of close cultural and commercial ties. I am also pleased that the initiative to establish Nalanda University saw significant progress last year, including in the form of passage of the necessary Act by Parliament.

India will continue to actively engage China across a spectrum of issues in 2011. The high level exchanges in 2010 lent stability and ballast to one of India's most important and complex relationships. We have agreed that as strategic partners, we will enhance all round cooperation in areas including trade and commerce, science and technology and people-to-people exchanges while also tackling the areas of divergence.

The Gulf region is another major partner of India and we significantly enhanced high level exchanges last year. Prime Minister's visit to Saudi Arabia and the conclusion of the "Riyadh Declaration" put in place "a new era of strategic partnership" between our countries. India's two-way trade with the Gulf has soared to US Dollar 107 billion making the region our largest trading partner. Some 6 million Indians live and work in the Gulf region. We will remain focused on expanding our engagement with the region.

India is not only keeping her historic links with Africa intact, but also revitalizing the relationship by adding a larger dimension of economic cooperation. We will host a Ministerial level conference of 49 Least Developed Countries (LDCs), which include 33 African countries. The second India Africa Forum Summit will also take place later this year in an African nation. Our African partners are undertaking a consensual decision on the timing and venue of the summit.

Looking westwards, relations with Russia remain a strategic priority of our foreign policy. Russia is our time-tested partner and we now characterise our friendship as a 'special and privileged' strategic partnership. Prime Minister should be visiting Russia this year for the traditional annual Summit meeting, which would build on the concrete and substantive outcomes in key areas achieved last year consequent to the visits of Prime Minister Putin and President Medvedev to India.

India and the United States have in the recent years built a strong global strategic partnership. President Obama’s visit in November has elevated our relationship to a qualitatively new level. We attach high importance to our partnership, both in the pursuit of achieving India’s national development goals and for advancing global peace, stability and progress.

Prime Minister’s participation in the annual India-European Union (EU) Summit in December 2010 paved the way for broader engagement with the EU. It was agreed that negotiations for a Broad-Based Trade and Investment Agreement would be concluded by the spring of this year. This Agreement would increase bilateral trade from around Euro 52 billion to Euro 100 billion over the next few years. A Joint Declaration for Cooperation on International Terrorism pointed to a more diversified engagement with EU.

International terrorism has been a core foreign policy concern for India for quite some time now. We have been victims of the most vicious kind of cross-border terror for over well two decades. It has had the backing of official agencies, and continues to be used against us as a political and economic weapon. Fortunately there is increasing realization today in the international arena that terrorism threatens the peace and security of the entire planet. India is working closely with her partners in improving sharing of information, countering terror finance and building capacity in our anti-terror mechanisms. Multilaterally, we piloted the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism at the UN. We continue our efforts to encourage early adoption of this long overdue Convention.

Given our unique experience in the fight against the menace of terrorism, the UN Security Council elected the day before yesterday (on 5th January) India’s Permanent Representative to the UN as the Chairperson of the Security Council Counter-Terrorism Committee (CTC), established in 2001. India will work to further strengthen the international legal framework for counter-terrorism and increase international cooperation in the area by all the UN member-states.
India joined the UN Security Council (UNSC) for a two-year term (2011-2012) on 1st January 2011, polling the highest number of votes - 187 out of 190 UN members present and voting. While being actively and constructively engaged on all issues before the Council, our focus will be on our immediate and extended neighbourhood and on issues such as counter-terrorism, peacekeeping and peace building. We will also continue our efforts for the much needed UNSC reforms. The second round of text-based negotiations started in the UN in December 2010. This can be safely called a "take-off" stage for the UNSC reform process and is a significant development after many years of meandering discussions on the issue.

These are some of the thoughts I wanted to share with you in our interaction at the very beginning of this year. I stop here and will be happy to take a few questions. Thank you.

Question: Since India has serious security concerns on Iran-Pakistan-India gas pipeline, what about the TAPI pipeline? Are you not concerned about the ability of Pakistani to provide security to TAPI pipeline?

External Affairs Minister: There are two issues whenever we look at a project of this kind. One is the cost analysis and the second is the security that is needed, especially in dealing with the countries that I mentioned. I am sure that all the countries are responsible countries and they know the kind of stakes - economic, political as well as security related - that are involved in it, and I am hopeful.

Question: When is your next meeting with the Foreign Minister of Pakistan? And also Pakistan has stopped export of onion on Wagha Border. Have you taken up the issue with them?

External Affairs Minister: Talking about the onions first, we are in touch with the Government of Pakistan. We have initiated talks. Before not too long we are hopeful that we will find a solution to this problem thereby easing the pressure within our country for onions.

With reference to the other question about the visit of the Foreign Minister of Pakistan, I have extended an invitation and the indication given to me by Foreign Minister Qureshi was that sometime in the first quarter of 2011 he would be visiting Delhi and we are looking forward to it.

Question: South Africa has been formally invited to join the BRIC group of countries. When do you expect it can formally become a full member? And what does India think about further expanding this group of countries?

External Affairs Minister: As members of the BRIC we did very carefully analyse the pros and cons of enlarging it. We needed a country from Africa which was left out in the BRIC and we found South Africa was willing to cooperate with us. As a result of that there was an overwhelming consensus in favour of inviting South Africa to join BRIC.

Question: Could you say what you would like to be on the agenda when Mr. Qureshi comes to Delhi? Also, are you taking this one meeting at a time or do you hope this would be the first in a series of meetings over the course of the year? And if so, do you have any other tentative plan for that in the future?

External Affairs Minister: The Prime Minister is very very clear and we would like to engage Pakistan in a dialogue and there is no other alternative other than talking to Pakistan, keeping them engaged, and thereby sorting out the outstanding issues. When I was in Islamabad, there were a number of issues about which there was similarity of thinking. I am sure that that process will continue as and when Foreign Minister Qureshi comes to India.

Question: Sir, you talked about the passports, the new initiatives that you are taking. I just wanted to ask, when would Delhi get its new passport offices? Secondly, on the issue of Quattrocchi just yesterday the lower court observed that there seemed to be mala fide intentions in Government not letting the case go ahead against him. So, keeping the Tribunal's Order in mind do you think his extradition should be sought all over again?

External Affairs Minister: The issue of extradition is a decision which is taken by the concerned Ministry. Only when a request is made after a decision is arrived at by the line Ministry, it is routed through the Ministry of External Affairs for extradition. So, as and when things happen we are willing to process it.

About the Passport Seva Kendra in Delhi, I am hopeful that by about June this year we should be able to get it going.

Question: Sir, you are leaving for Afghanistan you said. What deliberations will you have in Kabul? Looking at the terrorism scenario and the threat to our High Commission there, what talks will you have with your counterpart there?

External Affairs Minister: It is a fact that our Consulates and our High Commission are under constant attack in Kabul. As a result of these attacks we have lost precious Indian lives. We are working with the Government of Afghanistan so that they give our Consulates and our High Commission enough protection so that there are not going to be any more casualties.

Question: Mr. Foreign Minister, it is almost a year now since our Prime Minister has visited India. What about your Prime Minister or the Foreign Minister going to Bangladesh? Is such a visit in the ofing?

External Affairs Minister: I think 2011 is the year for such visits. For these visits we are trying to work out mutual dates.
Question: Sir, with regard to the visit of Foreign Minister Qureshi to India you said that he has indicated he will come in the first quarter of this year. But given how things ended last July in Islamabad, do you think that there needs to be some work done literally from scratch again? Will there be other meetings perhaps of the Foreign Secretaries or Joint Secretaries before Mr. Qureshi gets here, because you have to go back to drawing board?

External Affairs Minister: Let us remind ourselves that even before Foreign Minister Qureshi and I met in Islamabad there have been a number of interactions between our Foreign Secretary and the Foreign Secretary of Pakistan. So, before Foreign Minister Qureshi comes into India I am sure that it is in the fitness of things that the two Foreign Secretaries meet and clear the ground for a very productive meeting at the level of Foreign Ministers.

Question: Sir, going back to the question on your Kabul visit, is there any current review of the kind of threat perception to the Indian Mission or the staff working in Afghanistan? And you will be meeting Mr. Baburam Bhattarai and Ms Sujata Koirala this afternoon. There were recent reports of China interfering with the parliamentary process in Nepal to the extent of actually pumping in money and buying MPs in a way. Is that an issue that concerns you that you would like to address?

External Affairs Minister: Yes, I am meeting Mr. Baburam Bhattarai in the next two hours. Nepal is a friendly country. We want a broad consensus for a political process there so that they would be in a position to write the Constitution. India is certainly keeping close contact with Nepal because of our civilisational and historical ties with that country. We wish them well.

On the question of review of threat perception, it is a threat which is there all the time. So, we are keeping the Government of Afghanistan informed of whatever threats that we get at our Embassy.

Question: Sir, Iran has said that they are ready to do business with India in Rupees. If they do it that way, then Indian exports to Iran can increase in exchange of energy. And, Sir, there is just a small question about you. Would you like to continue this work or given a choice would you like to take up bigger challenges?

External Affairs Minister: I think you have been very very sweet in putting that question to me. ‘Bigger challenges’ I like that. I think speculation is the exclusive prerogative of the ladies and gentlemen that I see in front of me. So, you keep speculating, we keep reading it, we keep watching it, and then take things as they come along. Ultimately, I think it is the Prime Minister's prerogative. As a Constitutional Law student as one who was teaching Constitutional Law, I am sure I know it.
On the question related to Iran, depending upon the banking regulations of our own country, that will be taken care of.

Question: Does this mean that India-Iran-Pakistan pipeline is off now completely?

External Affairs Minister: Did I give that impression?

Question: You did not. But you were talking about TAPI. So, I am asking will we have both or is it off?

External Affairs Minister: The negotiations are going on; the talks are going on; and it is in the initial process. I think we will proceed.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much.

002. Speech made by Special Secretary (Public Diplomacy) Jayant Prasad at the Workshop on Science, Diplomacy and Policy at the National Institute of Advanced Studies and American Association for the Advancement of Sciences.

Bangalore, January 12, 2011.

Professor Ramamurthy and distinguished participants,

I feel privileged to be in Bangalore to participate in this workshop on Science, Diplomacy and Policy. The National Institute of Advanced Studies and the American Association for the Advancement of Science have done well to focus on this issue, as science, technology, and innovation have become the core themes of the India-U.S. relationship. Indeed, these were some of the key areas of potential cooperation identified during President Obama’s visit to India in November 2010. These are becoming key instruments of India’s diplomacy, as they already are for the United States.

I am especially delighted to find myself in the company of Dr. Paula Dobrianski, who had pioneered the global issues dialogue with India in the early years of the last decade in her capacity as the Under Secretary of State for Democracy and Global Affairs. She will be happy, I am sure, with the considerable progress we have made since those days on the issues we had commenced our discussions on under her watch.
The link between science and diplomacy

As in all aspects of human life, and in inter and intra-State relations, science and technology are impacting profoundly on diplomacy. They have done this in two ways: first, through the impact of scientific advances on the conduct of diplomacy; and second, through the newer tools science has made available to diplomacy to nurture more constructive relationships between and among nations.

In a recent study, Skyful of Lies and Black Swans, the Chief Presenter of BBC, Nick Gowing, describes how “institutions of power” - both governments and corporates - are today typically ill-equipped to handle the onslaught of the new media, with its contracted timelines of immediate public impact and the shortening of news and information cycles. The public are now aware of what is happening on the ground before or simultaneously with official agencies, leaving governments little reaction time. This, in turn, is denting public confidence, and eroding the capacity of statecraft and diplomacy to effectively deal with challenges to State authority and legitimacy. Nineteenth century practices of diplomacy cannot meet twenty-first century challenges. This, however, is not an issue I shall address in my further remarks, other than to suggest that governments have to learn new ways of shaping the public discourse, including through greater openness, transparency and accountability.

Our focus, in the workshop, is how best to make use of science, which is the Latin word for knowledge, and technology, which is a form of concentrated capital, in the daily practice of communication and negotiations between representatives of States. Science can help the art of diplomacy, to work for mutual benefit, for promoting peace, stability and prosperity, and for resolving global, regional or bilateral issues amicably, without resorting to sanctions or the use of force. Based on the postulate that scientific and technological advances increasingly shape international relations, the workshop is about how States can get together to tackle issues such as poverty, climate change, and inclusive growth and development, by leveraging instruments that simply did not exist in an earlier era.

The public policy challenge

We are going to face challenges of staggering proportions in the coming decades. By 2050, the world will have 9 billion people, creating pressures on fresh water, proteins, energy, and other resources. Meanwhile, current global and national imbalances will invariably contribute to conflict and violence, manifesting around racial, ethnic or religious lines. National demands will have to be balanced within sustainable limits. How do we do this? One answer is, the same way as human beings have progressed since the European renaissance through to the industrial revolution and afterwards, by increases in productivity, brought about by the application of science and technology to production processes. That might provide a partial answer, at best.

Another option is to lower expectations and reduce consumption. This will be difficult. Of the current world population of nearly 7 billion, an estimated 1.2 billion live on less than $1 per day, and 3 billion on less than $2 a day. About 44% of Indians do not have access to commercially available energy. The aspirations of these have-nots are rising. Aggregate global consumption levels are therefore unlikely to decline, and in fact, much more likely to increase substantially.

While we pursue low energy consumption growth models, our collective genius must focus on our one remaining option: a new ethic of multilateral cooperation, based on more responsive governance within and across nations. Massive commitments are required to reduce poverty and hunger and redress the impact of climate change. This needs energised international cooperation and a better balance between the surplus and deficit countries through investments in infrastructure, energy and environment-friendly technologies. It also needs a commitment to build new national and international partnerships and human resource development for delivering the required public goods at an accelerated pace. Science or knowledge-based diplomacy can play a critical role in pursuing such cooperation.

In the multilateral arena, the most interesting United Nations-led initiative for science-based diplomacy began with a mandate from its Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) to UNCTAD in 2001. ECOSOC asked UNCTAD to develop special programmes and organise workshops to train diplomats, scholars and journalists in science diplomacy to assist developing countries, in particular, the least developed amongst them, in international negotiations for the evolving norms on standards setting. These programmes have helped developing country representatives in conducting negotiations on technical issues in which they have vital stakes, such as trade-related intellectual property rights, the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, the Convention on Biological Diversity, and the Convention to Combat Desertification, resource management, and generally in the area of multilateral trade and climate change negotiations. These Conventions are also examples of how scientists and members of civil society have participated in global norm setting and rule making on important issues of global governance.

As a latecomer to rapid development, over the past two decades in particular, India has shown herself to be dynamic, flexible and innovative. She will also remain demographically well endowed well into the twenty-first century. Favourable factors for continued rapid growth are available at this present, transient moment, but on condition that India harness the younger generation as productive members of the workforce. This will be critically predicated on India’s ability both to educate and train this burgeoning young population and provide them gainful employment. The scale and rapidity of economic change have generated uneven development and inequalities. There have been exceptional rewards for those who use their capital and skills to take advantage of the new opportunities. But many, especially those outside the organised economy, have been left beyond the ambit of the transforming landscape. A very special effort is, therefore, required to make India’s growth stable, sustainable, equitous, and inclusive, and bring into the development processes a fourth of the population that is currently on the periphery.

The hallmarks of India’s inclusive growth and development strategy, which have a direct bearing on its foreign policy, include:

- A quest for rapid growth for wealth-creation for our peoples in order to bring to them the fruits of development – particularly education, health and social security; Pursuit of a growth model that creates employment and equal opportunities, and that is regionally balanced and sustainable; Construction of a modern, knowledge and science-based society; and Achievement of the development objectives within a democratic framework and through responsive governance.

The key government initiatives have naturally followed these priorities. In education, the Sarva Shiksha Abhiyan and the Right to Education Act to universalise access to education; in health, the Rashtriya Swasthya Bima Yojana and the Janani Suraksha Yojana, to provide greater healthcare access and improved maternal and child health; the National Rural Employment Guarantee Act and the Food Security Act for employment and nutrition for the poor; a National Action Plan for Climate Change and National Solar Mission for energy security; and the Right to Information Act and unique identity numbers to improve the reach of welfare schemes and services, including banking. These priorities are reflected also in India’s emerging development partnerships.

How science or knowledge plays a part in India’s overseas programmes can perhaps be best illustrated through our experience in Afghanistan. We have hed an important role in that country’s reconstruction over the past nine years. Our financial commitments are substantial for a non-traditional donor. Our expanding development partnership covers all parts of Afghanistan and the entire gamut of development activities. In response to the requirements of the Afghan people, as conveyed to us by their representatives at the district, provincial and national levels, we are building everything from toilets to transmission lines. These activities span four broad areas: humanitarian assistance, infrastructure projects, quick gestation small development projects (SDPs), and capacity-building and skills development.

On the humanitarian side, we run five medical missions that provide free medical care and medicines to the poor. About a third of the 6.2 million children in school, of whom 38% are girls, have been getting, for the past five years, 100 grams of Indian high protein biscuits as part of WFP’s Nutrition Supplement Programme, which is a big incentive to draw young children to school.

The SDPs, which are projects conceived, proposed and implemented by Afghans in the provinces and districts, lie at the heart of the Indian development model in Afghanistan. These carry a modest budget ranging generally between $100-500,000 each, with a cap of $1 million, and bring direct and tangible benefit to the people. While the majority of the projects supported have been in the social sector, for building schools, clinics and public health centres, of late they have included micro-hydels, small irrigation, and solar electrification projects. We have implemented 50 SDPs since 2008, from the Wakhan corridor in Badakhshan in the North to Kandahar in the South, and 50 more projects are in the pipeline.

In more recent years, our greatest emphasis has been on human resource development, predicated on the belief that only the Afghans can take care of Afghanistan. We cannot develop Afghanistan. We can only help create an enabling environment for Afghans to develop themselves.

India has the largest programme in Afghanistan to train Afghan public servants abroad in specialized institutions, in the same institutions where Indian public servants are trained, and each year 675 Afghans come to India for this. Many of them go to technical institutions for IT programmes, or for auditing, accounting, financial management, and areas of applied science and technology. And we have the biggest university scholarship programme in Afghanistan, enabling its students to obtain undergraduate and post-graduate degrees in India – also 675 a year, and of which the number of women has been steadily increasing. There are at least five Afghan women scholarship holders currently studying medicine at the prestigious Lady Harding Medical College, and a growing number of women students in universities all over India. Our role in Afghanistan, thus, goes beyond the financial aspect of expending development funds. Our unique selling proposition is building institutions and developing human resources. Our massive training and scholarship programmes have begun to provide the country with a new generation of educated and skilled workforce.
Since in this workshop we are discussing science or knowledge-based diplomacy, I would like to share with you a specific innovative Indian project in Afghanistan, whose video-satellite hub is located not far from the NIAS campus in Bangalore, managed by the Indian telecommunications firm TCIL. This is a project providing telemedicine facilities between the Indira Gandhi Institute for Child Health (IGICH) in Kabul and two Indian super speciality post-graduate medical institutes in Lucknow and Chandigarh. It is part of a larger project set up by India for the SAARC countries to help improve healthcare delivery and promote medical education and exchanges between doctors in SAARC countries and Indian specialists. IGICH is the largest children’s hospital in Afghanistan, with 400-bed capacity. Besides tele-surgery and specialty referrals, the telemedicine applications include off-site radiological services, cardiac monitoring, and therapeutic education, particularly in the areas of public and environment health. A remarkable feature of this project is the modest expenditure incurred for what it does – just Rs. 21 million, equivalent to about $440,000, which includes the establishment cost, equipment, connectivity, and running expenses for a year. Indian projects in Afghanistan, with purchasing power parity allowing for lower materials and consultancy costs, show much more ‘bang for the buck’.

Another initiative devised by the Ministry of External Affairs with developing partner countries is the Indian Technical and Cooperation Programme (ITEC), centred on sharing experiences, transfer of technology, and capacity building. ITEC brings 5,000 professionals from our partner countries into Indian institutions for short-term training. One of the participating institutions is located not far from here, the Indian Institute of Science, which conducts an ITEC training programme on bio e-energy. ITEC also sends Indian experts to and sets up projects in developing countries, responding to their specific needs. In addition to its programme for Afghan students, the Indian Council for Cultural Relations brings in over 1,500 students from other developing countries to India on scholarship, 24% of whom are pursuing academic programmes in science including agricultural science, and engineering.

India is currently engaged in rolling out a programme that has generated remarkable resonance in Africa, the Pan-African e-Network project. This will link one major university and one major hospital from each from participating countries to counterpart Indian institutions. The connectivity has been offered to 53 countries, of which 47 are setting up or using the network. The tele-education coverage under this project will result in 2,000 students from Africa annually accessing e-courses offered by selected India universities.

Prospects of India-U.S. cooperation

There is considerable scope for pursuing science or knowledge-based diplomacy between India and the United States. There are few countries in the world with which India shares such basic identity of values and interests as with the United States. We have plural, tolerant, secular, and democratic societies. Our scientific engagement was modest in size but significant in its impact in the years immediately following India’s Independence, even when our political relations were not what they are today. This cooperation resulted in the establishment of the Indian Institute of Technology in Kanpur exactly half a century ago, as also the National Council for Educational Research and Training and India’s agricultural universities, which became the progenitors of the Green Revolution and helped India emerge from her ‘ship-to-mouth’ existence. The United States also contributed to the initial phase of our civilian space and atomic energy programmes. A few words, in this context, on the current India-U.S. Science and Technology agenda will not, therefore, be out of place.

The key areas of cooperation can be clustered under three broad groupings. First, are the high-technology and dual-purpose areas, nuclear, space, biotechnology, nano-technology, and defence and counter-terrorism materials and technologies. Under this cluster, the impediments to growing the partnership are being dismantled, beginning with the India-U.S. Agreement on Civil Nuclear Cooperation. During his visit to New Delhi, President Obama indicated that the United States will now work to integrate India into the technology control regimes: the Nuclear Suppliers Group, the Missile Technology Control Regime, the Wassenaar Arrangements, and the Australia Group for dual-purpose chemical precursors and feedstocks. Literally, the sky is the limit for such cooperation. And an example of it is NASA’s contribution to ISRO’s Chandrayan Project to land on the moon.

A second cluster is composed of areas that directly touch the lives of the people – agriculture, education, clean energy (including clean coal and carbon capture), clean water, sanitation, climate science, energy efficiency and renewable energy. Within these, there are issues that can be simultaneously addressed in the commercial domain, such as post-harvest technologies and facilitating collaborations to develop affordable products and services suited to the scales and levels of income in developing countries, including through frugal engineering, where India has growing expertise.

And finally, there exists the so far largely unexplored potential of third-country cooperation in areas like food security, healthcare, and skills development and capacity-building. For example, India and the United States can contribute together to the regeneration of Afghan agriculture. The task at hand is not complex. It requires financial support for certain inputs like seed and fertilizers, credit facilities for the farmers, together with quality extension work to be provided by Afghan agriculture scientists. The United States could provide the physical infrastructure for an Afghan agriculture university. India, which has faced and overcome a similar challenge in the past, and shares the agro-climatic and social conditions that prevail in Afghanistan, can provide the curriculum, the pedagogic materials, and teachers for such a project. While the new institution is being created, India can bridge the demand for expertise by training Afghan agriculture and rural credit experts, for which there is available capacity in Indian agriculture universities and rural credit institutions, such as NABARD. The basic assumption here is that, notwithstanding the differences in economic and scientific strengths between India and the United States, we are both knowledge-driven economies and our respective scientific and institutional strengths can be pooled together, with profit, in third countries.

Professor Ramamurthy conveyed to our Foreign Secretary that the aim of this workshop is to increase understanding of the power of science in diplomacy. Part of my current portfolio in the Ministry of External Affairs, in Public Diplomacy, besides increasing an understanding about India’s foreign and security policies for both foreign and domestic audiences, is to provide feedback to Government to improve policy formulation. What better can I do here other than to learn from the established practitioners of science-based diplomacy who are participating in this workshop? India is not a traditional donor country, and science has never been viewed by us as a core foreign policy concern. While we have pursued science-based initiatives in our interaction with fellow developing countries, we have to learn how precisely to mainstream science and technology in our growing development partnerships and assistance programmes. We also need to undertake an exercise in strategic planning and prioritisation in this domain. Such initiatives promise good rewards, for better articulation and implementation of science-based diplomacy and development initiatives will particularly resonate, in a positive way, with our partner countries, who share problems similar to the one’s faced by us.

Recommendations

I have concrete suggestions for further discussion among the experts present here, many of whom are established practitioners of science-based diplomacy and have contributed to our nuclear and space programmes and our energy and defence industries:

The Foreign Service Institute could consider instituting mid-level courses on making use of science and technology-based diplomacy, both for Indian foreign service officers and for diplomats and public servants from our partner countries, in collaboration with the Department of Science and Technology and NIAS. We could also get valuable inputs for this exercise from experts from AAAS.
India and the United States could explore possibilities of working together in third countries, beginning with Afghanistan.

India could accelerate trans-border science and technology-based initiatives under SAARC and other regional forum where India has membership to deal with cross-cutting trans-border challenges — such as management of pandemics and fragile eco systems, a case in point being the preservation of the unique delta and mangroves of the Sunderbans, and the Biosphere, Forest and Tiger Reserve shared between India and Bangladesh.

India could greatly enlarge its current programme of skills development and capacity-building, which is a cost-effective and efficient way to help our partner countries develop themselves.

“The ascent of man”, the eminent scientist, J. Bronowski, reminded us in 1973, “is always teetering in the balance.” He said so in the context of the danger of disjunction between knowledge and ethics, between knowledge and integrity, and between knowledge and the idea of civilisational progress. Science is neutral in value: it has been the motor for innovative technologies that have transformed the world. We can use it too, more pro-actively than we have done so far, as an instrument of policy in our diplomatic practices, for forging better relationships, for the common public good and to improve the human condition. Our national leaders reflect and embrace this vision. We, therefore, have a great opportunity to harness our inventiveness to work together in this new area, bilaterally, in third countries, regionally and globally.

I thank you.
Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna in Lok Sabha on combating piracy.

New Delhi, March 11, 2011.

The Cabinet Committee on Security met today and considered proposals with regard to conduct of anti-piracy operations in the Gulf of Aden and off the Coast of Somalia.

The Committee approved a series of measures which will be taken by the Government of India to address the legal, administrative and operational aspects of combating piracy. A broad policy framework covering all these aspects was approved. This would involve actions that would be taken in the medium and long term by the Ministries of Shipping, External Affairs and Defence.

The Committee also specifically considered the immediate situation arising out from holding of Indian hostages by pirates. It noted that as of now 53 Indian seafarers remain in captivity on 5 different ships. The Committee expressed its sympathy with the families of the hostages, and decided that the Government would take all appropriate action to safeguard their welfare. It approved the following immediate steps:-

- Intensify diplomatic efforts through consultations with the Governments of Egypt and the UAE where the owners of concerned vessels reside, as well as with the Governments of other nationalities who are also being held as hostages and intensifying diplomatic efforts both at the multilateral level and within the framework of the United Nations.
- Stepping up of contacts with the owners of the vessels concerned.
- Establishing of Inter-ministerial Group under the chairmanship of the Cabinet Secretary. The Group will act as an apex forum at the Government of India level to monitor the early release of Indian ships or cargo or crew. The Group will also consider welfare measures necessitated after the release of hijacked Indian nationals.
- Formulation of suitable standard operating procedures for the Indian Navy and coordination of the Indian Navy's activities with the Navies of friendly foreign countries in the Gulf of Aden.

[A similar statement was made by Minister of State Mrs. Preneet Kaur in the Rajya Sabha]
On March 10, 2011 the following Press Release was also issued.

WITH the release of the RAK Afrika, held by Somali pirates with 11 Indian sailors among its crew, the number of Indian sailors held by Somali pirates is now 53. They have been seized during the capture of the following ships:-

MV Iceberg - Panamanian Flag
MV Suez - Panamanian Flag
MT Asphalt Venture - Panamanian Flag
MT Savina Caylyn - Italian Flag
MV Sinin - Panamanian Flag

The UN Security Council and the International Maritime Organisation (IMO) are working on prevention, guidance, reporting and cooperation to mitigate piracy. One Indian naval ship has been deployed in the Gulf of Aden to escort Indian shipping interests since 2008. Following recent incidents of pirate attacks closer to Indian western shores, the Indian Navy has increased its vigil and neutralized two pirate "mother ships" and captured 43 pirates.

The Directorate General of Shipping, Government of India has issued numerous advisories, circulars and notices on the recommended traffic corridors, protocol with Indian naval ships, precautions to be taken and areas to be avoided. It is also necessary for flag States to be accountable and persuade the ships owners to expedite conclusion of negotiations with pirates so that seafarers are released quickly.

The safety and security of Indians remains the priority of the Government. The nodal Indian agencies/Ministries dealing with the problem of piracy off the coast of Somalia are Ministry of Shipping [Director General, Shipping] and the Ministry of Defence [Indian Navy and Coast Guard]. The main point of contact with the ship owners is Director General, Shipping, who remains in constant touch with the owners/management of the ship in order to secure the release of Indian crew members. The Ministry of External Affairs comes into the picture where the ship owners/management is based in a foreign country. MEA in such cases has assisted by taking up the matter with local governments to expedite negotiations between the owners/management of the ship and the pirates.

As a result of such efforts, 21 Indian nationals held on merchant ships were released in 2008, 34 in 2009, 56 in 2010 and 13 in 2011 bringing the total number of sailors that have been released to 124. 53 Indian sailors who were crew members of hijacked ships seized by pirates are presently held in captivity.
6. In most cases, ships on which Indian crew members are held in captivity have crew members of other nationalities also. For instance, MV Iceberg has 9 Yemenis, 6 Indians, 1 Filipino, 4 Ghanians, 2 Sudanese and 2 Pakistanis, all held by the pirates. MV Suez has 6 Indians, 11 Egyptians, 4 Pakistanis and 1 Sri Lankan, all held by pirates.

7. In the case of all five ships that are presently held by pirates with Indian crew members, our Missions and Posts concerned have been in regular touch with the ship owners and with the Governments of countries, where these ship owners are based, to secure the release of our nationals. Director General, Shipping has continued his efforts to expedite steps by the owners of the ships to secure the release of our sailors from the pirates.

8. Our Ambassador in Cairo and Consul General in Dubai are also working energetically with their counterparts from other countries whose crew members have been held by the pirates in order to intensify efforts to secure the release of crew held in these ships, expeditiously.

004. Speech of Vice President M. Hamid Ansari delivering the "Annual Lecture-2011" of the Association of Indian Diplomats.

New Delhi, March 11, 2011.

The Challenges to Indian Diplomacy in the 21st Century

"This is one of those occasions when pleasure and apprehension come together: happiness at being with members of one’s own tribe, and misgivings about the responsibility assigned. Ambassador Satish Chandra and his colleagues on the Executive of the AID had something to do with it but, as the saying goes, from the hands of a friend a stone is an apple!

I am required to speak on the challenges to our diplomacy in the twenty first century. The difficulty I confront is with the audience! How do I lecture to a group most of whose members know as much about the subject as I do; some, in fact, know much more.

There is yet another problem that I have at times encountered in the recent past. It is summed up in an Iraqi proverb: 'When you speak, do not fear; when you fear, do not speak'. In what manner then do I speak and yet observe the etiquette and the ritual emanating from what a philosopher, in another context, called 'My Station and its Duties'?

Within these constraints, I shall endeavour to be as coherent as possible. I would focus on the next four decades till about the middle of the century since no projections can realistically be made beyond it now nor can we predict the impact on society and politics of scientific or technological innovations that may surface later in the century.

Diplomacy is the conduct of relations among political entities aimed at reconciliation and accommodation of viewpoints and interests. It is both a function and a determinant of international order. The task of the diplomat, to use a blunt 15th century expression, is to seek the preservation and aggrandizement of his own state.

Many in this audience would recall Bismarck's remark that players on the world stage travel on the stream of Time which they can neither create nor direct but upon which they can steer with more or less skill and experience. They would also remember the words of another realist, Henry Kissenger, who recommended 'patient accumulation of partial successes' as a desirable methodology.

Both dicta have relevance. Our own experience of over six decades as a player in the international arena would sustain it in good measure.

It is our stated objective to seek a global order that assures our interests, safeguards the autonomy of our decision-making, and is conducive to the achievement of rapid, sustained and inclusive development of the country. This necessitates policy that combines 'firm commitments to our core national values with dynamic adaptation to changes in the international environment'.

What then are our interests as a people and as a state? Primacy has to be accorded to social cohesion and territorial integrity. The post-independence decades have witnessed political, emotional and market integration in great measure. The much apprehended Balkanisation did not come about. Challenges nevertheless remain and in places have become acuter. A certain 'Balkanisation of the mind' has surfaced. It emanates from regionalism and pursuit of identity politics in the wake of the deepening of the democratic processes; it also arises out of non-inclusive development. Our inability to address these in sufficient measure allows space for sub-national, sectional and non-state actors with agendas that pose threats to social cohesion and national security. These in turn detract from our ability to perform in a fuller measure on the global stage.
The world today recognises our emerging role. Our assets are considerable; so are the expectations. Demography and the demographic mix give us an advantage over most others. By the year 2050 we would have a population of 1.8 billion, a labour force of one billion, and the second largest economy of the world. Our defence capabilities would grow proportionately. These together would position us for being a significant player in the multi-polar international system that is now taking shape.

The typology of threats faced by us since independence shape perceptions and may be viewed in three broad categories: (a) internal and ideological threats emanating from attempts to challenge the Constitution, its functioning, or its core values; (b) threats principally from neighbours and relating to territorial or water disputes; and (c) threats emerging from the global order and arrangements that threaten or could threaten our security, political or economic interests and thereby constrain our policy options.

It is evident that of these, the second and the third fall squarely in the domain of foreign policy and therefore of diplomacy. They would, nevertheless, be impacted upon by the dynamics of our societal forces, the strength of our economy, and our technological capability to meet increasing requirements in areas of food production, public health and energy in step with the imperative of inclusive development and human security. A quality deficit in performance, low levels of accountability in governance, and what has been called the ‘malpractice of democracy’, are handicaps that can and must be overcome. Diplomacy cannot overlook these domestic impulses.

Let us now look at the foreign policy challenges that are likely to confront us in the foreseeable future.

In the first place and in terms of geography, our immediate neighbourhood would be critical for regional stability and cooperation and the accretion of comprehensive national power by India. Asymmetry is a fact of life in South Asia and the history of conflict and animosity is deep and scarring. Our emergence as a global player is dependent in some measure on our ability to resolve or manage contentions to ensure a peaceful and secure neighbourhood, with meaningful economic, cultural and political ties. Would we be able and willing to give a stake in our development and growth to our neighbours, thereby helping them consolidate their state structures and ward-off centrifugal and destabilizing forces of terrorism, aggressive nationalism, secessionism and poor governance?

The need for unconventional policy options in implementing such an agenda need hardly be over-emphasised, especially while dealing with amorphous state and elite structures, pursuing ambiguous and opaque security objectives.
The second challenge would be the emergence of Asia, as probably the most important locus of global power. This has been called the Asian Century and the first decade has given ample evidence of the changing nature of global economic and financial flows and emerging geo-political dimensions. Indian diplomacy will have to deal with the architecture, mechanics and the implementation of Asian economic and security cooperation that is likely to bring together regional organisations such as ASEAN, Asian powers such as China, Japan, South Korea, Australia and Russia and outside powers such as the European Union and the US.

Our "Look East Policy" must transform into a "Move East Policy" of our economic, political and cultural engagement resulting in intense exchanges of goods, services, peoples and ideas. As we move to complete the noodle bowl of FTAs and CEPAs with the region, the next challenging phase would be to realise the vision of an Asian Economic Community with seamless connectivities. Community building and partnership in Asia through a transparent, inclusive and open process would best lead to an Asian awakening that benefits all constituents of the continent and all stakeholders.

The third challenge would be to create an enabling international environment for unhindered economic development and growth, including through mutually beneficial arrangements concerning raw materials and markets for goods and services. The hunt for resources - mineral, energy, agricultural and human - would only intensify in the years to come and would necessitate resource diplomacy focused on maintenance of stable international resource markets, their efficient regulation and safety of related transport and shipping lanes. It should reasonably insulate functioning resource markets from intervention of state actors. Indian economic diplomacy would also be called upon to manage political risks involved in international trade, business and investments for Indian business; facilitate the movement of Indian human resources across business and sovereign jurisdictions; and attract foreign investments, technology and expertise to the country.

The fourth challenge is to foster a rule based international order underpinned by strong and functioning multilateral institutions. Security, economic development, stability and public welfare would increasingly be indivisible in a globalising world. An effective multilateralism premised on intense engagement and dialogue between a plurality of actors is the best institutional guarantee in an increasingly multi-polar world beset with global problems - whether on terrorism, natural disasters, global warming and environmental issues, pandemics or financial and economic crises.

The institutional architecture of global governance, however, is still an anomaly reflecting post-World War II and Cold War perceptions. Indian diplomacy is actively involved in initiating the process of making the international order reflective of contemporary realities through reforms in the United Nations system and the Bretton Woods institutions. It would be called upon to manage this process in tune with our interests and take the process to fruition, carefully balancing power and principle.

The fifth challenge is to evolve a consensual approach, along with all major and minor powers, of dealing with the regimes regulating global commons. We would need to articulate our role in fashioning, maintaining and implementing these regimes in accordance with our national interests. The global commons of the sea, air, space, Polar Regions and the cyber world are global public goods and our willingness and capability to contribute to their security, growth and stability, as per common but differentiated responsibilities, would only grow in future.

A sixth challenge is the requirement to respond in real time to unanticipated happenings, political, economic or environmental and to have at hand the intellectual and organisational resources to do so adequately.

Our diplomacy would have to maintain our strategic autonomy of action and policy while dealing with the accretion of national power and the calls by other state and non-state actors for "responsibility" in exercising it. It would, by its actions, pronouncements and conduct, have to carefully meander through the twin banks of state sovereignty and global order, of recognised multilateralism and selective coalition building, of universal equity and hard national interest.

This audience knows only too well that the practice of diplomacy is characterised by continuity and change: continuity of some aspects of its methodology amidst an ever changing content. On methodology, Richelieu's dictum about the need 'to negotiate continuously, directly as well as in more devious ways and in all places' would hold good for all times.

Representation is central to the process of diplomacy. The world of the 21st Century would increasingly be poly-centric and multi-layered, necessitating diplomatic representation at various levels and with the state, multilateral and non-state actors of relevance. As this process gathers momentum, our Foreign Office and diplomats would need to deal with two distinct stakeholders:

- Internally, with a multitude of other state and sub-state agencies with external interests, wishing to exercise diplomatic and quasi-diplomatic functions;

- Externally, with new non-state actors engaged in diplomacy-like functions.

The first problem of representation is the need for the external competencies of different government departments to be well integrated with our bilateral and multilateral diplomatic structures and mechanisms. This is particularly true of Ministries of Defence, Finance, Home, Commerce and Industry, Petroleum, Coal, Mines, Agriculture, Water Resources, Human Resource Development, Atomic Energy and Space. The same would hold for the state governments that are looking for enhanced international exposure and official presence outside India, with unique branding for purposes of attracting tourists, capital, technology and expertise.

States that are in border areas have a natural cultural and economic interest in our foreign policy orientation towards our neighbours. Furthermore, changes in the international situation are impelling state governments to seek some form of diplomatic representation. Policy areas that fall within their jurisdiction such as environment, agriculture, public health, transportation, law and order, and culture are increasingly coming under the ambit of multilaterally negotiated conventions and regimes. Thus, for example, state governments would be called upon to devise and implement the bulk of the adaptation and mitigation strategies under Climate Change related Environmental Agreements. Likewise, FTA and CEPA agreements entered into with other nations or regional organisations, or commitments made under WTO agreements, impose obligations and constraints in areas of jurisdiction of state governments.

Thus, Indian diplomacy would have to creatively deal with the pressures for such sub-State Diplomacy and devise means to address the concerns and facilitate achievement of the objectives of our state governments. While the Ministry's institutional response has been to open Branch Offices in a few State Capitals, a more robust institutional and systemic response rooted in mandatory dialogue and consultation mechanisms with sub-national territorial units might need to be crafted for the purpose.

The second problem of representation, in its external dimension, is more problematic. Classical diplomacy has been the exclusive preserve and domain of nation-states. As we survey the practice of diplomacy worldwide, we observe that the departure from the classical definition is very definitive. A range of new non-state actors have emerged on the global scene to engage in diplomatic or quasi-diplomatic activities to further their objectives. These include NGOs focused on environment, human rights and labour issues, international sports bodies, professional federations, business and multinational corporations and academic institutions.

Our diplomacy would have to find means of representation with, and access to, these new actors and engage with them to defend and promote our national interests. Traversing these uncharted waters would be tricky and would have to be carefully calibrated in view of the strong linkages of many of them with Indian civil society and NGOs, Indian business and industry, our Pravasi Bharatiya Community, and our polity and economy.

In a delectable quote, the late Mr. Y.D. Gundevia cited Jawaharlal Nehru's remark that that India's foreign policy 'was so simple that even an Ekkawala in Lucknow could claim to understand it'. Mr. Gundevia added, more substantively, that India was not in any country's orbit but was rotating on its own axis as part of the great galaxy of nations.

Interestingly enough, a report on Global Trends 2025 published in 2008 by the National Intelligence Council of the United States had this to say about India:

"India's growing international confidence, derived primarily from its economic growth and its successful democratic record, now drives New Delhi towards partnerships with many countries. However, these partnerships are aimed at maximising India's autonomy, not at aligning India with any country or international coalition."

As in the past, it will be the job of Indian diplomacy to explain our axis to the world and to our citizens. Our Ambassadors, true to their calling would remain, in the words of Nizam ul Mulk, ‘generally censorious and always on the look out to see what faults and what virtues there are’ in the nations to which they are assigned.

I thank Amb. Satish Chandra and the Association of Indian Diplomats for inviting me today."
005. Keynote Address by Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao on 'Women in Public Service' at the DRDO Workshop on "Worldwide Women's Leadership and Critical Success Factors for R&D".

New Delhi, March 16, 2011.

Dr. Arun Kumar, Outstanding Scientist and Director, Personnel

Ms. Akila Krishnakumar, Country Head & COO M/s Sungard Technology Services

Dr. V.K. Saraswat, SA to RM, Secretary, Defence R&D and

Ms. Alka Suri, Chairperson, Women's Cell, DRDO Hqrs

I am extremely pleased to be present here at the inaugural session of the workshop on "Worldwide Women's Leadership and Critical Success Factors for Research and Development" organized by the Defence Research and Development Organisation (DRDO).

Let me briefly speak about the importance of DRDO in developing comprehensive military capabilities before I move to the subject of 'women in public service' in view of the theme of this years' workshop.

The country is proud of the contributions made by our scientists of the Defence Research and Development Organisation (DRDO). Through individual brilliance and outstanding team work they have come up with products of great scientific and technological distinction, often achieved against considerable odds given the international restrictions that were in place for several decades.

DRDO has over the past five decades made its mark in diverse fields, from the development of our Integrated Missile Development Programme, the Main Battle-Tank, the Light Combat Aircraft, the BRAHMos Missile to a number of other systems essential for the country’s strategic deterrence capabilities. Our armed forces are better poised to defend our country in diverse terrains, be it mountain or desert warfare, due to equipment designed and developed by DRDO. A number of the products developed by DRDO have also found commercial use in the civilian sectors of our economy.

While India is committed to building an environment of peace and cooperation with all our neighbours and we have no desire to engage in any arms race that would divert resources from the developmental priorities, it is important for a large country like ours to develop comprehensive military capabilities. The DRDO has played a crucial role as part of our indigenous efforts on critical technologies of strategic value where the country has no option but to rely on its own efforts.

The DRDO is a centre of national excellence with over 30,000 scientific and technical personnel, of which about 14% are women. It brings together our best scientific minds. I am confident that it will rise to the challenges of the future to make our nation truly proud of its achievements.

Let me now turn to the issue of women in public service. A few days back on 8 March, we celebrated the first centenary of the International Women's day. Debates on the level and progress in empowerment and advancement of women have been held regularly by the government, media and civil society alike.

When we consider the issue of women empowerment we realize that it commences from the basic unit of human life - the family itself. The role of women in the family, their decision-making capabilities, the level of their education, respect for their rights and their dignity, care of their health are all building blocks or enablers for the larger role that they can play in a nation's development. It was Gandhiji who said that women are mentally, spiritually and intellectually, equals of men. That fundamental premise should guide our endeavour to permit the role and the space for women as equal partners in the progress India is making today.

Some estimates have put the number of women at around 8% in the top ten civil services. This is certainly not commensurate with the profile of a rising and developing India where 50% of the population are women. While women are largely underrepresented in the civil service, few sectors can compare with the impact and influence of the rising role of women in public service. We have seen them challenging the concept of the glass ceiling, breaking gender barriers and stereotypes and rising to the top through their sheer hard work and dedication.

Women in public service play an important part in bringing their voice and talent to shape the issues that guide our development. And as their voices become heard and their contributions acknowledged they can inspire their younger sisters to enter the workplace in even larger and larger numbers. Gender sensitivity in formulating policies that encourage the participation of women in public service, and in business and industry is a vital requirement in this process. Empowered and self-confident women serve as role models to many others who look up to them for inspiration and motivation. There is this multiplier effect as they become the driving force for many others.

There remain barriers for women seeking elected office or hoping to climb the ladder in the public service. But these barriers are not as high as many assume and are certainly not insurmountable. The government has also taken a number of measures to address discrimination against women, strengthen existing institutions which include the legal system, provide better access to education, health care and other services, equal opportunities for women's participation in decision-making, and mainstreaming gender concerns in the development process, etc. With the amendments to the Constitution allowing for political empowerment of women through 33% reservation of women in rural and urban local bodies, there are today more than one million elected women representatives in panchayats in India. Another bill, already passed by Rajya Sabha, is presently under consideration of Lok Sabha, and if passed, will provide 33% reservation for women in parliament and State Legislatures, and will be a significant step in ensuring greater political participation of women at national level.

Speaking of India, we see before us a number of eminent women who have distinguished themselves in various professions - in social work, in education, in science, in administration, in law and, of course, in politics. With the Hon'ble President, Hon'ble Speaker of Lok Sabha, leader of the ruling party, leader of opposition in Lok Sabha, all being women, this is certainly a positive development and provides impetus to the cause of women empowerment. I must also mention here the praise and admiration that has come the way of the all-female contingent of women police from India who were engaged in UN Peacekeeping Operations in Liberia. They have done the nation proud. I also recall the exemplary courage and selflessness shown by Major Mitali Madhumita, a serving officer of the Army Education Corps and the first woman to be awarded the Sena Medal for her gallantry during the terrible attack by Taliban terrorists on a guest house in Kabul in February 2010 in which nineteen persons including seven Indians were killed and when she rescued several injured comrades.

Right from the times of Ms. C.B Muthamma, whose brilliance shone right through her work and who we all fondly remember as the first woman career diplomat of India, the history of women in the Indian civil services is replete with inspirational accounts of women who performed to the best of their abilities with steadfast commitment and dedication. Their life stories tell how they brought about transformational change both at home and abroad and when we remember their contribution to this nation, we do so with a sense of immense pride and respect.

The position of women in the Foreign Service has seen a sea change since the days of pioneers in the field such as Ambassadors Mutthama and Rukmini Menon. Miss Mutthama's was a story of how a woman with strong determination and the courage of her conviction can challenge the whole system, setting in motion the wheel of change.
Today, women comprise almost 11-12 per cent of the Indian Foreign Service. This increase is reflected not only in numbers but also in career profile and service conditions. Today there is no country or posting which is considered out of bounds for a woman officer in the Foreign Service. Coincidentally, the two most recent cases of evacuation of Indian nationals from Libya this year and Lebanon in 2008 were very ably handled by women Ambassadors.

In the world of diplomacy, one is reminded of what Madeleine Albright said when discussing the differences between women and the men as diplomats. The greatest difference she felt was that the women diplomats paid greater attention to the context of a particular problem while their male counterparts tended to look exclusively at the problem in hand. She also felt that the women's aptitude for developing relationships was an important factor in furthering diplomatic relations. This is an interesting observation coming from an extremely well-regarded contemporary woman diplomat and international relations specialist.

A greater participation by women in the civil service would definitely bring in the much needed balance in terms of gender representation. When women increasingly participate in the execution and implementation of issues of concern to them, and to the nation both at home and abroad, they become agents of change and transformation. They will inspire others to join in and replicate such efforts. This will be the touchstone of gender empowerment in the true sense of the term. It will reflect well on India's democracy to allow its women an even greater voice in the times to come.

Turning to the DRDO, I am aware of the stellar contributions being made, by our women scientists who are joining the Organization in larger numbers. The role of women in science is to be particularly prized and celebrated because they are pioneers in every sense - innovators, inventors, and initiators of new paths and areas of scientific development and discovery - whether in basic research, life sciences, aeronautics, computer science and armaments and missile technologies. The nation salutes their achievements.

I will conclude by quoting our former Prime Minister Smt. Indira Gandhi who said that "to be liberated, woman must feel free to be herself, not in rivalry to man but in the context of her own capacity and her personality. We need women to be more interested, more alive and more active not because they are women but because they do comprise half the human race. Whether they like it or not, they cannot escape their responsibility nor should they be denied its benefits".

I wish you all happiness, and higher and higher achievement, in your efforts to build a modern, progressive and developed India. Thank you

New Delhi, March 18, 2011.

Thank you Arun for inviting me to speak at this important gathering of intellectuals that brings together a wide range of issues, opinions, ideas and insights into contemporary affairs.

The subject of this year's Conclave is indeed, thought provoking. Looking around us, not just in India but at the world around us as well, it is clear that the balance of power has indeed shifted, both within and between states.

If there is one defining characteristic of the changes that we see in India and the world, it is the shift in power towards the ordinary citizen.

In India, we have seen rapid economic change and growth since 1991. What is less evident but equally significant is the fundamental deepening of our democracy that has been brought about through the empowerment of local institutions, broadened civil society action and a policy of inclusive social and economic growth. This has led to a shift in power from the institutions of state to the citizens of our country.

In 1991, we unleashed the entrepreneurial energies of our people by dismantling the license-permit raj. This released individual creative energies to produce the wealth that we need for fulfilling our responsibility of offering a life of equal opportunity and dignity to our citizens.

The policies of the Government in recent times have sought to remake the democratic state of India, to make processes of social and economic change more inclusive and thereby empowering over a billion people, one sixth of humanity. It is in fact a mandate that derives from our Constitution.

We have sought to make political democracy meaningful through social democracy by addressing the specific needs of excluded or marginalized sections of our society like Scheduled Castes, Scheduled Tribes, minorities and women. We are committed to providing reservation to women to the extent of 50% in local bodies and up to a third in the state legislatures and in our Parliament.

We have sought to bridge several divides in our country simultaneously: the infrastructural divide through Bharat Nirman, the educational divide through the Sarva Shiksha Abhiyan and the Right to Education, the health divide through the National Rural Health Mission and exclusion through targeted affirmative action programmes for minorities, Scheduled Castes and by restoration of the rights of indigenous people or Scheduled Tribes over forests and forest produce. We are moving towards providing broadband connectivity to all our 2,50,000 panchayats so that modern technology is harnessed for the empowerment of our citizens.

We have introduced landmark legislations that provide citizens the Right to Information, the Right to Education and the Right to Work through the Mahatma Gandhi Rural Employment Guarantee Act.

We have intensified our efforts for the emancipation of our women. Our efforts to create equal educational opportunities through targeted programmes for girls' education and specific economic programmes focused on women particularly through self-help groups are all gradually bearing fruit. Our major challenge going forward is to give our women political voice and to work out and implement effective strategies for gender equality.

We have sought to capitalize on the opportunities that come in the way of decentralization of power. It is heartening to see that the modern sectors of our economy are also beginning to understand the value of operating at the bottom of the pyramid and combining public welfare with the pursuit of profit.

The focus is to create a skilling revolution in our country that touches every nook and corner. This needs everyone to collaborate - the Central and State Governments, the private sector, developers of technology, NGOs and others. Through the Prime Minister's National Council on Skill Development we have been working on this and now that the recession is behind us, and we are coming out with a blueprint for the skill revolution in the next two months.

We have in our country not yet evolved a fully satisfactory system for reconciling harmoniously the demands of growth and environment. We need to move away from seeing the environment-development debate as a zero-sum game and instead devise win-win combinations. A lot of intellectual effort is needed to operationalize the concept of sustainable development. This should challenge the imagination of our environment and development planners. The tragic nuclear incidents in Japan in the aftermath of the recent earthquake and tsunami should make us revisit strategies for nuclear safety, learning lessons from these experiences. I have already ordered a thorough review by the Department of Atomic Energy.

We live today in an age when science and technology and the growth of human knowledge are becoming major determinants of the power and wealth of nations. India's ability to carve out a place for itself in the evolving comity of nations will be determined by our ability to use science and technology in accelerating the processes of social and economic change.
What we have attempted in India is, of course, specific to Indian conditions. But the human desire for more freedom and for citizens to decide their own future is universal. The shift of power to citizens is today a global phenomenon.

As a democracy we are happy to see our brothers in West Asia and North Africa taking an increasing role in determining their own future. These are decisions for countries and their citizens to take for themselves, free of outside interference or coercion. India will do what it can to support the decisions that the people and countries of the region take about their own future. As close neighbours and historical friends, we have a major stake in their peaceful, orderly evolution. Over 6 millions of our citizens live and work in this area.

India's trade, economic and human ties with the countries of South Asia, East Asia and West Asia are deep and historical. We have to find new pathways of cooperation with these countries to create new opportunities for growth and development.

The balance is also shifting between states in the global system. The old order is clearly changing. A new order however is yet to be born. No country has a greater interest and stake than India in a rule-based and predictable international system within which we can grow and develop.

Our existing institutions of global governance need to change to reflect today's shift in balance. To some extent, this is already happening in regard to the global economy. India, today participates fully and meaningfully in international economic institutions, particularly the G-20 which has emerged in the aftermath of the global financial crisis of 2008 as the preferred and primary forum for global economic issues. We seek a similar evolution in the international handling of political, security and other issues and a democratization of institutions like the United Nations Security Council to bring them in line with present day realities.

It is important that all major powers work together to address the major economic and political challenges that face us, including those involving non-state actors. Cooperation to deal with cross border terrorism is very important.

Problems such as piracy require cooperative solutions by several states, acting together both to prevent piracy on the high seas and to eliminate the causes which make these possible. India has a strong interest in the security of the sea lanes. Our Navy has done a commendable task in foiling attempts at piracy in the Arabian Sea and it is working with international navies of the Horn of Africa.

The shifts in the balance of power and its implications suggest that we need to adapt ourselves. In many ways, India is well placed to take advantage of the changes in the balance of international forces. We can contribute to the world's recovery from the recent financial and economic crisis. We can become a pole of political stability in an uncertain world. But for all this we will need to show innovation and flexibility in our approaches. Some inadequacies have become apparent in our systems of functioning. We have to deal squarely with the malaise of corruption. We need to reform and improve governance at all levels.

I am sure that your deliberations in this conclave will contribute to a more informed debate on all the issues that this important topic raises.

With these few words, I wish your conclave every success.

007. Interaction of Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao with the senior journalists of the Indian Express in the "Idea Exchange" programme.

New Delhi, March 20, 2011.

Shubhajit Roy: Leaked US diplomatic cables refer to an alleged attempt by the Congress to buy MPs before the 2008 no-confidence motion. Do you think that the end justified the means?

Mrs. Rao: We have no means to verify the authenticity of what is contained in that particular document. Cables from a diplomatic mission anywhere in the world, regardless of which Embassy is sending them to their central headquarters, are privileged communications and fall within the category of diplomatic immunity. Even in the legal sense, the content referred to is hearsay and you cannot take it as evidence. The Indo-US civil nuclear deal is of benefit to the country. It enhances and enlarges the scope of opportunity for India to access technology for the generation of electricity through nuclear technologies that will now become available. After the nuclear deal was concluded with the US, negotiations on civil nuclear cooperation are on with a number of countries. So I think history will make the right judgment and I think the judgment will be that India did benefit.

Shubhajit Roy: Given the crisis in Japan, is evacuation of Indians living there on the government's mind?

Mrs. Rao: Some countries have announced their decision to encourage the evacuation of their nationals. We are in touch with the Department of Atomic Energy and with an Indian scientist who is posted in Tokyo with the World Association of Nuclear Operators. We are looking at the data which is coming out from the Japanese side and we are making our assessments on that basis. If electricity is restored and they can ensure that the reactors cool properly, the situation will naturally improve. At this moment, one doesn’t have any surety on that.

Amitabh Sinha: When a diplomat sends a cable back home, how much of it is mere reporting of facts and how much of it is a value judgment, an assessment of the situation?

Mrs. Rao: Diplomatic cables, by virtue of their security classification, will contain not only facts and figures but also an analysis—that is why a security classification would be given to a diplomatic cable. Such communications are not supposed to be leaked to the public.

Amitabh Sinha: Who is authorised at a mission to send cables?

Mrs. Rao: Technically, any diplomatic officer can send a cable but since we function in hierarchies, it would have to be authorised by the head of the wing. It could be the deputy chief of mission, it could be the ambassador.

Coomi Kapoor: Are Indian diplomatic cables as indiscreet and as well-written as American cables?

Mrs. Rao: I can assure you they are extremely well-written and they offer candid assessments. A great deal of care is taken over what you write in a cable.

Dilip Bobb: After WikiLeaks, is there any other way of sending cables back to the country?

Mrs. Rao: I don’t think telepathy functions as a means of diplomatic communication as yet!

Smita Aggarwal: Could you give us a sense of what went on behind the scenes during the evacuation of Indians from Libya?

Mrs. Rao: There were an estimated 18,000 Indians in Libya. The decision to evacuate them was taken at the end of February. Libya is a fairly big country, almost half the size of India if you go by area. Our people were scattered all over the country. People said the Chinese were quicker than us in evacuating their people. In Libya, the Chinese were basically workers in Chinese projects without their families and were easy to take out. We had a mix of people, from blue-collar workers to professionals like doctors, teachers and engineers—many living with their families. We had to plan carefully to ensure nobody was harmed and everybody was evacuated. We had to get clearances for movement of our planes and our ships into trouble areas. As for the Libyan government, when it came to clearances for evacuation, they were quite forthcoming. The Indian community organised itself and they helped with the evacuation. So far, 16,200 Indians have been evacuated. There was excellent coordination between the MEA, Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs and the Ministries of Defence, Civil Aviation and the state governments. I must also commend Air India for rising to the occasion.

Anubhuti Vishnoi: You and the MEA have embraced social networking sites like Facebook and Twitter. Now we have WikiLeaks exploding in the face of the world. What's your view of WikiLeaks? Have they done something criminal? Or is this a wake up call for transparency?

Mrs. Rao: Social networking sites and WikiLeaks are very different. With Facebook and Twitter, you want to access the medium because you want to put out perfectly legitimate messages about your work or a certain policy decision. You use it to expand outreach and for advocacy. Diplomats today can't be involuted, they have to reach out. As far as WikiLeaks is concerned, these are cables that have security classifications. In WikiLeaks, certain codes were broken—a code of diplomatic practice and convention. Regardless of advancements in modern communications, certain communications will always stay outside the public domain, and should, if national security is to be protected. Certain channels must remain restricted.

Anubhuti Vishnoi: Indian students from Australia to the UK and USA are facing difficulties. How much is it an issue of concern for you?

Mrs. Rao: It's an issue of great concern. We have about 100,000 Indian students studying in the USA today. Generally, they have faced no substantive difficulty. As for the Tri-Valley case, it was clearly an illegal operation and 1,500 of our students were innocent victims. Our effort after this scandal broke was to reach out to students to provide legal advice and to work with the Department of Homeland Security, with the State Department. On the radio tagging incident—out of 18 students, there is only one who has a radio tag and I hope that would be removed shortly. Some students are still being questioned by US authorities. In the case of a large number of students who everybody believes are innocent, we are trying to see how they can adjust their visa status after they obtain admission to bonafide universities. Those who want to come back should be allowed to come back. That's the kind of involvement we have and that's why I say diplomacy is a service industry today. You have to be able to reach out and be accessible.

Pranab Dhal Samanta: What is your prognosis of how things are evolving in Pakistan? We face a Sino-Pak nexus on various issues, we have our problems with China that get complicated by the day.
Mrs. Rao: We have commenced the process of re-engagement with Pakistan. Later this month, the Home Secretary will meet his counterpart. This will be followed by a dialogue of the Commerce Secretaries. We have a sequence of meetings that will lead up to the meetings of the Foreign Secretaries just before our Foreign Ministers meet, hopefully in July. Through this, we seek to demonstrate that despite the complexity of the problems that populate our relationship, the best option is to engage with Pakistan and see how we can reduce differences, reduce the trust deficit between the two countries. Now Pakistan has been assuring us that it is equally concerned about terrorism and that it is as much a victim of terrorism today as any other country in the region. We have to see whether these assurances will translate into a permanent stoppage of terrorism against India and we want to hold them to that assurance. Meanwhile, we have begun this process of re-engagement because to keep the relationship in a state of complete non-communication is not good for the two countries or for peace and stability in the region. It's a modest attempt. We are not going in with inflated expectations. But we want to approach it with an open mind.

With China, there is a certain way in which we have managed the relationship over the years despite the fact that we have many complex issues that remain unresolved. Over the last decade, we have had many rounds of discussions on how to resolve complicated issues, like the boundary issue, on which differences still persist. But we have put mechanisms in place to maintain peace and tranquillity in border areas. We have engaged with China across a whole spectrum of issues at various levels. At the defence level too, until the deceleration in contact occasioned by the difficulties in the proposed visit of our Northern Army Commander to China. We are trying to resolve these differences. It was also tied to the issues of stapled visas to residents of Jammu and Kashmir on which we have had a very strong position and we have told the Chinese that this is not acceptable to us. The Chinese have assured us that they are working on a solution. We will have to verify this assurance. In recent weeks, there has not been an instance of a stapled visa being issued to a J&K resident, although we had this issue with Arunachal Pradesh.

M K Venu: There are some concerns at the highest level of government that the Chinese are funding massive infrastructure projects in India and funding private sector companies to build infrastructure of such a magnitude that nearly 20 per cent of India's power capacity will be hypothecated to Chinese. How do you look at this?

Mrs. Rao: It's under the scanner at the moment. We are aware of the involvement and increasing presence of Chinese companies, especially in infrastructure, particularly in the power sector, and that funding is being provided to some of our companies for the purchase of machinery from China. The point is how do we deal with it? The long-term measures include building up capability within the country and building our own domestic manufacturing capabilities. In the short term, we have to embed the Chinese in a rule-based system. We have to build more areas of reciprocity. If they are going to be coming in such a big way, then we should be able to demand similar access for our companies and businesses.

Amitabh Sinha: Will the Japan crisis impact our plans to expand the nuclear sector in any way? Also, we have high-value collaborative projects like Posco or Jaitapur which have run into environmental obstacles. Do these become irritants in our relations with countries who are stakeholders in such projects?

Mrs. Rao: There are two aspects to the nuclear issue, one is development and the other is the issue of safety. The DAE has been very categorical in affirming that our safety standards rank among the best in the world—we are not talking about using 40-year-old technologies, we are talking about the latest technology. And nuclear energy is part of the energy mix that we want to provide to this country for clean energy, green energy. Events in Japan should be an opportunity to be even more vigilant about the safety aspects of the plants that we build. I think we should trust the atomic energy establishment on this.

On the question of business, investors come with full knowledge of the fact that being a democracy, there will always be a lively debate about these issues—this is not the only country where there have been protests about a site or a certain location, and there is an environment lobby that wants to make its point on this. As for being an irritant in our bilateral relations, I think by and large the record that manifests itself in the last few years is of increasing investor confidence in India.

Prajakta Hebbar: The Chinese programme similar to Google Earth had shown parts of Arunachal Pradesh and Aksai Chin as Chinese territory. How do you react to this?

Mrs. Rao: We do not react favorably to such reports. The way they represent the border with India, we don't accept that, we have not accepted it in the past and we do not intend to accept it in the future. Similarly, they don't accept the way we represent the border. So what is the solution to that? Obviously we need the negotiations to move forward and come to some mutually satisfactory settlement.

Coomi Kapoor: What is the percentage of women in the IFS now?

Mrs. Rao: It is about 13-14 per cent. But the numbers are going up. And the quality of the jobs we are doing has completely transformed from what it was 30 years ago. My generation of women diplomats has certainly been able to take on very challenging assignments and there has been no discrimination between genders when it comes to posting you somewhere and giving you sensitive assignments.

Ritu Kant Ojha: Whenever Indians face any harassment in a foreign location, the response of the Indian government has been slow—that is the perception. Take the case of piracy and the Indians held hostage.

Mrs. Rao: Not a single Indian ship has been taken hostage ever since our Navy started patrolling the international maritime transit corridor in the Gulf of Aden. In the last four-five years, a number of foreign flagged ships with Indian sailors have been taken hostage, and a number of ships have been released; not a single Indian life has been lost. At the moment, there are five foreign ships held by pirates and there are Indian sailors among the hostages. The perception here is that the Indian government should move in and somehow rescue them, but it does not work like that in any country. The ship owners deal with the pirates who want a ransom; the government does not intervene in negotiations. Media hype on these issues is not helping the negotiations and nobody is focusing on the pirates, and the crime of piracy. I think we need a certain course correction here.
Remarks by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the release of 'India’s National Security - Annual Review 2010'.

New Delhi, April 19, 2011.

Ambassador Rasgotra, Chairman of the Governing Board of the Foundation for National Security Research,

Prof Satish Kumar, Editor of India’s National Security Annual Review (INSAR) 2010, Distinguished Members of the Governing and Editorial Boards,

Distinguished scholars, experts and guests,

Ladies and gentlemen,

I am very happy to have released a short while ago India’s National Security Annual Review 2010, brought out by the Foundation for National Security Research. In the past decade or so, the Review has established its usefulness for those who wish to understand security challenges we face and the responses we need, evolve and implement. The Review brings to its readers valuable views of leading security experts.

As I say this, ladies and gentlemen, I think I must pause to pay homage to one such leading expert, Mr K Subrahmanyam, commonly referred to as the doyen of the Indian strategic affairs community. His sterling contribution greatly helped our understanding of our national security challenges and shaped responses to many of them. He was and will be an inspiration to generations of strategic thinkers and security experts. The void created by his demise in February this year will be difficult to fill. I will personally miss his deep analysis and well-thought prescriptions.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

When I began my public life about five decades ago, the concept of security was more or less akin to military prowess. And then, I remember that about two decades later, when I participated in the UN First Committee as a Member of our Parliament, the thought was beginning to gain ground that the world will be a safer place with fewer weapons, including fewer weapons of mass destruction.

However, in a matter of a few more years, in a geo-politically altered post-Cold War world, a host of new challenges to our individual and collective security - terrorism, environment, economic downturn, energy and cyber security - to name a few, had acquired a new and threatening enormity. These have today become central to the discourse on national security in a manner which a few decades ago was perhaps the sole domain of armed territorial aggression.

In less than a lifetime, the imperatives of national security have changed radically.

In case of our own country, immediate challenges before us at the time of Independence were defending our unity and territorial integrity, and generating enough in the economy to meet the needs of a growing population.

In the course of about sixty five years, our country has emerged stronger through armed aggressions imposed on us. Our GDP has increased from low double digit in billion US Dollars to over a trillion US dollars. Even as the population has grown about four times, we produce more than four times food grain than we produced in 1950. And yet we have managed to relegate the share of agriculture in national economy. Hundreds of millions have been pulled out of poverty and illiteracy and the resultant death and disease. Sustained high growth since economic reforms and liberalization introduced in early 1990s has put India as the fourth largest economy in the world, behind EU, US, China and Japan, on Purchasing Power Parity.

As a result of these historical achievements, which are underpinned by the strength of our democratic institutions, we are, in general, better prepared today to comprehend the security challenges we are faced with, and to respond to them effectively.

At the same time, changes in the global security, geo-political and economic landscapes have entailed new challenges, which I just referred to. They have also introduced nuances in the more traditional ones. I am happy that INSAR 2010, which has just been released, provides deep analytical insights into them.

Although making the distinction between 'internal' and 'external' challenges in today's enormously interconnected world is meaningless beyond a point, yet, I think this is a useful categorization to understand the direction and the thrust of the effort to address them. I agree with Prof. Kumar that our biggest internal challenge is with regard to economic security of the country. In my view, the mantra to meet this challenge is 'inclusive growth'. It is the surest way to address the threats posed by left wing extremism. Innovative public-private partnership will play an increasingly important role in meeting our socio-economic objectives.

Our external environment is very different from what prevailed towards the end of the last century. The multipolarity of today’s world implies less of stability and predictability. In addition, there are: shift in the world's economic centre of gravity away from the US and Europe, the global economic crisis, and competition among fast growing economies for resources to meet their developmental and economic challenges.

Our foreign policy seeks to address challenges arising from beyond our borders so as to secure an enabling external environment for the pursuit of our national objective of development. While, it may not be possible for me to speak of each and every challenge or task in external policy domain, I would touch upon a few briefly.

Terrorism is perhaps the single biggest challenge rooted in our external environment. It is an extremely complex challenge. India has been victim of cross-border terrorism for decades. After 26/11, we have, on one hand, sought to improve our counter-terrorism capabilities, and on the other reached out to the world in an unprecedented manner to stress the need for bringing to justice expeditiously all those responsible for the Mumbai terrorist attack.

With Pakistan, we have pursued the path of dialogue to reduce the trust deficit and to resolve all outstanding issues in a spirit of openness and in the hope that we can build a better future for the peoples of both countries. At the same time, we have never abandoned our concerns about the need to eliminate cross-border terrorism.

Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh and the Prime Minister of Pakistan had a wide-ranging conversation when they met in Mohali to witness the cricket match between India and Pakistan. We won the match despite our traditions of being gracious hosts.

The meeting of the two leaders once again reaffirmed our intention to take forward the process of dialogue through which we can resolve outstanding issues.

As you would be aware, the Home Secretary of India and the Interior Secretary of Pakistan met last month and had a very positive round of discussions. The Commerce Secretaries of the two countries will meet this month in Islamabad. There will be a series of other meetings, leading to the meetings of Foreign Secretaries, and Foreign Ministers of the two countries. As the Prime Minister said recently, the aim of this process is normalization of relations with Pakistan. Hopefully, this normalization will take into account India’s vital concerns. On our part, we shall be always ready to address Pakistan's concerns as long as the mechanism is dialogue.

China is our largest neighbour and we have sought to structure our relationship with that country based on the principles of mutual sensitivity to each other’s concerns and the need to peacefully resolve outstanding issues through painstaking negotiations. This is a path that we have pursued with careful deliberation, conscious always of the need to defend our security interests and to carefully monitor Chinese activities in our neighbourhood.

Last week, Prime Minister had a very productive, warm and friendly meeting with President Hu Jintao on the margins of BRICS Summit at San Ya. Among the understandings reached is an agreement in principle on establishing a working mechanism for consultation and coordination on border affairs. This will handle important border affairs relating to maintaining peace and tranquility. We would hope that this mechanism would allow the two countries to take their relationship in a positive direction.

India is engaged closely with and in global and regional cooperation structures, such as ASEAN, ARF, IBSA, G-20, SCO and EU. Last week’s Summit of the BRICS - Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa - confirmed that these emerging countries have almost the same views on major issues that confront the world. Whether it is the question of establishing a more equitable and a fair world, or coordination of macroeconomic policies, BRICS has emerged as a major voice in the world.

A seminal development of last year was India’s election to the UN Security Council as a non-permanent member with a record 187 out of 190 votes. Our Membership provides us an opportunity to contribute to the decision making affecting peace and security in various regions of the world, including our own. This we are doing with a voice of reason and moderation, as would be clear from our active and constructive role in the Council’s deliberations, beginning with discussions on the UN Mission in Nepal in January, the Sudan referendum, the Ivory Coast situation, developments in Middle East, including Libya and the issue of piracy involving Somalia. India is also chairing two important committees, namely, the Counter-terrorism Committee, and the Committee concerning Somalia and Eritrea.

As you would be aware, with over 8,700 personnel, India is the third largest contributor to UN Peace Keeping. This reflects our commitment to global security and peace, and also our faith in the words that peace and security are indivisible.

India has to remain alert for responding to the developments in the Middle East and the Gulf, regions with which we have traditionally close ties. About 6 million Indians live and work there. The regions provide over two-thirds of our oil imports. Our effort is directed at ensuring safety of our nationals and securing our interests in the widest sense of the word.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Before I conclude, I would like to briefly touch upon another area which has security dimensions. We see with great sorrow the death and devastation wrought by natural disaster, most recently in Japan. After the Tsunami of 2004, we took a number of steps to significantly enhance warning and disaster relief capabilities. A recent indication of the efficacy of these measures came in the form of the touching appreciation for our 48-strong National Disaster Response Force team, which carried out rescue and relief work in the worst affected Miyagi prefecture for over two weeks. However, no level of development is defence enough against the vagaries of nature. We must be prepared, to our best, and always.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

In our age and times, national security is not an esoteric pursuit indulged in by a few grey or white haired scholars peering through their thick glasses over thicker jargon and producing even thicker articles. The growing multidisciplinary and cross-sectoral understanding of our national security issues and responses will benefit further from introduction of security in more institutions of higher learning in the country.

I am aware of the respect that our security scholars and research institutions command worldwide, and the camaraderie they enjoy with their international peers. I would advocate strengthening these institutional partnerships, and deepening the channels of communication between our strategic community and policy makers in the times to come.

As for the future, I recall that the February 2010 issue of the Quadrennial Defence Review of the US Department of Defence has been quoted in INSAR 2010 as follows:

"India has already established its worldwide military influence through counter piracy, peace keeping, humanitarian assistance and disaster relief efforts. As its military capabilities grow, India will contribute to Asia as a net provider of security in the Indian Ocean and beyond." Unquote.

The revised National Security Index, an analytical tool developed to understand where we stand on various security parameters, points to India emerging as the fourth most powerful nation of the world by 2025. I recollect what the captain of India’s World Cup winning cricket team said a few days ago about his team’s One Day International rankings: If we keep playing well, the rankings will take care of themselves.

With these words, I thank the Foundation for National Security Research for giving me the honour to launch INSAR 2010. I would like to compliment its Editor Prof Satish Kumar, and all the distinguished contributors.

The support to INSAR from National Security Council Secretariat, the Confederation of Indian Industries and the publishers has been for a worthy cause, and I hope, will continue.

With the hope that the Review will contribute to wider debate and deeper understanding of a large number of issues that straddle the security horizon of our country, I thank you all for your attention.

009. Press Release issued by Ministry of External Affairs on the call by IFS Probationers on Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh.

New Delhi, May 11, 2011.

The Prime Minister today met the probationers of the 2009 batch of the Indian Foreign Service. In his remarks to the probationers, the Prime Minister recalled the vision of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru about an India that was free from poverty and hunger and the role of the civil service in contributing to national goals and meeting societal aspirations.

The Prime Minister observed that in an increasingly inter-depending and uncertain world, the Indian Foreign Service had an important role to play in steering the country towards the path of socio-economic development. The Prime Minister highlighted some of the contemporary issues requiring special focus. These included issues of environmental security, the role of the international trading system and regional trading arrangements in overcoming the limitation of natural resources in the country, the question of international terrorism, national security, which requires particular attention to relations with India’s neighbours and extended neighbourhood (South East Asia, Gulf and West Asia, Central Asia, Africa) and the importance of maintaining productive relations with the world’s major powers. The Prime Minister noted that foreign policy should enable the release of resources from defence to achieve our development goals.

The Defence Minister Shri AK Antony today asked the top brass of the Indian Armed Forces to continuously assess the security situation in our strategic neighbourhood in the aftermath of the elimination of Osama Bin Laden and remain prepared for any eventualities. Describing the US operations in Pakistan as ‘a watershed in the global war on terror’, Shri Antony said the event has ‘internationally stamped’ Pakistan's position as the core of terrorist activities in the region. Addressing the Unified Commanders Conference here, he said the ripples of this event will have wide ranging impact on our strategic neighbourhood.

Shri Antony said the security situation in Pakistan continues to be a cause for concern. He said despite supporting the war on terror, China continues to remain its main strategic partner. The Defence Minister said if any real progress is to be made in improving bilateral relations, Pakistan must take concrete action to dismantle terrorist infrastructure on its soil.

The two day annual conference was attended among others by the Minister of State for Defence Dr MM Pallam Raju, the Chairman Chiefs of Staff Committee, Chief of Air Staff Air Chief Marshal PV Naik, Chief of Naval Staff Admiral Nirmal Verma, Chief of Army Staff Gen VK Singh and the Defence Secretary Shri Pradeep Kumar.

The Defence Minister said India has always desired friendly relation with all its neighbours. He said though we are not unduly concerned over China's moves to modernize and upgrade its military capability, we must on our part, keep up the ongoing process of upgrading our military structure. He expressed the hope that progress will be made in discussion with China on border dispute.

Dwelling on the ground situation in Jammu & Kashmir shri Antony said it has shown improvement over the past few months. The violence level has declined and the political processes have come to the forefront, due in a large measure, to the sustained efforts of our security forces. He, however, said that the armed forces need to keep up the vigil to ensure that the levels of violence are kept to the minimum. ‘This calls for a lot of restraint and upholding the human rights of the local people, without compromising over all our preparedness to meet any evil designs’. Shri Antony said the summer months will be a crucial test of our response mechanism.
Referring to modernization in the armed forces shri Antony called upon the top brass to adopt a change in world view. "Just as the old brick and mortar economies have given way to the new economic architecture across the world, so too modernization of our armed forces must chart a new path. The thrust for modernization and change has to be necessarily top driven and that is where your role assumes a crucial significance”.

Turning to the welfare of the armed forces shri Antony said we have taken all possible steps to ensure that the soldiers and their families are cared for and looked after well. However, the onus of translating the government's intentions into reality lies with the commanders as the best of schemes and mechanisms can fail due to lack of proper and effective implementation, he said.

The Defence Minister informed the gathering that to address the issue of existing shortage of officers in the armed forces, an additional squadron is being raised at National Defence Academy. This squadron will have a capacity of 120 cadets and the total authorized capacity of NDA would be enhanced from 1800 to 1920 cadets.

Shri Antony complimented the armed forces for the quick rescue and relief operations during floods and mud slides in Leh and the delivery of aid to the affected people.

011. Press Release issued by Ministry of Commerce and Industry on the visit of Minister Anand Sharma to Paris to address the OECD Ministerial meeting and attend various other engagements connected with trade development.

New Delhi, May 27, 2011.

The Commerce and Industry Minister Shri Anand Sharma, visited Paris from 24-26 May to address the OECD ministerial meeting. During his visit he also participated in an informal meeting of trade ministers convened by Australia to take stock of progress of negotiations in WTO. He expressed satisfaction with the meeting, which was convened in a complex backdrop where negotiations had come to a near standstill with sharp differences between developed and developing world. Mr Sharma said that the meeting saw a unanimous resolve emerging among the ministers that a package of deliverables which had at its heart the interests of Least developed countries be accorded priority and efforts made to fast track negotiations in those areas for conclusion by end December. LDCs have a key interest in Duty free quota free market access as well as the issue of phasing out of cotton subsidies.

Earlier yesterday, he held substantive bilateral meeting with French Finance minister Christine Lagarde to explore opportunities of trade and investment cooperation between India and France. Shri Sharma identified joint technology development with a shared IPR regime as a key area of priority specially in high end technologies. He also mentioned energy, infrastructure, fashion, skill development and design as major priorities. They reaffirmed commitment of reaching bilateral trade of Euro 12 billion by 2012.

During his visit Shri Sharma also met EU trade Commissioner Karel de Gucht to take stock of progress of negotiations on India EU BTIA and expressed optimism for a conclusion of negotiations in 2011. He also held bilateral meetings with Argentinian trade minister Hector Timmerman and Australian trade minister Craig Emerson, apart from meeting DG WTO Pascal Lamy.

Shri Sharma also addressed leading business chambers of France seeking greater participation for foreign investment in India. In his discussion with French higher education minister, he expressed his strong support for the IIT Rajasthan project being supported by the French government.

New Delhi, June 13, 2011.

Smt. Mohsina Kidwai, Member of Parliament and Chairperson of Haj Committee of India, Senior leaders and Hon'ble Members of Parliament,
Shri Sanjay Singh, Secretary, Ministry of External Affairs, Honourable Members of Haj Committee of India,
Dr. Shaik Shakir Hussain, CEO, Haj Committee of India,
Honourable Chairpersons and Members of the State Haj Committees, Distinguished Religious Scholars, Members of Media
Ladies and Gentlemen!

I consider it a singular privilege to be participating in the Annual Conference for Haj 2011. The Conference is an important occasion which provides an opportunity for stakeholders from all over the country to make a positive contribution to the preparations for the Haj pilgrimage, keeping the interests of our Hajis in mind.

I extend a very warm welcome to each one of you and hope that the deliberations of the Conference would be constructive and result in practical suggestions for improving the management of the Haj.

At the outset, I would like to express the Government's firm commitment to extend all possible assistance for successful Haj this year too, as has been done in previous years. The pilgrimage to the Holy places of Makkah and Madinah is both a cherished and life-long dream, and a sacred duty for millions of our brothers and sisters in India. We shall leave no stone unturned for making the fulfillment of their dream and duty as comfortable as we can.

You would be aware that a record number of one lakh seventy one thousand six hundred and seventy one pilgrims from our country performed Haj last year. The success of the operations was despite late start due to several court cases challenging various aspects of Haj policy and practice. This success could not have been possible without collective efforts of all stakeholders. I congratulate everyone concerned.

When I visited Saudi Arabia in March this year, I conveyed to the Saudi Government our Government's gratitude for the support extended to the Haj Mission of India, and congratulated them on successful organization of Haj 2010. The Saudi Embassy in New Delhi and the Consulate in Mumbai deserve our sincere thanks for the support extended to us, including through the timely issue of Haj visas. I would like to thank specially His Excellency Mr. Faisal Hassan Trad, the Ambassador of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, for all his cooperation.

Given the fact that there has been a significant increase in the number of intending Haj pilgrims from India, the Government has requested the Saudi Government for an enhanced additional Haj quota. During my visit to Jeddah for the conclusion of the Bilateral Haj Agreement with the Government of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia on March 26, 2011, I personally handed over the request for additional seats to the Saudi Minister for Haj.

Active preparations are underway for Haj 2011 and Review Meeting for Haj 2010 has been held in February 2011 in Jeddah.

Last year, a decision was taken to allow those Haj pilgrims who have applied unsuccessfully of three consecutive years to be automatically given a seat without having to participate in the draw of lots or Qurrah. This has already been implemented. Further, as part of our efforts to continuously improve Haj management, it has been decided to allocate confirmed seats to all the intending pilgrims over 70 years of age along with a companion, with effect from this year.

Among the many measures and reforms in the Haj process undertaken in the recent past are elections of zonal representatives, held last year. As members of the Haj Committee of India, these representatives make a valuable contribution. Other measures include increasing the number of embarkation points from 19 to 21; setting up an inter-Ministerial committee on charter flights for Haj pilgrims in order to provide better facilities; and opening a Helpline by our Consulate General in Jeddah for our pilgrims in Saudi Arabia.

We are constantly monitoring the flow of passport applications and issuance of passports to Haj applicants with a view to ensuring that they get their passports in time to complete all other formalities. I am pleased to inform you that the Government has decided to give all the pilgrims selected by the Haj Committee of India passports with validity of eight months without police verification. Regional Passport offices have been advised to hold special passport adalats for the purpose.

I understand that the Haj Committee of India is making efforts to introduce standardized baggage system Haj.

I have also been informed that the Haj Committee of India is taking all necessary steps to hire accommodation for the pilgrims well in time. Over one lakh twenty five thousand units have already been approved for hiring. Process is on for signing of agreement with the landlords.

I am happy to note that an important component of the Haj preparations, viz. training, is to be undertaken in several cities of India soon after this Conference. There is indeed need for proper orientation and training of pilgrims through the Haj Committee as well as the PTOs.

Ladies and Gentlemen!

In an exercise as gigantic as Haj, which involves many agencies outside our Ministry, outside the Government of India, and outside of our country, there would always be room for improvement.

Many of you would recall that three months ago, on March 7, a meeting of Members of Parliament belonging to the Muslim community was organized by us to elicit suggestions for improvements in management of Haj. Valuable suggestions received from Hon'ble colleagues meeting will go a long way in further improving facilities for Hajis and overall Haj management.

Before I conclude, I would like to assure all the distinguished participants that my Ministry is committed to solemnly carry out its constitutional responsibility for "Pilgrimages to places outside India", in consultation and coordination with other stakeholders.

I wish you all success in your deliberations. Thank you.

013. Announcement by Official Spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs about the appointment of next Foreign Secretary.

New Delhi, June 27, 2001.

The Ambassador of India to Paris Shri Ranjan Mathai who is an IFS officer of the 1974 batch, would be the next Foreign Secretary of India. He would have a two-year term. He assumes office on the 1st of August 2011.

014. Address by Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao on ‘Key Priorities for India’s Foreign Policy’ at the International Institute for Strategic Studies.

It is indeed an honour and privilege for me to be back at the IISS on this warm Monday afternoon. India and the UK share a special and unique relationship—there are shared values and ties that bind us— with the ideals of democracy, the rule of law, inclusiveness and pluralism informing the political systems in both our nations. Our multi-faceted bilateral relationship with the UK was infused with further strength after its upgradation to the level of a strategic partnership in 2004. Importantly, the visit of Prime Minister David Cameron to India in July 2010 saw these relations elevated to an ‘Enhanced Partnership for the Future’. You sense from all this that the partnership between our two democracies is going to further strengthen and deepen in the years to come.

As open, pluralistic societies, we understand well that respect for freedom and human rights must inform the emerging world order. We also take great pride in the fact that along with giving importance to our political, economic and commercial ties we emphasise our educational, scientific, tourism and cultural cooperation.

In global affairs, India holds as its lodestar the values and the ideals of multilateralism, peaceful coexistence, justice, freedom, equality and fraternity, which are required for an equitable and sustainable world order in the 21st century. With our vision firmly rooted in these values, we seek to engage the international community in essential reforms of the international governance system so that its much more tuned into the atmospheric space of the twenty first century.

Today, it is normal to speak of the dynamic Indian growth story despite the ravages of the global economic crisis. But to put your arms around the Indian experience, you must understand the nation as it has evolved and acquired its current attributes.

Our Republic is sixty one today, and, the course of our foreign policy also covers almost the same period. As the country has grown, so also our foreign policy has evolved, innovated and adjusted to changed global circumstances, in accordance with the national interest. A fundamental goal of India’s foreign policy is to promote our economic growth targets and ambitions in a conducive and a peaceful, stable, external environment.

India is placed in an extremely complex neighbourhood which has seen rapid and often, turbulent, change in the last thirty years. A peaceful periphery is a an irreducible requirement for the success of our efforts to accelerate domestic economic development. This thread runs through our foreign policy.

With our largest neighbour, China, we have consciously practised a policy of engagement that has yielded positive dividends. Although there is an unresolved boundary question between our two countries which should be settled on mutually acceptable terms, we have not held the rest of the relationship hostage to this complex issue. We have also collaborated usefully on a variety of multilateral issues.

With Pakistan, we have consistently made efforts to go back to the negotiating table to solve difficult issues. We have striven to promote better relations with Pakistan. Naturally, such relations can only grow in an atmosphere free of terror and violence. The trajectory of our relationship over the last few decades has been distorted and adversely impacted by the factor of cross-border terrorism. A stable Pakistan which acts as a bulwark against terrorism and extremism is in its own interest and also in the interest of our region. I have just returned from a productive and positive round of talks with Foreign Secretary Bashir in Islamabad.

We help Afghanistan in its reconstruction efforts with the aim of bringing peace and stability in that country. During his recent visit to Afghanistan (May 12-13, 2011), our Prime Minister announced an additional assistance of US $ 500 million, over and above India’s existing commitments of US $ 1.5 billion. India’s assistance programme is spread across Afghanistan and spans almost the entire gamut of economic and social developmental activities. It places particular emphasis on capacity building and human resource development.

With Bangladesh, with whom we share the longest border among any of our neighbours, relations have improved significantly over the last two years. Our dialogue has yielded benefits for both countries, in a people-centred manner that stresses trade, connectivity, easier transit, development, and the enhancement of mutual security cooperation against insurgency and terrorism. There is enhanced trust and mutual confidence that oxygenates our relationship.

With Sri Lanka, the end of the civil war, has brought historic new opportunities for reconciliation between the Tamil and Sinhalese people and for the reconstruction, rehabilitation and economic development of the Northern and Eastern Provinces. Mahatma Gandhi called India, Sri Lanka’s “nearest neighbour”. It is through that prism that we see our ties with this island nation.

The satisfactory conclusion of the peace process and constitution drafting are eagerly awaited goals in Nepal, both for the people of that country and for India because of the symbiotically close relations we share.
We have articulated a policy in our neighbourhood that emphasises the advantages of building networks of inter-connectivity, trade, and investment so that prosperity can be shared and so that the region can benefit from India’s rapid economic growth and rising prosperity. We want to create an environment with our neighbours that enables us to work together to fulfill our common objectives of economic development.

In this context, I sense a new vigour and dynamism in the South Asian Association of Regional Cooperation (SAARC) which has completed 25 years of existence in 2010. This has been generated as a result of initiatives taken by the Member States in recent years that herald the move of the Association from a hitherto largely declaratory phase to an implementation phase. India’s enhanced profile in SAARC in recent years is based on an asymmetrical and non-reciprocal approach where we are willing to go the extra mile in order to strengthen regional cooperation.

Our ‘Look East’ Policy enunciated in the early nineties, represented India’s vision of the changing dynamics in international relations. It was meant, at a fundamental level, to reconnect and reach out in the civilizational space we share with our near neighbours in Southeast Asia, and catalyse the sharing of capacities and opportunities to improve the economic well-being of our peoples. Our relationship with ASEAN was the natural pivot in this deepening collaboration. It is a fact little recognized that India is as much a Southeast Asian nation as a South Asian nation, given the rich linguistic and ethnic mosaic of our Northeast, and the fact that we share borders with a large ASEAN nation – Myanmar. Our Andaman and Nicobar islands chain are also in the very close vicinity of Southeast Asia.

Two decades of India’s Look East Policy have, therefore, seen India’s quick integration with Southeast & East Asia at the strategic, political, economic, cultural and people-to-people levels. This to me also represents the renewal of the rich civilizational contact expressed in India’s contact and interaction with this region in the annals of history.

India has strongly supported the process of reform and restructuring of the UN to make it better equipped to effectively respond to an era of transformational change in global affairs. India along with Brazil, Germany and Japan (together known as G-4 countries) have proposed expansion of the Security Council membership from the current fifteen to twenty-five members, with the addition of six permanent and four non-permanent members. The G-4 efforts have helped launch the text-based inter-governmental negotiations in the UN on the Security Council reform issue in July 2010. This was a significant development after many years of meandering discussion. The effort is an ongoing one, and support for reform and expansion from member countries is growing in a substantive manner.
India joined the UN Security Council as a non-permanent member on 1 January 2011 for a two-year term after winning a record number of votes. In these six months, our focus and effort has been concentrated on the need for resolution of conflict through reasoned negotiation and diplomatic means rather than the use of force. We have also supported the greater involvement of regional organizations like the African Union in the resolution of disputes within their regions.

India is one of the oldest, largest and consistent contributors to the UN peacekeeping operations. It is currently the third largest troop contributor with 8,691 personnel deployed with nine UN Peacekeeping Missions. The high standards of performance maintained consistently by the Indian troops and policemen, including our women personnel I might add, deployed on UN Missions under challenging circumstances have won them high regard.

As the chair of the Security Council’s Counter Terrorism (1373) Committee (CTC), and the 1566 Working Group, we are committed to taking global counter-terrorism efforts forward.

We also consider the 1267 regime against Al Qaeda and Taliban as a core instrument available to the International community in our fight against terrorism. The challenge before the 1267 regime is to ensure complete commitment to eliminating the scourge of terrorism, and to resist the dilution of such efforts for reasons that may seem compelling today but may not withstand the test of ground realities.

Adoption of a Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT), a draft for which was proposed by India way back in 1996, is a key objective for us. We feel that with some modifications, the text currently being discussed in the Working Group [of the Sixth Committee of the UNGA] could find acceptability with the majority of Member States.

India has committed its full support to international anti-piracy efforts. An Indian naval ship deployed in the Gulf of Aden has successfully thwarted several piracy attempts and provided security escort to several merchant ships in these waters. As a founder member of the Contact Group on Piracy off the Coast of Somalia (CGPCS), India actively participates in its deliberations and anti-piracy efforts. The Indian Navy also coordinates and shares operational information with other Navies under the Shared Awareness and De-confliction (SHADE) mechanism.

India has welcomed efforts for countering piracy by the enhancement of regional cooperation and capacity building of littoral states. India also supports determined action against the kingpins, financiers and facilitators of piracy through tracking of financial flows. A key issue for India is the welfare of hostages in the custody of pirates.

India remains steadfast in its commitment to the goal of global, universal and non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament, as outlined in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan. We believe that nuclear disarmament can be achieved by a step-by-step process underwritten by a universal commitment and an agreed multilateral framework for achieving global, non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament in a verifiable manner. India is willing to engage in a meaningful dialogue among all states possessing nuclear weapons to build trust and confidence and reduce the salience of nuclear weapons in international affairs and security doctrines. India supports negotiations in the Conference on Disarmament towards a universal, non-discriminatory and verifiable FMCT that bans the future production of fissile materials for weapons purposes.

Over the recent years, our Civil Nuclear Initiative has resulted in international civil nuclear energy cooperation with various international partners, including the US, France, UK, Russia, Canada, etc. This has reflected recognition of India’s impeccable non-proliferation record and its contributions to global non-proliferation objectives. We have in place strict and effective controls over the export of sensitive items in line with the best international standards. India has expressed interest in the full membership of the four multilateral export control regimes which we believe will be mutually beneficial. We are engaged with the regimes and regime members and hope to make progress in that direction with the support of our partners, including the UK.

The tragic incident at the Fukushima Daichi Nuclear Power Plant in Japan has raised world wide concerns about the safety aspects of nuclear power. The lessons learnt from the Fukushima incident will be useful for the global nuclear power industry. At the national level, India is taking measures to reassure our people about the safety of our nuclear power plants, including technical review of safety of our plants and strengthening the safety regulatory framework. We also participated in the recent IAEA Ministerial Conference on Nuclear Safety in Vienna.

Climate change is an extraordinary global challenge facing humanity today and requires an urgent, collective and coordinated global response. For the developing countries, the issue of climate change goes beyond environmental sustainability and directly impacts on their developmental aspirations. The global effort to address climate change must be anchored to the basic principles of “equity” and “common but differentiated responsibility (CBDR) and respective capabilities.” Equitable burden sharing that provides for an equal sharing of the resource of the atmosphere for all human beings is a natural expectation we have from the on-going negotiations. Talks in Bangkok and Bonn this year have shown that for a successful outcome at COP-17 in Durban, it would be important to maintain a balance between the operationalization of Cancun decisions and working on the unresolved issues under the Bali Action Plan. This, and urgent implementation of commitments by Annex-I parties for a 2nd Commitment Period under the Kyoto Protocol would be the key to a comprehensive, ambitious and balanced outcome in Durban. For a country like India, with one of the smallest carbon foot-prints in the world, the first and overriding priority is to pursue economic development, to alleviate poverty and to address our severe energy deficit. Half a billion people in India still need to be given access to commercial energy. Any international agreement will, therefore, have to be sensitive to the enormous challenges we face in bringing the benefits of growth to the poorer sections of our population.

In conclusion, I would like to reassert that India’s Foreign Policy is an amalgam of national interests, our conviction that inclusive structures of dialogue and cooperation to address the new dimensions of security threats are necessary, that the institutions of global governance including the United Nations should reflect current realities, and that the dynamism and energy of the Indian economic growth story must be shared with our region, and that to sustain our growth trajectory we need an environment that is free from transnational threats like terrorism. I thank you.
015. Interview of Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao to Indrani Bagchi for the Times of India.

New Delhi, July 17, 2011.

[Interview of Foreign Secretary by Indrani Bagchi for Times of India]

[Nirupama Rao doffs one hat only to don another. Wrapping up a successful two-year stint as foreign secretary, Rao, 60, is to be India's new envoy to the United States. During her last week in office, she will be conducting two big foreign policy dialogues with the US and Pakistan. She speaks to Indrani Bagchi about life in the foreign office, the Pakistan dilemma and her tweets.]

What are your expectations from the upcoming India-US Strategic Dialogue. Would you agree with the perception that India-US relations have plateaued or are adrift?

Ans: We're looking forward to welcoming Secretary Hillary Clinton to Delhi. This will be the second strategic dialogue. We have one day, July 19, set for meetings. I don't agree that India-US relations are adrift. Since the visit of President Obama to India last November, we have accelerated the level of engagement. There is progress on a number of areas and there is a very broad based bilateral agenda.

We've just launched a dialogue on West Asia this week. Defence cooperation has grown. The Homeland Security dialogue has been launched, which supplements ongoing counter-terrorism cooperation. The quality of the non-proliferation dialogue is also completely changed. The level of communication and the chemistry that I have been able to establish with my counterparts, like Under Secretary Ellen Tauscher is positive.

Beyond political and economic meetings we're trying to harness the power of science and technology, agriculture, health, clean energy and education. We're partnering each other in food security as well as jointly working in other parts of the world, including Africa.

The US says they will stand by the nuclear deal, yet it appears that their obligations to the NSG's new guidelines on ENR are in conflict with their commitment. Your comments.

Ans: Let's look at the US statement of 23rd June, which states clearly that the US remains committed to the "clean exemption" accorded to India in the 2008 NSG decision. We have told them this is sacrosanct and cannot be diluted. The US stated that it is committed to "full civil nuclear cooperation" with India. These are the exact words they've used. And the kind of feedback we've got post the ENR decision is that they're committed to taking forward the nuclear relationship on the basis of full implementation of mutual commitments. And that is something that we regard as the bedrock.

India will implement its commitments but we expect our partners - US, France, Russia - to fully implement their commitments as well. France and Russia have also clarified their national positions.

Were we too slow in pushing against the ENR restrictions which have been building up for the past couple of years?

Ans: We spared no effort in putting across our viewpoint within the NSG and with individual countries. A lot of work went into that. And in the three rounds of the Security dialogue that we've had since 2009 we've been very clear on the matter. In fact, the US statement of 23rd June is actually a response to the concern we've expressed on the ENR issue. Let me say something else: I'm quite confident that long term trends in the global nuclear architecture will move in India's favour. And systems that exclude India will give way to those that see India as an indispensable partner.

Its another July, and another round of India-Pakistan talks. In the context of the Mumbai attacks on Wednesday, is this another jinxed dialogue?

Ans: Every time there is a terror attack in India, being Indian, we tend to freeze a little. Its very natural for us to think of all that has happened in the past. So much of this issue has complicated our relationship with Pakistan. I am convinced of the need for India and Pakistan to discuss such issues of vital importance for the future of this region, if we want a stable future. I know the extent of pain and suffering that we as a country have to deal with, and has been inflicted upon us by cross-border terrorism, I don't think the memories of that can fade so easily. But because we share borders, we will always have to deal with them. I don't think unadulterated confrontation or speaking the language of conflict can help us or Pakistan.

What are your expectations from the Krishna-Hina round next week?

Ans: There are no miracles that we can expect, just from the fact that we have sought to engage Pakistan. Particularly on terrorism, the kind of feedback I got from my last interaction with my counterpart Salman Bashir was that they wanted also to make this a primary issue in the discussion between the two countries, to sit down and work out how we can tackle this more effectively. We have to build on that and see how it goes forward. I have no readymade prescriptions that I can offer but I certainly think we have to make an honest effort. I don't believe stopping talks is the answer.
What about China?

Ans: Our bilateral relationship is one of India’s most important foreign policy relationships. We have a very long border.

The nature and content of the bilateral relationship has evolved significantly in the last few years. From both sides, I think we’ve been able to manage this relationship despite the complexities and difficulties - in a manner that has ensured tranquility on our border, that has ensured regular dialogue across a number of issues for mutual benefit.

I think we’ve been able to establish a sort of equilibrium in the relationship. Our dialogue has kept going despite the manner in which the media sometimes have tended to give an impression to the contrary.

Communication is good and this relationship has matured over the years. There are still issues that need to be solved. The boundary question, the issue of China’s relationship with Pakistan, which crops up constantly, but the level of candour with which we have been able to discuss these issues with China is also very noticeable.

You are starting the first India-Japan-US trilateral dialogue. What’s on the menu?

Ans: The trilateral is a new exercise at the official level, and adds a new dimension to our relations with two important strategic partners. They’ve been very keen. Our three countries have done naval exercises together. We have shared interests including economic development of the region, having an open, balanced, inclusive, architecture for discussions of issues that concern our region, security of sea lanes of communication, issues like terrorism, non-proliferation. We will discuss the changes taking place in our region, since we’re part of many regional forums together. Let me emphasise its not some kind of exclusive arrangement, not like we’re creating some kind of exclusive club, but its part of our growing breadth of engagement in the region.

You have just finished a successful stint as foreign secretary? How did you make a difference?

Ans: That’s not for me to judge. But every bit of my last two years have been wonderfully exciting, fulfilling, challenging.

The job description of the foreign secretary has been redefined in a manner that you would never have conceived of a few years ago. The scope of the issues being covered, immediacy of many of the subjects we are handling especially in our neighbourhood, have all changed. I did try to make a difference and I believe I’ve made an honest effort.
Give us a flavour of your last couple of years — what did you feel, what were challenges you thought were unique to you, and what were your unique advantages that you brought to the job?

Ans: It was exactly 10 years ago I became the first woman spokesperson for this ministry. I remember the Agra Summit. It was an action-packed period. The Agra Summit was followed by 9/11 and I watched the world change before my very eyes. The attack on Parliament and everything after that. I went on to do administration and I learnt valuable lessons about the ministry itself. My work in Sri Lanka and China was fulfilling. I was in Sri Lanka during the tsunami, in China during the Olympics. You could say I’ve had a ringside view of history.

I realised when I was in administration that the service in terms of its human resources had to be augmented if we wanted to rise to the challenges India was facing. We need more people in the junior and middle levels. We are doing some of that. There is a cabinet decision to increase cadre strength. This year, we’re taking over 30.

You have to look at recruitment differently. Once you recruit it takes years to bring that officer to the level of experience that is needed. It takes over 10 years. In the interim we’re taking people from other ministries, mainly economic ministries. We are in the process of structuring the work of the ministry in a way that focuses on development cooperation.

Any regrets, any advice you want to leave behind for your successor?

Ans: Time has a velocity we cannot escape. But I’ve learnt to manage the energy and time quotient as well as I could. When I look back at the last two years, I haven’t seen any high points of tension in my personal life. I haven’t got stressed out. That I’m thankful for.

I would have liked to spend more time with the younger officers in the ministry. I’ve tried my best not to abandon the human side of what we all are as people. I’ve tried to humanize the work situation, rather than dehumanize it.

I’m sure my successor, Ranjan Mathai will do wonderfully well. He comes to the job with very impressive accomplishments and experience.

Which accomplishments are you particularly proud of?

Ans: When I look back I think the Libya evacuation was a demanding but fulfilling experience. Our missions in Tripoli, Cairo and Tunisia did a wonderful job.

I created about 300 posts for the passport and visa division. That aspect concerns our dealings with the public. The public diplomacy division acquired a positive profile. We’ve created a database of international relations scholars in India, and we’re hoping to have the first international relations conference for Indian scholars in September.

The next step is how to augment the research and historical department in MEA. We had a historical department until about 15 years ago. We’ll have to get people from outside, who will work with the ministry, there has to be something like a cross-fertilization of official stream and scholars. It won’t be the classic structure of old where you could have recruited a few people. We need area specialists.

Much has been said about you and social media...

Ans: I now have 20000 followers on Twitter. I find it very useful in correcting erroneous information and contra-factual reporting that may come up from time to time.

Almost 30-40 of our overseas missions are now on Facebook. The one in Cairo is bilingual. We’ve set up a Facebook page for our ITEC fellows over the years. They’re all coming in and sharing experiences. We’re using it just to bring people back into the ministry’s fold, communicate better. So much work has gone into building these relationships, creating stakeholders for India.
016. Address by Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao on “Maritime Dimensions of India’s Foreign Policy”. New Delhi, July 28, 2011.

Speech by Foreign Secretary Nirupama Rao on “Maritime Dimensions of India’s Foreign Policy” organized by the National Maritime Foundation at India Habitat Centre

Admiral Arun Prakash, Chairman NMF
Commodore C Udai Bhaskar, Director NMF

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Young students, dear friends from the diplomatic corps and the media

It is a pleasure to be invited to speak at the National Maritime Foundation, which, under the stewardship of Admiral Arun Prakash and his team, has emerged as the premier institution in the country working on matters relating to the nation’s maritime interests and policies.

The question posed by the title of my talk today is what are the maritime dimensions of India’s foreign policy? The answer is not far to seek. With any policy that has an outward orientation, as does foreign policy, the overlap with security, land, and maritime frontier dimensions is difficult to ignore. For Peninsular India, the lure of the sea around it, has moulded and set the course of the history of the people who inhabit it. The ocean also brought traders and colonizers. Our vantage location with the Indian Ocean literally at our feet, became in those early times, also a source of vulnerability, laying bare our unpreparedness to face external threat. Learning lessons from the broad sweep of history, Pandit Nehru concluded: “We cannot afford to be weak at sea. History has shown that whoever controls the Indian Ocean has, in the first instance, India’s sea-borne trade at her mercy and, in the second, India’s very independence itself.” We forget this lesson of history at our own risk. All the more reason, therefore, that our engagement and interaction with the world, should internalize awareness of these risks and vulnerabilities and prevent their return, in new forms, to haunt us again and threaten our development and wellbeing.

India is naturally a maritime nation- a coast line of over 7500 kms; the Lakshwadweep and the Andaman and Nicobar chains stretch over 600 islands, with southernmost tip just 90 nautical miles from Indonesia and the northern most tip less than 10 nautical miles from Myanmar. Our EEZ is more than 2.5 million square Kms. The mining areas of over 150,000 sq Kms allotted to India under UNCLOS are about 2000 kms from our southernmost tip. We have significant interests in Antarctica as well. Our inseparable bonds with the Indian Ocean region are not merely geographical but of deeper civilizational significance. Historical, cultural economic and political linkages have been forged between India and the Indian Ocean over millennia.

India is almost an island as far as trade is concerned. In the absence of good regional land connectivity, the bulk of our trade is seaborne. India’s global mercantile trade has grown phenomenally and now constitutes 41% of our GDP. 77% of our trade by value, and over 90% by volume is carried by sea. India is now projected to become the fourth largest economy in the world by 2020, after China, Japan and the US. Our dependence on sea borne trade is expected to expand exponentially. The maritime dimension is also vital for our energy security. India’s oil consumption is expected to rise to 245 million tons annually by 2020, with the country likely to be the world’s single largest importer of oil by 2050. Our economic growth would continue to be critically depended upon unhindered flow of oil. The sea borne terrorist attacks on Mumbai- 26/11, focused the need for strengthening maritime and coastal security against threats from sea. Clandestine proliferation networks also use seaways for proliferation activities. It follows that our foreign policy has to focus on these critical aspects for our national development and security.

India has a vision of the Indian Ocean region unshackled from historical divisions and bound together in collective pursuit of peace, and prosperity. As a mature and responsible nation, one of our foreign policy interests is to evolve a regional architecture based on the twin principles of shared security and shared prosperity. India is well poised to play a substantive and formative role in this regard.

We have friendly and productive bilateral relations with almost all the states in the Indian Ocean region. Our bilateral relations with Sri Lanka, Bangladesh, Indonesia, Mauritius, Maldives, Myanmar, Seychelles, Oman, Mozambique South Africa and others facilitate access to a wide swathe of the Indian Ocean. Maritime Security is an important dimension of our relations with ASEAN countries, in particular Singapore and Vietnam. Many of these are territorial neighbours but all are our maritime neighbours. We have historical and civilizational ties with many of these countries. Some of these countries have large Indian communities. The broad spectrum of our ties with these countries has a strong economic and socio-cultural dimension. The Indian Navy has contributed towards expanding our diplomatic engagement in the region and beyond. An active Indian naval presence is welcomed in many waters, near and far from our shores. In cooperation with the Indian Navy, we are looking at ways of long term engagement with many of these countries in capacity building including training assistance, refit of ships joint exercises, coordinated patrols, supply of hardware and product support. We are also prepared to assist countries to conduct EEZ surveillance.

Maritime Security is emerging as an important element of our dialogue architecture with various countries, including with the United States. This includes periodic bilateral exercises, information exchanges through maritime domain awareness, sharing of best practices in areas such as search and rescue, maritime safety, pollution control, maritime law enforcement that could cover counter narcotics and counter piracy, training, exercises and humanitarian assistance and disaster relief and exchange of views on promoting a regional security architecture that enhances maritime security.

In addition to bilateral interactions, we are actively engaged with almost all regional bodies that are either based in or border the Indian Ocean region-ranging from SAARC, BIMSTEC, EAS, ARF, ASEAN, GCC, SADC to the AU. Prime Minister’s participation in the second India-Africa Forum Summit held in Addis Ababa on May 25 2011 was indeed a milestone. Our aim is to build a web of cooperative relations that brings together all the stakeholders based on mutual interest and benefit. India’s ‘soft power’ attributes give us an advantage that few countries have.

The scourge of piracy off the Somali coast poses a serious problem for safety of maritime traffic as well as the well-being of crew members. The Gulf of Aden is a major trading route for India. Approximately US $ 110 billion of our trade passes through it. India contributes around 7% of the world’s merchant mariners and thus has an abiding interest in their safety and security. In the UN and other multilateral fora, India has urged greater international cooperation in anti-piracy efforts, including welfare of the hostages. It was at India’s specific instance that the UN Security Council, vide resolution 1976 of April 11, 2011, for the first time strongly condemned the growing practice of hostage-taking by pirates operating off the coast of Somalia, expressed serious concern at the inhuman conditions hostages face in captivity, recognized the adverse impact on their families, called for the immediate release of all hostages, and called upon States to cooperate, as appropriate, on the issue of hostage-taking. On India’s intervention, the Contact Group in its Communiqué, issued at the latest (9th) Plenary Meeting on 14 July 2011, expressed outrage at the suffering of innocent seafarers held hostage by pirates, including reports of increased violence and even torture, and called for continued international focus on comprehensive counter-piracy efforts and sustained contribution to them. In addition, India is engaged with other countries on capacity-building and consultations in the area of anti-piracy to devise measures for keeping open access points to avoid choking international trade.
The Indian Navy commenced anti-piracy patrols in the Gulf of Aden from October 2008. Since then, 25 Indian Navy ships have been deployed in the Gulf of Aden to provide point to point escort to merchant vessels passing through the 490 nautical miles (nm) long and 20 nm wide Internationally Recommended Transit Corridor (IRTC) in the Gulf of Aden. In addition to escorting Indian flagged vessels, ships of other countries have also been provided protection. Since October 2008, Indian Navy ships have escorted more than 1500 ships, including more than 1350 foreign flagged vessels from different countries. Indian ships thwarted more than 26 piracy attempts; no ship under Indian escort has been hijacked by pirates. Indian Navy and Coast Guard through their effective vigilance have successfully thwarted attempted piracy attempts in our EEZ.

With increased presence of naval forces off the coast of Somalia and in the Gulf of Aden, pirates have moved to other areas and increased pirate activity has been witnessed in the larger Indian Ocean area outside the Internationally Recommended Transit Corridor (IRTC), including close to the West Coast of India. As the piracy prone area has expanded eastwards, the Indian Navy has made additional deployments off the Eastern and North Eastern Arabian Sea.

India, as a founder-member of the ‘Contact Group on Piracy off the Coast of Somalia’ (CGPCS), established in January 2009, has been fully engaged in the efforts of the group to share information, coordinate actions of navies in combating piracy in the Gulf of Aden, raising public and merchant marine awareness and, examining legal and criminal justice issues with respect to apprehended pirates. Further, the Indian Navy has proactively cooperated with other navies through the SHADE (Shared Awareness and De-confliction) mechanism and otherwise. Our Navy deserves high commendation for the professional manner in which it has conducted anti-piracy operations.

Questions have been asked as to the judicial process for handling captured pirates. In principle India does not support establishment of any international judicial tribunal under Chapter VII as such action would interfere with the national legal sovereignty of States. On basis of legal opinion, India is inclined to support the establishment of a special chamber within the national jurisdiction of a State or States in the region, with UN participation. This option is considered suitable besides being cost effective, as it would strengthen the existing jurisdiction with the established procedures. It also provides opportunity in capacity building for countries in the region. Further, this arrangement provides proximity for the purpose of transfer of suspects by patrolling naval states and also the transfer of those convicted to third States for imprisonment. We in MEA are also at an advanced stage of drafting a new bill on piracy that would help in the prosecution of captured pirates.
Let me turn to some of the multilateral initiatives which are of significance for maritime security.

The Indian Ocean Naval Symposium (IONS) was launched in February 2008 as a cooperative maritime security initiative following a meeting of Chiefs of Navy of nearly all littoral States of Indian Ocean in New Delhi. The Charter of Business of IONS is to provide a framework to promote shared understanding of maritime issues facing the littoral States of the Indian Ocean region; enhance regional maritime security and stability; establish and promote variety of cooperative mechanisms and develop inter-operability in terms of doctrines, procedures etc. IONS, an inclusive and consultative regional forum provides a platform for all IOR littoral navies to periodically and regularly discuss issues that bear upon regional maritime security.

As per the charter the membership of IONS will be open to any country whose territory abuts or lies within the Indian Ocean. Other countries can become Observers if they meet the agreed criterion. The Chairmanship of the IONS initiative will be rotated every two years. The text of Charter of Business has incorporated suggestions by various countries including India, Australia, France etc. Member States are expected to approve the Charter during next meeting of IONS scheduled in 2012 to be hosted by South Africa. It would then come into force and guide the future activities of IONS initiative. The Navy and MEA have worked closely on the IONS initiative.

In our diplomatic engagement with the ASEAN, the ARF has recognized that maritime security is an indispensible and fundamental condition for the welfare and economic security of the region. India is supportive of international and regional cooperative efforts in this regard. We are already working with ASEAN and other ASEAN Regional Forum members to ensure security of sea lanes against threats posed by piracy and other transnational crimes, and also to build capacity in the field of maritime security. Maritime security issues are one of the core focus areas of our navy in bilateral and multilateral interactions with other navies. The Indian Navy has been hosting the Milan series of biennial exercises since 1995 for building friendship and mutual understanding among participating navies of ARF countries. Cooperation and exchange of best practices on the maritime security issues were the core theme of Milan 2010 held at Port Blair in February last year.

India and ASEAN trade relations have expanded in recent years to over 46 billion dollars. Nearly 50% of India’s sea borne trade is east bound heading towards markets in ASEAN (with which we have an FTA in Goods that came into force in July 2010), East Asia, the United States and Canada. India has also invested in off shore energy development projects in partnership with Petro Vietnam. The South China Sea is an important shipping route. India supports the freedom of navigation in the South China Sea. At the recent ARF meeting in Bali, India noted that the parties concerned were engaged in discussions to address the South China Sea issue and welcomed the recently agreed guidelines on the implementation of the 2002 Declaration of the Conduct of Parties between China and ASEAN.

The Regional Cooperation Agreement on Combating Piracy and Armed Robbery against Ships in Asia (ReCAAP) is the first regional Government to Government agreement to promote and enhance cooperation against piracy and armed robbery at sea in Asia. To date, 15 states have become Contracting Parties to ReCAAP. The ReCAAP initiatives have contributed significantly towards maritime security in the region. The ReCAAP has been recognized as a model organization by IMO for cooperation of regional governments to combat piracy and armed robbery. India is a founding member of ReCAAP and contributed financially towards the running of the Information Sharing Centre (ISC) of the ReCAAP ISC. Our contributions in ReCAAP have contributed towards enhancing our stature as responsible maritime state in the region. In addition, it has also helped our ongoing regional engagement initiatives.

The ASEAN+8 Defence Ministers Meeting (ADMM Plus) Plus is a significant milestone in the evolving security architecture in the Asia Pacific region. The ADMM Plus has identified five areas of cooperation – maritime security, humanitarian assistance and disaster relief (HADR), military medicine, counter-terrorism and peacekeeping operations. India is seen as an important stakeholder in the ADMM Plus activities.

We expect maritime security to be an important issue that would be discussed in the context of the East Asia Summit which will be held later this year. During my visit to Japan, it was agreed to establish an India-Japan-United States trilateral dialogue on regional and global issues of shared interest. Maritime security would be one important issue that will be discussed in this Initiative. In fact, the evolution of the Asia-Pacific Security architecture will depend to a large measure how states are able to pull together interests and capabilities to address common threats and preserve and protect the Global Commons, including maritime security.

A word about neighbourhood policy particularly with maritime neighbours. Issues like coastal security consolidation and fisheries cooperation are also very much within the domain of our foreign policy concerns, as any analysis of neighbourhood policy would indicate. The salience of creating a fisheries management policy in the Palk Straits and the Gulf of Mannar through cooperation between India and Sri Lanka is receiving considerable focus of late. This involves close coordination with the Navy, the Coast Guard, and the State Governments concerned. The issue of maritime boundary delimitation with our neighbours is also dealt with in the Ministry of External Affairs. Competing demands for natural resources, including energy sources, can come into play. The challenge is to find solutions that are mutually acceptable. Conserving and protecting precious marine biology and the oceanic environment through cooperation between littoral states is another important aspect of this maritime dimension. The effects of global warming and climate change on sea levels can have critical human security related repercussions on low lying countries, and the small island developing states. All this falls within the ambit of foreign policy concern.

The development of port and harbour infrastructure both on our coastline in order to improve our global trade turnover, cannot be divorced from the steps being taken in our neighbourhood to develop ports or modernize them with foreign assistance. The economic and security repercussions of such moves have been the subject of intense scrutiny and analysis by our strategic and security experts. The naval outreach and capability of a number of countries has been growing in the Indian Ocean region. Our own capability to be infrastructure builders in our immediate neighbourhood and region needs to be enhanced significantly. Our naval cooperation in the neighbourhood needs further stepping up. Capacity building, training, equipment and vessel supply are all areas that need further attention. With the region, we need to build a common vision of maritime security, conflict prevention, the unhindered passage of trade, counter terrorism and piracy, disaster prevention and humanitarian relief, and the peaceful settlement of disputes, in a balanced and inclusive manner that safeguards these regional and global commons.

It goes without saying that our ability to shape our maritime security environment will require the development of a credible naval presence with adequate assets commensurate with our defence and security interests as well as those required to discharge the role and responsibility expected of India by the international community. As a diplomatic instrument, the Navy has key attributes- access, mobility, reach and versatility. We need to embed these attributes within the larger vision of India’s role in the global arena. A flexible but proactive maritime doctrine is essential to safeguard and project our national interests overseas. The Navy and our foreign policy establishment need to establish closer coordination in this regard. I am confident that the National Maritime Foundation will continue to play a leading role in shaping such a doctrine. I wish Admiral Arun Prakash and his team the very best in their endeavors.

Thank you.
Interview of Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao on Headlines Today TV Channel.

New Delhi, July 29, 2011.

Interviewer (Mr. Saurabh Shukla): Foreign Secretary, good to… (Unclear)… with you on your dream project the Jawaharlal Nehru Bhavan. In fact, the MEA is finally getting a home of its own.

Foreign Secretary (Shrimati Nirupama Rao): Well, I am very happy to see the project having come up in this fashion. I have seen it grow before my very eyes and I get an enormous sense of satisfaction because a lot of hard work has gone into this and we worked as a team - the Ministry of External Affairs, the CPWD, the people involved with the art work. It has been a project of our dreams and I am very happy to see it come up this way.

Interviewer: I believe it is a green building and a lot of special features have been added.

Foreign Secretary: Yes, it is a green building, and in terms of energy conservation, in terms of building materials that we have used it is very ecologically sensitive. If you come in the evening at twilight or dusk and you see the facade lighting also you get an idea of the lighting having been specially designed and used in a way that we spend as little energy as possible but at the same time ensure a beautiful effect.

Interviewer: Yes, it looks quite beautiful. What would you say the highlight of your career as the Foreign Secretary has been?

Foreign Secretary: I think it has been a marvellous journey, very exciting and full of discovery. Even though I have spent many years in the service, every moment I think you are learning. It is an education, it is a quest, intellectual quest. Professionally, it has been very fulfilling. It has been an action-packed period. And the work of the External Affairs Ministry as a whole I believe has expanded in many ways and it has become much more encompassing than before, especially when we deal with issues concerning the neighbourhood. It is very natural and essential that we focus on relations with neighbours. So, I have tried to spend a lot of time trying to look at these relationships.

Interviewer: What was the most challenging assignment for you?

Foreign Secretary: I was very happy and privileged to work on the process of recommencement of dialogue with Pakistan. I get a sense of satisfaction from the fact that we have been able to carry out the directions of our Prime Minister and translate his vision into the first steps that are needed to be taken to begin to connect once again, to talk, to open dialogue in various fields. That I think is something that I look back on with a lot of professional satisfaction and fulfilment.

Interviewer: You have just finished an important round of dialogue with Pakistan. The Foreign Ministers met. You met your counterpart. Are you satisfied with the Pakistani response and the 26/11 investigations, or do you think they need to do much more?

Foreign Secretary: Obviously you need progress on the Mumbai terror trials. You need the culprits to be brought to justice. This is what we have been emphasising all along to Pakistan.

Interviewer: Were you satisfied with their response this time when you met them?

Foreign Secretary: The point that has been made, the Home Minister has made this point and we have also made this point, is that Pakistan needs to accelerate its efforts. We need to see more concrete outcomes, most importantly the culprits to be brought to book. At the same time the Home Secretary of India and the Interior Secretary of Pakistan have started a dialogue on issues relating to counterterrorism including progress on the Mumbai trial. So, this is an ongoing process. It is too early to express satisfaction. But I do not want you to make it your headline because I think the headline has to be the fact that India and Pakistan are talking to each other, understanding full well what the problems are, how difficult the issues are. But we have begun to deal with these issues I think in an intelligent, problem-solving way.

Interviewer: The Foreign Minister of Pakistan told us that India’s approach to this whole Mumbai 26/11 investigation is dated. What do you have to say to that?

Foreign Secretary: I said it before also there is no use by date advice on this whole issue of the Mumbai terror attack. It is something that is of deep concern to India, to the Indian people; and we can hardly afford to be insensitive to the feelings of our people on this issue of Mumbai.

Interviewer: But do you really feel that by taking incremental steps like confidence-building measures on the Line of Control you can settle difficult issues like Kashmir and terrorism because Pakistan says that Kashmir is the core issue? India says Kashmir is an integral part of India. So, how do you reconcile those differences?

Foreign Secretary: I think you and the people in the media, I say it in a friendly way, are as much Indian as we are. And you should be as much focused on the need to craft and normalise our relationship with Pakistan. I think it is your responsibility as much as it is ours. You must understand that there will be no dramatic breakthroughs. This is not something like you get an instant coffee rush about. It is not that. Relations between India and Pakistan should not be seen on the basis of the headlines that you generate.

Interviewer: It is not fast food diplomacy?

Foreign Secretary: It is not an issue of getting instant satisfaction from this. This is not about emotional highs and lows. You have to be very very realistic and understand the nature of the terrain that is involved and take incremental, graduated steps. Now on the issue of Jammu and Kashmir, the CBMs across the Line of Control, what do they do? They help people connect with each other. They help traders to do business with each other. They make it easier for people on both sides of the Line of Control to engage with each other in a peaceful way. I think that is a very important measure that you need to put in place to create that climate of confidence and to reduce the trust deficit. Obviously we will have to, and the structure for resolving the Jammu and Kashmir issue is really a bilateral structure, India and Pakistan have to sit down and discuss this. And it is my hope that as the dialogue progresses, as the future opens up before us we will get down to discussing these fundamental issues also.

Interviewer: China is one area you have been closely associated with the boundary negotiations. You were an Ambassador in Beijing. What is the problem? What is the sticking point there? We have been meeting for so long but nothing seems to be opening and nothing seems to be working. What is the problem there?

Foreign Secretary: Again, I do not believe there are quick fixes. This is a longstanding issue, the boundary question between India and China. We have a mechanism in place. We have the forum that has been created by the Special Representatives. They have had 14 rounds of meetings so far and that just illustrates the complexity of the problem. But let me also tell you that the border between India and China has remained peaceful for many decades now. I think that in itself is a concrete achievement. Let us not underestimate the importance of that. And we have to understand there are pockets of difference also in interpretation of the Line of Actual Control between the two countries. How do you minimize tensions? How do you ensure that there are mechanisms in place to deal with transgressions when they happen? You hear of transgressions happening from time to time. So, we are very much on track, India and China, in focusing on these issues and trying to see how we can create even better mechanisms to ensure peace and tranquility in the border areas while at the same time we move forward with the discussions to resolve the boundary question.
Interviewer: But are you not concerned that they gave an assurance, that too from the Chinese Prime Minister when he came here, on the stapled visa issue but that has not been followed up, or has not been kept so far?

Foreign Secretary: Our people, our nationals, our citizens from Jammu and Kashmir, I think there has been some change in the situation. Now, I do not want to sound completely as if the problem has been solved. But I think there has been some sort of a transition, some sort of a change in the situation from as it existed a few months ago. We will have to see, we will have to evaluate, we have to assess whether this is a fundamental change or whether this is just something that is transitory. But let me say that I believe and this is what I am told by the Chinese Ambassador and the Embassy there that people are being given visas, not stapled visas, residents of Jammu and Kashmir are being given visas to travel, and that many such people have travelled to China in the last two months.

Interviewer: But they have not told you explicitly that they have discontinued with the policy of stapled visa.

Foreign Secretary: The point is, it is not expressed in such a stark fashion. It is not like ticking a box to say yes or no. It is not like that. Diplomacy does not work like that. You have to see that things change. There is a gradual shift or there is a sort of a change of hues, a change of colours. That is how it happens. I think you should be patient. I think you should allow for these processes to take root and to become stronger. I think you must be patient, you must understand that with differences of this nature. It is not like bringing the other side, even India can never be brought to its knees and I presume China also looks at it that way. I think you must understand in relationships of this nature as important as they are, we will have to deal with each other constantly to see how we can sort out problems and make things better, and then gradually make them as best as they can be.

Interviewer: If you were to turn back the clock, what is one decision you feel you could have done differently as India’s top diplomat?

Foreign Secretary: I do not think I have really any regrets when I look back. I think I look at the work that we did in the Ministry in these last two years, I mentioned Pakistan, the Libya evacuation for instance was a very very huge operation.

Interviewer: That is a big one, yes.

Foreign Secretary: I look at the building behind us today, the kind of work that went into it. I look at the posts that we created in the Central Passport Organisation for the first time, I believe my colleagues tell me, since 1947. We have done a cadre review for the IFS-B which is before the Finance Ministry at the moment. So, I think there has been a lot of good work that all of us...

Interviewer: But something that you felt that you could have done better on an area where you felt not much was achieved?

Foreign Secretary: By and large I would say that it has been a good season and it has been a time when the Ministry of External Affairs has been in the news, I hope for the right reasons, and it is not for me to assess my own performance. I think report cards have to be written by not me, there is a world outside that assesses you. I think the Indian Agency for Partnership in Development, which is going to be the development wing of the MEA, I worked on the proposal and we have it all together. I would have liked to see it approved before I demitted office. But these things are ...

Interviewer: Essentially to clean up the mess in the LoCs and things like that.

Foreign Secretary: I would not say it is a mess but I think it would streamline the procedures and it would create an expert body to assess projects, to execute them, implement them. So, we are embarking on an expansion of our role as a Foreign Ministry when you look at the development related areas of work that we are now increasingly undertaking both in the neighbourhood and in other parts of the developing world including Africa and Southeast Asia.

Interviewer: You have been High Commissioner to Sri Lanka. You know obviously there have been these cases of human rights violations there. Headlines Today aired a documentary. How are you going to tell the Rajapaksa regime that they need to do more on the issue of human rights because I believe you are going there as well?

Foreign Secretary: They obviously have to look at this very carefully. I am sure they are assessing the impact of that documentary. I believe they are in touch with western governments. And of course the last few days of the war, I call it the fog of war, and they were fighting a terrorist outfit, the LTTE, and it was the last days of the conflict. And you have seen all around the world when it comes to - I am not in any way justifying it at all, please do not think I am justifying anything that may have happened - but it was a war zone, and very often things can go very wrong in a war zone, and civilians get caught, civilians become victims of this.

Interviewer: But in your own way, have you expressed your concerns?

Foreign Secretary: I think the civil war in Sri Lanka was a human tragedy. You look at not only the numbers who were killed or lost their lives or were injured or maimed, you think of the people who were displaced, people who left the northern part of the country. And you must also think of the fact that on the government side there were many young soldiers recruited from villages in the deep south of the country who also lost their lives. So, there has been a tragedy for the country and I think you must understand that the gaping wounds from that tragedy need to heal, and we must not think of restoring normalcy in the country. We have to think of reconstruction, rehabilitation and allowing the people, the minorities to have a voice to be able to realise their aspirations to live as citizens who can contribute to the progress of the country, improve their human development, access to facilities, health, education, roads, infrastructure, connectivity. I think there is a lot of work to be done. I think for us in the neighbourhood we must focus on these issues because ultimately India and Sri Lanka are such near neighbours. Gandhiji called India Sri Lanka's nearest neighbour. And as a nearest neighbour, I think we also have certain obligations to be very aware and to look at this with 20/20 vision. We have to avoid any partial conclusions, or any jumping to conclusions based on whatever we see coming in from other sources. We have to deal directly with the Sri Lankan government on this and that is what we are doing.

Interviewer: You take over as the new Indian Ambassador to the US very soon. So, let us talk about your new innings inside this magnificent building. It is good to be inside this lovely new building, Madam. Let us talk about your new assignment as India's Ambassador to Washington. What are you looking forward to? What are the challenges that you think you will face when you go there as India's new Ambassador?

Foreign Secretary: I think it is an extraordinarily rich relationship in terms of the ground that we have been able to cover in the last few years, the manner in which the dialogue has evolved, has progressed. If you just look at the dialogue and the cooperation between India and the United States, it is a kind of a whole of government approach. Almost every Ministry of the government is playing a role in the development of this relationship. So, obviously there will be exciting challenges to deal with and I expect to be very busy in this assignment and I am greatly looking forward to going back to Washington DC where I had served earlier, reconnecting with old friends. I think it is going to be quite exciting.

Interviewer: What are the challenges? The relationship still needs some repair work - Hillary Clinton was here, she did some of it - be it on nuclear issues, they want market access. We have had problem regarding harassment of your diplomats. You issued a very strong statement. So, you need to do a lot of repair work in Washington. How will you do it?

Foreign Secretary: I look at it as a relationship on which so much good has happened in the last few years. Look at the way we interact with each other.
When I go to Washington, for instance, just the variety of meetings, the nature of the discussion, just the content and substance of the discussion, it is a very serious, substantive relationship. So, I would not use the term repair when it comes to addressing the challenges we face. Obviously there will be certain areas where we may not agree with each other entirely, but that is what relationships are about. Relationships are about being able to deal with each other in a mature way, and to talk about issues on which there is divergence, and try and see how we can fix such problems and we can chart a course ahead. So, when it comes to whatever you referred to, there will be certain occasions, certain times when a problem arises. But what is diplomacy about? Diplomacy is about trying to find solutions. And I think both India and the United States look at the relationship that way. Secretary Clinton's visit last week was an extremely good example of that. We discussed issues, we spoke candidly about all the matters that concern both countries. We spoke about the situation in the region. Beyond the bilateral, there is a regional context in which we dialogue with each other in which we are building cooperation. And multilaterally also there is so much to do and talk about.

Interviewer: How do you address the people-centric issues? The Tri-Valley University issue happened. You have raised it also with the US side during the recent talks. And now there is another issue of Northern Virginia University. How do you settle these issues? These are of prime concern to the people of India, especially students who are going to the US.

Foreign Secretary: These are not insurmountable problems. On the latest issue that you mentioned, in fact the US authorities reached out to us and told us that there are these questions that have arisen about this university.

Interviewer: Indian Embassy in Washington or they got in touch with you?

Foreign Secretary: Our Embassy in Washington. They had told them about the problem and how they intended to deal with it. They have assured us that there will be no radio-tagging and no difficulties caused to our students who in any case are innocent people. If the university has to be investigated, in no way should these innocent students be targeted. And that they have said they will not, they will allow them to transfer to other universities; those of them who want to return home, they will be allowed to do so. So, I think the problem is being tackled in a different manner from the Tri-Valley. I think many lessons were learnt from the Tri-Valley episode.

Interviewer: So, do you think this issue will get sorted out and the US side has assured you on that?

Foreign Secretary: We are hopeful it will be sorted out. We are very carefully monitoring the situation. We remain in touch with the Department of State in Washington and the other US Departments concerned.
Interviewer: Even though we have a strategic relationship with the US, there is a sense that US sometimes is not a reliable partner, be it on transfer of technology on defence. On one hand they promised us a nuclear deal, they delivered on that, but then you have these new ENR guidelines of the Nuclear Suppliers Group which could not have come into place without being initiated by the US. So, how do you tackle such problems? What do you have to say to that?

Foreign Secretary: We tackle these issues by talking about them, by trying to see how we can understand each other better. I would just call this relationship a partnership. I would not attach epithets to it. I would not attach adjectives to it. It is a partnership, and it is a partnership of strategic significance, it is a partnership of economic significance, it is a partnership of political significance, because it is a partnership between two of the world's largest and best functioning democracies. So, one should not miss the larger picture when one looks at this relationship.

Interviewer: What about this whole ENR issue? Do you think that the Indo-US nuclear deal and some of the other agreements that we have with other countries would be undermined by these new regulations?

Foreign Secretary: You have to look at what the governments concerned have been saying, and they have reassured us and said it so publicly in so many words, that they intend to stick by the commitments which had been spelt out in the bilateral civil nuclear cooperation agreements that they transacted and concluded with India. They have said that upfront very soon after the ENR decision. As far as we are concerned, we believe these commitments must be scrupulously adhered to, there should be no dilution of these commitments. As far as we are concerned, we have always stood by our commitments. I am not meaning to be sanctimonious about it but I believe India is a country that is a responsible country, particularly on the nuclear issue I think our reputation is unblemished and untarnished and has remained so through the decades. And that is understood by our partners, by the larger international community. As I have said earlier, the global nuclear architecture as far as we see it in the Government of India, will be changed in India's favour as time goes by and you have to watch the space.

Interviewer: You are not concerned about the fact that they want you to tweak your nuclear liability law?

Foreign Secretary: No, this is a discussion obviously that is ongoing now to frame the rules and regulations through which this law will be applied. While doing so we are in discussion with the domestic companies, with the foreign companies concerned; and we want to provide a level playing field for everybody.
Interviewer: Are you concerned at the US troops' pullout from Afghanistan because this may affect the strategic stability of India as well because our security interests are closely tied with what happens there?

Foreign Secretary: Ultimately we want everything good for Afghanistan. We want a stable, prosperous, democratic Afghanistan with non-interference in its internal affairs from any other country. When it comes to the foreign troop presence in Afghanistan, they are there obviously to help stabilise the situation and they will be there as long as the Afghan Government needs them. Ultimately this has to be an Afghan-led process and Afghan-dictated process. So, one has to look at that. As far as the region is concerned, all of us regional players have their role to play in helping Afghanistan become stronger, becoming able to improve its governance, to strengthen its institutions, and to improve its trade and economic connectivity with the rest of the region. All of us can help in that. And India's role in Afghanistan has been greatly appreciated by the Afghan Government. In fact, we have helped transform lives in Afghanistan. As I said, post 2014 it is our hope that the institutions in Afghanistan will be much stronger, that terrorism would have been overcome, that there will be in no way any regression to the situation that obtained in that country prior to 2001. I think that is the effort that we are talking of. When we have the Bonn Conference later this year, we will be talking about the economic work that needs to be done in Afghanistan, the political work. There will be talk of reconciliation. Naturally we will keep in focus the redlines that should not be crossed when it comes to such reconciliation. We will be listening carefully to what the Afghan Government has to say on these matters. So, this is a period obviously of transition and we have to help Afghanistan during this period. It is a very crucial period, it is a very sensitive period not only for Afghanistan but for the region.

Interviewer: Mr. Fai's arrest in the US, obviously by the FBI, does it illustrate the fact that US and India are closely cooperating? Is the Government looking into some of his contacts here, some of the money trail that was going back and forth from India and the US?

Foreign Secretary: I do not believe you are painting the picture in a very accurate way. This is a Department of Justice matter that now they are acting against Ghulam Nabi Fai. We have known for years, for two decades, that he has been pursuing a certain agenda in Washington and that his activities needed scrutiny. So, our view on this, our approach has been very clear.

Interviewer: Do you think the US needs to put more pressure on Pakistan on the issue of terrorism because they are affected by it as much as India or any other civilised democracy around the world is?
Foreign Secretary: That is for the United States to do. I do not want to be commenting on what the United States needs to do with Pakistan. They are doing a lot. I believe there is a lot of focus on terrorism within Pakistan. I am more focused on what we and the United States do together. And there is very substantive counterterrorism cooperation. It is one of the pillars of our cooperation, of our strategic dialogue today.

Interviewer: Let me ask you a question on the elegance and style in diplomacy. I put it to Hina Rabbani Khar. A lot of eyes were on her. You are known for your style and elegance. Does it help in diplomacy in any way? Does it help to negotiate well? How does it help?

Foreign Secretary: I look at it from a different angle. I think you are representing the country and you obviously would like to represent the country in the best possible way. You place a lot of emphasis on dignity and being in control of the situation to the extent possible, to maintain your poise. These are all I think qualities that a diplomat anyway should possess, whether male or female. I think you should not have a gender based approach to these issues. I think elegance or poise or dignity should apply to both male and female diplomats.

Interviewer: One last question. As India’s Ambassador to the US, obviously you will have some tough time in convincing the US to actually fulfil its promise of supporting India at the UN Security Council as a permanent member. How challenging is that going to be because so far there has been very little movement on that?

Foreign Secretary: I think there is a whole campaign that needs to gather further momentum within the United Nations on this issue. We are going to work very closely with our partners and within the Security Council since we are non-permanent members of the Security Council until the end of next year. So, this is the season, this is the opportunity for us to make very concerted efforts to push this campaign forward. Obviously our interaction, our outreach to the United States is a very crucial segment of these efforts.

Interviewer: Foreign Secretary, thank you for hosting us at the MEA’s new home.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: Welcome to this programme Mrs. Nirupama Rao. You are just about to complete your tenure as the Foreign Secretary. In fact, tomorrow you are, day-after tomorrow you are handing over. Looking back, are you satisfied with what you have been able to do and are you leaving behind any unfinished agenda?

Foreign Secretary: Well, I look back at the last two years as a marvellous journey, full of excitement and full of discovery. I speak from the personal point of view and also from the professional point of view. I think it has been an action-packed tenure and the Ministry and its work have been very much in focus during this period. And when I look back I think of the various events that have concerned the Ministry, especially the re-commencement of dialogue with Pakistan which was one of the main projects that I sought to see activated and I was happy that the Ministry was able to make its contribution to the process and to be able, to help realize the vision of our Prime Minister in this regard. That was very satisfying. And I also look back at the expansion of the public diplomacy division, the Libya evacuation, the completion of the Jawaharlal Nehru Bhawan, which is the new building of the Ministry of External Affairs. The setting up of our new consulates in Jaffna and Hambantota in Sri Lanka, I see that also as a very positive achievement. And on the administrative side, the Ministry has been able to do some work to help expand the cadres and to create a better dispensation for our staff and our officials. So, I think it has been a good experience.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: Any unfinished agenda, anything which you wanted to, something you wanted and you could not do it?

Foreign Secretary: I think I tried to do whatever I could. The setting up of the Indian Agency for Partnership in Development which is going to the development arm of the Ministry, I have been able work on that and the proposal is ready and that is something I am now handing over to my successor. But that also I see as something I really spent time on and I was happy to contribute.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: Mrs. Rao, the talks at the Foreign Ministers level this week, that have just concluded, you also held talks with your counterpart. In your assessment, is there any forward movement or is it just one more photo opportunity and each side saying the same thing again and again?

Foreign Secretary: I believe you are referring to Pakistan.
Smt. Kalyani Shankar: Yes, Yes.

Foreign Secretary: Well, I certainly do not think of it as a photo opportunity. Nothing between India and Pakistan should be seen as a photo opportunity. You are talking serious stuff here.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: But nothing has moved forward also?

Foreign Secretary: I think you have to be realistic about this. We cannot be naive about this relationship. We cannot expect instant solutions or dramatic breakthroughs because there are divergences that exist between the two countries. There is a long history of contentious relations between India and Pakistan. So we must understand the nature of the terrain. In anything you undertake in life, I think, you must first grasp and understand the nature of the terrain. I think of India and Pakistan as neighbours. We have no choice but to deal with each other. I think it would be unrealistic to think otherwise. It is also unrealistic to talk the language of confrontation. I think we must engage with each other and we must take gradual incremental steps that build confidence, that reduce the trust deficit. This is going to be a long drawn out process. But the challenge and I think the focus from our side has been to keep this process going. We have been able to re-commence a dialogue process over the last few months and the meeting of the two Foreign Ministers in Delhi, two days ago, went very well. It was a positive meeting. From both sides, I think, there was a realization that we must seek to move forward that we owe it to the people of the two countries to move forward. And this is not an empty statement that I am making. I think people are at the heart of this relationship and we must be conscious of that in whatever we do for India and Pakistan. And it has to be done in an atmosphere free of terrorism and violence. So we have been very very emphatic that Pakistan must understand our very deep concerns about terrorism that has been directed against us from across the border over the years. And the Mumbai terror attack is a graphic illustration of that and our concerns about the slow pace of the Mumbai terror trial were conveyed very clearly.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: Was there any assurance that it will be done sooner?

Foreign Secretary: Well, the Pakistan side has told us that they are trying their best to see that there will be progress on this. Let us wait and see.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: At the Foreign Ministers meeting, I think we have protested to Pakistan about meeting the separatist leaders. But this is not the first time. They have met them earlier also. So, why does it happen?

Foreign Secretary: Well, yes, it has happened in the past and it happened this time also. We told the Pakistan side clearly that this has not struck a right note, especially on the eve of the two Foreign Ministers meeting to discuss such important issues and given the stated resolve of the two sides to reduce the trust deficit between the two countries. So our disappointment and our concern about this meeting was very clearly conveyed to the Pakistan side. This group of people that they met cannot by any definition be said to represent the entire people of Jammu and Kashmir. In a democratic society there are obviously different groups of people, different opinions but this group has espoused the cause of separatism which is not conducive to the building of good relations between India and Pakistan. And, therefore, we expressed our protest against this meeting.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: Mrs. Rao there was no change in the Pakistani position during the talks either with your talks with the Pakistani Foreign Secretary or Foreign Ministers level talk. Was there any change in Pakistani position in dealing with India and particularly Kashmir?

Foreign Secretary: Here again you are asking me to draw, you know, black and white conclusions. I don’t believe that in diplomacy it would be professional on my part to give you a ‘Yes’, or ‘No’ answer to that. There is a certain process involved here. Every meeting is a part of that process. What is the end goal of this process? The end goal is to normalize relations between the two countries, to reduce the divergences, to resolve the problems that have kept us apart. So, I say this is part of a process. It is still too early to talk about, you know, radical shifts in position and dramatic changes in attitude. It would not be realistic to talk about it. But I am happy to say that this process has gathered now a certain momentum and we had a series of meetings. This meeting between the two Foreign Ministers had been scheduled to take place by July. We have fulfilled that goal also. So a certain process has commenced. We have to take it forward. We have to continue to give it a positive direction. And there is political will, may I say, on both sides. That seems apparent from the desire of the two Prime Ministers to make an honest, concerted effort to see how we can reduce the differences between the two countries.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: Mrs. Rao, are you concerned about India’s gradual deterioration with its neighbours. Apart from Pakistan, ties with Sri Lanka and Nepal are also of concern. How do you view our neighbourhood?

Foreign Secretary: Well, our neighbourhood, yes, is an extremely important area obviously our foreign policy. We spend a considerable amount of time on relations with our neighbours. And, I think, from India’s point of view, our outlook, our approach has been very clear. We want peaceful and good relations with all our neighbours. We do not want contention with any of our neighbours. And we want our neighbours to share in the fruits of India’s economic development because we are part of the same region. So we would like better connectivity, regional connectivity, we would like a freer flow of trade in goods and services, we would like to provide the best possible dispensation to our neighbours to be able to export more to India, so that their economic development is also helped. We want to be able to work with every country in the neighbourhood to promote these shared goals of economic development, promoting prosperity and strengthening peaceful co-existence. So, I would not say there is deterioration in relations with the neighbours. With Sri Lanka, we have an on-going dialogue, we have very close relations because for Sri Lanka, India is its nearest neighbour, as Gandhiji said. And so there is an economic relationship, there is the very legitimate dialogue that we have conducted with the Sri Lanka government about the question of the minorities in Sri Lanka, particularly the Tamil-speaking minority. We are participating in a big way in the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the Northern Province and I am happy to refer to the housing programme that we have launched. Now the houses are actually coming up. I have seen the photographs of the houses coming up in the Northern Province. So, that work has also started.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: What about fishermen?

Foreign Secretary: Fisheries, we want to build a relationship with Sri Lanka that enables our fishermen and their fishermen also to earn their livelihoods from the sea without disturbance, without violence, without any intimidation. So, we are engaged in discussion with the Sri Lankan government to create the best management regime possible for fisheries cooperation. There are many aspects of this. There is, of course, the fishing activity from both sides. This is a very narrow stretch of water. And after the conflict ended in Sri Lanka, the fishermen of the northern province of Sri Lanka have also begun to come in larger numbers for fishing. And our fishermen had been traditionally going into the same area. So we have to find the best way to ensure that no tension is there, that there is no violence.

Recently there had been some very unfortunate cases of our fishermen, some of whom died and some of them were held in custody, for some time, you know, and we don’t want that situation to continue. And that we have said to the Sri Lankan government and I believe they understand the depth our concern about this. But we want to work out a Memorandum of Understanding on fisheries cooperation. There is a joint working group that is meeting from time to time to discuss this. The Fishermen’s Associations can also play a very good part in building confidence. And, with Nepal also. The situation in Nepal has been fluid for the last two years or so. But it is really the internal dynamic in Nepal that has to, you know, to settle in this regard because you have a peace process that has to be completed. The constitution drafting has to be completed. India has not been an obstacle in this and you cannot hold India responsible for whatever is happening in Nepal. The political parties in Nepal are trying to find consensus. They are trying to see how through dialogue they can solve the differences that exist between the political parties so that multi-party democracy is strengthened in Nepal. But we are friends and well-wishers of Nepal. I want to emphasise that. We are friends and well-wishers of the Nepalese people and we have a dialogue with all the parties in Nepal. We have not excluded any party from contact and communication with us.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: The Prime Minister visits Dhaka next month. I think he is going in August.

Foreign Secretary: Early September.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: What would be the agenda?

Foreign Secretary: Well, the agenda is again India-Bangladesh relations. And the fact that there is a new chapter in this relationship. The Government of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina and our Government have very cordial relations and since her visit here in January 2010, there have been a number of positive developments in the relationship, the line of credit that we extended has been activated, discussions to resolve the remaining pockets of the border that have to be settled have also proceeded very very positively, on connectivity, on the various projects under the line of credit all that, on water related issues, there has been very good progress. So, as I said this is a new chapter in the relationship and there are enormous possibilities for strengthening this further and our Prime Minister’s visit in September, we are working very hard in our preparations for the visit. And I believe there will be an extremely positive outcome from that visit.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: Mrs. Rao, the Nuclear Suppliers Group had recently introduced a new paragraph (5) in its guidelines to the recipient countries must move before the NSG countries could sell ENR technology and the first condition is that they should sign NPT. India’s position in this regard is very well known. Does this qualify India? What is the US position and what is our position?

Foreign Secretary: Obviously, you know, the position taken by the Nuclear Suppliers Group is not in consonance with our position on these matters. But the Governments of the United States, France and Russia, who are our chief partiers in civil nuclear cooperation have assured us that they intend to implement all the commitments made to us on civil nuclear cooperation and the furtherance of such cooperation. And this has been said in very unambiguous terms following the decision of the NSG. So we will have to see how we take this forward. I think commitments, there should be a full meeting and implementation of the commitments from all sides concerned. That is something we have stressed. And we are confident and India is confident about the fact that the global civil nuclear architecture is going to change in India's favour. That time will come. And I think we should be confident about our position in this regard.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: Well, Mrs. Rao, Mrs. Hillary Clinton, the US Secretary of State had visited recently. During her talks with the Government, did she mention about the reservation from the US business community about India's civil nuclear liability bill. How do you propose to overcome this problem?

Foreign Secretary: Well, we have said very clearly to the United States government that we are committed to a level playing field for all the companies that are engaged in discussion with us in the implementation of these agreements. So that has been made very clear. And the rules and regulations concerning the civil nuclear liability bill which has been passed by Parliament are in the process of being framed and in this process we are consulting with both the domestic companies and the foreign companies concerned. So, we have in a sense assured our partners that, as I said, we are committed to a level playing field and that in India, there are laws within which all companies will need to work. And that they should continue their dialogue with us on this. The intention is to take these projects forward.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: How long do you think it will take?

Foreign Secretary: Well, this process is going on at the moment and the intention is not to delay it, I can say that. And on the Convention on Supplementary Compensation, we told them that the ratification will also be done before the end of the year. We are just going through various procedures. So everything is on track in this regard.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: Mrs. Rao you are going to the United States as India’s Ambassador next month. Where are Indo-US ties going now and what challenges are ahead?

Foreign Secretary: Well, I think, the relationship is on an even keel. It is moving forward. We have strengthened and expanded our cooperation in very many ways in the last few years, particularly in the last two years. And the dialogue mechanisms, the extent of interaction all across, it is a whole of government approach if one can put it that way. So, we are interacting with each other, the strategic dialogue has moved forward, we had two strategic dialogues with the United States in the last two years. As I said, in almost every field of human endeavour India and the United States are engaging with each other as two large democracies, two vibrant democracies and as I said, we are, in a sense there is a natural affinity between the two countries. And that is in a sense powering this relationship and empowering it also.
Smt. Kalyani Shankar: What are going to be your challenges?

Foreign Secretary: Well, in a relationship of such size and dimension, the levels of activity are intense and I am also going to pay attention to business and economic cooperation and contact with the Indian community in the United States which plays a very positive role in all this, is also important. I think, I will be very busy and I am sure in this assignment there will be lots to do and I look forward to it, look forward to it very much.

Smt. Kalyani Shankar: Thank you, wish you all the best for your successful term in the United States and thank you very much for being with us.

Foreign Secretary: Thank you, it was a pleasure to be here, thank you.

019. Remarks by Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai upon assumption of Office.

New Delhi, August 1, 2011.

I am greatly honoured to be taking up this assignment which is a very complex one and full of many challenges, The Ministry of External Affairs is part of the structure of foreign policy making, since the time of the first Prime Minister of India. But we have to be scrupulous and efficient managers of the policies which are laid down by the Government and that will be my priority.

We are in a world of flux and we have to be innovative and adapt to the situation as it develops, but at the same time we have to be clear eyed about what are our national priorities and interests, many of which remain permanent. Obviously in dealing with the foreign policy challenges we have to take a holistic view of our political, strategic, economic and commercial, cultural as well as, public aspects of our image, as a country.

I would also like to give considerable priority to what is called the public service dimension, of the work of this Ministry and the Embassies abroad, by which I mean, the Passport and Consular Services which we render to the citizens of the country. I think this is an area which needs particular importance.

Finally, this Ministry has to be administered in accordance with the regulations; we have a budget and a management system to be addressed. And I think this has to be addressed while keeping in mind the morale of the personnel who work in it. So this is what I intend to set out to do and I will do my best.
Question: What are your key foreign policy challenges? ISI is trying hard to rescue Mr. Fai, your comments please?

Answer: Well I would like to start with my challenges, and obviously as I said in my opening remarks, the challenges are dealing with our foreign policy and its outreach through diplomacy in a holistic way, which takes care of our political and strategic interests, combines the economic and commercial interests of the country, and keeps in mind also the cultural image of the country and the way in which we portray ourselves in the world.

Within this broad framework obviously the main challenges are maintaining an area, if I may put it, of constructive cooperation in the immediate neighbourhood, that is the main challenge, and I think that will be one of my priority tasks.

Obviously, we also will have to be in close touch with and develop the most cooperative and strong relationships with all the major global players on the international scene and in coordination with the other Secretaries of this Ministry, we need to keep in mind the need for very very strong relations with the countries of Africa, Latin America, of Central Asia, of South East Asia and the Gulf region. I think managing all these would be the major challenge.

As regards Pakistan, I think I would rather not go into the second part of your question but I would like to say that I have entered this office with a mandate, which is that we as Foreign Secretaries are expected to pave the way for a substantive dialogue with Pakistan, on all issues and I look forward to cooperating with the Pakistan Foreign Secretary on that and we have to try and work to restore trust and confidence. This is the mandate that has been given to me and in conclusion I would like to say that the Foreign Secretary is as much an institution, as an individual. So I will continue this effort, continuity will be my watchword.

Question: Are we going to assume that composite dialogue with Pakistan is the way ahead?

Answer: I think we have put it, as I said, the mandate is on substantive dialogue on all issues of common concern.
020. Extracts from the Interaction of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh with the media on board his return Special Flight to New Delhi.

April 16, 2011.

Prime Minister: Ladies and Gentlemen I have had two very fruitful meetings. One was the BRICS meeting in Sanya in China. You have seen the Sanya Declaration and Plan of Action and NSA has also briefed you from day to day. Yesterday I came to Kazakhstan, I had meeting with the President and followed the meeting with the Prime Minister and other ministers. We have discussed wide ranging political, economic, regional and international issues and there is almost complete unanimity in our desire to work together and give added meaning and thrust to our strategic partnership. The visit of mine was the first visit to Kazakhstan, and was in response to the 2009 initiative when we had invited President Nazarbayev as Chief Guest of our Republic Day. We had on that occasion agreed to upgrade our strategic partnership and my visit today was in pursuance of that objective of giving added weight and depth to our strategic partnership.

Question: On meeting with President Hu Jintao and whether it covered the stapled visa issue.

Answer: Well, we discussed… It was a very cordial meeting. We discussed bilateral economic issues, the trade imbalances. We also discussed other relevant issues relating to international situation, possibility of cooperation between the two countries in international foras of G20, in WTO and in the Security Council. With regard to defence exchanges, my expectation is that they would be continued and also there was a proposal from the Chinese side, when Premier Wen Jiabao came to India to look at a new mechanism to maintain peace and tranquillity on the border. Work is in progress. I hope some concrete results will be visible in the near future.

Question: After BRICS Summit, is our goal getting a permanent seat in the Security Council near?

Answer: Well, I think there is a growing support that the Security Council and other international organisations must reflect realities of the contemporary age, rather than being embedded in an era which is dead and gone. But I would not say that we are there, as such, it is a work in progress, there is growing support for India’s permanent membership of the Security Council.

Question: Excess volatility to commodity prices, especially in the energy and food sectors, a grave threat has been posed to the ongoing global economy. How the BRICS would control and what would be India’s role?
Answer: Well, the BRICS by themselves cannot control. This has to be a collective international effort. We have all agreed that the Group of 20 is the appropriate international forum to discuss global economic issues and I am confident that when President Sarkozy convenes the meeting of the G20 later in the year, issues like fluctuations and volatility of food prices and oil prices would figure high on the agenda.

Question: Regarding the comprehensive nuclear cooperation agreement with Kazakhstan, is India planning to sell nuclear reactors to Kazakhstan?

Answer: Well I think it takes two to strike a deal, we have I think a capability to produce small nuclear reactors choosing natural uranium and there has been discussion on that but no concrete decision has been taken.

Question: Post Fukushima, why are we still so convinced about going ahead with nuclear power?

Answer: Well I think we are too close to the Japanese disaster and in the background of what has happened, there is a certain amount of nervousness about extensive use of nuclear energy even for peaceful purposes. But I am convinced that when all is said and done, when cool headed discussions take place about the future of energy, what are problems with coal, what are the problems with other hydrocarbons, in terms of their impact on climate change. I think there would be a reconsideration of the role of nuclear energy as one of the essential options which all countries must keep in order to deal with the problems like climate change and energy security.

Question: In one of your statements at the BRICS, you said about the shift of power to the common people, was it in the context of the ongoing international situation or the domestic context?

Answer: Well, I think there is both, a domestic…I think we have to take note of the fact that people’s power is some thing which we have to reckon with, which is also happening internationally in the Middle East, in North Africa. I would not like to pronounce authoritatively that I have the answer on what went wrong in West Asia.

Question: Market access for Indian pharma products & IT in China, Dr. Reddy’s US FDA approved drugs are facing problems in entering China. Has this been taken up with the Chinese?

Answer: Well I did raise the question of the trade imbalance. We import goods and services which give rise to the severe trade imbalances. President Hu Jintao recognised that it is the problem. I also specifically mentioned two areas, one pharmaceutical industry and the other IT. These happen to the sectors where we feel, Chinese could do, and I can not say he said precisely this with regard to these two areas, but he did say that he did recognise that China has also the responsibility to tackle the problem of trade imbalances.

Question: There is a great deal of interest in your initiatives with regard to Pakistan. What are the five things that you would like to achieve in your relationship with Pakistan?

Answer: I think five is too much, well, if I can succeed in normalising relations between India and Pakistan, as they should prevail between two normal states, I will consider my job well done.

Question: Two questions, one on the possibility of induction of Indonesia in the BRICS and second on your opinion of Anna Hazare?

Answer: Well, as far as increase in membership of BRICS is concerned, this was not the subject matter which came up for discussion in the BRICS meetings.

As far as Anna Hazare ji is concerned, I respect him as an important leader, who had done lot of good work in rural development and that's why the whole country respects him.

Q: On slowing down of world economy, concerns among G 20 countries about state of global economy and what could India do about it?

Ans: Well let me say, the world economy is an increasingly inter-dependent entity. Fuel of trade and technology and capital inflows influence the growth path of a large number of countries today. And if those economies which are the locomotives economies of the world, The United States, Europe, Japan are in trouble there is bound to be some effect on us. But we have so far managed to protect our economy in a manner that has earned us the admiration of the world. In the year 2008, when the global economy bought into problems, our economy still managed to grow @ 6.7 percent. Later on we were able to raise the rate of growth to 8.1/2 percent and even in this troubled year the projection of Indian growth rate would still be between 7.8 to 8.5% and that would be a remarkable performance. Let me say that we can do more in India, if all political parties of our country work together, if Government is allowed to do its essential task, which is maintain a growth path of about 9 percent, which is possible for us to do so. Despite what is happening in the world, if only we could step up investment in infrastructure in our economy, we would be on a strong wicket, and that's what I would like Government to do.

Q: On global economic crisis and what can India do to insulate itself?

Ans: Well, I think let me say we are not that helpless, though I would not say that we will not be affected by what happens in the outside world. We have savings rates of about 34 or 35 percent. Our investment rate in recent years has been about 37 percent of the GDP. With saving rates of even of 35 percent, we can maintain a growth rate of close to 8.5 to 9 percent. Now if we spend this savings well, if our infrastructure is well managed, if social sector programmes leakages can be curbed, I think that's the path which would keep India afloat and afloat handsomely even the world is in dire trouble.

Q: On change in thinking about benefits of globalization?

Ans: When the world changes we have to take note of those changes. We cannot be static in a world that is fast moving and there is no doubt that there are immense changes that are taking place. Globalization has a lot of potential to do good, but if globalization is not properly managed and if misused by big powers, it can also hurt the poorer countries in the world.

Q: on reports and concerns about diversion of Brahmaputra waters by China?

Ans: Well we have been discussing the issues relating to the trans border river system with China, for number of years. I have myself raised this issue with both the President as well as the Prime Minister of China on number of occasions. They have assured us that they are not doing anything which will be detrimental to the interests of India. And so far the evidence we have supports their statement that nothing is happening on the ground which we should be worried about.

Q: On foreign armed intervention in Libya and other countries?

Ans: Well I was referring to the situation as it has developed in Libya. My worry is that despite what the western powers are saying about Libya, that their success in getting rid of Gadaffi, there are still signs that Libya may well be entrapped in civil war like Somalia. And if it goes in the Somalian way it will be in nobody's interest.

Q: On India's Permanent Membership of UNSC

Ans: I think that at UNGA we can count on the support of about 120 members already. As far as the permanent members of UNSC are concerned you heard President Obama, when he came to India. You heard the Russian leadership. The Chinese leadership is somewhat hesitant but not totally unsupportive. So I am not predicting that it will fall into our lap tomorrow or the day after. But I think the climate of global opinion, is certainly in favour of a country like India being made a permanent member of the reformed UNSC.

Q: On Kudankulam civil nuclear project?

Ans: It is my honest expectation that sooner or later the world would recognize that there is no alternative but to rely on atomic energy, as an essential component of the energy mix of a country, any country that seeks protection of its environment that wants to protect itself from excessive carbon emission. I have no reason to believe that the leadership in Tamil Nadu will be an exception to this rule. There are anxieties. Some vested interests are playing on that. I have spoken to the Hon'ble Chief Minister of Tamil Nadu myself before coming.
We will sit together with all the enlightened leadership of Tamil Nadu to find a practical and pragmatic solution because, Tamil Nadu is today the fastest industrializing state in the country. I feel very proud, when I go to Tamil Nadu, when I see the way industry is expanding. But quite honestly, this industrialization can become a casualty if Tamil Nadu is not self sufficient in the field of energy. I am sure that leadership of all shades of opinion will recognize, that a healthy mix should include an element of nuclear energy for safety and for security. We will protect all the people of India. Our safety standards will be second to none. And if we have any doubt we will be the first to tell our people that we will not move forward.

Q: On murder of Prof. Rabbani murder, security situation in AfPak and Gen. Mullen’s views on complicity of ISI.

Ans: In my speech at UN, I joined the rest of the world in offering my condolences to the people of Afghanistan on the killing of Prof. Rabbani. There is now growing awareness of the groups which indulge in these nefarious activities and we have to take notice of that. And what Gen. Mullen has said with regard to the role of certain forces in Pakistan, is also something which is nothing new to us. In fact when we were the first to flag this issue earlier, the world didn’t believe us. I am glad that at least the world recognizes the truth of what the government and the people of India had been saying about the activities of ISI for many many years.

Q. On concluding the Teesta Agreement with Bangladesh?

Ans. We would seek the help of West Bengal Government and of Chief Minister Mamata Banerjee, to create an environment where a meaningful and viable solution to this issue can be found.
022. Address by National Security Advisor Shivshankar Menon at the Cariappa Memorial Lecture on "The Role of Militaries in International Relations".

New Delhi, October 5, 2011.

General V.K. Singh, Chief of Army Staff,
General Pradeep Kapoor,
Ladies and Gentlemen.

I am deeply honoured to be asked to speak on this prestigious occasion, in memory of one of India's great soldiers.

It was suggested to me that I should speak on the role of militaries in international relations. It is only appropriate that I do so in memory of independent India's first Indian Army Chief Field Marshal Cariappa. Less well remembered than his pioneering and brilliant career as a soldier is Field Marshal Cariappa's career as a diplomat. As High Commissioner to Australia and New Zealand he laid the foundations of the relations that we enjoy with that continent today. While I never had the privilege of meeting him, I do know that he took a deep interest in international relations. The official files contain an extensive correspondence between him and Prime Minister Nehru after his retirement where he expressed his views on our relations with Pakistan and its Army's increasing political role. I do hope that this correspondence will be made public one day soon. It reveals Cariappa as a concerned and informed citizen sharing his views with his government, even while as a soldier he explicitly stays away from politics. It is therefore only fitting that we consider the role of militaries in international relations as we celebrate Field Marshal Cariappa's life and achievements.

We have all heard the statement that "war is diplomacy by other means" attributed to Clausewitz. The actual statement was more nuanced but this will serve for our present purpose. We are also familiar with the corollary that "diplomacy is war by other means". Each contains enough truth to justify the cliché. That truth is that war and diplomacy, military force and international relations, are Siamese twins, joined together at birth for life.

Militaries have always provided states with an instrument for effective diplomacy, mainly through the threat of the use of force or, in the case of a militarily weaker state, the ability to withstand military attack or engage in attrition. The actual use of force in most, if not all, cases demonstrates the failure of diplomacy.

The issue is therefore not whether militaries and force are important in international relations but how important they are, and their role.
In the next half hour I would like to look at the role and utility of force in international relations, what the military can do, and our Indian experience.

I. The role and utility of force in international relations

Realists believe that in an anarchic international system power rules the day. They also assume that states, like individuals, are self-interested rational maximisers. Uncertainty is rampant, information is always incomplete, and opportunism is always possible in international society. As a result, states have little choice but to defend themselves.

Force is an inescapable factor in international relations, whether through its actual use or in the threat of its use. It is much more so in international society than within the nation states in which we have organized our societies. This is because alternative forms of legitimacy are much less developed in international society than in our domestic societies with their complex systems of laws and domestic political legitimacy. International society is only now beginning to arrive at commonly accepted definitions of laws for some activities. Where such laws exist, such as the laws of war or the law of the sea, they are underdeveloped, or not universally accepted, or not always respected in practice. The biggest difference between national societies and international society is that sanctions for not respecting laws within our societies are several and multilayered, ranging from social opprobrium to judicial punishment. There is no effective international equivalent of these sanctions for those who transgress international law, such as it is. The only effective sanction is force or the threat of its use, and the willingness of those who possess it to use it.

In other words, while domestic societies have evolved or are evolving towards rule of law, international society is still much closer to primeval anarchy, where to a very great extent “the strong do as they will and the weak do as they must.”

Force is today the ultimate sanction in international society, and while it may be one of several sanctions, it is clearly the most widely studied and used. Its use is not getting any less frequent despite all the attempts to develop other means of suasion and persuasion. Military power remains central to great power competition which defines the global order.

The last sixty years have seen a dramatic increase in the frequency of conflict and its intensity, between and within societies. This is a result of new technologies of force and their widespread dissemination. In fact we seem to be entering a phase of increasing militarization of international relations. Look at recent developments in the Middle East, where conventional air power, covert and Special Forces, and internet social media have been used in new tactical combinations with old fashioned propaganda and international institutions to change regimes and create political outcomes.

Secondly, as technology has developed, newer forms of power also have increasing effect. For instance today cyber actions in virtual space have kinetic effects that were once only possible through the use of traditional military force.

In other words the spectrum of conflict, and therefore of the use of force is widening. The state no longer has a monopoly of violence, and technology has empowered small groups and individuals to the point where they can pose credible threats to society, if not the state itself. We have only to think of the recent lethality of terrorist groups and their attacks.

Limits on the use of force

Paradoxically, though military force is the ultimate and preponderant sanction in international society, and it's use is more widespread than ever, it is less and less the preferred option. This is due to the paradox of conflict. The higher the effect of force, the less likely it is to be used. If the emergence of nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction changed international relations fundamentally, they also highlighted the use of force for deterrence rather than as an actual sanction, as a means of influencing an adversary's behaviour through the threat of force rather than its application.

Today there are limits to the utility of force in international relations. Some are classical and were recognised in the ancient world as well. As Sun Tzu said two millennia ago: "To fight and conquer in all your battles is not supreme excellence; supreme excellence consists in breaking the enemy's resistance without fighting". (Sun Tzu: Art of War III.2.).

The application of force has always been the blunt edge of politics and will probably continue to be so despite the promise of technology. Political outcomes that are sought by the use of force are often circumscribed by the degree of risk which political leaders are willing to take, and that degree of risk will be weighed against the stakes at issue.

Order, justice and resolution are the normally desired outcomes of any conflict. Force has a pivotal role in restoring order. But it can do very little on its own in ensuring justice and a final resolution of the causes of conflict.

Other limits come from recent factors such as technologies and their widespread dissemination.

Taken as a whole, the experience of using military force against terrorism and extremism since September 11, 2001 reveals these limits under today's conditions. In many cases the strategic outcomes created by the post 9/11 use of force have been the opposite of those originally intended.

It would appear that the role of military force is circumscribed in producing outcomes even though it is the ultimate sanction in international society, and much more important there than within our states and societies. We can't do without it but don't want to use it.

And in today's situation, in a world of weapons of mass destruction, it becomes essential that the basically anarchic practice of international relations with the powerful calling the shots be regulated or moderated. This could be achieved by evolving new norms of international behaviour, and by democratising international governance and its mechanisms. In fact such a process is now a compelling necessity. As experiences of 9/11, Iraq and Afghanistan show, a different approach to international relations is long overdue. As power is more and more diffused internationally, this different approach to international relations will become all the more necessary.

II. The Role of the Military

These developments make it necessary to re-examine the role and utility of the conventional military as traditionally configured and organized. What is the conventional military's relevance when the spectrum of conflict is wider than ever before and when force is widely held and used in international society outside the military?

It can be argued that as traditionally configured, the militaries of most powers are irrelevant to large portions of today's broader spectrum of conflict. The traditional military is no longer the sole or major instrument to deal with the wider spectrum of conflict, a spectrum that is wider than ever before in history, in new domains like cyberspace and outer space, and extending to the economy, society and social and political psychology.

Cyberspace as a domain is an example where rigid hierarchies and structures go against the nature of the domain and the technology itself, which is best handled by small groups or individuals, often acting on their own. We have shown the capacity to adapt to such challenges before. For instance, every democracy that has a developed Special Forces capability has kept it outside the traditional military command structure and uses it to activate the sub-conventional spectrum of conflict.

The expanded spectrum requires that we seek jointedness, that much used but less practiced word, not just between services but with the other instruments of state power. Today's spectrum requires a holistic integration of all the instruments of state power, the armed forces, the intelligence agencies, our scientific and technological resources, soft power instruments and others.

In other words we need much closer coordination between civil and military power. In my experience even minor actions by the military have foreign policy consequences. The military is therefore both an important adjunct and component of diplomacy.

There is also a need to restructure militaries to learn the lessons of a decade or more of counter-insurgency and counter-terrorism. While different doctrines and theories have been applied in the last decade, their results in practice can at best be described as mixed. In fact some of the best results are those that we have developed from our own experience in India in dealing with insurgency and cross-border infiltration and terrorism.

Militaries today are faced with a choice: they can stick to what they know and do best, at the risk of reduced relevance. Or else they can reorder themselves to deal with the new challenges that face us, rethinking doctrines and practices from the tactical to the operational to the strategic and even the grand strategic level.

At this stage, I can imagine some of you thinking that this is all very well in theory but what about the use of the military in diplomacy. Should India not be doing much more military diplomacy, particularly when armed forces play such an important role in the internal politics of countries in our neighbourhood? Of course we must, and we do so where we can. The Indian armed forces increasing contacts with the world have been a very useful adjunct to our diplomacy and have brought our armed forces, and by extension the country, respect for professionalism and competence.

But we must also remember that when the military is in power in a country, as it has been for an extended period in some of our neighbours, they behave as politicians do, with their primary purpose changing to staying in power. Secondly, if they respond to your diplomatic approaches it is because of what you represent, the strength and capacity of your country, not individual brilliance or attractiveness or professional fellow feeling. When you speak for a strong, prosperous and united India you will be listened to and are effective, in or out of uniform.

III. The Indian Experience

Is there an Indian doctrine for the use of force in statecraft? This is not a question that one normally expects to ask about a power that is a declared nuclear weapon state with the world's second largest standing army. But India achieved independence in a unique manner; through a freedom movement dedicated to truth and non-violence, and has displayed both ambiguity and opposition to classical power politics. In the circumstances posing the question is understandable and legitimate.

To answer the question let us look at traditional Indian attitudes to force and the lessons India draws from its own history, and at Indian practice since independence in 1947.

Attitudes to Force and Lessons from History

While India may have achieved independence after a non-violent struggle, it was a struggle that Gandhiji described as non-violence of the strong.

As far back as 1928 Gandhiji wrote, "If there was a national government, whilst I should not take any direct part in any war, I can conceive of occasions when it would be my duty to vote for the military training of those who wish to take it.... It is not possible to make a person or society non-violent by compulsion."

During the Partition riots at his prayer meeting on 26 September 1947 Gandhiji said that he had always been an opponent of all warfare, but that if there was no other way of securing justice war would be the only alternative left to the government.

Faced with the tribal raiders sent by Pakistan into Kashmir in October 1947, Gandhiji said that it was right for the Union Government to save the fair city by rushing troops to Srinagar. He added that he would rather that the defenders be wiped out to the last man in clearing Kashmir's soil of the raiders rather than submit.

In saying so, Gandhiji was entirely in keeping with a long Indian tradition which has regarded the use of force as legitimate in certain circumstances, namely, if there is no alternative way of securing justice. This is in essence a doctrine for the defensive use of force, when all other avenues are exhausted.

The lesson that comes through very clearly in both the major Indian epics, which deal with wars of necessity, is also apparent in Kautilya, the original realist, and in Ashoka, the convert to idealism. Ashoka and Kautilya were both products of a highly evolved and intricate tradition of statecraft which must have preceded them for centuries. A simple reading of the Arthashastra suffices to prove how in Indian strategic culture, as early as the third century before Christ, the use of force was limited both by practical and moral considerations. This was not a doctrine of "God on our side", (though that helped, as Krishna proved in the Mahabharata). Nor is it about just wars. In the Indian tradition the use of force is legitimate not just if it is in a good cause and its results will be good. Instead, this was a doctrine that saw force as necessary in certain circumstances, to obtain justice, when all other means are exhausted, and which also recognised that force was not always the most effective or efficient means to this end.

The other lesson that Indian thinkers have consistently drawn from history is of the perils of weakness. The colonial narrative of India’s history, stressing “outside” invasions and rulers had as its corollary the conviction that India must avoid weakness at all costs lest that history be repeated. The Indian quest after 1947 for strategic autonomy and for autonomy in the decision to use or threaten force has a long tradition behind it.

The Indian Practice since 1947

Let us look at Indian strategic culture in action, at Indian practice and policy since independence.

- The defence budget has only exceeded 3% of GDP in one year of the last sixty-three.
- There have been clear limits on the use of military force internally. The use of military force for internal security functions has been severely circumscribed, limited to those cases where there is a strong correlation to inimical forces abroad such as Nagaland and J&K.
- The armed forces of the Union have only been used defensively against external aggression in the sixty-three years of the Republic.
- India has never sent troops abroad except for UNPKO or at the express request of the legitimate government of the country concerned. This was true in the Maldives in 1987, in Sri Lanka in 1987 and in Bangladesh in 1971.
- India has also never retained territory taken by force in the wars that she has fought. This is so even for some Indian territory taken back from Pakistan in the Indian state of J&K which was returned to Pakistani control after the 1965 and 1971 wars.
- India’s overseas projection of power has been limited for several centuries.

India as a Nuclear Weapon State

This strategic culture is also reflected in the Indian nuclear doctrine, with its emphasis on minimal deterrence, no first use, and its direct linkage to nuclear disarmament. We have made it clear that while we need nuclear weapons for our own security, it is our goal to work for a world free of nuclear weapons. We are ready to undertake the necessary obligations to achieve that goal in a time-bound programme agreed to and implemented by all nuclear weapon and other states.

In sum, there is an Indian way, an Indian view and an Indian practice in the use and role of force.

How do we apply this approach in today’s complicated situation of multiple threats, rapid shifts in the balance of power and growing Indian interests abroad?
We are now in a world where the geopolitical centre of gravity is shifting to Asia and its surrounding oceans. In Asia itself, several strategic rivalries contribute to uncertainty. We are in the midst of a global shift in the balance of power and in a time of great change, far from the certainties of the Cold War or other eras. And the global power shift has immediate consequences in our immediate vicinity.

If Asia is our theatre, South Asia is our home. And the situation in South Asia is still fraught. If our partners in our region so desire we would work with them to provide and enhance security in the subcontinent, the Asian landmass and the Indian Ocean littoral.

Despite the shifting international landscape India’s situation and interests remain unique. Our situation and interests are not identical to those of any other country or group of countries. It is therefore for us to work out our own solutions to our unique security dilemmas, working within and developing our own strategic culture and doctrines for the utility of force in international relations.

In grand strategic terms the primary purpose of Indian military power remains the defence of India’s territorial integrity (on land, sea, air and in space), and to prepare for the threats of war that exist. This task on the Asian landmass does not change.

We should now also be leveraging our geopolitical potential to develop our maritime capabilities, fulfilling our responsibilities and contributing to maritime security in the Indian Ocean littoral, critical as this is to our ability to transform India and ensure her security.

In addition we should be shaping our military power in line with political objectives that are feasible under conditions of nuclear overhang which now apply in our immediate periphery.

And we should see how military power can contribute to increasing our security in non-conventional security areas such as energy security.

As I said before, in today’s age of technology and media small powers and groups can create effects disproportionate to their physical scale or ostensible material power. In other words we have to reckon with the changing nature of global power, as power itself is becoming much more diffused and fragmented. We need to develop the power to deal with weak states, terrorists and small groups and post-modern forms of power, a capability which is different from the conventional tasks that the military has been configured to achieve in the past.

At a time of rapid change it is essential that we continue to learn from our experience and re-evaluate it regularly. Government have recently established a Task Force to review and evaluate the effectiveness of our national security structures to see whether and how they could better serve our present needs. The Task Force will make its recommendations for the future soon, and I hope that it will enable us to move towards the holistic integration of the instruments of state power that is needed today to meet these challenges.

IV. Conclusion

Let me try to sum up some of what I have said.

The role of militaries in international relations will continue to be influenced by the changing character of the threats that we face, but the essential role of the military to protect and further a country’s interests is likely to endure, even as the means adopted to apply or threaten force continue to evolve.

We live in a time where international law remains underdeveloped, international governance is non-existent or weak, and international society is fundamentally anarchic. As a result the role of force in international relations has been magnified. But the age of weapons of mass destruction and newer technologies make it essential that we consider new ways of regulating the use of force in international relations.

Now that technology has made the spectrum of conflict wider than ever before, it is more than ever a political call whether and how to use force. Societies that have not followed this simple rule have suffered as a consequence. Militaries will have to strive to close the gap between their military capabilities and desired political outcomes. This will require flexibility and agility.

India as a society and nation has by and large made wise choices in the past on matters relating to the use of force, showing strategic restraint and realism. We have contributed force to internationally legitimate uses such as UN peacekeeping, while limiting its domestic deployment. Today we are in a position to make a greater contribution to global public goods in areas such as maritime security. At the same time we are moving towards an Indian doctrine for the use of force, though this is a work in progress. But as I hope I have shown, the uses of force that we have envisaged so far are all in keeping with our strategic culture and do not conflict with our values. In today's complicated international situation we must keep it so.

New Delhi, October 11, 2011.

"It gives me immense pleasure once again to address the Combined Commanders Conference of the Indian Armed Forces.

You have the singular privilege and honour of leading our gallant soldiers, sailors and air warriors. Our men and women in uniform have demonstrated unflinching devotion to duty each time the nation’s security has been challenged or when we have faced natural calamities.

The armed forces have played a stellar role in safeguarding our borders, in fighting terrorism and infiltration in Jammu and Kashmir, insurgencies in the North-East, pirates in the Indian Ocean and aiding civil authority in Sikkim during the recent earthquake. Our countrymen look up to the armed forces as the epitome of honesty, integrity, character and professionalism.

Your Conference is taking place at a time when the country is faced with multiple challenges. In this age of rapid information flows and explosion of technologies, one of the most important security imperatives is our ability to respond to these challenges quickly and in an integrated fashion.

We should be justifiably proud of the excellent civil-military relations that we have traditionally maintained, and which has been the bedrock of our democracy. We must, however, continuously build upon this tradition and leverage the combined will of the nation to meet new and emerging threats.

Broadly speaking, the international strategic and political environment has deteriorated from our point of view. The policies we adopt, whether internally or externally, must factor this in.

We have paid special attention to our immediate neighbourhood. This is based on our conviction that the task of India's socio-economic transformation will always be more difficult and less likely to succeed if we do not manage relations with our neighbours properly; more importantly, if we do not give them a substantial stake in India's economic progress and stability.

Most major powers today are preoccupied with their own domestic problems. This has made the task of effective and coordinated global response to international issues that much more difficult. While we must work with the international community to address global issues, we must also strengthen our own capabilities and be ready to stand on our own feet, whenever required. We must therefore consolidate our own strategic autonomy and independence of thought and action.

The fundamentals of our economy remain strong. Despite the global slowdown, we will still achieve a growth rate of close to eight percent this year. Our short term challenge is to bring down inflation, while in the long term we have to make our growth process more inclusive, spur agricultural growth, expand the delivery of education, health and other services, protect our environment and improve our overall infrastructure.

It is equally the responsibility of the government to equip our armed forces with all the necessary means to meet all threats to our nation, including those which go beyond conventional warfare.

We have a long history in fighting terrorism. Today terrorist groups are highly networked, nimble footed and more lethal. This calls for appropriate responses. Cyber threats are emerging as a major source of worry. Cyber and information warfare could qualitatively change the concept of a battlefield. Nuclear proliferation and nuclear security remain a serious threat in our neighbourhood.

We must focus much more on maritime security, and on securing our coastline, our exclusive economic zone, our island territories and the sea lanes of communication.

Internally, we have to work assiduously to address problems in the North East and deal with left-wing extremism in a comprehensive manner. We have to be sensitive to the needs of the weaker sections of society and ensure that the fruits of our progress reach them. Issues relating to use of scarce resources such as land and water and strengthening institutions of governance require much closer attention than they have received in the past.

The Government will never fight shy of finding the funds for the modernization of our forces. At the same time we have to recognize that resources are not unlimited. I would urge upon you to optimize the use of scarce resources. You are the best judges of how this can be done, but advance and long term planning and the creation of common institutions, communication networks and infrastructure are some examples of how this could be achieved. We should keep this in mind particularly when we build new capacities for meeting emerging threats.

The development of an indigenous defence industry is a national security objective. We have succeeded in persuading many of the advanced countries to dismantle their export control regimes targeted at us which will give us access to high technology, but we need to gear up our own efforts.

Modernisation of the armed forces should not be limited only to acquisition of foreign equipment or foreign technologies. We have to progressively reduce our dependence on external sources. This has to be a national effort, involving our armed forces, our scientists and captains of Indian industry.

We are among the world leaders in information technology and a knowledge based economy. We have a vibrant private sector. It is necessary to put in place policies to promote a viable defence industry in the country using the large industrial and skill base that already exists. Greater competition will lead to greater efficiencies and more research and development. The Defence Production Policy announced this year is a step in the right direction.

The Ministry of Defence has over the last few years taken several steps to streamline the processes of acquisition. I am glad that the Defence Procurement Procedure 2011 contains new provisions to encourage private sector participation in ship building and expansion in the scope of the offset guidelines. Procurement procedures must ensure transparency, probity and accountability. We must also constantly work towards reducing time for processing proposals. Well formulated long term integrated plans will facilitate this task.

Our armed forces must attract the best and the brightest of our youth. The skills of those who are already in the forces should be continuously upgraded and broad-based so that our forces operate at the cutting edge of technology. As Commanders, you have a special responsibility to inculcate the finest qualities of character, integrity and professionalism among your junior officers and men and women. We live in an increasingly open society characterised by instant communications and mass media. These impose greater responsibilities on all public institutions of our Republic, including the armed forces.

Ensuring the welfare of ex-servicemen is a responsibility that the nation has towards our men and women in uniform. It is necessary that the relevant plans and schemes are implemented diligently, that we ensure appropriate retraining and above all, we show compassion to those who have served our nation so well.
You are commanders of one of the finest armed forces in the world. Our nation is truly proud of your achievements and indebted to you for your bravery, for your valour and for your sacrifices. I wish you even greater success in the service of our nation in the year to come.”

024. Press Note issued by the Ministry of Defence on Defence Minister’s address to the Naval Commanders Conference on maritime security.

New Delhi, October 12, 2011.

The Defence Minister Shri AK Antony today assured India’s maritime neighbours of the country’s “unstinted support for their security and economic prosperity”. Addressing the top brass of the Indian Navy and MoD here, Antony said the Indian Navy has been “mandated to be a net security provider to island nations in the Indian Ocean Region”. He said “most of the major international shipping lanes are located along our island territories. This bestows on us the ability to be a potent and stabilising force in the region”.

While acknowledging the benefits of conducting several exercises in the South China Sea, East China Sea and the Western Pacific Shri Antony also brought out the need to maintain a balance between the various responsibilities of the Indian Navy by saying “Although reaching out to our extended neighbourhood is important, you must always be mindful of the core area of your responsibility that mainly includes preserving and strengthening our shore lines and coastal security”.

Talking about coastal security Shri Antony said “We have taken several measures to strengthen our coastal security, our maritime forces are capable of protecting our maritime frontiers. However, this should not lead into a feeling of complacency”. He went on to say that “isolated incidents, which though directly did not pose a challenge to maritime security, highlighted the need to further strengthen our coastlines and maritime security”. Saying so Shri Antony emphasised the need to replicate coastal security exercises with all stakeholders “as frequently as possible”.

The Defence Minister spoke on other issues and challenges that face the Indian Navy. Describing piracy as a continuing cause of major concern, Shri Antony acknowledged the proactive efforts of the Indian Navy but noted that, “the international community as a whole needs to do a lot more collectively”.

2 Shri Antony observed that the modernization of the Navy was going apace. He however, pointed out that indigenous shipyards must “develop and expand rapidly, as well as adopt latest best practices”. Saying that the Navy has been making satisfactory progress in indigenisation efforts, Shri Antony said that such efforts must not only be continued but also accelerated.

Talking about infrastructure development, Shri Antony said that the development of infrastructure in the island territories must be pursued in synergy with other stakeholders. He also stated that Phase II of the Karwar project must be pursued vigorously.

The Defence Minister was addressing the Chief of Naval Staff Admiral Nirmal Verma and Defence Secretary Shri Shashikant Sharma among other senior officers of the Indian Navy and MoD at the beginning of the three day Naval Commander’s Conference.

025. Address of Vice President M. Hamid Ansari at the First National Conference on International Relations organized by the Public Diplomacy Division of the Ministry of External Affairs.

I am happy to participate in this conference, claimed to be the first of its kind, of scholars and practitioners of international relations from all over the country. This initiative of the Ministry of External Affairs deserves our appreciation.

I confess I am somewhat puzzled at the characterization of today’s initiative as being part of ‘public diplomacy’. Words have meanings and concepts have connotations. Neither of the two is immutable; yet, new meanings and connotations do require explanations and justifications. Diplomacy, to be productive, cannot be conducted publicly; the public, on the other hand, has every right to be informed about its outcomes.

The dictionary meaning of diplomacy is ‘management of international relations’. Textbooks on the subject refine it to mean ‘the peaceful conduct of relations amongst political entities’. The interest of the general public in it, as in other aspects of public policy, is evident. We thus have three categories of persons who profess to relate to diplomacy: those who are charged to conduct it, those whose pursuit in life is to analyze it from an academic or expert perspective, and those who interest themselves in a general sense in its processes and results.

It is evident that bringing together practicing professionals, academics, and interested members of the public, for a healthy exchange of views and ideas is a normal part of the business of government in all aspects of national activity. There is no reason for it to be different in regard to external relations or be given a different nomenclature.

Friends

India lives in a community of nations and is an active participant in it. We have a population of 1.2 billion, an economy of nearly two trillion dollars, a capacity in some measure to project power in immediate or proximate neighbourhood, as well as the wherewithal to become a knowledge society. Together they sustain the claim to have both hard power and soft power and the ability to enhance both in good measure and thereby enhance national power.

A prerequisite for these is a sound knowledge of the world, of the equilibrium of power, of the dynamics of current or anticipated changes, and of the manner they impact on India and Indian interests. Each is a function of incisive scholarship in which conceptual frameworks and micro-analysis would lend credence to the national effort.

How well are we prepared to shoulder this responsibility? How do we fare in comparison to our peers among players on the global stage?

The need for the study of international relations is self-evident; its absence, in fact, evokes questions. The harsh reality, however, is that the study of international affairs in our country is episodic, emotive and inadequate.

Three aspects of the matter need to be considered. The first relates to the need to conceptualise our own experience as a player on the global stage; the second to the requirement of in-depth study of countries and regions of relevance to us and the acquisition of analytical and linguistic tools, required for such studies; the third to the manner in which this experience and knowledge is to be related to our present and future policy options.

Record would show that our performance on each of these counts is less than adequate; given our intellectual resources, the output should have been better in terms of quality and content.
The need for correctives is thus evident. It is here that a platform like today’s, where concerned scholars and researchers from all parts of the country could exchange ideas and experiences with practitioners, would be of great relevance. Its rationale is self evident; its success would lie in concrete correctives, not platitudes.

Academics analyse the conduct of international relations and diplomacy. Diplomats, on their part, put together the building blocks of diplomacy and use them for achieving national objectives in international relations. The former can choose areas of interest of their research; the latter, usually, have tasks thrust on them by the tidal waves of daily developments from all the corners of the globe.

Yet, it is vital that they interact and exchange notes. The academic has one resource that the professional does not – the time to study and analyse a problem in all its dimensions. The academic also has the option of dissent, of thinking unconventionally, suggesting courses of action that may be perceived to be risky and need not bear the weight of either history, or future expectation, that would distort decision-making.

Friends

Our understanding of countries and people that we deal with cannot be based solely on academic output of foreign institutions. We need to evolve a uniquely Indian understanding, based on the historical context of our relations with other nations and peoples, as also contemporary realities and concerns. We need our own culture of strategic thought.

A first step towards this end should be acquisition of linguistic skills. This is one area where there is an acute national shortage of skilled professionals, well versed in the languages and idiom of other countries and peoples. I would urge this distinguished gathering to deliberate on this aspect and work out the means through which we can create a national resource-base of language professionals which can be tapped not only by government, but also by academia, media, industry and business.

Another requirement is the sociological analysis of societies, particularly of countries most relevant to us and to ascertain their core concerns, interests, obsessions and inhibitions, and response frequencies.

There is another aspect that deserves closer scrutiny. Serious academic analysis in the field of international relations is not possible without access to archival records. Unfortunately, despite significant strides in transparency, especially through the Right to Information Act, archival documentation is so scanty that our researchers are forced to rely on declassified documents of foreign governments. We do need to bring our rules on this in line with the practice of other advanced and open societies.

Ladies and Gentlemen

It is my sincere hope that this is not a one-off Conference and that there would be regular and institutional interaction between the two broad groups represented in this audience. This would lead to better academic research and more productive policy making.

I wish you all success in your deliberations over the next two days and thank the Ministry for inviting me to this Conference.

026. Address by Foreign Secretary at National Defence College on “Security dimensions of India’s Foreign Policy”.

New Delhi, November 23, 2011.

I was originally given the theme – India’s Foreign Policy Concerns and Strategy – but in MEA, I was advised to restrict the talk to the theme of your current study which is Strategies and Structures for National Security. The theme of foreign policy is larger and involves many different strands. In the kind of opening statement which I am making, it is better to touch on broader themes and leave other aspects to a Q&A session if they are felt necessary. Now, I was last here in 1987 and hence I know that I have been lucky with the timing. So let me go to the subject

2. India’s external environment remains complex and challenging. We are living in a world in transition, not just in geo-political terms, but also in geo-economic terms – covering trade, financial flows, financial trends, demographic changes and participation in a globalized economy. Globalization comes with its concurrent global threats – terrorism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, piracy and other threats to maritime security, environmental challenges, threats to space and cyber security, and access to water, among others. It is hard to distinguish between traditional and non-traditional threats to security, just as the lines are getting blurred between threats that emanate from within, our immediate neighbourhood or from regions far beyond our own. Let me now start with a few basic parameters. As the Prime Minister said at the recent Combined Commanders Conference, our internal and external policies must factor in the deterioration in the international strategic and political environment. The ability of the international community (such as it is) to respond to global security challenges has been limited by the preoccupation of major powers with domestic problems. 2012 will be a year of political transitions.

3. Our foreign and security policy guidelines flow out from the national requirements of sustained and inclusive economic growth which are politically defined as the priority for the country. External engagement has to ensure an enabling environment for national growth and development in terms of securing key variables: a periphery which is peaceful and hence permits concentration on economic development and access to material resources, energy, technologies and access to markets.

4. In a globalized world, a proactive external engagement is required to protect and promote India’s national interests. We need to define strategic autonomy in a dynamic context. From a foreign policy perspective it means that we must be self reliant in sectors critical to our national security, but we should be able to use external sources to our advantage. This will require that export control regimes targeted against us are given up. Beyond the critical sectors we must actively seek participation in global networks so that we benefit from sources with comparative advantage. It is of course clear that the ability of a country to harness globalization to its benefit, depends on its own strengths – which broadly includes the strength of its institutions, its infrastructure, its military capabilities, economic dynamism and cultural vitality.

5. Our strategic and security interests and concerns are closely intertwined with those of our neighbours. The peaceful periphery I talked of earlier calls for a policy of active engagement and cooperation with these countries with a view to nurture and promote our shared destinies and expand economic complementarities and connectivity. This is an ongoing effort. We seek to ensure that our smaller neighbours are not used by elements inimical to our interests. Conversely, our neighbours have to be assured their interests are taken care of in our bilateral engagements. Giving our neighbours a stake in our own economic growth will be an investment in our shared vision of security through shared prosperity. With many of our neighbours we are also committed to assisting them in building up their own security capabilities – through training, service-to-service ties, joint exercises etc.

6. At the bilateral level, we desire peaceful and cooperative relations with Pakistan. We are committed to resolving all outstanding issues with Pakistan through bilateral dialogue in an atmosphere free from terror and violence. The first round of the resumed dialogue has been completed in July 2011. We are committed to carry forward our discussions with an open mind and a forward looking approach. However, Pakistan must fulfil, in letter and spirit, its stated commitment of not allowing territory under its control to be used for fomenting terrorism against India in any manner. Our vision of a peaceful, cooperative and progressive South Asia cannot be realized unless the dark shadow of terrorism emanating from Pakistan is eliminated.

7. We have a strong multi-faceted strategic relationship with Afghanistan, demonstrated by the Strategic Partnership Agreement signed during the recent visit of President Karzai to India. Our strategic relations are based on historical and cultural linkages, and cemented by a significant Indian role in the reconstruction, development and capacity-building in Afghanistan. It is in our interest to see a peaceful and stable Afghanistan, which develops its natural and human resources and also becomes an economic hub, linking Central and South Asia through pipelines, trade and transit routes for the common good of the people of our region and the world. In this regard, India has committed to assisting Afghanistan in its reconstruction and development process in the run up to 2014 and beyond.

8. India and China as two large, growing economies with overlapping areas of interests are bound to cooperate and compete simultaneously. On the global issues there are a number of areas where we find common ground. The nature and content of the bilateral relationship has evolved considerably since the signing of our Strategic and Cooperative Partnership for Peace and Prosperity and the Shared Vision Document in January 2008. We have a wide-ranging bilateral dialogue. We also have outstanding issues and discussions by the Special Representatives appointed to deal with the boundary question are set to continue. The rapid strides in economic and military capabilities of China and the manner in which China exercises its power is being followed carefully not only by us but by other neighbours in East Asia, ASEAN and beyond. Managing our relations with China, will be probably the most critical element among the security dimensions of India’s foreign policy.

9. India shares open borders with Bhutan and Nepal. Open borders have facilitated people-to-people contacts and trade and commerce but they are vulnerable to misuse by forces inimical to peace and stability in the region. The security challenges posed by open borders require more intense and effective coordination between the security agencies of our two countries.

10. We are working with Nepal’s law enforcement agencies to address issues such as money laundering, and financing of terrorism through mutual cooperation. The need to further strengthen cooperation at the operational levels, ensure better coordination and exchange of information cannot be over emphasized.

11. Our relations with Bhutan, whose Head of State visited India last month, are based on trust and mutual understanding, which has been sustained through a common perception and understanding of our strategic and security interests. The operations conducted in 2003 to evict Indian Insurgent Groups in Bhutan were a milestone in our joint response to terrorist activities. India is committed towards capacity-building in Bhutan’s security agencies and there is close cooperation in the training of Bhutanese police and armed forces personnel in training institutions in India. The Indian Military Training Team in Bhutan is a symbol of our cooperation in the defence and security field for over four decades.

12. During Prime Minister’s visit to Dhaka in September, we made significant strides in our relations with Bangladesh, including the settlement of the long pending land boundary issues, and trade and economic cooperation. We expect to move forward on water sharing issues and road, rail and waterways connectivity which will fundamentally transform the cooperative landscape between India and Bangladesh. On security related matters we have received very good cooperation from Bangladesh and have been reassured that Bangladesh soil will not be allowed to be used for any activity inimical to our security interests.

13. India enjoys close and friendly relations with Sri Lanka and the Maldives which covers wide range of areas including trade, connectivity, power, agriculture, science & technology, capacity building, infrastructure development, education, culture and people to people contacts. We have close military-to-military cooperation with these neighbouring countries that underpins our core security concerns. There have been recent exchanges of visits at the level of the three Service Chiefs, senior officers, institutional exchanges and training programmes. More such exchanges and visits contribute to better bilateral understanding. Our relations with Myanmar continue to have a strong security dimension. The stabilization of our borders in the North-East of India requires a policy of cooperation with Myanmar. Myanmar can be our land bridge to South East Asia. It is also a significant partner in the Bay of Bengal.

14. Our extended neighbourhood in South East Asia, Central Asia and the Gulf region are an important priority in our foreign policy. These are regions that are witnessing domestic transformations which could impact on vital interests, including the presence of a large Indian Diaspora and as a source for our growing energy needs. Our strong economic and trade relations with these regions will need to grow in the coming decades. Hence their peace and stability is of vital interest to us.

15. The entire Indian Ocean region stretching from East African coast to the South China Sea remains crucial to our foreign trade, energy and national security interests. As part of our ‘Look East’ policy, the engagement with South East Asian states has been intensified. The Asia Pacific region is witnessing evolution of a regional economic and security architecture. We are participating in the process of East Asia Summit, ASEAN Regional Forum, ADMM Plus and other forums. An open, balanced and inclusive regional architecture is in the long-term interest of the region as a whole. Our strategic partnerships with Japan, ROK and other Asia Pacific countries also serve our long-term economic, developmental and security interests.

16. As part of our expanding interests, our relations with major powers are becoming increasingly important and extend beyond purely bilateral cooperation to areas such as regional security, economic issues, climate change, and disarmament and non-proliferation. We have established over the last decade a close relationship with the US and the US President last year described our relationship as one of the defining partnerships of the 21st century. Our ties with Russia also remain of vital importance to us – and this is underlined by the leadership level summits held annually with Russia. With Japan, France, and UK too we have very close ties founded on a commonality of interests encompassing the political, defence, energy, and economic areas. With all these countries we have to leverage our relations in high technology cooperation that can boost our defence modernisation programmes. This engagement is also important for securing a place for India in the world that is commensurate with our position and our expectations. Our current two-year membership in the UN Security Council and constructive contribution in international forums also reinforces our global credentials.

17. In an increasingly integrated global economic order, the economic crisis in some EU states affects the rest of the world through financial, trade and investment linkages. The G-20 had demonstrated its value in jointly addressing the challenges of the financial and economic crises and initiating reforms in international financial institutions. It remains a key forum for us to ensure that the agenda of the international economic cooperation takes account of our concerns and those of other developing countries.

18. Through new formations like BRICS, and IBSA we are expanding our economic partnerships with what are called the emerging countries.

19. We share the long-term vision for global, non-discriminatory and verifiable nuclear disarmament. We also support global non-proliferation objectives. However, as a nuclear weapon state, nuclear weapons are an integral part of our national security and will remain so pending global elimination of nuclear weapons. The Government is committed to putting in place all the necessary capabilities in pursuit of our policy of credible minimum deterrent. The developments in Pakistan’s nuclear and missile programmes have been reported widely. The close military and strategic ties between China and Pakistan impacts on our security environment. Our policies and engagements need to factor in this strategic reality and provide us options and additionalities to safeguard our national interest, beyond our own efforts.

20. India’s position in the Indian Ocean gives our nation a maritime destiny. Our foreign policy has to address growing maritime challenges which call for comprehensive naval capabilities. Ninety percent of India’s international trade by volume and seventy-seven percent by value is carried by sea. The maritime dimension is also vital for our energy security, as economic growth is critically dependent upon unhindered flow of oil. The sea-borne terrorist attacks on Mumbai-26/11, focussed the need for strengthening maritime and coastal security against threats from sea. The growing threat of piracy emanating from Somalia has assumed ever expanding dimensions even coming relatively close to our Lakshadweep island territories. A flexible but proactive maritime doctrine is essential to safeguard and project our national interests overseas as a net security provider to several island and littoral states in the Indian Ocean region and beyond. Obviously, this doctrine has to mesh with our overall foreign policy outreach. I am happy that as I speak, the Ministerial Meeting of the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation is being held in Bengaluru. The Indian Ocean Naval Symposium and the joint exercises carried out with partners are also of significance in this context.

21. Let me say in conclusion that our armed forces are increasingly participating in our external engagement which extend beyond UN peace-keeping, goodwill visits or joint exercises. Bilateral defence talks and service-to-service interactions have been growing. The services are integral to participation in the Regional Cooperation Agreement on Combating Piracy and armed robbery against Ships in Asia (ReCAAP), Defence Officials Dialogue under the ASEAN Regional Forum (ARF) and the ASEAN Defence Ministers Meeting Plus (ADMM Plus) process.

22. We live in a world in transition to a new order which will not be just multipolar but one with kaleidoscopic arrangements based on varying security, economic, technological and societal interests. This will call for greater coordination in our policy making mechanisms at home. The distinctions between internal and external security will also become more blurred calling for a constant review of our capabilities, preparedness and strategies. This NDC Course is, therefore, an important opportunity to address the strategies and structure for our national security.

New Delhi, November 29, 2011.

Foreign Secretary, Shri Ranjan Mathai
Additional Secretary Shri Basant Gupta,
Chief Passport Officer Shri Muktesh Pardeshi
Passport Officers
Distinguished representatives from Media

I am pleased to inaugurate the Annual Passport Officers’ Conference 2011. This Conference is an important occasion for the Ministry as well as Passport Offices to take stock of the functioning of our Passport Offices in meeting the primary objective of delivering passport services to fellow citizens efficiently.

At the outset, let me reiterate that the Passport Offices are the public face of the Ministry of External Affairs. I attach very high importance to prompt, efficient and courteous manner of delivery of passport services to our fellow citizens.

With India’s fast growing economy and our increasing integration with global economy, the number of Indians travelling abroad has shown phenomenal growth in recent years. Apart from business and employment reasons, more and more people are travelling abroad for education, tourism, pilgrimage and social visits. This, in turn, has resulted in a rapid increase in demand for passports and other miscellaneous services.

It is no surprise, therefore, that the number of passport applications has doubled since 2000. I understand a record number of passports numbering over 53 lakh were issued during 2010-11, in addition to rendering more than 6 lakh passport-related services. The demand on the Passport Offices would continue to grow in the months and years to come. This offers not only new opportunities but also enormous challenges.

I acknowledge the positive contributions made by Passport Officers in rendering timely Passport services, in spite of steep increase in demand and constraints with regard to infrastructure, equipment and personnel.

As a rapidly growing and modernizing nation, we are duty bound to provide services to our public that are completely transparent, prompt, user-friendly and, above all, in conformity with the best international standards and practices.
We have to strive to re-affirm our citizen-centric role by adopting measures which will facilitate greater convenience and comfort to public at large.

I wish to stress that there are still large number of complaints received by emails as well as through letters. Be it harassment of people visiting passport offices by either officials or by the agents, be it discourteous behaviour at the public interface in the passport offices, or be it difficulties in accessing information or in meeting with responsible officials. These problems should be addressed promptly.

Here, we need to constantly improve on the public grievance redressal mechanisms that have been put in place. Priority should be accorded to increase accountability within the system so that grievances/complaints are indeed attended to.

You must also ensure accessibility to citizens in your offices in a systematic manner by way of designating an ‘Open Day’ for addressing the complaints received from the public. It is important that these services are widely disseminated for citizens to take maximum advantage.

We must continue to facilitate faster and easier issuance of passports to Haj pilgrims as carried out this year. Next year as well, you should take measures for opening separate counters for the Haj pilgrims; holding special Passport Adalats; and liaising with police authorities to obtain police reports on priority basis.

The Passport Adalats, held once a month all over India, are disposing off long pending cases. These Passport Adalats should be mandatory for all passport officers their calendar to eliminate all pending old cases.

I understand that there is lot of pendency in passport delivery services largely due to pending police verifications. Please coordinate with the respective Commissioners of Police in your jurisdiction regularly so that the police verifications can be expedited. I also like that this pendency be eliminated, at least in those cases where police verifications have been received, by the end of the year.

To meet the ever increasing demand for passports, we embarked on an e-Governance initiative - the Passport Seva Project. This is a flagship Project of our Ministry. I am happy to note that 30 out of 77 Passport Seva Kendras have become operational. I would like to see the operationalization of remaining PSKs by March next year.

As part of the organisational reforms, the Central Passport Organisation cadre has been restructured and expanded. As part of the staff welfare and career enhancement measures of CPO employees, the Ministry has fast tracked promotions and also instituted Productivity Linked Incentive Scheme. I am happy to note that the employees of the Central Passport Organisation and their families are offered gratis passport services. We also need to urgently address the genuine grievances of the CPO employees.

Dear Colleagues,

The Passport Seva Project is a venture in the overall national interest. You are the most important stakeholder in the Project and your active involvement would be critical for the success of the execution of the Project.

I am confident that with your utmost support, this transformational initiative would be a great success and become a model for other citizen-centric services in the country.

I hope that the deliberations of the Conference would be constructive and result in practical and forward looking suggestions for improving the overall management of the Central Passport Organisation.

I wish the Conference all success. Thank you.

Riyadh, December 5, 2011.

Professor Abdulkhaleq Abdullah, Fellow Speakers,
Excellencies and distinguished participants,

I wish to thank the Institute of Diplomatic Studies and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia for the honour of speaking at this prestigious forum on the Gulf and the Globe.

Allow me to make a few points to start off a discussion on the topic that was suggested to me, namely, Global Power Shifts and the Role of Rising Powers.

1. We live in a time of unprecedented change. No one knows this better than the sub-region where we are today. It is hard to think of another area which has been as transformed in the last fifty years as the Gulf. Often the scope and pace of change is beyond explanation or comprehension and our thinking still has to catch up with reality. This is true of the economic shift that has accelerated after the financial crisis of 2008. It is also true of the rapid shifts in regional and global balances of power. Some of the change is positive. For the first time in history 60% of mankind has been exposed to sustained growth rates of over 6% for an extended period. Balance of power shifts and technological change are creating a world where power is more widely held. We seem to be moving to a situation of multiple major powers in the international system with the ability to produce or influence outcomes.

2. Unprecedented change also brings with it unprecedented uncertainty and insecurity. This is evident around us. Globalisation has created interdependence, knitting the world together. If the centre of gravity of world politics, and soon the economy, has shifted to Asia, including the Gulf, Asia is now also the cockpit of rivalries and the stage on which international competition is played out. Uncertainty and insecurity lead powers to follow hedging strategies, each acting on their own worst fears, and thereby risking making them come true.

But the same change that creates new challenges also opens up space for creative diplomacy. There is space opening up in the international system for medium powers and others to play a more active role in this world of multiple powers, economically interlinked and embedded in a new balance of power.
3. What are the drivers of this change? They range from technology (such as nuclear fission, ICT and uses of outer space), to economics, to politics, and to new issues like climate change and the uses of soft power in an interdependent world. Technologies like information and communications technology (ICT) have empowered small groups and individuals and the state itself, opening up new domains with new rules and practices, and new forms of contention.

4. We see the effects of these power shifts all around us. Developments in North Africa, West Asia and Gulf are evidence. The epicentre of global growth shifting to Asia is another. If this transformation is to be continued, for the benefit of the global economy, energy will be the key, and the Gulf will be critical to the rest of Asia’s growth and therefore to global economic health.

The flip side of common prosperity is common security. Asia’s security is also interlinked across this great continent. India has therefore argued for an open, inclusive Asian security architecture to be evolved by the powers of the region itself. We face common challenges of proliferation, terrorism, and maritime security and need to find a way to ensure the peace and stability that is essential to our futures.

5. What is the role of emerging powers in this situation? First, a problem of definition. Many of these so called emerging countries are really re-emerging powers, better described as rapidly developing countries rather than as rising powers. Today the world is fortunate to have several growth poles simultaneously in East Asia, South Asia, South East Asia, the Gulf and in Africa.

The larger countries in this category, (irrespective of whether you call them rising or emerging powers), are likely to continue to have several poor people even as they accumulate power in the international system, unlike the situation in the 19th or 20th centuries when Europe and North America developed. They are therefore unlikely to behave as the older or traditional powers did, and their domestic imperatives will take priority in policy formulation.

I can only speak for India, and give you one Indian’s view on the role of so-called emerging powers. We in India still have a long way to go in realising our domestic goal of transforming India to the point where each Indian has the opportunity to fully realise his potential. The scale of our domestic task is enormous, and for a long time to come our primary responsibility will be to sustain the pace of inclusive growth at home. I remember a Chinese friend saying once that the best contribution that India and China can make to global food security is to feed themselves. There is considerable truth in that.

Over the last two decades years India has averaged over 6% growth, which has accelerated to between 8-9% in the last five years. With a domestic savings rate of 35% and investment rate slightly higher than that the economy can sustain high growth rates. India’s economic prospects are good and the fundamentals are strong.

We also recognise that we live in an increasingly interdependent world and that India’s own success is increasingly bound to the fate of the rest of the world. When we began economic reforms twenty years ago only about 14% of our GDP was related to the external economy. Today that proportion is closer to 40%. (That figure is almost twice that for China.) We will therefore work with our international partners, contributing within our capacity to creating an enabling external environment for the domestic transformation of India. That is what India and Saudi Arabia have attempted to do together in the G-20.

This requires an external environment of peace. It is important that our strategic partnership also extend to creating that climate of peace working together on issues of regional security.

For India Saudi Arabia and the Gulf are vital partners. Almost 6 million Indians live and work here, and our trade is now over 100 billion dollars a year. India has a stake in issues relating to peace and stability in the wider Gulf region including Iran and Iraq.

India and Saudi Arabia enjoy cordial and friendly relations reflecting centuries of economic and social ties. The landmark visit of His Majesty King Abdullah bin Abdulaziz to India in January 2006 opened a new chapter in India-Saudi Arabia relations, which was carried forward by the visit of Prime Minister Manmohan Singh in 2010, giving new impetus to our strategic partnership.

One thing I can assure you. India will not be like the traditional big powers. Mrs. Indira Gandhi used to say India will be a different power, a power that works for development, peace and international understanding, in its own interest and in that of its friends and partners abroad, Asia is not Europe and our indigenous strategic cultures are strong and lasting. I am confident that, working together, India and the Gulf will be able to face the challenges that the new geopolitics are throwing up and take advantage of the opportunities that these changes are opening up.

Doha, December 12, 2011.

Excellencies,
Ladies and Gentlemen,

It is an honour and privilege for me to take part in the Fourth UN Alliance of Civilization Forum, here in Doha. I would like to take this opportunity to express my sincere gratitude to the First Lady of Qatar, Her Highness Sheikha Moza bint Nasser, the Ambassador for UNAOC for her strong commitment and valuable contribution to this forum and to his Excellency Jorge Sampaio, High Representative for UNAOC, for his leadership and efforts to strengthen this forum.

It is heartening to note the increasing interest of the international community in this Forum. The significant participation of world leaders, Ministers, Parliamentarians, Representatives of Civil Society and NGOs in this Forum is testimony to the desire and abiding interest of the international community towards a genuine civilizational dialogue to enhance mutual understanding and to make the world a better place to live.

Excellency,

When we look around for successful models of inclusiveness, tolerance and peaceful existence, I have no doubt in my mind that India stands out as a living example of Unity in Diversity. India is a land of variety with a mosaic of geography, climate, lifestyles, religions, habits, thought processes and cultures. With a population of over 1.2 billion, it has more than 30 languages, more than 1600 dialects and hundreds of ethnic groups. India is the birthplace of the great religions of Hinduism, Buddhism, Sikhism and Jainism. We also have one of the largest populations of Muslims in the world and our land has provided the ground for other religions like Christianity and Zoroastrianism to flourish.

And in spite of all these differences, all these diversity, the Indian civilization, from time immemorial, has been characterized by inclusiveness and by unity in diversity. India has been a living example of Confluence of Civilizations and not Clash of Civilizations. It is a place where we celebrate diversity and are enriched by differences. Each and every section of society in India has found equal opportunities for expression and for accomplishments. India is the largest democracy in the World and it has ensured for its citizens equality and dignity. Even the weaker sections of the society are provided equal status and equal opportunities.
The interaction between India and rest of world go back to centuries starting from the trade links between Indus Valley Civilization and the other Civilizations of that time i.e. Nile and Mesopotamian Civilizations. India’s interaction and exchanges with the West also goes back to the time of ancient Greece. Over the centuries, India’s contact with Islam produced the great edifice of the Sufi Traditions and the Indo-Islamic culture. Unlimited strains of thoughts and cultures have touched India and India has attracted travellers like Ibn Batuta, Al Baruni, Fa Yean, Hun Tsang and Magasthenese. And yet India always benefitted from these thoughts, these cultures but maintained its identity, the Indian-ness. As father of our nation, Mahatma Gandhi had said, “I do not want my house to be walled in on all sides and my windows to be stuffed. I want the cultures of all the lands to be blown about my house as freely as possible. But I refuse to be blown off my feet by any.”

I think this is the need of the hour.

The world is becoming a global village and it is almost impossible for any country or any nation to remain untouched by the outside influences. But what is needed is to absorb these trends, these diversities, these differences so as to produce a beautiful civilizational mosaic where all different cultures, thoughts can co-exist peacefully.

Excellency,

This has become even more important in the present day context where at a number of places in the world, people are becoming impatient and are yearning for change. The differences are trying to dominate the commonalities. However here I would like to say that the societies cannot be reordered from outside and any process of change should be driven by the desires of the people in the spirit of inclusiveness. It is the responsibility of the countries to create conditions that enable their people to freely determine their pathways to development. Particularly in the Middle-East, the developments over the past year again underlined ever so strongly the need for inclusive processes underpinned by dialogue, not violence, and reforms to meet the legitimate aspirations of people. It is also imperative that nations like Palestine which have been denied to play their rightful role in the international community are allowed to do so.

Excellency

UNAOC has been playing an important role towards civilization understanding. In the last few years the UNAOC has expanded rapidly and the number of member States and international organizations of the Group of Friends has grown further. India fully supports the initiatives of the Alliance and welcomes and supports all efforts to build bridges of understanding between nations, peoples, religions, and cultures across the many fault-lines that exist.

Excellency,

Peace and development are two faces of the same coin. There cannot be equitable development without sustainable peace. We appreciate the UNAOC’s role in advancing better inter-cultural relations thus creating an environment for equitable development. India also welcomes the efforts to explore the linkage between AOC’s mission and aims and Millennium Development Goals (MDGs), at this Forum. We hope that this Forum will come out with concrete initiatives for creating peace through dialogue among all civilizations and also achievements of the developmental goals as enshrined in the MDGs.

I would like to conclude by thanking the Government of Qatar for their warm hospitality and excellent arrangements for this meeting.

Thank you.

030. Address by Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai at the Conference on “Economic Policies for Emerging Economies”.

New Delhi, December 14, 2011.

During the deliberations today you may have dealt with definitional issues in the context of the emergence of “emerging economies”, and just how many economies fit the description. It is, therefore, not my intention to go back to the Goldman Sachs Global Economics Paper Number 66, which brought BRICS into the jargon of international discourse. But the last ten years have propelled BRICS further forward in popular imagination, as well as much as in the reality of their contribution to the global economy. Obviously Indonesia, Mexico and Turkey and some other countries may need to be added to the acronym. Or just as we have IBSA we could have further sets of emerging economies who acquire prominence when grouped together. Such groupings are arbitrary as the emerging economies are not necessarily cohesive. But whether collectively or severally the emerging economies are set to become poles of economic and political power in a multi-polar world.
Such predictions are by nature dangerous. In the 1960s Herman Kahn had more or less convinced some that by the end of the century we would all need to speak Japanese to survive. There are other examples to show that - In the long run not only are we all dead but all our predictions are dead!

Now the Financial Times of December 7 carried the headline “Brazil growth shudders to halt”. The article suggests a somewhat eager anticipation of a hard landing or slowdown for all four BRICS countries. Some slowing may be inevitable over time but to draw a conclusion that the long term trends are negative is probably a case of premature schadenfreude. However policies have clearly to be set in place if the trend lines are to stay steady.

Evidence from the growth path of China and India show that there are some key features of the economic environment that are necessary to sustain such growth, and hence good pointers to the economic policies necessary:

(i) The liberal open economic order built over the last sixty years with stable trading rules, a reliable international reserve currency, protected commons through which merchandise and invisibles can be exchanged globally, has been identified by Ashley Tellis as a key enabler.

(ii) India’s case is not one of trade-driven growth. But the unleashing of animal spirits which has enabled us to leverage a 34 % savings rate, is not purely a domestically driven mechanism. The success stories of Indian software professionals were made possible through integration in global communication networks and the relatively open system of trading in services. Global success of the services sector imparted new imagination and confidence to our country, apart from financing a boom in domestic consumption, and creating a wider domestic consensus on the benefits of participation in the global economy.

Emerging countries would, therefore, do well to play their part in preserving the viability of global regimes and systems of trade and transport, tweaking them to remove distortions which deliberately work against them. But individually or as a group, emerging economies must encourage greater emphasis on trade and connectivity.

A second critical area is the policies that affect our energy choices. There is no getting away from the fact that even today sustained growth will require what Lenin called “electrificia”. With forty percent of the population still without access to commercial energy in India one of the greatest challenges of economic policy is to stimulate energy investments, efficiencies and innovations.
As the recent Durban discussions showed, there will be continued pressure to slow down the emergence of emerging countries, through mechanisms of legally binding agreements which would curtail critical energy and infrastructure development. In our own interest, as much as in our responsibility for the planet, emerging economies have no alternative but to become Green focussed economies within one generation. This will call for a technological revolution, which points to another set of economic policies necessary.

Emerging economies will have to take account of the fact that their spectacular growth in the last 2-3 decades began at low levels of development. Most had resources that remained underemployed because of lack of opportunities or lack of what Tellis calls “catalysing mechanisms”. Economic reform helped with factor accumulation, and at the same time the emerging economies benefited from the “late industrialisation” syndrome of using production techniques, technologies and processes already tried and tested elsewhere. In telecom, for example, we were able to leapfrog an entire stage of development and did not have to dig up the whole country with copper wire for a nation-wide landline network, before moving as we have to a stage where over 800 million people have telecom connectivity.

The future will depend to a much greater extent on productivity. Of course, availability of capital, technology, higher education and efficient infrastructure will be necessary. But as an ADB study looking at the year 2030 notes “what will differentiate countries is their ability to adopt technologies – the skill level of workforce, appropriate capital and infrastructure, openness to trade and FDI, and more generally the investment climate”. The so called demographic dividend can be one only if productivity gains become the norm. Economic policy that drives such productivity improvements, would give us balance in the terms of engagement with countries and organisations which are major sources of technology and finance.

Any historical overview will also clarify that economic policies cannot be divorced from the existing political realities of the world. To have freedom and space for economic policy-making that seeks to increase participation in the global economy, it will be necessary for the emerging economies to have increased weightage in the global political discourse, and in the management of the global commons. The ability to pull our weight in reformed institutions of global governance (including international financial institutions), a visible capacity for self-defence with domestic capabilities in the requisite technologies, and diplomatic skills would all be essential. We have to manage the interface of economic and politico-military assets, all the while articulating policy and interests in a world of instant communication.
The economic policies of emerging countries will have to take into account the political balance in the world and make choices which are best suited for navigating a sustainable course in this complicated scenario.

As we see it in South Block our economic policies must enable us to build on India’s inherent strengths and factor advantages. All development is ultimately local. But our potential is best leveraged through structures of international cooperation. The G-20 provides the emerging economies one platform which is shared with the established powers, whereas IBSA, BRICS or even the G-77 provide avenues for beneficial convergence with other emerging economies and beyond. In many areas partnerships and the task of finding interlocutors will be between institutions, corporates and organisations, not necessarily between countries. Managing such kaleidoscopic variations will not be easy, but they would be essential part of economic policy making just as much as in foreign policy.

031. Inaugural Address of Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee at the International Conference on “Economic Policies for Emerging Economies”.

New Delhi, December 14, 2011.

It gives me great pleasure to deliver the inaugural address at the International Conference on “Economic Policies for Emerging Economies” organized jointly by the Ministry of Finance, Government of India and the National Institute of Public Finance and Policy. The initiative by Prof Kausik Basu last year of bringing together economists, policy makers, industry captains and other stakeholders to deliberate on topical economic issues has now grown into a week-long “Delhi Economics Conclave”. I understand that this is the plenary day of the Conclave, which is a collaborative effort with seminars being hosted by the Delhi School of Economics, Confederation of Indian Industry and Indian Statistical Institute.

I welcome and support this initiative. There are eminent scholars from India and abroad, including Nobel Laureate Professor Amartya Sen, Prof. Richard Freeman of Harvard University, well-known policy makers, leading bankers, representatives from Trade and Industry, social activists and journalists participating in this Conference. While extending a warm welcome to all of you I would like to compliment Prof. Kaushik Basu, and his able team of officers in organizing this conference. I am sure this conference would contribute to the economic policy discourse of emerging nations including India.

The subject of today’s conference “Economic Policies for Emerging Economies” is very topical. The world economy is passing through turbulent times. Recovery from the global economic crisis has been staggered because of a complex mix of real and financial challenges facing many industrialized economies. Moreover, the recovery has been two-paced, with emerging market economies like China and India leading the way followed by Latin America and Africa. Advanced economies have grown more slowly than before. Over the past months, deep and widespread economic problems have surfaced in Europe which is a further setback to the global economy.

Indeed, there is indication that even the tepid economic recovery that we have seen so far in the advanced economies is stalling. Unemployment in these economies never quite recovered from their crisis highs. The relatively robust recovery in emerging market economies is also beginning to falter. The financial markets, which had never fully recovered from the earlier crisis, are under renewed stress.

The current build-up of concerns has been incremental in nature with a series of local intermittent shocks getting transferred to the global economy. All this has happened despite the aggressive use of both fiscal and monetary policy tools and our collective resolve to keep markets open. This poses some serious problems for the policy makers. Going forward it limits our options in dealing with the emerging situation.

The heart of the problem lies in sovereign debt. John Maynard Keynes had famously observed that when you borrow 1000 pounds, you are under the thumb of your banker. But when you borrow 1 million pounds, your banker is under your thumb.

During economic slowdown in the wake of the global financial crisis, virtually all governments increased their spending as part of fiscal stimulus packages. In particular, several European governments built up large public debt. As a consequence, those who lent money to these sovereigns are in trouble. I should add that reality is a little more complex than what Keynes had said. The large debt is causing a problem for both the lenders and the borrowers.

It is possible to argue that current developments in the global economy reflect a major shift in the international economic order, where emerging economies will come to play a major role in the post-crisis world. While new opportunities await us in the near future, we must recognize that sound economic policy-making is a must for realizing them. Our intellectual engagements in the field of economic policy analysis also need to increase. It is therefore imperative to deliberate on innovative ideas to address challenges faced by emerging economies, involving all stakeholders. In this context, the present conference assumes even greater significance.

Though emerging economies recovered quickly from 2008-09 global crises, factors including capacity constraints, rising commodity prices, uncertainties in capital flows and slowdown in external demand have impacted their growth to varying degrees. Some of them have also been experiencing inflationary pressures. Excessive liquidity from aggressive policy actions, by central banks from around the world trying to counter recessionary tendencies, spilled over onto emerging economies, resulting in excessive volatility in capital flows and inflationary pressures.

It is reassuring to note that in such a globalized environment the pause in India’s growth story was brief. The Indian economy recovered with growth averaging over 8 per cent in the two years following the outbreak of the crisis in 2008.

We are presently faced with a rapidly evolving economic scenario. While the Indian economy faced excessive capital inflows in the aftermath of the global crisis leading to appreciation of the domestic currency, with the unfolding of the euro zone crisis, the matter of concern at present is reversal in such flows leading to increased currency volatility. We have witnessed sharp depreciation of the Rupee vis-à-vis the US Dollar in the last few months. Slowdown in external demand has led to deceleration in the growth of exports in recent months with the current account deficit widening to around 3 per cent of GDP.

Sustained high level of inflation that has been a major policy concern for us over the past two years is now beginning to moderate. Food inflation has seen a decline to 6.6 per cent for the week ending November 26, 2011. Growth however has slowed in 2011-12. The second quarter of the current fiscal has registered a GDP growth of 6.9 per cent following a growth of 7.7 per cent in the first quarter. Our monthly industrial growth has slowed down sharply for the month of October 2011. This is partly a reflection of global trends, but our own fight against inflation has also taken a toll on investments by our corporations. We must turn our attention now to reviving growth as quickly as possible.

We also have our fiscal challenges but our problems, whether they are measured in terms of aggregate public debt or the size of the fiscal deficit, are nowhere nearly as large as the ones faced by many European nations. I say this not to encourage complacency in India but to place the issue in perspective. I am expecting that the present downturn will be temporary and our economy will soon revert back to high growth.

The Indian economy is, in some ways, better placed than many other nations to withstand a fresh round of global economic turmoil. India’s resilience results from the fact that the bulk of India’s GDP is domestic demand driven. A calibrated approach to capital account convertibility has, to a significant extent, prevented rapid surges and reversals of debt creating capital flows. India’s external commercial borrowings policy that places end-use, all-in-cost and maturity restrictions, has been successful in maintaining external debt at sustainable levels. India’s banking sector is robust and export basket is increasingly diversified with developing countries being our largest export market. We can also boast of optimal regulatory mechanisms in place that check unsustainable financial practices, thus ensuring the robustness of the financial sector.

I understand that a plenary panel in this conference will dwell on issues concerning social justice and inclusive development. I am happy that Professor Amartya Sen, who is a world authority in these matters, is with us today.

In a globalised world, macroeconomic disturbances will come up from time to time to challenge policy makers in economies like ours. However, problems of poverty and inequality pose continuing challenges for us. Our growth story is now an accepted fact, but many people in this country are yet to receive the full benefits of our rapid economic expansion. Our commitment to ‘inclusive growth’ is an endeavour to include those at the margins into the mainstream of India’s growth story through micro and macro level initiatives. We are seeking to strengthen institutions and delivery mechanisms that take the benefits of high growth to the poor. The Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme (MGNREGS) is one such example. Our emphasis on inclusive development in the 12th Five Year Plan that focuses on agriculture and crucial social sectors including education and health is in keeping with this objective. While I am not personally familiar with the work of Professor Richard Freeman, I know that he has written extensively on labour rights and the welfare of workers. I am sure he will have useful advice to give us.

Let me conclude by saying that we need to further our understanding of issues where greater and coordinated policy actions are needed to sustain growth and create inclusive outcomes for the people. I am confident that this conference would contribute to that end. Let me once again compliment the organizers of the Conference for this great effort. I look forward to benefiting from the outcomes of your deliberations.

New Delhi, December 15, 2011.

I am very happy to be here today at the inauguration of this CII event. I understand this conference, which is being organised as a part of the Delhi Economics Conclave, to dwell on contemporary economic issues and challenges before us, would be an annual feature from this year. I welcome this initiative.

The world economy is facing renewed challenges on several fronts in the aftermath of the global financial turmoil of 2008. The persisting Euro zone sovereign debt crisis has continued to fuel uncertainty in the financial markets, undermining business sentiments globally. Post-financial crisis, the world saw a two-paced recovery with advanced economies growing more slowly than before, while emerging economies like China and India leading the way.

After the initial phase of harmonising the use of macro-economic policy and keeping markets open, countries in the developed and the developing world adopted revival strategies, in keeping with the needs of their respective contexts, though with varying degree of success. Thus, in recent months, while recovery in the advanced economies is showing signs of stalling, there is slowdown in the emerging economies. This does not augur well for the global economy. Indeed, it is becoming one of the most challenging periods for policy makers the world over.

It is in time like these that the need for putting our heads together to come up with practical policy options in addressing the challenges before us becomes vital. Emerging economies including India have a prominent and ever increasing role in the global economic and financial system. Consequently, their intellectual engagement in the field of economic policy analysis also needs to increase. A realignment of how the world integrates various human dimensions, across social, political, and economic spheres, for an interdisciplinary approach to problem solving needs to emerge. Fortunately, we now have the tools of technology and communication to assist in this process. I would like to believe that the idea of having a Delhi Economics Conclave is a step in that direction. India has to make progress as a centre for intellectual discourse and knowledge creation in the fields of economic, financial and social policy-making, to complement its growing economy and role in global policy matters.

As you dwell on some of the policy challenges before us, particularly in the emerging market economies, it is important for us to strike a fine balance between the short run and the long run policy issues and options to help restore market confidence. Post-financial crisis, as the global recovery was taking root our attention was on rebalancing of the global economy, to make the recovery stronger and sustainable in the medium to long-term. In retrospect, perhaps we did not pay adequate attention to internal imbalances i.e. shifting demand back from the public sector to the private. The present indicators show that both private consumption and investment sentiments have weakened. It is this weakening of sentiments that makes it necessary to shift some of our focus back to near term issues even as we recognize that some structural imbalances remain to be addressed.

The economic restructuring process of troubled nations is going to be protracted and would throw up many more challenges over the medium term for the rest of the world. Likewise, the world’s largest economy the US is also struggling with high debt levels and continued balance sheet troubles for firms and households. In fact, the OECD has recently cut its growth forecast for advanced economies over the coming two years. The conditions in the advanced economies have inevitably transmitted to developing economies through various channels including loss of demand volumes, volatile fund flows, fluctuating commodity prices, and others. All nations have become vulnerable to lesser or larger extent. India is no exception although the impact has been relatively muted and macroeconomic fundamental remain strong.

It is necessary in this context for policy makers to send clear signals, mindful of the fact that our options today are much more limited. On the one hand, markets are wary of mounting public debt in the absence of strong growth, which is a long-term issue. On the other hand, strong injections of liquidity by Central Banks seem to have done little to stimulate lending and borrowing, so far. Instead we are witnessing damaging spillover consequences, especially on asset and commodity prices and more recently in the foreign exchange markets that have strengthened inflation in some emerging markets.

The real danger to the global economy lies in the rapid contagion possible through today’s globally integrated financial markets. Imbalances even in relatively small economies can be magnified by integrated financial markets, especially through mechanisms such as the currency unions. We cannot afford to have a piecemeal stop-go approach. A concerted and coordinated response is the need of the hour for the collective global well-being.

The global economy is perhaps better positioned today than what it was in the 1930’s. At the time of the Great Depression, global growth was entirely dependent on industrialized countries fed by raw material producing colonies. The latter were entirely dependent on demand in the former. Both advanced economies and their colonies therefore went down together. The situation today is different. Former colonies are now emerging markets undergoing their own industrial revolutions and with their own endogenous sources of rising demand. Although emerging markets cannot be entirely decoupled in an integrated world, nevertheless this is the main reason why the world continued to grow even as advanced countries went into recession. It is important not to weaken the growth impulse in the new nodes of demand, but should indeed strengthen it.

One way of doing that is to leverage global imbalances to address developmental imbalances. If we need to add demand to the global economy, to offset the moderation of demand in industrialized countries, a good way of doing that is to expand infrastructure investment in developing economies. This suggestion may well be extended to increasing investment in infrastructure generally, and a more liberal flow of technology to developing countries, which in turn could spur output and productivity growth in both advanced and developing countries.

Let me turn to the Indian economy. The challenges facing the country are daunting. The primary challenge is of human development, where India still ranks low in global terms, particularly in critical areas such as infant and maternal mortality, nutrition, and literacy. India cannot afford to relax on its efforts to promote growth and to leverage the fruits of that growth for fostering more equitable and inclusive development. Domestically, the struggle against inflation and tightening interest rate regime has contributed to lowering of growth in demand and investment. The slowdown in industrial growth is of particular concern as it impacts employment.

Despite declining trend, inflation is at unacceptable levels. There are also immediate concerns related to fiscal deficit and current account deficit. Over the medium term, employment creation is a key challenge as some 250-300 million new entrants to the workforce are expected over the next decade or so. Skill development and training efforts will need to be stepped up. Financial inclusion and reforms are high priority and so is infrastructure across all sectors. Challenges of land availability and environmental sustainability have to be also addressed effectively over a longer time horizon.

Innovative remedies would be required to address these challenges simultaneously. The options for fiscal steps as well as monetary measures are increasingly limited. However, there is potential for policymaking in other areas. In recent months, the government has sought to unlock economic bottlenecks through initiatives such as the National Manufacturing Policy, permitting greater FDI in retail sector, Direct Taxes Code, Goods and Services Tax, and various legislations including in the financial sector. We hope that greater consensus on these initiatives will help speed up their implementation.
In today’s context, macroeconomic management can no longer be confined only to economic issues. Economists must also be adept at addressing political and social outcomes of policy decisions. In a complex and interconnected world, it is no longer enough to merely state the desirable steps – we need to go beyond the ‘what’ to also lay out the ‘how’. The success of our navigation through a complex multi-layered environment is what will determine future economic growth and development.

No nation can afford to be insular in its decision-making process. Democratisation demands globally acceptable solutions within the interest matrix of each nation. We need to work together for building consensus within domestic and international communities. For this, a new form of communication and dialogue is needed, between nations, between communities, between political entities, between social classes and economic stakeholders.

Let me conclude by thanking you for giving me this opportunity to share some thoughts. I greatly look forward to the discussions at the Delhi Economics Conclave and await its outcomes with anticipation.”

033. Speech by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the inauguration of Passport Seva Kendras in Andhra Pradesh.
Tirupati (Andhra Pradesh), December 23, 2011.

Hon’ble Minister Shri Raghuveera Reddy,
Hon’ble Minister Smt. Galla Aruna Kumari,
Hon’ble Member of Parliament and Chairman of Tirumala Tirupati Devasthanam (TTD) Shri K. Bapi Raju, Hon’ble Member of Parliament of Tirupati Dr. Chinta Mohan
Hon’ble Member of Legislative Assembly of Andhra Pradesh Shri Chiranjeevi, Hon’ble Members of the Legislative Assembly of Andhra Pradesh
Additional Secretary Shri B.K. Gupta,
Joint Secretary and Chief Passport Officer Shri Muktesh Pardeshi, RPO Hyderabad Dr. K. Srikar Reddy,
Friends from the Media,

Ladies and Gentlemen

I am delighted to be in the holy city of Tirupati on the occasion of the inauguration of seven Passport Seva Kendras (PSKs) in Andhra Pradesh - one each in Tirupati, Nizamabad, Vijayawada and Visakhapatnam and three in Hyderabad.

The launch of Passport Seva Kendras is part of the Government of India’s firm commitment to provide timely delivery of passport services to our fellow citizens. I take this opportunity to reaffirm the citizen-centric role of passport offices, by adopting measures which facilitate speedier service, greater convenience and comfort to the public at large.

With India’s rising international profile, fast growing economy and our increasing integration with the global economy, the number of Indians travelling abroad has shown phenomenal growth in recent years. Apart from economic and employment reasons, more and more people are travelling abroad for education, tourism, pilgrimage and social visits. This, in turn, has resulted in rapid increase in demand for passports and other miscellaneous services. The number of passport applications at the national level has doubled since 2000.

In Andhra Pradesh, the demand for passport services has been growing rapidly in the recent years. It is at a much higher rate than at the national level. The Regional Passport Office in Hyderabad, together with the Passport Office in Visakhapatnam, has been coping up with the demand for issue of passports in Andhra Pradesh. These two Passport Offices have processed about six lakh passport applications till November this year, which is an increase of about 25% compared to the same period in 2010.

I am aware of the pendency in issue of passports in our passport offices. I have directed the Passport officials to dispose those passport applications where police verifications have been received in an expeditious manner. Coordination between Passport officials and the local police authorities will be improved to obtain speedy police clearances to reduce pendency in issue of passports.

Andhra Pradesh is a pioneer in launch of various e-Governance initiatives, such as e-Seva and e-Procurement. In a similar vein, the Passport Seva Project launched by the Ministry of External Affairs is a flagship initiative of the Central Government under National e-Governance Plan to improve delivery of public services and overall governance. The Project incorporates the best of global practices in the passport issuance system including the establishment of PSKs. Through this Project, the Government of India is aiming to deliver all Passport-related services to the citizens in a timely, transparent, manner and a more accessible and comfortable environment.

I am happy at the progress achieved so far in the implementation of this ambitious Project. In a short time, we moved from Pilot Project mode to commencement of nation-wide rollout of Passport Seva Kendras in June this year, with the joint efforts of the Ministry and the Service Provider – the Tata Consultancy Services.

I am satisfied with the progress of launch of Passport Seva Kendras - 30 out of 77 planned PSKs have been made operational. The States of Karnataka, Tamil Nadu, Haryana, Punjab, Andhra Pradesh, National Capital Region and West Bengal have been covered by the Project so far. Nine more Kendras will go live by the end of this month in Gujarat, Kerala and Uttar Pradesh, thus crossing the halfway mark in our rollout journey. The Ministry will strive to accomplish the launch of all PSKs by March next year.

Here, I would like to express my sincere appreciation to Tata Consultancy Services, the Service Provider and our partner, for their earnest efforts in speedy implementation of the Project.

I am privileged to dedicate today seven PSKs in Andhra Pradesh. We have thus fully implemented the Passport Seva Project in respect of Andhra Pradesh. I am also happy to announce that we have agreed in principle to open a mini-PSK at Bhimavaram, West Godavari district, and it would be launched shortly.

I am confident that the comprehensive overhaul of passport delivery system through the Passport Seva Project undertaken by us will help in bringing ‘Public Services Closer Home’ in Andhra Pradesh and in other States.

I would like to felicitate the people of Andhra Pradesh on this momentous occasion of launch of seven PSKs across the State. We also acknowledge the whole-hearted support that we have received from the Government and people of Andhra Pradesh in the timely execution of these transformative initiatives.

Thank you.

CIVIL NUCLEAR ENERGY
034. Remarks by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Commissioning of the Power Reactor Fuel Processing Plant.

Tarapur, January 7, 2011.

"I am delighted to be present at the historic occasion of the commissioning of the second Power Reactor Reprocessing Plant at Tarapur.

This is a significant milestone in our country’s three-stage indigenous nuclear programme. I heartily congratulate the scientists and engineers who were involved in the design, construction and commissioning of this unique complex and state of the art facility. This is yet another instance that once we make up our mind, India can do anything.

We have come a long way since the first reprocessing of spent fuel in India in the year 1964 at Trombay. The recycling and optimal utilization of Uranium is essential to meet our current and future energy security needs. The vision of the founding fathers of our nuclear programme, Jawaharlal Nehru and Homi Bhabha, was to achieve the mastery of the complete fuel cycle, thus enabling India to use our vast and abundant thorium resources in advanced nuclear power reactors. The reprocessing of spent fuel is therefore the key to our three stage indigenous nuclear power programme. Reprocessing is essential in the transition to the second stage of fast breeder reactors which we have begun, and in the subsequent third stage using thorium in advanced reactors.

Reprocessing spent fuel will also ensure that we are better able to manage the wastes which are by-products of the nuclear fuel cycle.

Tarapur, itself is an outstanding example of nuclear energy’s capacity to provide the clean, safe and economical energy that our nation requires for its development and growth. This site is home to the oldest boiling water reactors in the world. Here we have built our own reactors as well. And we have subsequently added the entire range of facilities covering the entire fuel cycle from fuel fabrication to reprocessing and waste immobilization.

Taken together, the atomic energy programme of India represents a very important and significant step towards technological and energy self-reliance and security. That we have done so by the efforts of our own scientists and engineers is tribute to the vision of the founders of our atomic energy programme. Given the advanced status of our indigenous programme and the capabilities of our scientists and engineers we can now confidently utilize the new opportunities that have been created with the opening up of international cooperation in the field of nuclear energy.

As we move forward in the years to come to realize the potential of atomic energy to contribute to our nation's development I would urge that we pay greater attention to capacity building, training and nurturing young and fresh talent which is in abundant supply in our country.

I once again congratulate all those who have played a role in this important landmark and who have contributed to the development of our capabilities in atomic energy. In their own way, each one of our scientists and engineers engaged in this very important national projects are nation builders. I commend you all for your dedication and your hard work and your commitment to the goal of our national development. I wish you even greater success in your service to our nation. I think each one of you on this historic occasion."

Vienna, June 14, 2011.

Foreign Secretary Smt. Nirupama Rao met Director General of International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) Yukiya Amano in Vienna today. They reviewed cooperation between India and the Agency. Recalling his visit to India in January this year DG said he was deeply impressed with India's achievements in peaceful uses of nuclear energy. DG also praised India's excellent nuclear non-proliferation record. FS briefed the DG regarding India's plans for expansion of nuclear energy in the coming decades, as a clean and sustainable energy source, to meet India's developmental needs and contribute to energy security. DG agreed with FS that nuclear energy would continue to be an important energy source for a number of countries.

The DG outlined some nuclear safety issues that have arisen after the nuclear accident at Fukushima Daiichi. A report by an International Fact Finding Mission is expected to be submitted to the Agency. FS said that India welcomes DG's initiative to host a ministerial conference on nuclear safety which will be held in Vienna next week. India has taken a number of measures to review and strengthen nuclear safety at its nuclear power plants. Government was also planning to introduce a bill in the next session of Parliament to establish an independent Nuclear Regulatory Authority of India.

DG spoke of his efforts in promoting role of IAEA in agriculture, industry and health which was important for developing countries. DG also thanked Government of India for its generous donation of Bhabhatron to Vietnam and Sri Lanka.

FS mentioned that India would like to cooperate with IAEA on the Global Centre for Nuclear Energy Partnership being established in India as a follow up to PM's announcement at Nuclear Security Summit in Washington in April 2010.

036. Message of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh to participants of Global Zero Summit.

I have great pleasure in conveying my greetings to the participants of the Global Zero Summit and to extend my support for its noble goal of a world free of nuclear weapons.

India has been steadfast in its support for global, non-discriminatory verifiable nuclear disarmament. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi presented a visionary Action Plan for a Nuclear-Weapon-Free and Non-Violent World Order. This Action Plan sets out a roadmap for achieving nuclear disarmament in a time bound, universal, non-discriminatory, phased and verifiable manner. We are glad to note that the Global Zero Action Plan is based on similar principle and that, like India, it has supported the global elimination of nuclear weapons in a time-bound framework.

The goal of nuclear disarmament can be achieved by a step-by-step process underwritten by a universal commitment and an agreed multilateral framework that is global and non-discriminatory. Progressive steps are needed for the de-legitimization of nuclear weapons. Measures to reduce nuclear dangers arising from accidental or unauthorized use of nuclear weapons, increasing restraints on the use of nuclear weapons, de-alerting of nuclear weapons are essential steps. There is need for a meaningful dialogue among all states processing nuclear weapons to build trust and confidence and for reducing the salience of nuclear weapons in international affairs and security doctrines.

This campaign can be taken forward by forging a renewed consensus on non-proliferation and nuclear disarmament. Public awareness and support is vital to generate and sustain an irreversible momentum until we reach our cherished goal of a world without nuclear weapons. Transforming this vision into reality is a task worthy of the distinguished participants of the Global Zero Campaign.

I extend my best wishes for a successful conference.

(Manmohan Singh)

037. Extract relevant to Nuclear issue from the Interview of Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao by Karan Thapar for Devil’s Advocate.

New Delhi, July 2, 2011.

(The earlier part of the interview related to Pakistan for that Please see Document No.287)

Interviewer: (Mr. Karan Thapar): Hello and welcome to Devil's Advocate. Where do relations with Pakistan stand and has the Nuclear Suppliers Group betrayed India? Those are two of the critical issues ...(Inaudible)... in an exclusive interview with the Foreign Secretary Nirupama Rao.

Interviewer: Foreign Secretary, let us come to the recent decision taken by the Nuclear Suppliers Group not to sell enrichment and reprocessing technologies to countries that have not signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. Would you accept that in effect this has nullified the clean waiver India got in 2008?

Foreign Secretary: I think we are very clear about this development. There are two points that I would like to make. First of all we have consistently underlined, and this is a fact well-known to our partners, that the sanctity of the clean exemption that India was granted in the September 2008 NSG decision must be maintained, must be upheld.

Interviewer: That is your position. But they do not share that position.

Foreign Secretary: I am coming to it. The second point is that full bilateral civil nuclear cooperation commitments that have been entered into between India and its various partners must be taken forward. And both these points let me mention have been recognized by our chief partners in this regard - by the United States, by France, by Russia.

Interviewer: I will come to the United States, France and Russia in a moment's time. Let us first pick up on your point that the sanctity of the waiver must be retained and preserved. That is your position. But the NSG has introduced a new paragraph 6 in its guidelines which stipulates the criteria that recipient countries must meet before any NSG country can sell ENR technology. And the first criteria is membership of the NPT. That criteria alone disqualifies India.

Foreign Secretary: First of all let me say that these guidelines have not been published in open text as yet. We need to study that more fully and we need to draw our conclusions from that. I am not saying that these developments are welcome. I am not in any way suggesting that this is something that we have not known and we have not fought all this time. We knew that there was a process under way and we …

Interviewer: And we tried very hard to prevent and we failed to prevent as well.

Foreign Secretary: It is not a question of failure. You have look at this as a dynamic process. Let me say one thing very clearly, and I will repeat myself on this, that the international nuclear order will change in India's favour. And I am sure of that.

Interviewer: That is a hope. …(Inaudible)… But let me put it like this. When India got the clean waiver in 2008, it did so on the basis of certain specific commitments it made. It agreed to put several of its nuclear facilities under international safeguards. It publicly endorsed a whole set of nonproliferation conditions. It agreed to pass a nuclear liability law. India fulfilled all its commitments but now, almost three years later, the NSG was wavering, it is diluting its waiver. Do not you think they …(Inaudible)… ?

Foreign Secretary: Karan, nothing is set in stone here. I think you are jumping to very hasty conclusions. As I said, this is a dynamic process. We have to study these guidelines, there is no doubt about it. But let us look at the statements that have come out of the United States, France and Russia post the NSG decision.

Interviewer: On the point on France and Russia let me quote to you …(Inaudible)… He was the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission when that waiver was obtained. He has gone on record to say this is a betrayal.
Foreign Secretary: I would not use similar terminology. As a professional engaged in this process, I think the latest NSG decision is not the end of the road. It is not set in stone. Let me say that.

Interviewer: How can you say that? You ...(Inaudible)... member of the NSG. How can you say that?

Foreign Secretary: Definitely I am basing that on the knowledge of the situation as it exists. There is a balance of interest, there is a balance of commitments, there is mutual reciprocity involved. There are leverages that we can exert from our side also.

Interviewer: What are the leverages we have?

Foreign Secretary: I am not going to go into details. The whole issue of full bilateral civil nuclear cooperation, the fact that India has the potential to develop 60,000 MW of electricity from nuclear energy by 2030. So, this is a dynamic process. We have an expanding nuclear industry. This is a great attraction to the rest of the world.

Interviewer: Are you saying that India would not buy reactors from any country that refuses to sell ENR technology as well. Is that the leverage you have in mind?

Foreign Secretary: We will defend our interests to the hilt.

Interviewer: Let me put it like this. You have great hope that countries like France and Russia would continue to sell ENR technology to India. The truth is that at the moment you do not have agreement with either that permits the sale of ENR technology. Both countries have committed themselves to reaching a further agreement. That further agreement has not been reached in either case. Now, with the NSG changing its guidelines, there is a real danger that France and Russia will never conclude an agreement that permits sale of ENR.

Foreign Secretary: I am not going to draw a doomsday scenario from this. As I said, this is a dynamic process. Nothing is set in stone. This is not the end of the road. And as I said, there is a balance of interest and commitments involved. There are questions of reciprocity.

Interviewer: Is this just hope and brave talk.

Foreign Secretary: No, certainly it is not.

Interviewer: You are sure it is not just diplomatic bluster to use a colloquial term.
Foreign Secretary: No. I do not believe in bluster. I believe in being diplomatic definitely, but this is neither diplomatic bluster nor non-recognition of reality.

Interviewer: Let me tell you what people believe is your real hope. The Hindu says, between 2009 when Prime Minister Manmohan Singh went to Paris President Sarkozy made a personal pledge that Paris would not be bound by any decision of the G8 or the NSG not to sell ENR technology to India. Does that pledge still hold today?

Foreign Secretary: I think pledges deserve to be honoured and everything we are hearing from the French, from the Americans, from the Russians would suggest that their commitment to full bilateral civil nuclear cooperation and keeping in mind, and let me say this, the clean exemption that was given to us in September 2008, will be taken forward.

Interviewer: But that is the past. You say pledges should be honoured. Will this pledge be honoured? Have you had confirmation from Paris that they stand by their pledge?

Foreign Secretary: I have confirmation from both the United States and from France and from Russia that they stand by the commitments made to India in this regard and that there is no dilution of these commitments.

Interviewer: But the problem is that the commitments they made in their bilateral agreements do not include sale of ENR technology. That is something that both countries had said that they would negotiate later. And the problem is that in Paris’s case you have a pledge which we do not know whether it is reconfirmed or not, in Russia’s case, Russia has actually passed something called Decree 992 which they re-endorsed and renewed in December 2010, which does not permit sale of ENR to any country which is not an NPT signatory. So, if Russia …(Inaudible)… Russia is being only duplicitous with us.

Foreign Secretary: I do not believe Russia is being duplicitous. Russia is a long time strategic partner and I think the strategic interests in this relationship, the fact that this is a relationship that is rock solid, will prevail.

Interviewer: You are confident on that?

Foreign Secretary: I am very confident and very clear about the strengths that we have. I think people seem to think that this is the end of the road. It is not the end of the road. I think we have a tendency to proclaim defeat at every such turn. I think that is not the way. In situations such as this which are dynamic situations, nothing is set in stone. Nothing is set in stone. Interests prevail, reciprocities prevail, commitments prevail.
Interviewer: And you are also saying that India’s strength and leverage will prevail.

Foreign Secretary: Absolutely.

Interviewer: Foreign Secretary, a pleasure talking to you.

Foreign Secretary: Thank you so much, Karan.

038. Suo Motu Statement in Lok Sabha by EAM on Nuclear Enrichment and Reprocessing Technology.

New Delhi, August 10, 2011.

Madam Speaker,

I rise to inform the House of the issue of nuclear Enrichment and Reprocessing Technology.

2. Several Members have raised the issue of the adoption of new guidelines by the Nuclear Suppliers Group at its Plenary meeting in the Netherlands from June 23-24, 2011 relating to transfer of enrichment and reprocessing technologies.

3. Concerns have been expressed about its implications on our existing agreements with other countries on civil nuclear cooperation, whether the revised guidelines are targeted at India and where do they leave us with regard to the scope of our civil nuclear cooperation with the rest of the world.

Madam Speaker,

4. In this context, I wish to make the following clarifications :-

i) We are absolutely clear that as far as India is concerned, the basis of our international civil nuclear cooperation remains as contained in the special exemption from the NSG guidelines given to India on September 6, 2008. The "Statement on Civil Nuclear Cooperation with India" issued on September 6, 2008 after an Extraordinary Plenary Meeting of the NSG spells out the scope of our cooperation. That statement contains reciprocal commitments and actions by both sides relating to international civil nuclear cooperation.
ii) The September 2008 exemption accords a special status to India. It was granted knowing full well that India is not a signatory to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Honourable Members would recall that on August 17, 2006, Prime Minister had indicated that one of our main objectives of the Civil Nuclear Initiative was the removal of restrictions on all aspects of cooperation and technology transfers pertaining to civil nuclear energy, covering all aspects of the complete nuclear fuel cycle. We see this as the surest guarantee of India’s acceptance as a full and equal partner of the international nuclear community. As PM had informed this august House on July 29, 2009, we were successful in securing a "clean" exemption from the NSG in September 2008 i.e. the NSG members had agreed to transfer all technologies which are consistent with their national law.

iii) As far as we are concerned, the September 2008 decision is the basis and overarching framework that governs cooperation in civil nuclear matters between India and the NSG. The issue is the full implementation of that understanding. This is what we expect and our major partners are committed to.

iv) We must take note of the fact that the NSG Public Statement of June 24, 2011 makes a specific reference to cooperation with India. It says that the NSG "continued to consider all aspects of the implementation of the 2008 Statement on Civil Nuclear Cooperation with India and discussed the NSG relationship with India".

v) The agreements reached for permitting international civil nuclear cooperation with India contain commitments on both sides. We expect all NSG members to honour their commitments as reflected in the 2008 NSG Statement and our bilateral cooperation agreements.

vi) The Guidelines of June 23-24, 2011 are a decision by the NSG. India is not a member of the NSG as yet and therefore not a party to this decision.

Madam Speaker,

5. Following the NSG Plenary of June 2011, several of our partners have clarified their positions:

i) The US Department of State in a Press Statement has stated that the "Obama Administration fully supports the 'clean' Nuclear Suppliers Group exception for India and speedy implementation of the US-India Civil Nuclear Cooperation Agreement. Nothing about the new Enrichment and Reprocessing (ENR) transfer restrictions agreed to by the NSG members should be construed as detracting from the unique impact and importance of the US-India Agreement or our commitment to full civil nuclear cooperation. The Press Statement further states that the "NSG's NPT references, including those in the ENR guidelines, in no way detract from the exception granted to India by NSG members in 2008".

ii) A Communique issued by the Ambassador of France in New Delhi on July 5, 2011 has stated that the NSG exemption "reflects the unique situation of India and constitutes a historical achievement. Therefore, in the French view, nothing in the existing and future guidelines shall be interpreted as detracting from that exemption or reducing the ambition of our bilateral cooperation".

iii) The Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman on July 14, 2011 stated that the NSG decision "does not affect in any way the September 2008 decision of the Group to unfreeze peaceful nuclear cooperation with India".

6. In so far as enrichment and reprocessing technology is concerned, I would like to reiterate to Honourable Members that India has full mastery of the entire nuclear fuel cycle, and this includes enrichment and reprocessing technology. We have a well-developed indigenous enrichment and reprocessing infrastructure. Government is committed to taking forward our domestic three-stage nuclear power programme. India is among the handful of countries that has developed fast breeder technology. Access to enrichment and reprocessing technology from abroad, as part of international civil nuclear cooperation, is only an additionality to accelerate our three-stage programme.

7. The transfer of enrichment and reprocessing items and technology has no bearing whatsoever on India's upfront entitlement to reprocess foreign origin spent fuel and the use of such fuel in our own safeguarded facilities.

8. Not every NSG member has the ability to undertake transfer of enrichment and reprocessing items and technology to other countries. We expect that those that do and have committed to do so in bilateral agreements with India, will live up to their legal commitments.

9. I would also like reassure Honourable Members that we will not accept pre-conditions for transfer of enrichment and reprocessing items and technology. There is no question of India joining the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty as a non-nuclear weapon State.

10. India is engaged with the four multilateral export control regimes, namely the NSG, the Missile Technology Control Regime, the Australia Group and the Wassenaar Arrangement for full membership. We have noted with appreciation the expressions of support from a number of our partners towards this objective.
CIVIL NUCLEAR ENERGY

Madam Speaker,

11. I am confident that the international nuclear order will continue to evolve in India’s favour. We are poised to emerge as one of the major nuclear countries in the world, with a large and diversified nuclear industry. India is committed to full international civil nuclear cooperation for the development needs of our country and is engaged in discussions with foreign companies to expand our nuclear energy programme. We expect that our international partners will fully honour their commitments in this regard.

Thank you.

039. Information supplied by Minister of State in the Prime Minister’s Office V. Narayanasamy on Nuclear Liability Law with reference to the Protests against it by energy companies.

New Delhi, August 10, 2011.

Several global atomic energy companies have registered their protest against the Nuclear Liability Law of India.

Following the passage of the Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage Act, 2010, some potential suppliers have raised certain issues mainly relating to application of ‘operators right of recourse’ as provided in Section 17 and ‘Act to be in addition to any other law’ as provided in Section 46 of the Act.

The government is taking necessary action to implement India’s nuclear energy programme, including nuclear power projects in technical cooperation with other countries on the basis of the Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage Act, 2010. The Government is also in the process of framing rules as provided under said Act.

Shri V. Narayanasamy, Minister of State for Personnel, Public Grievances & Pensions and in the Prime Minister’s Office gave this information in a written reply to a question by Shri Arjun Ray and Shri Anant Kumar Hegde in Lok Sabha today.

CLIMATE CHANGE
043. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Environment and Forests on India’s commitment to move ahead with Conservation and Sustainable Use of Biodiversity.

New Delhi, February, 10, 2011.

Minister for Environment, Shri Jairam Ramesh, Minister of State for Environment and Forests said that India is well placed to lead the way in incorporating the value of nature into national, regional and local policy making. Speaking at ‘Stakeholder Consultations on the Economics of Ecosystems and Biodiversity in India’ (I-TEEB) here today, he said India soon will launch a scheme in three states, Tamil Nadu, Gujarat and Maharashtra and introduce a market based system for control of air pollution. We introduce legal changes. For the first time in last December, the Ministry promulgated the rules for ecological functions. We created regulatory authority also. The protection, preservation and regeneration of living beings will be central in biodiversity maintenance. Good Quality of forest cover will help primary stakeholder, i.e. people. Livelihood opportunities will be sustainable with this. Green India Mission will also contribute towards maintaining quantity of forests.

The Minister informed that India is one of the recognized mega-diverse countries of the world. With an area of about 329 mha, India is 7th largest country in the world. India has wide range of ecosystems and habitats such as forests, grasslands, wetlands, coastal and marine ecosystems, and deserts which in turn have contributed to immense biological diversity with large variation in species of plants, animals and microbes. With only 2.4% of world’s land area, India accounts for 7 to 8 % of the recorded plant and animal species of the world. Talking about diversity in biodiversity of India, the Minister of State said, “India has ten bio-geographic zones and also four global biodiversity hotspots. India is endowed with vast forest resources. The total forest and tree cover of the country is estimated at 23.39% of the geographic area, of which forest cover accounts for 21.02% (69.09 mha)’.

TEEB Study leader and UNEP Special Adviser and Head of UNEP’s Green Economy Initiative, Shri Pavan Sukhdev said, “The loss of biodiversity and the ecosystem services impacts us all, but in India the rural poor are the first to be adversely affected by these losses. Defining the economic value of nature’s contribution to the human well-being of both rural and urban communities, and the costs to these communities if we allow the continued degradation of this natural capital is essential if India is going to be able to sustain the human-wellbeing of its population moving forward.”

Sh T.Chatterjee, Secretary, Environment & Forests, briefed about India’s policy, institutional and legal initiatives and strengths for conservation and sustainable use of biodiversity and future leadership role in the International Decade of Biodiversity.

Stakeholders consultations on the economics of ecosystems and biodiversity in India aims to recognize, demonstrate, capture and optimize the value of biodiversity and ecosystem service and targets policy actions at national and state levels, improvements in business assessments and disclosure, and improved citizen awareness of the issues involved. A framework will be developed for strengthening biodiversity conservation programs and initiating action for assessing the economic value of India’s natural capital. The study will enable to take in to account the valuation and economics of biodiversity also to ensure enhanced transparency, effectiveness and sustainability in utilization of natural resources, consistent with the needs of the country to achieve accelerated economic development. The study will also facilitate to meet the objective to adopt an open, transparent and competitive mechanism for allocation, pricing and utilization of biological resources.

Based on the recommendations of the study of The Economics of Ecosystems and Biodiversity (TEEB) hosted by UNEP, the ‘India TEEB’ consultations will pilot assessments in some of the States and will be showcased at the 11th Conference of Parties Meeting on the Convention of Biological Diversity to be held in India from 1st -19th October 2012.

Experts from the Indian Government, State Governments, Academic community and NGOs, members from the World Bank, UNDP, UNEP, Government of Norway and other international partners are participating in these deliberations.

044. Press Release issued by Ministry of Environment and Forests on the Speech of Minister of State for Environment and Forests at the Basic Countries Conference.

New Delhi, February 27, 2011.

Shri Jairam Ramesh, Minister of State for Environment and Forests said it is highly regrettable and most unfortunate that even after 14 months of Copenhagen Accord, under the so-called Fast Finance Track window, there is hardly any significant disbursement. Giving his opening remarks in a press conference here today at the end of two-day 6TH Meeting of BASIC Ministers on Climate Change, Shri Ramesh said, "All of us welcomed the Cancun Agreements. It was a positive step forward and Cancun Agreements provided a stage for resolution of some outstanding political issues. We were equally convinced that the Cancun Agreements are not a substitute for the 'Bali Road Map' that are not present in the Cancun Agreements. Basic growth of countries will make every effort to bring these issues back in the main stream of global climate change negotiations."

Shri Ramesh said that in particular three issues were identified, namely, the issue of equity, the issue of intellectual property rights and the issue of trade. Adding to this he said, "There are three very important issues for BASIC quartet. With help of 77 Group we will bring these and other Bali Road Issues back into the Mainstream of negotiating agenda." Giving details about the negotiations, Shri Ramesh informed, "We need to continue the negotiations in 2011 leading up to Durban in a spirit of inclusiveness and transparency. Many issues on which we need further clarity. Two most critical issues are of second commitment period of the Kyoto protocol and the issue of Fast Track Finance. It is highly regrettable and most unfortunate that even after 14 months of Copenhagen Accord, under the so-called Fast Track Finance (FTF) window there is hardly any significant disbursement. This was a commitment of 30 billion dollars, over a 3-year period. Fast Start Finance was meant for South Africa, small island states and for the LDCs. It is a matter of great regret that the FSF which was the key element of bargain at Copenhagen, is a contradiction in terms. Unless countries begin to see money flowing, the atmosphere at Durban would continue to be clouded by doubts and suspicion."

Giving details of a meeting of Basic Group of Experts Shri Ramesh said they also met on non-government issues yesterday and discussed the issue of equitable excess to sustainable development. It has been decided that this group of independent academics will prepare a synthesis paper on our approach to the issue of equity which is a key vision of shared global concern."

Mr Zhenhua Xie, Vice Minister of the National Development and Reform
Commission and Special Representative on Climate Change, People’s Republic of China, said, "We are going to safeguard the interests of developing countries to promote over all climate change negotiations’ process. The BASIC group will play a very active and constructive role in promoting over all process."

Ms Izabella Monica Vieria Teixeira, Minister of Environment, Federative Republic of Brazil, said in her opening remark, "We will work together to support our agenda. Next two years will be very crucial for sustainable development agenda."

Ms Bomo Edith Edna Molewa, Minister of Water and Environmental Affairs, Republic of South Africa, said, "We had good discussions as BASIC group and regarding Agreements arrived at Cancun our emphasis will be on the issues of finance, technology and capacity building etc. We have to emphasis on finance to avoid some challenges which might arise at Durban."

India has invited Ministers/Ambassadors from three other countries - Argentina, Algeria and Maldives - to the Delhi meeting. These countries represent important regional groups within the “G-77 and China” bloc in the climate change negotiations, and will participate in the meeting as Observers. This is in keeping with the BASIC tradition of involving major regional groups within G-77 and China in order to enrich discussions and represent the interests of developing countries. Maldives is a member of Small Island Developing States (SIDS) in addition to being a neighboring country from South Asian region. Algeria represents the developing countries in Africa, while Argentina is the current Chair of the Group of 77 and China. The participation included Argentinean representative at United Nations, Environment Minister of Maldives and special representative of the Environment Minister of Algeria, representing this Africa Group.

The Basic Group’s meetings started in 2009 in Beijing, followed by New Delhi, Cape Town, Reo de Janero, Tanjein, China and again in New Delhi for 6th meeting.
44A. Joint Statement issued at the Conclusion of Sixth basic Ministerial meeting on Climate Change.

New Delhi, February 27, 2011.

The BASIC Ministers exchanged views on the outcome of the Cancun Conference and the approach to be taken to the future work in the run-up to Durban. The Ministers appreciated the role played by Mexico as President of COP-16 in achieving the outcome and noted several positive elements of the outcome. While agreeing that the Cancun Agreements were a step forward in the global action on climate change and provided the space to address some of the outstanding issues, the Ministers stressed that the Cancun Agreements were not a substitute for the Bali Road Map. The Bali Road Map must, therefore, continue to be the template for future work of the parties. The statement is as follows:

“The BASIC Ministers exchanged views on the outcome of the Cancun Conference and the approach to be taken to the future work in the run-up to Durban. The Ministers appreciated the role played by Mexico as President of COP-16 in achieving the outcome and noted several positive elements of the outcome. While agreeing that the Cancun Agreements were a step forward in the global action on climate change and provided the space to address some of the outstanding issues, the Ministers stressed that the Cancun Agreements were not a substitute for the Bali Road Map. The Bali Road Map must, therefore, continue to be the template for future work of the parties.

The Ministers stressed that the final decision text should accurately reflect the agreements reached by parties on specific issues at the end of the Cancun Conference. To this end, the draft unedited version of the Cancun Agreements appearing on the UNFCCC website needs to be brought in concordance with the Presidency’s text adopted at Cancun.

Ministers discussed the provisional Agenda for the meetings of the AWG-LCA and AWG-KP at Bangkok and emphasized that the agenda should be anchored in the overall framework of the Bali Road Map. They stressed that the agenda of AWG-LCA, in particular, should follow the structure of the Bali Action Plan in order to ensure that the agenda is comprehensive and places equal importance on all issues under negotiation. The Ministers encouraged the Group of 77 and China to engage with the AWG Chairs to have the agenda revised accordingly in time before the Bangkok meeting.

The Ministers exchanged views on several key issues such as global goal and equity, 2nd Commitment Period for Annex-I parties under the
The Ministers stressed the need to maintain a balance between the obligations of the developed countries vis-a-vis those of developing countries. They emphasized the need for clear elaboration of a process to convert their pledges into economy-wide emission reduction obligations and rules to account for both mitigation and finance by Annex-I parties, in particular for accounting and compliance to be done in balance with the work on the guidelines for international consultation and analysis. Ministers also agreed that the guidelines for MRV for developing countries should be less onerous than the rules for enhanced MRV for developed country parties.

Ministers agreed that the 2nd Commitment Period under the Kyoto Protocol is critical to achieving the global goal of ambitious emissions reduction and global peaking of emissions. The effective operationalization of the mechanisms for providing financial and technological support to developing countries was equally critical in enabling them to contribute to global efforts for addressing climate change. They also stressed that the decision on 2nd Commitment period under the Kyoto Protocol should be taken at Durban to ensure that there is no gap between the first and the second commitment periods.

The Ministers observed that issues like equity, intellectual property rights and trade, which are very important for developing countries, were not adequately addressed in the Cancun Agreements and should form part of the future work of the parties. After discussions, the Ministers decided that the experts of the four BASIC countries will exchange views on rules for accounting for Annex-I countries and also prepare a synthesis document on the issue of equitable access to sustainable development to be considered in the next BASIC meeting.

The Ministers agreed that the adaptation issues should be accorded equal priority and the financing of adaptation actions should include a mechanism for loss and damage. They noted that there was an imbalance between the modalities for deciding on adaptation related issues and the modalities for decision in other areas. They stressed that the adaptation and REDD Plus related issues should be addressed in a defined timeframe.

The Ministers discussed the issue of financial support for climate change mitigation and adaptation actions. They were of the view that the decision to convene a meeting of the Transition Committee even before many regional groups of countries have nominated their members, was premature and stressed the need to respect the rules regarding convening of meetings and ensuring accountability, transparency and inclusiveness. They urged that the Transition Committee should take guidance from and report to AWG-LCA in respect of its work. The Ministers noted that, despite the declarations at Copenhagen and Cancun, actual disbursement of funds is lacking even to SIDS, Africa and LDCs, who most needed adaptation finance. The Ministers urged that sizeable flow of funds under the Fast Start Funds should begin before discussions on the Green Climate Fund gain momentum.

The Ministers noted the success of the creation of a Technology Mechanism at Cancun and felt that the Mechanism should go beyond providing technical assistance and capacity building to enable acceleration of the development and piloting the technologies that are appropriate for the developing countries. Further actions should be taken to address the issue of Intellectual Property Rights (IPRs) and eligibility criteria in order to enhance and accelerate the development and transfer of mitigation and adaptation technologies. It was stressed that there was a direct link between the Technology Mechanism and the Financial Mechanism.

The issues relating to HFCs were discussed. HFC gases are not ozone depleting substances but some of these have high global warming potential. The Ministers felt that the issue of phase down of HFCs with high global warming potential required in-depth examination.

In preparing for future work in 2011, the Ministers expressed their strong support and solidarity with South Africa as the incoming COP Presidency to organize meetings in the run up to COP 17. They called for South Africa to deepen Mexico’s efforts of last year to strengthen the multilateral process in an inclusive, party-driven and transparent manner.

The Ministers noted that the three key events with significant interlinkages are taking place over the next eighteen months, namely, the UNFCCC COP 17/CMP 7 at Durban, Rio+20 Summit at Rio and CBD COP 11 at New Delhi and decided that the BASIC countries will work together in mobilizing political support for the success of these events. The Ministers reiterated the commitment of the BASIC Countries to continue to work to strengthen the unity of the Group of 77 and China and thanked Argentina as Chair of G77 and China and the representatives of Algeria and Maldives for their presence and valuable contribution. Ministers welcomed the offer of South Africa to host the Seventh BASIC Ministerial Meeting on Climate Change in May 2011.”
NEW DELHI, MARCH 18, 2011.

I. Introduction

Thank you, Madhu Kishwar. I didn’t know if you were introducing me or writing my epitaph. Friends, it gives me great pleasure to be here on the tenth anniversary of the original conclave. I am also very happy that for the first time in ten years the environment figures in a session, even though it’s billed as a luncheon session. I’ll do my best to ensure that you keep your date with your culinary destiny.

I am supposed to speak on the way to a green GDP. Let me begin by recalling one of the most famous literary essays of all times by the philosopher Sir Isaiah Berlin, called “The Hedgehog and the Fox”. It is derived from an ancient Greek dramatist, Archilochus, who says that the fox knows many things, but the hedgehog knows one big thing. The way to a green GDP, is to ensure that it is not hijacked by one type of hedgehog– the enviro hedgehogs who know nothing but maintaining the environment in its pristine form or the growth hedgehogs who can’t see beyond their GDP noses. All of us will have to become foxes. The characteristic of the fox, as Archilochus reminded us, is that the fox knows many things. Unless we are foxes we will not move to a green GDP. The issue of a green GDP is important for four reasons that have assumed special significance in India.

II. Livelihood

Increasingly, environmentalism in this country is not a matter of lifestyle but a matter or livelihood. All I can do is to recall here, contemporary India’s first environmental movement – the Chipko movement of the mid 1970s where the women of Uttrakhand hugged the trees of the hills to ensure that their forests were protected from rapacious contractors. Thus was born modern India’s environmental consciousness. We are increasingly seeing this expand to central and western India. The livelihood concerns of tribals, forest dwellers, small farmers, and small landowners who depend on the land for an occupation are increasingly finding a voice. Their concerns are increasingly coming in to conflict with the economic objectives that we have set for ourselves.

III. Public Health Concerns

The second reason is a public health concern. Increasingly environmental consciousness or environmental issue is not a middle class elitist issue, but an issue of a large number of people, including the poor and the marginalized. The fact that Bhatinda has now become one of the most serious cancer epicenters is not coincidental. In places like Chembur, Bhopal and Chandrapur — the problems of the environment are not just environmental issues per-se but also public health issues. Ordinary people, who may not speak the language of environmentalists, speak the language of respiratory diseases, cancer and leukemia. In the 1960s the incidence of respiratory diseases in Bangalore, India’s most dynamic city, was less than 7% amongst children. Today independent surveys have shown that the incidents of respiratory diseases are around 25% amongst children in Bangalore. Public health should drive the way to a green GDP.

IV. Climate Change

The third reason is climate change. We don’t have to be climate evangelicals but we shouldn’t be climate atheists either. Climate change is here and is a reality and there is no country in the world as vulnerable to it as India. Our economy is still dependent on the monsoon. An indifferent southwest monsoon and an indifferent northeast monsoon will wreak havoc on our economic performance. We have a large coastline with a population of about 300 million people, vulnerable to tsunamis and rise in mean sea levels. We have a population of about half a billion people living in the north Indian region dependent on water security and on the health of the Himalayan glaciers which are under retreat. And we have this large mineral wealth, which we want to exploit rapidly, from the most forest rich areas of our nation. So there is no country in the world — not Maldives, Bangladesh or any African country that is going to be as affected by climate change as India.

V. Sustainability

And finally, the sustainability argument. We have to recognize that our demographic karma will be 1.7 billion people by the year 2050. In the next 40 years we are going to be adding 500 million people. Just the sheer base on which India’s population is growing is propelling India’s population to a region of about 1.6-1.7 billion people by the year 2050. Therefore it is incumbent on this generation to ask ourselves what is the natural resource base that we want to bequeath to future generations. In many countries there is no future generation to think of, as their populations have begun to decline. India is one of those few countries where the population is not only increasing but the population is also going to get younger.

VI. Road to a Green GDP

Now, let me turn to the second point of where we are on this road to a green GDP. Have we any idea what this animal called green GDP means? I’m afraid that question is more difficult to answer because economists have not really grappled with this in any meaningful way. Last year the World Bank brought out a publication called “The Changing Wealth of Nations”. They defined a concept called ‘adjusted net savings’ which takes the macro economics saving rate as conventionally defined by economics and adjusts it for environmental pollution, resource depletion and a whole host of environment related factors. For the year 2008, the conventionally measured savings rate for India was 38% of our GDP and according to the world banks estimates; the adjusted net savings rate for environmental factors is 24% of GDP. So then, what does this 14% difference mean in simple English? It translates roughly into a GDP growth of about 2.5 – 3% points. If India is reporting a normal, real GDP growth of 9% per year, according to the adjusted net savings it is actually 6% a year, if you were to take into account all environment related factors. There is another estimate that is being done by the world’s most distinguished environmental economist – Professor Partha Dasgupta from Cambridge University. He published a paper in which he estimated that between the year 1970 and 2000, India’s per capita GDP (as economists measure) grew by 3% per year, but net per capita wealth which he defines as growth that takes in to account environmental factors as well, only grew by about 0.3% per year. Normal GDP growth does not measure well-being. So, the point I want to make is that there is a very substantial gap between the economic growth of India, as measured by GDP, and the real well-being of the country as measured by economic performance after being adjusted for environmental factors.

VII. Way Ahead

Let me now move to the final part of my presentation. What are the next steps we need to take? What are the milestones on the way to this green GDP? First and foremost– we need to measure. I believe if you can’t measure something, you can’t monitor it and manage it. So if you want to manage you need to monitor and if you want to monitor, you need to measure. The measurement of where we are is absolutely crucial. I’m happy to say that Professor Dasgupta has agreed to chair a high level group to work out a road map for national resource accounting for India. By the year 2015, we hope to be amongst the few countries in the world that will report both conventional economic growth and also adjusted economic growth. The G of GDP doesn’t stand for gross but green. The second important aspect to the way to a green GDP is to simply enforce the laws of the land. India is fortunate enough, (almost entirely thanks to the political vision of Shrimati Indira Gandhi), to have the most progressive legislation on the environment- these include the Forest Conservation Act, the Environment Protection Act, Coastal Regulation Zone, Wildlife Protection Act, or legislations to deal with hazardous waste and pollution control. Unfortunately Indians delight in passing laws but take greater delight in bypassing them later.
Therefore it is no surprise that even though we have the best laws of the land even from an international perspective, they have been characterized by non-observance. In no country in the world would a minister who is enforcing laws be drawing headlines. He would be regarded as doing his normal day-to-day activities. Here I am made out to be Frankenstein, hell bent on destroying an economic system that has been built so assiduously over the last few decades. All I am doing is asking a very simple question – here are the laws, are they being observed or not? Now if the laws are outdated it is my responsibility, it is the government’s responsibility to make sure that laws are modernized. To the consternation of many people, we said that the Coastal Regulation Zone of 1991 is outdated because it is choking Mumbai city. The new Coastal Regulation Zone, 2011 recognizes the reality of India. We cannot have one coastal law for our 7,500km of coastline. So we treat Goa, Mumbai, Kerala, Andamans and Nicobar Islands and Lakshadweep differently, but we have a law. Where laws are outdated or need to be modernized lets change the laws, but we have to enforce laws too. We have to enforce laws in an accountable and transparent manner. India needs more regulations but could certainly do with fewer regulators. India needs more laws but could do with fewer lawyers. The trick is to find a way to implement these laws in a market friendly manner that does not lead to harassment, or rent seeking on the part of the government. We are trying to do this but with limited success, as we have a complicated federal system. I hope in the next couple of years, we can put in place a clear, rule based enforcement mechanism for the laws at a central and state level. The third aspect to the way to a green GDP is that we have to make choices. The time has come for us to recognize that we have to make some choices. It’s good if we can have a 9% growth and do all kinds of wonderful things. That is the ideal solution and that should be our objective. But we must recognize that there will be situations where we will have to exercise choices. Those choices must be exercised publicly, democratically and as part of the political discourse. It cannot be done unilaterally. I think the trade-off between growth and conservation should be made explicit. Let these trade-offs be made explicit in the public domain and then let’s exercise those choices. In a majority of cases you will have a yes, in some cases you will have a yes but (like the Navi Mumbai Airport), and some cases it will be a simple two letters – ‘NO’. Now, that no is unacceptable and an anathema to us. A ‘No’ to the other person is acceptable to me, but a ‘No’ to me is unacceptable. I think we have reached a situation where if we have to achieve our growth objectives, we will be called upon to make some tough choices. I think the sooner we recognize the need for these choices, the better off we will be. Finally, on the way to this growth turnpike, we have to recognize there are certain limits. We can deal with environment issues through improved technology and safeguards but we cannot deal with the destruction of forests that have taken centuries to evolve. We cannot say that a eucalyptus plantation will have the same ecological value and impact. There are limits to this growth. Is it going to be a 9% growth that destroys forests, pollutes rivers and displace livelihoods or is it going to be a 7% growth that protects forests, cleans up rivers and conserves livelihoods? I know where my choice lies; it has to be the latter. We should try for the 9% growth in a manner that protects forests, ensures clean rivers and protects our natural resources. But if it is not possible, ladies and gentlemen, I submit to you we have to make these choices. So, we have to chart out a way to a green GDP as no one else will do it for us. We have to do it as part of our political, industrial and media discourse. If we have a road map in the next decade or so, India can truly claim a leadership role in green GDP. Rather than see it as a cost that we have to incur, we should see it as an opportunity and grasp the opportunities that lay ahead.

Thank you very much.

New Delhi, April 20, 2011.

The Union Cabinet has approved the signing of the Nagoya Protocol on Access and Benefit Sharing (ABS) by India.

The Nagoya Protocol would also contribute to the other two objectives of the Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD) relating to conservation and sustainable use, since benefits accruing from utilization of genetic resources would act as incentive to biodiversity-rich countries and their local communities to conserve and sustainably use their biodiversity.

India would be hosting the next Conference of Parties (CoP) to the CBD in October 2011. This will give India an opportunity to consolidate, scale up and showcase its strengths and initiatives on biodiversity before the world. As the incoming Presidency of CoP, India would be involved in setting the global agenda on biodiversity for the next few years.

The ABS Protocol is open for signature from 2nd February 2011 to 1st February 2012. So far six countries have signed the Protocol including three megadiverse countries (namely Brazil, Mexico and Colombia). As the incoming President of CoP-11, it is expected that India would be one of the early signatories to the ABS Protocol.

India is one of the identified megadiverse countries rich in biodiversity. With only 2.4% of the earth’s land area, India accounts for 7-8% of the recorded species of the world. India is also rich in associated traditional knowledge, which is both coded as in the ancient texts of Indian systems of medicines such as Ayurveda, Unani and Sidha and also non-coded, as it exists in oral undocumented traditions.

The genetic resources and associated traditional knowledge can be used to develop a wide range of products and services for human benefit, such as medicines, agricultural practices, cosmetics etc.

India is a Party to the Convention on Biological Diversity (CBD) which is one of the agreements adopted during the Rio Earth Summit held in 1992. One of the three objectives of the CBD relates to ABS, which refers to the way in which genetic resources may be accessed, and benefits resulting from their use shared by the users with the countries that provide them. The CBD prescribes that access to genetic resources is subject to national legislation. Accordingly, India after extensive consultative process had enacted Biological Diversity Act in 2002 for giving effect to the provisions of the CBD. However, in the near absence of user country measures, once the resource leaves the country providing the resources, there is no way to ensure compliance of ABS provisions in the country where it is used. Towards this, a protocol on access and benefit sharing has been negotiated under the aegis of CBD, and adopted by the tenth Conference of Parties (CoP-10) held in Nagoya, Japan in October 2010. India has participated actively and contributed meaningfully in the ABS negotiations which formally started about six years back. The objective of the Nagoya Protocol on ABS is fair and equitable sharing of benefits arising from the use of genetic resources, including by appropriate access to genetic resources and by appropriate transfer of relevant technologies.

It is expected that the ABS Protocol which is a key missing pillar of the CBD, would address the concern of misappropriation or biopiracy of its genetic resources.

047. Joint Statement issued at the conclusion of the Seventh Basic Ministerial Meeting on Climate Change.

Zimbali, Durban, May 29, 2011.

The seventh BASIC Ministerial Meeting on Climate Change took place at Zimbali, near Durban from 28 to 29 May 2011. The Ministers who participated in the meeting were H.E. Minister Edna Molewa, Minister of Water and Environmental Affairs from South Africa, H.E. Xie Zhenhua, Vice Chairman of the National Development and Reform Commission and H.E. Liu Zhenmin, Assistant Minister of Foreign Affairs from China, H.E. Francisco Gaetani, Deputy Minister for Environment from Brazil, Mr. JM Mauskar, Special Secretary Ministry of Environment and Forests from India. The incoming COP President, H.E. Minister Maite Nkoana-Mashabane also attended. In line with the “BASIC-plus” approach, Argentina as chair of the G77 and China was invited to the meeting and was represented by Mr. J Fernandes.

Ministers discussed the work required to achieve a comprehensive and balanced outcome in COP17 and CMP7 in Durban. Ministers indicated that COP17 and CMP7 must continue to work within the framework agreed in Bali, and in this context address the work programme agreed in Cancún, following the agenda agreed in Bangkok, with a view to complete the mandate of the Bali Road Map.

They considered the challenges and possible priority elements on the road to COP17 and CMP7 in Durban. The Ministers reaffirmed their determination to constructively engage with others to develop an ambitious and realistic outcome, urging Annex 1 Parties to fulfill their commitments under the Convention and the Kyoto Protocol and to demonstrate this in concrete terms. Ministers emphasized that the environmental integrity of the climate regime was of critical importance to all, particularly for developing countries that are vulnerable to the impacts of climate change. In this regard, they stressed that unilateral approaches, such as the inclusion of emissions from the aviation sector in the EU Emissions Trading Scheme or establishing unilateral carbon accounting rules are inimical to multi-lateralism, and clearly not in line with the provisions and principles of the Convention, particularly the principles of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities. Issues with regard to maritime and aviation emissions, agriculture and HFC’s should also be addressed in accordance with the provisions and principles of the Convention.

Ministers reaffirmed the centrality of the negotiations under the UNFCCC and its Kyoto Protocol, recognising that parallel and informal processes can also contribute to the formal negotiations in a supplementary manner, without however, undermining the transparent and inclusive multilateral process under the UNFCCC. Ministers strongly supported the South African proposals for a transparent, inclusive preparatory process to ensure that Durban takes a major step forward in working towards the perspective of a comprehensive, ambitious, fair and effective outcome. Ministers encouraged South Africa to explore with Parties in Bonn how this preparatory process could efficiently inform the negotiations.

The Kyoto Protocol, including its multi-lateral definition of commitments and rules, is critical to environmental integrity of the climate change regime. Given that the first commitment period of the Kyoto Protocol will end in 2012, they expressed the view that the second commitment period is central to a comprehensive and balanced Durban outcome.

Ministers emphasised that the perspective of developments under the UNFCCC, respecting the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities, will depend first and foremost on the political willingness of all Annex I Parties to undertake commitments in an appropriate legal form.

Recognising the urgent need to support developing countries in adaptation, particularly SIDS, LDC’s and Africa, Ministers emphasised that the balance between adaptation and mitigation needs to be guaranteed. The costs of inactions are huge, and the impacts will be felt most by poor countries and communities. Adaptation should be as central to negotiations as mitigation, and this has to be reflected in the structures being designed for financial and technology transfer support.

Ministers considered work by experts on the need for rigorous, robust and transparent accounting for finance by Annex I Parties. A common reporting format for funding must be considerably enhanced. This will require further work by negotiators and experts, in order to ensure that accounting for finance by all developed countries is consistent, complete, comparable, transparent and accurate. Ministers identified the need for work on MRV at expert and negotiator level. A proposal was made to consider the possibility of creating a fund between BASIC countries to stimulate research providing evidence on climate change issues. This analysis could be developed by institutions from BASIC countries and other countries from G77 and China.

Solutions on disbursement of finance are urgently required to enhance trust.
Ministers were of the view that the UNFCCC Secretariat should publish information on funding already disbursed under fast-start finance provided by developed countries, since it is a commitment made under a multi-lateral agreement. They also reiterated that the Transitional Committee should interact with, and be guided by the AWG-LCA.
Ministers received presentations on a document by experts from BASIC countries on “a framework for equitable access to sustainable development” as requested at the 6th BASIC Ministerial Meeting. This work will be refined and published, as contribution to the body of scientific knowledge informing policy development.

Ministers emphasised the need for early operationalisation of all the institutions established in terms of the Cancun agreements, including the Adaptation Committee, the Technology Executive Committee, Centre and Network, the registry, the work programme on the Response Measure Forum and the Green Climate Fund.

The work programme on the road to Durban entails a high volume of work. Ministers heard a report from negotiators that identified the need for 35 to 40 technical and operational decisions or guideline under the COP and CMP. Ministers emphasized that a negotiating session in September/October is essential, and that it should include a short programme of the Subsidiary Bodies as a significant amount of work was mandated to these bodies in Cancun. They noted India’s submission of three items to be added to the provisional agenda of the COP (equity and sustainable development; trade measures and climate; mitigation, adaptation actions and IPR technology). Ministers also noted the submission made by Saudi Arabia relating to the provisional agenda of upcoming session of the SBI and SBSTA and stressed the importance of following the rules and procedures for the inclusion and removal of agenda items. Ministers expressed their complete support for the programme and timetable for informal consultations by the incoming COP Presidency.

Ministers reaffirmed the commitment of BASIC countries to continue working to strengthen the unity of G77 and China and thanked Argentina as chair of the Group for its presence and valuable contribution. The importance of rebuilding trust and strengthening the multilateral system was emphasised. Ministers re-emphasised that an agreement on the 2nd commitment period of the Kyoto Protocol is absolutely critical for the success of the Durban Conference.

Ministers welcomed the offer of Brazil to host the 8th BASIC Ministerial Meeting on Climate Change in August 2011.

048. Press Brief issued by the Ministry of Environment and Forests on the 5-Pronged Approach to fast track climate talks held in Berlin on July 3-4, 2011.

The second Petersberg Dialogue on climate change was held in Berlin on 3-4th of July 2011, to evolve political consensus on key deliverables for success at Durban and the outcomes of the Cancun climate conference. The conference was organized by the Government of Germany and the Government of South Africa, which will be hosting the 17th Conference of Parties (CoP) to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) in Durban this year.

In the first political-level discussion on climate change after the Cancun negotiations, Mr. Jairam Ramesh, Minister for Environment and Forests, participated in the Petersberg Dialogue, and had several bilateral meetings with Ministers and representatives from the United States, China, the United Kingdom, European Commission, Sweden and South Africa.

Underlining the five key issues that need to be addressed before Durban, Mr. Jairam Ramesh said, “in order to generate forward momentum for progress at Durban, we need to ensure actual disbursement of fast start finance that was promised at Cancun; preserve the structure of the Kyoto Protocol and its second commitment period; work on content before deciding legal form; agree on the modalities of the Review (of a global goal) based on the process of monitoring reporting and verification; and resolve pending issues from Cancun such as equity, IPRs and trade.”

Issues of operationalizing the Cancun Agreements, and finance occupied a large part of the discussions. Ministers and Delegates agreed that there needed to be a step-by-step approach to deliverables promised at Cancun – especially the Green Climate Fund (GCF), technology mechanism and the adaptation committee, as also on transnational in the post-2012 period. On finance, discussions focused on the importance of a structure and modalities for the GCF emerging from Durban, as well as the sources of funds being enumerated.
Minister Smt. Jayanthi Natarajan, Minister of state for Environment and Forests (Independent Charge) said that it is important to remain engaged on issues such as equity, accelerated transfer of technologies and trade measures at and beyond Durban and the crucial role of Indo-US programmes regarding science of climate change to further strengthen the bilateral engagement. During a meeting with a high level US delegation led by Special Envoy for Climate Change Mr. Todd Stern here today, Smt Natarajan brought out the Indian perspective about the balanced outcome on both the LCA and KP tracks under the Bali Road Map.

During the meeting, scientific and technical cooperation between the two countries on issues relating to climate change, both present and future, were deliberated upon. Both sides exchanged their views, in a cordial atmosphere on bilateral issues and the ongoing climate change negotiations in the multilateral fora under the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC). Both sides agreed that operationization of the Cancun decision in a balanced manner should be the goal for the meeting of the Conference of Parties under UNFCCC at Durban in December 2011.

Mr. Stern conveyed his view on transparency arrangements, i.e. International Assessment and Review (IAR) for developed countries and International Consultations and Analysis (ICA) for developing countries, the principles and approaches for functioning of the Green Climate Fund, the Technology Mechanism, the Financial Mechanism and the legal form of the Agreed Outcome of the LCA process.

At the end of the meeting, both sides agreed that the Indo-US dialogue on Climate Change issues would be continued at the scientific level, the negotiators level and the Ministerial level.

India and the USA have a long history of cooperation on environmental and forestry issues and the present meeting was in continuation of that engagement. In the technical level meeting which met yesterday, the US and the Indian officials discussed climate change issues of mutual concern under the leadership of Mr. Todd Stern and Dr. T. Chatterjee, Secretary, Ministry of Environment & Forests.

Sh T Chatterjee, Secretary, Sh J M Mauskar, Special Secretary, Sh R R Rashmi, Joint Secretary, Sh Jagdish Kishwan, Additional Director General, Forests, Dr Subodh Sharma, Adviser and Sh T S Trimurthi, Joint Secretary, Ministry of External Affairs took part in this discussion.

051. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Environment and Forests on the International Seminar on Environment and Disaster Management.

Smt. Jayanthi Natarajan, Minister of State for Environment and Forests (Independent Charge) said, “The poor are more vulnerable towards possible impact of environmental degradation, and they pay disproportionately greater price. They are also affected due to ill-designed policies at some time which do not mitigate properly environmental degradation and climate change. Creating awareness about environment, with disaster management and climate change issues is very much integrated with the issue of human rights and environment justice. We believe that poverty eradication is extremely important.” Addressing at the curtain raiser function on the eve of the International Seminar on ‘Global Environment and Disaster Management: Law and Society” here today she said, “The efforts of Governments will help to think in a holistic manner to revisit our priorities in dealing with environmental disasters. Deliberations of concerns, views and processes at such seminar will help in guiding our orient institutes towards playing a positive and meaningful role in this regard.”

The Minister said, “Environment as well as natural disaster do not have geographical boundaries, its effects disturb the world causing immense damage. There is a huge difference between need and greed. We often forget what unmanageable scale of the disaster is we face. So our efforts and resources should be towards building disaster management rather than constructive development. Without a concerted international participation, it is impossible to restore environmental sustainability and peace and harmony.” She hopes that participants will take initiative and direct discussions to redefine the progress in a constructive environmental sustainability."

Sh Salman Khurshid, Minister of Law and Justice said, “The responsibility is of everybody to maintain justice and success of generations to come. This is a significant milestone for us to have an international seminar. This is the age of convergence and specialized persons from specific fields will discuss together on one platform. We will revive our institute in a targeted way. The government has to respond to convergence. Our methodology and our attitudes towards functions have to change. This conference is taking place at such a time where remarkable inputs will be received. The Message from here is that we have to move in a particular direction when industrial and technological revolution has taken place. The rapid industrial growth which bring pressure on natural resources should be reduced which looks more difficult."

Earlier Sh T Chatterjee, Secretary, Ministry of Environment and Forests said that the world is less prepared today to respond to man-made disasters than natural disasters. It is strange that natural disasters are predictive more accurately than chemical accidents and explosions in industrial estates. He said, “In India we are very much aware about chemical accidents those have taken lives almost on monthly basis all over the country. We have very strong framework to deal with this matter, but did not connect between informative agencies and the law makers which is a major problem. In the Ministry of Environment and Forests, we will ask existing organizations to take industry’s problems. Natural disasters can not be prevented as in the case of Fukushima and Leh. This seminar is very important in the context of how to make us prepared for man-made disasters.”

This seminar is jointly organized by the Supreme Court of India, the High Court of Delhi, the Indian Law Institute, the Ministry of Environment & Forests and the Ministry of Law and Justice. Its objectives are to nurture discussion on the useful linkages between the disciplines of law, disaster management, natural sciences, environmental conservation and anthropology and human rights law, to identify and understand legal and technical issues of contemporary significance in relation to the environment and to share the best local, regional and international practices and / or experiences in combating climate change and successful disaster management.

The international seminal will provide a platform for academicians, policy makers, the judiciary, lawyers, civil society and other stakeholders to deliberate on topical issues like climate change, natural resource management, disaster management, legal responses to natural and man-made hazards, the role of the judiciary in strengthening law and policy on environment and disaster management. The focus of the seminar is to collectively seek solutions that are not only environment friendly but support all-inclusive growth that sustains not just the environment but human life and livelihoods. Recommendations and suggestions that emerge unanimously from the deliberations and discourse of the seminar shall be compiled in a report to be submitted to the Government of India for study and implementation.

Participants from 80 countries will deliberate on various subjects including biodiversity and natural resource management, Law, Environment and Climate Change, Nuclear and Chemical Accidents, Disaster Management and Legal Responses to Natural Hazards, Law, Policy and Environment, Environment friendly and Inclusive Growth: Role of Stake Holders, overview of Global Environment and Disaster Management etc.

052. Valedictory Address of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the International Seminar on Global Environment and Disaster management.

New Delhi, July 24, 2011.

I indeed happy to be present here at the valedictory session of this very important International Seminar on Global Environment and Disaster Management. I compliment the Supreme Court and the co-sponsors for organizing a seminar on such a contemporary and highly relevant issue.

In the past fifty years or so we have come face to face with unusual climatic occurrences, weather changes and environmental disasters. These are a corollary of the global pursuit of rapid growth in particular rapid growth of industrialization and, very often, the mindless and predatory exploitation of natural resources to sustain such patterns of development and industrialization.
These have happened across the world, without distinguishing between rich and poor nations. There have been unprecedented heat-waves in the United States and Europe, devastating floods in China and tsunamis in South East Asia and more recently in Japan. All of these have highlighted the vulnerability and helplessness of human beings confronted with the wrath of nature.
The United Nations Conference held at Stockholm in 1972 marked the first major international event to deal with environmental issues. But securing global cooperation for the protection and preservation of the environment has proved quite difficult, as each country has sought to protect its own perceived national interest. There has also been a divide between the north and the south, which the international community has failed to bridge thus far. Protecting and preserving the environment is not a divisible task, as the acts of omissions and commissions of one nation or one set of people impinge on the others and vice-versa. Therefore, all countries, both rich and poor, developed and developing, countries of the north and countries of the south need to cooperate in this sort of global effort.

In general, in the increasingly integrated world that we live in, we have to devise cooperative solutions to deal with the pressing emerging global challenges and concerns. Environment and climate change certainly belong to this class of issues. In this context the development of new environment friendly technologies is going to play a very important role. The task ahead, as I see it, is to design a system of intellectual property rights which provides adequate incentives to invest in the development of new environment friendly technologies and at the same time ensuring that these technologies become available to poor countries at affordable cost.

Sustainable development has been accepted widely as the strategy that marries the aspirations for growth and development with preservation of the environment. Perhaps, it has been interpreted somewhat narrowly as the ability to meet efficiently the needs of the present generation, without imperilling the ability of the future generations to do so. The concept of sustainable development, however, appears to be larger than just a nation’s ability to produce enough to meet its needs. It is about how we collectively address the growing concerns regarding climate change, resource management and what we bequeath to our future generations in terms of knowledge, skills and lifestyle that they can use to protect the environment, while they pursue their objectives of growth and development. Only then would we have contributed to the advancement of civilization and given an enduring legacy to the forthcoming generations.

In the public mind, there has always been a trade-off between economic growth and environmental sustainability. But, this view is changing slowly as more and more people are reviewing their notions of what constitutes growth. In fact, the very definition of growth has been enlarged to accommodate environmental and related concerns. There is now general agreement that environment cannot be protected by perpetuating the poverty of developing countries. Their basic concern is with development and this is as it should be.
But it is also no longer acceptable to take as given that a certain degree of environmental degradation and over-exploitation of natural resources in the cause of promoting growth is inevitable. It is no longer possible to treat the environment with passive disregard. And it is no longer tenable to pretend that these are concerns only for the other or wealthier nations.

In the last four years our government has formulated a national agenda for environmental protection to meet the challenges of disaster management and climate change. We have a target for greening 10 million hectares of forest land to increase incomes of the poor through a national Green India Mission. Action for generating over 20,000 MW of solar energy by the year 2020 is underway. Our mission for enhanced energy efficiency will reduce substantially need for capacity addition. Our mission for sustainable habitat will develop standards for green buildings which we intend to make integral to our municipal laws. Our missions on sustainable agriculture and water conservation will increase productivity of dry land agriculture as well as increase efficiency of water use. All these steps will cumulatively lead us to a low carbon growth path. These are steps that we have decided to take on our own as responsible global citizens. We are not waiting for an international consensus to evolve through ongoing negotiations on global climate change.

In recent years we have also accelerated efforts to enhance our capability to manage disasters. The enactment of the Disaster Management Act in 2005 enabled the setting up of institutional mechanisms for disaster preparedness and mitigation. We have also tried to share our expertise and experience with the other countries of the world. As a signatory to the International Charter on Space and Major Charters, India extends its space capabilities to acquire data of the location of disasters anywhere on the globe and share the same with the affected country or countries on a priority basis. We also provide training in disaster management to personnel of other countries, especially those in our neighbourhood.

We believe that the cause of environment cannot be furthered merely by exhortation. It also needs the strength and conviction demonstrated by concrete national legislation. We, in recognition of our commitment to this cause, have enacted a comprehensive law establishing and empowering a specialized tribunal for the settlement of a broad spectrum of environmental cases of civil nature. We have joined a handful of forward looking countries to have such a dedicated mechanism. This tribunal has started functioning and I expect it will help to reduce the workload of our courts.

We also hope to establish an independent regulator - the National Environment Appraisal and Monitoring Authority soon. This authority could lead to a complete change in the process of granting environmental clearances. Staffed by dedicated professionals, it will work on a full time basis to evolve better and more objective standards of scrutiny.

I must also mention that but for the enduring wisdom of our judiciary, we would not have the bulk of what we proudly call ‘environmental jurisprudence’. The nineties witnessed remarkable changes in India. Rapid growth and industrialization were underway as a result of the newly liberalized economy. At times like this, many nations might have chosen to bear silently the depletion of the nation’s natural resources as the cost of doing business but we did not compromise on these concerns. Our judiciary enforced laws passed by a farsighted legislature to ensure that these concerns were neither diluted nor dismissed. Our safeguards are now far more stringent and well defined than they were two decades ago. But for these to be effective they need continuous support from a strong executive and the oversight of a wise judiciary. Over all, a major challenge ahead is to put in place a legal and regulatory framework which is effective in protecting the environment but without bringing back the hated license permit raj of the pre-1991 period.

Any discussion on the environment would be incomplete if we in India do not look inwards to our own cultural heritage and local practices. Our people have coped with adversities of nature by nurturing practices that were environmentally wise and sound. We have looked upon Nature as a source of nurture rather than a dark force to be conquered and bent to our will. Today, we have a great deal of understanding from global experience and best practices in environmental management. We need to complement this understanding with our own Indian way of looking at nature to get the most acceptable outcomes.

I am sure that the deliberations you have had in this seminar will contribute to deepen our understanding of how important issues relating to environment and disaster management can be tackled and resolved. I once again compliment all those who have been associated with the organization of this highly creative seminar. I wish all of you all the very best in your personal and professional lives.

The eighth BASIC Ministerial Meeting on climate change took place in Inhotim, Minas Gerais, on the 26th and 27th of August 2011. Antonio de Aguiar Patriota, Minister of External Relations of Brazil, Izabella Teixeira, Minister for the Environment of Brazil, Maite Nkoana-Mashabane, Minister of International Relations and Cooperation of South Africa as incoming COP President, Edna Molewa, Minister of Water and Environmental Affairs of South Africa, Xie Zhenhua, Vice-Chairman of the National Development and Reform Commission of China, and J.M. Mauskar, Special Secretary for Environment and Forests of India attended the meeting. In line with the “BASIC-plus” approach, Argentina as chair of the G77 and China was invited.

Durban outcome

Ministers reiterated the importance of achieving a comprehensive, balanced and ambitious result in Durban in the context of sustainable development and in accordance with the provisions and principles of the Convention, in particular the principles of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities, and the Bali Road Map. This result must fully cover negotiations under the two tracks of the UNFCCC: the Ad Hoc Working Group on Further Commitments for Annex I Parties under the Kyoto Protocol (AWG-KP) and the Ad Hoc Working Group on Long Term Cooperative Action (AWG-LCA). They emphasized that Durban must advance all aspects of the negotiations, including the establishment of Annex I commitments for the second commitment period of the Kyoto Protocol and comparable commitments by non-Kyoto Protocol Annex I parties, the operationalization of Cancun decisions and resolving pending issues not concluded in Cancun. Ministers emphasized the centrality of adaptation and means of implementation as part of a balanced and comprehensive outcome. These are elements needed to ensure balance in the completion of the Bali Road Map and Bali Action Plan. Ministers underlined that agreeing on the second commitment period is the central priority for Durban, as failure in this regard would generate a challenge to multilateralism and would undermine the rules based multilateral response to climate change under the UNFCCC. Ministers reiterated their support for a transparent and inclusive preparatory process to ensure that Durban takes a major step forward in working towards the perspective of a comprehensive, ambitious, fair and effective outcome, ensuring the full, effective and sustained implementation of the UNFCCC and its Kyoto Protocol.
Kyoto Protocol

Ministers reaffirmed that the Kyoto Protocol is a cornerstone of the climate change regime. They underscored the role of the Kyoto Protocol in ensuring deep cuts in greenhouse gas emissions from developed countries commensurate with the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) assessments and the 2°C goal recognized in Cancun. They stressed that the continuation of the flexibility mechanisms of the Kyoto Protocol, in particular the Clean Development Mechanism (CDM), is contingent upon the establishment of quantified emission reduction commitments by Annex I Parties under the second commitment period. They urged Parties to the Kyoto Protocol to work constructively to ensure that there is no gap between the first and second commitment periods. Ministers emphasized that the perspective of Annex I Parties leaving the Kyoto Protocol to present their mitigation contribution under the AWGLCA can only be the reflection of reduced political will to cut their greenhouse gas emissions. It is hardly conceivable that a country would leave the Kyoto Protocol to do more.

Pending issues to be concluded

Taking note of India’s submission of items to be added to the provisional agenda of the COP, Ministers underlined the importance of addressing pending issues which must be advanced in Durban. This is essential to generate the necessary balance in the climate change negotiations.

Cancun operationalization

Ministers also called for the early operationalization of all the institutions agreed to in Cancun, including the registry for nationally appropriate mitigation actions and international support; the Adaptation Committee; the Technology Executive Committee, Centre and Network; and the Green Climate Fund, which must provide significant means of implementation for immediate action to tackle climate change. They highlighted that the extent to which developing countries can implement their actions is dependent on the extent to which developed countries fulfill their commitment to provide sufficient financing, technological support and capacity building for both mitigation and adaptation.

Green Climate Fund

Ministers stressed the importance of ensuring appropriate overview of the Green Climate Fund by the Conference of the Parties, in order to ensure its adequate management and timely disbursements to developing countries. They emphasized that the Transitional Committee should interact with, and be guided by the AWG-LCA.
Financing

Ministers considered work by BASIC experts on a common reporting format for rigorous, robust and transparent accounting of finance by Annex I Parties. A common reporting format for finance is a priority for Durban to enable accounting of performance against the delivery of the quantified finance target of US$ 100 billion per year by 2020. Ministers also underlined the importance of ensuring the scaling up of financing up to and beyond 2020. They reiterated the need to ensure that accounting of finance by all developed countries be consistent, complete, comparable, transparent and accurate. Ministers also stressed the importance of detailed and comprehensive information on fast start financial flows provided by developed countries, which should be made available officially. They reaffirmed their view that the UNFCCC Secretariat should publish information on funding already disbursed under fast start financing, as this relates to a multilateral commitment.

MRV

Ministers also reflected on BASIC expert discussions on measuring, reporting and verifying Annex I mitigation. They underscored the need for stringent common accounting rules, with a view to ensuring transparency and comparability of mitigation commitments by all developed countries. They stressed that the rules of the Kyoto Protocol are the reference for the efforts undertaken by all developed countries in this area. They expressed the importance of operationalizing the transparency arrangements by developing countries, based on existing provisions under the Convention. They pointed out the robust contribution already offered by developing countries in emission reductions, which demonstrates a higher level of effort in comparison to mitigation by developed country Parties.

Equitable access to sustainable development

Ministers welcomed the work undertaken by BASIC experts on “a framework for equitable access to sustainable development”, as requested at the 6th BASIC Ministerial Meeting. This work will serve as a valuable contribution to the body of scientific knowledge informing policy development.

Reducing emissions from deforestation and forest degradation (REDD+)

Ministers recognized the importance of enhancing action to reduce emissions from deforestation and forest degradation, enhance removals by forests and sustainable forestry management practices, on the basis of scaled up international financing and technology transfer. They also underlined important additional benefits that REDD+ can offer to sustainable development in areas such as biodiversity protection.
Dangers of unilateralism

Ministers expressed their concern with unilateral climate change measures, planned or implemented, which generate negative impacts on other countries. They expressed their strong concern with the decision of the European Union to include the aviation sector in the EU Emission Trading System, including flights to and from its territory by noneuropea companies.

G77 and China

Ministers emphasized the importance of G77 and China unity and its key role in climate change negotiations. They noted the clear demonstrations by the G77 and China of leadership and willingness to contribute to a strong global effort. They decided to maintain the “BASIC-plus” approach, in order to enhance the transparency of its meetings. They also praised the role played by the South African incoming COP Presidency and its efforts to organize inclusive, high-level consultations on climate change, which will contribute to a successful and ambitious outcome in Durban.

Rio +20

The Ministers also had an opportunity to discuss the perspective for the Rio+20 Conference in 2012. In this regard, they stressed the important role of BASIC countries in ensuring success of Rio+20, as well as the Durban Conference on Climate Change and the New Delhi Conference on Biodiversity. This is a clear sign of their firm commitment to advance multilateral solutions to global problems.

Ninth Meeting of Ministers

Ministers welcomed the offer of China to host the Ninth BASIC Ministerial Meeting on Climate Change on the 31st of October and the 1st of November. A meeting of experts will be held alongside this Ministerial meeting.
The main challenge facing the international community today is to sustain and accelerate the process of poverty eradication and ensure food and energy security, particularly to developing countries while shifting gradually to a Green Economy. Agriculture plays a critical role in determining food, water, ecological and livelihood security. Integrating the strategies and policies for a green economy into agriculture has to proceed with an absolute imperative of ensuring these and not forgetting the differentiated needs of subsistence agriculture and market-oriented crops. Also, transitioning to a greener model of agriculture will depend on the expeditious provision of green technologies and financial support to developing countries for productivity enhancement, improved resilience and diversification of production systems. Sustainable development and management of agriculture would benefit from sharing of best practices including farm and non-farm development, improved post-harvest management, integration of supply chains and strengthening of public distribution systems.

Eradicating poverty is an indispensable requirement for sustainable development. A major cause aggravating poverty is the unsustainable pattern of consumption and production. Poverty eradication remains an overriding objective of governments in developing countries, and efforts to build green economies should contribute substantially to realizing that objective. A green economy approach to development holds the potential to achieve greater convergence between economic and environmental objectives.

Integrating green economy strategies and policies into poverty eradication, food security and energy security is an imperative for sustainable development. The issues to be addressed at the two-day 2011 Delhi Ministerial Dialogue on ‘Green Economy and Inclusive Growth’ include sustainable management of sectors like agriculture, industry, energy and transport, urgent adoption of sustainable life styles and consumption patterns through reduction in per capita ecological footprint, appropriate population policies, equity concerns, poverty eradication and developmental imperatives. Designed properly, green economy policies and programmes can directly contribute to poverty eradication. Successful examples can offer lessons and possible models for replication. For instance, India’s rural employment guarantee programme is at one and the same time an anti-poverty programme and an ecosystem restoration programme. This and other important examples of aligning environmental and social objectives would be ALSO presented and discussed at the Dialogue.
Food security and access to affordable clean energy are both crucial to eradicating poverty and promoting social development. The main challenge facing the international community now is to sustain and accelerate the process of poverty eradication and ensure food and energy security, particularly to developing countries while shifting gradually to a Green Economy. Agriculture plays a critical role in determining food, water, ecological and livelihood security. Integrating the strategies and policies for a green economy into agriculture has to proceed with an absolute imperative of ensuring these and not forgetting the differentiated needs of subsistence agriculture and market-oriented crops. Also, transitioning to a greener model of agriculture will depend on the expeditious provision of green technologies and financial support to developing countries for productivity enhancement, improved resilience and diversification of production systems. Sustainable development and management of agriculture would benefit from sharing of best practices including farm and non-farm development, improved post-harvest management, integration of supply chains and strengthening of public distribution systems.

The issue of energy security and universal energy access is intricately linked with economic development and growth, and rising energy needs to meet it. Energy poverty coexists with inefficient energy use in much of the world, which – given continued heavy dependence on fossil fuels – has been a major contributor to greenhouse gas emissions. Understanding the flexibility or lack of flexibility of each country to change this energy mix and devising innovative methods to secure energy security are the need of the hour without compromising on the need for high economic growth to meet the aspirations of the people, especially in developing countries.

Energy security is a multi-faceted concept. In the current context, the primary focus is on poor people’s securing adequate energy supplies to raise their living standards, including through improved income generation, health and education. Renewable energy should be considered as an integral part of the solution to the energy needs of the poor, but that will only be feasible if it is affordable and technologically accessible. As affordability is a function in part of large-scale deployment and learning, the strategy to address energy poverty needs to be linked to a broader alternative energy strategy as part of a green economy.

With respect to energy security, rural energy access remains seriously deficient in many developing countries, with well over a billion people lacking access to electricity and clean cooking and heating fuels. At the same time, even in urban areas, electricity is often underprovided and unreliable, especially for urban poor communities. This exacerbates poverty and closes off escape routes by limiting income generation opportunities as well as educational opportunities especially for girls.

New Delhi, October 3, 2011.

Excellencies, Mr. Sha Zukang, Secretary-General for the UN Conference on Sustainable Development, Dr. Ashok Khosla, Mr. Maurice Strong,
Mr. T. Chatterjee, Secretary to Government of India,
Distinguished Representative of Argentina on behalf of the Chair of G-77 and China, Distinguished Representative of Poland on behalf of the Presidency of the European Union, Distinguished delegates, UN officials, eminent experts,

Ladies and gentlemen,

2. It is a pleasure and privilege to have you here at Delhi and I extend a warm welcome to all of you. The Delhi Ministerial Dialogue has been organized by the Government of India in partnership with the UNCSD Secretariat, and is expected to facilitate a greater understanding of the architecture of green economy in the context of key development goals like poverty eradication, food security and access to energy. We have a platform for free and frank deliberations on the theme, ‘Green Economy and Inclusive Growth’ in the next two days as part of the preparatory process for the Rio+20 Conference next year. In order to secure a global consensus and cooperation to address economic and social concerns of the developing countries, along with a sustainable management of global commons, we must work together collectively. Rio+20 Summit must succeed.

3. India has been actively engaged in the Rio+20 process. As part of our preparations, we have constituted four Inter-Ministerial Working Groups in specific domains to look at the question of sustainable development as a whole. These Working Groups are being facilitated by renowned technical organizations, who have provided researched inputs. In addition, consultations with the corporate sector and civil society representatives have also been undertaken.

Ladies and gentlemen,

4. India is committed to improving the quality of life of its people through an inclusive and broad based growth trajectory. India has explicitly recognized inter-linkages of growth with social aspects as well as environmental concerns. The twelfth five year plan for the period 2012-2017 will be aimed at faster, more inclusive and sustainable development of India. I would like to highlight three dimensions of our development process.

5. Firstly, rapid economic growth with emphasis on infrastructure and livelihoods. Indian economy has recorded a high growth rate since 2003 averaging around 8.5 per cent per annum, before the global financial crisis in 2008, which reduced the growth rates to around six per cent. Despite the slow global recovery, India’s economic growth is expected to be strong and is projected to record around eight per cent for the year 2010-11. The economic growth has also been accompanied with a decline in poverty.

6. Secondly, focus on plurality and reduction of disparities. India has made significant strides in the direction of human resource development. Major health and demographic indicators and literacy rates have shown significant improvement in the last two decades. A democratic, secular and inclusive approach has been the hallmark of Indian polity.

7. Thirdly, the mainstreaming of environmental concerns in the Sectoral Policies and Programmes. India in its drive for sustainability has given high priority to environmental protection. India was among the first countries in the world to enshrine environmental protection in its Constitution. We may recall that the late Prime Minister of India, Smt. Indira Gandhi was the only Head of State, apart from that of the host country, to attend the landmark Stockholm Conference in 1972. Since then, a series of legislative, policy and institutional measures have been taken by the Government of India to integrate environmental concerns in our developmental process. In the realm of legislation, as an illustration, whereas the Right to Information Act, 2005 ensures greater transparency and access to public information, the National Green Tribunal Act, 2010 provides for a specialized green tribunal to promote access to environmental justice. The National Action Plan on Climate Change was launched in the year 2008, which encompasses eight thematic Missions covering areas such as solar energy, energy efficiency, sustainable agriculture and strategic knowledge. As a mark of its commitment to biodiversity conservation, India will host the 11th Conference of Parties to the Convention on Biodiversity in October, 2012.

8. We are also conscious of some ground realities. Although we have achieved a great deal, considerable challenges remain in the area of poverty eradication. 55% of population of rural India today does not have access to electricity. The challenge of scale up of cleaner energy solutions gets further compounded by limited access to green technologies at affordable cost. These continue to remain major concerns for India.
Ladies and gentlemen,

9. Rio Principles talk of human beings as the centre of concerns of sustainable development. It is a matter of concern that nearly 1 billion people on the planet are suffering from chronic hunger and 1.2 billion people have no access to modern energy services. Multiple crises of energy, food and water have been further compounded by the global financial meltdown. In this context, Rio+20 provides us an opportunity to foster a common approach on addressing these issues successfully.

10. Greening of economy has to be directed towards achieving the overriding objectives of sustainable development and poverty eradication. I mention a few guiding principles, which could be followed towards achieving global consensus and action: One, reaffirm the Rio Principles, including the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities. Two, strike a balance between the three pillars of sustainable development. Three, allow policy space for the countries to define their sustainable development strategies as per their national priorities and respective stages of development. Four, build institutional capacities at all levels – global, regional and local. Five, prioritize programmes for the inclusion and upliftment of socio-economically weaker sections of the society, women and youth. Six, promote access to green technologies at affordable cost, including through greater financial assistance for R&D in the public domain. Seven, strengthen global partnership for sustainable development, including for access of developing countries to additional financing. And finally, avoid green protectionism in the name of green economy.

11. The Delhi Ministerial Dialogue is based on the premise that promotion of sustainable consumption and production patterns is the key to lasting economic growth and prosperity. It has been rightly said that poverty is the biggest polluter. On the other hand, conspicuous consumption in many parts of the world has also resulted in tremendous pressures on natural resources and environment. Both the issues have to be addressed in tandem. A renewed political commitment on green economy has to be viewed in the context of its meaningfulness for the overarching goal of equity and poverty eradication.

12. The themes of the individual Plenary Sessions in the Dialogue relate to integration of Green Economy with key concerns of Inclusive Growth like Poverty Eradication, Food Security and Energy Security. This is indeed very topical. How do we ensure universal access to modern energy services without disturbing the planetary ecological boundaries? How do we operationalize the Nagoya Protocol on Access Benefit Sharing so as to protect the rights and interests of the local people? What are the policy and programme options, at all levels, to ensure access to food and sustainable livelihoods? A shared vision on such basic issues is expected to be the main outcome of this Dialogue.
13. The Dialogue has brought together ministers, policy-makers, representatives from UN bodies and eminent experts from various fields and, I am sure, you will offer fresh perspectives on the challenges to sustainable development, which the world faces today. I am equally confident that guidelines for new partnerships between stakeholders will emerge and these in turn will result in more efficient ways of combating these challenges. Most importantly, I expect that the exchange of ideas and possible solutions shall promote the achievement of consensus on key issues related to green economy and inclusive growth, encompassing the concerns of both developed and developing countries.

14. I thank you all again for your gracious presence and look forward to a successful Delhi Dialogue.

Thank you.
Jai Hind.

New Delhi, October 3-4, 2011.

More than hundred high level representatives from 41 countries, including ministers and senior officials, representatives from nine international agencies and leading experts on sustainable development came together at the Delhi Ministerial Dialogue between 3-4 October 2011.

The Delhi Ministerial Dialogue takes place at a time when preparations are on for the Rio+20 Summit. The United Nations Conference on Sustainable Development 2012, popularly known as ‘Rio+20’, will be held in Brazil next year where Heads of States and Governments are expected to participate to renew their commitment to sustainable development under the rubric of Green Economy and Sustainable Development. It is in this context that the theme of this Ministerial Dialogue ‘Green Economy and Inclusive Growth’ assumes special significance.

Minister of State for Environment and Forest, Smt. Jayanti Natarajan, in her inaugural address urged for collective action amongst all countries towards sustainable development and poverty eradication. Outlining India’s commitment to improve the quality of life of the people through an inclusive and broad based growth, she emphasised the interlinkages between economic, social and environmental issues. In this context, she outlined eight key principles for securing global action. In particular, she highlighted that the developing countries must be allowed to have appropriate policy space to define their suitable developmental strategies in their quest for poverty eradication. She also mentioned that the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities is crucial for a global partnership. She cautioned against use of Green Economy concept for green protectionism. Access to energy, food security and poverty eradication are of paramount importance in India’s development process, the Minister said.

Mr. Sha Zukang, Under Secretary General of the United Nations and Secretary General for the Rio+20 Conference, emphasised that Rio+20 must be about three aspects namely implementation, integration and coherence. He appreciated India’s role in taking the lead in formulating responses in the areas of food and energy security. Eminent experts Mr. Maurice Strong, Dr. Ashok Khosla, Prof. M. S. Swaminathan, Dr. R.K. Pachauri, Dr. Thomas C. Heller, Mr. Martin Khor, Prof. Jorge Alejandro Nadal and others participated in the dialogue.

The Minister also released a publication ‘Sustainable Development in India: Stocktaking in the run up to Rio+20’.

The two day dialogue threw up several options and ideas relating to the issue of inclusive growth and food and energy security. Poverty eradication was acknowledged as the benchmark for formulating Green Economy policies. Sustainable and inclusive economic growth was necessary for poverty eradication. There was acknowledgement that there was no one-size-fit-all solution and that national priorities will define the nature of strategies adopted by each country to green their economies. Development was seen as an empowering process. Sustainable management of natural resources and access to these resources for the poor and the vulnerable groups was seen as essential. In strengthening international partnership, substantial finance assistance, particularly from developed countries, would be necessary. Technology transfer at affordable prices was considered equally crucial for developing countries. Importance of sustainable practices in agriculture including productivity enhancing technologies, reduction of pre and post harvest losses, strengthening of agri-governance and improvement of dry-land farming was discussed. Universal access to sustainable energy and promotion of the use of renewable energy were to be explored.

New Delhi, October 3 – 4, 2011.

1. The Delhi Ministerial Dialogue on ‘Green Economy and Inclusive Growth’ was organised by the Government of India with the UNCSD Secretariat, which was held at Hotel The Ashok on 3-4 October 2011. 144 delegates participated in the Delhi Ministerial Dialogue (DMD), which included Ministers and high level representatives from 41 countries, besides delegates from nine international organizations and eminent experts in the field.

2. Smt. Jayanthi Natarajan, Minister of State for Environment and Forests (I/C), Government of India, delivered the inaugural address. Chatterjee, Secretary to Government of India, Mr. Ernesto Carlos Alvarez, Ambassador of Argentina in India on behalf of G-77 and China Dr. Janez Potocnik, European Commissioner for Environment also spoke in the inaugural session.

3. Plenary and Breakout sessions were held covering various aspects of food security, poverty eradication, and energy security in the context of Green Economy, besides a plenary on Country statements. The DMD provided a platform for free and frank deliberations on key developmental goal such as poverty eradication, food security, and access to energy and towards a greater understanding of the architecture of Green Economy.

4. The Plenary on Country Statements (Plenary 1) was co-chaired by Smt. Jayanthi Natarajan Minister of State for Environment and Forests (I/C), Government of India, and Mr. Sha Zukang, Under Secretary General of the United Nations and Secretary General of the UNCSD. Representatives of 30 countries, besides European Commission presented their views, concerns, challenges, and achievements in the context of Green Economy, poverty eradication and sustainable development. They were: Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Brazil, Cambodia, China, Columbia, Cuba, Finland, France, Germany, India, Italy, Japan, Kenya, Mexico, Nicaragua, Norway, Pakistan, Peru, Poland, South Africa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Thailand, UK, US.

5. There were four more Plenary sessions which dealt with the poverty eradication, food security and energy security issues and concerns facing the planet and also various regions/ countries. They were the following:
a. Plenary 2 - ‘Integrating Green Economy with poverty Eradication’,

c. Plenary 4 - ‘Integrating Green Economy with Energy Security Mix, Considering Means of Financing and Implementation’ and

d. Plenary 5 - ‘Formulating an Approach to Green Economy and Inclusive Growth’

The breakout sessions were held in smaller groups for more intensive discussions and interactions.

7. The Delhi Ministerial Dialogue addressed various issues pertaining to sustainable management of sectors like agriculture, industry, energy and transport, urgent adoption of sustainable life styles and consumption patterns for reduction in ecological footprint, equity concerns, poverty eradication and developmental imperatives. The Dialogue laid a particular focus on how green economy strategies and policies can be integrated with poverty eradication, food security and energy security objectives. It held that Rio+20 need to consider how best to integrate green economy strategies and policies into these priority concerns. The following key points and views emerged in the two-day Delhi Ministerial Dialogue on various issues related to an approach to Green Economy and inclusive growth, poverty eradication, food security, and energy security.

8. Green Economy and Inclusive Growth

a. Any outcome at Rio+20 should be based on the Rio Principles and there should be no rewriting or renegotiations of the above Principles. The reaffirmation of Rio Principles and reinvigoration of Agenda 21 was espoused. It was mentioned that the foundation of the GE approach was based on the Principle of Equity. The concept of equity encompasses intra-generational equity, inter-generational equity as well as equity across countries. A transition to GE should not lead to greater disparities. The Principle of ‘common but differentiated responsibilities’ (CBDR) was considered by many as crucial in this context. Similarly multilateralism was held to be important.

b. It was held that the Rio+20 needed renewed political commitment of countries which should culminate in concrete actions, beyond political rhetoric. The crisis and challenges facing us included, inter alia, risk of new global recession, increasing food prices, food and energy deficiencies and natural disasters. It was expressed that the time had come to bring definite ideas, options and practical action plans agreed by all countries for the 3 negotiation tables for Rio+20. It was said that Rio+20 must be about three things integration, implementation and coherence.

c. The concept of Green economy was interpreted in various ways by different countries. There was apprehension that the debate on the Green Economy may distract attention from sustainable development. There was a growing consensus that GE should be seen as one of the means to attain sustainable development and it is not an alternative to sustainable development.

d. Preserving natural resources and making efficient and sustainable use of them was considered essential to making the transition to a greener economy. Sustainable management of these resources and sustainable use of the ecosystem would make crucial contribution to poverty eradication. Early operationalisation of Nagoya protocol was considered important in promoting conservation of biological resources.

e. Rio+20 could facilitate collective action and development of a common understanding and consensus about the Green Economy approach and a possible Green Economy Roadmap accompanied by a tool box of flexible policies, instruments and best practices. A win-win economic and environmental arrangement ensures that economic and environmental synergies prevail over trade-offs and project and programmes are co-beneficial, bringing in revenues from both environmental and economic investments. In this context it was pointed out that it was not only important to know what is a Green Economy, it was also important to know what is not a Green Economy. This would help in delineating a Roadmap for Green Economy and identifying relevant policy tools.

f. The approach to GE could include a menu of policy options, so that countries can choose nationally appropriate policies as per their needs and national circumstances. Green economy approach should be mainstreamed into national plans. National leadership was required for an effective transition to GE. Green economy should make economic sense to be sustainable and practical and people oriented solutions were necessary.

g. It was held that one size does not fit all and that there should be recognition that national priorities and conditions would define the nature of the policies and strategies adopted by each country to green their economies. Rio+20 should allow flexibility to States to adopt nationally appropriate policies to pursue national priorities and objectives.

h. There were references to a proposal for a set of SDGs. (Sustainable Development Goals) in the line of MDGs in the post-2015. This was advocated as a tool to guide and provide priority to SD agenda at international and national level. However the need for further consideration in this regard and the apprehension that it can subvert the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities (CBDR) were raised. It was felt that setting of restrictive quantitative targets needs to be eschewed.

i. It was said that poverty eradication remained the daunting and foremost objective, so long as human development and human dignity is not universally enjoyed, not only for the developing countries but for the entire planet. A need was felt for strengthening the social pillar, for gains of development to reach all sections of the society, to help the poor and vulnerable so that all sections of the society could grow and progress. Development was seen as an empowering process.

j. There was a need to strike a balance between the three pillars of sustainable development, i.e. economic, social and environmental pillars, which required integration and coordination. Neglecting any one pillar would defeat the purpose of attaining sustainability and efforts should be made so that all the pillars reinforce each other.

k. For Green Economy to become truly sustainable, there was a case to reject green protectionism. A Green Economy approach also accompanied associated risk and costs which needed to be studied and addressed. The costs of green economy and its and costs on States at various stages of development and nationally on various sections of people should be studied and mitigated, so that benefits from a GE approach could be maximized.

l. Water was considered another vital sector with critical implications for sustainable development, including agriculture, food security and economic development. Water security was essential for efficient food production and sustainable agriculture. Rio+20 could be an opportunity to highlight the need for good water governance and efficient water use as key elements of sustainable Ocean development, sustainable use of marine resources could have significant implications for economic development, food security and social well being of many States particularly the small island States and in the context the concept of ‘blue economy’ was mentioned.

m. The unsustainable production and consumption pattern had resulted in rising demands on natural resources, ecological scarcities and many environmental crises. Therefore there was an urgent need for change in the unsustainable consumption and lifestyles. A strong commitment to follow the green economy strategies should come from the national governments. Political will, commitment and partnership with civil society and other stakeholders was considered important for transition to a green economy.

n. Developing countries would need a supportive international financing system and technological support and enhanced access to market opportunities for a transition to Green Economy. In strengthening international partnership, developed country financing was seen as crucial for developing countries to undertake and implement policies for sustainable development. These would supplement domestic resources. The developing countries should not be burdened with the costs and risks of transition to a GE. In the context of dematerialisation of growth and competition for resources, it was considered important that developed countries should not relieve themselves of their responsibilities.

o. While public financing should take the lead in this direction, private sector could also play a proactive role in mobilising additional finance required for a transition to GE. A greater and innovative role for private sector was envisaged. The need for creation of a sustainable development fund to enable transition to a Green Economy was also mentioned.

p. Access to clean technologies at affordable prices and removal of barriers to technology transfer were considered crucial for transition to GE. It was emphasised that technology innovation and investment in Science and Technology should be factored in to leapfrog towards sustainable development. Centres of excellence as nodal points for technology research and development in developing countries might be identified and provided appropriate resources so that appropriate and affordable technology solutions could be available in public domain.
q. It was held that traditional knowledge should be documented and applied; however, decisions regarding appropriate technology options should be taken up in the context of national priorities and choices.

r. Special efforts should be made to ensure participation at the Rio+20 Conference of civil society including NGOs, business and trade unions, especially NGOs from developing countries. It was highlighted that NGOs from developing countries were usually underrepresented in international fora because of their financial constraints. Therefore financial assistance to civil society of developing countries to participate in Rio+20 and augmenting the trust fund for the purpose of assisting NGOs to participate in the conference should be supported.

s. It was mentioned that the existing international institutional framework lack coordination, coherence and work in silos. Weak institutional framework was considered one of the reasons why the world has not made adequate progress in strengthening and integrating the three pillars of sustainable development. There was a need for building and improving global partnership and institutional capabilities at international, regional, national and local level for sustainable development. The role of private sector and other stakeholders was recognised. There was a view that the existing arrangements of global governance needed to be strengthened including ECOSOC and UNEP reforms. It was felt that there was a need to narrow down these options without trying to create another superstructure.

9. Integrating Poverty Eradication with Green Economy

a. Poverty eradication should be the benchmark for formulating GE policies. Sustainable and inclusive growth was considered important for poverty eradication, which in turn has to create opportunities for all, irrespective their levels of development. It was felt that the Poverty eradication agenda had to consider its strong inter linkages with food security, energy security. Food security was in turn related to land and water management.

b. Poverty eradication with a Green Economy approach would be affected by the global economic downturn, environmental degradation and the social crisis germinating from the economic and environmental crises. In addition to the above, the world was to cope with the challenges emanating from increasing food prices, food and energy deficiencies, and natural disasters. Development had to reach the poor, the vulnerable and the people at the margin, i.e. growth had to be inclusive. In this context, the concept of inclusive growth was even more relevant so that socio-economically weaker sections and women and children, could be protected from change and adversity. The challenge was to bring the poor and the vulnerable groups into the ambit of Green Economy and give them access to resources.

c. There were different views on the role of market, while one view envisaged a limited role for the government and free play of market forces, another view raised the concern that free market could lead to dominance by a few big players. A constructive and proactive role for public sector and government was seen in the developing countries in the context of green economy.

d. A GE approach should be well designed to generate employment and sustainable livelihood for poverty eradication. Social protection programmes, worker retraining should ensure that the poor and vulnerable are protected. GE had to result in job creation, address unemployment and in this context the continuing role of SMEs was highlighted to create jobs.

10. Integrating Food security with Green Economy

a. The various challenges for food security were rising demand for food, increasing degradation of resources and competing users for land, climatic risks, unstable global supply and prices for agricultural products. Food security was also to be examined from various aspects such as availability, access, absorption and appropriateness of food.

b. Price volatility of food which has severe implications for food security can be addressed at the international level by following measures: slowing down or eliminating speculation, building stocks at global, regional and national level, restoring confidence in international trading system, investment in agro-ecological agriculture, and reducing food waste and pre and post-harvest losses by developed countries.

c. It was felt that to address food security, improving productivity of agricultural inputs, sustainable agricultural practices, prevention and reversal of land degradation, conservation and sustainable use of biodiversity was essential. Land degradation was considered a major challenge because agricultural production, thus food security, depends on the health of the soil. Half of world's livestock and 40 percent of world's food production were from dry lands. As a large proportion of population lives on dry lands, it was important that issues of land degradation, desertification should have prominence in green economy discussions. The cost of fixing a degraded land was far more than that of preventing land degradation. Prevention and reversal of land degradation was considered to be a cost effective strategy to enhance food security, with co-benefits in climate change management, biodiversity conservation and livelihoods.

d. The special sensitivities of subsistence agriculture, indigenous people and the peasant economy were emphasised. Traditional farming had the characteristics of minimum tillage, environment friendly pest management, risk management by better agro-biodiversity, and involved mainly the small farmers and poor and contributed more to employment. On the other hand large scale farming were heavily subsidized, used more nutrients, and damaged the environment and biodiversity. Investment in water management, improving organic farming and traditional farming would be crucial in meeting the joint challenges of food crisis and related environmental problems. Organic agriculture, low pesticide management practices, soil fertility management through use of natural resources, improved biodiversity can have substantial livelihood and environmental impacts. However, the concerns of small and marginal farmers had to be respected. It was to be understood that greening of agriculture had limitations in the realm of de-chemicalization. Accordingly, there had to be a judicious mix as per the capabilities of countries to adopt nationally appropriate strategies.

e. There was a need to connect farmers to markets to capture larger share of value along the supply chains, to give them access to micro-finance and to create non-farm employment to supplement farm incomes and mitigate risks.

f. Incentives to scientific intensification of agriculture with resource conservation, reduction of pre and post harvest losses, use of a regionally differentiated approach, stronger agri-governance including land reforms, water management, research and extension and adoption of a rights-based approach and improving dry-land farming would help in attaining food security.

g. The time was ripe for a move to a second green revolution or what one of the speaker christened as ‘evergreen revolution’. This entailed sustainable intensification of agriculture with conservation or what FAO had described as ‘save and grow’. The new green revolution should be technology intensive not resource intensive.

h. A global soil partnership in the line of a global water partnership was mentioned.
i. Attention was drawn to the need for water conservation and mitigation of climate change impacts. The ecological foundation of the planet could be strengthened through water and land management which was considered vital for food security. Removal of agricultural subsidies was an option to be considered.

j. Policies to promote climate resilient agriculture should be developed and promoted considering the new risks brought in by climate change.

11. Integrating Energy security with Green Economy

a. It was mentioned that three billion people in the planet do not have access to energy and 1.4 billion people do not have access to electricity. Universal access to sustainable energy was seen as essential. Providing universal energy access by 2030 was one of the biggest challenges that needed to be resolved in Rio+20 summit because energy was the basis of achieving other MDGs.

b. Universal access to modern energy services at a sustainable basis was recognised as an imperative for economic growth and human development. The sustainability, reliability, and affordability of energy supply were also recognised as a need and a challenge to be met for improving the lives of a large proportion of population on the planet. Aspects relating to enhancing energy efficiency, changing of the energy mix and policies to promote use of renewable energy were required to be looked into.

c. Governments could have a greater role in providing widespread energy access, building infrastructure and policy interventions could be done more efficiently by it. Thus, Government’s role was important in the initial stages. A top down approach had to be amalgamated with a bottom up approach in this sector.

d. It was felt that price support and micro finance were required to make cheap credit available to poor, involvement of local institutions, rapid expansion of rural electrification with grid infrastructure, technology transfer to SMEs could be some of the measures to improve access to energy. In the context of technology transfer to SMEs sector, the burden of initial costs of new technology, the importance of knowledge networking and skill development was discussed.

e. Renewable energy was seen as a clean alternative to other energy services. Switching to renewables could lead to high socio-economic costs and appropriate policy intervention was required. Renewable energy sector required large investments, particularly in the initial stages and sophisticated technology and this could prove to be a restraint to its proliferation. The burden of the initial costs of new technology would be prohibitive on developing countries. Enabling environment for investment in renewable energy was necessary.

f. It was said that Africa and Asia together account for roughly 75% of the world’s population but their per capita energy consumption level was much lower and their historical contribution to emissions was also low. The developed world should reduce its consumption to reduce price and create space for developing countries to pursue growth and improve the lives of their people. Some drastic measures would have to be taken to change the business as usual situation which has high dependence on fossil fuel. In this context access to greater international financing was considered critical besides policy intervention. It was mentioned that reduction in subsidies to fossil fuel could lead to more efficient and cleaner energy mix. However, it was also noted that many countries have limited capabilities to change their current energy mix and in the absence of cost effective renewable technologies, the dependence of developing countries on fossil fuels for economic growth was expected to continue for some time. Clean coal technology options needed to be adopted.

g. Sustainable energy for all should incorporate quality and quantity of energy supply issues. Additional energy demand for universal energy access would not put major pressures on energy demand and or climate security, provided developed world changes its current unsustainable consumption and lifestyles. It was also pointed out that universal access to energy would require multi fold enhancement in investment in energy. Developed countries needed to supplement the domestic mobilisation of finance and new and additional sources of funding for developing countries were needed.

h. Development and access to clean affordable energy solutions, establishment of technology innovation centres to respond to the specific needs of developing countries, investments in clean energy infrastructure were some of the measures needed to ensure universal access to energy.

i. Reliable data collection was a key to formulate meaningful policies. Information on the current magnitude of use, requirement and how much the country could afford, would help in planning. Rio +20 could be an opportunity to help countries modernize their data collection.

j. Availability of clean and affordable energy for cooking could have significant environmental and social implications in terms of improving health of the household from indoor pollution, saving labour used in collection of biomass fuels. Energy access and microfinance for cooking can improve lives of millions.

Indian Proposal on Neglected issues for Durban Discussions

The Indian Government has submitted a proposal to the Secretariat of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) to include three contentious but very important issues on ‘unilateral trade measures’, ‘intellectual property rights’ and ‘equitable access to sustainable development’ for inclusion in the provisional agenda of the 17th meeting of the Conference of Parties (COP 17) to be held in Durban, South Africa in late November this year.

These issues have been neglected and not properly addressed in the 2010 Cancun decision on the outcome of the Ad-hoc Working Group on Long-term Cooperative Action under the Convention (decision 1/CP 16) despite being raised by India and a large number of developing countries prior to and in Cancun.

India requested that the 3 issues be included in the COP 17 provisional agenda and developing countries in the Bonn talks that ended on 17 June objected to attempts to have these items addressed by the Subsidiary Body on Implementation (SBI) that has no mandate to provide guidance (thereby influencing) the COP agenda.

The Indian proposal is for the inclusion of these issues as follows: (i) under the agenda item ‘Development and transfer of technologies’, a sub-item on ‘Mitigation and adaptation actions and technology related Intellectual Property Rights’; (ii) under the agenda item ‘Review of implementation of commitments and other provisions of the Convention', to include ‘Equitable access to sustainable development’ and 'Unilateral trade measures'.

The Indian submission provided the explanatory notes in respect of each additional agenda item as proposed.

On the intellectual property rights (IPRs) issue, the Indian explanatory note states that “at Cancun, Parties to UNFCCC agreed to set up a Technology Mechanism and Networks of Climate Technology Centres with a view to promote cooperation amongst Parties for development and transfer of technologies. While the Technology Mechanism will help build capacity for deployment of existing technologies and dissemination of environmentally sound technologies, there is a need to augment this arrangement in form of removal of constraints at the global level on the development and availability of climate friendly technologies. An effective and efficient global regime for management of (IPRs) of climate friendly technologies is critical to the global efforts for development, deployment, dissemination and transfer of such technologies. In the absence of such an arrangement, the objective of advancing the nationally appropriate mitigation and adaptation actions at the scale and speed warranted by the Convention cannot be met effectively and adequately. Such a regime should promote access to (IPRs) as global public good while rewarding the innovator and enhance the capacity of developing countries to take effective mitigation and adaptation actions at the national level. Conference of Parties should urgently decide on addressing the issue of treating and delivering climate technologies and their IPRs as public good in the interest of the global goal of early stabilization of climate and advancing developing country efforts aimed at social and economic development and poverty eradication.”

On the issue of ‘equitable access to sustainable development’, the explanatory note states that ‘at Cancun, Parties agreed to a global goal for climate stabilization with a view to hold the increase in global average temperature below 2 degree C above pre-industrial levels and decided that urgent actions be taken to meet this long term goal consistent with science and on the basis of equity. Parties also decided to work towards identifying a time frame for global peaking of green house gas emissions based on the best available scientific knowledge and equitable access to sustainable development. The decisions at Cancun imply that the global goal of climate stabilization in terms of limiting the temperature rise to 2 degrees Celsius above pre-industrial levels should be preceded by a paradigm for equitable access to sustainable development. The achievement of the global goal must not compromise the sustainable development imperatives of developing countries and must fully take into account the overriding priority of social and economic development and poverty eradication in such countries. Keeping in mind the objective of identifying the suitable timeframe for reducing the global emissions on the basis of equitable access to sustainable development, the principle of equity must be defined so as to recognize that the global atmospheric resource is the common property of all mankind and each human being has equal entitlement to use of this resource in the interest of meeting the overriding priorities of developing countries.’

On the issue of “unilateral trade measures”, the note states that, “at Cancun, Parties agreed to promote a supportive and open international economic system. Parties decided, inter-alia, that measures taken to combat climate change including unilateral ones should not constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination or a disguised restriction on international trade. Unilateral Trade Measures (UTMs) include tariff, non-tariff, and other fiscal and non-fiscal border trade measures that may be taken by developed country Parties, against goods and services from developing country Parties. Recourse to UTMs on any grounds related to climate change, including protection and stabilization of climate, emissions leakage and/or cost of environment compliance would be tantamount to passing mitigation burden onto developing countries, and would clearly contravene the fundamental principles and provisions of equity, common but differentiated responsibility and respective capabilities, and the principle enshrined in Article 3 of the Convention. Parties should expressly prohibit use of unilateral trade measures on such grounds, as they will have negative environmental, social and economic consequences for developing countries and compromise the principles and provisions of the Convention.”

Attempts were made to negotiate and amend the elements of the provisional agenda for COP 17 that included the new issues proposed by India, under the discussions on ‘arrangements for intergovernmental meetings’ (AIMs) in a contact group of the SBI. Developed countries, especially the United States, are of the view that these issues have been settled in Cancun. However, most developing countries are of the view that not all the issues were addressed in Cancun and are still unresolved.
Joint Statement Issued at the Conclusion of the Ninth BASIC Ministerial Meeting on Climate Change.

Beijing, November 1, 2011.

1. The Ninth BASIC Ministerial Meeting on Climate Change was held in Beijing, China from 31 October to 1 November 2011. H.E. Mr. Xie Zhenhua, Vice Chairman of the National Development and Reform Commission of China, H.E. Mr. Liu Zhenmin, Assistant Minister of Foreign Affairs of China, H.E. Mr. Francisco Gaetani, Deputy Minister of Environment of Brazil, H.E. Ms. Jayanthi Natarajan, Minister of State (Independent Charge), Environment and Forests of India, and H.E. Ms. Bomo Edna Edith Molewa, Minister of Water and Environment Affairs of South Africa, as well as H.E. Ms. Maite. Nkoana-Mashabane, Minister of International Relations and Cooperation in her capacity as the incoming COP president attended the meeting. In line with BASIC-plus approach, representatives of Argentina (as chair of the G77 and China), Egypt (as representative of the Arab Group) and Grenada (as chair of Alliance of Small Island States) were invited and participated in the meeting as observers.

2. The BASIC ministers reaffirmed their continued full support to the government of South Africa to make Durban Conference a success in an open, transparent, inclusive and party-driven process. They agreed that Durban should achieve a comprehensive, fair and balanced outcome to enable the full, effective and sustained implementation of the Convention and its Kyoto Protocol, in accordance with the principles of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities, and fulfilling the mandate of Bali Roadmap in the two-track process of negotiation. Ministers emphasized the need to implement the Cancun decisions as well as to address the unresolved issues from the Bali Roadmap. They called upon the Conference to clearly establish the second commitment period under the Kyoto Protocol where the developed country parties to the Kyoto Protocol shall undertake quantified emission reduction commitments. They called for the Durban Conference to accomplish the Bali Action Plan where developed country parties that are not Parties to the Kyoto Protocol to undertake comparable quantified emission reduction commitments under the Convention and for developing country parties to implement enhanced mitigation actions in the context of sustainable development and enabled and supported by finance, technology and capacity building. Ministers stressed the need for early and effective operationalisation of the procedures and mechanisms for adaptation, finance, technology transfer, capacity building and transparency.

3. Ministers emphasized that the Kyoto Protocol is the cornerstone of the climate regime and its second commitment period is the essential priority for the success of Durban Conference. Ministers underlined that the continuation of the flexibility mechanisms of the Kyoto Protocol is contingent upon the establishment of quantified emissions reduction commitments by Annex I Parities under the second commitment period. Ministers reiterated their support to work towards the perspective of a comprehensive, ambitious and fair outcome, ensuring the full, effective and sustained implementation of UNFCCC and its Kyoto Protocol.

4. Noting that while sustainable development and poverty eradication remain urgent challenges and overriding priorities for them, the developing countries, in particular the BASIC countries have engaged ambitious actions to reduce emissions at substantial cost to their economies. Ministers called upon the developed country parties to rise up to their historical responsibilities and undertake ambitious and robust mitigation commitments consistent with science and in accordance with the principles of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities. Ministers recalled the robust contribution already offered by many developing countries in emission reductions by which these countries have become the active leaders of the global effort against climate change. This has come about despite the responsibility, established under the Convention, that developed countries "take the lead".

5. Ministers recalled that parties were working under the mandate of the Bali Roadmap to agree on a second commitment period under the Kyoto Protocol and to enable the full, effective and sustained implementation of the Convention through long-term cooperative action, now, up to and beyond 2012 and reaffirmed the need to focus on this mandate.

6. In this connection, they stressed that deliberations and discussions for the further implementation of the Convention beyond 2020 must be firmly based on the principles and provisions of the Convention and consistent with the latest findings of science as per the forthcoming 5th Assessment Report of the Inter-Governmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC). In this context, they noted the importance of the Review process which is to be completed by 2015.

7. Ministers reaffirmed that any outcome on shared vision needs to be firmly based on the principles of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities.

8. Ministers underscored that financing is one of the pressing priorities at the Durban Conference. Ministers welcomed the work of the Transitional Committee and envisaged the consideration and approval of its draft report by the COP. Ministers agreed that the Durban Conference should decide to initiate the operationalization of the Green Climate Fund with accountability to and under the guidance of COP, ensuring adequate financial support for developing countries. Therefore, they urged developed countries to capitalize the Green Climate Fund from their public financial resources as soon as possible.

9. Ministers were of the view that developed countries should fulfill their commitment of providing US$ 30 billion as fast start funding, ensuring new and additional funding and transparent information of its performance. Ministers reiterated the importance of ensuring the accounting of finance on the fast start funding is transparent, measurable, reportable and verifiable. They requested developed countries to submit information on the fast start funding to the UNFCCC secretariat in a common and comparable format to strengthen mutual trust between developed and developing countries. This could serve as the first step in more accurate reporting on long-term financing, generating information to assess progress towards the collective financial commitments by Annex I Parties.

10. Ministers urged developed countries to honor their commitment to provide US$100 billion per year by 2020 in a predictable manner with specific measures and clear roadmap to be adopted in Durban, ensuring that there is no funding gap from 2013 to 2020. This funding should mainly come from public financial resource and private and other alternative resources of funding should only be supplementary.

11. Ministers emphasized that adaptation is the most urgent task in developing countries and supported the African Group’s position on prioritizing this issue in Durban. They called for immediate operationalisation of the Adaptation Committee, which should contribute to adaptation policy development and implementation of adaptation actions in developing countries following the requests of developing countries and respecting a country-driven approach. Ministers highlighted that the Adaptation Committee should establish effective links with the finance and technology mechanisms to support adaptation actions for all developing countries, particularly SIDs, LDCs and Africa.

12. Ministers welcomed with appreciation the functioning of the Technology Executive Committee and the progress on the set-up of the Technology Centre and Network. They urged a clear definition of the relationship between the two bodies and the link between the technology mechanism and the finance mechanism. Ministers highlighted the need to address the IPR issue properly and the early operation of the technology mechanism to advance climate-friendly technology transfer to developing countries.

13. Ministers stressed that the Review must be conducted in accordance with the principles and provisions of the Convention itself. They stressed that the Review must include a review of the adequacy of global temperature goal and effectiveness of ambitious quantified emission reduction commitments by Annex I Parties and the provision of finance and technology support by developed countries to enable developing countries to implement enhanced mitigation and adaptation actions under the UNFCCC.

14. Ministers underlined the importance of the Indian proposal to include the issues of equity, trade and intellectual property right (IPR) in the provisional agenda of the COP17. They agreed that discussions on these important issues which are crucial to many developing countries, would contribute to a comprehensive and balanced outcome at Durban.

15. Ministers emphasized the need to address emissions from international aviation and maritime transport in a multilateral context and in accordance with the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities. They highlighted that unilateral measures on climate change, such as the inclusion of emissions from international aviation in the EU-ETS, would violate the principles and provisions of the Convention and jeopardize the effort of international cooperation in addressing climate change.

16. Ministers received reports on the progress made by the BASIC experts group on Equitable Access to Sustainable Development and supported the publication of the paper as a contribution to the scientific body of knowledge. They also received reports on common accounting rules for emission reductions by Annex I Parties, lower carbon development strategies and common reporting format for accounting of finance by Annex I Parties. Ministers considered their work would usefully inform the negotiations under the Bali Roadmap. Ministers decided that the BASIC experts group would continue to meet in parallel with BASIC ministerial meetings.

17. Ministers stressed their dedication towards consolidating and strengthening the unity of G77 and China and decided to continue to enhance transparency and inclusiveness through the BASIC–plus approach. Ministers appreciated the role played by South Africa as the incoming Presidency and its efforts to achieve a successful outcome in Durban. They reaffirm their determination to work with all parties to Save Tomorrow Today.

18. Ministers welcomed the offer of India to host the Tenth BASIC Ministerial Meeting on Climate Change in the first quarter of 2012.

060. Statement by Minister of State for Environment and Forests
Ms. Jayanthi Natarajan at the High Level Segment at the 17th Conference of Parties (COP-17).
Durban, December 7, 2011.

Madame President,
Excellencies,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Thank you for giving me this opportunity to speak to the international community on an issue of such a great importance.

India shares a great historical bond with South Africa. We gave you Mohandas Gandhi, the attorney. But you gave us the Mahatma, the Great Soul. We are proud of him and also the country that turned him into what he eventually became. I am sure, that same spirit will continue to inspire our common journey in future to address climate change. We are fully behind you to ensure that Durban CoP becomes a successful CoP for climate change.

We are a large country but with a very small carbon footprint. Our per capita emission is only 1.7 tonnes per annum. Our modeling studies show that, even in 2030, with a growth rate of 8-9 per cent per annum, our per capita emissions will not exceed 3.7 tonnes. Our Prime Minister has already stated that we will follow a growth path that will help us remain sustainable and not emulate the fossil fuel-intensive growth path followed by developed countries in the past.

We are a developing country that has large unmet energy needs. But we are moving fast towards using all possible avenues of generating cleaner energy.
We have a National Action Plan on Climate Change. We have a target of generating 20,000 MW of solar power in 2020. We are doing this in phases, so that the market develops and costs come down. We are implementing ambitious energy efficiency programmes. In 2003, it used to take about 190 grams of oil to produce a dollar of GDP. Now, we need only about 140 grams in 2009 – a sharp decrease of about 30% in 6 years. This is because of a number of policy measures that we have taken. We have a cess on coal. We follow a regime of high energy prices, mandatory energy efficiency standards, and an innovative trading mechanism for energy efficiency.

As a developing country, India faces many challenges. Despite these we have been engaged very constructively in these negotiations. We are conscious of our responsibilities and have, in that spirit, taken new and additional mitigation actions in a regime of international transparency. We are fulfilling these obligations. It is time the developed countries stepped up to fulfill their part of the commitment under UNFCCC and its Kyoto Protocol as laid out in the Bali Roadmap.

It is very important that, in Durban, a clear and ratifiable decision on KP second commitment period takes place. We hope that this legally valid agreement to which all of us are parties will not be allowed to lapse due to inaction by some parties. This will undermine credibility in any future legally binding instrument.

We must also not forget that, for a very large number of poor in the developing world, the world has not changed. They continue to struggle with the challenge of eking out their livelihoods and meeting their basic needs. They cannot be expected to be legally bound to reduce their emissions when they have practically no emissions. Eradication of their poverty and social and economic development is the primary goal. Development is the best healer for the environment.

India wants and is hopeful that the Green Climate Fund (GCF) will be established at Durban. Developed country Parties who have commitment to provide resources should agree to capitalize the Fund, its legal status, and also to the structure of long term sources of finance for the Green Climate Fund.

Madame President,

We need to do substantial work in the days to come. Equity is a fundamental issue in climate change. It deals not only with Common But Differentiated Responsibility (CBDR), but more importantly, with equity in access to global atmospheric resources. Besides, the question of unilateral measures needs to be dealt with so that such actions do not become disguised trade actions. Similarly, we need further work in the area of IPRs to facilitate the goal of technology development and transfer at affordable costs.

I have come to Durban with an open mind and a constructive spirit. And, it is my conviction that we will effectively implement and sustain the regime of climate change if the regime is anchored within the framework of the existing Convention and adheres to these fundamental principles.

Thank you.
Thank you Madam Chair. I do not know how to start. I have heard people across the room carefully. I am from India and I represent 1.2 billion people. My country has a tiny per capita carbon footprint of 1.7 ton and our per capita GDP is even lower.

I was astonished and disturbed by the comments of my colleague from Canada who was pointing at us as to why we are against the roadmap. I am disturbed to find that a legally binding protocol to the Convention, negotiated just 14 years ago is now being junked in a cavalier manner. Countries which had signed and ratified it are walking away without even a polite goodbye. And yet, pointing at others.

I was also deeply moved listening to the comments of my colleagues and friends from the small island states. Our positions may be different, but their sentiments resonate with me very strongly. India has 600 islands which may be submerged, we have deltaic region in which millions of people live. We are absolutely at the forefront of the vulnerability of Climate Change. When I talk here, I have in front of my eyes, the face of the last Indian who is affected by the effects of Climate Change.

It would be helpful if we do not talk at each other and do not prejudge each other.

As a developing country, the principles of equity and CBDR are central for us. India is asking for space for basic development for its people and poverty eradication. Is this an unreasonable demand? Former Prime Minister of India Indira Gandhi said that poverty is the greatest polluter and development is the greatest healer. Equity has to be the centerpiece of the Climate discussion and our negotiations should be built on it. We cannot accept the principle of CBDR to be diluted. The firewall of CBDR must not be broken. Equity in the debate must be secured.

I too raise my voice for urgency. Climate Change is the most pressing and urgent problem for us. I too have a grandson, the son of my son. Climate Change affects us too. What is important is what action we are taking to address it. We are not saying nothing should be done now, or no action should be taken. On the contrary. We are asking that the actions of the developed country parties must be reviewed.
We have taken ambitious steps in India to address Climate Change. My Prime Minister has announced that our per capita emissions would never exceed that of developed countries. Has any other country done this? We have ambitious energy efficiency targets.

We have pledged to lower our emissions intensity of our GDP by 20-25% by 2020. A recent report from Stockholm Institute has noted that the mitigation pledges of developing countries amount to more mitigation than that of developed countries.

What we demand is for existing commitments to be met. What we demand is comparability of actions. We demand that the emissions gap must be bridged.

Coming to the text you have presented Madan Chair, I have three comments. First of all, there is an imbalance in the two texts. The KP is weak. It does not have:

- The numbers for KP parties, not till next years
- No timeline for ratification
- And no indication of how the gap in the implementation will be avoided

My biggest concern with reference to the texts is that there is no reference to the fundamental principle of equity and CBDR in the bigger picture text.

We should have clear timelines that advance the actions and ambition of parties. We in the developing world are taking very ambitious domestic actions. It is because we need urgent actions that we should urgently implementation the Bali Action Plan and operationalize the Cancun Agreements.

We should have an ambitious implementation phase till 2013 and then go to the Review in 2013-15 to make an assessment based on science and commitments.

We should then begin work on the arrangements that can enhance our ambition further.

We should not confuse legally binding arrangements with ambition. We need commitments, not mere hollow promises.

Thank you.
062. Statement by Minister of State for Environment and Forests
Ms. Jayanthi Natarajan at the Plenary of the COP – MoP.

Durban, December 11, 2011.

Madam President

We are here to find a solution to the entire issue of climate change.

In these negotiations, India has shown more flexibility than any other party. In these negotiations, the centerpiece of climate change actions should be equity. Madam, will you disagree with me on this issue? Equity is the central issue. And, the equity in burden sharing cannot be shifted.

So many people have asked me in different voices and at different times about the issue of equity. And, it is not about India. It is about climate change.

Now, there is para 4 of the paper on the big picture. I am told that the world wants a legally binding agreement. But, Madam, the options for a legally binding agreement are all there in para 4- a protocol, a legal instrument, and a legal outcome. Some people want us to drop ‘legal outcome’. And, I was told that India will be blamed if there is no legally binding agreement.

Madam, I want to make one thing clear. India will not be intimidated. India will not be blamed or be subject to any threat of this kind.

Let me tell you why I am so passionate about it. We are talking of livelihoods and sustainability here. How do I give a blank cheque, to sign away the rights of 1.2 billion people of India without even knowing what this legally binding agreement is? Where will the equity and CBDR figure in this agreement?

I am not doubting any one’s sincerity. But, does fighting climate change mean we have to give up on equity? We must have equity and CBDR in the options.

Madam, look at the text. Is it a weak text? There is last para 10 in the text which says that it will apply equally to all parties. Is this the text that you want to reopen.

There is this LCA text which many countries opposed and we supported. We accepted it. We will not issue any threats to anyone. Is there any multilateral process where decisions will be taken on the basis of threats?

There is pain in my heart. I feel humble and I get agitated when I see the fate of millions of people living in the vulnerable areas of my country. That is the reason why I have agreed with the idea of raising ambition levels. It is possible to raise ambitions when we take actions based on equity.
Madam, India had proposed 3 agenda items on equity, trade and IPRs. These 3 items were not taken on the centrestage but parked somewhere. Yet, we have gone along. We have walked the extra mile. We did not issue a threat. Please do not hold us hostage and force us to say final goodbye to CBDR. We can not give up the principle of equity.

Madam, in the end, I would like to say that the ‘legal outcome’ is just one more option. How is it wrong? What is the problem in having one more option?

If there is insistence on reopening the text, we are willing to reopen the entire Durban package. We will reopen all sections of the LCA text where we have reservations-mitigation, adaptation and others where the text does not meet our expectations.

Thank you very much.

Inaugural Address by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at India-ASEAN Delhi Dialogue- III.

New Delhi, March 3, 2011.

Secretary General of ASEAN His Excellency Dr. Pitsuwan

My Ministerial colleagues from ASEAN countries

Excellencies,

Distinguished guests

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I would like to add my words of welcome to all of you who are present here today with us as we launch the third edition of Delhi Dialogue.

I especially welcome my colleagues from ASEAN countries and their delegations, who have honoured us with their presence not only for this event but also for other activities that we in India are privileged to host this week to focus on our relations with these countries. I express my gratitude to the Secretary General of ASEAN H. E. Dr Surin Pitsuwan for accepting my invitation.

Ladies and Gentlemen, distinguished guests,

We stand at the threshold of twenty years of the launch of the formal Dialogue partnership between India and ASEAN, which started in 1992. We look forward to holding the Commemorative Summit in 2012 in India.

It is a happy coincidence, or is it a coincidence, that this two decade period has been transformational for India, as also for its engagement with South East Asia.

It has been a gratifying engagement for us - an engagement which has drawn strength from India's rapidly developing bilateral ties with individual ASEAN countries, and from our millennia-old bonds with the countries and civilizations of the region.

The words 'Look East' encapsulate our renewed focus on these ties. I wonder if we have a phrase that can capture the age-old roots, cordiality and partnership that are at the heart of our Look East Policy.

Historical ties of India with Myanmar, Thailand, the Malay Peninsula, Cambodia, Laos and with what was known as the East Indies - Sumatra, Java, Bali and Borneo - are well known. These ties are rooted in geographical contiguity and commonality of a multitude of other factors.
It is both a contemporary need and a responsibility to nurture these natural relationships. We are committed to deepening our all-round engagement with ASEAN.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

India's first Free Trade Agreement was signed with ASEAN. This Agreement will provide a further thrust to the almost twenty-fold increase in our trade with ASEAN which has been witnessed in nearly twenty years since 1990.

India has undertaken a number of initiatives in line with its commitment to the "Initiative for ASEAN Integration" which is intended to bridge the developmental gap between the older and the newer, less developed, members of ASEAN, i.e. Cambodia, Lao PDR, Myanmar and Vietnam.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

The shift of power to Asia in this century is almost a cliché now. While such a shift may indeed be taking place, the processes involved are far more complex than what would appear at first glance. A number of new initiatives and institutions in South East Asia are coterminous with and contribute to this shift.

On the strategic side, there is the ASEAN Defence Ministers Meeting Plus Eight process. India's participation in this is part of the wider paradigm shift which characterises our Look East Policy.

The second big institutional change is the continued evolution of the East Asia Summit (EAS) process. Our Look East Policy has evolved with this process, which was born in 2005. This Policy has, therefore, evolved to include the Far Eastern and Pacific regions and facilitated greater links with Japan, Republic of Korea, Australia and New Zealand.

EAS further expanded at its 5th Meeting in October last year to include US and Russia into its ambit. India welcomed this expansion, which, we believe, will add to regional peace and security. We also believe that the existing mechanisms of EAS will remain intact with this expansion and will be guided to a more fruitful benefit for the region.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

With this backdrop of historical and contemporary wide ranging association, how does India look beyond the first two decades of our engagement with ASEAN?

There are a few vectors which suggest themselves for the future.

Firstly, I think we need to focus on a vision for our region which is inclusive. As many of you know in India we have sought to embed in our developmental experience the principle of inclusivity. These principles need to form part of international efforts as that in the end is the strongest factor for the maintenance of peace and security.

Secondly, we feel that the principles of State sovereignty and non-interference in internal affairs of others must be the bedrock of our cooperative endeavours.

Thirdly, diversity comes naturally to us in Asia. Respecting diversity and developing tolerance must, therefore, form the third prong of our approach.

Within this framework, I believe, we must focus even more sharply in our efforts to construct an interconnected economic block.

I believe that India and ASEAN can do so by concentrating even greater efforts on physical connectivity. This aspect fits very well with our own domestic priority of upgrading infrastructure. If the two can proceed in tandem, it is possible that in the space of next five to seven years we will see a dramatic flowering of India-ASEAN relations. Connectivity will enhance the potential of Merchandise Trade and Investment Agreements that have been already put into effect or are on the anvil.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Greater physical connectivity will reinforce intellectual inter-linkages that we have or will foster.

In this context, I would like to mention our joint initiative for the revival of the Nalanda University.

Similarly, the Mekong-Ganga Cooperation (MGC), launched in the year 2000, is a sub-regional initiative comprising India and five ASEAN countries: Cambodia, Lao PDR, Myanmar, Thailand and Vietnam. Both the Ganga and the Mekong are not mere rivers but symbols of civilizations. This initiative is thus reflective of the cultural and commercial linkages among the member countries of the MGC through centuries. Members of MGC are working to promote cooperation in the sectors of tourism, culture, education and transport & communications.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Our enterprising ancestors created through the passage of time a most wonderful matrix of mutually enriching cultures, and mutually reinforcing bonds. As we look to India-ASEAN engagement beyond 2012, we need to assiduously promote people-to-people relations. It is on the wings of these ties that the future of our relationship will soar.
Ladies and Gentlemen,

Before I conclude, I would like to congratulate the Indian Council of World Affairs, the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry, the Institute of Southeast Asian Studies and the SAEA Research Group of Singapore, as well as the Economic Research Institute in Jakarta, for their fruitful partnership in restructuring the Delhi dialogue. I also compliment all the think tanks, scholars and experts involved who have worked so hard to bring this Dialogue to fruition.

I hope that our guests will have a pleasant and fruitful stay in Delhi and the Dialogue, which you are engaged in, will bring in to sharper relief the future of our path.

I wish the Dialogue all success.

Thank you.

064. Press Release issued by Ministry of External Affairs on External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna’s visit to Bali for East Asia Summit, Asean Regional Forum Ministerial and other Ministerial meetings.

New Delhi, July 20, 2011.

The External Affairs Minister would be participating in the 9th India-ASEAN Post Ministerial Conference, the East Asia Summit Foreign Ministers Consultations and the ASEAN Regional Forum Ministerial Meeting in Bali, Indonesia from July 22-23, 2011.

2. The India-ASEAN Ministerial Meeting will review ASEAN-India Cooperation and deliberate on its future direction, particularly in the context of the India-ASEAN Commemorative Summit to be hosted in New Delhi in December 2012. The Ministers will also exchange views on regional and international issues of interest to ASEAN and India.

3. India became a sectoral partner of ASEAN in 1992, and a full dialogue partner in 1996 after signing the Treaty on Amity and Cooperation with ASEAN. The 1st Summit Level Meeting took place with ASEAN leaders in 2002. India and ASEAN adopted a Plan of Action for the period 2010-15 during the 8th ASEAN-India Summit held on October 30, 2010 at Hanoi. The Indian Parliament has Observer Status in the ASEAN Inter-Parliamentary Assembly. India would be hosting the India-ASEAN Commemorative Summit in December 2012 to celebrate these 20 years of partnership.

4. India-ASEAN trade reached US$ 55.21 billion in the financial year ending March 2011. We now have a target of US$ 70 billion by 2012. India and ASEAN have signed a Trade in Goods Agreement and the notification process in respect of all signatories would be complete by the time the ASEAN-India Economic Ministers meet in Manado, Indonesia on August 13, 2011. Both sides are also hopeful of concluding the negotiations on the Services and Investment Agreement by the end of the year.

5. ASEAN-India cooperation covers a wide canvas including growing ties in trade and investment, science & technology, space sciences, transport & infrastructure, rail air & sea connectivity, education, information & communication technology, health and pharmaceuticals, energy, tourism etc. An Eminent Persons Group has been set up between India and ASEAN to submit recommendations to the Leaders on the future direction of the partnership.

India has consistently supported the centrality of ASEAN in the EAS architecture and the ASEAN way of dialogue at a pace comfortable to all.

7. The East Asia Summit Foreign Ministers Consultations will focus on the review and future direction of EAS and the preparations for the 6th East Asia Summit in November 2011 in Bali, Indonesia. The Foreign Ministers will also exchange views on regional and international issues.
065. Remarks by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna as Co-Chair at India-ASEAN Ministerial Meeting.

Bali, July 22, 2011.

Your Excellency Dr. Kao Kim Hourn, Deputy Foreign Minister of the Kingdom of Cambodia,
Your Excellency Dr. R.M. Marty M. Natalegawa, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Indonesia,
Your Royal Highness Princess Masna, Minister - at - large of Brunei Darussalam, Esteemed Ministerial colleagues
Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

Let me begin by saying that I am happy to attend this meeting in the beautiful city of Bali in the friendly Republic of Indonesia. I would like to express my sincere gratitude to the Government of the Republic of Indonesia, for the very warm welcome and gracious hospitality accorded to me and my delegation. I would like to commend my Indonesian colleagues and friends for the excellent arrangements for our meetings here. Let me also place on record our deep appreciation to Cambodia for steering our Dialogue Partnership with the ASEAN with dedication and determination in their present role as our Country Coordinator. We look forward to effective support from the Country Coordinators as we prepare for ASEAN-India to commemorate their 20 years of dialogue relations and 10 years of Summit Partnership.

2. India and ASEAN have had a committed dialogue partnership since 1992. ASEAN has been central in India's Look East Policy.

3. As India and ASEAN prepare to hold the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit in 2012, we look to elevating our dialogue partnership to a “strategic partnership”. India and ASEAN must upgrade and strengthen their engagement in the face of the new security and economic architecture being envisaged.

4. Our countries are today facing increasing challenges from transnational non-traditional security threats. Countering international terrorism, combating drug trafficking, piracy, natural disasters and pandemics, strengthening energy security and environmental protection, arresting climate change, improving infrastructural development and meeting our requirements for education, health care, human resource development are all key areas for our common endeavour to ensure sustained economic growth in our region.
5. I look forward to good progress in the ASEAN-India Economic Ministers meeting in Manado in August 2011 and the Energy Ministers meet in September 2011 in Brunei. We have received an invitation to the ASEAN Inter-Parliamentary Assembly meeting to be held in September 2011 in Phnom Penh. There is a proposal for our Agriculture Ministers to meet in October 2011. We are looking at hosting the ASEAN-India Trade Ministers meet next year. We, perhaps, need to suggest that our Education Ministers Meet as well. Attention to human resource capacity building will help us to build a durable foundation for the future ASEAN-India strategic partnership.

6. The first meeting of the ASEAN-India Eminent Persons Group will take place on August 2-3, 2011 in Phnom Penh and I hope this select group will provide useful suggestions for the future vision for ASEAN-India relations.

7. When we meet again at the Summit level in Bali in November this year, we will present details relating to the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit to be held in December 2012. We have welcomed the suggestion for a Car Rally to highlight the geographic connectivity between our countries. I propose that, unlike the car rally in 2004, this time the car rally begin from ASEAN countries into India and culminate at Kolkatta. We will be proposing “marker” events in each ASEAN country along the route for the car rally and I would request my colleagues here to lend support to these events by their presence and the involvement of the Indian and ASEAN Ambassadors.

8. We would be sharing with you, in the coming weeks, details of a sailing ship expedition in 2012, involving onshore events at each port of call. We have begun consultations towards the Regional Air Services Arrangement to strengthen connectivity by air between India and ASEAN countries.

9. We should also, in the run-up to the ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit of 2012, encourage greater connectivity between our people. We need connectivity more than ever before between our younger generations, the entrepreneurs, IT experts, scientists, diplomats, media, students, etc. We could also use virtual networks to enhance connectivity. We, therefore, envisage a year-long celebration of the commonalities and complementarities, our civilisational heritage and its current manifestations in ASEAN countries and India through an India-ASEAN Festival in 2012. We are also looking at translating literary works and books from the ASEAN region into Indian languages and Indian literary works of excellence into the languages of the ASEAN member states.

10. I look forward to an exchange of views with you as we define the celebration of two decades of partnership between ASEAN and India.

Thank you.
066. Information provided to Lok Sabha on the Look East Policy of the Ministry of External Affairs.

New Delhi, August 10, 2011.

There has been steady progress in India’s ties with countries of East Asia as well as in the India-ASEAN relationship through the years. India became a Sectoral Dialogue Partner of ASEAN in 1992. The relationship was upgraded within ten years in 2002 to the level of an Annual Summit Level Dialogue Partnership. Trade between India and ASEAN countries has now reached US$ 55.21 billion as compared to US$ 7.84 billion in 2001-2002. India is today ASEAN’s sixth largest trading partner and eighth largest investor. The Framework Agreement for Comprehensive Economic Cooperation signed in 2003 is at the heart of India’s economic engagement with ASEAN countries. An Agreement on Trade-in-Goods has been concluded after negotiations over six years. India and ASEAN are also intensifying cooperation in diverse sectors, including science & technology, tourism, transport & infrastructure, information & communication technology, space technologies, agriculture, energy etc. India is pursuing extensive engagements with countries of North East Asia with whom also our trade and investment ties are increasing rapidly. There are regular high level exchanges between countries in East Asia and India, including Ministerial/Summit level events.

The Government of India has built the 160 km (approx) India-Myanmar Friendship Road between Tamu-Kalewa-Kalaymo (TKK road) in Myanmar which connects Myanmar to Moreh in Manipur. This will eventually become part of the India-ASEAN Highway. India and Myanmar are also in discussions to undertake various other road projects including the road from Zawkhathar (Mizoram)/Rhi into Myanmar. These roads, besides providing a valuable cross border link between India and Myanmar, enhance cross border trade, tourism and economic development of the areas on both sides of the border.

067. Media Briefing by Secretary (East) Sanjay Singh on Prime Minister’s visits to Bali for the India-ASEAN Summit and the East Asia Summit and to Singapore for a bilateral visit.

New Delhi, November 16, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good evening to all of you. Prime Minister of India Dr. Manmohan Singh would be leaving for Bali tomorrow to participate in the Ninth India-ASEAN Summit and the Sixth East Asia Summit. Thereafter the Prime Minister would be visiting Singapore to pay a bilateral visit.

Secretary (East) (Shri Sanjay Singh): Good afternoon.

Prime Minister would be embarking on a visit on November 17th to attend the Ninth ASEAN-India Summit and the Sixth East Asia Summit in Bali, Indonesia. The visit to Bali would be followed by an official visit to the Republic of Singapore from November 19th to 20th.

National Security Advisor, Principal Secretary to Prime Minister, and Secretary (East) MEA would be accompanying the Prime Minister.

The Ninth ASEAN-India Summit to be held on the 19th of November would take stock of ASEAN-India relations which have witnessed a rapid period of growth in the past 20 years, from the time that India became a sectoral dialogue partner in 1992, a full dialogue partner in 1996 and a Summit level partner in 2002. There is a mutuality of interest in the ASEAN-India relationship. The key drivers are partnership, capacity-building, dialogue and connectivity at the civilisational, cultural, geographic and institutional levels and addressing common challenges. The pace and scope of progress has been facilitated by a Plan of Action that ASEAN and India have agreed to periodically. In recent months, we have sought to intensify our collaboration and a number of projects have been suggested to ASEAN member states through the ASEAN Secretariat.

India would be hosting a special ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit in India next year. We are in the process of planning a number of events as part of the celebrations next year including the Delhi Dialogue-IV in February 2012, a Car Rally from Indonesia to India in November-December 2012, a Sail Training Ship Expedition along the monsoon trade winds route from September 2012 to May 2013, and an intensive year-long calendar of cultural activities.

The Trade-in-Goods Agreement between India and ASEAN is now fully functional. We are continuing efforts to conclude the Services-and-Investment Agreements which will complement the Trade-in-Goods Agreement. The Ninth ASEAN Economic Ministers-India Consultations were held on August 13, 2011 in Manado, Indonesia. The total trade between India and ASEAN increased by 30 per cent in 2010-11 reaching around US$ 58 billion. We expect that the trade target of US$ 70 billion by 2012, announced by Prime Minister at the 7th ASEAN-India Summit in Hua Hin, Thailand on October 24, 2009 would be realised. The 2nd ASEAN-India Business Fair is planned to be held in December 2012, together with the ASEAN-India Business Summit and ASEAN-India Business Council. We are looking at encouraging collaboration in the MSME sectors.

The 1st India-ASEAN Meeting on Agriculture was held on October 28, 2011 in Jakarta. We expect the ASEAN and Indian Agriculture Ministers to meet again in New Delhi in 2012. In addition to various project proposals under consideration in Agriculture, we are looking to publish a news letter “India-ASEAN News on Agriculture”. We are examining proposals for fellowships for higher agriculture education, exchange of young farmers, a meeting of Vice-Chancellors of Agricultural Universities, training programmes etc., in keeping with the ASEAN-India Plan of Action for 2010-15.

The 1st meeting of ASEAN-India Green Fund was held on October 19, 2011 in Phnom Penh, Cambodia. India has deposited US$ 5 million into the Fund. ASEAN and India also have an S&T Fund of US$ 1 million and multiple projects are under implementation, including an India-ASEAN S&T Digital Centre, a Technology Information Commercialisation Portal, a Virtual Institute for Intellectual Property etc. ASEAN and India are considering projects in information and technology, space cooperation, new and renewable energy, education etc. The Indian Minister of State for Petroleum and Natural Gas met his ASEAN colleagues at the East Asia Summit Energy Ministers Meeting in Brunei in September 2011, and this is expected to enhance cooperation in the energy sector. We are working towards finalization of an MoU on strengthening tourism cooperation. ASEAN and India have begun informal discussions on an ASEAN-India Regional Air Services Agreement. India offers 637 scholarships to ASEAN countries, bilaterally and multilaterally. We recently hosted a group of 100 students in September 2011. The Foreign Service Institute will be holding a special month-long training course for 50 ASEAN diplomats and three officials of the ASEAN Secretariat from November 16, 2011.
In terms of our people-to-people interaction, a very important segment is the ASEAN-India Media Exchange programme. The first and second media exchanges took place in January 2009 and January 2010, and a third such exchange occurred back-to-back with the Delhi Dialogue-III in March this year. We have proposed that under this programme, 40 ASEAN journalists visit India in two groups of 20 every year, and Indian journalists visit ASEAN States in five batches of eight for the next three years. I hope some of you would be able to avail of this opportunity. Under this programme we look forward to a group of 20 ASEAN journalists visiting India in February 2012 at the time of Delhi Dialogue IV.

An Indian Parliamentary delegation led by Member of Parliament Shri Ninong Ering (Arunachal Pradesh, Lok Sabha) participated as Observer in the 32nd General Assembly of the ASEAN Inter-Parliamentary Assembly (AIPA) held in September 2011 in Phnom Penh, Cambodia.

The Prime Minister would also participate in the 18-country Sixth East Asia Summit on the 19th of November which is being held against the backdrop of the increasing importance of Asia in geopolitics. The United States and Russia would be participating for the first time formally as members of this Leaders-led forum. The East Asia region comprises some of the more dynamic economies and emerging powers which lends great utility to a dialogue between its Leaders on strategic, political and economic issues of common interest and concern with the aim of promoting peace, stability and economic prosperity.

Leaders are expected to give direction to coordination of international effort on the five core areas of the EAS i.e. energy, education, finance, pandemics and disaster management as also connectivity and Comprehensive Economic Partnership for East Asia (CEPEA). We view ASEAN as the driving force in this process. We are also comfortable with the ASEAN way of progress at a pace comfortable to all. India has been consistent in endorsing the centrality of the ASEAN in the ongoing processes in the East Asia region.

The Leaders are expected to adopt a Declaration on Principles of Mutually Beneficial Relations, and another on ASEAN Connectivity, which includes appreciation of the Comprehensive Asia Development Plan (CADP). The CADP is based on studies by the Economic Research Institute for ASEAN and East Asia (ERIA) and is meant to create infrastructural-industrial connectivity between ASEAN and the greater East Asia region.

The Leaders would meet in a Plenary Session and also at a Retreat. They are expected to also discuss the future evolution of the East Asia Summit agenda. They would also discuss issues of regional and international interest during the Retreat session.
On the sidelines of these two Summits, Prime Minister would be holding a few bilateral meetings. These meetings are likely to focus on bilateral and EAS related issues.

Singapore:

Following the meetings in Bali, Prime Minister would leave for Singapore on the evening of November 19, 2011 on a two-day bilateral visit. Prime Minister last visited Singapore in November 2007 for the India-ASEAN and East-Asia Summits. The last bilateral visit by an Indian Prime Minister was by Prime Minister Vajpayee in 2002, and from the Singapore side by the present Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong in 2005.

Prime Minister’s visit aims to maintain the high-level dialogue with Singapore, our major partner in South-East Asia, and will provide an opportunity to exchange views on bilateral, regional and global developments. Our bilateral relations with Singapore, based on long-standing historical and cultural ties, are characterized by warmth and multifaceted cooperation. Singapore is an important partner in our Look East engagement. India values the key role played by Singapore in consolidation of our relations with other countries of South East Asia and with ASEAN. As pluralistic societies with market economies, the two countries share similar concerns about the challenges posed by terrorism and fundamentalism and have found it mutually beneficial to evolve a broad framework of defense and security cooperation. The two countries have recently decided to establish a Parliamentary Friendship Group in their respective Parliaments.

The Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement (CECA) that we signed with Singapore in 2005 was the first for India. It covers agreements on trade in goods, services, and investment. The Second Review of CECA was launched on 11th May, 2011 in New Delhi by Commerce and Industry Minister Shri Anand Sharma and Singapore’s Trade and Industry Minister Lim Kiang. It is expected to be completed by early 2012.

Singapore is India’s largest trade and investment partner from the ASEAN region and now accounts for a third of our overall trade with South East Asia. Our bilateral trade has increased from US $ 8.7 billion in 2005-06 to US$ 17.4 billion in 2010-11 making Singapore the fifth largest destination for India’s exports in 2010-11. Singapore is also the second largest investor in India, amounting to US$ 14.67 billion in cumulative FDI till July 2011. Indian investment in Singapore has also increased many folds and is around US$ 23 billion. There are more than 81 FIIIs from Singapore which are registered with the Securities and Exchange Board of India (SEBI). Combined with a positive enabling environment, strong air connectivity and the presence of a large Indian community, Singapore has emerged as the key offshore hub for Indian corporates. The Indian corporate presence in Singapore has also grown significantly and an estimated 3800 “Indian” companies have registered their presence there.

Singapore is also a preferred travel destination for many Indians and flight connectivity to Singapore is among the highest from India to any destination. Directly connected currently to 11 Indian cities, Singapore has perhaps the largest number of air connections to India. There are about 384 weekly direct scheduled flights which in 2010 carried approximately 2.55 million passengers.

Given the large and diverse Indian community in Singapore, around 9.2 per cent of Singapore’s population, Indian cultural activities receive considerable local support. Inter-governmental cooperation in culture is governed by a 1993 MoU for Cooperation in the fields of Arts, Archives and Heritage. This is buttressed by Executive Programmes that are agreed upon for specified periods and we signed one recently for the years 2011-14. Earlier in the year, the bust of Rabindranath Tagore was unveiled by the External Affairs Minister as a fitting tribute in the year when we are observing his 150th Birth Anniversary. Skills development, education, Infrastructure, Personnel Management and Public Administration are other areas of particular focus.

Prime Minister’s visit to Singapore will provide great impetus to an important bilateral relationship.

Thank you.

Question: Sir, talking of bilaterals, could you give us a sense of two important bilateral meetings Prime Minister Manmohan Singh will have with Chinese Premier as well as President Obama and also the issues likely to be on the agenda?

Secretary (East): Yes, there is to be a meeting between Prime Minister and Chinese Premier at Bali on the sidelines of the East Asia Summit. Prime Minister has been meeting with Chinese Premier regularly and has a good working relationship with him. I cannot predict what subjects will be discussed between the two leaders. In such meetings the conversation is free flowing and each leader can take up any subject he desires. Naturally we will brief the media at Bali after the meeting.

Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh and President Obama are to meet in Bali on the margins of the East Asia Summit on November 18th. This will be the first meeting since the visit of President Obama to India in November, 2010 although the two leaders have been in touch with each other on phone and through letters. Over the past year, the two sides have maintained a high level of engagement and have expanded strategic consultations in a substantive manner, and there has been significant progress across a broad spectrum of bilateral agenda. The meeting between the two leaders will be an opportunity for them to review the progress on bilateral relations including with regard to the decisions and outcomes from the November 2010 summit. They will also discuss a wide range of regional and global issues of mutual interest including the Asia Pacific region, East Asia Summit, our immediate neighbourhood, and other areas of mutual interest.

Question: Sir, there are intelligence reports suggesting that Paresh Baruah, a key ULFA leader, is living in China, he sought shelter in Unan Province. Many reports have appeared to this effect. Have you taken up this matter with China?

Secretary (East): I would not like to talk about this particular report. I will let the Spokesman deal with it. Today’s meeting can be confined to the East Asia Summit and India-ASEAN relations.

Official Spokesperson: The presence of Indian insurgent groups in the region and availability of arms to them, has figured in our discussions with our Chinese friends in the past. We also have seen these reports that have appeared in the Indian media in the last few days. We do not, however, have any credible information at our disposal at the moment to comment on it in any manner.

Question: Just a follow-up very quickly on that point. The general point about Chinese arms flowing to insurgent groups in India is a broader issue. Is that something which will continuously be raised in the India-China dialogue?

Official Spokesperson: I said that the presence of the Indian insurgent groups in the region and availability of arms is something that has figured in our discussions with our Chinese friends in the past.

Question: Can you tell us the status of progress in India-ASEAN FTA talks?

Secretary (East): We have been having regularly India-ASEAN discussion on taking the India-ASEAN trade in goods and enhancing it to investments and services also. This is in progress and we hope that we should be able to reach a successful conclusion.

Question: During this Summit?

Secretary (East): There will be no negotiations during the Summit on this particular issue. As you know, there are groups of negotiators on both sides which meet and take this forward.
Question: Secretary, can you give us a sense of how you see this description of this word Indo-Pacific which is being used now, and what is the kind of role India sees in it?

Secretary (East): I think this is a word that has no clear definition at the moment. If it means a region which takes us from India all the way to Pacific, this is a region where we have very strong relationship with the countries of the region, and we wish to strengthen our relationship bilaterally and the region as a whole.

Question: Secretary, the Philippines has suggested in ASEAN that it wants a dialogue at the East Asia Summit on the South China Sea. This happens even as we are preparing to go there. So, what is the take on this issue as the Prime Minister is heading there?

Secretary (East): A number of issues of interest to the region will be discussed in East Asia Summit. I do not want to speculate on what will be discussed and how and the form that they will take. We will brief you as and when they take place.

Official Spokesperson: I take it there are no more questions.

Thank you very much.
068. Statement by Prime Minister Dr, Manmohan Singh prior to his departure for Bali for the India-ASEAN Summit and the East Asia Summit and to Singapore for a bilateral visit.

New Delhi, November 17, 2011.

I am leaving today on a tour of South East Asia during which I will visit Indonesia and Singapore.

I will attend the 9th India-ASEAN Summit and the 6th East Asia Summit in Bali, Indonesia.

Partnership with ASEAN is an essential component of our “Look East” policy. The level of our engagement with the ASEAN as a group and with individual ASEAN Member States has gone up qualitatively in the last few years. This is reflected in the areas of trade and investment, capacity-building, connectivity, people-to-people and institutional linkages. We have agreed upon an ambitious India-ASEAN Plan of Action for 2010-2015. I will review the implementation of the Plan of Action with the ASEAN Leaders.

Next year, we will host the India-ASEAN Summit for the first time to commemorate 20 years of our dialogue partnership with ASEAN. I will have the opportunity to share our ideas for the Commemorative Summit with ASEAN Leaders in Bali.

The East Asia Summit is the principal forum to devise an open and inclusive architecture of regional cooperation in the Asia-Pacific region. This year’s Summit will see the formal entry into the East Asia Summit process of the United States and Russia. As a founding member, India is part of several initiatives taken by the East Asia Summit to create an economic community in the region such as the Comprehensive Economic Partnership in East Asia (CEPEA).

Increasingly, political and security issues are becoming part of the East Asia Summit agenda. There are concerns among the countries of the region over issues relating to disaster management, maritime security, terrorism and other non-traditional threats to security. I look forward to an open, frank and productive discussion on all these issues.

On the margins of the India-ASEAN and East Asia Summits, I will have the opportunity to meet other world leaders, including the President of Indonesia who is hosting the Summit, the President of the USA, Premier of the State Council of China and the Prime Minister of Cambodia.
I attach great importance to my first bilateral visit to Singapore as Prime Minister. Singapore is a key partner for us in the region. India’s “Look East” policy started with our engagement with Singapore, and that country has been among the strongest advocates of greater cooperation between South East Asia and India.

Singapore is our largest trading partner in ASEAN, and the second largest investor in India. It was the first country with which we signed a Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement in 2005. Currently we are in the process of a second review of this Agreement to make it work better for both of us. There is a large and vibrant Indian community in Singapore, including several Indian companies and students. I look forward to holding wide-ranging discussions with Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong and other distinguished leaders of Singapore on deepening our economic, trade, cultural and people-to-people relations. I particularly look forward to unveiling a Marker and Bust of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru in Singapore.

069.  Media briefing by Secretary (East) Sanjay Singh on Prime Minister’s engagements in Bali.

New Delhi, November 18, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good afternoon and welcome. Really appreciate your patience, and sorry to keep you waiting. You know that Prime Minister has had a number of bilateral interactions, and Secretary would like to brief you about these interactions...........

Secretary (East) (Shri Sanjay Singh): I apologize for keeping you away from lunch.

In the morning, Prime Minister had a warm and friendly meeting with President Obama lasting over an hour. As you know, this meeting took place after a year after President Obama’s visit to India in November 2010 which he described in his words as extraordinary. He also mentioned that we have continued to strengthen our bonds, commercial, security and strategic, as between the two democracies. He said that there is a great amount of progress on all the issues and that he expressed the hope that we would work together bilaterally, regionally and in the multilateral fora specifying the East Asia Summit where he identified issues such as maritime security, humanitarian assistance and disaster relief.

Prime Minister recalled President Obama’s historic visit to our country, that we have made progress in every direction since the visit, in innovation, economy, investment, higher education, clean energy, strategy and defence. He underlined that that there are no irritants in working together bilaterally, on regional matters, and globally. We have strengthened in many ways the paths set out during the visit whether in civil nuclear cooperation, humanitarian assistance and disaster relief, maritime issues, on which we can cooperate and engage. We have a strategic dialogue that covers a number of areas. He expressed that we welcome US to the East Asia Summit.

He also emphasized that we envisage that EAS should respect the centrality of ASEAN countries, and it should be ASEAN-led. He said that we look toward greater integration of the region and we wish to participate in the new architecture that is being developed. Both called for greater cooperation in trade and investment and for its facilitation.

Prime Minister referred to the recommendations of the CEO Forum which has been set up between India and the United States as being very useful. He invited US companies to invest in the opportunities being created by the infrastructural expansion in India in which over one trillion dollars will be invested in the next five years. He spoke of the Indian growth story of 8.5 per cent over the last five years, the prospects for the future based on our high savings rate of 35 per cent and investment rate of 37 per cent. He underlined our Government’s desire for inclusive growth and for participation of every Indian in it and for every Indian to have a share in it. The two leaders also discussed regional developments among other things.

Prime Minister also met thereafter Premier Wen Jiabao. It was a very good meeting covering a range of bilateral, regional and international issues; and that lasted 55 minutes. They recalled Premier Wen’s landmark visit to India in December 2010. Premier Wen also recalled Prime Minister’s observation that there was enough space in the world to accommodate the developmental aspirations of both India and China. Premier Wen added that there were enough areas where India and China could enhance mutually beneficial cooperation. He termed 21st century as an Asian century beckoning India and China to work hand in hand to promote economic development and growth.

Both of them recognized our robust trade, economic and business ties constituted the core of our bilateral relationship. They expressed happiness that trade had crossed US$ 60 billion in 2010, and was likely to touch US$ 70 billion this year, and was expected to attain US$ 100 billion target by 2015. Prime Minister welcomed greater Chinese economic engagement with India and mentioned that China was among India’s partners which were executing a large number of projects in India. Prime Minister also underlined the need for balanced trade to create a more conducive environment pertaining to the realisation of the considerably untapped economic potential.

Premier Wen and Prime Minister welcomed the holding of the first Strategic Economic Dialogue between Indian and China in Beijing last September led by Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission from our side, who had been received by Premier Wen. They called for greater people-to-people contacts as well as a continued and closer dialogue on regional and international issues. Premier Wen recalled with considerable warmth his interaction with the Indian youth delegation which had visited China earlier this year. The two also noted the convergence of views on a number of global issues such as climate change.

Premier Wen valued India’s role at EAS and spoke for closer coordination between the two sides. He also welcomed India’s interest to enhance cooperation with the SCO. They also exchanged views on global economic situation agreeing to keep in touch on a regular basis. Both sides expressed satisfaction that the relationship based on mutual respect and equality was on a firm footing and that was in the interest of both countries.

Foreign Minister Yang, and NSA and Principal Secretary were present. In the meeting in the morning with President Obama, Secretary of State Clinton was present.
The third meeting that Prime Minister had was with Prime Minister Hun Sen who, as you know, visited India in 2007. They discussed our bilateral cooperation. As you know, India has assisted in setting up Entrepreneurship Development Centre; it is helping with water resources management, information technology, English language training, etc. Prime Minister especially thanked Cambodia which has been the ASEAN coordinator for India and would be continuing with this work leading up to the commemorative year next year, which would mark the 20th anniversary of our dialogue partnership with ASEAN and the Tenth anniversary of our summit level partnership with ASEAN. They also discussed the programme for the commemorative year.

Prime Minister Hun Sen expressed that he was grateful for India’s assistance in various areas including in the renovation of the Ta Prohm temple. Prime Minister assured him of continued cooperation and assistance. Another issue which came up was possibility of direct flight connectivity between the two countries and promotion of tourism.

Thank you.

Question: How long was the Prime Minister’s meeting with Premier Wen?

Secretary (East): Fifty five minutes.

Question: The Prime Minister told us after his meeting with President Obama about what he conveyed on the issue of nuclear liability. I just wanted to know what the President had to say and how he reacted to the liability rules and if anything in particular was said by the US side. And in the meeting with China, given the backdrop of what is happening in the South China Sea and some of the statements we have seen on troop deployment on the border, was any of that discussed between the two leaders?

Secretary (East): I think I cannot add anything more to what Prime Minister told you directly on the concerns on the nuclear liability law etc. I will leave it at that.

On the South China Sea, this matter did come up in the context of the East Asia Summit.

Question: With Wen?

Secretary (East): Yes. And Prime Minister observed that exploration of oil and gas in the South China Sea by India was purely a commercial activity, and that the issues of sovereignty should be resolved according to international law and practice.

Question: Sir, there was a demand from the Americans that Indian nuclear liability law should be vetted by the IAEA. Is it their stand still? Secondly, the Prime Minister’s statement says that India has done within the four corners of the law of the land. Is there anything that India specifically can do to close the deal with supplier liability?

Secretary (East): I would not like to add to what the Prime Minister has clearly expressed as his view.

Question: Sir, was there any issue of Iran that was raised in the meeting between Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh and President Obama?

Secretary (East): Yes, there was an exchange of views in the context of the recent IAEA report.

Question: With whom? Both leaders or only with President Obama?

Secretary (East): President Obama.

Question: And, what was said?

Secretary (East): Prime Minister reiterated the view that the matter needs to be dealt with diplomatically.

Question: What issues did the American side raise?

Secretary (East): There was a general exchange of views on this ... a passing reference to the IAEA report and Prime Minister reiterated India’s stand on it.

Question: Only that! What were all the issues that were raised?

Secretary (East): On the regional issues they discussed developments in Afghanistan. Prime Minister briefed him on our relations with the country and his interactions with President Karzai who had visited India recently. And President Obama apprised Prime Minister of his appreciation for the developments taking place there.

Question: Mr. Secretary, in the context of the talks with Premier Wen you said that the South China Sea issue came up. Was it for a proposal to discuss the South China Sea in the summit, and what has India said?

Secretary (East): I will repeat that the matter did come up in the context of the EAS and Prime Minister observed that Indian exploration of oil and gas in the South China Sea was purely a commercial activity and that issues of sovereignty should be resolved according to international law and practice.

Question: The Chinese side raised it or we raised it?

Official Spokesperson: As the Secretary has mentioned, they spoke about the East Asia Summit, they spoke about the desirability of keeping in touch, talking to each other on the East Asia Summit. Premier Wen appreciated, in fact what Secretary has said exactly is, Premier Wen said that he valued the role that India is playing in the EAS. And in that context there was a mention about the South China Sea, to which Prime Minister said that our interests were purely commercial. And the rest you have heard from the Secretary.

Question: “I explained to him that we have a law in place and rules have been formulated. These will lie in Parliament for thirty days.” This is what the Prime Minister has said. “Lie in Parliament for thirty days”, there is a lot of confusion on that statement. Could you clarify what the Prime Minister has said?

Secretary (East): I am not an expert on this. So, I would not like to clarify on what the Prime Minister has said.

Question: Mr. Secretary, you mentioned that in the meeting with Premier Wen Jiabao, the issue of the economy was raised …(Inaudible)… was this issue also discussed in the meeting with President Obama earlier on the …(Inaudible)… the next summit? Can you just share …(Inaudible)…

Secretary (East): As you know, both of them had been at Cannes for the G20 Summit and they exchanged views on the present state of the global economy, the developments in Europe and in the Euro zone, and the need for concerted global action to deal with the challenges that arise.

Question: The basic question is the response of the US President to Indian Prime Minister’s statement that everything has been sorted out in the framework of the sitting law on the nuclear liability.

Official Spokesperson: Mr. Chandra, can I interject? Same question, same answer.

Question: I think you should say something, something should come out.

Official Spokesperson: All right.

Question: Did Pakistan come up during the meeting with President Obama and what was discussed?

Secretary (East): Yes, Prime Minister mentioned about his meeting with Prime Minister Gilani at the SAARC Summit and the details of it, and the steps being taken by the two countries.

Question: Mr. Secretary, there have been reports in the Chinese media. Did Premier Wen raise this issue of the military build up with the Prime Minister, were there any discussions on any of the outstanding issues as far as border talks are concerned?
Secretary (East): Nothing on the issue that you raised but both sides welcomed the resumption of defence exchanges. In the context of the boundary, they referred to the decision for the Joint mechanism which is to be set up and which was taken during Premier Wen’s visit last year. And they also noted with satisfaction that the boundary was peaceful and tranquil.

Question: Just an addition to the question on the angle that the Prime Minister talked about his meeting with Gilani. Did President Obama talk about their issues with Pakistan? Did he say anything about the US-Pakistan relationship?

Secretary (East): Prime Minister basically spoke about his meeting with Prime Minister Gilani.

Question: Mr. Secretary, during the meetings with President Obama and also Premier Wen, was the Prime Minister’s view on increasing US military ties with Australia …(Inaudible)… What is India’s view? Was India …(Inaudible)… increasing its partnership with ASEAN in …(Inaudible)…

Secretary (East): As I said right in the beginning, we look at ASEAN as central to the East Asia Summit process which should we feel be led by ASEAN. We have, as I mentioned, a long relationship with ASEAN and we would be commemorating the twentieth anniversary of our dialogue partnership next year, and the tenth anniversary of our summit level partnership which we will be commemorating in India.

Question: Was South China Sea referred to in the discussion between Prime Minister Singh and President Obama?

Secretary (East): As I said right in the beginning, they discussed cooperation in maritime issues.

Question: Mr. Secretary, did the question of American bases in Australia come up when Obama spoke to Prime Minister?

Secretary (East): No.

Question: In his meeting with Mr. Wen, did the Prime Minister raise the issue of Chinese activity in POK?

Official Spokesperson: That issue did not come up. What Secretary has mentioned is that both sides expressed satisfaction that the India-China Line of Control is peaceful and tranquil. They also welcomed the process of the SR talks and they spoke in that refrain.

Thank you very much. Have a good day!
It is a pleasure for me to be amongst friends today. The city of Bali epitomises the age old civilisational links between India and Indonesia, and indeed between India and South East Asia.

I thank you, Mr. President, for hosting the 9th ASEAN-India Summit, and for the excellent arrangements made for our meeting.

I would like to begin by expressing India’s solidarity with the people of Cambodia and Thailand as they deal with the floods that have badly effected their countries.

India is extremely pleased with the practice of annual Summits with ASEAN. Our partnership with ASEAN is one of the cornerstones of our foreign policy, and the foundation of our ‘Look East’ Policy.

In the relatively short span of our full dialogue partnership with ASEAN we have put in place a rich agenda of cooperation. This has benefited both of us and is contributing to the processes of integration and transformation of the Asia-Pacific region.

Since our last Summit in Hanoi, we have made concrete progress.

On the trade and economic front, the India-ASEAN Free Trade Agreement for Trade in Goods has come into effect in all ASEAN Member States and India following its ratification by Cambodia on 1st August, 2011.

India’s trade with ASEAN has increased by 30% in 2010-2011 and has crossed the 50 billion US dollar mark. With such a rate of growth we should be able to achieve our trade target of 70 billion US dollar by 2012.

The inaugural India-ASEAN Business Fair was held in New Delhi in March 2011 along with meetings of the India-ASEAN Business Summit and Business Council. Investments from both sides are steadily growing.

The 9th ASEAN-India Economic Ministers Consultations were held in August 2011 in Manado. The Ministers have agreed to a structured private sector engagement in the five areas of pharmaceuticals, innovation and skills training, information technology, manufacturing and infrastructure.

I seek your support for the early conclusion of a commercially meaningful Services and Investment Agreement. This would create a positive atmosphere for the implementation of the India-ASEAN Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement as envisaged in our Framework Agreement of 2003.
We should endorse the decision taken at the last round of negotiations in October 2011 to conclude the Agreement by March 2012.

The first ASEAN-India Meeting on Agriculture was held in October 2011, and the first meeting of the India-ASEAN Green Fund was held in Cambodia in October 2011.

At our Summit last year, we had called for developing a long-term vision for the strategic partnership between ASEAN and India.

We have taken the first step in this direction by constituting the ASEAN-India Eminent Persons Group. The Group has been tasked to draft a ASEAN-India Vision 2020 document and has already held two meetings in August 2011 and October 2011.

The successful implementation of the ASEAN-India Plan of Action for 2004-2010 listing specific items of cooperation was followed by an 82-point Plan of Action for the period 2010-2015. We adopted this ambitious Plan in the Hanoi Summit.

India has forwarded a number of cooperative projects as part of this Plan as well as part of the 50 million US dollar ASEAN-India Cooperation Fund to the ASEAN Secretariat. We look forward to an early response from the ASEAN side.

The expansion of our cooperation in the fields of science and technology, space and information technology has generated considerable enthusiasm on both sides. So too has our cooperation in the area of training, capacity building and human resource development in various sectors.

Several projects are under implementation under the ASEAN-India Science and Technology Fund. Based on the feedback from the ASEAN, our Department of Space has revised its proposal for a five year project for establishing a tracking and reception station and data processing facility for the ASEAN countries and training of ASEAN personnel. We will convene a meeting of Heads of Space Agencies of India and ASEAN in early 2012.

We have already offered to assist in the Master Plan on ASEAN ICT Connectivity and in particular on the establishment of an e-network in the CLMV countries for tele-medicine and tele-education.

Our experience with initiatives to promote people-to-people exchanges has been excellent.

I invite ASEAN countries to participate actively in the Nalanda University project on which work has begun.
The visa on arrival facility for six ASEAN countries is now in place. We should ensure that the Memorandum of Understanding on strengthening tourism cooperation between ASEAN and India is signed at the earliest, preferably at the meeting of the ASEAN-India Tourism Ministers planned to be held in Indonesia in early 2012.

India hosted a group of 100 students from ASEAN countries in September 2011. Based on the positive feedback, we will increase this number to 250 students per year.

We wish to institutionalize the ASEAN-India Media Exchange Programme for a period of three years. Under this India will be ready to host two groups of 20 ASEAN journalists each year and ASEAN countries could in turn consider hosting Indian journalists to ASEAN Member States.

Greater physical connectivity between India and ASEAN remains our strategic objective. There are several proposals under consideration with regard to land and sea connectivity. These include the India-Myanmar-Thailand Highway, its extension to Laos and Cambodia and the development of a new highway also linking Vietnam.

We also have a study on a Mekong-India Economic Corridor conducted by the Economic Research Institute for ASEAN and East Asia which proposes the linking of corridors in the peninsular, and possibly the north east regions of India with the East Asian region.

I would suggest that all these different proposals should be studied in an integrated manner by our officials so that we take considered decisions to optimize our resources and efforts.

India welcomes the growing cooperation with ASEAN on security issues, and our association with ASEAN led forums. These have focused on maritime security, counter-terrorism, training, exercises and disaster management.

Excellencies, it gives me great pleasure to extend a personal invitation to all of you to attend the special ASEAN-India Commemorative Summit in India. This will be a historic occasion for us. I wish to propose the dates of December 20th and 21st, 2012 for the Summit to be held in New Delhi.

India looks forward to working closely with Cambodia, as the incoming chair of ASEAN, and with all other Member States to prepare for this Summit. We would like the Summit to be the culmination of a year-long celebration of the India-ASEAN partnership.

The events we propose to hold in the run up to the Summit include the holding of the fourth round of the Delhi Dialogue in February 2012 and meetings of the ASEAN-India Ministers for New and Renewable Energy and Agriculture as well as an India-ASEAN Business Fair. We also propose a year-long calendar of cultural activities.

We look forward to organizing the ASEAN-India Car Rally to mark the Summit. The Rally will serve to highlight the strong bonds between ASEAN and India, and spread the message of solidarity, enterprise and creativity which are the hallmarks of our region.

We also propose to send a Sail Training Ship “Sudarshini” on an expedition to ASEAN countries along the route of the monsoon trade winds.

Excellencies, I believe that our cooperation is on the right path. Given the global economic downturn, there is today an even greater urgency to our cooperation.

I wish to place on record my deep appreciation to Prime Minister Hun Sen of Cambodia for the role that Cambodia has played as Country Coordinator for India.

I also wish to once again thank His Excellency President Yudhoyono for the warm welcome and gracious hospitality extended to India for this Summit. I thank you.

Your Excellency Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono,

President of the Republic of Indonesia,

Excellencies,

I thank President Yudhoyono for his very warm hospitality and excellent arrangements made for this Summit meeting in Bali.

I would like to congratulate the United States of America and the Russian Federation on their formal entry into the East Asia Summit process this year. Their presence will enrich our discussions, and reflects the growing significance of East Asia in global affairs.

India endorses the draft Declaration of the Summit on the Principles for Mutually Beneficial Relations, and the Declaration on ASEAN Connectivity.

Mr. Chairman, Excellencies,

India fully subscribes to the view that the East Asia Summit process must be centred on the ASEAN, and ASEAN should be its driving force. We must move at a pace and in the direction with which the ASEAN countries are comfortable, and which responds to their concerns and priorities.

The East Asia Summit is the forum for building an open, inclusive and transparent architecture of regional cooperation in the Asia-Pacific region. In a relatively short period it has taken several initiatives to promote trade, economic integration and connectivity. It has facilitated collective responses to challenges such as natural disasters, pandemics, climate change and energy security.

The global economic situation is showing several signs of stress. However, the emerging market countries in Asia are growing well and are in fact contributing to the recovery of the world economy.

I am happy to say that India is a part of this process. We have grown at an average of 8.4 percent in the past five years. Like other countries we too have slowed down in 2011, but we still expect to grow around 7.5 percent. However, none of us can prosper in isolation to the rest of the world. The most serious fault line at present is what is happening in Eurozone.

We all have a stake in an early resolution of the Eurozone crisis and I hope we can send a message of solidarity to Europe.
Against the global economic background that we are in, it is all the more important that we give full play to flows of trade, investment, services and ideas among ourselves. Howsoever complex the task, we should persevere with the project of East Asian economic integration and in our efforts towards a Comprehensive Economic Partnership in East Asia or CEPEA. India is working actively to integrate with this region. We are in the process of finalising a Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement with ASEAN.

We have concluded similar agreements with the Republic of Korea, Malaysia and Japan. An agreement is already in place with Singapore. We have commenced negotiations for a Comprehensive Economic Cooperation Agreement with Indonesia, Australia and New Zealand.

Several useful reports and studies by the Economic Research Institute for ASEAN and East Asia have been produced and contain proposals which can be taken forward. These include a Comprehensive Asian Development Plan to enhance connectivity in the region.

The channelling of investible surpluses from Asia and the rest of the world into some of these projects will have a direct impact on the real economy of the region and on job creation, and will also stimulate global growth.

Mr. Chairman, Excellencies,

Rapid economic growth is the most enduring strategy to overcome the global economic slowdown. We should keep our focus on the development agenda, make sure our growth is environmentally sustainable, find new and renewable technologies to fuel our growth and invest in education and skill development. The East Asia Summit is ideally equipped to pursue such an agenda.

I wish to inform this Summit that following the adoption of a Statement on the establishment of the Nalanda University in India by the East Asia Summit in Thailand in 2009 work on the University is in progress.

Political and security issues have increasingly become a part of the discourse in the region, whether in the ASEAN Regional Forum or the ASEAN Defence Ministers Meeting Plus Eight. We believe that while respecting differences and ensuring synergy between different forums, the East Asia Summit provides an opportunity to discuss all issues. It can contribute to enhancing mutual understanding and promoting peace, stability and security.

There are common challenges we face that cut across national boundaries such as terrorism, prevention and response to natural disasters, piracy, protecting sea lanes of communication and drug trafficking. We welcome the opportunity to discuss these issues in the East Asia Summit.
India would be happy to share its expertise in the areas of disaster management and maritime security. Specifically, we propose to host next year a EAS Workshop on disaster management and relief in the case of an occurrence of an earthquake. We are already working with several countries in combating piracy.

The East Asia Summit process is still work in progress but I believe we are on the right track. India is committed to the success of this process. The resurgence of Asia is dependent on the evolution of a cooperative architecture in which all countries are equal participants. We will work with all other countries towards this end.

I thank you.

ASEM

073. Intervention by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna on Afghan situation at ASEM Foreign Ministers meeting.

Godollo (Hungary), June 6, 2011.

Madam Chairperson,

Thank you for giving me the floor to speak on Afghanistan.

Before I do that, may I also thank Hungary, our most gracious hosts for their hospitality and excellent arrangements for the meeting of ASEM Foreign Ministers.

Madam Chairperson,

The situation in Afghanistan has a particular impact on the countries of the region such as ours. Past experience has shown, however, that no country, however distant, can stay immune from the challenge posed by terrorist groups and the safe havens that they enjoy. It is imperative for the international community to underline its long-term commitment to Afghanistan, as well as the importance of safeguarding the gains made in areas such as democracy and human rights.

The Kabul Conference Communiqué rightly notes the importance of ensuring that terrorists are denied sanctuaries. Continued existence of such sanctuaries beyond Afghanistan's borders is a major impediment to restoration of peace and stability in Afghanistan.

India has attempted to help Afghanistan in its reconstruction efforts as a means to bringing about stability in that country. During our Prime Minister's visit to Afghanistan in May 2011, India announced additional assistance of US $ 500 million, over and above our existing commitments which are almost 1.5 billion US Dollars. India's assistance projects are spread across Afghanistan and span almost the entire gamut of economic and social developmental activities. India's assistance programme - which is Afghan owned and led - places particular emphasis on capacity building and human resource development, areas which are particularly important as the process of transition unfolds in Afghanistan.

Our vision is for Afghanistan to be a stable and peaceful economic hub linking Central and South Asia through a network of trade, transit and pipelines, for the ultimate benefit of all the countries and peoples in the region. We do not see assistance to Afghanistan’s development and reconstruction as a zero sum game. Despite persistent attacks, India has reiterated its determination to fulfill its commitments to the Afghan people and Government as they build a peaceful, democratic and pluralistic Afghanistan.

For peace and stability to be restored in Afghanistan, it is essential that renewed efforts are made to sufficiently enhance the capacity of Afghanistan's own institutions, including the Afghan National Security Forces. This is a necessary prerequisite to achieving the ultimate goal of handing over responsibility to the Afghan side without sacrificing the gains made over the past few years. The importance of dealing with the terrorist sanctuaries and safe havens also becomes important in this context.

As our Prime Minister stated during his visit to Afghanistan, we fully respect the decisions of the Government and people of Afghanistan and recognize the need for a political process which is Afghan-led, inclusive, transparent, and adheres to the 'red-lines' which the Afghan Government and the international community have agreed to. These red lines for reintegration are crucial in the common endeavour of our countries to prevent Afghanistan sliding back to becoming a safe haven for terrorist and extremist groups.

I thank you all.
074. Remarks by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at Opening Ceremony of ASEM Foreign Ministers meeting.

Godollo (Hungary), June 6, 2011

I am delighted to be here at Godollo to participate in the ASEM Ministerial meet. ASEM has emerged as an important partnership forum for Asian and European countries, to consult and coordinate positions, on a vast array of subjects of common interest and concern. I look forward to meaningful and constructive discussions with my counterparts, over the next two days. I would also like to take this opportunity to thank our gracious Hungarian hosts, for making immaculate arrangements for the Forum.

It may be recalled that Asia - Europe partnership forum or ASEM was constituted in 1996, with the first Summit meeting at Bangkok. Since then ASEM has become an important forum of 46 Asian and European countries, in addition to two international organisations viz ASEAN and EU, for exchanging views on a array of subjects, seen as the three pillars of ASEM cooperation - i.e. political and security, economic and socio-cultural cooperation. India has been participating in ASEM Meetings since 2007. Prime Minister of India Dr. Manmohan Singh participated in the 7th ASEM Summit, for the first time, at Beijing in Oct 2008. Summit and Ministerial meetings are held on biennial basis. India was represented by Vice President Mr. Hamid Ansari, at the 8th ASEM Summit in Brussels in October last year. The next Summit will take place in Vientiane (Lao PDR) in October 2012. ASEM countries represent over half of the global population and account for more than half of the global GDP. India’s participation at the event underscores India’s commitment to play a constructive and proactive role, in further strengthening this vital inter-regional forum.
Non-traditional security threats such as terrorism, piracy, illegal drug and arms trafficking, threat of terrorists gaining access to WMDs pose serious challenges to peace and security not only in Asia and Europe but also globally. These challenges can only be addressed through collective effort by the international community. We believe that different multi-lateral processes, including various regional forums dealing with these issues, such as, the ARF and ADMM-Plus, should consolidate international efforts to address these threats.

Terrorism is a truly trans-national menace. Recruiting, planning, financing and training for terror operations can all be done outside the borders of the country which is attacked. Sanctuaries for terror infrastructure outside of our national borders are a continuing concern. Political expediency, short-term gains, geopolitical considerations, faulty analyses, etc. blur clarity on how to address the menace of international terrorism. All terror is unacceptable and has to be tackled comprehensively. A selective approach will not work. Over the past couple of years, we have seen greater understanding amongst the members of the international community that segmented approaches to the problem of terrorism have not worked; nor has the approach of differentiating between lesser and greater evils in this context.

There has to be an international collaboration in the sharing of information, countering the financing of terrorism, building capacity in our anti-terror mechanisms, exchange of best practices and strengthening our mutual legal assistance and extradition regimes. We piloted the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism at the UN because we were convinced that existing sectoral conventions left wide gaps in the global anti-terror legal framework. We urge early adoption of this overdue Convention. India is party to all the existing international Conventions on Terrorism. In 2010, we became members of the Financial Action Task Force, the world’s premier inter-governmental organisation to monitor standards in anti-money laundering and counter-financing of terrorism. We co-chair the Asia Pacific Group, a FATF styled regional body, for the period 2010-2012 and will be hosting its plenary in Kochi in July 2011. We are fully committed to implementing the UN Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy of 2006. We are happy to have assumed chairmanship of the UN Counter-Terrorism Committee (also known as the 1373 Committee) in January 2011.
India has deep concerns about the nexus between fundamentalism, terrorism and weapons of mass destruction.

Madam Chairperson,

The maritime security environment in the Indian Ocean region continues to be fragile. Non-state threats to maritime security are also on the rise from piracy, smuggling, international terrorism, transnational crimes, drug-trafficking, maritime security and proliferation of sensitive items.

Maritime security is an issue of significant relevance to the growing economies of Asia Pacific Region. The economic growth of the region remains critically dependent on oceanic connectivity and stable maritime environment. It is a fundamental factor in ensuring the welfare and economic security of the region.

Maritime security can be enhanced by transparency, dialogue and cooperation to augment confidence for coordinated response to non-traditional maritime security threats. While addressing the threats posed by non-state actors is important, states themselves must abide by "rules of the road."

Cooperation on maritime security issues could provide the necessary trust and confidence to build a flexible and adaptable Pan Oceanic Security Order for protection of maritime commons.

On the specific challenge posed by Piracy, we feel that it not only threatens the safety and security of maritime trade, but has also brought about much suffering to seafarers and their families.

India is committed to international efforts against piracy. As a founder member of the Contact Group on Piracy, we have contributed to its efforts to counter piracy. Our naval ships deployed in the Gulf of Aden since October 2008 have successfully thwarted several piracy attempts and provided security escort to Indian and foreign merchant ships. Indian naval forces have also stepped up their vigil against pirates near our coast. They have apprehended several pirates and rescued hostages being held by them.

It, however, remains a matter of serious concern for us that more than 550 hostages, including 46 Indian nationals, continue to languish in the custody of the pirates. It is important to have greater cooperation among governments for ensuring the safety and early release of the hostages.

India also supports greater involvement of the UN in coordinating international efforts to enhance global anti-piracy efforts. In this regard, India played an important role in the framing and adoption of UN Security Council Resolution 1976 (this year), particularly to include references expressing serious concern at the inhuman conditions that hostages faced in captivity, the adverse impact on their families and calling for the immediate release of all hostages as well as noting the importance of cooperation between member States on the issue of hostage taking.

Madam Chairperson, I thank all of you for allowing me to take the floor.

076. Statement by Minister of State E. Ahamed at the 10th Asia Cooperation Dialogue (ACD) Ministerial Meeting.

Kuwait, October 10, 2011.

Mr. Chairman, Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

At the outset, I would like to express my deep appreciation to the Amir of the State of Kuwait, His Highness Sheikh Sabah Al-Ahmad Al-Jaber Al-Sabah, and to His Excellency Sheikh Dr. Mohammed Sabah Al-Salem Al-Sabah, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs for the warm hospitality accorded to me and my delegation and the excellent arrangements for holding this very important conference in the dynamic city of Kuwait.

India congratulates the State of Kuwait for assuming the Chair of ACD and also compliments the Islamic Republic of Iran for the dynamic stewardship provided during its Chairmanship.

Excellencies,

India has been relatively better placed in terms of the impact of the global financial crisis on account of three factors: the inherent strength of its economy, the strength of our domestic consumption and the government’s effective action in terms of fiscal stimulus, growth packages and monetary policies. India was, thus, able to achieve a growth rate of 8.6% in 2010-11.

As we look to secure our economies, India would suggest that the ACD focus on energy and food security. We have amongst us here the world’s most important energy producers and consumers. We must have a bearing on the global discourse on these issues, particularly since both energy and food security are fundamental to our efforts at sustained economic development. The steep rise in fuel and food prices, volatility in commodity prices and extreme climatic occurrences threaten various development schemes. ACD can be a useful forum to develop cooperative mechanisms to address such issues.
We must also encourage higher investment in agriculture and use of better technologies to meet the nutrition needs of people.

Mr. Chairman and Excellencies,

Regarding the second session on investment opportunities and making use of natural resources, allow me to say that the ACD member countries together constitute the biggest aggregate of natural resources in the world. Many of us have strong bilateral relationships for optimum use of our respective natural resources. However, there are many ACD members who require our assistance in terms of technology and know how. We need to cooperate further in this regard.

We should recourse to joint ventures in greater numbers to sustain long term engagement. I would like to mention here Indian private sector’s contribution to the economic growth in many of the SAARC, ASEAN, and GCC countries in Asia.

Excellencies,

India is committed to the early functioning of the Nalanda University project. We have already received excellent cooperation from some ACD countries. I would like to welcome others to articulate their support. We would suggest that ACD countries look to granting recognition to Nalanda’s degrees as a signal of support to this historical icon of Asian renaissance.

Excellencies,

The linkage between technology, transport and environment is becoming increasingly relevant. I hope that this session will encourage interested ACD countries to come together for the development of competencies and capacities.

India has been a strong supporter of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change and its Kyoto Protocol. The global effort must be anchored to the basic principles of “equity” and “common but differentiated responsibility and respective capabilities”. The introduction of trade related protectionist measures in the form of carbon tariffs should be discouraged because it will only lead to “green protectionism”. Further work is required for strengthening weak mitigation pledges by developed countries, preventing unilateral trade actions in the name of climate change, and constructive dialogue on IPRs for technology development and transfer.

Despite our huge developmental challenges, we have set ourselves ambitious targets through a National Action Plan on Climate Change, including through commitments to keep the per capita emissions below the average of those in the developed countries and to reduce emissions intensity of India’s GDP by 20 to 25% by 2020 as compared to 2005.

Mr. Chairman and Excellencies,

Finally I would like to mention here that as prime mover on transport linkages, India again requests ACD partner countries for their comments on the concept paper that was circulated by us during the 8th Ministerial Meeting in Colombo in 2009. This would enable us to take cooperation forward in this important sector.

Thank you very much.

BIMSTEC

077. Statement by Minister of State Smt. Preneet Kaur at the Plenary of the 13th BIMSTEC Ministerial Meeting.

Nay Pyi Taw (Myanmar) January 22, 2011.

Your Excellency Mr. U Nyan Win,
Excellencies,
Ladies and Gentlemen,

At the outset I would like to express my profound appreciation to our host, the Foreign Minister of Myanmar, for the excellent arrangements made for the 13th BIMSTEC Ministerial Meeting and warm hospitality extended to me and my delegation.

Excellency,

I would like to take this opportunity to welcome the proposal to host the 3rd BIMSTEC Summit in Myanmar this year. I would like to assure that India would be happy and willing to offer all support to make this Summit a success.

Mr Chairman,

I have been informed that the deliberations over the past two days have been fruitful. Significant progress has been made on various areas including on the establishment of the permanent Secretariat. Today we would also be signing the MoA on the establishment of the BIMSTEC Energy Center in India. I would like to commend the leadership provided by you and your team in enabling us to achieve this progress and to BIMSTEC since assuming the Chairmanship of BIMSTEC.

The challenge confronting all of us today is to achieve an inclusive economic growth. The recent financial crisis has shown that such an ambitious target can be met only by enhancing cooperation amongst ourselves. Today when the countries of the region are leading the global recovery, we need to further intensify this cooperation process to harness the synergies that exist amongst ourselves for the betterment of our people.

BIMSTEC countries have a population of 1.5 billion constituting 21% of world population and a combined GDP of over US$ 1.8 trillion. Despite these impressive figures, intra-BIMSTEC trade is less than 5%. With the increasing protectionist measures and reduction in trade as a result of sluggish growth in the developed economies, the need for re-directing and promoting trade amongst ourselves has been strongly felt. Hence I would urge the early conclusion of the BIMSTEC FTA negotiations including on Services and Investment. A need has also been felt to strengthen and support the participation of the private sector in this process.

Your Excellencies,

Recognizing the importance of the BIMSTEC Transport Infrastructure and Logistics Study, the 12th BIMSTEC Ministerial Meeting endorsed the Study. We should now collectively work on the implementation of the action plan and expedite the meeting of the Expert Groups.

Connectivity is vital to take forward our cooperation process. Hence I am happy to inform that India hosted the sixth conference of Railways of South and South East Asia in March 2010. We also continue to train railway personnel in India at Asian Institute of Transport Development, New Delhi. I am also happy to inform that India would be expanding this training program and would be conducting a workshop cum training program on Highways and ports with emphasis on public - private partnership in the development of this key infrastructure.

We recognize the impact that oil-price volatility, over dependence on fossil fuels, and unsustainable energy consumption patterns have on climate and on our region’s economies and people’s well being. The potential of natural gas, hydropower and renewable energy available in the region needs to be harnessed for mutual benefit of members. In this context, I was particularly happy to note that to expedite the establishment of BIMSTEC Energy Center, the MOA on the establishment of the Energy Center is proposed to be signed today. India is hosting the meeting of taskforce on BIMSTEC Energy Centre and Senior officials meeting on 7-8 February 2011. They would surely help early operationalisation of the Energy Centre.

Excellencies,

We have to be on guard against those who are out to exploit our connectivity for their own nefarious and unacceptable ends. Terrorists and their backers, those behind illegal financial flows, trafficking drugs are some of them. They pose significant challenge to all of us and we need to act in concert to defeat these threats. Hence I would like to urge our partners to ratify the BIMSTEC Convention on Cooperation in Combating International Terrorism, Transnational Organized Crime and Illicit Drug Trafficking that was signed in the last Ministerial meeting. This would provide the legal framework to our law enforcement authorities to cooperate in combating the scourge of terrorism, organized crime and drug trafficking.

In order to further strengthen cooperation in this critical area, I would also like to propose taking up negotiations on the Draft BIMSTEC Agreement on Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters and give the mandate to the Sub group on legal and law enforcement issues to initiate discussions on this important Agreement.

BIMSTEC countries share a history of common natural hazards which, more often than not, transcend geographical boundaries to affect many of us. Flood, Cyclone, drought, earthquake and tsunami have become shared risks for all countries in the region. Hence we will be happy to support capacity building in this important area in our BIMSTEC partners. We are also taking steps to expedite establishment of BIMSTEC centre on Weather and Climate. I would also like to take this opportunity to announce that India would be conducting workshops on Seasonal Predictions and application to Society and on Climate change and disasters.

Agriculture and Fisheries provide livelihoods to majority of the populations of BIMSTEC Countries. I am happy to note that the third expert group on agriculture met in Kandy, Sri Lanka in November 2010 to discuss cooperation in this area. I can hardly overemphasize the importance of cooperation in this area for the common good of our peoples.

We face increasing challenge from emerging and reemerging diseases. We need to pool together our technical and scientific knowledge to combat these challenges. India shares its experience in traditional medicine with its fellow BIMSTEC partners in the spirit of South-South cooperation. I am happy to inform that India would be conducting a workshop on IPRs in Traditional Medicines in April this year.

In order to support capacity building and share expertise India has been offering over 450 scholarships annually to BIMSTEC Countries. I am happy to note that the utilization rate is over 80%.

For our cooperation in BIMSTEC to deepen and strengthen, it is important that it goes beyond government-to-government realms. In this context, it gives me satisfaction to note that India hosted the 1st meeting of BIMSTEC Network of Think Tanks in February, 2010. We are charting further course of action after getting feedback on the report from member countries and from partner think tanks.

Tourism is an important and growing sector in our economies. India has established BIMSTEC Information centre and contributed its share of US$ 10,000 for BIMSTEC Tourism Fund. This Centre will help disseminate information regarding tourist destinations in the member countries to give impetus to growth of tourism. I would urge our partners in the BIMSTEC to expedite their contribution to the Tourism Fund and also provide relevant material to enable effective functioning of the Information Center.

Mr. Chairman,

BIMSTEC has made sure and steady progress during the last 13 years. The establishment of the Permanent Secretariat will help in implementing and monitoring the activities under BIMSTEC better. I would like to congratulate Bangladesh for becoming the host to the Permanent Secretariat. The role of the Secretary General is critical in providing dynamism to this cooperation and we would like to thank Sri Lanka for agreeing to take on this responsibility and nominate the first Secretary General.

We have taken many initiatives to enhance the multifaceted cooperation within BIMSTEC. We should task our Senior Officials to review these initiatives and suggest further course of action for their early completion.

Before I conclude, I would also like to congratulate Nepal on taking over the next Presidency of the BIMSTEC.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.
At the outset let me extend a very warm welcome to our South Africa Colleague to our platform. The BRIC platform has demonstrated to the world that although the BRICS are located in different continents, and have vastly different economic structures, they can come together and cooperate to enhance global economic outcomes. And now with South Africa joining us, we are further enriched further and enabled to take a more cohesive policy stance in various forums.

G 20 Framework and mutual assessment: The global recovery is still fragile and uneven. We are faced with significant downside risks arising from tensions in the euro area periphery spreading to other regions, high commodity prices and inflationary conditions in our countries. Policy coordination is critical for sustaining the economic recovery. The crisis showed us the fruit of working together for policy cooperation. This is just as true for the recovery.

International economic policy coordination though the G20 framework for strong, sustainable and balanced growth holds the key to sustaining the global recovery. The Leader's Declaration at Seoul clearly focused on 'promoting external sustainability' within the spirit of multilateral cooperation. Our Leaders were careful enough to recognise that such an exercise should focus on persistent and excessive imbalances. As co-chair, we are concerned that the task of preparing guidelines and the ensuing MAP process should not be seen as one that would be used to shape country specific policies in a manner that one size fits all. The objective is clearly of framing a set of 'indicative' guidelines that all G 20 countries will agree upon in the interest of reducing excessive external imbalances that stand in the way of raising global growth on a sustainable basis.

Most members have agreed to a 2 stage approach in the Working Group. However, a G 20 style consensus is yet to be arrived at. Some outstanding issues regarding agreeing on indicators also remain. At the same time we need to proceed keeping in view the spirit of cooperation within a multilateral framework and recognizing that this is needed not only in the interest of the global economy but also in the interest of individual economies regardless of their size or their current rate of growth.

We also need to be cognizant of another kind of glaring developmental imbalance, including the sheer lack of physical and social infrastructure in developing countries and LICs. The Multilateral Development Banks have a wealth of experience and expertise in the area of infrastructure financing. The high level panel on infrastructure financing being set up under G20 Development agenda could, inter alia, focus on the manner in which global surpluses could be productively channeled into financing infrastructure investment in developing countries through the modality of Multilateral Development Banks. We should stand committed to ensure sufficient resources for MDBs.

BRIC Study: Friends, a decision was taken in the Meeting of ‘BRIC Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors’ in London on September 4, 2009, wherein the BRIC Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors resolved to commission a study by their Finance Ministries and Central Banks regarding where the world economy will be in the near future and the role of the BRIC countries. To take this special relationship further forward, I propose to include South Africa in this study.

The report is a joint and concerted effort by BRIC countries. So even though India is anchoring and is in charge of compilation and writing the report, inputs and comments have been sought from all the BRIC countries in every stage of the study. However, I am informed that greater cooperation from our Russian Colleagues is desired in the drafting of the report. I sincerely expect that the report will bring BRICS countries to work together for stronger cooperation and provide the platform for sharing best practices and challenges. Having agreed on the design of the report during the first workshop held in New Delhi in September, for which the first draft of the report was circulated in December 2010, we should start working on the final stage of the study by actually finalizing the draft report and providing comments to the anchor, which at present have be given only by Brazil working group members.

Friends, for completing the task by March end 2011 and its final release in April 2011 during the BRICS Summit in Beijing, we need your cooperation. Finally, I would like to appeal to the Working Group members of each country to produce a quality document that our Leaders should be proud of.
Briefing by Secretary (ER) Manbir Singh and Secretary (East) Sanjay Singh on Prime Minister's visit to China for the BRICS Summit and Kazakhstan for the Bilateral Summit.

New Delhi, April 11, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good afternoon to all of you and let me extend you a warm welcome to the Media Hall. Good to see you here in numbers.

I am particularly happy and delighted to have our media friends from nine African countries with us here. They are in New Delhi on a familiarization and training programme. On behalf of all my colleagues in the Ministry of External Affairs and the Indian media, let me accord you a very warm welcome. Thank you for being with us. And also a warm welcome to Prof. Shrivastava, the Course Director from the Indian Institute of Mass Communication, who has been a steadfast friend of MEA and has been conducting training programmes for visiting media teams on a regular basis.

You are aware that the Prime Minister of India, Dr. Manmohan Singh, would be leaving tomorrow for Sanya in China for the third BRIC Summit. Thereafter, he would be travelling to Astana for the India Kazakhstan bilateral summit meeting. We have Mr. Manbir Singh, Secretary (Economic Relations) to my right here, who will give you a perspective on Prime Minister's visit to Sanya. To his right is Secretary (East), Mr. Sanjay Singh, who would next like to brief you about the visit of the Prime Minister of India to Astana. Let me also introduce two of my other colleagues who have joined us. To the right of Secretary (East) is Mr. Ajay Bisaria, Joint Secretary (Eurasia), who inter alia handles Kazakhstan. And to my left is Mr. Charanjit Singh, Director (MER). I would request Secretary (ER) to speak to you about Prime Minister's visit to Sanya.

Secretary (Economic Relations) (Shri Manbir Singh): Thank you, Vishnu. Let me at the outset thank all of you for coming here this afternoon for this briefing on the Prime Minister's visit for the BRICS to Sanya and for his visit to Kazakhstan. I would also like to welcome specially our African friends. And it is very appropriate that they are over here today because the BRIC for the first time would be having South Africa as part of their BRICS conference in Sanya.

To begin with let me say that the Prime Minister is visiting Sanya, China from 12th to 15th April, on the invitation of His Excellency Hu Jintao, President of China. He will be accompanied by Shrimati Gursharan Kaur. The other senior members of the delegation would include Commerce and Industries Minister, Mr. Anand Sharma; Principal Secretary to the Prime Minister; National Security Advisor; and other senior officials from the Prime Minister's Office and from the Ministry of External Affairs.

Prime Minister will also be accompanied by a media delegation, a business delegation including representatives from the FICCI and the CII, and they will be attending the BRICS Business Forum separately. The forthcoming BRICS Summit is the third in a row. The first one took place in Yekaterinburg in Russia on June 2009, the second took place in Brasilia in April 2010, and now Sanya. All BRIC Summits are important but this is particularly so. And I will say that for two reasons. Firstly, we will have an additional member from Africa, which is South Africa; and also we have four members of the BRICS who are members of the Security Council. Sorry, I said four. All five members of the BRICS are members of the Security Council.

The programme which will begin on the 14th starts with a Group Photograph. The Prime Minister and the other BRICS leaders will be there. Then there will be a restricted session. In the restricted session there are four main topics that the Chinese hosts have underlined for discussions. These are: (1) the international situation at the present time, (2) international economic and financial issues, (3) the development issues, and (4) the cooperation amongst BRICS countries. This restricted session would be for about 80 minutes and then they will go in for the plenary. Plenary will be open to the press and the Plenary theme is, "Broad Vision and Shared Prosperity". Each of the BRICS leaders would be expected to speak for about six or seven minutes on this particular subject - Broad Vision and Shared Prosperity.

Thereafter there will be a Joint Press Conference. And at the Joint Press Conference each of the BRICS leaders will be expected to make a short statement of how he has viewed the various agenda items and the discussions that have taken place. There would be a welcome banquet hosted by the President Mr. Hu Jintao. And in the evening there would be a cultural programme.

During this BRICS Summit, the Prime Minister will have bilateral meetings with all his counterparts - China, Brazil, South Africa and the Russian Federation. There are some accompanying events for the BRICS Summit. The BRICS Trade Ministers will be meeting. Mr. Anand Sharma will be accompanying the Prime Minister and he will participate in the BRICS Trade Ministers meeting. As I already mentioned, there will be a delegation of businessmen from the FICCI and the CII. They will be attending the BRICS Business Forum.

Then there is a track II. Meetings also take place before or after the BRICS summit. In this particular summit, a BRICS track II meeting took place in Beijing on the 24th and the 25th of March, 2011. A six-member Indian delegation had participated in it. The six-member Indian delegation came from the Observer Research Foundation, Research and Information System for Developing Countries, and Indian Council for Research and International Economic Relations. The theme for the Business Forum as well as that of the think tanks is how to take stock of the international trade and commercial situation and how to promote economic interaction between the BRIC countries.

As far as the outcome is concerned, there will be a Sanya Declaration. And of course this declaration will depend on the discussions that take place between the leaders of the BRICS countries. The Trade Ministers are likely to issue a Joint Press Release on the 13th of April. And there will be a second edition of BRICS statistical publication which would be released in Sanya. There is also a proposal that the BRICS Business Forum would sign an MoU on establishment of BRICS contact points so that amongst the BRICS countries there are contact points where they can pass on information in regard to trade, investment, etc.

As far as the BRICS background is concerned, everybody knows and I do not have to repeat that, it was first used in 2001 by Goldman Sachs as part of an economic modeling exercise to forecast global economic trends over the next half century. BRICS is important by itself because together it commands about 26 per cent of world’s geographic area, 40 per cent of the global population of the world, and 22 per cent of the global GDP. BRICS countries have also been amongst the fastest growing economies in the world with tremendous potential.

Over the last three years since the summit meetings have begun we have seen that there has been a very intensive interaction amongst the BRIC countries. You have had the Foreign Ministers meeting almost on a yearly basis on the sidelines of the UNGA in September in New York; you have had meetings of the National Security Advisors; you have had meetings of the Agriculture Ministers; you have had meetings of the Finance Ministers and the Chiefs of the Central Banks; you have had interaction between the statistical institutions; you have also had meetings of the mayors from one country each from the BRICS and the Mayor of Mumbai has been representing India. The Mayors are talking about how to promote education and commerce between their main towns, and also they are talking about science and technology.

The Track II is also proceeding very well as I told you. They just had a meeting. They are also trying to see how the BRICS can be consolidated and what sort of work chart or what sort of programme they should have.

The other issues that the BRICS has been dealing with have been issues before the G20, Brettonwood Institutions, trade protectionism, and the Doha Development Round, international terrorism, achievement of Millennium Development Goals, support for multipolar, equitable and democratic world order, mutual respect, cooperation, coordinated action, and collective decision-making of all states.

The Prime Minister had said that the BRICS Finance Ministries should get together and make a study of the world economy and see how the BRICS countries together can help in the growth and development of the world economy and what kind of a charter they would have within the world economy. So, the Ministry of Finance has had some meetings with representatives of all the BRIC countries and the report was ready. But now since South Africa is also going to join in Sanya, they will wait for the report for the next year after including the inputs from South Africa as well.

Official Spokesperson: Can I request Secretary (East) to kindly make his opening statement?

Secretary (East) (Shri Sanjay Singh): Good afternoon. At the outset let me also recognize the presence of our friends from Africa and specially recognize the presence of the press delegation from Kazakhstan which is here with us this afternoon on that side.

On the second leg of his tour, Prime Minister will pay an official visit to Kazakhstan on 15-16 April at the invitation of President Nursultan Nazarbayev. This would be the Prime Minister’s first visit to Kazakhstan and his second to Central Asia after his visit to Uzbekistan in 2006.

President Nazarbayev is a long standing friend of India. He last visited India as the Chief Guest at our Republic Day celebrations in 2009. He had previously visited India three times in 1992, 1996 and 2002.

Apart from bilateral visits, the two leaders have met on several occasions on the margins of multilateral events. In recent times, they met on the sidelines of the SCO Summit in Yekaterinburg in June 2009, and on the sidelines of the Nuclear Security Summit exactly one year ago on 11th April 2010 in Washington.

President Nazarbayev has recently been re-elected in Presidential elections on 3rd April and has been inaugurated in his new term on Friday, 8th April. Prime Minister has sent a letter congratulating President Nazarbayev on his latest electoral victory.

The programme on Saturday, 16th April, will be that after an official welcome ceremony at the Presidential Palace, the Prime Minister will have a restricted meeting with President Nazarbayev followed by delegation-level interaction. The two leaders will then interact with the media before attending an official luncheon. PM will also meet Prime Minister of Kazakhstan His Excellency Mr. Karim K. Massimov. Some agreements are expected to be signed. The Prime Kazakhstan is a key regional country in Asia with a global role and has been playing an important part in promoting regional peace and stability. Kazakhstan was the first Chairman from Central Asia in 2010 of the OSCE (Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe). It is the current Chair of the SCO (Shanghai Cooperation Organisation) and has been a major driver of the CICA (Conference on Interaction and Confidence Building Measures in Asia). CICA, as you may know, is an important Central Asia-led forum in which India is a full member. The then Indian Prime Minister had attended the CICA Summit in 2002 in Almaty.

I would like to now give some background on India-Kazakhstan relationship. We have had historical linkages with Central Asia, which is a part of our extended neighbourhood in the north, and Kazakhstan is a key partner in this region, and in 2009, India and Kazakhstan elevated their relationship to a strategic partnership.

India's relationship with Kazakhstan in fact goes back to antiquity. Kazakhstan is sometimes referred to in India as the land of the Sakas. During the period between the 12th and 3rd century BC, nomadic Saka tribes are said to have reached India from southern Kazakhstan. India returned the favour in the second century AD when Buddhism first travelled from India to Central Asia during the reign of the Kushanas. Since then, the Silk Route has led to a vigorous exchange of not just commodities but also ideas and knowledge. Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru accompanied by Shrimati Indira Gandhi had visited Almaty in 1955.

India was one of the first countries to recognise Kazakhstan after it became an independent country in 1991 and opened an Embassy in 1992 in Almaty. Subsequently, the capital of Kazakhstan shifted from Almaty to Astana in 1997, and the Indian Embassy also moved there in 2007.

Our relationship has been marked by a robust exchange of high-level visits and also by an effective bilateral institutional mechanism. We have a large number of bilateral agreements in place in a range of sectors.

Kazakhstan has been supportive of India's candidature to the expanded UNSC. We have a convergence of views on key issues like counterterrorism and coordinate closely in multilateral bodies such as the United Nations. Our political dialogue is likely to deepen in the years ahead.

We have also been a development partner of Kazakhstan and have assisted in capacity-building in Kazakhstan. Since 1992, over 800 Kazakh officials as also defence personnel have received training in various fields under the ITEC program. Over 120 students have studied in India under other Government scholarship schemes. The areas of interest for Kazakh students are English language proficiency, IT, banking, and small business.

Energy is another important sector of cooperation with Kazakhstan. Kazakhstan is one of the largest oil producing nations in the world with substantive proven reserves in the Caspian Sea basin. In recent years, ONGC Videsh Ltd, has been in discussion with its counterpart, Kazmunai Gaz (KMG) for an equity stake by OVL in the Satpayev Oil block in the Caspian Sea. We also cooperate in the area of civil nuclear energy.

Bilateral trade at around US$ 300 million in 2010 is well below potential. A key constraint to the development of trade is connectivity, and we hope to discuss ways of overcoming this problem by focusing on the International North South Trade Corridor. This is a multi modal route which would connect Kazakhstan to India through Turkmenistan and Iran. We will be discussing this issue with the Kazakh side.

Punjab National Bank has acquired controlling stake in a local Kazakh bank, Dana Bank, and three out of five branches have already started functioning. This is likely to be named PNB Kazakhstan. Other areas of promise include information technology, pharmaceuticals and agriculture, to name a few.

We also look at further enhancing people-to-people contacts by holding Days of Kazakhstan in India this year and Days of India in Kazakhstan next year. Prime Minister's visit will place our strategic relationship on a firmer footing and qualitatively expand the scope of our cooperation. Thank you.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you, Sir.

Secretary (ER) and Secretary (East) will be happy to take your questions.

Question: My question is addressed to Secretary (ER). What are the agenda items for India in BRICS?

Secretary (ER): The key agenda items, as I already mentioned, are the international situation, and India would like to discuss the international situation and understand the viewpoints of the other countries from the BRICS. We also had a recession in 2008 and the countries are coming out of it. There is some problem with regard to inflation in many countries the world over. There is volatility in commodity prices. Therefore, international and economic and financial issues are, a second agenda item but it is an agenda item that is important which India would like to discuss. Then there are the development issues. We are a developing country. So, the Millennium Development Goals, the climate change programmes, these are the issues that will come up. Also the trade, the Doha Round and also cooperation amongst the BRIC countries. I had mentioned to you that over the last three years how rapidly we have moved in having various meetings and exchanging views and arriving at understandings on the world issues. So, these are all very important agenda items in which India would participate very actively.

Question: This was in general terms. But are you going raise to any specific issue? Is India going to make any specific proposal?

Secretary (ER): These agenda items were discussed by the Chinese hosts with all the big countries in advance. They have sent their Sherpa here to Delhi and these agenda items have been finalized after intensive discussions.

Question: In Kazakhstan, which exactly are the documents you are hoping to have signed there, in which areas?

JS (ERS): Yevgeny, as you know we do not talk of outcomes that are expected from the visit. We are working on a number of documents. Discussions are going on, as Secretary mentioned, in a wide range of areas. And you will know of the outcomes on the 16th once we discuss them.

Question: There are a number of international economic fora in which the west especially America have asked Beijing, China to revalue its currency citing that the current Yuan regime gives Beijing an unfair advantage in trade. Once the BRICS summit starts, is it also an issue that you are going to raise against China?

Secretary (ER): That is not an issue that we are going to raise. It is for the China to decide what they want to do with their currency and how it is place in the world economic order and how it is valued with other currencies and what are its pros and cons.

Question: The Track II meeting in Beijing has suggested that BRICS should now consider having a regular Secretariat. Right now it functions without Secretariat. Is a Secretariat likely to be established? If so, where is it likely to be? Is India going to offer to host it?

Secondly, I think BRICS summit correspondents seem to suggest that the Chinese came up with an idea that the BRICS countries should have their own exchange arrangement as an alternative to the US dollar. What are India's views on the subject?

Secretary (ER): As far as the Secretariat is concerned, the issue if it comes up will be before the leaders and it is for them to take a decision on this. You are very right, the BRICS has functioned without a Secretariat. It has functioned very satisfactorily so far. And we have to see what is the future course for this organization and whether the Secretariat will be useful. But to answer your question, no decision has been taken on this yet.

As regards the exchange arrangement, yes the EXIM Banks of all the BRICS countries have been talking to each other and they have been looking at how to promote trade between two countries. We have not looked as an alternative to any currency because as you know that dollar or the euro or the yen, these are freely exchangeable currencies, and the currencies of the BRICS countries are yet to reach that stage. So, it requires a lot of pros and cons to be studied. But the EXIM Banks of all the countries are focusing on it and they are seeing how that trade and economic interaction can be. Thereafter it will require to see whether all these issues are compatible with your national laws, with your central banks, etc. So, it is a process that will take some time.

Question: In addition to that question of a Secretariat not being established, what is the mechanism that has been evolved for these summits in order to coordinate among the member countries?

Secretary (ER): As I pointed out to you, apart from the summits that are taking place, there are External Affairs Ministers who are meeting on the sidelines of the General Assembly. There are the National Security Advisors who are meeting on a regular basis. So, there is no dearth of fora or meetings where any issue that any particular or a group of countries feel is important, it can be raised. So, there are number of options available for raising these issues amongst the BRICS countries.

Question: My question is the turmoil in the Arab world and North Africa have raised the petrol prices which has a negative impact on the growth especially of the region of BRICS you are talking about. Do you have any plan, a proactive plan, to counter such measures or what is the axis would you like to see of these countries to have more diversified source of energy to tackle this problem? Or whether this problem of the North Africa and the Gulf countries will come for discussion in more active manner, as it is a priority issue at the moment?

Secretary (ER): Energy is a very important issue before the BRICS countries and energy security is something that the BRICS countries would like to discuss. There is a feeling of uncertainty in some of the oil-producing countries which has led to a rise in price. But these issues I am sure will be discussed by our leaders, but I cannot preempt what they will discuss. This is an important issue; this is an issue that has been flagged by a number of countries. So, I expect that it may come up.

Question: You said India will not talk about the Yuan. But is it not on the formal agenda, the Chinese currency? Secondly, the G20 has just finalized a tentative deal on economic indicators in the Paris meeting. Is there going to be any progress on the economic indicators? ...(Inaudible)…

Secretary (ER): Both the issues that you have raised are not specifically on the BRICS agenda. But the leaders, under the various agenda items, are free to raise whatever they feel is important.

Question: As China is hosting this BRICS summit and India is participating with so many agenda items and you have been able to find so many areas where you can have cooperation with these countries, how will you expect that we will have some improvement in Indo-China relations with the help of the summit? And how do you view the present state of relations?

Secretary (ER): The BRICS is an organization of emerging countries which are doing very well economically, and they want to contribute to the world economy and also try and find out ways and means to overcome problems that arise in the financial domain, in the energy security, in the food security, etc. But, this forum also gives an opportunity for the leaders to have bilateral talks to meet each other and these bilateral talks promote understanding, promote each other’s viewpoint, lead to a greater acceptance of what the other person is saying. So, I would say that though BRICS is not directly aimed at promoting bilateral ties, the bilateral ties are a spin off of all the BRICS meetings.

Official Spokesperson: If I can just add to what Secretary (ER) has said, China is one of our most important neighbours. This is a relationship which is very important to us. We already have a strategic and cooperative partnership with China. And the canvass of our cooperation is quite wide. We have growing convergences with China. One of the hallmarks of the relationship is regular high-level exchanges. You know that Hon. President of India had been on a state visit to China last year. Premier Wen Jiabao had been to India in December. And as Secretary (ER) has mentioned, one of the important meetings on the margins of the BRICS summit would be the one between the Prime Minister of India and President Hu Jintao. So, this is a very important relationship and we both sides have been making all efforts to try and enhance convergences between the two countries.

Question: You just talked about the bilateral meeting that was scheduled on the sidelines of the BRICS summit. I just wanted to ask you a question related to China's continuous assistance to Pakistan. In fact, off late what we have learnt is that they have signed a deal with Pakistan promising six submarines and four aircraft. This had raised eyebrows in South Block earlier also. Will this be on the agenda of the Prime Minister during that bilateral meeting?
Official Spokesperson: When the leaders meet, they have a very broad canvass of subjects that they discuss. But obviously it is not possible to prejudge what they would be discussing.

Question: Already BRIC has become BRICS. So, it is plural now. Can Indonesia be a new member in the near future in this group?

Secretary (ER): Indonesia is a very influential country. It is a fast emerging country. It exercises a very stabilizing influence in the area where it is geographically located. Such a proposal is not before the BRICS today. But Indonesia is a very good candidate. What I can say is that for the present, the BRIC is looking at ways how it can consolidate the interaction between each other, the BRICS countries, how they can promote the various sectoral dialogues, the various programmes that they have.

Question: How do you see the relevance of IBSA with South Africa joining BRICS?

Secretary (ER): BRICS member countries are fast emerging countries, economies wise. And as far as IBSA is concerned, it is a group of three countries which is democratic, plural, and has other values which are common to them. Therefore, you have one which is focusing more on economics but slowly moving to other areas as well; and there is IBSA which have, there is a common democratic principles which guide the three countries. And therefore, those values are being promoted in the IBSA forum. So, there is some difference between the two organizations and I do not think that South Africa’s membership of one and then also of the second will in any way diminish IBSA in any way.

Question: Secretary (ER), I would like you to make a comment on our Nigeria. At a recent interaction with the Indian High Commissioner at Nigeria, Mahesh Sachdev, he said that there is a lopsided bilateral trade relationship between India and Nigeria. I would like to know if you have plans any time soon to boost this relationship with a view to achieving a balance sort of.

Secretary (ER): Wherever in the world you have a trade balance which is distorted in favour of one country, it is the efforts of that country which has an adverse trade balance to readdress it. And this is done by trade facilitation; it is done by sending more delegations to that country so that if the trade balance is not balanced then its exports grow. So, Nigeria is an oil-exporting country. I personally do not know what the trade balance is between Nigeria and India but I am sure that our High Commissioner is looking into it and I am sure your Government itself is sensitive to it.

Question: My first question is this. Considering your major goal which is to contribute to the growth of the global economy, currently 22 per cent of the global GDP comes from BRIC countries. And looking at your goal, which is to contribute to the global GDP growth, do you think such goal can be achieved in isolation of African countries?

The second question is this. What strategic initiatives are you in India going to venture into in favour of African countries in the medium to long-term?

Secretary (ER): If you see the growth rate of almost all the BRIC countries, it is fairly good. They have sound economies. The criteria which brought them together was, the basis was this, their economic growth rate. Now the leaders, apart from enjoying a good economic growth rate also want to contribute to the world economy and see how that issues that come up can be resolved, how they can contribute in solving them. But if your question is that if BRICS by itself can lift the world economy, I do not know. That remains to be seen. But that there is definitely a good efforts towards that to lift the growth rates to generate trade, to generate investment, to see that the fluctuation in the foreign exchange regime is reduced, to see how inflation can be tackled, how food security, how energy security, what is the reforms of the international monetary systems, all these issues are relevant to the stability of the world economy and the BRICS definitely want to contribute towards the stability of the world economy and find solutions, solutions that are not only acceptable to them but acceptable to all the countries.

The second question on whether there can be any special criteria or strategies for growth in Africa, the United Nations itself has made the Millennium Development Goals a criteria for development, in health, in education, in poverty eradication. And the BRICS are going to focus on how much of MDGs have been achieved and if they have not been achieved, what are the lacuna, what are the shortcomings, how can these goals be reinforced, how more money can be made available. So, these are issues that would contribute towards development in Africa.

Official Spokesperson: I would just like to add a bit about India's relationship with Africa. Let me say at the outset that we have had civilisational linkages with Africa. There are a large number of Indian people who see Africa as their home. And we have always been a developmental partner of Africa. We are ourselves a developing country but we have been quite open to, quite ready to work with Africa, according to the needs and priorities of the African continent and the countries concerned. And I would like to emphasise that point. We are very clear in our minds that Africa as a continent, the region, and each country knows what is best for them; what are their developmental priorities. And we respond to the wishes of, the priorities of our African friends in terms of working with him especially in three areas - in capacity-building, in human resource development, and also in development of infrastructure.
Now you would recall that we had a very important event in April 2008, the first India-Africa Forum Summit that took place in New Delhi. As decided by our African friends, the second India-Africa Forum Summit would be held in Addis Ababa in May this year. During the first summit meeting, amongst others it was decided that India will extend 5.4 billion dollars as lines of credit to our African friends, in addition to providing 600 million dollars as grants for setting up centres of excellence and so on. We are well on our way to achieving each and every target. And I would again like to point out that the centres of excellence, the educational institutions, the Pan African E-Network project, all are being done according to the advice and suggestions of our African partners.

Let me just add a word here about the media relationship, and that brings me to the invitation that we have extended to all of you to visit India. We see that there is an information gap about the opportunities that India has in Africa and vice versa. And that is what we are trying to bridge. I am happy to tell you that every year we have been inviting groups of African journalists on familiarization tours and on training programmes, and also having Indian journalists go to Africa.

Question: Will we raise the issue of the Chinese presence in PoK and the stapled visas issue?

Official Spokesperson: I have already responded to that question that the Prime Minister and the President would meet. When the President and the Prime Minister meet, they have a broad canvass. So, I am not aware of what exactly would be discussed.

Question: What kind of view that Prime Minister will carry to Sanya for the future of BRICS summit? Does that necessary for a great country to develop a closer organization for the common interest of this country, especially under now there is the international … like the western countries have done in the Middle-East.

Secretary (ER): This is a question actually which should be addressed to the Prime Minister himself. But I can only say from the Ministry of External Affairs perspective we view the BRICS grouping very positively and we are very happy that China is holding the third BRICS summit. And I know that with what pains China has drafted the programme, agenda, the side events that are taking place. We go there with a very positive viewpoint. We want to consolidate this organization. We feel that it has a very good future and it is a very good forum where the six countries can discuss various issues which are before the world. So, we take a very positive attitude and we are very hopeful for a very meaningful outcome of this summit.
Question: In the international chapter that will be discussed in Beijing, will the Libyan crisis be one of the points given the fact also that all the BRICS countries were abstaining on the UN resolution on intervention in Libya? Secondly, it has already been decided that BRICS in Beijing? Is it decided that the name of the group will be BRICS and not BRIC any more with the arriving of South Africa? We are saying that but it is not clear whether it would be BRICS.

Secretary (ER): I think with the inclusion of South Africa, the BRIC will become BRICS but formal change will happen at the summit itself because this is the first summit that is going to be attended by South Africa. As far as the other question that you had raised about Libya, I think it is an extremely important issue and it is an issue that affects everybody, all the BRICS countries. They have a viewpoint on it. India had a large number of people in Libya. Therefore, I would feel that this issue would come up to be discussed by the BRICS leaders.

Official Spokesperson: Just a factual bit. It was BRIC countries which had abstained, all BRICS had not.

Question: There have been reports for quite some time that China has started given again the normal visas for Kashmiris. Are these reports correct? Has the problem been quietly solved? And are we going back to resuming military exchanges?

Official Spokesperson: Let me take you back to the visit of Premier Wen Jiabao. You would recall that the issue of visas had come up during the visit and it had been agreed that both sides would be meeting, would be putting our heads together, would discuss this issue to work towards an early resolution. That is where the matter is. On the other issue also, we are looking at ways and means as always to enhance our relationship to widen the canvas of our cooperation, and that effort will continue.

Question: After three years it has a very wide agenda and has a slow progress. What particular does India expect from this particular summit? Is there any new idea ...(Unclear)...

Secretary (ER): We are expecting a very good exchange of views, a promotion of understanding between the BRICs countries, a discussion on issues that confront the world whether they be of an economic nature or political nature. As I have said two, three times already, we are looking forward to a greater cohesion, consolidation out of the BRICS summit at Sanya. I am sure that the Chinese hosts have prepared it so well, it would be a successful summit.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much.

080. Statement by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh prior to his departure for China for the BRICS Summit and Kazakhstan for a bilateral visit.

New Delhi, April 12, 2011.

I leave today on a visit to China and Kazakhstan.

In China, I will attend the BRICS Leaders Meeting in Sanya being hosted by President Hu Jintao. This is the third Summit of the BRICS grouping since the first stand alone meeting in 2009. This meeting will see the participation for the first time of South Africa. India welcomes South Africa’s membership of BRICS, which will provide an African perspective to our deliberations.

I look forward to a wide ranging exchange of views with the BRICS leaders on the state of the world economy and the contribution which BRICS can make in sustaining the process of global economic and financial recovery. The traditional sources of economic growth are still under stress, even as fresh uncertainties have emerged as a result of recent developments in different parts of the world. If we can coordinate our positions on some key areas such as sustainable development, balanced growth, energy and food security, reform of international financial institutions and balanced trade, that will be to our advantage.

Today all BRICS countries are members of the G 20 and the United Nations Security Council. Our experience of working with each other in these forums has been positive and holds promise. This gives the Sanya Summit, whose theme is “Broad Vision and Shared Prosperity”, special significance.

During my stay in Sanya I look forward to my meeting with President Hu Jintao. The India-China relationship is a key relationship which has now acquired global significance. I will also have bilateral meetings with Presidents of Russia, Brazil and South Africa. Our relations with these countries are very warm and substantive.

From China, I will travel to Kazakhstan on a bilateral visit at the invitation of President Nursultan Nazarbayev. This will be my first visit to Kazakhstan. It is an important partner of India in a region which has always displayed special empathy and goodwill towards India. I will build upon the successful visit of President Nazarbayev to India in 2009 and seek to expand the frontiers of our cooperation with that great country. There is immense potential for moving forward in areas such as political and security cooperation, trade and investment, energy, pharmaceuticals, agriculture, information technology and capacity building. My visit signals India’s abiding interest in Central Asia that is rooted in the history and culture of this region.

Sanya (China), April 14, 2011.

I would like to thank His Excellency President Hu Jintao for hosting the BRICS Summit in this beautiful city of Sanya. I thank the Government and the people of China for their warm hospitality and for the excellent arrangements that have been made.

I would also like to warmly welcome South Africa as a member of BRICS. We have greatly benefited from President Jacob Zuma’s wise counsel in our deliberations.

We have had very fruitful discussions at the Summit. We have reviewed the international situation, discussed international economic, financial and trade issues, the challenges of sustainable development, food security, energy security and climate change.

We have adopted the Sanya Declaration and agreed upon an Action Plan to deepen and broaden cooperation among our countries. This is an extremely rich and ambitious agenda. It covers the areas of security, finance, business links, agriculture, health, culture, sports and the green economy.

Our designated banks have signed a framework agreement on financial cooperation which envisages grant of credit in local currencies and cooperation in capital markets and other financial services.

In a short span of two years since our first Summit in 2009, BRICS has thus travelled a long distance.

The quality and durability of the global economic recovery process depends to a great measure on how the BRICS economies perform. We have reason to be satisfied with the management of our economies, but there is no room for complacency. The developments in West Asia and North Africa and the aftermath of the huge tragedy that befell Japan have introduced fresh uncertainties in the global recovery process. At the same time, the world continues to grapple with threats to security from terrorism and piracy.

As members of the G-20, the BRICS countries closely cooperate with the rest of the world. We will continue to do so as we prepare for the next G-20 Summit in France.

It is a unique coincidence that this year all the BRICS countries are also members of the United Nations Security Council. We have therefore agreed to intensify our consultations to address the major economic and political challenges that face us. An important objective must remain the reform of institutions of global governance to make them truly representative of contemporary realities.

I am deeply encouraged by the consensus among us of the need for an international order that is rule based and respects the unity, territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence of individual States.

I have invited the BRICS leaders to India for the next BRICS Summit in 2012, and I am happy that they have accepted my invitation.

I once again thank President Hu Jintao for hosting this Summit and for his admirable leadership in guiding it to a successful conclusion.

Thank you.
Sanya (China), April 14, 2011.

Your Excellency President Hu Jintao,

Your Excellency President Medvedev,

Your Excellency President Dilma Rousseff,

Your Excellency President Zuma,

Distinguished delegates.

The theme of this meeting is "Broad Vision and Shared Prosperity". The Sanya Declaration and the Action Plan that we will be adopting later today outlines the contours of where we would like to be in the years ahead.

For us it is a matter of great satisfaction that a BRICS Summit is taking place for the first time in Asia. The fact that we are meeting in China is equally significant. The balance of power is shifting to the Asia-Pacific region, and China has admirably withstood the consequences of the global economic and financial crisis.

From a geopolitical perspective, the BRICS economies occupy a strategic economic position. They possess a significant percentage of the world’s landmass and an even more considerable percentage of the global population. The evolution of BRICS and its broad appeal among all our peoples is a reflection of emerging realities, and full of hope.

The challenge before us is to harness the vast potential that exists among us. We are rich in resources, material and human. We are strengthened by the complementarities of our resource endowments. We share the vision of inclusive growth and prosperity in the world. We stand for a rule-based, stable and predictable global order. We respect each other’s political systems and stages of development. We value diversity and plurality. Our priority is the rapid socio-economic transformation of our people and those of the developing world. Our cooperation is neither directed against nor at the expense of anyone.

We have the opportunity to give concrete meaning to the concept of sustainable and balanced development, and produce innovative models of development. We can cooperate in clean and alternative sources of energy and technologies. Nuclear safety has emerged as a major source of concern the world over after the tragedy in Japan. We should cooperate in this area, as well as in disaster relief and management.
We live in an age when science and technology and the growth of human knowledge are becoming major determinants of the power and wealth of nations. We should share our experiences in capacity building, education and skill development.

As large and diverse societies we are vulnerable to new and emerging threats to our security. It is our duty to our citizens that we cooperate in the fight against terrorism, extremism and intolerance and other non-traditional threats like piracy.

We should join hands in ensuring a peaceful and orderly transformation of the world order that reflects contemporary and emerging realities. This should be the case whether it is the reform of political and security governance structures in the United Nations or the international financial, monetary or trade system.

India reaffirms its commitment to a balanced and ambitious outcome to the Doha round of WTO negotiations. India will continue to engage with its partners to facilitate a rule-based multilateral trade regime which is fair, equitable and addresses the development agenda effectively.

We are embarked on a major enterprise of socio-economic change for our peoples. Cooperation among BRICS holds the promise of building an external environment for ourselves that helps each of us and complements our task of nation building. To that extent I would say the best is yet to come.

India stands ready to work with other BRICS countries to realize these goals. Our economy is more open and more connected to the world than it has been in the past. Our financial and capital markets are sound, and eager to absorb foreign direct investment. We have put in place ambitious schemes for the social and infrastructure sectors which have begun to bear fruit. The creative energies of our people have been unleashed. The economy is well on its way to a long term annual growth rate of more than 9%.

Our Ministers and officials must be mandated to give practical shape to our vision and take steps that bring the benefits of our collaboration to the common man.

I thank you.
083. Briefing by Secretary (Economic Relations) Manbir Singh on BRICS Summit.

Sanya (China), April 14, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good afternoon to all of you. You are aware that the BRICS Summit this morning started with a restricted session of the leaders followed by the plenary meeting, next there was a Joint Press Conference, and President Hu Jintao also hosted a banquet lunch for the leaders and other distinguished invitees. Prime Minister addressed the plenary session and I am sure you have copies of the address of the Prime Minister at the plenary. You have also received the address of the Prime Minister at the joint media event, and you have the Sanya Declaration with you.

Secretary (ER) is here to brief you about India’s participation in the BRICS Summit. He is joined by our Ambassador to Beijing Dr. S. Jaishankar. I will request Secretary (ER) to make an opening statement, and thereafter he will be happy to take a few questions.

Secretary (ER) (Shri Manbir Singh): Thank you, Vishnu. Thank you all for coming here and for your enthusiasm and interest in what have been happening since the morning.

As we had briefed you in Delhi and NSA and Minister for Commerce and Industries briefed you, there was a theme for the meetings and there were mainly four agenda items. These agenda items were: (1) international situation; (2) international economic, financial and trade issues; (3) challenges of sustainable development; (4) cooperation amongst the BRICS. Today morning, after the photo session of the five BRICS leaders, President Hu Jintao addressed himself first on the four issues, and gave his views. Thereafter he invited the other Presidents and our Prime Minister to give their views in the order of the BRICS countries - Brazil, Russia, and then India and South Africa.

The discussions and the meeting took place in an extreme atmosphere of friendliness and understanding. It was apparent that on almost all the world views, and we had a very rich agenda covering almost all political issues that face the world today, economic issues, monetary, financial issues, climate change issues, piracy, terrorism, reforms of the UN, reforms of the International Monetary Fund. So, there was a huge gamut of issues and as the leaders spoke one after another what was very apparent was that there was a complete harmony of views. I will not use the word almost but I would say the complete harmony of views because they all echoed each other's views. That is why I feel that the BRICS as a grouping is very important because all these emerging countries, major countries, almost have the same views on major issues that confront the world. There was also a great spirit of understanding, bonhomie and support to the idea of the BRICS grouping and that we must take it forward.

You have the statements made by the five leaders before the press at the plenary, which essentially covers major part of the discussions that took place; and you have our Prime Minister’s statement as well; and then we have the Sanya Declaration which goes in detail of all the issues that were covered. So, I will just mention one by one the various issues on which the leaders spoke up.

There was strong desire for peace, security, development and cooperation. I think this is a very common desire for all these countries because they are all developing countries. And what developing countries need is peace, a facilitative environment for growth and development. So, all the leaders came up very strongly that there should be peace, security and there should be cooperation for development and growth. Also, this is a time in our world situation where there are complex changes taking place. These BRICS powers are emerging, they are called emerging powers because their growth rate is very high, and they are overtaking some of our long established economic powers of the world. So, it is in their interest and it is as well in the interest of the world that most of the world institutions reflect the changes that are taking place. So, they all spoke about establishing a more equitable and a fair world.

Again peace, harmony, cooperation, scientific development, economic, financial and BRICS serves as a major platform for dialogue and cooperation, they reaffirmed it. Global economic governance should be strengthened. Democracy in international relations, voice of emerging and developing countries to be strengthened, these are the themes that I was just now talking about. All the BRICS countries affirmed the central role of the United Nations. They wanted the United Nations strengthened. It should be able to face global challenges and threats. And they spoke about comprehensive reforms of the United Nations including the UN Security Council. As all of you know, India is an aspirant for the UNSC permanent seat. We already have a temporary, rotating seat for 2011-2012. And we have been saying that the UN now reflects the realities of the post World War II and that it should reflect the realities of the contemporary world. So, earlier the BRICS formulation on this issue has been reforms of the UN, but now there is an added dimension - including the UN Security Council.

There was concern over the turbulence in the Middle East and North Africa. There was also mention of terrorism as a scourge and also cyber crime. It was felt that the major economies should coordinate macroeconomic policies. You would recall that after the recession in 2008, the G20 came into being. Previously we used to have G8 and then we had Special Invitees which included India as well. But it was felt that for the economic governance of the world, there should be a bigger number of countries which had economic strength. So, the G20 came into being and they had a number of meetings on which they coordinated their macroeconomic policies which were very helpful in overcoming the recession. But it was felt that this recession, though it has been overcome, the growth and development is still uneven; there are areas where there would be concern, there is greater consolidation required in Europe. There are some countries which are facing very serious fiscal deficits there. Therefore, there should be more engagement, more discussions on the international monetary situation, and there should be coordination on the macroeconomic policies.

There was a great support for the Group of 20 countries. It was felt that the Group of 20 countries is very essential, it should be strengthened. The BRICS gave their support. They said that it should become the main instrument for the economic governance of the world. They spoke about the reform of the International Monetary Fund. They also spoke about a broad-based international currency, it should be examined, the idea of a broad-based international reserve currency should be examined including that of the Special Drawing Rights (SDRs). They expressed concern on cross border capital flows because this is what they call hot money these days because it has become very easy to transfer large amount of funds from one country to another country. It creates volatility in foreign exchange. So, there is this gamut of issues, capital inflows, fluctuations in foreign currency, etc., this all comes under the broad rubric of international monetary and financial governance. So they felt that this needs to be strengthened.

They also expressed concern on volatility in commodity prices. The prices of food, the prices of energy products have been fluctuating very violently, going up, then slightly going down, then going up. So, it was felt that this is not conducive to good economic growth, and therefore all the countries should study how this volatility in commodity prices needs to be controlled.

Then there was some discussion on the nuclear energy and everybody felt that nuclear energy is very essential but strict observance of safety standards must be resorted to in the light of what had happened I think in Japan. Though nobody specifically mentioned Japan - everybody expressed their condolence on the loss of life there and the loss suffered by that country - but the nuclear energy discussion I want to say that the background was what has happened in Japan. And they confirmed that nuclear energy is required, is essential, but that the safety norms need to be strengthened.

There was support for South Africa's having UN Conference on Climate Change in 2011, and there was support for the Conference on Sustainable Development that Brazil is going to host in 2012. We are going to host a Conference of the Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity and Cartagena Protocol on Biosafety in 2012. That was also mentioned.
There was a very strong resonance and all the Presidents and Prime Ministers agreed that the Doha Round should have a conclusion which is comprehensive and balanced; and they felt that in the interest of the world trade which needs to be strengthened especially when there are still elements of recessionary trends that we should guard against any protectionist measures by any countries.

Then they spoke about BRICS cooperation and everybody was very keen and they felt very happy, they were satisfied, I would use the word satisfied, that since the time the BRICS has started convening regularly after Yekaterinburg, that there has been a large number of forums and meetings where they have an exchange of ideas, views and they put some more ideas on how to exchange and the cooperation, and this is included in the action plan along with the Sanya Declaration.

There was a strong sentiment for cooperation in science, technology and innovation and it was felt that for a very meaningful poverty eradication and improving the living standards of the people education, good quality education is a must, as well as research work and cooperation in science and technology.

The Prime Minister offered to host the next Summit of the BRICS in India in 2012 and the other countries welcomed this and were very supportive that India should.

There is one statement that our Prime Minister made that I want to quote to all of you. In the context of what is happening in the Middle East, North Africa, he said, "There is a shift of power towards the ordinary citizens" - which I felt sums up the situation there, it is a tragic situation but it is summed up very well by the Prime Minister - "People determining their own future. People determined to take their own decisions".

This is what I want to say in the beginning. If there are any questions, I will be happy to take them.

Question: In the Joint Declaration, the names of India, Brazil and South Africa are mentioned and the Declaration says that the BRICS support their aspirations to play a greater role in the UN. Since it is practically impossible for all the three countries to get a permanent seat, do you think that will slow down the process of India getting a seat in the near future?

Secretary (ER): You know that all the three countries are aspirants. It may well be possible to accommodate all three and perhaps even more. So, I do not rule it out. I have not seen any papers or I have not received any signals or indicators which would suggest that accommodating all three would be difficult. I think all the three countries have their merits. South Africa which is the latest entry into the BRICS countries is also, as you know, a country with a lot of influence, with a sound political system, and in contributes towards peace and stability in Africa. It is trying to participate in peace activities in Libya, in Cote d'Ivoire. So, you cannot say that. South Africa with India with Brazil is a possibility, and all three are aspirants.

Question: The Joint Declaration refers to a kind of an agreement that there have to be coordinated macroeconomic policies on the BRICS countries. I assume that this is in the context of the overall view also taking the G20 and the need for a calibrated pullout or bail out of the stimulus measures that were introduced post 2008 crisis. While G20 has taken a clear stance that these stimulus policies need to be phased out over a period of time, the Declaration here does mention about economic overheating and asset bubbles. My question is that if you are talking about coordinated macroeconomic policies, are you suggesting a new timeframe for the kind of … pullout of the stimulus packages?

Secretary (ER): The statement just says 'coordination on macroeconomic policies'. Coordination can only occur after discussions. So, unless there are discussions, how would you coordinate your policies? You have mentioned some of the concerns. There are other concerns as well because they are saying that because of very expansionary monetary policies it is having an adverse effect on commodity prices. Other countries say that if they have a tighter monetary policies, already the manufacturing is suffering, so it may suffer more. So, these are issues that need to be talked about. But it is important that these issues are underlined and the perspective of every country is taken on board, and then some via media can be found.

Question: Sir, on the issue of these…local currencies, have you achieved any final resolution on inter-currency acceptability?

Secretary (ER): The background of this is that at the last summit in Brasilia there was a very strong feeling. And you know at that time there were a lot of currency fluctuations that the banks of each of the BRICS countries should meet and work out some kind of a modality whereby trade, projects and loans can be encouraged. So, Exim Bank from India and the other banks have had I think two meetings over the last one year, and they have come up with what I would say a framework agreement. But in financial sector all these issues require a lot of clarity and lot of detailed work. So, the agreement which they have signed today, which is a framework agreement says it is subject to national laws. So, the national laws of each country are overriding, and they will within the national laws find out means to assist trade, investment and projects in each other's countries.

Question: Two questions. Talking about the framework agreement on local currency, is it one way to diminish the importance of the dollar as a trading currency in BRICS economies? Secondly, as far as the Special Drawing Rights (SDRs) are concerned, what is India's position, because we do not have much clarity on that, on the inclusion of Yuan in the SDR?

Secretary (ER): As far as the dollar is concerned I have not heard it said by anybody that it is their desire to diminish the value or the importance of the dollar. Dollar, as you know, is a reserve currency and most of the BRICS countries - whether it is India, China and the others - are holding large amounts of reserves in dollars at present apart from other currencies as well. So, trying to facilitate trade in their own currencies should not be construed as being something that would work against the value of the dollar. But at the same time you should look at what is happening in the international world today. The reserve currency dollar has necessitated for the USA to continue to have a deficit for a long time and this deficit continues. And there is now a strong public pressure within the US Government that this deficit should be brought to a stop or curtailed. And how will you curtail the deficit without actually stringing in the reserve currency? So, these are all things that are happening and in the background people are talking that this reserve currency is fluctuating, then we must have another reserve currency which may not be a substitute but is an alternative. Substitute would mean that you replace one by the other. But the alternative means they have a choice - you have dollar, you have SDRs. But what was felt today was that these are issues which are complex issues on which there should be studies and there should be detailed recommendations because you cannot go without studying what are the implications. You do not want to do something as a palliative to a certain issue and then find that on a score of other issues you are sorry. So, the decision that they are taking is that let us explore SDRs. SDRs have been a reserve currency since a very long time but it is not being expanded. So, let us see what can be done with the SDRs.

Question: Was inclusion of Yuan an issue?

Secretary (ER): That was never an issue. That never came up.

Question: But what is India's position?

Secretary (ER): This is very hypothetical. Because this issue has never come up we have never studied this issue.

Question: What is India's specific position in ... What does India want?

Secretary (ER): We would like a very detailed study on it. We feel that the BRICS as such should do a detailed study on the implications of expanding the SDRs. We are not seeing SDRs as international reserve currency, but we are now talking about expanding the SDRs. You cannot expand the SDRs to double the amount they are in a year or two years. It will have to be over a period of five years or six years. But what are the implications, how can it be done, what would be the contribution of all the economic powers in the strengthening of the SDRs and expanding, these studies need to be done. This is what everybody wanted.

Question: My question is related to what you have mentioned about the nuclear energy and the safety. Was the decision of a general nature or was any specific programme or details discussed? Can you throw some more light on this?

Secretary (ER): These were the leaders of the countries who are discussing this issues, the nuclear safety, nuclear energy; and they were discussing a gamut of issues, development issues, they were discussing that fluctuation in energy prices. In this context the question of nuclear energy also came up; and it was felt that nuclear energy is something which is important but also that the safety norms should be strengthened. But there was no nuclear energy expert at the meetings to discuss the great details. Probably that is what you were asking. It was a general discussion.

Question: There are two permanent members in the BRICS on the Security Council and you have for the first time included reforms in the UN Security Council. At the same time the Declaration does not specifically endorse the candidature of the other three nonpermanent members - India, Brazil, South Africa. Was there any discussion at all on the matter of expansion of UNSC? And in particular what was the Chinese stand in this respect?

Secretary (ER): The only thing I can say is that this is a consensus statement. The two permanent members - China and Russia - are part of this consensus which the statement has. This statement is satisfactory as far as we are concerned.

Question: That is being seen as an endorsement for the three other nonpermanent members.

Secretary (ER): It is an endorsement. You have to study this. They have said, "Playing a larger role in the UNSC". And if you see the previous line, they have talked about an expanded UNSC. You have to draw your own conclusions from that.

Question: Sir, the Action Plan mentioned that there will be a conference on security in China at the end of this year. Will this conference include the question of terrorism and cybercrime in the light of what has been mentioned in the Declaration?
Secretary (ER): This is a meeting of the National Security Advisors. The National Security Advisors usually include whatever is topical with regard to security. These issues of cybercrime and terrorism have been put on the agenda of BRICS. So, I have no doubt that it will come up in the NSA meetings.

There is another agreement that has been concluded today - it was separately done in the Business Forum - on the BRICS business focal points. So, the BRICS countries will have a focal point if they have any enquiries where to send it in the other country.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you.

084. Sanya Declaration issued at the end of the Summit of the BRICS countries.

Sanya (China), April 14, 2011

Sanya Declaration
(BRICS Leaders Meeting, Sanya, Hainan, China, April 2011)

1. We, the Heads of State and Government of the Federative Republic of Brazil, the Russian Federation, the Republic of India, the People’s Republic of China and the Republic of South Africa, met in Sanya, Hainan, China for the BRICS Leaders Meeting on 14 April 2011.

2. The Heads of State and Government of Brazil, Russia, India and China welcome South Africa joining the BRICS and look forward to strengthening dialogue and cooperation with South Africa within the forum.

BRICS aims at contributing significantly to the development of humanity and establishing a more equitable and fair world.

4. The 21st century should be marked by peace, harmony, cooperation and scientific development. Under the theme "Broad Vision, Shared Prosperity", we conducted candid and in-depth discussions and reached broad consensus on strengthening BRICS cooperation as well as on promoting coordination on international and regional issues of common interest.
5. We affirm that the BRICS and other emerging countries have played an important role in contributing to world peace, security and stability, boosting global economic growth, enhancing multilateralism and promoting greater democracy in international relations.

6. In the economic, financial and development fields, BRICS serves as a major platform for dialogue and cooperation. We are determined to continue strengthening the BRICS partnership for common development and advance BRICS cooperation in a gradual and pragmatic manner, reflecting the principles of openness, solidarity and mutual assistance. We reiterate that such cooperation is inclusive and non-confrontational. We are open to increasing engagement and cooperation with non-BRICS countries, in particular emerging and developing countries, and relevant international and regional organizations.

7. We share the view that the world is undergoing far-reaching, complex and profound changes, marked by the strengthening of multipolarity, economic globalization and increasing interdependence. While facing the evolving global environment and a multitude of global threats and challenges, the international community should join hands to strengthen cooperation for common development. Based on universally recognized norms of international law and in a spirit of mutual respect and collective decision making, global economic governance should be strengthened, democracy in international relations should be promoted, and the voice of emerging and developing countries in international affairs should be enhanced.

8. We express our strong commitment to multilateral diplomacy with the United Nations playing the central role in dealing with global challenges and threats. In this respect, we reaffirm the need for a comprehensive reform of the UN, including its Security Council, with a view to making it more effective, efficient and representative, so that it can deal with today’s global challenges more successfully. China and Russia reiterate the importance they attach to the status of India, Brazil and South Africa in international affairs, and understand and support their aspiration to play a greater role in the UN.

9. We underscore that the concurrent presence of all five BRICS countries in the Security Council during the year of 2011 is a valuable opportunity to work closely together on issues of peace and security, to strengthen multilateral approaches and to facilitate future coordination on issues under UN Security Council consideration. We are deeply concerned with the turbulence in the Middle East, the North African and West African regions and sincerely wish that the countries affected achieve peace, stability, prosperity and progress and enjoy their due standing and dignity in the world according to legitimate aspirations of their peoples. We share the principle that the use of force should be avoided. We maintain that the independence, sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of each nation should be respected.

10. We wish to continue our cooperation in the UN Security Council on Libya. We are of the view that all the parties should resolve their differences through peaceful means and dialogue in which the UN and regional organizations should as appropriate play their role. We also express support for the African Union High-Level Panel Initiative on Libya.

11. We reiterate our strong condemnation of terrorism in all its forms and manifestations and stress that there can be no justification, whatsoever, for any acts of terrorism. We believe that the United Nations has a central role in coordinating the international action against terrorism within the framework of the UN Charter and in accordance with principles and norms of the international law. In this context, we urge early conclusion of negotiations in the UN General Assembly of the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism and its adoption by all Member States. We are determined to strengthen our cooperation in countering this global threat. We express our commitment to cooperate for strengthening international information security. We will pay special attention to combat cybercrime.

12. We note that the world economy is gradually recovering from the financial crisis, but still faces uncertainties. Major economies should continue to enhance coordination of macro-economic policies and work together to achieve strong, sustainable and balanced growth.

13. We are committed to assure that the BRICS countries will continue to enjoy strong and sustained economic growth supported by our increased cooperation in economic, finance and trade matters, which will contribute to the long-term steady, sound and balanced growth of the world economy.

14. We support the Group of Twenty (G20) in playing a bigger role in global economic governance as the premier forum for international economic cooperation. We expect new positive outcomes in the fields of economy, finance, trade and development from the G20 Cannes Summit in 2011. We support the ongoing efforts of G20 members to stabilize international financial markets, achieve strong, sustainable and balanced growth and support the growth and development of the global economy. Russia offers to host the G20 Summit in 2013. Brazil, India, China and South Africa welcome and appreciate Russia's offer.

15. We call for a quick achievement of the targets for the reform of the International Monetary Fund agreed to at previous G20 Summits and reiterate that the governing structure of the international financial institutions should reflect the changes in the world economy, increasing the voice and representation of emerging economies and developing countries.

16. Recognizing that the international financial crisis has exposed the inadequacies and deficiencies of the existing international monetary and financial system, we support the reform and improvement of the international monetary system, with a broad-based international reserve currency system providing stability and certainty. We welcome the current discussion about the role of the SDR in the existing international monetary system including the composition of SDR's basket of currencies. We call for more attention to the risks of massive cross-border capital flows now faced by the emerging economies. We call for further international financial regulatory oversight and reform, strengthening policy coordination and financial regulation and supervision cooperation, and promoting the sound development of global financial markets and banking systems.

17. Excessive volatility in commodity prices, particularly those for food and energy, poses new risks for the ongoing recovery of the world economy. We support the international community in strengthening cooperation to ensure stability and strong development of physical market by reducing distortion and further regulate financial market. The international community should work together to increase production capacity, strengthen producer-consumer dialogue to balance supply and demand, and increase support to the developing countries in terms of funding and technologies. The regulation of the derivatives market for commodities should be accordingly strengthened to prevent activities capable of destabilizing markets. We also should address the problem of shortage of reliable and timely information on demand and supply at international, regional and national levels. The BRICS will carry out closer cooperation on food security.

18. We support the development and use of renewable energy resources. We recognize the important role of renewable energy as a means to address climate change. We are convinced of the importance of cooperation and information exchange in the field of development of renewable energy resources.

19. Nuclear energy will continue to be an important element in future energy mix of BRICS countries. International cooperation in the development of safe nuclear energy for peaceful purposes should proceed under conditions of strict observance of relevant safety standards and requirements concerning design, construction and operation of nuclear power plants.

20. Accelerating sustainable growth of developing countries is one of the major challenges for the world. We believe that growth and development are central to addressing poverty and to achieving the MDG goals. Eradication of extreme poverty and hunger is a moral, social, political and economic imperative of humankind and one of the greatest global challenges facing the world today, particularly in Least Developed Countries in Africa and elsewhere.

21. We call on the international community to actively implement the outcome document adopted by the High-level Plenary Meeting of the United Nations General Assembly on the Millennium Development Goals held in September 2010 and achieve the objectives of the MDGs by 2015 as scheduled.

22. Climate change is one of the global threats challenging the livelihood of communities and countries. China, Brazil, Russia and India appreciate and support South Africa's hosting of UNFCCC COP17/CMP7. We support the Cancun Agreements and are ready to make concerted efforts with the rest of the international community to bring a successful conclusion to the negotiations at the Durban Conference applying the mandate of the Bali Roadmap and in line with the principle of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities. We commit ourselves to work towards a comprehensive, balanced and binding outcome to strengthen the implementation of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and its Kyoto Protocol. The BRICS will intensify cooperation on the Durban conference. We will enhance our practical cooperation in adapting our economy and society to climate change.

23. Sustainable development, as illustrated by the Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, Agenda 21, the Johannesburg Plan of Implementation and multilateral environmental treaties, should be an important vehicle to advance economic growth. China, Russia, India and South Africa appreciate Brazil as the host of the 2012 UN Conference on Sustainable Development and look forward to working with Brazil to reach new political commitment and achieve positive and practical results in areas of economic growth, social development and environmental protection under the framework of sustainable development. Brazil, Russia, China and South Africa appreciate and support India's hosting of the eleventh meeting of the Conference of the Parties to the Convention on Biological Diversity. Brazil, China and South Africa also appreciate and support the sixth meeting of the Conference of the Parties serving as the meeting of the Parties to the Cartagena Protocol on Biosafety to be held in October 2012.

24. We underscore our firm commitment to strengthen dialogue and cooperation in the fields of social protection, decent work, gender equality, youth, and public health, including the fight against HIV/AIDS.

25. We support infrastructure development in Africa and its industrialization within framework of the New Partnership for Africa's Development (NEPAD).
26. We have agreed to continue further expanding and deepening economic, trade and investment cooperation among our countries. We encourage all countries to refrain from resorting to protectionist measures. We welcome the outcomes of the meeting of BRICS Trade Ministers held in Sanya on 13 April 2011. Brazil, China, India and South Africa remain committed and call upon other members to support a strong, open, rule-based multilateral trading system embodied in the World Trade Organization and a successful, comprehensive and balanced conclusion of the Doha Development Round, built on the progress already made and consistent with its development mandate. Brazil, India, China and South Africa extend full support to an early accession of Russia to the World Trade Organization.

27. We reviewed the progress of the BRICS cooperation in various fields and share the view that such cooperation has been enriching and mutually beneficial and that there is a great scope for closer cooperation among the BRICS. We are focused on the consolidation of BRICS cooperation and the further development of its own agenda. We are determined to translate our political vision into concrete actions and endorse the attached Action Plan, which will serve as the foundation for future cooperation. We will review the implementation of the Action Plan during our next Leaders Meeting.

28. We intend to explore cooperation in the sphere of science, technology and innovation, including the peaceful use of space. We congratulate the Russian people and government upon the 50th anniversary of the flight of Yury Gagarin into the space, which ushered in a new era in development of science and technology.

29. We express our confidence in the success of the 2011 Universiade in Shenzhen, the 2013 Universiade in Kazan, the 2014 Youth Olympic Games in Nanjing, the 2014 Winter Olympic and Paralympics Games in Sochi, the FIFA 2014 World Cup in Brazil, the 2016 Olympic and Paralympics Games in Rio de Janeiro and the FIFA 2018 World Cup in Russia.

30. We extend our deepest condolences to the people of Japan with the great loss of life following the disasters that struck the country. We will continue our practical support to Japan in overcoming consequences of these catastrophes.

31. The leaders of Brazil, Russia, India and South Africa extend our warm appreciation to China for hosting the BRICS Leaders Meeting and the Hainan Provincial Government and Sanya Municipal Government and their people for their support to the Meeting.

32. Brazil, Russia, China and South Africa thank India for hosting the BRICS Leaders Meeting in 2012 and offer their full support.

085. Proposal by India to create a special Science, Technology and Innovation (STI) fund for BRICS.

September 15, 2011.

Minister of State for Science and Technology, Earth Science and Planning Commission Dr. Ashwani Kumar today announced India’s support at the Summer Davos conference at Dalian, China organized by World Economic Forum and Confederation of Indian Industries (CII).

Dr. Ashwani Kumar said that India would be willing to contribute an initial sum of USD 2 million as its share of the contribution to the proposed 10 million USD BRICS STI Fund and also offered three key proposals.

In his Keynote address at the meeting, Dr. Ashwani Kumar emphasized the need for collectively harnessing the scientific and technological knowledge to address the challenges of this century that humankind faces in common like hunger, malnutrition, pandemics, climate change, energy, food security and many more. Talking about the potential areas for STI collaborations among BRICS countries he opined that the BRICS countries the Minister said that the BRICS countries are large in size and their energy requirements are likely to scale new proportions with the growth of their economies. New sources of clean energy based on second generation bio-fuels developed through recourse to biotechnology could form an important program for co-investment. Energy efficient transportation and civil aviation needs are also bound to increase many fold, he commented. Shri Ashwani Kumar informed about India’s eight missions under National Plan on Climate Change and emphasized that the challenge to balance between the responsibilities to mitigate emission of green house gases while maintaining our GDP growth momentum is common to all BRICS nations. This is an area where BRICS countries could all cooperate and global problems could be countered best through collaborative excellence, he mentioned.

The three key proposals include various fields One, India will pursue BRICS STI cooperation activities in the areas of shared priorities such as Energy, Water, Health, Natural Disaster Management, ICT, Basic research in emerging areas of S&T, Industrial clusters especially involving MSMEs. Second, India is in favor of setting a BRICS Framework of STI Cooperation that promotes some common objectives to be overseen by BRICS STI Working Group. And the third, creation of a "BRICS STI Fund" with annual contributions from each member country for supporting cooperation activities under the BRICS STI framework. Mr. Kumar announced that to begin with, the initial contribution could be to the tune of US$ 2 million per member country and India is prepared to undertake its share of commitment.
086. Joint Communiqué issued by the BRICS Finance Ministers' at the end of their Meeting.

Washington DC, September 22, 2011.

We, the BRICS Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors, met on September 22, 2011 in Washington DC, USA, amid growing concern regarding the state of the global economy.

While BRICS countries recovered quickly from the 2008-09 global financial crisis, some of us have been subject to inflationary pressures and growth prospects of all our countries have been dampened by global market instability. In advanced countries, the build up of sovereign debt and concerns regarding medium to long-term plans of fiscal adjustment are creating an uncertain environment for global growth. Also, excessive liquidity from aggressive policy actions taken by central banks to stabilize their domestic economies has been spilling over into emerging market economies, fostering excessive volatility in capital flows and commodity prices.

The immediate problem at hand is to get growth back on track in developed countries. In this context we welcome the recent fiscal package announced by USA as well as the decisions taken by Euro area countries to address financial tensions, notably by making the EFSF flexible. It is critical for advanced economies to adopt responsible macroeconomic and financial policies, avoid creating excessive global liquidity and undertake structural reforms to lift growth create jobs and reduce imbalances.

The current situation requires decisive actions. We are taking necessary steps to secure economic growth, maintain financial stability and contain inflation. We are also determined to speed up structural reform to sustain strong growth which would advance development and poverty reduction at home and benefit global growth and rebalancing. The contribution of BRICS countries and other emerging market economies to global growth is rising and will increase further. However, global rebalancing will take time and its impact may not be felt sufficiently in the short-term. We will also work to intensify trade and investment flows among our countries to build upon our synergies.

The BRICS are open to consider making additional efforts in working with other countries and International Financial Institutions in order to address the present challenges to global financial stability, depending on individual country circumstances.

We are concerned with the slow pace of quota and governance reforms in the IMF. The implementation of the 2010 reform is lagging. We must also move ahead with the comprehensive review of the quota formula by January 2013.
and the completion of the next review of quotas by January 2014. This is needed to increase the legitimacy and effectiveness of the Fund. We reiterate our support for measures to protect the voice and representation of the IMF’s poorest members. We call on the IMF to make its surveillance more integrated and evenhanded.

Multilateral Development Banks are considered by developing countries as important partners in helping them meet their long term development finance needs. In the current global economic environment, the Banks need to mobilize more resources to increase their assistance to low income and other developing countries including finding ways of expanding their lending capacity, so that development finance is not neglected.

In the face of a slowdown of global economic growth, it is necessary to maintain international policy co-operation and co-ordination. We remain committed to work with the international community, including making contributions to the G20 Cannes Action Plan consistent with national policy frameworks to ensure strong, sustainable and balanced growth. We shall work together in searching for a coordinated solution to the current challenges as we did in 2008-09."

CHOGM

087. Media briefing by Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai on Vice-President’s visit to Perth for CHOGM.

New Delhi, October 25, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good evening to all of you and sorry to keep you waiting.

You know that Hon. Vice-President of India would be leaving for Perth to head the Indian Delegation at the Commonwealth Heads of Government Summit, on the 27th morning. Foreign Secretary would like to brief you about the visit of the Vice-President for the CHOGM Summit. We also have with us Mr. P. Harish, to the right of Foreign Secretary, who is the Joint Secretary in the Vice-President’s Secretariat.

I would like to invite the Foreign Secretary to make his opening statement.

Foreign Secretary (Shri Ranjan Mathai): Thank you.
The 54-nation Commonwealth Heads of Government Summit Meeting, or CHOGM, will be held at Perth in Australia from October 28 to 30, 2011. It will be preceded by the Pre-CHOGM Foreign Ministers Meeting on October 26 and 27, 2011.

Hon'ble Vice-President of India will be leading the official Indian delegation to the Summit. The External Affairs Meeting will be heading the Indian delegation to the Pre-CHOGM Foreign Ministers meeting. The Delegation includes the Foreign Secretary, the Additional Secretary for International Organisations Mr. Dilip Sinha, other senior officials and members of the media. There will be an Indian business delegation at Perth which is headed by the CII President Designate Mr. Adi Godrej. The Vice President proposes to leave New Delhi on 27th and return on the 31st. CHOGMs have a format of: (a) Executive Sessions, where Heads of Government interact in a more formal manner and they make statements, and are accompanied by Ministers or officials, and (b) a Retreat, where the Heads of Government interact informally with their counterparts without the presence of any aides. This element of CHOGM is what makes it a unique forum for interaction among the leaders of 54 member countries.

The theme of CHOGM this year, chosen by Australia, is ‘Building National Resilience, Building Global Resilience’. Australia has circulated a Concept Paper on the theme which focuses on strengthening the Commonwealth, to enable it to more effectively assist member nations in dealing with current challenges as individual states, as members of the Commonwealth, and as members of the global community. The paper focuses on issues related to economic and social development, food and energy security, and the adverse effects of climate change. Efforts are also underway to enhance the Commonwealth’s role in international fora, particularly the G20 process, the 17th Conference of Parties (COP-17), and the Rio+20 meeting on sustainable development scheduled in Brazil next year.

In addition, the Heads of Government are expected to review developments within the Commonwealth and globally. They will discuss a whole gamut of issues of relevance to the Commonwealth ranging from the promotion and protection of fundamental political values in the Commonwealth, the global economic situation, international trade, the Commonwealth’s engagement with the G20, climate change and sustainable development, and initiatives to deal with the concerns of the youth and women. A discussion on small states, which is particularly important here because 32 of the 54 Commonwealth countries are actually small states, will be held especially in the context of their vulnerability to economic volatilities.

In terms of the Outcome Documents, the Heads of Government are expected to issue a joint communiqué spelling out the position of the Commonwealth on major issues including these international issues that are of importance to the Association. A stand-alone Declaration on Food Security Principles is also expected to be negotiated and adopted.

A number of Commonwealth-affiliated organizations such as Business, Youth and People’s Forums will also be meeting during this period in Perth. Reports on their activities will be presented to Foreign Ministers at their meeting.

The Commonwealth Business Forum, to which I alluded earlier, would meet from the 25th to the 27th and as I said Mr. Adi Godrej would be leading the Indian Business Delegation.

As an international organization the Commonwealth has innate strengths and considerable expertise in areas pertaining to economic, social, environmental and governance issues. It has emerged as a ‘one-stop shop’ for many of its members to easily access a variety of assistance and support in these areas such as technical advice, financial support, consultancy, feasibility reports, managerial training and skill development. The Commonwealth is also doing important work in the areas of gender equality, education and youth. The Commonwealth has been a pillar of support for many of the geographically smaller developing countries, whom I referred to earlier, particularly in facing the challenges arising out of the global economic and financial crisis.

India is the largest member of the Commonwealth and has nearly 60 per cent of its total population. A number of Commonwealth countries also have sizeable numbers of Persons of Indian Origin in their population. India is presently the fourth largest contributor to the Commonwealth’s assessed budgets and the fifth largest contributor to the voluntary Commonwealth Fund for Technical Cooperation (CFTC), which is used for providing technical assistance and capacity-building to its developing member states. India has consistently, constructively and significantly contributed to various Commonwealth activities and has stepped up its engagement with the organization in recent times. We have also increased our contribution to CFTC to over one million pounds since 2009-10.

During the last CHOGM in 2009 in Port of Spain, the Hon’ble Prime Minister had announced several initiatives to support Commonwealth activities, including enhanced training slots, contributions to the Media Development Fund and the Commonwealth Partnership Platform Portal, and support for the new Commonwealth Small States Office in Geneva. All these commitments have been fulfilled and they demonstrate India’s continuing commitment to the Commonwealth.
As you are aware, Mr. Kamalesh Sharma is presently the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth. During his tenure, the Commonwealth has noticeably scaled up activities, particularly in its support to Small States and the efforts to influence the international debate on global economic governance. Shri Sharma’s re-election for a second term would also be considered by leaders at the CHOGM in Perth.

Thank you.

Question: How relevant is the Commonwealth today? And is it because it is not that important that the PM has not found the time for it?

Foreign Secretary: I think the Commonwealth retains its relevance. As you are aware, it has evolved considerably since 1949 when it came into existence. The fact that it has been, as I described it, a particularly useful grouping for assistance particularly of a technical and economic nature has been actually appreciated globally. Just to mention an example, there have been in the last few years countries which are otherwise not associated with Britain have chosen to join it. The Commonwealth when it started became a voluntary association of States which had this special connection with Britain. But even other developing countries which have no such connection have chosen to join it. To give you examples, Mozambique joined the Commonwealth in 1995, Cameroon followed a few months later, and Rwanda joined the Commonwealth in 2009.

India has, we believe, a natural partnership with the organisation. It is after all a community of English speaking nations all of whom have a common law system. The focus on South-South cooperation through the Commonwealth has been very effectively managed and used. It also deals with values of democracy, good governance, and others. But I would say in particular the ability of the Commonwealth to provide a direct interaction and a forum for cooperation and technical assistance to many of the small States, as I said 32 out of 54, particularly in small States from the Pacific islands and the Caribbean, political dialogue in an informal setting, economic cooperation and technical cooperation, this provides us a very natural platform.

As to the Prime Minister attending, as you are aware the Prime Minister has had a very heavy schedule of meetings just now and he has a couple of very heavy international commitments going forward in the next few weeks. It is in this context that the hon’ble Vice-President, and we were extremely appreciative of that, kindly agreed to lead the Indian delegation to CHOGM.

Question: Sir, what are our expectations so far as terrorism is concerned because it is a global issue? Is the Summit going to discuss how to tackle it?
Secondly, can the Commonwealth really provide some answer to the present financial crisis facing the West and the US?

Foreign Secretary: Terrorism would obviously come up in the retreat and the political level discussions. But it would come up in the context of global cooperation against terrorism and in a very general form. I do not really expect a very focused, specific attention on terrorism.

But as to the global financial system, the Commonwealth has the very special advantage of having in it countries which are in the G20 both from the industrialised world and from the developing world, and some other countries who are being marginalised because of the global financial crisis. So, it has an ability to bring together very differing viewpoints in a very informal setting as well as in the formal communiqué and to try and combine the interests, concerns and perceptions of all these three categories of countries. So, I think it would provide a forum for a very useful debate.

Question: There has been a push in Australia and also from the Canadian Prime Minister to have the Sri Lankan proposed hosting of CHOGM in 2013 postponed until there has been some, I think it has been said, progress on human rights and accountability there over the war and some allegations of war crimes. What is India’s position on that? Secondly, with regard to the Eminent Persons Group Report that is likely to be submitted during CHOGM, there are some suggestions that India does not support the creation of a Human Rights and Rule of Law Monitor. Can you speak about that and explain what India’s objections are?

Foreign Secretary: First of all on Sri Lanka, the decision was taken in 2009 for the next two CHOGM Summits. I think that matter has been decided already and it is not a subject which needs to be reopened.

As far as the Eminent Persons Group is concerned, we have seen the report and we had a discussion on it in New York. The Foreign Ministers of the Commonwealth met. I was present at that meeting. The report is very voluminous. It has got 106 recommendations covering the entire range of activities of the Commonwealth. The report itself was prepared over a period of one year with five meetings between July 2010 and July 2011. Since that time the member governments have had only a few weeks to actually look at it and in fact to start a discussion on it. I would not like to comment on each of the recommendations. Even these 106 have been classed into 14 core recommendations and the others. There are a number of areas where we think there is need for a more careful view.

Certainly the proposal for the Commissioner for Democracy, Rule of Law and Human Rights is one on which we have some reservations. The responsibilities spelt out in this would seem to undermine the role of both the Secretary-General and the Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group itself which is actually dealing with precisely those issues. Secondly, it seems to us that this particular proposal is like a duplication of what the UN is already doing through its Rapporteurs. And at a time when the organisation is facing budgetary difficulties whether it should really go that direction, is not quite clear. In fact, I raised the specific issue as to where the money was going to come from, and it was mentioned that it might involve reallocation of some of the resources of the Secretariat as of now. And when you consider that the current allocation and budget of the Commonwealth secretariat has been decided after considerable discussion and approval by the Heads, reallocation at this stage does not seem appropriate. It seems to us that the real focus of the Commonwealth should be once again on the development challenges which are uppermost in the minds of the vast majority of the members. So, while we support the important values of democracy, rule of law and human rights, we believe the Commonwealth should focus on strengthening the existing institutions rather than trying to create new ones.

Question: Sir, for most of the issues that have been raised during the CHOGM Summit, it almost seems that countries like Australia and Canada are kind of focusing the issues on smaller countries and of course countries like India, be it polio, human rights, many things. So, what are some of the issues that India, given the fact that India represents the voice of most of the smaller countries, might raise asking from countries like Australia and Canada? Secondly, will the issue of exports of uranium be raised on the sidelines with Australia once again?

Foreign Secretary: Our focus is not specific to any one or two members. I will ask the Joint Secretary to the Vice-President to comment on polio because this has just come and he has just been advised about it. But considering the focus which we have always been giving, it is for the organisation as a whole and that it should retain its very unique ability to provide for the needs of the small States and small members assist in the process of development. I think that would be our main aim. As you can see, we have been gradually stepping up our own contributions to it through economic and technical cooperation. One of the initiatives we took a couple of years ago was to create a portal for improving e-learning and through such mechanisms we think there is an ability of the organisation as a whole to really respond to the felt needs of the smaller members of the Commonwealth. I think that is the direction we would specifically go.

As to what we would discuss, the Vice-President is having a couple of bilateral meetings. Those are still in the process of being finalised. All issues in our bilateral relations would be certainly discussed. I do not know if there would be any specific focus on uranium. That is more a subject which may come up Joint Secretary and OSD to Vice-President (Shri P. Harish): Yesterday was the World Polio Day and it was in this context that there have been Op Eds in most Australian newspapers authored by Bill Gates and the Prime Minister Gillard. I think there is also an Australian history to polio eradication. The call was given by a very eminent Australian citizen in this regard. So, I think as far as India is concerned, this is the first year where we have had only one incidence of polio and that too on the 13th of January this year in West Bengal, amounting to near polio eradication. However, I think the cause for vigilance has been highlighted by the Government of India. There have been incidents of outbreak of polio in the neighbourhood, in Pakistan and China and a few other countries. So, vigilance is continuing. I think the National Polio Eradication and Monitoring Campaign has in that sense achieved significant success.

Question: Sir, you spoke about climate change at CHOGM. As far as global warming is concerned, India and China and many African countries have a certain stand. It appears from reports that South Africa may be wavering and may be changing its position. If that is so, are we going to discuss this with South Africa or leave this out? The other issue, Sir, is slightly different. Senior Cabinet Minister Subodh Kant Sahai has just said that this US travel advisory is hurting and will continue to hurt travel to India as far as tourism is concerned. So, would you take this up with the Americans?

Foreign Secretary: On your first question, I am not aware that a specific bilateral has been scheduled with the South Africans. But certainly we have a number of fora during which we discuss matters with the South Africans and certainly we would be discussing with them before head into the COP-17.

On the travel advisories, we have noticed that these advisories have been issued by the US and some other countries. What we have been told is that these countries are obliged under their legal system to regularly advise their citizens on travel related issues to any foreign country. It is understood that these countries took on board some of the Indian media reports about the heightened security concerns and the precautions in India during the festive season and had accordingly brought this to the attention of their citizens. There have also been references to some of our own advisories from time to time which are not of the same nature. It is a combination of different sources of information based on which they make their assessment. We on our part have conveyed it certainly to the Americans, and we will do it with the others, that we feel that the language of these advisories was a little disproportionate in that the security situation in India is basically normal and tourists have nothing from the Australians rather than from us. On polio would you like to add something? to fear. The Minister for Tourism in fact spoke to me about this and he highlighted the fact that Jammu and Kashmir this year has received a record number of tourists, the highest in 25 years. And of course we will be conveying this kind of information to our interlocutors, and we will continue to convey to them that whatever they wish to do under their own legal obligations should be proportionate and carefully modulated.

Question: I just wanted to get a sense of bilateral meetings Vice-President may have in Perth.

Foreign Secretary: They are still in the process of being finalised. But those which are scheduled are the Prime Minister of Australia, the Leader of Opposition also of Australia, and the President of Seychelles. These have so far been firmed up.

Question: My question is about the incident just two days earlier when an Indian chopper crossed over to Pakistan. There are reports that they have taken the GPS Coordinates of many helipads in India. What is your response to what Pakistan has done? Also, do you appeal to the forces on the border on the Indian side to be more sensitive in future? This time around they are back safe, but if it recurs they may be shot down.

Foreign Secretary: As to media report, I would not wish to comment on it. As of now it is just a report from the media and I would prefer not to comment on it. But in all our discussions we are actually working on what are called confidence-building measures and certainly the need for vigilance and care on both sides is a part of that. But I think this particular incident was simply a matter of straying. The fact that it has been resolved quickly and amicably is a matter of satisfaction.

Question: Foreign Secretary, what are the chances of a discussion on West Asia and North Africa, especially after Gaddafi’s death? Will there also be any kind of discussion on whether there is a responsibility of the countries which have intervened in nation-building?

Foreign Secretary: I do not see any reference in the programme as it stands to engage and to discuss specifically Libya in the Commonwealth context because usually the Commonwealth deals only with issues involving its own members. But certainly when Heads of State and Government get together and review the global situation, it is inevitable that those countries which are directly affected, and we have some Commonwealth member States from Africa and from the Mediterranean who are very close by, obviously there would be a general discussion on it. Our position as you know is very clear. We are now engaged and we are in contact with the National Transitional Council. Our Charge d’affaires visited Tripoli and established contact with them. But the upsurge which has been taking place across the West Asia and North Africa is something of course we would discuss with others. Our basic point is that changes such as they are in these countries should be led by the populations of those countries by themselves. Any move towards democratisation is obviously welcome. But as we have said, for the outside world it is to be supportive but not to seek reordering of societies through military force. This is something we totally reject.

Question: Sir, you said India is one of the larger contributors to the Commonwealth. How much is it in numerical terms and how does it compare to the other major contributors like Australia and Canada?

Foreign Secretary: As I said, for the CFTC itself we contribute over a million pounds. There is a separate contribution we make for the running of the Commonwealth Secretariat. And there are also some individual programmes we run. For example, the ICCR handles the scholarship programme which is totally different. Our contribution to the Secretariat is about 640,000 pounds. To the Commonwealth Foundation, which does a lot of work with non-governmental organisations, it is 140,000 pounds. The Commonwealth also has joint offices in New York and Geneva the main aim of these being to provide office space and a venue for many small countries who would otherwise find it very difficult to manage office space in international organisations. To the one in New York it is about 100,000 dollars; and to the one in Geneva it is 80,000 dollars. There is a Commonwealth Media Development Fund. You would be happy to hear, we have given them 60,000 dollars as part of a 120,000 paid over two years. As I said, for the Commonwealth Fund for Technical Cooperation it is about 1.1 million pounds. The Commonwealth Partnership Platform Portal which, I referred to on the e-government and learning, it is again 100,000 pounds. For the Commonwealth Youth Programme, which is aimed at youth activities and sports, it is another 50,000 pounds. I do not have the contributions of the other members. But we will certainly get it for you.

Question: In Australia in the last few days there has been a bit of self reflection on the fact that the Prime Minister of India is not coming to CHOGM and whether that reflects the fact that as a neighbour we have failed to properly engage India and build the relationship that we consider very important for our future in Australia. What would you say to Australians who believe that perhaps we have failed as a nation to properly engage India? And secondly, it is an old chestnut I know, in your bilateral discussions to come with Prime Minister Julia Gillard will India be raising the issue of uranium exports to India?

Foreign Secretary: I think if there is any impression that the Prime Minister’s participation reflects on our bilateral relations would be most unfortunate and not correct. As I said, the Prime Minister’s engagements being what they are, his commitments were very heavy indeed. In our system the Vice-President holds a position of great importance. The Vice-President is in our Warrant of Precedence in fact second highest personality of our State. The Vice-President has vast experience in international affairs. He is eminently qualified to deal with issues on the global stage. We were honoured that he accepted to lead the Indian Delegation. So, I do not think it would be appropriate to draw any kind of conclusion apart from the fact that the Vice-President leading the Indian Delegation is the right decision.

As to the bilateral, as I said the subject has come up for discussions in the past. Our understanding is that Australia has to make up its own mind on what it will do with uranium. We would welcome a discussion when it does so.

Question: Sir, India has increased its contribution to the IMF also. This was cleared by the Cabinet today. Can you give us a little detail on this?

Foreign Secretary: I am afraid anything that deals with our contribution to IMF will be announced by the Finance Ministry when it is good and ready.

Question: Will the issue of migration be taken up in the Commonwealth Summit? Bangladesh feels that the process has to be more humane.

Foreign Secretary: It is one of the issues which will be discussed. Exactly in which format and which particular segment, that I do not have right now. But certainly yes, we have seen a reference to the Bangladeshi wish to have this item also as one of the items for discussion.

Question: Sir, side by side with CHOGM Australia is hosting a meeting of largely small developing states on the issue of climate change. Most of these states are members of the G77. There has been some concern that developing countries have been luring them to their point of view by offering financial aid. Will India be doing any sort of negotiation or influencing of these small states in light of Durban? Secondly regarding climate change, the Environment Ministry and the positions it is putting out seem to have given more of an emphasis on equity this year than there has been in the last few years in India’s position, and that has not been taken too happily among developed countries. What is the External Affairs Ministry’s position on that?

Foreign Secretary: It is a Government of India’s position. In fact, equity has been the basis of our position all along. I cannot recall an occasion when equity was not among the highest priorities for the Indian negotiators. So, I do not think it would be appropriate to say that there has been any change in the situation there. As regards the Australian meeting with the small island developing states, I do not have too much information on that perhaps because we are not a small island developing state.
Question: Not small island developing states, small developing states.

Foreign Secretary: Small developing states. No. We continue our discussions with those countries in every available forum. We meet in G77 as you said. Commonwealth is an area where we will certainly be joining in the discussions. But I do not see a separate interaction on this occasion.

Question: Sir, on the issue of homosexuality decriminalisation, India is one of the countries which have recently done it. Will India be urging other countries as well to take steps within the Commonwealth?

Foreign Secretary: Not that I am aware of.

088. Media Briefing by Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai on Vice-President’s engagements at Perth.

Foreign Secretary (Shri Ranjan Mathai): Good evening ladies and gentlemen. I am basically going to be discussing the Vice-President’s schedule and his meetings yesterday and today. I have with me our High Commissioner to Australia Mrs. Sujatha Singh; Additional Secretary (IO) Mr. Dilip Sinha; Joint Secretary (UNP) Mr. Pavan Kapoor; and Mr. P. Harish who is the Joint Secretary in the Vice-President’s Secretariat.

Yesterday the Vice-President had basically one meeting and that was a bilateral meeting with the Leader of the Opposition of Australia Mr. Tony Abbott who was accompanied by the Shadow Foreign Minister and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition Julie Bishop. The two leaders reviewed bilateral relations and spoke on the fast-growing engagement between our two countries. Later on I will request the High Commissioner to add a little bit on background on that, after I finish the other engagements.

The Vice-President held some internal briefings also yesterday evening. This morning his programme included the following. He attended the inaugural session of the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting which was a very impressive ceremony. Thereafter, the Vice-President proceeded to what was called the Executive Session-1, which was the opening you might say of the actual meeting. The one significant element in that meeting was the welcome which was accorded to the President of Rwanda. As you are aware, Rwanda joined the Commonwealth and President Kagame was attending his first Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting.

Thereafter, the Executive Session took up the report of Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group (CMAG). The report was presented by the Foreign Minister of Ghana and the main issue was that of Fiji. In respect of Fiji, the CMAG reported that they have held four meetings since the last Heads of Government meeting but there has been really no progress towards Constitutional rule and so Fiji remains suspended.

A mention was made that the Special Representative of the Secretary-General had passed away. The Secretary-General, who is Shri Kamalesh Sharma, said that a new Special Representative would soon be appointed.

Thereafter, Mr. Kevin Rudd, the Foreign Minister of Australia presented the outcome of the Foreign Ministers' meetings which had taken place on the two previous days. As you aware, our External Affairs Minister Shri S.M. Krishna had represented India in that meeting. The External Affairs Minister had to leave because he is in fact going to be reaching Japan tonight where he will be participating in the India-Japan Strategic Dialogue.

In the presentation made by the Foreign Minister of Australia Mr. Kevin Rudd, three issues were highlighted. One was the process of the communiqué or the Outcome Statement of the Commonwealth. The CMAG report, on having been presented by the Foreign Minister of Ghana, was adopted. As you are aware, the Eminent Persons Group had been set up under the chair of Mr. Badawi, former Prime Minister of Malaysia. That report has made 106 recommendations. So, there was some discussion on various items on that. Thereafter, even this discussion takes into account the broad rubric of what is called Commonwealth for the Future, planning for the future of the Commonwealth. The discussions which took place on the EPG report and the CMAG and others would be continued in the Retreat Session which starts tomorrow morning.

Prior to the presentations there were also separate reports on the Commonwealth Connect - which is a portal created with contributions from India and some contributions also from UK, Canada and Australia - which is designed to improve information connectivity within the Commonwealth.

There was also a report on the United Nations Secretary-General's Global Sustainability Panel. The Foreign Minister of Australia made a detailed presentation on that along with President Zuma of South Africa who is the Co-Chair of UN Secretary-General’s Global Sustainability Panel. The issue was in the context of the Commonwealth also being involved in some of those issues relating to sustainability. The Eminent Persons Group meeting was discussed in the afternoon. Mr. Badawi presented the report himself and there was a very lively discussion on that particular subject. Tomorrow the Retreat is likely to continue the discussions on the EPG as well as the other issues remaining on the agenda.

On the bilaterals, as I mentioned already, the Leader of the Opposition of Australia met the Vice-President yesterday. Subsequently in the evening, Vice-President met the President of Seychelles and they reviewed the fast-growing bilateral cooperation between our two countries. There was a considerable discussion on the fight against piracy. In fact it is of interest that even while the meeting was going on, the Australians had convened another meeting at Foreign Ministers’ or senior officials’ level on the fight against piracy which was attended by both the Foreign Minister and the Defence Minister of Australia.

In the Seychelles meeting, the President of Seychelles expressed appreciation for India’s help in capacity-building, particularly under the ITEC programme, but also in the field of security. A number of issues relating to the Indian Ocean were also discussed. Seychelles is considered one of the very important tourist destinations in the world, and the potential for more Indian tourists was discussed. There was also some discussion on the marine zone cooperation.

As we speak, the President is preparing to attend a banquet which is being hosted by Queen Elizabeth II, and that will finish the programme of the day. As I said, tomorrow will be the Retreat. It is an occasion for informal discussions and it is expected that as a result of these informal discussions, any remaining issues relating to the Outcome Document, the EPG, the other issues on the agenda will get completed in a very informal setting.

That is all I really have to say. We will take a few questions. I will ask my colleagues also to share in answering those questions.

Question: In tomorrow’s retreat Vice-President would be talking about the EPG and the other issues. Can you highlight a few of the other issues?

Foreign Secretary: The completion of the communiqué itself involves the final outcome on the entire gamut of issues which have been discussed both during the Foreign Ministers and during the Vice-Presidents themselves. There are two Executive Sessions - one is on global sustainability, as I said. There is the food security issue under the broad title of what the Australians have given. The entire conference is on building global resilience and building national resilience. The issue of food security and how the Commonwealth must address this issue and assist countries in need for capacity-building to handle food security, would certainly be one of the issues.

There will also be a review of global and Commonwealth developments, promotion of fundamental political values, and women as agents of change. In fact, it is interesting that during the inaugural ceremony the Prime Minister of Australia did remark on the fact that the outgoing President was the lady Prime Minister from Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago; and she was handing over to a lady Prime Minister of Australia; and this was done in the presence of the lady Head of the Commonwealth who is the Queen. The Australians have put a great deal of emphasis on this subject of women as agents of change. In fact, during one of the presentations there was a very interesting statistic that the introduction, bringing women into the work force in the last decade or two decades has been a greater contribution to world GDP than even the increase of China’s GDP. I was not aware of this but this was presented as part of one of the UN statistics. So, women as agents of change will be one. There is going to be some discussion on youth. In fact, tomorrow very early in the morning some officials and some of the Heads may be attending what is called a Sports Breakfast. There is a discussion on that. And youth programmes will be another subject of discussion.

The UK Prime Minister also presented some ideas on the diamond jubilee of the Head of the Commonwealth that is Queen. This really relates mostly to those countries for whom the Queen is actually the Head of State. But broadly within the Commonwealth the other countries will be happy to hear about these initiatives also. And then they have the title ‘Any Other Business’, so then they can discuss any other business.

Just to mention, in the nature of these international meetings you have what are called ‘pull asides’ in which they meet on the margins. The Vice-President also had you might say ‘pull aside’ meetings with the Heads of Government of Namibia and of Malawi. As you are aware, India has placed a great deal of emphasis on increasing its engagement with African countries. The cooperation programmes, the lines of credit, issues like these were briefly mentioned in these pull aside meetings.

Question: Does the empowerment of the CMAG mean that you will not need a Human Rights Commissioner?

Foreign Secretary: The subject of the Human Rights Commissioner is in the EPG report. As I said, there was a lively discussion on it. The subject broadly has still to be finalised by the Heads. So, I do not want to presume what decision they will take. But it was mentioned and there was almost a consensus at the Foreign Ministers’ level that the idea of a Human Rights Commissioner needed further study. But as I said, that was just a consensus which emerged from the first level of meetings. But this is a Heads of Government meeting. So, please do not take that as something I am announcing. It is just the fact. The Heads of Government will take a view on this.
Question: What were the arguments for and against the move?

Foreign Secretary: You have to read the entire report. It is a very voluminous document. I will be happy to share it with you at some point. It has 106 recommendations. This is one of them. This is one which goes into considerable length. This was discussed in New York also when we attended the UN General Assembly. The Canadian Senator Segal, who is one of the principle authors of the report and this particular idea, came and explained it. He said that the idea is that the Commonwealth has like a Good Offices role but Good Offices are taken up or the CMAG gets into an issue when there is a particular, if not a crisis, a change in situation somewhere and then the Heads of Government meet and take note of it; or if a particular government chooses to put in a request on the issue. But a Commissioner for Human Rights would be like a permanent body all the time monitoring human rights situation, assisting with capacity-building, assisting with research - in fact this is one of the issues they have mentioned at some length - on the subject of human rights, governance, democracy and these kind of issues.

This is the way it has been presented. The argument against - this was mentioned in New York, so it is not anything secret - was that the UN already has the system Rapporteurs; it already has systems by which human rights are monitored on a very regular basis; secondly that within CMAT you have a mechanism; and further what would be exactly the relationship between this Commissioner and the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth who is actually supposed to implement all these decisions of the Commonwealth; and finally the issue of where do we get the money from for running this kind of a Commissioner. This was a question which was asked even in Delhi. I raised it in New York and there was some talk of reallocation of resources. Today there was a mention that there were some programmes which have outlived their utility and so on, so those could be satisfied and the Commissioner could be set up. I think the whole tenor of the discussion finally did reveal that there are a lot of areas which still need clarification. How this will fit in, whether we can afford it, whether decisions which have been taken in the past and the budget can be just overturned by just one decision, all these issues will take a lot of discussion. So, a consultation process is necessary. This is what a lot of people argued. The Heads of Government will review this and decide on their own and finally they will tell us what they have decided.

Question: I would supplement Mr. Rakesh on this human rights issue. For your information, there were some very strong demonstrations held near this hotel. Some 2000 activists demonstrated in favour of the Human Rights Commissioner to Lanka and India especially. Do you find any hidden hand or hidden agenda for these people to get organised in such a manner and to raise slogans on their own?

Foreign Secretary: Since I did not see the demonstrations, I cannot talk about what hand they have hidden behind their back. Broadly speaking, as you aware, there is a strong demand for this. Certainly as a country which values good governance, human rights, and democracy, the subject per se is not a problem for India. The issue is, whether these kinds of accepted values, which we accept as fundamental values, are really primarily an issue for domestic debate, domestic consultations, and for the international community to be of assistance when required in capacity-building, in assisting people, in engagement. So, I think that is the nature. I do not know? What were the demonstrators saying?

Response: The demonstrators were raising slogans against India and Lanka and asking that this Human Rights Commissioner be sent to these countries, that the war criminals be put to trial in the court, that third degree methods should not be there, that detention centres should be closed, and all sorts of things. There were almost 2000 people. It must have been funded by someone.

Question: Sir, on the issue of this Special Commissioner thing some amount of hype has been generated as you know in our media back home. So, to be on the right side of reporting I just wanted to know how many countries supported our point of view because ultimately what matters is the numbers on any issue in the international community. Secondly, this evening just a little while ago the Secretary-General has announced a set of indicators to ascertain conformity to the core values of the Commonwealth by the Member States. Has our delegation endorsed the entire set of indicators, or are there any one or two issues on which we have some reservations? Reasonable restrictions on media and civil society activism is one of the indicators. In a throbbing democracy like ours, some of our own people can make an issue out of it and take it the Commonwealth. How would it impinge upon our approach and action on this?

Foreign Secretary: I have not actually seen those indicators. If I could get back to you on that a little later, we will do that. On the Commissioner, I start with the caveat that this is a debate which is going on. So, I hesitate to try and give you numbers and so on. As I said, this is a matter on which the Heads of Government will take a view. Generally speaking, I think when the Australian Foreign Minister presented his summing up, at the Foreign Minister’s level there was certainly a very large majority which did not see that the Commissioner for Human Rights was necessary in the form it has been presented at this stage. The majority basically was saying that we need further discussion on the issue, we need a process of consultation. It is not strictly against or strictly for. It was just that the subject needs much further examination.
Question: Sir, you said that there was lively debate about the EPG and much of that of course was about the Human Rights Commissioner. But were there other issues, other recommendations that have also been a matter of debate or disagreement of any sort? And the other question is, in the press conference especially the one with the Secretary-General and the Australian Prime Minister, a number of questions seem to be on Sri Lanka. Like the demonstration on the streets, it has a major target and attention during this. Within ...(Unclear)... has any allegations regarding Sri Lanka’s human rights record? Has that come up? Has it been brought up by any country?

Foreign Secretary: In addition to the EPG, there was a discussion on the proposed Charter of the Commonwealth. That is another issue. Actually in the EPG report itself there is a charter which has been appended. Though the report per se does not go into the charter in any detail as far as I recall, in effect the EPG report is also presenting this Charter of the Commonwealth. This is again another issue on which there was some lively debate as you might put it. Basically the consensus which was emerging was that the charter itself is not a bad idea, it is a good idea, but what would it do? It would in effect be putting together in one document many concepts, values, ideas, which have already been accepted in previous Commonwealth meetings or through the process of consultation which the Commonwealth has. For example, the principle one would be the document which is called the Affirmation of Principles and Values which was adopted two years ago in Port of Spain. The issues were also like when you come up with a charter which you then declare and it has all these documents, is it legally binding or is it not legally binding. The general consensus was that it should not be, it should be more of a declaratory nature even if you call it a Charter. On this issue also I think the general consensus was, we need to look at this again and go slow.

On your question about Sri Lanka, at the Heads of Government level at least I have not seen. I was present in the sessions today. There was no reference. But if there was any at the Foreign Ministers’ level, maybe you can address this question. I was not here on the first day.

Additional Secretary (IO): Sri Lanka issue was not on the agenda except in terms of the next Summit which will take place in Colombo about two years later. And that has been reaffirmed by the Foreign Ministers.

Question: The strengthening of the CMAG, ...(Unclear)... was that either implicitly or explicitly discussed as a possible compromise for not having the Human Rights Commission accepted? Was that discussed implicitly or explicitly?
Foreign Secretary: Implicitly to the extent that the CMAG report as it was presented did have a lot of recommendations and ideas which pointed in the direction that the CMAG has the capacity to do many of these things which are being proposed in the EPG’s Commissioner concept. Would you like to expand on that a little?

Additional Secretary (IO): Yes, Sir. One needs to make a distinction between the EPG report and the CMAG report. CMAG is an inter-governmental body, it has Ministers in it. So, CMAG has itself been going into the question of reforming and its own working. The EPG Report is a civil society voice. It is a non-government report. There were individual members in it. So, the Governments have not yet had an opportunity to take a look at it and discuss it. So, there is a distinction between the two. The CMAG report came as a report of the Ministers of the countries that are there on the CMAG as a representative body which represents the Foreign Ministers from countries of different regions. So, there is a clear distinction between the two. The EPG report is more in the nature of the views of academics and leaders, former politicians, etc., who have given their recommendations which now have to be looked at. They have been looked at by the Foreign Ministers. The Heads will look at them. Then they will decide what further action needs to be taken on these reports before they crystallise into some kind of implementation by the Commonwealth.

Foreign Secretary: Would you like to add anything on the bilateral relations with Australia? Is there a meeting proposed?

Indian High Commissioner to Australia (Shrimati Sujatha Singh): There is a going bilateral engagement between India and Australia. The Vice-President will be having a bilateral meeting with Prime Minister Gillard on Sunday. The relationship is a fast-growing one virtually in all areas, especially in trade and investment. Australia is India’s eighth largest trading partner. Total trade is about 22 billion Australian dollars. Mineral resources account for 88 per cent of Australia’s exports to India. Investment is growing. All our IT majors are here, 17 of them. There is a large number of software development centres. There are growing investment in Australia’s mineral resources sector here in Western Australia as well as in Queensland where the mineral resource is the coal. Good cooperation in mineral resources. Several action plans for coal, for new and renewable energy, power. There is excellent cooperation also on the scientific research front. We have a large Australia-India Strategic Research Fund. Good people-to-people contacts. So, it is a good relationship growing strongly.

Question: Any progress on the sale of uranium to India?
Indian High Commissioner: Australia has a position on this which is not India-specific. When they are ready to talk to us about it, we will be ready to talk to them.

Foreign Secretary: We have not raised it*.

Thank you.

* Media reports suggested that the Indian team during its stay in Perth interacted with the Australian leadership for supply of Uranium. Australia has a strict uranium export regime which is not India specific. The Vice President even spoke to the leader of the Opposition in Parliament who leads the Centre-right Liberal Party of Australia. “If the [Australian] government was serious about reducing global emissions, they would lift the ban on selling uranium to India,” Mr. Ansari told Australian TV channel ABC. Australia did realize that India’s civil nuclear power programme was not dependent on Australian uranium. Mr. Rudd, the Australian Foreign Minister told the Australian media that “If you hear an argument from an Indian businessperson that the future of the nuclear industry in India depends exclusively on access to uranium, that is simply not sustainable as a proposition” since there was no problem in terms of global supply. (After this there has been change in the Australian position. Please also see Document No.340.) 089.  Perth Declaration on Food Security Principles.

Perth, October 29, 2011.

1.  Food insecurity is one of the most pressing and difficult global challenges of our time. This is a profound concern for the Commonwealth – half of the world’s one billion hungry live in our nations. The global food crises of 2007 and 2008 and the ongoing volatility and uncertainty of world food markets underscore the need for sustained international engagement with the issue. The distressing humanitarian crisis in the Horn of Africa, most particularly in Somalia, and the drought, famine and famine-like situations occurring in other most vulnerable countries in the developing world highlight the difficulties we face.

2.  Population growth will have a major impact on global demand for food. Additional factors, including scarce land and water resources, the diversion of fertile land, the reduction in crop species and use of crops for non-food purposes, urbanisation, distorted markets, and climate change, are intensifying pressures on supply. The world’s poor and most vulnerable suffer most from food insecurity.

3.  Commonwealth countries reaffirm the right of everyone to have access to safe, sufficient and nutritious food, consistent with the progressive realisation of the right to adequate food in the context of national food security.

4.  Commonwealth member states affirm the important role that women, youth, farming and fishing communities, civil society, and the private sector play in sustainable development and the need for their effective involvement in driving climate-smart agriculture and the food security agenda.

5.  The Commonwealth is uniquely placed to support global food security efforts through Commonwealth countries’ membership in all major global and regional forums that are engaged on this issue. Commonwealth countries therefore commit to use their membership of these forums to advocate the Perth Declaration on Food Security Principles to achieve outcomes that are relevant and meaningful to members. Commonwealth members further commit to use the Perth Declaration principles as a guide to support domestic efforts to build food security.

6.  The Perth Declaration principles reflect our shared approach to addressing the challenge of food insecurity and are focused on meeting the needs of the most vulnerable, particularly women and children.

7.  The Perth Declaration principles on food security call for:

   a.  coordinated and timely regional and global emergency relief efforts to deal with immediate crises;
b. undertaking decisive and timely measures to prevent crises occurring, mitigate their impact when they do and build resilience;

c. delivering practical measures over the medium-term to make agriculture, including irrigated agriculture, and fisheries more productive and sustainable;

d. strengthening support to government-led programmes and initiatives based on the spirit of effective partnerships;

e. development of country-led medium to long-term strategies and programmes to improve food security and ensure alignment of donor support to implementation of country priorities;

f. scaling up nutritional interventions, including those that target mothers and young children, and incorporating nutrition considerations into broad food security initiatives;

g. enhancing research and development over the longer term to build a sustainable agricultural sector, including through the promotion and sharing of best agricultural practices, in order to feed and nourish the people of the world;

h. strengthening fisheries and marine resource management in member states' waters to ensure sustainability of these resources for national and global food security, including through addressing illegal unregulated and unreported fishing;

i. improving international market access for food producers, including smallholders and women, through trade liberalisation measures such as the elimination of tariff and non-tariff trade barriers and avoidance of restrictions on food exports;

j. addressing the impediments that are inhibiting economic opportunities for these important producers, including lack of affordable financing, local value-added and adequate infrastructure;

k. collaboration between international organisations, donor countries, and national governments to address production, storage, waste reduction, elimination of post-harvest losses, transportation and marketing challenges; this collaboration could include more effective ways of meeting infrastructure financing gaps that engage the private sector; and
I. improving the institutional framework for global food security efforts, including by supporting reform of the UN Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO).

8. Commonwealth countries recognise that Africa has the potential not only to achieve food security but to become a significant net food exporter. Leaders commit to supporting efforts and initiatives such as the Comprehensive Africa Agriculture Development Programme (CAADP), designed to realise the long term potential of Africa as a food producer and exporter.

9. To support African agricultural production, Commonwealth countries have committed to direct action through major investments in agricultural productivity.

10. Commonwealth countries recognise the critical role played by national and international agricultural research in promoting and sharing agricultural technologies for enhanced crop yields, and undertake to deepen their cooperation.

11. Commonwealth countries also underline their critical role in managing and safeguarding a large proportion of the world’s fish stocks.

12. In advocating the Perth Declaration principles, Commonwealth countries acknowledge the central role played by the United Nations in global food security governance and commit to show leadership in the United Nations by supporting food and nutrition security initiatives.

13. Committed to using the collective Commonwealth voice to influence global action, Commonwealth members urge the UN Conference on Sustainable Development in Rio de Janeiro in June 2012 to commit to an ambitious programme of action to drive increased investment to boost sustainable global agricultural and fisheries productivity.

14. The Commonwealth, through its five G20 members, further commits to advocate for strong outcomes on food security at the G20 Cannes Summit, including to increase investment in appropriate agricultural technologies and sustainable productivity, to address market volatility and other market-distorting factors, and for food security, including fisheries, to be accorded a high priority within the forward G20 development agenda.

15. Recognising the ongoing critical food security needs, the Commonwealth welcomes the substantial contributions made by Canada, the UK and Australia in fulfilment of their L’Aquila Food Security Initiative commitments, and calls on countries that have not yet fulfilled their food security commitments to do so.
16. Commonwealth countries will continue to prioritise food security and will assess progress towards implementation of these principles on food security at the next Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting in 2013.

Perth (Australia), October 30, 2011.

Commonwealth Heads of Government met in Perth, Australia, from 28 to 30 October 2011, under the theme ‘Building National Resilience, Building Global Resilience’. Reflecting on the unique nature of the Commonwealth, a voluntary association which brings together 541 developing and developed nations from six continents, Heads reaffirmed their commitment to the values and principles of the Commonwealth and agreed to a series of actions to maintain the Commonwealth’s relevance, to ensure its effectiveness in responding to contemporary global challenges and to build resilient societies and economies. Given the significant challenges facing the global economy, Heads emphasised the importance of the international community working cooperatively to secure a sustainable global recovery. Heads highlighted the importance of a strong response to these challenges to provide the necessary confidence to global markets.

(One member, Fiji, is currently suspended.)

Heads welcomed the report of the Eminent Persons Group, ‘A Commonwealth of the People: Time for Urgent Reform’, and thanked members of the Group for their outstanding work. They agreed that the report provided a strong basis to revitalise the Commonwealth and its institutions and ensure its continued relevance to member states and their people – today and in the future.

To this end, Heads agreed to the following:

1. Reform of the Commonwealth to ensure that it is a more effective institution, responsive to members' needs, and capable of tackling the significant global challenges of the 21st century.

This includes:
a) the reform of the Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group (CMAG);
b) consideration of the Eminent Persons Group (EPG) recommendations on reform;
c) strengthening the management and delivery of Commonwealth programmes, including through regular review of their efficiency, effectiveness and results, against measurable indicators;
d) to this end, focusing delivery of practical assistance to members through greater prioritisation and alignment of programmes to members’ priorities on the basis of Commonwealth comparative advantage and, where necessary, retiring programmes that do not meet these criteria; and
e) undertaking associated reform of the Commonwealth Secretariat and ensuring the adequacy of resources and their appropriate use to enable it to deliver on its agreed mandates.

2. To actively promote, uphold, preserve and defend the fundamental values, principles and aspirations of the Commonwealth. Heads agreed to do this by:
   a) agreeing to the recommendations of CMAG to strengthen the role of CMAG, in order to enable the Group to deal with the full range of serious or persistent violations of Commonwealth values;
   b) resolving that the composition of CMAG for the next biennium should be as follows: Australia, Bangladesh, Canada, Jamaica, Maldives, Sierra Leone, Tanzania, Trinidad and Tobago and Vanuatu.
   c) agreeing that there should be a “Charter of the Commonwealth”, as proposed by the Eminent Persons Group, embodying the principles contained in previous declarations, drawn together in a single, consolidated document that is not legally binding.
   d) Heads will agree to a text for the Charter in 2012, following a process of national consultations, consideration by a Task Force of Ministers drawn from all geographical groupings of the Commonwealth, and a full meeting of Foreign Ministers in New York in September;
   e) tasking the Secretary-General and CMAG to further evaluate relevant options relating to the EPG’s proposal for a Commissioner for Democracy, the Rule of Law and Human Rights and to report back to Foreign Ministers at their September meeting in New York;
   f) noting that the EPG’s recommendations relating to CMAG were consistent with the CMAG reforms adopted by Heads at this meeting;
g) responding to the remaining EPG recommendations as follows
   i. adopting without reservation 30 recommendations;
   ii. adopting, subject to consideration of financial implications, 12 further recommendations;

Perth
Australia
30 October 2011
Since 2008 the G20 process has been driven by the objective of arriving at coordinated responses to the challenges emerging out of an unprecedented global financial and economic crisis, and more recently of safeguarding the process of economic recovery. The global recovery remains fragile, uneven and is fraught with significant downside risks arising from the volatility in exchange rates, high commodity prices, persistently high unemployment and high inflation in some economies, and difficulties in formulating medium-term fiscal consolidation plans. Nevertheless, the coordinated response in the aftermath of the global crisis, and the resultant recovery, even if it is not complete, has clearly demonstrated the merits of a coordinated approach. A new style of economic governance appropriate to a rapidly integrating global economy is being born.

Underpinning the effort to take forward the cooperation to address structural problems in the global economy has been the G20 Framework for Strong, Sustainable and Balanced growth. Our leaders at the Seoul summit had underscored the centrality of the MAP process and the need to enhance this multilateral process to promote external sustainability, by pursuing the full range of policies conducive to reducing excessive imbalances and maintaining current account balances at sustainable levels. Persistently large imbalances are to be assessed against indicative guidelines in terms of their nature and the root causes of the impediments to adjustment, while remaining cognizant of national or regional circumstances.

At this juncture I would like to highlight a few key words in the leader’s declaration at the Seoul summit. The focus was clearly on ‘promoting external sustainability’ within the spirit of multilateral cooperation. Our leaders were careful to recognise that such an exercise should focus on persistent and excessive imbalances.

I welcome the progress made so far by the G20 Framework Working Group in the difficult task of working towards an agreed set of indicators and towards framing guidelines for addressing persistent imbalances. I hope that the remaining differences would be ironed out during this meeting. I would like to emphasise that the task of preparing guidelines, and the ensuing MAP process, should not be seen by members as one of fabricating an iron casket or a mould that would be used to shape country specific policies in a manner that one size would fit all. The objective is clearly of arriving at a consensus on a set of 'indicative' guidelines that could reduce excessive external imbalances. It would be difficult to realize our objective according to the agreed timelines if we cannot agree on indicators during this meeting. Therefore, I would strongly urge my colleagues at the table to reach a consensus on the indicators during today's deliberations. I would like to emphasis that the Framework is a joint effort of the G 20 to arrive at a road map to deal with problem of global imbalances. A positive outcome is needed to provide a signal that the G 20 is serious on ensuring strong sustainable and balanced growth for the World economy and addressing structural problems in the global economy and that it is not simply a crisis-fighting forum.

We need to proceed in a spirit of multilateral cooperation, recognising that the guidelines arrived at are not only be in the interest of the global economy, but also in the interest of individual economies regardless of their size or their current rate of growth. In this context I would like to reiterate my Prime Minister's suggestion at the Seoul Summit that a way must be found of channelling global savings to regions where huge investments are required for development and infrastructure.

The position of India in this regard is that it did not (and does not) contribute either to the buildup, or to the persistence of global imbalances. Nor does it contribute to the volatility that we have been witnessing in several of the international markets, including commodity markets. According to latest estimates, the Indian economy is estimated to have grown by 8.6% in 2010-11 and the Indian growth story remains robust.

A large emerging economy like India is vulnerable to seasonal factors and their effect on the food prices. As a result of vagaries of weather, India has witnessed a high and unsustainable inflation on the food items. The food inflation has also been accentuated by structural changes in the consumption pattern thanks to our growth. Such high food inflation has a tendency to feed into general inflation throwing challenges at our macroeconomic management. The high and persisting international prices of food commodities do not give us room for comfort in tackling food inflation in India.

We are also fortunate that the current phase of growth has been more or less evenly balanced between consumption and investment on the one hand, and between domestic demand and external demand on the other. Nevertheless, we have our share of concerns arising from elevated commodity and asset prices, and economic problems of a more structural nature that underlie the uncertainties in the global economy. Some of these uncertainties also derive from the aggressive macro-economic policy response to the global crisis itself.
Despite the two-speed global recovery, we live in a world which is becoming more integrated rather than decoupled. Any sustainable recovery must necessarily be global, where trade and capital will need to flow in a stable manner and where benefits accrue across the board by creating employment and well being without destroying livelihoods.

February 18-19, 2011.

1. We, the G20 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors, met today to address ongoing economic and financial challenges and to agree on a way forward to fulfill the mandates given to us by our Leaders.

2. The global recovery is strengthening but is still uneven and downside risks remain. While most advanced economies are seeing modest growth and persisting high unemployment, emerging economies are experiencing more robust growth, some with signs of overheating. We reaffirm our willingness to ensure a consistent and coordinated response to the challenges we face, address the root causes of the crisis and restore global economic growth on a sounder basis.

3. We reaffirm our commitment to coordinated policy action by all G20 members to achieve strong, sustainable and balanced growth. Our main priority actions include implementing medium term fiscal consolidation plans differentiated according to national circumstances in line with our Toronto commitment, pursuing appropriate monetary policy, enhancing exchange rate flexibility to better reflect underlying economic fundamentals and structural reforms, to sustain global demand, increase potential growth, foster job creation and contribute to global rebalancing. We discussed progress made since the Seoul Summit and stressed the need to reduce excessive imbalances and maintain current account imbalances at sustainable levels by strengthening multilateral cooperation. We agreed on a set of indicators that will allow us to focus, through an integrated two-step process, on those persistently large imbalances which require policy actions. To complete the work required for the first step, our aim is to agree, by our next meeting in April, on indicative guidelines against which each of these indicators will be assessed, recognizing the need to take into account national or regional circumstances, including large commodity producers. While not targets, these indicative guidelines will be used to assess the following indicators: (i) public debt and fiscal deficits; and private savings rate and private debt (ii) and the external imbalance composed of the trade balance and net investment income flows and transfers, taking due consideration of exchange rate, fiscal, monetary and other policies. We also adopted a timetable for developing the 2011 action plan that will implement our Framework for Strong, Sustainable and Balanced Growth and monitor the commitments already made. As agreed in Seoul, we call on the IMF to provide an assessment as part of the Mutual Assessment Process on progress towards external sustainability and consistency of policies at our October meeting. At that time, we will also review a report on the MAP including an action plan informed by the analysis on the root causes of persistently large imbalances based on the agreed guidelines. We will also review an assessment of progress made in meeting commitments made in Seoul.

4. The international monetary system (IMS) has proven resilient, but vulnerabilities remain, which raise the need to improve it in order to ensure systemic stability, promote orderly adjustment, and avoid disruptive fluctuations in capital flows, disorderly movements in exchange rates – including advanced economies with reserve currencies being vigilant against excess volatility – and persistent misalignment of exchange rates. Today we agreed on a work program aimed at strengthening the functioning of the IMS, including through coherent approaches and measures to deal with potentially destabilizing capital flows, among which macro-prudential measures, mindful of possible drawbacks; and management of global liquidity to strengthen our capacity to prevent and deal with shocks, including issues such as Financial Safety Nets and the role of the SDR. This will also require discussions on exchange rates issues and on the strengthening of IMF surveillance. We look forward to discussing at our next meeting in April a report from the IMF on the strengthening of the IMS and reports by the World Bank and the RDBs building on experiences, on actions to strengthen local capital markets and domestic currency borrowing in emerging and developing economies. In addition, we will benefit from the work of OECD on capital flows, and from the contributions of other relevant international organizations, such as UNCTAD.

5. We discussed concerns about consequences of potential excessive commodity price volatility and asked our deputies to work with international organizations and to report back to us on the underlying drivers and the challenges posed by these trends for both consumers and producers and consider possible actions. Keeping in mind the impact of this volatility on food security, we reiterated the need for long-term investment in the agricultural sector in developing countries. We welcomed the interim report by the IEF, IEA and OPEC to improve the quality, timeliness and reliability of the Joint Organization Data Initiative Oil (JODI oil) and call for further work on strategies to implement these recommendations to be detailed in their final report. Building on the Riyadh symposium held on January 24th, we encourage the IEF to provide concrete strategies to improve the producer-consumer dialogue at its next meeting on February 22nd 2011. Following our Leaders’ request, we call on the IMF and IEF, as well as IEA, GECF and OPEC, to develop by October 2011 concrete recommendations to extend the G20’s work on oil price volatility to gas and coal. We look forward to discussing at our next meeting the report of IEF, IEA, OPEC and IOSCO on price reporting agencies as well as the interim report on food security currently being undertaken by the relevant international organizations, and IOSCO’s recommendations, and the FSB’s consideration of next steps, on regulation and supervision of commodity derivatives markets notably to strengthen transparency and address market abuses.

6. We commit to pursuing the reform of the financial sector. Despite good progress, significant work remains. We will implement fully the Basel III new standards for banks within the agreed timelines while taking due account of the agreed observation periods and review clauses in respect of the liquidity standards. Likewise, we will implement in an internationally consistent and non-discriminatory way the FSB’s recommendations on OTC derivatives and on reducing reliance on credit rating agencies’ ratings. We look forward to the completion by the next Leaders’ Summit of the following ongoing work on systemically important financial institutions as scheduled in the FSB work program for 2011: determination of Global-systemically important financial institutions by FSB and national authorities based on indicative criteria, a comprehensive multi-pronged framework with more intensive supervisory oversight; effective resolution capacity including in a cross-border context; higher loss absorbency measures through a menu of viable alternatives that may include, depending on national circumstances, capital surcharges, contingent capital and bail-in instruments; and other supplementary requirements as determined by the national authorities including systemic levies. Once the framework initially applicable to G-SIFIs is agreed, we will move expeditiously to cover all SIFIs. We look forward to the 2 reports to be finalized by the BIS, IMF and FSB on macro-prudential frameworks and by the FSB, IMF and World Bank with input of national authorities on financial stability issues in emerging market and developing economies by our October meeting. We look forward to the recommendations that the FSB will prepare by mid-2011 on regulation and oversight of the shadow banking system to efficiently address the risks, notably of arbitrage, associated with shadow banking and its interactions with the regulated banking system. We call on IOSCO to develop by mid-2011 recommendations to promote markets’ integrity and efficiency notably to mitigate the risks created by the latest technological developments.
We also call on the FSB to bring forward for our next meeting comprehensive proposals to strengthen its governance, resources and outreach. We urge all jurisdictions to fully implement the FSB principles and standards on sounder compensation practices agreed by the G20 Leaders in Pittsburgh and call on the FSB to undertake ongoing monitoring in this area and look forward to receiving the results of a second thorough FSB peer review midyear to identify remaining gaps. We call on the OECD, the FSB and other relevant international organizations to develop common principles on consumer protection in the field of financial services by our October meeting. We reaffirm our commitment to more effective oversight and supervision, including regular stress testing of banks building on the Basel committee’s principles.

7. We reiterated our call to improve compliance with international standards and strengthen the process of identifying non-cooperative jurisdictions. We look forward to the forthcoming update by FATF of the public list of jurisdictions with strategic deficiencies and to a public list of all jurisdictions evaluated by the FSB ahead of the next G20 Leaders Summit. We welcome the 18 peer reviews issued by the Global Forum on Transparency and Exchange of Information and urge all jurisdictions so far identified as not having the elements in place to achieve an effective exchange of information to promptly address the weaknesses. We look forward to the progress report by November 2011, based on the expected completion of around 60 phase 1 reviews, to address in particular the jurisdictions’ quality of cooperation with the Forum, level of compliance and unsolved deficiencies. We call upon more jurisdictions to join the Global Forum and to commit to implementing the standards. We urge all jurisdictions to extend further their networks of Tax Information Exchange Agreements and encourage jurisdictions to consider signing the Multilateral Convention on Mutual Administrative Assistance in Tax Matters.

8. We discussed the way forward on implementing the Seoul Development Consensus on Shared Growth and its Multi-Year Action Plan. In particular we welcome the launch of the Global Partnership for Financial Inclusion last December. We also welcome the appointment of the members of the High Level Panel for Infrastructure Investment, and look forward to their recommendations by September. We discussed the report made by the UN High-Level Advisory Group on Climate Change Financing. We welcome the positive outcomes of the Cancun Climate Conference, and in particular the decision to establish a Green Climate Fund, and will pursue discussions on mobilizing sources of financing, including public and private, bilateral and multilateral, as well as innovative sources, consistent with the objective, provisions and principles of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC).
9. We reaffirm our commitment to free trade and investment recognizing its central importance for the global recovery. We will refrain from introducing, and oppose protectionist trade actions in all forms and recognize the importance of a prompt conclusion of the Doha negotiations.

10. We stand ready to support Egypt and Tunisia, with responses at the appropriate time well coordinated with the international institutions and the regional development banks to accompany reforms designed to the benefit of the whole population and the stabilization of their economies.

093. Communiqué issued by the G–20 Finance Ministers and Governor of Central Banks at their meeting at Washington (D.C).

April 15, 2011.

1. We, the G - 20 Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors, met today to address the economic challenges at hand and to progress on our previous commitments. We reaffirmed that our overriding objective is to improve the living standards of all our citizens through strong economic and jobs growth. We expressed our solidarity with the Japanese people after the tragic events, our readiness to provide any needed cooperation, and our confidence in the resilience of the Japanese economy and financial sector.

2. The global recovery is broadening and becoming more self-sustained, with increasingly robust private demand growth. But downside risks still remain. We agreed to remain vigilant and to take the actions required to strengthen the recovery and reduce risks.

Events in some Middle-East-North African countries and in Japan have increased economic uncertainty and tensions in energy prices. We noted there is adequate spare capacity to meet global energy demand.

3. In order to enhance our mutual assessment process to promote external sustainability, we agreed on a set of indicative guidelines (see attached) that complete the first step of our work to address persistently large imbalances. We now launch the second step of this process with an in-depth assessment of the nature of these imbalances and the root causes of impediments to adjustment. Based on this analysis, the IMF assessment on progress toward external sustainability, as well as the other aspects of our mutual assessment process, we will ascertain for our next meeting the corrective and preventive measures that will form the 2011 action plan to ensure Strong, Sustainable and Balanced Growth, to be discussed by Leaders at the Cannes Summit.

4. To strengthen the international monetary system, we agreed to focus our work, in the short term, on assessing developments in global liquidity, a country specific analysis regarding drivers of reserve accumulation, a strengthened coordination to avoid disorderly movements and persistent exchange rates misalignments, a criteria-based path to broaden the composition of the SDR, an improved toolkit to strengthen the global financial safety nets, enhanced cooperation between the IMF and regional financial arrangements, the development of local capital markets and domestic currency borrowing, coherent conclusions for the management of capital flows drawing on country experiences. We also agreed on the need to strengthen further the effectiveness and coherence of bilateral and multilateral IMF surveillance, particularly on financial sector coverage, fiscal, monetary and exchange rate policies.

5. We welcome the entry into force and the activation of the expanded and more flexible New Arrangements to Borrow (NAB). We will work to complete the steps required to implement the 2010 quota and governance reform by the Annual Meetings of 2012.

6. Commodity prices face increasing pressures. We welcomed the recommendations of the IEF, IEA and OPEC and committed to improve the timeliness, completeness and reliability of the JODI Oil database. We welcomed the work of international organizations on their report to address excessive price volatility in food and agricultural markets, and its impact on food security. We look forward to receiving their final recommendations, including on risk management and mitigation tools. We stressed the need for participants on commodity derivatives markets to be subject to appropriate regulation and supervision, called for enhanced transparency in both cash and derivatives markets as previously recommended by IOSCO, and asked IOSCO to finalize, by September, its recommendations on regulation and supervision in this area especially to address market abuses and manipulation, such as through formalized position management powers including the authority to set ex-ante position limits where appropriate, among other powers of interventions.

7. We welcomed the preliminary proposals of the FSB to strengthen its capacity, resources and governance including representativeness and asked the FSB to put forward formal proposals at its July meeting for review at our next meeting. We took stock of progress made to determine a cohort of global SIFIs and confirmed that the FSB will make recommendations on a multi-pronged framework with more intensive supervisory oversight, effective resolution capacities and higher loss absorbency capacity. We look forward to public consultations on SIFI recommendations and request a macroeconomic impact study by FSB and BCBS, in cooperation with BIS and IMF, to be reviewed at our next meeting. We welcomed the FSB work on the scope of shadow banking and look forward to the recommendations that the FSB will prepare for our next meeting on the regulation and oversight of the shadow banking system. We committed to set high, internationally consistent, coordinated and non-discriminatory requirements in our legislations and regulations implementing FSB recommendations on OTC derivatives markets and stressed the need to avoid overlapping regulations. We urge all jurisdictions to fully implement the FSB principles and standards on compensation. We call on the FSB to undertake ongoing monitoring in this area and will assess the results of the 2nd peer review on compensation practices by our next meeting. We will review at our next meeting progress made by the IASB and FASB towards completing their convergence project by the end of 2011 and look forward to the outcome of the ongoing IASB governance review process. We welcomed ongoing work of OECD and FSB and other relevant international organizations to develop common principles on consumer protection in financial services.

8. We agreed to maintain momentum for action to tackle non-cooperative jurisdictions and to fully implement the G20 anti-corruption action plan. We asked the Global Forum to report to us on ways to improve the effectiveness of exchange of tax information. We tasked the World Bank, working with Regional Development Banks, and the IMF, in coordination with other relevant organizations, to conduct the analysis on mobilizing sources of climate change financing, including public and private bilateral and multilateral as well as innovative sources, drawing inter alia on the AGF report consistent with the objective, provisions and principles of the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change. We support the work of the transitional committee established for the design of the Green Climate Fund. We reemphasize the importance of implementing the Seoul Development Consensus on Shared Growth and its Multi-year Action-Plan. We look forward to concrete recommendations from the High level panel on infrastructure investment by September.

G - 20 Indicative Guidelines for Assessing Persistently Large Imbalances

1. Our aim is to promote external sustainability and ensure that G20 members pursue the full range of policies required to reduce excessive imbalances and maintain current account imbalances at sustainable levels.

2. In February we agreed on a set of indicators that will allow us to focus through an integrated 2-step process on those persistently large imbalances that require policy action. These indicators are (i) public debt and fiscal deficits; and private savings rate and private debt (ii) and the external imbalance composed of the trade balance and net investment income flows and transfers, whilst taking due consideration of exchange rate, fiscal, monetary and other policies.

3. To complete the first step, we have agreed today on indicative guidelines against which each of these indicators will be assessed. While not policy targets, these guidelines establish reference values for each available indicator allowing for identification of countries for the second step in-depth assessment. Four approaches will be used:

1. A structural approach, which is based on economic models and grounded in economic theory, which benchmarks G20 members against each indicator in a way that takes into account specific circumstances including large commodity producers (e.g. its demographic profile, oil balance or trend growth).

2. A statistical approach which benchmarks G20 countries on the basis of their national historical trends.

3. A statistical approach which benchmarks G20 country’s historical indicators against groups of countries at similar stages in their development.

4. A statistical approach which draws on data, benchmarking G20 country’s indicators against the full G20.

4. Statistical approaches are based on the 1990 to 2004 period, as this is the period that preceded the large build up in external imbalances. Reference values drawn from 1990-2010 were also provided as a complement. In all four approaches, forecast figures over the 2013-15 period are compared to the values suggested by the guidelines to determine whether or not an in depth assessment should be undertaken. Those countries identified by at least two of the four approaches as having persistently large imbalances will be assessed in-depth to determine in a second step the nature and root causes of their imbalances and to identify impediments to adjustment. In carrying out this assessment, we will take due account of the exchange rate and monetary policy frameworks of members. For members of the euro area with its governance framework, this assessment will involve the appropriate authorities. National circumstances will also be taken into account. In the second step assessment, the independent IMF analysis will rely on IMF forecast data, while countries’ own assessments can use national data.
5. For the identification of countries that will move into the second stage, the selection rules for G20 countries accounting for more than 5% of G20 GDP (on market exchange rates or PPP exchange rates) will reflect the greater potential for spillover effects from larger economies.

New Delhi, September 13, 2011.

Union Finance Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee has said that one of the central objectives of the G-20 has been to address the root causes of the global financial crisis, prevent a recurrence and, going forward, to take measures to achieve strong sustainable and balanced growth. Dealing effectively with the interrelated issues of global imbalances, financial regulation, and the international monetary system are central to this agenda, he said. The Finance Minister was speaking at the international conference on ‘Global Cooperation on Sustainable Growth and Development, here today. He said that the conference had been organised around 5 broad thematic areas - global imbalances, financial regulation, international monetary system, development and commodity markets. He said that in each of these areas, the world is facing several immediate challenges and these issues are therefore the subject of ongoing discussions in the G20. He congratulated ICRIER and its partners for organizing this timely conference and bringing together eminent academics and policymakers from across 14 countries, to deliberate on these critical issues.

Finance Minister said that the G 20 demonstrated its relevance to international policy making with the success of its coordinated response on the fall-out of the global financial crisis. He said that the economic downturn was moderated and growth resumed in the second half of 2009 in most economies, although the pace of recovery remained uneven. The Finance Minister said that it appeared that policy makers had learnt theirs lessons from history by honing and harmonising the use of macro-economic policy and keeping markets open. At the same time, countries in the developed and the developing world adopted revival strategies in keeping with the needs of their respective contexts, he said.
Shri Mukherjee said that developments in recent months have been less encouraging and there is widespread apprehension that even the tepid global economic recovery that we have seen so far is stalling. Growth in most advanced economies has declined in the second quarter of 2011 and emerging markets are witnessing a combination of moderation in growth and rising inflation, he said.

The Finance Minister said that advanced economies, the Euro zone and the US, are seized with sovereign debt problems which is making financial markets nervous. He stated that elevated fiscal deficits and public debt have always followed deep recessions in the past, which could be overcome with stronger recovery in output and in the present instance, the nominal output is yet to reach the pre-crisis levels. Shri Mukherjee said that there are structural constraints coming in the way of advanced economies returning to their trend growth path. As a result, their fiscal position looks increasingly unsustainable. He said that despite the aggressive fiscal and monetary policy, unemployment continues to be at its highest in many advanced countries. The question is what more can policy makers do to improve growth or to avoid another downturn, he said.

The Finance Minister said that emerging markets recovered quickly from global slowdown, but are facing elevated commodity prices, inflation, moderating growth and volatile capital flows all at once. Central banks have been forced to raise policy rates repeatedly, potentially compromising growth in the short-term. While raising rates may help stabilize growth, it may also invite more capital inflows. It is true that emerging economies are relatively better placed with regard to their public debt and fiscal deficit due to their stronger growth momentum and relatively robust banking systems. Their downside risks are on account of high oil and commodity prices and volatility in capital flows, partly due to the easy money policies in advanced countries, he said.

Shri Mukherjee said that unlike at the outset of the global financial crisis, when G 20 led policy coordination across economies could be achieved rapidly, it may be more difficult now. The advanced and developing countries are at different stages of the business cycle. It is important, therefore, to pause and think about what the G 20 agenda has been thus far and how it needs to evolve in future, he said.

Shri Mukherjee said that most observers believe that the proximate cause of the recent crisis lay in a small, sub-prime segment of the US housing market. The ultimate reasons included the growing weaknesses in financial regulation and the build up of global imbalances. Since the international monetary system does not have an effective mechanism for preventing the build up of global imbalances, the G 20 took up the issue of its reform on a priority basis, he said.
The Finance Minister stated that there is an understanding that the G 20 Framework for Strong, Sustainable and Balanced Growth may be the mechanism for adjusting these imbalances. This work-stream, in which India plays an important role as co-chair of the Framework Working Group, is vital for the success of the G 20, he said.

The Finance Minister said that strengthening domestic drivers of growth in developing and emerging economies is necessary for rebalancing of the global economy. As a result, the development agenda has become a central theme for the G 20 since the Seoul Summit. Moreover, as financial markets were seen to be destabilizing commodity markets, commodity price volatility and food security were also added to this agenda, he said.

Shri Mukherjee said that while welcoming these initiatives, we need to be cautious regarding the danger of working with a one-size-fit-all approach. Basel III is a good case in point. He said that it is quite demanding on developing country banks. Different stages of economic development require different levels and quality of support from the financial sector. If capital adequacy standards become too high, there is a danger of inefficient dis-intermediation in markets. Emerging markets should use prudential regulation and close supervision rather than merely high capital standards, he said.

The Finance Minister Shri Mukherjee said that Global macroeconomic imbalances are at the heart of destabilizing sustainable economic growth at the international level. He stated that all imbalances are not bad as some of them reflect multi-paced growth, different savings-investment behaviour and productivity levels across economies and such differences may not be destabilizing per se. Shri Mukherjee said that at the same time, some imbalances reflect structural inefficiencies usually created by policy distortions relating to the external sector, trade, capital flows and exchange rate policies, financial markets, tax and subsidy regimes, which have to be addressed.

The Finance Minister said that the reform of the International monetary system is high on the agenda of the G-20 and various issues including capital flows management, financial safety nets, measuring global liquidity, composition of the SDR basket are currently under discussion, he said.

The Finance Minister emphasised upon a few specific issues for the deliberations. Firstly, he said that an issue of immediate concern for emerging economies is managing large capital flows. Large and volatile capital flows to emerging markets can be destabilising as they lead to high exchange rate volatility and in some cases make it incumbent to maintain high levels of foreign exchange reserves as an insurance against sudden or large-scale flight of international capital, he added. Large and volatile inflows are also associated with asset price booms and encourage excessive risk taking by traders and investors and therefore threaten financial stability, said the Minister.

Secondly, the Finance Minister said that recent commodity and food price rise and their volatility have induced considerable threat to economic growth and food security in energy dependent emerging, as well as, developing economies. Factors behind recent price hikes are yet to be pin pointed. Even the G-20 is undecided on the role of speculation and global excessive liquidity on the international commodity prices. He said that though it does seem odd that commodity prices should be so buoyant even as the outlook for global growth is weak. He stated that we need more research and debate on whether speculation in currency and commodity markets has been playing a role in recent price rises.

Thirdly, the Finance Minister said that G 20 development agenda is understandably very vast and covers areas that are also being handled by a number of developmental agencies. While we are committed to concerns of 'development' and of sharing the fruits of economic growth, it is imperative to prioritize among various development needs, he said.

Shri Mukherjee said that one development issue that deserves priority is the recycling of global savings for infrastructure investment. Enhancing infrastructure investment in emerging economies and developing countries would have positive spin-off for rebalancing global demand. It would result in real investments with tangible growth. The G-20 is well placed to coordinate various stakeholders including governments, especially the ones that have large surpluses, the private sector, and multilateral development banks, for investment in developing economies, he said. He hoped that the conference can suggest innovative ways to recycle global savings and identify viable strategies to overcome the presumed hurdle of 'lack of enabling environment' for infrastructure investment in emerging and developing countries.

In his concluding remarks, the Finance Minister said that even though there are no simple answers or magic solutions to some of these issues, he did not see any reason for despair. He hoped that the deliberations would help in addressing global challenges at the current conjuncture and also the structural problems that confront us, in an innovative and cooperative framework. He said that the need of the hour is global reforms with an eye on medium to long-term sustainability of economic growth.

We, the Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors of the G-20 are committed to a strong and coordinated international response to address the renewed challenges facing the global economy, notably heightened downside risks from sovereign stresses, financial system fragility, market turbulence, weak economic growth and unacceptably high unemployment.

We are taking strong actions to maintain financial stability, restore confidence and support growth. In Europe, Euro area countries have taken major actions to ensure the sustainability of public finances, and are implementing the decisions taken by Euro area Leaders on 21 July 2011. Specifically, the euro area will have implemented by the time of our next meeting the necessary actions to increase the flexibility of the EFSF and to maximize its impact in order to address contagion. The US has put forward a significant package to strengthen growth and employment through public investments, tax incentives, and targeted jobs measures, combined with fiscal reforms designed to restore fiscal sustainability over the medium term. Japan is implementing substantial fiscal measures for reconstruction from the earthquake while ensuring the commitment to medium-term fiscal consolidation. Heightened downside risks have also made the economic environment for emerging markets and developing economies more challenging and they are adjusting their macro-economic policies accordingly to maintain stability and sustain growth. The contribution of the emerging market economies to global growth will increase as these economies as a whole move towards more domestic led growth, including through structural reforms and enhanced exchange rate flexibility to reflect economic fundamentals. We reiterate that excess volatility and disorderly movements in exchange rates have adverse implications for economic and financial stability.

We are committed to supporting growth, implementing credible fiscal consolidation plans, and ensuring strong, sustainable and balanced growth. This will require a collective and bold action plan, with everyone doing their part. We are working together to put in place for the Cannes Summit such an action plan of coordinated policies with both short term decisions and a medium-long term perspective.

We commit to take all necessary actions to preserve the stability of banking systems and financial markets as required. We will ensure that banks are adequately capitalized and have sufficient access to funding to deal with current risks and that they fully implement Basel III along the agreed timelines. Central Banks will continue to stand ready to provide liquidity to banks as required. Monetary policies will maintain price stability and continue to support economic recovery.

We will review progress made in implementing the commitments made today at our next meeting.

096. Intervention of Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee at the G20 Finance Ministers' and Central Bank Governors' Dinner Meeting.

Washington DC, September 23, 2011.

“Thank you for the opportunity to give a brief on the progress in the Mutual Assessment Process. Since we have had a detailed presentation by my Canadian colleague, Jim Flaherty, I will limit my briefing to raise some important issues to guide our discussion today.

First, it is worth considering whether we are giving excessive weightage to the balance and sustainable elements of the Framework, and too little to strong growth. The question of growth is particularly relevant at this juncture, when the recent developments in the global economy are cause for serious concern. The Framework exercise was initiated on the assumption that the global economy was recovering reasonably well from the economic and financial crisis, and hence the G20 needed to turn its attention to medium to long-term issues. Rebalancing global demand would make growth more sustainable, and even stronger, going forward, especially if there has been permanent demand destruction in some parts of the global economy. However, our medium term action plan for Cannes may not seem credible unless it addresses short-term growth and stability concerns as well. For instance, how credible would commitments for medium term consolidation look if we are seen embarking on a fresh round of stimulus? Several structural reforms to boost productivity could also have an adverse impact on short-term growth. The Cannes Action Plan, therefore, may have to link the medium term to the short-term as well.

Second, Growth also needs to be made more broad based and especially strengthened in developing countries in general. The Framework exercise therefore needs to focus more sharply on the development aspect. In this respect, I would like to underscore the suggestion made by our Prime Minister at the Seoul Summit that global imbalances should be leveraged to address developmental imbalances. If we need to add demand to the global economy to offset the moderation of demand by industrialized countries as they contract final output, perhaps a good way of doing this is to expand infrastructure investment in developing economies. Many developing countries have developed the capacity to grow rapidly but are constrained by poor infrastructure. Financing infrastructure development in these economies could contribute to sustainable global growth.

Third, the focus of the Framework on systemically important economies derived from the fact that global crises in the past, including the recent one, emanated from large economies. However, as we work to redefine elements of the MAP process in the G 20 countries we are faced with a new crisis arising from imbalances in relatively small economies in the periphery of the Euro Zone which has spread to countries which were well outside the periphery. This is because, given the highly interconnected nature of financial markets, large imbalances even in a small economy in a large currency union can destabilize global markets.

The issue arises whether, in trying to anticipate threats to the global economy, we should expand our agenda to consider the nature of the stresses in the Euro Zone and policy options for handling them. The need for doing so arises because of the highly interconnected nature of the world and to the potentially destabilizing role that expectations in financial markets can play. If expectations were always determined by what we call "macroeconomic fundamentals" - essentially the imbalance indicators identified in the MAP process - it would be one thing. However, expectations can change suddenly and when they do countries that are otherwise seen as solvent can suddenly appear insolvent. Given the importance of the Euro Zone for global financial markets it is necessary to consider whether the MAP should include some surveillance of the Euro Zone.

Fourth, we need to take stock of whether we have made substantial progress since the Toronto Summit when our leaders agreed on policy options for groups of countries, i.e. for advanced surplus, advanced deficit, emerging surplus, emerging deficit and resource rich economies. While it was not spelt out which country fell in what group, each G 20 country knew to what category it belonged, and the broad direction in which it needed to move.

Since then, what we have done is to first come out with a set of multiple indicators of measuring imbalances, on the basis of which we have identified seven countries that are seen to have "exceptionally large" imbalances and which are systemically important. The G 20 countries, including all the systemically important ones, have presented their national projections on major indicators. The IMF has compiled these projections and given us a comparison between what they imply and what the IMF thinks is feasible based on their global models. They have concluded that the improvements in imbalances projected by the individual G 20 countries are consistent with an overall view of the world economy which is over optimistic. If that optimism now seems excessive we need to know what changes would be needed in individual country projections.

Fifth, there appear to be some difficulties involved in making forward looking commitments. The MAP national policy template submissions of G20 member countries indicate that there is a broad congruence of ideas and recommendations for directing the future course of policy coordination, including on the need to focus on seven systemically important economies. Member countries recognize the need for further cooperation to achieve the goals of strong, sustainable and balanced growth as committed by our Leaders. The Framework Working Group deliberations have also underscored the need for countries to be more ambitious in their commitments. Countries have made forward looking projections in their templates, but these are not commitments, and are subject to periodic updates like all macro-economic models. The commitments are contained in the written part of the template and are in the form of objectives and policy changes. How commitments can be measurable is an issue.

There are three related issues here. Firstly, some commitments asked for are outcomes over which governments do not have full control, such as fiscal deficits and current account imbalances. They control only specific policies, such as tax rates and expenditure, which may influence but not fully determine final outcomes which are the result of a complex interplay of several variables. It is important to distinguish between ‘outcome’ variables and ‘control’ variables in making prescriptions. Secondly, countries may be only willing to commit only what they have already made public so far. Are countries in a position to make measurable, forward looking commitments beyond what is approved by their national Parliaments? Thirdly, is there a danger of such measurable commitments leading to naming and shaming, that could be acrimonious and divisive, something that the G 20 has so far avoided? The Framework makes clear what each country is expected to do, and the extent to which this ultimately feeds into domestic policies is subject to periodic mutual assessment. How and in what manner, and should we, and can we, be more ambitious and move beyond the current path?

I know I have raised more questions than provided answers. The questions are, I think, relevant and important. I now look forward to colleagues providing the answers.

097. Communiqué issued by the Finance Ministers and Ministers of Development of the G-20 countries.

Washington (D.C), September 23, 2011.

1. We, the G20 Finance Ministers and Ministers in charge of development and international cooperation, met today for the first time to address development challenges as part of the global economic agenda. With developing countries acting as key poles of growth in the global economy, support for development is an investment in the prosperity of all countries.

2. In Seoul, the Leaders approved the Seoul Development Consensus and the Multi-Year Action Plan. The Seoul Development Consensus sets out our commitment to work in partnership with other developing countries, and LICs in particular, to help them tackle the bottlenecks to a stronger and more equitable, sustainable and resilient growth. The G20 Multi-Year Action Plan embodies this commitment and highlights several areas of actions to maximize growth potential and economic resilience in developing countries, in particular infrastructures, private investment, domestic resources mobilization, trade, food security, social protection, remittances, financial inclusion and human resources. It complements the efforts of the UN system and multilateral and bilateral donors in assisting developing countries to achieve Millennium Development Goals, in particular for LDCs as articulated in the Istanbul Program of Action.

3. G20 Leaders decided in Seoul, in the wake of the most severe economic shock in recent history, to put development as a key element of the agenda for global recovery. We reaffirm that the Development agenda will remain at the core of G20 priorities and that the G20 will continue its work to promote a strong, balanced and sustainable growth, to narrow gaps in levels of prosperity, to foster a shared and inclusive growth, to further reduce poverty, promote gender equality and contribute to job creation. We welcome the progress made by the Development Working Group in advancing the Seoul Development Consensus on Shared Growth and its Multi-Year Action Plan, and look forward to its report to Leaders for the Cannes Summit.

4. Today we reviewed the two following priority areas of actions to maximize growth potential and economic resilience in developing countries, food security and infrastructure, that will be taken forward by our Leaders in Cannes.

5. The humanitarian crisis in the Horn of Africa requires an international response. The international community has come together to support the people of the region but more needs to be done. This crisis highlights the urgent need to strengthen the emergency and long-term response to food insecurity. To feed more than 9 billion people in 2050, agricultural production will have to double in developing countries. It is time to reinvest in the agricultural sector. In light of the G20 Agriculture Ministers Action Plan on Food Price Volatility and Agriculture, we aim at improving global food security through a set of concrete actions, prepared on the basis of the work of international organizations which was coordinated by FAO and OECD. These actions include strengthening research, innovation and dissemination mobilizing the G20 agriculture research networks, promoting efforts to scale up responsible investments and activities related to agricultural production and food security in cooperation with MDBs and the private sector, including through the Global Agriculture and Food Security Program. Other initiatives aim at improving protection for the most vulnerable against excessive price volatility through risk management strategies, tools and instruments, drawing on the work of the MDBs, enhancing nutrition and access to humanitarian food supply in the framework of country and region-led initiatives, such as the development of the pilot project led by Economic Community of Western African States (ECOWAS) for a targeted regional emergency humanitarian food reserve, and the ASEAN +3 emergency rice reserve initiative, complementing existing national food reserves. In this context, we stress the importance of the work being done under the guidance of Finance ministers on commodity financial markets regulation.

6. The lack of infrastructure dramatically hampers the growth potential in many developing countries. We agree that this challenge needs to be addressed without delay, especially in Low Income Countries and whilst not exclusively, with a special emphasis on Sub-Saharan Africa. We welcome the efforts of the Multilateral Development Banks to develop a joint Infrastructure Action Plan to address bottlenecks and constraints and call on them to present their recommendations ahead of the Cannes Summit, in particular on quality of data available to investors, incentive to support regional projects, improved assistance for public-private partnerships, transparency in the construction sector, efficiency of project preparation and harmonization of MDBs procurement rules and practices. We also welcome the proposal of the Infrastructure Consortium for Africa (ICA) to open its membership.

7. We welcome the contribution of the High Level Panel on Infrastructure Investment and ask it to finalize its innovative work under the three workstreams responding to its mandate, notably for promoting enabling environments, diversifying sources of funding and identifying sustainable infrastructure projects to be presented to our Leaders in Cannes. We take note of the set of criteria proposed by the HLP, in close cooperation with the MDBs, for identifying exemplary infrastructure investment projects, with due consideration to environmental sustainability, food security, trade and regional integration.
8. The global economic crisis affected disproportionately the most vulnerable people. In the context of global risks, there is a growing need to develop mechanisms to offer better protection and ensure a more inclusive growth path. In that perspective, we welcome proposals to implement and expand national social protection floors defined by the countries themselves according to their individual circumstances, to reduce the cost of remittances transfer, to promote private investment, job creation and human resource development, to enhance domestic resource mobilization and to enable a growth-enhancing regional and global trade environment. We support the implementation of the Action Plan of the Global Partnership for Financial Inclusion.

9. Following the presentation of the preliminary findings of the report prepared by Bill Gates on financing for development, we recognize the importance of the involvement of all actors, both public and private, and of the appropriate mobilization of domestic, external and innovative sources of finance. We look forward to the presentation of Bill Gates’ final report to our Leaders at the Cannes Summit. We also look forward to receiving the joint report on mobilizing climate finance, coordinated by the World Bank Group, in close partnership with the IMF, regional development banks and the OECD, aimed at analyzing options for expanding the flow of climate change finance to developing countries in pragmatic and cost-effective ways, drawing inter alia on the AGF report consistent with the objectives, provisions and principles of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change.

10. We look forward to a successful replenishment of the Asian Development Fund and the International Fund for Agriculture Development.

11. We firmly believe that we pave new ways of cooperation through the Development Working Group sharing our diversified experience and knowledge as well as making synergies with other fora in development cooperation, including the 4th High Level Forum on Aid Effectiveness to be held in Busan in November. We will further strengthen our collective efforts for the G20 Development agenda for the Cannes Summit and beyond.
Distinguished Chairperson and Colleagues,

My Canadian colleague has made a detailed presentation on the Framework. We have also heard from the IMF on the state of the global economy and financial markets. The draft Cannes Action Plan has to be viewed against the backdrop of these presentations. In this context, I will limit my intervention to three important issues that I feel could help focus our discussions.

2. First, it is important for us to strike a fine balance between the short run and the long run policy issues and options to help restore market confidence. In our recent meeting at Washington DC, there was a growing sense that the global economy had slipped into a precarious phase, reminiscent of the period in the run-up to the collapse of Lehman Brothers. There is apprehension that even the tepid economic recovery that we have seen so far in the advanced economies is stalling. Unemployment in these economies never quite recovered from their crisis highs. The relatively robust recovery in Emerging Market Economies is also beginning to falter. The financial markets, which had never fully recovered from the earlier crisis, are under renewed stress. Indeed, the current crisis has been incremental in nature with a series of local intermitted shocks getting transferred to the global economy. All this has happened despite the aggressive use of both fiscal and monetary policy tools and our collective resolve to keep markets open. This is a source of great concern. Going forward it limits our options in dealing with the emerging situation.

3. The Framework was conceived at a time when the global recovery was taking root, and our attention was on rebalancing of the global economy, to make the recovery stronger and sustainable in the medium to long-term. The recovery was based on a strong dose of stimulus, both fiscal and monetary, which has been difficult to withdraw. Although concerns were expressed regarding fiscal imbalances at Toronto, the focus at Seoul was on external imbalances. In retrospect, perhaps we did not pay adequate attention to internal imbalances i.e. shifting demand back from the public sector to the private. The current indicators show that both private consumption and investment sentiments have further weakened.

4. It is this weakening of sentiments that is compelling us to shift some of our focus back to near term issues in the Action Plan, even as we recognize that structural imbalances remain to be addressed. We need to send clear signals, mindful of the fact that our options today are much more limited. On the one hand, markets are wary of mounting public debt in the absence of strong growth, which is a long-term issue. On the other hand, strong injections of liquidity by Central Banks seem to have done little to stimulate lending and borrowing, so far. Instead we are witnessing damaging spillover consequences, especially on asset and commodity prices that have strengthened inflation in emerging markets.

5. Second, since recent global crises emanated from large economies, the focus of the Framework has so far been on systemically important economies. However, we need to recognize in our MAP process that imbalances even in relatively small economies can be magnified by integrated financial markets, especially through mechanisms such as the currency unions. The real danger to the global economy lies in the rapid contagion possible through today’s globally integrated financial markets. Thus, it would appear strange if the focus of the G 20 were to remain on large economies even as the periphery of the Euro Zone is proving to be systemically more important. The Framework process will need to come to grips with the reality of large imbalances, in a small economy, in a large currency union having the potential to destabilize the global economy in today’s context. Our Action Plan must find a way of addressing this issue.

6. Third, it is worth considering whether we need to lay greater emphasis on the growth element of our Framework at this stage. The World Bank’s report on ‘Rebalancing, growth, and development: an interconnected agenda’ has suggested that the recent weakening of growth in the global economy calls for a renewed G20 focus on growth. I agree with the Bank’s views and I am convinced that the desired rebalancing may be difficult to achieve and sustain in the face of faltering growth.

7. In this regard the global economy is perhaps better positioned today than what it was in the 1930’s. At the time of the Great Depression, global growth was entirely dependent on industrialized countries fed by raw material producing colonies. The latter were entirely dependent on demand in the former. Both advanced economies and their colonies therefore went down together. The situation today is different. Former colonies are now emerging markets undergoing their own industrial revolutions and with their own endogenous sources of rising demand. Although emerging markets cannot be entirely decoupled in an integrated world, nevertheless this is the main reason why the world continued to grow even as advanced countries went into recession. Therefore, as we put together an Action Plan for Leaders to consider at Cannes, our recommendations on rebalancing global demand should not weaken the growth impulse in the new nodes of demand, but should indeed strengthen it.
8. In this context, I would like to reiterate the suggestion made by my Prime Minister at the Seoul Summit that global imbalances should be leveraged to address developmental imbalances. If we need to add demand to the global economy, to offset the moderation of demand in industrialized countries, a good way of doing that is to expand infrastructure investment in developing economies. This suggestion may well be extended to increasing investment in infrastructure generally, and a more liberal flow of technology to developing countries, which in turn could spur output and productivity growth in both advanced and developing countries.

9. Let me also add here that tax evasion and illicit flows have posed serious challenges to the world economy and the efforts of the countries to raise revenue for development. A strong and sustainable growth requires effective tax administration nationally and cooperation between countries. We need to start exchanging information automatically for improved tax compliance with partner countries on a voluntary basis and then urging other countries also to do so. We also need to give a call on exchange of past banking information and assistance in collection of taxes. We shall be discussing these and other related matters in the session tomorrow, but I have flagged it here since I believe it should be one of the Cannes deliverables.

Thank you.
099. Media Briefing by Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission Montek Singh Ahluwalia on Prime Minister’s visit to Cannes for the G20 Summit.

New Delhi, October 29, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good afternoon to all of you. Welcome.

You are aware that the Sixth G20 Summit would take place at Cannes, France on the 3rd and 4th of November. Prime Minister of India would be heading the Indian delegation and would be leaving for Cannes on the 2nd. He would be assisted by Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission, Dr. Montek Singh Ahluwalia who is also India’s Sherpa to the G20 process.

We are most grateful that Deputy-Chairman has so kindly agreed to talk to you about India’s approach, outlook, and give you a sense of how we view the G20 process. I would request Deputy-Chairman to make his opening remarks and thereafter he will be happy to take your questions.

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission (Dr. Montek Singh Ahluwalia):

Thank you all. Actually, I might as well take questions because it is not an issue which is very India-focused. Obviously this is an annual event and it will get dominated by the issues related to management of the world economy and I guess the Eurozone crisis.

You have just had a European Summit which has given some indication, and I am sure that the leaders will be looking at what the prospects are for overcoming the Eurozone difficulties and moving on to sustainable, more robust, global growth path.

The issues connected with bringing robustness to the global economy were on the agenda. The framework for strong and sustainable growth was an exercise that was being done by the G20 countries. It was supposed to lead to something called a Mutual Assessment Process (MAP). I think India and China co-chair this. The Finance Deputies are currently working on that. Of course the idea was what we can say about the policy initiatives needed in the major G20 countries which would basically set the framework for the global economy to move ahead rapidly. All that was got over and taken by the Eurozone crisis, and obviously resolving the Eurozone crisis became an essential first step.

Now we have seen there has not been any discussion in the G20 thus far specifically on Eurozone issues.

But obviously we had a European Summit, they have taken some steps. I am sure it is an occasion for the G20 to express a view on the importance of these attempts, what we expect out of them and given that these things have already been done, what more needs to be done particularly in the context of the Mutual Assessment Process. The Mutual Assessment Process includes four Eurozone countries – Germany, Italy, France, Spain – and of course it includes the other countries including of course China and India. So, the Mutual Assessment Process will come forth with a set of what it would regard as the policy priorities in each of these countries which will create the global conditions for a revival of global good.

Clearly the short-term growth prospects in the global economy are not very good and the main growth rates have been revised downwards. We will be getting from the IMF their assessment of what will happen on the Business As Usual basis, what would happen if more supportive policies are taken, etc. But I think we have to see that analysis before I can comment on it. There are many other issues on the agenda which have been there for some time, and of course the leaders will review those also.

In the Seoul Summit they had put development on the agenda and a couple of things were done in pursuit of that. A high-level panel was set up to look at the work programme of the multilateral development banks and to see whether that work programme was contributing adequately to development priorities. President Sarkozy had also invited Bill Gates to submit some report on sort of innovative ways of addressing development challenges, and that report also will be looked at by the Group.

Question: What is your initial reaction to the Eurozone plan that has been announced and agreed so far? Secondly, as part of that Europeans are looking to countries like China and Brazil and possibly India to put in funds for the stabilization of the Euro. Is it not something that India is potentially willing to contribute to?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: On the reaction to the Euro Summit, I think most people’s reaction and our reaction also is positive. It makes some very important statements. It clearly says something very specific about Greece. Greece has been a problem that has been building up and it did need to be addressed, and we actually welcomed the realism that is built into the parameters that have been laid down for Greece. Of course, it involves a very large voluntary debt reduction. The details of this have not been worked out but they are hoping it will be done by December. The debt reduction is not enough. Greece will also need an EU-cum-IMF support package. That will have to be negotiated. We welcome the effort to stabilize Greece and we have to wait till the end of the year to see what specific proposals come out of it.
On the issue of contributing more generally for Europe, certainly no specific requests have been made to India. I have seen newspaper accounts that people have been talking. Our view by the way is that although this is a Eurozone problem, it is also a global problem with potential spillover effects. So, I think it is important that the international community provides the Eurozone whatever support is needed as part of a credible restoration of stability. Different things have been talked about. The Eurozone Summit actually gives a very sketchy account of that. Obviously the EFSF is going to be used.

The EFSF is going to be leveraged which is innovative departure from traditional practice. The IMF could be used, and then there is a separate idea that there may be other sources of support. That is not unusual when countries are handling crisis management and you have swap arrangements and all kinds of things. But I am not aware of what specifically is being proposed. However, in general I think the principal agency that is responsible for bringing about international stability is the International Monetary Fund. We will certainly support the International Monetary Fund providing resource support to Europe.

This will raise an issue if the IMF’s own resources are not enough, how does it get other resources? There are well-established mechanisms for doing that like the new arrangements to borrow etc. None of this has actually come to a level at which one can give a governmental reaction. But I think it has to be the view of the global community that stabilising the Eurozone is an important thing not just for the Eurozone but for the global economy. And we would support any reasonable multilateral effort in that direction.

Question: On the question of support from emerging economies for a possible bailout of Euro, is a coordinated BRICS/Emerging Economies position possible on that because people have been approaching in fact China? The second question is on the issue of European Union per se. There has been talk that …(Unclear)… possibly have fiscal coordination, there will be a supranational authority to supplement what is essentially a monitoring agency. What is the status of that?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: On the BRICS issue, I have been also reading newspapers but we are currently not engaged in any discussion of specific types of support, at least not India. But clearly the possibility of bilateral support always exists. The mechanics of bilateral support may vary. If it is a straight swap arrangement, then it does not create too many problems. If it is supporting a new vehicle, which is what some people are talking about, that is between the countries concerned. If it is support from the IMF, then you have to make a judgment what is the scale of resources that the IMF has and what is it that is needed. And to do that you have to take into account the leveraging that they have already built in into the EFSF.
There are a lot details. Just generally what I am saying is that we should be supportive of any reasonable multilateral effort to provide Europe with the support needed to stabilize. We have not received any bilateral request or anything so far. So, I do not have any comment on that.

The second point was about the fiscal authority. I think it is well-known that one of the basic fault lines in the Eurozone is that you have a single currency but not a single fiscal authority. Originally the fiscal discipline that is meant to accompany this sort of arrangement was supposed to come in from various Maastricht Rules etc., which obviously did not work and were in fact broken by what are not crisis countries today. I think from what I read the European Summit statement, there is a sort of recognition that you need to have mechanisms for fiscal discipline. What they have I think proposed is, it does not surrender any fiscal sovereignty but it introduces a system of fairly intrusive peer examination and pressure but with no penalties.

So, if you are in difficulties you will be looked at, suggestions will be made. If you have to pass some proposals, they will get commented on by various Eurozone observers, independent observers, etc. But there is no actual loss of fiscal sovereignty, there is no actual penalty for not doing whatever is said. So, I think it is a move in the right direction because it is generally agreed that you run too much of a danger if you surrender the flexibility that your own currency gives you and you do not put in place the sort of fiscal corrective needed to ensure stabilization. I think that is moving in the right direction. How far this move will go and whether it will be effective is to be worked out.

Question: What role is India expected to play as a member of the Mutual Assistance Process? Any specific suggestion from your side?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: First of all, this is a mutual process and Canada and India co-chair the process. So, we are basically talking to all the countries. Essentially the mechanism is that the International Monetary Fund makes a sort of technical assessment and says, this country should do this and the other country should do that and all the rest of it. And this becomes an input into the MAP process. So, theoretically all the participants of the MAP process, which is all the G20 countries, collectively come to a view as to what is the consensus on the policies that different countries should follow.

We are playing a very active role in that by definition almost by being a co-chair. We are obviously concerned about what it does say. We are playing an active role in responding to what the MAP process says about India. We are also playing an active role in judging whether the overall outcome, first of all whether the IMF’s analysis is right or not right; and secondly if different people disagree with it, and they usually do, then have we come up with an alternative which is credible. But we are not playing any bigger role than anyone else. I mean the whole difference between this process and the normal surveillance process is, in the normal surveillance the IMF takes a view and goes to the Board. The Board may or may not agree with it but there is an IMF view. Here the IMF is only giving us inputs. So, actually what will go to the leaders is not the IMF view but what has come out of the framework working group which Canada and India co-chair.

Question: How is this Summit going to change the lives of common people all over these countries? There is a perception that in these meetings most of the decisions are on the affluent sections of the society. With the Wall Street protest in the background and the high rate of inflation in India, how is it going to discuss all these issues which affect the common people?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: No government takes macro policy decisions without focusing on the implications for the common people. So, the view of the Government of India is that clearly bringing inflation under control is very important for the common man. But at the same time, we want a global economy that will support rapid growth for India. And internally we are working to make sure that our growth is inclusive. That is our objective. Now, we are not telling other countries what to do to make their growth inclusive. But their governments are doing that.

I think the principal concern in the summit is to create a global environment that is fair and which is conducive to rapid growth. Each country has its view on what that global environment should be. We certainly have ours and we would express that. I should also mention that there are many items on the agenda which are kind of more directly focused on developmental type issues. For example, agriculture is one of the issues. There is a lot of concern that why are food prices in the world rising? Is that due to demand-supply imbalances in which case you have to address them in a certain way? Or is it due to just too much liquidity fuelling speculation which has to be addressed in a different way? There are discussions on things like employment.

How do we make sure that the growth process is also going to generate employment? In the industrialized countries there has been a huge change in the level of unemployment in the last two or three years. So, that is something they are very concerned about. But we are also concerned about having a growth process that supports employment in India – open markets, access for our exports and that kind of thing. So, all of these things put together would be covered. Of course there is a traditional development agenda, development assistance, how to finance infrastructure in emerging market countries. So, all of these things will come up.
Question: My question is very close to the earlier question. The world leaders have worked out, have been working out how to revive the economy, but we are having crisis after crisis. The revival process is not in the correct direction it seems because or else the revival could have already taken place. Wherever there were green shoots rising, the green shoots are fading away and a winter of the global economic crisis is far from over. In this context, people are looking at India and China where the growth process is taking place. But the real thing is, growth process is taking place in India, I do admit, India has become the home of, it has a large number of …

Official Spokesperson: Can you please come to the question?

Question: I will come to the question. At the same time India is the home of billionaires. Do you not feel that the revival process is not in the correct direction and this present capitalist system cannot deliver the goods, and capitalism has within it the seeds of its own destruction and hence socialism, rather democratic socialism is inevitable?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: That is rather lot of questions to answer for a G20 briefing. Definitely relevant questions but I think they are more relevant if you are asking the question for India. I cannot answer for other countries. Actually this is not the forum to ask those questions. My own view is that given the shock that the global economy got in 2008, the G20 did a pretty good job in arresting the decline. There was negative growth in the world in 2008 and a somewhat surprisingly positive growth in 2010. 2011 was never expected to be the same as 2010, it was expected to be lower. But now it is going to be worse. And that is because it got overtaken by a second crisis which is the sovereign debt crisis emerging in Europe. We have to give the G20 a chance to tackle that crisis.

On the issue of whether this involved some fundamental weakness in the system, that is something on which I am sure people can continue to disagree and we should encourage that. I think it will be a very interesting subject, but I doubt if I can add anything in this press conference on that issue.

Question: Are there going to be any bilateral meetings between our Prime Minister and President Obama for one, and President Hu Jintao?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: I honestly do not know. The Prime Minister’s Office probably has a more up-to-date account of it. These gentlemen are going to be in a very tightly packed schedule for a day and a half and there are periods when they interact. So, I am sure they will get a chance to talk to each other. But whether there are formal pullout bilateral, I just do not have the answer to that. They are all going to be meeting again a little bit later in East Asia. It is a different kind of scene.
Question: As far as the Indian contribution is concerned, is India emphasizing more on World Bank than IMF as the clientele ...(Unclear)…?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: We do not go there docketed. Right now we have a major Eurozone crisis. The World Bank has no role whatsoever to play in the Eurozone crisis. The World Bank has a very important role to play in the development process and we will make that point, we often do. But right now the biggest thing before them is, is it economic management within Europe leading towards an early resolution of Greece, and is it containing contagion to other European periphery countries? In this process the World Bank has no role at all.

I am sure they have analytical inputs but it is really the G20. The World Bank also says things about what is going to be the implication of the Eurozone crisis on the global economy. So, in that sense there is an input. But in the solution to the Eurozone crisis, I do not think the World Bank has any role at all. There is an agenda item which is development, and in that is development financing. It is certainly our view that the long-term development financing role of the World Bank remains important for emerging market countries like India. I think we have frequently said that the volume of lending of the World Bank, unless something is done, is likely to shrink very sharply next year which is not a desirable thing. It is not the biggest issue before the Summit right now.

Question: It is a non-G20 question. Would you like to react to Union Minister K.V. Thomas’s reported remark that affluence of Indians is responsible for the food inflation going up?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: I think very carefully in responding to remarks made by Ministers after I am sure that I know exactly what they have said. But if I start responding to remarks attributed to them by someone in the press, that is not a good thing. So, I will not in fact respond. I do not know what exactly he said really.

Official Spokesperson: I would like to make a request. Deputy-Chairman has another maximum ten minutes. So, let us restrict ourselves to the questions related to the visit.

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: I have to go to Rashtrapati Bhavan for the Governors’ Conference. So, it is not just time but protocol, etc. Ten minutes is fine.

Question: A question related to the G20. Sir, you said that situation in Europe will figure prominently in the Summit. What about the situation in the US? Will that also be discussed?
Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: Of course, certainly. There is no question about it. The US has not produced any sudden surprises. It remains the case that growth in the US is a little bit weak but actually most people say that it is sentiment that is weak. The economy is not doing so badly. The real problem in the US is, unemployment does not seem to be coming down. Given the size of the US, any Mutual Assessment Process has to address the question how the US calibrates its own policies. Now, if you take a very narrow view and say, look the US has too high a public debt so it should just shrink its fiscal deficit, then you will be actually recommending a very contractionary set of policies for the US which will have spillover effects in the rest of the world. And even within the US there are very sharp differences of view on this.

Many people would say what US should do is to take steps that will increase the confidence that over time the US deficit will come down without necessarily doing a sharp contraction now. So, I mean the US would also ask about what signals the other countries are giving, who is going to expand demand. And that is part of the whole Mutual Assessment Process. There is no question that the policy signals for the US would be a very important part of the MAP process.

Question: Sir, the way things are panning out, it seems the G20 and the global leaders are stumbling from one crisis to another whereas the agenda after the 2008 crisis was to address the global imbalance and create an architecture that does not encourage this kind of crisis again. Do not you think that is getting lost in this firefighting that is happening and what is India doing to put this back on the agenda?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: The fact that there is a crisis means that the G20 is struggling with a shifting set of circumstances. I do not think our view on this is different from anybody else’s. What you have in this particular case is a crisis that has been precipitated not by lending to the private sector as was the case in Europe but due to uncontrolled sovereign debt. So, in one sense it is a similar kind of crisis but in another sense it is caused by somewhat different factors. I think one of the reasons why it has happened is that the Eurozone financial system did not actually read the signals right in the sense that when you get rid of currency differences, you get rid of what is called currency risk. So, to the extent to which your interest rate reflects currency risk, that is an advantage.

And you should have a lower interest rate. But you do not get rid of country risk or credit risk. So, it does not mean that if you keep running as big a deficit as you like, then your interest rate will still remain low. I think in retrospect it is very clear that European banks lent or rather bought bonds of sovereigns under some sort of an assumption that there would be no debt servicing problems.
So, now this is bearing the cost of that. As these things emerge, corrective steps do get taken. We have to see how effective they are.

Question: You have said that to create an environment for the global economy will be the focus of the Summit. I just wanted to have your opinion on how representative G20 is so far as the world economy is concerned, especially in the context of the disparity the world over when 20 richest countries corner more than 80 per cent resources of the whole world.

In that context, how representative is G20 so far as the whole world is concerned? After all we have the United Nations and then other smaller groups from G8 to G20 to make it more representative. How do you assess its representativeness so far as the whole world is concerned?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: It is a very good question. I think you have rightly put it. It is a democratization of the G8, but a democratization by adding some of the larger countries. It is certainly not representative. It is not a formal organization, unlike the UN or even the IMF and the World Bank which are formal international organizations. In the UN each country has one vote. In the IMF each country votes whatever its share is and there are huge differences. But there is a sense in which everybody is represented. The G20 is just 20 plus five countries who get invited.

So, it is obviously not formally representative. The strength of the system simply is that the countries that are included in the G20 account for 80 per cent of global GDP. So, the fact of the matter is that if this Group of countries agrees on something, then you have got 80 per cent of global GDP more or less agreeing on something. And hopefully since they keep doing outreach with their other colleagues, they are in touch with other organizations - it is not as if these countries have opted out of the formal international representative structure - it becomes a way of reaching a common agreement which then gets when it needs to be endorsed by some formal international organization, it has to go and do that. But the probability that that will happen goes up. That is exactly what the G7 used to do. They would fix the deal themselves and then go and get it voted by the IMF Board or whatever Boards.

So, now 20 of them hopefully will do the same thing. I think it would be a mistake to denigrate this on the grounds that it is not representative. It is not very useful to have a G192. So, that is what it does. It is not a substitute. Incidentally we and other developing countries like China constantly say that what needs to be done in a multilateral framework should be done in a multilateral framework. But we can consult about what our positions are going to be. So, that gives a greater chance of reaching an international agreement. I think Prime Minister Cameron is supposed to present a paper on global governance and the G20 at the Cannes Summit. So, that should be quite interesting because I am sure he will be addressing some of these issues.

Question: Sir, given the ongoing global crisis, there has been a dip in the FDI flows. Will you be taking this option to send out a message of the robustness of India’s investment climate to keep the capital flows in, and also allay whatever concerns they might be having on the investment front given the governance issues?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: You do not allay concerns of investors by talking to their governments. You allay concerns of investors by talking to investors. This is not going to focus on those kinds of issues. I think the world is going to look at the G20 Summit and ask themselves the question, are they actually giving a sense of collective responsibility in managing the global economy in a sensible way or not? And are there any changes of signals such as the one my friend here was talking about? Are they issuing an obituary for capitalism or something? Those are the things that they will be watching for.

I think out of that will come some assessment of what does the G20 think makes for a well functioning global economy. Then I think investors will make up their own mind about whether they agree with the G20 on this or not. It is a bit of a subtle process. But I think it is useful. No doubt about it.

Question: Sir, you said that it has a potential of spillover. Dr. Singh also said this a little while ago. With what suggestions, what advice, what instructions are we going to the G20? What will be India’s approach? Can you throw some light on that? Secondly, do you think that the time is right now to change the Bretton Woods formula and is India going to pitch for it this time?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: What do you mean by the Bretton Woods formula?

Question: It is basically the institutions like the IMF, the World Bank, the change in them, more representation.

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: On the representation issue, it has been our consistent view that we need these international institutions. So, we are not in favour of abolishing them. But they need to become more representative reflecting the changes that have taken place in the global economy. And what that translates into is more voting rights and associated obligations for the developing countries. The G20 did succeed in moving it a little bit a year ago. So, it is a move in the right direction. By no means in our view commensurate with the change that is needed. But it is a move in the right direction.
On the issue of what are we going to do, the whole point I think of a Mutual Assessment Process is that each country does not go off and makes his list of demands. Right now or maybe by tomorrow, the Economic Affairs Secretary and his colleagues in the other Finance Ministries will be looking at what the G20 MAP process says. I think out of the G20 MAP process will come a set of recommendations which would say, for the US this is what they should do, for Italy this is what they should do, for India this is what they should do.

And clearly we hope that each of these countries or the collectivity of these countries, as far as we are concerned, will certainly endorse that we are on the right path. From the point of view of the global economy we are on the right path because we are not running a big surplus, we are not having a fixed exchange rate. The fact that our current account deficit is high means that we are contributing to global demand. And of course they will say, like we are saying ourselves, that we should reduce our fiscal deficit because really globally you need to do that all the time. But how much other countries will agree to, we have to wait and see.

Question: Sir, if the Eurozone crisis is not resolved within a certain period, how will it impact India?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: I do not think the Eurozone will impact on India any differently from the way it will impact on the whole world. I do not want to sound negative but it is more like an academic exercise. What does it mean that the Eurozone crisis is not resolved? It could mean that for example uncertainty about Eurozone debt is not resolved. This means that interest rates for many of the countries in the periphery remain high. This means that basically value of holdings of sovereign debts by banks will fall. Banks will be under stress. Basically European growth will slow down dramatically. Credit in Europe will become constrained. You could have a liquidity problem. Some of this is perceptual and some of this is real. This will have an impact on the rest of the world. If you disrupt the smooth functioning of a financial system by throwing a lot of uncertainty into it, basically everybody stops deciding, and we will be as impacted as anyone else. We are not exclusively dependent on Europe. So, from that point of view obviously countries that have 100 per cent of their trade with Europe will be much more affected than countries that have 30 per cent of their trade with Europe. And our trade is actually quite diversified, which means that whoever has a problem we have some impact but it is not such a huge impact.

But let us not underestimate it. I do think that the world is in a fragile situation barely recovering from 2008. And it does not need another crisis with a signal that governments are not capable of handling these crises. If all you are saying is what happens if Greece defaults but everybody else is fine, the answer would be very different. Very sad for Greece, but I do not think it will matter for the rest of the world. But I think if you have a Eurozone crisis, that is big news. And we do not want that.

Question: I just want to come back to my original question. Initially there have been voices from India saying we are a poor country, why should we step in to help out the rich Eurozone world? But it sounds like what you are saying is that although there has been no formal request made and there is no clear path forward, India is receptive to, I just want to try and understand, calls to step up to help out stabilize the Eurozone. Is that correct?

Deputy-Chairman, Planning Commission: What I said was that I think as members of the G20 we should be willing to do our bit to play whatever supportive role is necessary for the international economy to support the Eurozone. Now, issues of choice come in here. For example, a lot could be done by Europe itself and they have done that through the EFSF, leveraging, and all this. Now if it turns out that what Europe does itself is not enough, my personal view - this is a Finance Ministry matter really - is that the logical thing to do is to bring in the International Monetary Fund. That is why we have it. We are members of the Fund.

If it turns out that the Fund were to say that look, we do not have enough resources and we need support to mobilize more resources, I would be in favour of India saying that we should support the Fund in doing that. We did do that last time around by contributing about 10 billion dollars or whatever it is to the NAB. On the other, very often countries may not want to go to the IMF. But then they have to do whatever bilateral deal they want to do themselves. Nobody has asked us for anything. So, I am not in a position to say. Institutionally it seems to me that we have constantly said that the International Monetary Fund should be an organization that is both strengthened and made more even-handed. Frankly the best way to make it more even-handed is that when rich countries need support they go to the Fund because the rules that the Fund then applies will be the rules that the Fund will apply subsequently.

I am not at all in favour - this is again a purely personal view, I have no idea what the Government’s view is - of saying that the IMF is only there for poor countries and everybody else will sort out things on their own. That is not the spirit of any of the communiqués of the G20.

Thanks.
100. Statement of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh prior to his departure for Cannes for the G-20 Summit

New Delhi, November 2, 2011.

I leave today to attend the G-20 Summit in Cannes, France at the invitation of President Nicolas Sarkozy.

The Cannes Summit takes place against the backdrop of the sovereign debt crisis in the Eurozone. This crisis has emerged as the principal source of concern for the global economy. The twin Summits of the European Union and Eurozone a few days ago have helped to restore a measure of confidence in the markets, but much more needs to be done. It is imperative that the difficult decisions needed to address the economic challenges in Europe and elsewhere are taken swiftly.

The Eurozone is a historic project. India would like the Eurozone to prosper, because in Europe’s prosperity lies our own prosperity.

It is important for the Cannes Summit to signal a strong and coordinated approach to put the global economy back on track, while addressing medium term structural issues.

Developing economies such as India need a conducive global economic environment to address the vast challenges they face. In an increasingly interdependent world, we have to be wary of contagion effects and the import of inflationary pressures in our economy. We need to ensure that developing countries have access to requisite funds through multilateral development banks and to investible surpluses to meet their infrastructure and other priority needs.

The issue of global governance will also come up for discussion. This is an issue of importance to India, and we will work with others to develop effective and representative global governance mechanisms and carry forward the process of reform of the international monetary and financial system.

I will separately hold a bilateral meeting with President Nicolas Sarkozy during my visit. I also look forward to meeting Prime Minister David Cameron, Prime Minister Julia Gillard, as well as the European Union leaders Mr. Herman Van Rompuy and Mr. Jose Manuel Barroso.

101. Remarks of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the G-20 Summit.

Cannes (France), November 3, 2011.

Mr. President, let me thank you for the excellent arrangements made for the Summit, and for your hospitality.

We meet at a time when the global economy faces exceptional uncertainty. Our Summit will be judged by our ability to deal with financial instability emanating from the Euro zone periphery. We had hoped that the agreement arrived at by Euro zone Leaders for reducing the Greek Debt, combined with a new EU-IMF programme providing additional resources, could be put in place quickly. The announcement of a referendum by the Government of Greece has upset these calculations. I hope ways can be found to manage the situation so that a package can be put in place as quickly as possible.

We welcome the initiatives taken in the Euro zone to evolve innovative mechanisms to raise resources for the European Financial Stability Facility and to strengthen fiscal discipline through intensive surveillance. This goes some way towards addressing one of the known deficiencies in having a monetary union without fiscal union. However, the effectiveness of these arrangements to cope with the crisis is yet to be tested.

Although the Eurozone countries have the principal responsibility for dealing with these problems, the dangers from spillovers from the Eurozone to the rest of the world are a matter of concern for all of us.

In an increasingly integrated world, all of us have a stake in the orderly functioning and prosperity of Europe, including the Eurozone countries. Prolonged uncertainty and instability in the Eurozone countries can hurt us all. The IMF must keep the situation under close watch as part of regional surveillance. It should also be willing to help in an appropriate manner if asked to do so.

We strongly support the IMF playing its part in restoring stability in Europe. At the same time, the IMF must also keep in mind the liquidity requirements of developing countries who are not at the centre of the crisis, but may nevertheless be adversely affected as innocent bystanders.

As we deal with the short term problem of instability we must also face the challenge of orchestrating a broad based recovery and sustainable growth in industrialized countries and in developing countries. This is what the Mutual Assessment Process exercise is meant to do. We face the difficult task of balancing the requirement for giving a push to growth in the short term and the task of restoring fiscal sustainability over the medium term. These call for very different policy prescriptions.

The Mutual Assessment Process needs to focus on structural reforms in all G-20 countries to increase efficiency and competitiveness over the medium term.
This would help revive the animal spirit of investors which is necessary to allow us to shift the burden of sustaining demand from the public to private sector. Such rebalancing is necessary to make the recovery sustainable. We in India are taking steps to ensure a return to high growth. Our economy has slowed down in the current year and GDP growth is likely to be between 7.6 and 8 percent. Like many other emerging market countries, we too are experiencing high levels of inflation. We hope to go back to higher growth in 2012-13, together with a moderation in inflation.

Our medium term strategy focuses on a revival of investment especially in infrastructure, and continuing efforts to reduce our fiscal deficit through improved revenue collection which is expected to come from tax reforms.

Mr. President, as the G-20 battles with short term problems of crisis management it must not lose sight of the developmental needs of developing economies. After a long period, these economies experienced broad based acceleration of growth, making them potentially significant contributors to global growth. This is now threatened by slowing trend growth in developed countries and uncertainties in financial markets.

We need to find credible ways of strengthening these growth impulses. At Seoul, I had called for measures to redirect global savings so that they could be leveraged to increase investments in developing countries. This would help offset the moderation in private demand in industrialized countries.

Multilateral Development Banks play a key role in mobilizing and deploying global savings. The G-20 should therefore raise its level of ambition for these institutions so that they can play the kind of transformational role they played in the post war period.

The G-20 has made considerable progress towards strengthening global financial regulation and this needs to be carried forward through follow-up measures. It is important that in an integrated world there should be common standards that are implemented simultaneously in all jurisdictions, to avoid a race to the bottom. Otherwise financial activity will migrate from the tightly regulated sectors to less regulated jurisdictions. It is however important that the developmental needs of developing countries are kept in mind in these regulatory reforms.
In many developing countries, including India, financial markets have been tightly regulated. This tight regulation helped us avoid financial crises resulting from excessive leverage but it came with a cost, as it increased the cost of intermediation. Emerging markets therefore were engaged in progressive reduction in tight regulations with a view to modernising their financial markets and expanding intermediation.

The priorities in emerging markets, like India, before the crisis, were not regulatory but developmental, with the aim of deepening and developing new markets to sustain high rates of growth in the real economy.

Financial inclusion, provision of long-term funding instruments for infrastructure, the development of liquid bond markets to improve monetary policy transmission, among others, were financial sector priorities in India before the crisis. Nothing has happened in Indian financial markets or globally that warrants changing these priorities. We need to be sure that the regulatory reforms being introduced globally will not hamper this process.

There are areas where our concerns are different. For example, while banking capital needs to be strengthened in India, this is not on account of higher risks but because credit is projected to expand at a very fast pace to feed the high real growth that we expect. To take another example, while the principle that the cost of a bailout falls on equity holders rather than on taxpayers is robust, in India large segments of the financial sector, especially banking and insurance, is mostly state owned, and equity holders and taxpayers are mostly one and the same. In this environment it is difficult to see why a financial sector tax, which would only raise the cost of capital even further, would be appropriate.

Mr. President, tax evasion and illicit flows have seen the migration of tax bases in developing countries abroad and are serious problems. The G-20 should send a strong message to curb such activity. G-20 countries should take the lead in agreeing to automatic exchange of tax related information with each other, irrespective of artificial distinctions such as past or present, for tax evasion or tax fraud, in the spirit of our London Summit that “the era of bank secrecy is over”.

Thank you Mr. President.

Cannes, November 3, 2011.

On the occasion of the signature ceremony of the Convention on Mutual Administrative Assistance in Tax Matters on the 3rd of November 2011 at the G20 Summit in Cannes, France, Mr. R. Gopalan, Secretary (Department of Economic Affairs), Government of India, on behalf of the Finance Minister, affirmed the intention of the Government of India to sign the Convention along with China and Saudi Arabia.

Among the G20 countries, Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Germany, Indonesia, Japan, Mexico, Russia, Turkey have signed the Convention on the occasion. France, Italy, Korea, Mexico, UK and USA have signed the Convention earlier.

Speaking on the occasion, Secretary (Economic Affairs) Mr. Gopalan said that tax evasion and illicit flows are serious problem and over the last two years, in order to check this trend, India has negotiated 19 new Double Taxation Avoidance Agreements and 17 new Tax Information Exchange Agreements. In addition 22 existing Double Taxation Avoidance Agreements have been renegotiated. All these 58 Agreements provide for tax information exchange according to international standard. For these instruments to be effective, he said that it is vital that consensus is built on applying the standards to past information, including banking information, so that earlier evasion is also investigated. This is essential, if the spirit of the G20 London Summit that “the era of bank secrecy is over” is to be respected. He urged members of the G20 to lead by exchanging information automatically with their treaty partners and urge other countries to do the same. He expressed hope that the Multilateral Convention on Mutual Administrative Assistance in Tax Matters would help progress in this regard.

103. Opening statement of Prime Minister at Press Conference in Cannes.

November 4, 2011.

The summit had before it an extensive agenda, on which work had been going on over the past two years. It was overtaken by sudden developments in Greece which could have broader spillover effects. The Summit reviewed progress on the existing agenda and also discussed the implications of the Greek crisis.

As far as the ongoing agenda is concerned, the communiqué brings out the significant progress made in all the important areas. These include the outcome of the Mutual Assessment Process (MAP), progress in financial regulation and banking transparency, and improvements in the functioning of agricultural and energy markets, including futures markets. The communiqué welcomes the IOSCO recommendations for improving regulation and supervision of commodity markets to manage volatility in prices.

The MAP process represents the first time that the major economies have undertaken a collective commitment to follow policies which meet their national objectives while also being consistent with promoting global growth.

I am particularly happy to note that the communiqué endorses our call for increased banking transparency and exchange of information to combat tax fraud and evasion and other illicit flows. This was an important part of our agenda.

The Communiqué emphasizes the importance of social inclusion, the establishment of social protection floors based on national policies and promotion of employment, especially among the youth. These emphases are fully in line with our own priorities.

The summit also reviewed the position regarding the Doha Round of negotiations, which have not made progress. The summit has endorsed the importance of the Doha Round and the mandate of the Doha Development Agenda. To give a forward push in this area, it has tasked the G20 Trade Ministers to explore all possible approaches at the next WTO Ministerial Meeting in December and report back at the Mexico Summit. The Summit has also reaffirmed the standstill agreement on new protectionist measures which was adopted in Toronto.

The Summit also discussed issues arising from the Greek crisis and the need to take protective measures to avoid contagion. We had stated that management of the Eurozone crisis is primarily the responsibility of the Eurozone countries and this assessment was shared by many other delegations. The Eurozone countries did undertake extensive consultations among themselves and have reported some progress. The Greek referendum announced earlier has been withdrawn and the Greek Government has indicated that it will proceed with implementing the package agreed earlier.

We welcome this development, and hope that it will lead to an early resolution.

On the issue of the contagion spreading to other Euro zone countries, Italy announced that it has agreed to a monitoring arrangement under which the IMF will report every quarter on Italy’s performance under the existing programme agreed with the EU. This is meant to send a signal of confidence to the markets. We have taken the view that the IMF should keep the situation under close watch and we would support the IMF in playing an appropriate role to backstop preventive steps taken within the Eurozone. The communiqué has stated that the G-20 will ensure that adequate resources will be available with the IMF. This issue has been referred to the Finance Ministers for their next meeting in December.

The crisis in the Eurozone is a potentially grave threat to the stability. There was obviously too little time in the Summit to resolve all the issues. However, I hope that unresolved issues can be quickly resolved. The outcome of the Summit on this issue should be seen as a work in progress.

G-20 Leaders Summit Communiqué
Cannes, November 4, 2011.

1. We, the Leaders of the G20, met in Cannes on 3-4 November 2011.

2. Since our last meeting, global recovery has weakened, particularly in advanced countries, leaving unemployment at unacceptable levels. In this context, tensions in the financial markets have increased due mostly to sovereign risks in Europe; there are also clear signs of a slowing in growth in the emerging markets. Commodity price swings have put growth at risk. Global imbalances persist.

3. Today, we reaffirm our commitment to work together and we have taken decisions to reinvigorate economic growth, create jobs, ensure financial stability, promote social inclusion and make globalization serve the needs of the people.

A global strategy for growth and jobs

4. To address the immediate challenges faced by the global economy, we commit to coordinate our actions and policies. Each of us will play their part.

5. We have agreed on an Action plan for Growth and Jobs to address short term vulnerabilities and strengthen medium-term foundations for growth.
   - Advanced economies commit to adopt policies to build confidence and support growth and implement clear, credible and specific measures to achieve fiscal consolidation. We welcome the decisions by European Leaders on October 26th, 2011 to restore debt sustainability in Greece, strengthen European banks, build firewalls to avoid contagion, and lay the foundations for robust economic governance reform in the Euro area and call for their swift implementation. We support the measures presented by Italy in the Euro Summit and the agreed detailed assessment and monitoring by the European Commission. In this context, we welcome Italy’s decision to invite the IMF to carry out a public verification of its policy implementation on a quarterly basis.
   - Taking into account national circumstances, countries where public finances remain strong commit to let automatic stabilizers work and take discretionary measures to support domestic demand should economic conditions materially worsen. Countries with large current account surpluses commit to reforms to increase domestic demand, coupled with greater exchange rate flexibility.
   - We all commit to further structural reforms to raise output in our countries.
6. We are determined to strengthen the social dimension of globalization. We firmly believe that employment and social inclusion must be at the heart of our actions and policies to restore growth and confidence. We therefore decide to set up a G20 task force which will work as a priority on youth employment. We recognize the importance of social protection floors in each of our countries, adapted to national situations. We encourage the ILO to continue promoting ratification and implementation of the eight core Conventions ensuring fundamental principles and rights at work.

7. Convinced of the essential role of social dialogue, we welcome the outcomes of the B20 and L20 and their joint statement.

Towards a more stable and resilient International Monetary System

8. We have made progress in reforming the international monetary system to make it more representative, stable and resilient. We have agreed on actions and principles that will help reap the benefits from financial integration and increase the resilience against volatile capital flows. This includes coherent conclusions to guide us in the management of capital flows, common principles for cooperation between the IMF and Regional Financial Arrangements, and an action plan for local currency bond markets. We agree that the SDR basket composition should continue to reflect the role of currencies in the global trading and financial system. The SDR composition assessment should be based on existing criteria, and we ask the IMF to further clarify them. To adjust to currencies’ changing role and characteristics over time, the composition of the SDR basket will be reviewed in 2015, or earlier, as currencies meet the existing criteria to enter the basket. We are also committed to further progress towards a more integrated, even-handed and effective IMF surveillance and to better identify and address spill-over effects. While continuing with our efforts to strengthen surveillance, we recognize the need for better integration of bilateral and multilateral surveillance, and we look forward to IMF proposals for a new integrated decision on surveillance early next year, and for increased ownership and traction.

9. We affirm our commitment to move more rapidly toward more market-determined exchange rate systems and enhance exchange rate flexibility to reflect underlying economic fundamentals, avoid persistent exchange rate misalignments and refrain from competitive devaluation of currencies. We are determined to act on our commitments to exchange rate reform articulated in our Action plan for Growth and Jobs to address short term vulnerabilities and restoring financial stability and strengthen the medium-term foundations for growth. Our actions will help address the challenges created by developments in global liquidity and capital flows volatility, thus facilitating further progress on exchange rate reforms and reducing excessive accumulation of reserves.

10. We agreed to continue our efforts to further strengthen global financial safety nets and we support the IMF in putting forward the new Precautionary and Liquidity Line (PLL) to provide on a case by case basis increased and more flexible short-term liquidity to countries with strong policies and fundamentals facing exogenous shocks. We also support the IMF in putting forward a single facility to fulfil the emergency assistance needs of its members. We call on the IMF to expeditiously discuss and finalize both proposals.

11. We welcome the euro area’s comprehensive plan and urge rapid elaboration and implementation, including of country reforms. We welcome the euro area’s determination to bring its full resources and entire institutional capacity to bear in restoring confidence and financial stability, and in ensuring the proper functioning of money and financial markets.

We will ensure the IMF continues to have resources to play its systemic role to the benefit of its whole membership, building on the substantial resources we have already mobilized since London in 2009. We stand ready to ensure additional resources could be mobilised in a timely manner and ask our finance ministers by their next meeting to work on deploying a range of various options including bilateral contributions to the IMF, SDRs, and voluntary contributions to an IMF special structure such as an administered account. We will expeditiously implement in full the 2010 quota and governance reform of the IMF.

Reforming the financial sector and enhancing market integrity

12. In Washington in 2008, we committed to ensure that all financial markets, products and participants are regulated or subject to oversight, as appropriate. We will implement our commitments and pursue the reform of the financial system.

13. We have agreed on comprehensive measures so that no financial firm can be deemed “too big to fail” and to protect taxpayers from bearing the costs of resolution. The FSB publishes today an initial list of Global systemically important financial institutions (G-SIFIs). G-SIFIs will be submitted to strengthened supervision, a new international standard for resolution regimes as well as, from 2016, additional capital requirements. We are prepared to identify systemically important non-bank financial entities.

14. We have decided to develop the regulation and oversight of shadow banking. We will develop further our regulation on market integrity and efficiency, including addressing the risks posed by high frequency trading and dark liquidity. We have tasked IOSCO to assess the functioning of Credit Default Swaps markets. We have agreed on principles to protect financial services consumers.

15. We will not allow a return to pre-crisis behaviours in the financial sector and we will strictly monitor the implementation of our commitments regarding banks, OTC markets and compensation practices.

16. Building on its achievements, we have agreed to reform the FSB to improve its capacity to coordinate and monitor our financial regulation agenda. This reform includes giving it legal personality and greater financial autonomy. We thank Mr Mario Draghi for the work done and we welcome the appointment of Mr. Mark Carney, Governor of the Central Bank of Canada as Chairman of the FSB, and of Mr. Philipp Hildebrand, Chairman of the Swiss National Bank as Vice-Chairman.

17. We urge all jurisdictions to adhere to the international standards in the tax, prudential and AML/CFT areas. We stand ready to use our existing countermeasures if needed. In the tax area, we welcome the progress made and we urge all the jurisdictions to take the necessary actions to tackle the deficiencies identified in the course of the reviews by the Global Forum, in particular the 11 jurisdictions identified by the Global Forum whose framework has failed to qualify. We underline the importance of comprehensive tax information exchange and encourage work in the Global Forum to define the means to improve it. We welcome the commitment made by all of us to sign the Multilateral Convention on Mutual Administrative Assistance in Tax Matters and strongly encourage other jurisdictions to join this Convention.

Addressing commodity price volatility and promoting agriculture

18. As part of our financial regulation agenda, we endorse the IOSCO recommendations to improve regulation and supervision of commodity derivatives markets. We agree that market regulators should be granted effective intervention powers to prevent market abuses. In particular, market regulators should have and use formal position management powers, among other powers of intervention, including the power to set ex-ante position limits, as appropriate.

19. Promoting agricultural production is key to feed the world population. To that end, we decide to act in the framework of the Action Plan on Food Price Volatility and Agriculture agreed by our Ministers of Agriculture in June 2011. In particular, we decide to invest in and support research and development of agriculture productivity. We have launched the “Agricultural Market Information System” (AMIS) to reinforce transparency on agricultural products’ markets. To improve food security, we commit to develop appropriate risk-management instruments and humanitarian emergency tools. We decide that food purchased for non-commercial humanitarian purposes by the World Food Program will not be subject to export restrictions or extraordinary taxes. We welcome the creation of a “Rapid Response Forum”, to improve the international community’s capacity to coordinate policies and develop common responses in time of market crises.

Improving energy markets and pursuing the Fight against Climate Change

20. We are determined to enhance the functioning and transparency of energy markets. We commit to improve the timeliness, completeness and reliability of the JODI-oil database and to work on the JODI-gas database along the same principles. We call for continued dialogue annually between producers and consumers on short medium and long-term outlook and forecasts for oil, gas and coal. We ask relevant organizations to make recommendations on the functioning and oversight of price reporting agencies. We reaffirm our commitment to rationalise and phase-out over the medium term inefficient fossil fuel subsidies that encourage wasteful consumption, while providing targeted support for the poorest.

21. We are committed to the success of the upcoming Durban Conference on Climate Change and support South Africa as the incoming President of the Conference. We call for the implementation of the Cancun agreements and further progress in all areas of negotiation, including the operationalization of the Green Climate Fund, as part of a balanced outcome in Durban. We discussed the IFIs report on climate finance and asked our Finance Ministers to continue work in this field, taking into account the objectives, provisions and principles of the UNFCCC.

Avoiding protectionism and strengthening the multilateral trading system

22. At this critical time for the global economy, it is important to underscore the merits of the multilateral trading system as a way to avoid protectionism and not turn inward. We reaffirm our standstill commitments until the end of 2013, as agreed in Toronto, commit to roll back any new protectionist measure that may have risen, including new export restrictions and WTO-inconsistent measures to stimulate exports and ask the WTO, OECD and UNCTAD to continue monitoring the situation and to report publicly on a semi-annual basis.

23. We stand by the Doha Development Agenda (DDA) mandate. However, it is clear that we will not complete the DDA if we continue to conduct negotiations as we have in the past. We recognize the progress achieved so far. To contribute to confidence, we need to pursue in 2012 fresh, credible approaches to furthering negotiations, including the issues of concern for Least Developed Countries and, where they can bear fruit, the remaining elements of the DDA mandate. We direct our Ministers to work on such approaches at the upcoming Ministerial meeting in Geneva and also to engage into discussions on challenges and opportunities to the multilateral trading system in a globalised economy and to report back by the Mexico Summit.

24. Furthermore, as a contribution to a more effective, rules-based trading system, we support a strengthening of the WTO, which should play a more active role in improving transparency on trade relations and policies and enhancing the functioning of the dispute settlement mechanism.

Addressing the challenges of development

25. Recognizing that economic shocks affect disproportionately the most vulnerable, we commit to ensure a more inclusive and resilient growth.

26. The humanitarian crisis in the Horn of Africa underscores the urgent need to strengthen emergency and long-term responses to food insecurity. We support the concrete initiatives mentioned in the Cannes final Declaration, with a view to foster investments in agriculture and mitigate the impact of price volatility, in particular in low income countries and to the benefit of smallholders. We welcome the initiative of the Economic Community of Western African States (ECOWAS) to set up a targeted regional emergency humanitarian food reserve system, as a pilot project, and the “ASEAN+3” emergency rice reserve initiative.

27. Recognizing that the lack of infrastructure dramatically hampers the growth potential in many developing countries, particularly in Africa, we support recommendations of the High Level Panel and the MDBs and highlight eleven exemplary infrastructure projects and call on the MDBs, working with countries involved, to pursue the implementation of such projects that meet the HLP criteria.

28. In order to meet the Millennium Development Goals, we stress the pivotal role of ODA. Aid commitments made by developed countries should be met. Emerging countries will engage or continue to extend their level of support to other developing countries. We also agree that, over time, new sources of funding need to be found to address development needs and climate change. We discussed a set of options for innovative financing highlighted by Mr Bill Gates. Some of us have implemented or are prepared to explore some of these options. We acknowledge the initiatives in some of our countries to tax the financial sector for various purposes, including a financial transaction tax, inter alia to support development.

Intensifying our Fight against Corruption

29. We have made significant progress in implementing the Action Plan on combating corruption, promoting market integrity and supporting a clean business environment. We underline the need for swift implementation of a strong international legislative framework, the adoption of national measures to prevent and combat corruption and foreign bribery, the strengthening of international cooperation in fighting corruption and the development of joint initiatives between the public and the private sector.

Reforming global governance for the 21st century

30. We welcome the report of UK Prime Minister David Cameron on global governance. We agree that the G20 should remain an informal group. We decide to formalise the Troika. We will pursue consistent and effective engagement with non-members, including the UN and we welcome their contributions to our work.

31. We reaffirm that the G20’s founding spirit of bringing together the major economies on an equal footing to catalyze action is fundamental and therefore agree to put our collective political will behind our economic and financial agenda, and the reform and more effective working of relevant international institutions. We support reforms to be implemented within the FAO and the FSB. We have committed to strengthen our multilateral trade framework. We call on international organisations, especially the UN, WTO, the ILO, the WB, the IMF and the OECD, to enhance their dialogue and cooperation, including on the social impact of economic policies, and to intensify their coordination.

- On December 1st, 2011, Mexico will start chairing the G20. We will convene in Los Cabos, Baja California, in June 2012, under the Chairmanship of Mexico. Russia will chair the G20 in 2013, Australia in 2014 and Turkey in 2015. We have also agreed, as part of our reforms to the G20, that after 2015, annual presidencies of the G20 will be chosen from rotating regional groups, starting with the Asian grouping comprising of China, Indonesia, Japan and Korea.

32. We thank France for its G20 Presidency and for hosting the successful Cannes Summit.
G-24

105. Intervention by Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee after taking over the Chair of G-24.

*It is a great honour to take over the chair of G24 and I thank you for enabling it. I bring greetings from all the people of India.

South Africa and its dynamic Finance Minister Mr Pravin J Gordhan has successfully steered this group over the last one year. Let me thank him and his team, on behalf of all of us present here.

I also take this opportunity to welcome the new 2nd Vice Chair, Minister Fayza Aboul Naga of Egypt.

I had the privilege to chair the Group in 1983-84, and I clearly recollect the very influential role played by the Group at that time. Much has changed in the 28 years since I was last associated with the group.

First there have been fundamental structural changes in the global economy and these shifts have accelerated in recent years. The role of developing countries which had stalled for many years is now experiencing a major and fundamental rise. Second, the global economy has become much more interconnected and with it we are facing the need for much better coordinated and concerted actions.

I do believe that the G24 has an important role to play in fostering dialogue amongst developing countries and in supporting a more inclusive approach in global economic and financial cooperation including on the development agenda.

However, as we have discussed, realizing this potential will require enhancing the effectiveness of the Group and adapting its role to the changing landscape of global governance. A key prerequisite for effectiveness will be to agree on a limited set of priorities which are of vital importance to us and where we can make a difference.

The next few months are crucial for the global economy. The challenge of economic development and poverty alleviation is a continuing one. The recent commodity and food price rise and their volatility constitute a grave threat to economic growth and food security in our economies. Increased investment in agriculture and productivity should be the strategic priority of G24 to cool prices and provide food security to our people. Furthermore, there is a need to ensure transparency in commodity markets.
Another strategic priority that I hope to see focused action, is on the development of infrastructure in our countries. Gaps in infrastructure remain as significant bottlenecks to growth. India places great importance to meeting the challenge of infrastructure financing and we look forward to working with you in developing concrete proposals for action.

Third, we must continue to push for more ambitious progress on governance reform of the IFIs. The Multilateral Development Banks need to also mobilize more resources to increase their assistance to low income and other developing countries including finding ways of expanding their lending capacity, so that development finance is not neglected.

I believe that many of our countries possess extremely good practices that can be studied and emulated in others. Let us use the platform of G24 to build stronger South-South cooperation links for our people’s common benefit.

I look forward to your suggestions and your inputs as we go along.”

IBSA

New Delhi, March 8, 2011.

The Minister of External Affairs of the Republic of India, H.E. Mr. S. M. Krishna, the Minister of External Relations of the Federative Republic of Brazil, H.E. Ambassador Antonio de Aguiar Patriota, and the Minister of International Relations and Cooperation of South Africa, H.E. Ambassador Maite Nkoana-Mashabane, met in New Delhi on 8th March 2011 for the VII IBSA Trilateral Ministerial Commission.

2. The Ministers reaffirmed the commitment of their respective countries to further deepening the dialogue and cooperation within the IBSA framework at inter-governmental, social, people-to-people and business-to-business levels. They underscored the important role IBSA is playing in strengthening political coordination among the three countries on global issues of mutual interest. In this rapidly changing global order, the Ministers underscored the increased strategic importance of IBSA as a Forum of developing country democracies from three different continents based on shared values which play a critical role as an influential mechanism for further strengthening and fostering South-South cooperation and safeguarding and advancing the interests of the South, particularly in regard to reform of global governance.

3. The three Ministers confirmed their countries’ commitment to democratic values, inclusive social development and economic growth and their belief in multilateralism as the guiding principle to deal with peace, security and development issues. The Ministers emphasized the growing interdependence between development and security and its importance for sustainable peace.

The process of revision of the constitution would be completed by February/March 2012. He acknowledged that some mistakes had been made by the security forces in the initial stages of the unrest and that efforts were underway to prevent their recurrence.

The BRICS nations - Brazil, Russia, India, China and South Africa - will not let the Libya scenario repeat in Syria, said Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov.

"The Libya scenario will not be repeated there [in Syria], if BRICS have their way," he said at a joint press conference with visiting Brazilian Foreign Minister Antonio Patriota in Moscow on Sunday.

The Russian Foreign Minister unveiled a BRICS initiative on Syria.

The BRICS countries "propose that the Security Council firmly speak out against any violence in Syria, demand that all sides, the government and the opposition, respect human rights and engage in dialogue," he said.

"One must not instigate certain forces inside the opposition to keep on rejecting offers of dialogue. This amounts to inciting a replay of the Libya scenario."

Mr. Lavrov said the BRICS nations stand united on Libya.

"The position of BRICS has not changed: we stand for ending violence, ensuring the safety of the civilian population, guaranteeing human rights and observing international humanitarian standards." The BRICS countries are not happy with the current situation in Libya.

"Unfortunately, we cannot feel satisfied with what is happening in Libya. The main goal set forth by the U.N. Security Council was to protect the civilian population. Civilians keep dying in large numbers and unfortunately there is no end in sight for this sad process."

He said the reconciliation process should involve all political and ethnic forces.

6. They reiterated their view that peacekeeping operations have a contribution to make in early peacebuilding activities and in providing an environment conducive to the implementation of development strategies, as a means to bring immediate peace dividends to afflicted areas and to contribute to a cooperative atmosphere for UN missions.

7. They also noted that when considering the deployment of a mission or in evaluating and renewing the mandate of current missions, the Security Council should work in close cooperation with the Peacebuilding Commission (PBC), with a view to developing a stronger synergy between the two organs.

8. The need for the UN to ensure stronger cooperation and coordination with regional representative bodies such as the African Union and its Peace and Security Council was also reiterated.

9. They stressed that IBSA countries have consistently engaged constructively in deliberations on the UNSC in an effort to find permanent solutions to highly complex issues with emphasis on diplomacy and dialogue. It may be recalled that IBSA Deputy Foreign Ministers visited Syria as part of a trilateral engagement with the Syrian government to encourage democratic changes and a peaceful resolution to the situation. That initiative reflects values shared by the IBSA countries especially with relation to the promotion of democracy and human rights and the protection of civilians.

10. India, Brazil and South Africa committed to resume discussions and coordination on Security Council issues during the IBSA Summit which will be hosted in South Africa on 18 October 2011.

11. India and Brazil conveyed their best wishes to South Africa as host of the next IBSA Summit, on 18 October 2011.

111. Media Briefing by Secretary (West) M. Ganapathi on Prime Minister Manmohan Singh’s visit to Pretoria for the IBSA Summit.

New Delhi, October 12, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good evening. Welcome back. Good to see all of you.

The Prime Minister of India would be leaving for Pretoria on the 17th of October to participate in the IBSA Summit. Secretary (West) Mr. M. Ganapathi is here to brief you about the visit of the Prime Minister of India. He is joined by two of my colleagues. To his right is Mr. Ravi Bangar who has recently taken over as Joint Secretary (Multilateral Economic Relations). And to my left is Mr. Charan Jeet Singh who is the Director in the same Division. I will invite Secretary (West) to make his opening statement. Thereafter he will be happy to take a few questions.

Secretary (West) (Shri M. Ganapathi): Thank you, Vishnu. Good afternoon ladies and gentlemen, friends from the media. It is a pleasure to address you today afternoon and I am very happy that my colleagues Mr. Vishnu Prakash, Joint Secretary (XP), Mr. Ravi Bangar, Joint Secretary (MER), and Mr. Charan Jeet Singh, Director (MER) are here.

As Vishnu mentioned, Hon. Prime Minister is leading a delegation to the Fifth IBSA Summit which will take place in Pretoria, South Africa on Tuesday, October 18, 2011. The Prime Minister’s official delegation includes the External Affairs Minister Shri S.M. Krishna; the Commerce and Industry Minister Shri Anand Sharma; the National Security Advisor Shri Shivshankar Menon; the Principal Secretary to the Prime Minister Mr. Pulok Chatterjee; Secretary (W), MEA; the Media Advisor to the Prime Minister; and other senior officials.

The Summit will be chaired by His Excellency Mr. Jacob Zuma, the President of the Republic of South Africa. The President of Brazil Mr. Dilma Rousseff will also be participating. The format of the Summit envisages a restricted working meeting over lunch followed by a plenary meeting between the three leaders on, as I said, the 18th of October.

IBSA came into being as a Dialogue Forum in June, 2003 at a meeting of the Foreign Ministers of India, Brazil and South Africa. The first IBSA Summit took place in September, 2006 in Brazil. There were three subsequent Summits which took place in Pretoria in October 2007, in New Delhi in October 2008, and in Brazil in April 2010.

In the run up to the current Fifth IBSA Summit, the Focal Point Meetings of senior officials will take place in Pretoria on October 14, 2011, day after. The Foreign Ministers of the three IBSA countries will hold their Ministerial Dialogue on October 17, 2011 which will be followed by the IBSA Summit proper on October 18, 2011.

IBSA is a unique forum which brings together three large democracies from three different continents, which are Asia, Africa and the Americas, facing common aspirations and challenges. India, Brazil and South Africa are pluralistic societies and developing nations. The three countries occupy an important position in their respective regions as also globally. They are all members of the G20, BRICS and BASIC group of countries.

Cooperation in IBSA is perceived on three broad fronts. These include: (1) as a forum for consultation and coordination on significant political issues; (2) it is seen as an instrument for trilateral collaboration on concrete areas and projects through sixteen Working Groups and six People-to-People Forum; and (3) IBSA is involved in assisting other developing countries by developing projects in these countries through the IBSA Trust Fund.

The IBSA Working Groups include those relating to Agriculture, economic (which is trade and industry), social development, education, environment, information society, public service administration, human settlement, transport, defence, energy, science and technology, health, heads of revenue administration, culture and tourism. The six People-to-People fora (or the civil society fora) include the Academic Forum, the Editors Forum, the Local Government Forum, the Parliamentary Forum, Small Business Forum and the Women’s Forum.

Some of the Working Groups have already held their sessions and some Working Group meetings are on going. The meeting of the Women’s Forum is currently being held in Durban, currently meaning tomorrow and day after. Our Minister of State for Women and Child Development (Independent Charge) Shrimati Krishna Tirath has just arrived in Johannesburg, maybe a little while ago. The Business Forum will meet in Durban on October 16 and 17, 2011. And the Indian Delegation is led by Commerce and Industry Minister Shri Anand Sharma.

Thus, in the run up to the IBSA Summit, we would notice that the Working Groups and the People-to-People or Civil Society Forum would have already held their meetings. This would naturally engage the leaders comprehensively during the Summit.

To further concretize cooperation among themselves, the meeting of the senior officials, or the focal point as it is called, in New York on September 22, 2011 identified areas which will be led by the three concerned countries. This would include India overseeing cooperation in health and science and technology including space sciences and applications; Brazil will oversee agriculture and environment; and South Africa will oversee trade and investment and tourism.

The outcome of the discussions in the Working Groups and the different fora will be reported to the leaders during the Summit plenary session. The leaders will address a press conference following the plenary meeting.

A trilateral India-Brazil-South Africa MoU for cooperation among the diplomatic academies of the three countries will be signed in the presence of the leaders of the three countries.

I should mention the laudable steps taken by the IBSA Trust Fund aimed at identifying and executing replicable and scalable projects in developing countries for capacity building. Projects have been conceived in Haiti, Guinea Bissau, Cape Verde, Burundi, Palestine, Cambodia, Laos, Sierra Leone, Vietnam, Sudan and South Sudan. IBSA works in close coordination with the UNDP in monitoring and delivering these projects.

The IBSA process has contributed significantly to a positive feeling of friendship and working atmosphere at the level of the leadership, Government officials and popular levels of the three countries. More importantly, IBSA today is seen as an important forum by various international and regional organisations. The success of IBSA has a demonstrative effect by most vividly reflecting the fact that South-South cooperation is feasible and possible beyond the conventional areas of exchange of experts and training. IBSA’s active engagement in contributing to solutions for issues of a global nature, would also demonstrate the significance and importance to developing countries of the utility of engaging themselves with countries of the South.

The IBSA Summit this year is taking place against an important background. All the three countries India, Brazil South Africa are non-permanent members of the UN Security Council at this point in time. You would recall the visit of an IBSA delegation to Syria a couple of months ago and coordination of the position of the IBSA countries in the vote on the Syria Resolution in the UNSC.

Bilateral meetings between Prime Minister and President Jacob Zuma of South Africa, and Prime Minister and President Dilma Rousseff of Brazil are envisaged during the visit to Pretoria. This will be an opportunity for the leaders to review the current state of bilateral relations and look towards the road ahead.

Thank you and I am ready to take your questions.

Question: Mr. Ganapathi, this is a larger question on IBSA. Now that the BRIC has been expanded to BRICS, is IBSA still relevant, and how?
Secretary (West): The most important we should understand is IBSA brings together an important country from each of the three continents - Asia, Africa and the Americas. The relevance of this organisation was evidently felt by the visit of the IBSA countries to Syria, as I mentioned, and by the coordination of the positions during the Syria vote. Importantly, all the three countries have a harmonised position on a series of issues which naturally will be reflected in the Joint Declaration which will be issued after the IBSA Summit in Pretoria. So, you cannot do away with the relevance of IBSA and IBSA will continue to be relevant in the days to come.

Question: Mr. Ganapathi, there has been talk among members of IBSA and BRICS on the need for finding a reformed global governance in economic affairs, and there was a hunt for an alternative to the US dollar. What is the latest on that? Is there any move? In the last BRICS Summit in China you had a meeting where the possibility of the intra-BRICS trading in local currencies and all that. Is this likely to figure in the IBSA meeting in Pretoria?

Secretary (West): I think one of the important issues which will naturally figure in the IBSA Summit would be the current global and financial situation. Everyone agrees that the situation is not as easy as it was and it is fairly complicated and difficult. The three leaders have had a series of engagements before. And obviously, the entire scenario as it presents itself from a global financial and economical angle and possible steps to be taken forward would be touched upon. It is also significant that within a month’s time, the three leaders will also meet in the G20 Forum. So, it is relevant and it will be taken forward.

Question: What are the immediate advantages India is hoping to gain from IBSA, specifically strategic, from ...(Unclear)... and from this session?

Secretary (West): I think we should start by looking at the bilateral relations between India-South Africa and India-Brazil. Fairly healthy. A very good trade turnover of around 7.5 billion dollars between India-South Africa and India-Brazil, and coordination of positions internationally, globally and on regional issues. So, obviously when you look at the totality of the situation, be it the political discussions or discussions from an economic and financial point of view, it is going to be a useful engagement between the leaders of the three countries.

Question: You mentioned about the three countries being non-permanent members of the UN Security Council. Earlier this month there was a resolution which the US tried to bulldoze and the three countries came together and blocked it, and it led to the first ever walkout by the US in a Security Council meeting. So, do you think there is going to be a more coordinated strategy in terms of how you deal with the Security Council now that India is also the chair of the ...
Secretary (West): As I put it, I think one of the first and single most objective of IBSA has been seen as a forum for consultation and coordination on significant political issues. And in that context, if you had looked at the relevant declarations which have been issued by IBSA in all the four previous summits, there has been a healthy chapter on political issues of the day in which the summits took place, and also looking beyond as to how the IBSA countries and the leaders will look at global issues. Obviously, the visit to Syria by the IBSA representatives and the frequent exchange of views on the UNSC vote was itself an important indicator of the fact that the IBSA permanent representatives, IBSA officials, and IBSA leaders would like to take forward their engagement and cooperation in these areas.

Official Spokesperson: And by no means does IBSA aim at ganging up, as you said, against any country or organisation. As Secretary (West) has mentioned in his opening remarks, IBSA is a grouping or a forum of likeminded countries - three developing countries, three pluralistic societies, three democratic societies representing three continents. So, in a number of areas there is a natural convergence of positions. And whenever there is a convergence of positions that obviously gets articulated. But let us be very clear about the role of IBSA.

Question: Defence is also one of the areas of cooperation. In what way are they cooperating in defence?

Secretary (West): Right now in South Africa we have the Working Group on Defence Cooperation also meeting. I think they are meeting today and tomorrow if I am not wrong. Primarily exchange of views on the situation globally, exchange of views on the current state of the strategic interplay. And one of the important outcomes of the defence cooperation was the IBSAMAR, that is, IBSA Maritime Cooperation which took place on the seaboard of South Africa last year I think where the navies of the three countries have participated. Again I will take on from what Vishnu said. This is promoting intra-IBSA cooperation to the security interests of the three countries and moving forward.

Question: Sir, is there any plan to include new members in IBSA?

Secretary (West): Right now we have had four summits and the fifth is going to take place. Each of these summits has been successful. The current state of play factors in on the meeting of the three leaders of the three countries – India, Brazil, and South Africa.

Question: Is there any proposal?

Secretary (West): I think it is the three countries right now – India, Brazil, South Africa – and no proposal.
Question: This organisation is intended for the South-South cooperation. I wonder what kind of a concept you have when you talk of South. Compared to 20, 30 years ago, I do not think there is no more North-South problem. What do you think when you use the word?

Secretary (West): I think when you talk of South it is developing countries. It is not the geographical North or the geographical South. It is also in an economic scale the South comes down. So, obviously I think it is the developing countries’ forum and these three countries, as we mentioned in the preamble itself when we started staying, are developing countries where there are similarities of their stages of development, similarities in approach to various issues be it on political, economic, or financial fronts. And that is why it brings them together.

That is why when they also talk of the IBSA Trust Fund, they look at countries of the South from the developing world to see how we can assist them in their development, growth, and alleviation of poverty and other related problems.

Question: Mr. Obama has said India has risen already.

Secretary (West): When we rise, we also have to rise with the others; we have to take the others with us.

Official Spokesperson: Also there is no contradiction. Certainly we are rising, certainly we are growing, certainly we are developing. But all that Secretary West has said is basically, that Japan is a developed country or if you like to accept this categorisation - it is North. We are talking here of developing countries and the developed countries, the OECD countries and the developing countries. The three countries in question are economically developing countries, but certainly rising, economically developing countries, if you please.

Question: Sir, the Prime Minister as recently as yesterday talked about the troubles that the global powers are facing economically, financial troubles and said that India should independently evolve its strategies. Will this be the kind of a view we carry forward to the IBSA effort and what would be the plan?

Secretary (West): In various global fora I think the Prime Minister’s views are learnt with great attention and respect. Obviously when the Prime Minister speaks of economic problems and how to address them, he will make a presentation because this was a subject which will form the text and tenet of the discussions. Now obviously he will present his views and they will be listened to with great attention. Obviously first will be IBSA and then we go on to G20.

Question: Sir, any affirmation by Brazil or South Africa on India’s permanent membership of the UNSC?

Secretary (West): I think India and Brazil are part of the G4. And with South Africa we have had engagements on this and there has been support.
Question: Just a quick question on the IBSA Trust Fund. How much money is in that Fund?

Secretary (West): The three leaders agreed to the contribution of a million dollars from each of the countries over the last five years. Two projects have been successfully completed which are in Haiti and in Palestine, and it is ongoing.

Question: Is more funding expected?

Secretary (West): It is annual contribution as I mentioned.

Question: A million dollars every year, is that right?

Secretary (West): That was what was announced in the Second Summit.

Question: Carrying on with the defence question, Sir, were there any talks of cooperation in counterterrorism activities and intelligence sharing as well?

Secretary (West): This is an area of interest for all the three countries in terms of tackling organised crime, tackling issues which undermine the established nature of democratic states. So, obviously this would be discussed in the Defence Working Group among the three countries.

Question: Mr. Ganapathi, there have been some studies several years ago which suggested that Indian exports to South America using South African ports could reduce the transportation costs by 40 to 50 per cent. Given the fact that now IBSA is a tricontinental collaborative effort, is there any proposal to increase or enhance maritime connectivity between these three great continents?

Secretary (West): In fact one of the working groups, the Transport Working Group, has been touching up on this. In that there is a subgroup which has discussed this aspect of maritime cooperation and transport cooperation. Of course what would have happened twenty years ago is totally different from a situation today. I think you need intermediate points but you can also go directly. So, this is an issue which has been touched upon.

Question: Mr. Ganapathi, a runoff from the earlier question. Will it be correct to say that Japan and Vietnam have shown interest in joining IBSA, are they being considered?

Secretary (West): I am not aware of any countries asking to join IBSA. As I said, a takeoff from the earlier questions and a response to earlier answer, it is as of date and the Fifth Summit and beyond, India, Brazil and South Africa.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much.
Statement by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh prior to his departure for Pretoria to attend the IBSA Summit.

New Delhi, October 16, 2011.

I will leave tomorrow on a visit to South Africa to attend the 5th IBSA Summit being hosted by President Jacob Zuma in Pretoria on 18 October 2011.

The Summit is expected to focus, among other things, on coordination among IBSA countries in United Nations Security Council, sustainable development, the forthcoming meetings of the Conference of Parties under the UNFCCC and the Conference of Parties to the Kyoto Protocol being hosted by South Africa later this year, the Rio+20 Conference being hosted by Brazil in 2012 and other matters related to deepening of cooperation under IBSA.

The IBSA Dialogue Forum has matured considerably over the years. There is greater cooperation across a wider canvas. Above all, the idea of three large developing democracies, Brazil, India and South Africa working together in a highly complex global environment has taken root, and has received universal welcome by our peoples.

It is a happy coincidence that during 2011 India, Brazil and South Africa are members of the United Nations Security Council. We have shown significant cohesiveness and coordination in our approach to issues under discussion in the Security Council.

I also look forward to an exchange of views with our IBSA partners on the current global economic and financial situation especially in the context of the forthcoming G 20 Summit in France.

We expect to issue an IBSA Joint Declaration at the Summit.

During my stay in Pretoria, I look forward to holding bilateral meetings with President Jacob Zuma and President Dilma Rousseff to exchange views on global, regional and bilateral issues of mutual interest.
113. Opening Statement by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the plenary session of the IBSA Summit.

Pretoria, October 18, 2011.

President Zuma
President Rousseff
Ministers,
Distinguished delegates,

At the outset I would like to express my profound gratitude to President Jacob Zuma, the Government and the people of South Africa for making excellent arrangements for the 5th IBSA Summit.

I would also like to thank and convey my appreciation to our Ministers, officials, Focal Points and others who have painstakingly worked to ensure the success of our meeting.

I would also like to welcome President Dilma Rousseff to her first IBSA Summit. I am sure that we will benefit from her vision and leadership in the strengthening and consolidation of the IBSA Dialogue Forum.

Excellencies,

Our grouping derives its strength and global influence from the fact that it consists of three major developing democracies located in three continents.

We share the principles of pluralism, democracy, tolerance and multiculturalism.

We have similar views on many global issues such as the primacy of the development agenda, a just and equitable international order, a multipolar world, a rule based international trading system, climate change and reform of the United Nations.

Our cooperation is underpinned by three pillars - political consultation and coordination; multi-sectoral trilateral cooperation; and execution of development projects in third countries through the Trust Fund.

The IBSA framework is unique because it goes beyond just government-to-government interaction. It touches the lives of our people by facilitating dialogue among civil society and other important sections of society.

The IBSA Forum has also helped us in strengthening our own bilateral relations with each other. Through its 16 Working Groups and 6 people-to-people fora IBSA has brought together our officials, technical experts, business representatives, intellectuals and academicians. Despite the geographic distance between us, our cooperation has grown in all areas. Yet there is a lot more that IBSA can do to bring tangible benefits to our peoples.

The year 2011 has special salience on account of the fact that we are all Members of the United Nations Security Council. We have demonstrated our cohesion and coordination on various issues under discussion in the United Nations, particularly in the context of developments in West Asia and North Africa.

The visit of an IBSA delegation to Damascus in August this year and their interaction with the Syrian leadership demonstrated the political role which IBSA can usefully play. We should build upon this experience.

We stand united in our efforts to address the deficit in global governance. The United Nations Security Council must be enlarged in order to reflect present day reality and to make it representative and effective in responding to global challenges.

The IBSA Trust Fund is a novel initiative. Through this we have been able to share our developmental experience with other developing countries in the true spirit of South – South cooperation. We should strengthen IBSA’s ownership of the projects executed under the Trust Fund and bring their focus back to what was originally envisaged i.e. hunger and poverty alleviation.

We could consider new projects in areas such as agriculture and agro-processing, environment and energy, including new energy resources. These will help our partner countries in addressing the challenges of food and energy security. The IBSA Trust Fund projects could also useful focus on education and skill development, which is a key requirement of almost all developing countries.

Excellencies,

Despite the global economic slowdown our three economies have registered a steady growth rate. Our intra-IBSA trade is almost touching the 20 billion dollar mark. This augurs well for realizing our target of 25 billion US dollar by 2015, and for being even more ambitious.

The early conclusion of India-SACU-Mercosur Trilateral Trade Arrangement would give a boost to South-South trade. With the conclusion of this trilateral arrangement, Africa could emerge as a bridge linking South Asia and Latin America.

Excellencies,

The sovereign debt crisis in Europe and recessionary trends in the traditional engines of the global economy – the United States, Europe and Japan are sending negative signals to world financial and capital markets which are showing signs of distress. Developing countries cannot remain untouched by the negative impacts of these developments. Their ability to address their developmental challenges has been adversely affected.

We hope that effective and early steps will be taken by Europe and other advanced economies to calm the capital and financial markets and prevent the global economy from slipping into a double dip recession.

The G-20, of which all of us are members, has played an important role in pursuing the agenda of reform of international monetary and financial institutions. We should coordinate our positions in the run up to the G-20 Summit in Cannes to ensure that the priorities of the developing economies are adequately reflected.

Our cooperation on environment and climate change issues is important. The BASIC Group has proved to be an effective forum for projecting the viewpoint of the developing world. We should maintain the momentum of coordination and consultation in the run up to Durban.

I wish South Africa under President Zuma’s leadership all success for the Durban Conference. I also wish President Dilma Rousseff all success for the Rio+20 meet in Rio de Janeiro in June next year.

Excellencies,

The issue of IBSA’s outreach is one of the important items on our agenda. IBSA has deservedly received considerable attention since its establishment in 2003. It is important to further consolidate our achievements and maintain the unique identity of IBSA. We should preserve the common principles and values we stand for.

Excellencies,

India remains committed and willing to work closely with its IBSA partners in our collective endeavour to further deepen our cooperation.

I have pleasure in extending a most cordial invitation to you all for the next Summit meeting of IBSA in India in 2013.

Before I conclude I would like to heartily congratulate the people of South Africa as they prepare to mark the 100th anniversary of the African National Congress next year.

I thank you.

114. Prime Minister’s statement to the media after the 5th IBSA Summit.

Pretoria, October 18, 2011.

Your Excellency President Jacob Zuma
Your Excellency President Dilma Rousseff
Honourable Ministers

Ladies and Gentlemen of the media,

At the outset I would like to convey my profound gratitude to President Jacob Zuma, the Government and the people of South Africa for the warmth and cordiality with which we have been received here in Pretoria.

It is always a pleasure and privilege to visit this beautiful country. This is a country with which India and the people of India have very deep rooted links – links that have changed the course of India’s history. The people of India owe a deep debt of gratitude to South Africa for giving us the Mahatma.

India joins the people of South Africa as they prepare to mark the centenary celebrations of the African National Congress next year. We cherish our historical and deep emotional links with the ANC. The elimination of apartheid was one of the most seminal events of the 20th century.

We have just concluded a very fruitful exchange of views on a wide range of issues of interest to all the three countries. We have heard the results of the meetings of the Working Groups and Forums who met before our Summit. We have discussed ways and means to further consolidate our cooperation and collaboration under the IBSA Dialogue Forum.

I have had the privilege of attending all the IBSA Summits. I am, therefore, witness to the flowering of this unique organisation and this is a matter of great satisfaction for me. We have defied the skeptics and shown how three like minded countries can pool their resources and genius to help each other and others.

IBSA countries are already members of groupings such as BRICS, BASIC and the G-20. We have a tradition of collaborating on global economic issues and challenges such as international economic and financial crisis, climate change, energy security and food security.

This Summit is special because it has taken place in a year when all three of us are members of the United Nations Security Council. We have acted in concert on the global stage, dealing with complex regional and international political and security issues, including recently in West Asia. This suggests that IBSA can play a role in promoting the cause of international peace and security.

The IBSA framework is unique because the interaction under IBSA transcends the realm of government-to-government activity to encompass dialogue among civil society and people-to-people exchanges.

Its cooperative framework in the form of 16 Working Groups and 6 people-to-people fora brings together our officials, technical experts, business representatives, intellectuals and academicians. These have helped to expand our cooperation considerably. The IBSA Trust Fund is another unique feature of our outreach activities, which we have agreed to promote further.

There is, however, vast potential to increase and expand our cooperation. Intra-IBSA trade is now close to 20 billion US dollars. I am therefore confident that we will be able to cross the target of 25 billion US dollars by 2015. We need to do much more to address the present deficit of intra-IBSA linkages in terms of people’s travel, transport facilities and other related infrastructure.

As three developing democracies, we share very similar aspirations. We seek the empowerment of our people and betterment of their lives through inclusive socio-economic development. Our cooperation so far indicates that we are on the right path.

India looks forward to working closely with its IBSA partners in our collective endeavours to further deepen our cooperation.

I have offered that we will be happy to host the next IBSA Summit in India in 2013.

I thank you.

It is noteworthy that of all the three leaders of the IBSA, Dr. Manmohan Singh is the only leader who attended all its Summits.

“The grouping has shown sceptics how the three states can pool their resources and genius”

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh, who is the only leader to have attended all five IBSA summits, said the grouping had defied sceptics and shown how the three could pool their resources and genius to help each other and others. This is the first summit for Brazilian President Dilma Rousseff and the second for South African President Jacob Zuma.

As the senior-most statesman among the three, Dr. Singh in his opening remarks at the Fifth IBSA summit provided a detailed elucidation on why IBSA must remain restricted to the three countries. His rationale for retaining the three-country format comes against the backdrop of countries such as Turkey indicating their desire to join the grouping and comments by experts that IBSA had been buried under a pile of BRICS consisting of the three IBSA members plus Russia and China.

Describing IBSA as “unique,” its initiatives as “novel” and Tuesday’s summit “special,” the Prime Minister said it drew its strength and global influence from their common political model of being major developing democracies geographically located over three continents.

Collaborating and speaking in almost one voice at over half a dozen global fora, the Prime Minister said the history of cooperation was reflected at the United Nations Security Council (where all three are concurrently non-permanent members) where the three have acted in concert in dealing with complex regional and international political and security issues, including recently in West Asia. “This suggests that IBSA can play a role in promoting the cause of international peace and security.”

Dr. Singh wanted IBSA to build on this cooperation and cited the visit of an IBSA delegation to Damascus in August this year and its interaction with the Syrian leadership, which demonstrated the political role IBSA can usefully play.

Dr. Singh reposed faith in the G-20 and suggested the three leaders should meet on the sidelines of the next summit to ensure that the priorities of the developing economies are adequately reflected. He wanted Europe and other advanced economies, “traditional engines of the global economy,” to calm the capital and financial markets and prevent the global economy from slipping into a double dip recession.

Besides remaining active on the global stage, IBSA should consider new projects in agriculture and agro-processing, environment and energy, including new energy resources. The IBSA Trust Fund projects could also focus on education and skill development, which is a key requirement of almost all developing countries, he suggested.

With the early conclusion of India-SACU-Mercosur Trilateral Trade Arrangement, he hoped Africa could emerge as a bridge linking South Asia and Latin America.
115. Tshwane Declaration Issued at the end of IBSA

Pretoria, October 18, 2011.

Preamble

The President of the Republic of South Africa, H.E. Mr. Jacob Gedleyihlekisa Zuma, the Prime Minister of the Republic of India, H.E. Dr. Manmohan Singh, and the President of the Federative Republic of Brazil, H.E. Ms. Dilma Rousseff (hereinafter referred to as “the Leaders”) met at the Presidential Guest House, Pretoria, Republic of South Africa, on 18 October 2011 for the 5th Summit of Heads of State and Government of the India-Brazil-South Africa (IBSA) Dialogue Forum.

1. The Leaders noted that the India-Brazil-South Africa (IBSA) Dialogue Forum brings together three large pluralistic, multi-cultural and multi-racial societies from three continents, i.e. Asia, South America and Africa, as a purely South-South grouping of like-minded countries committed to inclusive sustainable development, in pursuit of well-being for their peoples. The leaders underscored the importance of the principles, norms and values underpinning the IBSA Dialogue Forum, i.e. participatory democracy, respect for human rights, and the Rule of Law.

2. This Summit took place at a critical time globally, when the world economy is faced with serious challenges and where democracy is being sought after in areas such as the Middle East and North Africa. The Leaders highlighted that the basic pillar of IBSA is the shared vision of the three countries that democracy and development are mutually reinforcing and key to sustainable peace and stability. The Leaders posited that the entrenched democratic values shared by the three countries to the good of their peoples and are willing to share, if requested, the democratic and inclusive development model of their societies with countries in transition to democracy.

3. The Leaders acknowledged the importance of the IBSA Dialogue Forum as an instrument to promote coordination on global issues, pertinently during the historic occasion of 2011 when all IBSA Member States serve as non-permanent members of the United Nations Security Council.

4. Recalling the Declarations and Communiqués issued during the previous Summits, they took the opportunity to deliberate upon the topics hereunder.

Coordination in Multilateral organisations

5. The leaders recalled their joint collaboration in the UNSC and other relevant international fora such as the UN Specialised Agencies and groupings such as the G20, G24, WTO, WIPO, BASIC, BRICS, and G77 + China.
Global Governance Reform

6. The leaders reaffirmed their commitment to increase the participation of developing countries in the decision-making bodies of multilateral institutions. They underscored the need for urgent reform of the United Nations (UN) to render it more democratic and consistent with the current geopolitical reality. They particularly emphasized that no reform of the United Nations will be complete without a reform of the UN Security Council (UNSC), including an expansion in both the permanent and nonpermanent categories of its membership, with increased participation of developing countries in both. Such reform is of the utmost importance for the UNSC to reflect the representativeness and legitimacy it needs to face contemporary challenges.

7. They reiterated that the current international system has to be more reflective of the needs and priorities of developing countries. IBSA, as like-minded countries, will continue to strive to contribute to a new world order whose political, economic and financial architecture is more inclusive, representative and legitimate.

8. They underscored the need for urgent reform of the UN Security Council, including an expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories of its membership, with increased participation of developing countries in both. They discussed the G4 initiative of a draft resolution on expansion of the Security Council in both categories and improvement of its working methods. The initiative has been supported by a wide coalition of Member States, from all regional groups of the United Nations. Therefore, they expressed the view that such strong support should be considered as the basis for further discussion in the ongoing intergovernmental negotiations on the UNSC reform. The need for greater progress in the intergovernmental negotiations was identified as critical to ensure the required impetus to achieve change. They committed themselves to maintain close cooperation and coordination in order to achieve tangible results during the 66th session of the General Assembly.

9. They expressed their satisfaction with the positive role that the three IBSA countries have been playing in the maintenance of international peace and security during their current tenure on the Security Council. They committed themselves to continued close cooperation in order to bring their perspectives into the work and decision-making processes of the UNSC. They reaffirmed their willingness and capacity to take on major responsibilities in the maintenance of international peace and security. In this context, the IBSA countries declared support for each other’s aspirations for permanent seats in a reformed United Nations Security Council.

10. The leaders encouraged coalitions of developing countries, devoted to the process of UNSC reform to actively participate in expediting the ongoing intergovernmental negotiations. The Leaders recalled the critical role of the regional organizations in resolving conflicts. The urged the UNSC to work closely with them.

11. The Leaders committed themselves to continue to work together in relevant multilateral fora to enhance macro-economic policy coordination for sustainable recovery and continued growth. As members of the G20, IBSA Countries reaffirmed their support for the Group as the premier forum for international economic cooperation. The Leaders stressed the importance of sustaining long-term capital flows to developing countries to stimulate investment, especially in infrastructure and called upon Multilateral Development Banks and Regional Development Banks to mobilise more resources and to find ways to expand their lending capacity to developing countries.

12. The Leaders emphasised the importance of the G20 development agenda, with its focus on the contribution to sustainable growth in developing countries, especially in low income countries. They committed themselves to work together for the continued mainstreaming of the development agenda of the G20 in the future, with the emphasis on infrastructure, food security and trade.

13. The Leaders called for the early implementation of the targets for the reform of the International Monetary Fund relating to the mandate, representation, scope, governance, responsibility, responsiveness and development orientation of the Fund, in order to ensure that the Fund is democratic, responsive and accountable. The Leaders reiterated that the governing structure of the Fund should reflect the changed realities of the global economy in the 21st Century, through the increased voice and representation of emerging economies and developing countries. The Leaders emphasized that reform of the international financial institutions should be carried out in accordance with G20 commitments, with the objective of achieving an equitable distribution of voting power between developed and developing countries consistent with their participation in the world economy.

14. The Leaders agreed that the Heads and senior leadership of all international institutions should be appointed through an open, transparent and merit-based process beginning with the selection of the next President of the World Bank in 2012. The Leaders underscored the importance of strictly adhering to the commitments already agreed in other fora, such as in the G20, including the development agenda.

Peacebuilding Commission (PBC)

15. Recalling the interdependence between security and development, the leaders reiterated their view that peacekeeping operations have a contribution to make in early peacebuilding activities and in providing an environment conducive to the implementation of development strategies, as a means to bring immediate peace dividends to afflicted areas and to contribute to a cooperative atmosphere for UN missions. The leaders noted that when considering the deployment of a mission or in evaluating and renewing the mandate of current missions, the UN Security Council should work in close cooperation with the Peacebuilding Commission, with a view to developing a stronger synergy between the two organs.

Global Financial and Economic Crisis

16. The Leaders expressed concern at the ongoing deterioration of the global economic scenario, which presents particular challenges for the economic policy and growth prospects of developing and low-income countries. Downside risks have increased substantially in recent weeks. They stressed the importance of the implementation of a credible plan of macro-economic and financial policies and structural reforms by the Eurozone countries, as a necessary step to prevent further negative shocks to the world economy. They also highlighted the importance of complementary measures by other key developed economies to boost recovery and help the global economy as a whole. They emphasized that domestic policy responses and structural reforms alone remain insufficient to restore growth in many developed and developing countries.

17. The Leaders emphasized the need to increase policy coordination amongst G20 nations, with a view to avert a new recession and to promote a robust recovery in order to ensure strong, sustainable and balanced growth of the global economy in the medium term. This requires carefully calibrated fiscal consolidation in countries with high debt levels and measures to strengthen domestic demand in countries with large surpluses. The Leaders believe that Brazil, India and South Africa are doing their part to promote growth while containing inflationary pressures and ensuring fiscal discipline.

18. The Leaders stressed the importance of implementing the current international commitments of financial regulatory reform, with a view to improving oversight and supervision, towards a more resilient financial system. They also renewed their commitment to the timely implementation of the Basel III agreement.

19. The Leaders emphasized the importance of a more stable and resilient International Monetary System and coherent management of capital flows. They highlighted the special responsibility of reserve currency issuers in the field, in the sense that their policies can have a disproportionate impact on global liquidity and capital flows.
The Social Dimensions of Global Governance

20. The Leaders reaffirmed that people must come first and should participate in the formulation and implementation of public policies, allowing for fair, equitable and sustainable development. They stressed the need to strengthen social policies and to fight poverty, unemployment and hunger. They considered this a relevant priority in the context of an increasingly globalized world, as well as in the restructuring the international financial architecture, which directly affects the welfare of people, particularly of older persons, the youth, the family and persons with disabilities. They reaffirmed their commitment to the implementation of the MDGs. They highlighted the role of the IBSA Facility for the Alleviation of Hunger and Poverty in the implementation of South-South cooperation projects.

Achievement of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs)

21. The Leaders noted that 2015 remains a fundamental target date, by which MDGs must be met. The leaders reaffirmed that with just four years to go for the target year, global efforts for attaining the MDGs by 2015 must see accelerated action. In this regard they called upon developed countries to urgently meet their ODA commitments and to take steps to strengthen global partnership as envisaged in MDG 8 including technology transfer. They further noted that the tepid pace of recovery of the global economy must not lead to lowering of ambition on the MDGs. The Leaders reaffirmed their efforts to strengthening the global partnership for development, but reiterate the necessity of the expeditious delivery of commitments already made by developed countries in the context of the Monterrey Consensus and the Doha Declaration on Financing for Development.

22. The Leaders acknowledged the centrality of the objectives and purposes of the Charter of the United Nations, and its pursuit for the advancement of the agenda for sustainable development. In this regard, the United Nations Millennium Declaration, adopted by the Heads of State and Government at the Millennium Summit on 08 September 2000, which reaffirms the objective of making the Right to Development a reality for everyone, remains complementary to the overall spirit of the Charter of the United Nations.

23. The Leaders acknowledged that the successful achievement of the MDGs; as encapsulated in the Millennium Declaration, the 2005 World Summit Outcome Document and 2010 High-Level Plenary Meeting of the General Assembly; requires strong political will and commitment; adequate funding at the national, regional and international levels; and strengthened international cooperation.
24. The Leaders noted that Sub-Saharan Africa faces peculiar challenges, with respect toward the achievement of the MDGs and has seen less improvement than other developing regions of the world. The African situation remains highly worrisome, particularly in the Least Developed Countries (LDCs) and the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPCs) who are faced with severe poverty and underdevelopment. There is therefore an imperative need for enhanced international cooperation and solidarity, especially under MDG 8, in order to ensure results.

International Trade (WTO DDR)

25. The Doha Development Round negotiations were launched on the basis of a mandate that sought to put the interests of developing countries at the centre of the work programme. The current impasse in the negotiations is therefore a source of serious concern. The distortions caused by the high levels of protection and subsidies in agriculture in the developed countries continue to undermine the development prospect of many developing countries, especially the least developed countries.

26. The Leaders reiterated their view that the demands of the current negotiations in the Doha Development Round reflect an imbalance in the sense that there is too much accommodation of the sensitivities of developed countries in agriculture, alongside unjust demands on developing countries to open their markets in the services and industrial sectors. The Leaders expressed concern at initiatives, such as a standstill on tariffs that remove WTO consistent policy space previously negotiated by developing countries. Developmental agenda remains central to the Doha Round.

27. To overcome the current impasse and to bring the Round to a successful conclusion, the Leaders reiterated the need to re-affirm the integrity of the mandate that launched the Round, and to build on the convergence already achieved. The Leaders urged the members of the WTO to reach an agreement on measures of interest to LDCs such as DFQF, Cotton, and services waiver and not to make it conditional to reaching an agreement on market access issues."}

Sustainable Development

28. The Leaders of India and South Africa pledged their support for Brazil’s hosting of the United Nations Conference on Sustainable Development in June 2012 in Rio de Janeiro (“Rio+20 Summit”) to secure renewed political commitment to sustainable development; to assess progress towards internationally agreed commitments on sustainable development and to address new and emerging challenges. The Leaders acknowledged the relevance of the main themes for the Summit namely the Green Economy in the context of Poverty Eradication and Sustainable Development and the Institutional Framework for Sustainable Development in implementing the Sustainable Development agenda. The Leaders recognised that this conference represents a key opportunity for the international community to examine and reinforce long term commitments established since the 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) held in Rio de Janeiro and the 2002 World Summit on Sustainable Development (WSSD) held in Johannesburg.

29. The Leaders agreed that Rio+20 should renew political commitment to accelerate the implementation of the sustainable development agenda as defined by the Rio Principles and taken forward through the Johannesburg Plan of Implementation (JPoI) in pursuit of global sustainable development. Recognising that the green economy is a means to sustainable development and poverty eradication, the Leaders stressed the significance of this conference in addressing the emerging sustainable development challenges associated with the multiple global issues such as food price volatility and food security, energy scarcity and energy access, unsustainable patterns of consumption and production, challenges of rapid urbanization, land degradation and climate change. Therefore, they stressed that there is no “one-size-fits-all” strategy for sustainable development and that the conference should reinvigorate political commitment towards the implementation of the global sustainable development agenda and work towards assisting developing countries through additional and new financing, technology transfer and capacity building in their efforts to achieve sustainable development and poverty eradication. Furthermore, the Leaders emphasised the importance of reaching an agreement on an effective multilateral institutional framework to coordinate, support and enable sustainable development efforts by the international community and relevant stakeholders in a coherent and integrated manner.

Climate Change

31. The Leaders recalled the two-track Bali Road Map decisions and that the Durban Climate Change Conference is the last opportunity to reach an agreement before the end of the 1st commitment period for developed country mitigation commitments under the Kyoto Protocol. They therefore, called for an agreement on the 2nd commitment period under the Kyoto Protocol as well as the early operationalisation of all the institutions agreed to at COP16/CMP6 in Cancun last year, the Adaptation Committee; the Technology Executive Committee, the Technology Centre and Network; the Standing Committee on Finance and the Green Climate Fund, which must provide significant means of implementation for immediate action to tackle climate change.

In this regard, an appropriate assessment of the Green Climate Fund should be undertaken during COP17/CMP7, in order to ensure its adequate structure, with a view to timely disbursements to developing countries. Furthermore, there is a need to ensure that accounting of finance by all developed countries is consistent, complete, comparable, transparent and accurate, and should include detailed and comprehensive information on fast start financial flows provided by developed countries.

32. The Leaders emphasised the centrality of adaptation and means of implementation as part of a balanced and comprehensive outcome towards the completion of the Bali Road Map. In addition, it is recognised that the extent to which developing countries can implement their actions is dependent on the extent to which developed countries fulfill their commitment to provide sufficient financing, technological and capacity building support to enable both mitigation and adaptation action.

Biodiversity

33. The Leaders, also as members of the Group of Like-Minded Mega-diverse Countries appreciated the initiative of India to host in October 2012, the eleventh Conference of the Parties to the UN Convention on Biological Diversity (COP11 of CBD) and the sixth meeting of the Conference of the Parties serving as the Meeting of the Parties (COP/MOP 6) to the Cartagena Protocol on Biosafety. also expressed concern at how the rising cost of inputs may have regressive impacts on agriculture production and highlighted the need to ensure an increase in agricultural production and productivity, and regulation of commodity markets to meet a growing demand. Regarding the ongoing famine in the Horn of Africa, particularly in Somalia, the Leaders renewed their appeal for countries to deliver on commitments made to provide funding to address issues of food and nutrition security, especially in support of domestic and regional programmes, where they exist.

35. It remains imperative that international collaboration improves to ensure that agricultural productivity be augmented, together with an increase in emergency aid, where needed. The Leaders emphasised the need to support small scale and subsistence agriculture and greater market access for their products. Simultaneously, the need for increased sharing of intellectual property with developing countries that could increase resilience in addressing agricultural development and sufficient nutritional feeding remains critical.

36. The Leaders expressed their support for the UN food based institutions in Rome, and other regional organisations that could increase the capacity of developing countries to deal with the issues of increased agricultural production, food security and nutritional feeding to ensure that they eradicate extreme poverty and hunger and attain the Millennium Development Goal 1. In this regard the Leaders welcomed the election of Dr JoséGraziano da Silva of Brazil as the first Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organisation from the Latin America region The Leaders expressed optimism that under the able leadership of Dr Silva, FAO would continue to grow in strength, particularly looking at its regional programmes, when addressing the specific problems of agriculture development and food security.

The Leaders recalled that South-South cooperation is a common endeavour of peoples and countries of the South, a partnership among equals, and must be guided by the principles of respect for national sovereignty, national ownership and independence, equality, non-conditionality, non-interference in domestic affairs and mutual benefit.

38. The Leaders affirmed that South-South cooperation is complementary to, and not a substitute for, North-South Cooperation. It encompasses all the aspects of international relations beyond the traditional economic and technical areas. South-South Cooperation is an ongoing process which helps developing countries to confront the common challenges they face in successfully promoting their own sustainable development, including through enhancing the capacities of the arrangements and the institutions that promote such cooperation. In this context, the Leaders reaffirmed the importance of South-South Cooperation being implemented jointly through the IBSA Trust Fund.

116. Extracts from the Media interaction by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh on board his Special Flight on way back to New Delhi after attending the IBSA Summit in Pretoria. October 19, 2011.

Question: Impact of the visit and how are we going to gain?

Answer: We had a very satisfactory meeting. As I said in my opening speech, we are three democracies, three developing countries, trying to bring about synergy of interests, we are trying to promote new pathways to promote economic cooperation between India and Africa and India and Latin America. The trade volumes are moving in the right direction. We are confident of reaching the target of 25 billion dollars of trilateral trade by the year 2015. What is more important is the people to people contacts, the various working groups, the fora which have been set up, they bring together civil society actors, women’s groups, science and technology group, agriculture groups, health group, and out of that I think, a new atmosphere, that we have a great deal to learn from each other, that the developing countries exchange can itself enrich all the participant countries. This is the message of this Conference.

Question: On tackling poverty, unemployment and other chronic ills ailing our country?

Answer: Getting rid of chronic poverty, ignorance and disease which still afflict millions and millions of people in our country is the most important task and to achieve that goal we have to walk on several legs. We have to ensure that the country’s economy grows fast enough and the 12th Five Year Plan has the target of about 9 percent growth rate. It is difficult in the present world situation but we believe it is achievable, and if we simultaneously lay lot more emphasis on infrastructure, on education, on health, on skill development, we will create an environment where the youthful population profile that we have, will create not only higher growth rates but also create jobs of productive quality for young men and young women who would be joining the labour force.

Question: On rising threat perception from China and plans to tackle it?

Answer: India and China are neighbours, we have problems. The border problem is a long standing problem, but its my sincere hope that is possible for us to find ways and means by which the two neighbours can live in peace and amity. Despite the persistence of the border problem our both countries have agreed that peace and tranquillity should be maintained along the border. Therefore despite, sometimes something appearing in the newspapers in our country, something appearing in the newspapers in China, that I think invites comments, but overall our relations are quite good. I have good working relations with President Hu Jintao, Prime Minister Wen Jiabao and I am convinced that the top leadership of China wants peaceful resolution of all problems that exist between India and China.

Question: What does India look forward to at the G20 in Cannes?

Answer: Well you would have seen the communiqué issued yesterday. We expect the developed countries, particularly the Eurozone countries to come up with credible measures to resolve the crisis of the sovereign debt which now is becoming a major global concern.
IOR-AR

117. Opening Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the 11th Meeting of the Council of Ministers of Indian Ocean Rim - Association for Regional Cooperation (IOR-ARC).

Bengaluru, November 15, 2011.

Excellencies, Distinguished Leaders of Delegations and Members of the Official Delegations, Allow me to first thank our officials, business persons and academics, as well as our Secretariat, for their diligent preparatory work for this meeting.

I am grateful to all of you for the confidence reposed in India, as we assume the Chair of this Association for the first time. My colleagues and I will work closely with you to contribute to our collective vision and to achieve our shared objectives.

We welcome Australia as the Vice Chair of our Association.

Excellencies,

Over six decades ago, our first Prime Minister Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru envisioned a grouping of countries bordering the Indian Ocean that could help one another in tacking common challenges. This extraordinarily perceptive idea was realized in 1997 with the formation of our Association. We reaffirmed then that the Indian Ocean is an integral part of our collective destiny, and that we need a holistic vision for a cooperative response to current challenges for this region.

The key east-west arteries of international trade – especially in commodities and energy sources – run through our ocean. Maritime security issues impact on our strategic security and the conventional security of our boundaries. Technological evolution and the rising cost of natural resources have made it economically viable to harvest new resources from our sea beds.

The sustainability of our economic development in today’s ecologically challenged world requires efficient management of our shared seas. Conservation and sustainable harvesting are vital for the security of our marine food resources.

These are both opportunities and challenges for collaboration, which reinforce the cultural and civilizational factors that have historically united our region. Our Association is based on an open regionalism, permitting multiple channels of interaction in areas of regional and sub-regional interest.
Excellencies,

Piracy is a priority challenge. It increases the direct cost of trade. It adds indirect costs through increased insurance premia and a human cost to many of our nationals involved in the shipping industry. We need to build upon existing national, regional and multilateral measures to enhance coordination to combat piracy.

We can build functional relationships between our Navies and Coast Guards to enhance the security of our waters. Our port and customs authorities, as well as our shipping firms, need to address issues of transport infrastructure and connectivity that hinder trade.

The growth of intra-regional trade has been limited by poor connectivity, market complexities and inadequate trade facilitation. Our intra-regional investment flows are modest, though many of our economies are important destinations for foreign direct investment from outside our region. We need to promote initiatives to rectify this situation.

We should strengthen connections between our disaster management agencies. India is willing to share its experiences with the Tsunami Warning System for the Indian Ocean.

Our hydrology, marine biology and weather systems research institutions can develop mutually beneficial collaborative projects, share best practices and enhance national capacities. We can invite the Indian Ocean Naval Symposium, of which all our countries are members, to make a presentation on its work at our future meetings.

Our international technical cooperation programme, ITEC, offers capacity-building courses in a number of areas of priority interest to our Association. Our Foreign Service Institute has developed training modules that could be of interest to diplomats in our member-countries.

More regular educational, cultural and tourism exchanges can play a key role in promoting people-to-people understanding.

Excellencies,

Our officials have been discussing ways of simplifying procedures for utilization of our Special Fund. It should become an effective instrument for financing projects and studies of common interest. With this objective, India has decided to provide additional funding of US $1 million to the Fund.

Excellencies,

From our meetings over the last few days, we get the sense of widespread impatience for our Association to move from discussion to action. India shares this sentiment and would like our meeting today to impart the required momentum in this direction. We have asked all our Heads of Mission in your countries to attend our deliberations here, so that they can take forward our agenda in priority sectors of interest.

In conclusion, Excellencies, I thank you again for your support. I look forward to hearing your views on how best to make our Association more effective.

Thank you.

Friends of the media

We have just concluded a very successful interaction of Indian Ocean Rim Council of Ministers.

This is the first time that the IOR - ARC meeting was held in India at the apex level. India would be chairing the Association for the next two years. Thereafter Australia would assume chairmanship for a further period of two years in 2013.

I am delighted that my good friend and colleague, FM Kevin Rudd, joined me as Vice Chair in the deliberations.

I am also pleased to welcome Seychelles back into the Association’s fold, taking our number to 19. We whole heartedly facilitated the re-entry of Seychelles ensuring that they could rejoin us at Bengaluru itself.

All 19 of us are sea faring nations, enjoying the bounty of the mighty Indian Ocean. We also have the responsibility at the same time, to further strengthen maritime security and do everything possible to enhance, all round cooperation among IOR nations.

The Indian Ocean is of strategic importance to all our member nations. India is committed to take initiatives to address the contemporary challenges and developmental aspirations of all nations on its rim. We have taken a decision in the meeting to fully harness the potential of all IOR related institutions that have been established over the years.

I am very encouraged by the overwhelming support for India’s Chairmanship and enthusiasm for making Indian Ocean Association a vibrant grouping for promoting economic and trade relations, cooperation in education, tourism, fisheries, strengthening maritime security, combating piracy, disaster management, share best practices and experiences - to cite a few examples.

We welcome the election of the new Secretary General of the Association, High Commissioner K. V. Bhagirath. He will take up his post on 1 January 2012.

You would have seen the communiqué which spells out our vision. I would refrain from going into further details at this stage.

I also took the opportunity, over yesterday and today, to have a series of meetings with visiting heads of delegations, including FM Rudd of Australia, FM Dr. Dipu Moni of Bangladesh, FM Arvin Boolell of Mauritius, Sr. Minister of International Monetary Cooperation of Sri Lanka, Minister of East African Cooperation of Tanzania, FM Al – Qirbi of Yemen and the FM of Seychelles.

I reviewed the state of play of our bilateral relations with my interlocutors, consulted them on infusing new synergies in the Indian Ocean Association of nations, as well as, exchanged views on regional and international issues of interest.

All my interlocutors were delighted that this important event had been held in Bengaluru and are going back with very positive impressions of the city and State.

Last but not the least, I will like to take this opportunity to sincerely thank CM of Karnataka, the state government and the people of Bengaluru, for their unqualified support and spontaneous warmth.
119. Bengaluru Communiqué issued at the end of the 11th Meeting of the Council of Ministers of Indian Ocean Rim - Association for Regional Cooperation (IOR-ARC).

Bengaluru, November 15, 2011.

We the Ministers of the Member States of the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation (IOR-ARC), met for the 11th Meeting of the Council of Ministers at Bengaluru, India, on 15 November 2011. Our discussions were facilitated by the recommendations of the preceding meetings of the Committee of Senior Officials, IOR Academic Group, Working Group on Trade & Investment and the IOR Business Forum.

We were delighted to welcome the Republic of Seychelles back as a member of IOR-ARC family.

Our deliberations emphasized the increased salience of the Indian Ocean in the contemporary setting. Our maritime domain is at the crossroads of commerce and its busy energy trade routes pass through vulnerable points. The menace of piracy has assumed alarming proportions in recent years. Our cities have been the target of global terror. Our region’s susceptibilities to natural and manmade disasters, issues of sustainable development of our countries and the well-being of our peoples, of the requirement of resources, environmentally friendly technologies and renewable energy to handle challenges of changing climate, the management and sustainable harvesting of the Indian Ocean’s bounty, all these were foremost in our minds and the peoples we represent.

The Indian Ocean is a part of our collective destiny, and there is clearly a case for developing a holistic vision and working cooperatively towards its realization if we are to cope with the challenges of the 21st century. We have reiterated our commitment to furthering the goals of IOR-ARC of promoting sustained growth, balanced development and stability, co-operation based on mutual trust and respect, common interests and similar approaches towards the pressing issues of our region.

We identified sectors of common and contemporary interest, which should guide our Association’s work as we further deepen and give intra-regional cooperation greater relevance and value.

We expressed our shared concern on the prevailing situation regarding maritime security in the Indian Ocean, particularly at the growing level of piracy off the Horn of Africa which poses a threat to international and regional navigation, maritime commerce and the safety of sea farers. In this regard we fully support the international efforts at the UN and the several initiatives at the regional level, as well as the Contact Group on Piracy off the Coast of Somalia which is coordinating anti-piracy efforts. We committed ourselves to cooperate fully through sharing of information and through technical assistance to jointly combat this menace. We noted that stabilisation of Somalia will contribute to dealing with piracy in the region. As members take practical steps consistent with international law to combat piracy, we agreed that IOR-ARC could serve as an effective vehicle for sharing information, experience and best practices. We encouraged members to actively participate in international conferences, regional symposia and workshops being held in the region dealing with these issues.

The Rim has faced the devastating impact of a tsunami a few years ago, and our countries have faced cyclones, monsoon floods and similar natural disasters. Oil spills and marine pollution are recurring threats. Sharing of experiences and best practices through workshops and through capacity building would help in better preparedness to tackle the consequences of disasters, and we have adopted this approach.

Fisheries and marine resources occupy important place in the economies and livelihood of the IOR-ARC member countries. We underscored the importance of deepening cooperation among IOR-ARC members, including in the management and sustainable harvesting of fish stocks and combating illegal fishing and damaging fishing techniques, to further consolidate cooperation under IOR-ARC. The IOR-ARC Fisheries Support Unit set up under the aegis of the Sultanate of Oman could function as a nodal institution to respond to the interests and requirements of member states.

Intra-regional trade amounts to 24% of the global trade and it is increasing. We have the capacity to take this process further. Infrastructure building and trade facilitation are areas in which we would be especially interested. We encourage IOR-ARC forums to reach out to the business and commercial expertise that exists in the region, with improved dissemination of market and supply side analyses and reports to support intra-regional growth of business. We also discussed possibility of initiation of a comprehensive study on the feasibility of preferential trading arrangements for the region including in a variable geometry. We are of the firm view that the academic, scientific and business communities of our membership would find their participation in the wide variety of trade, academic and tourism exhibitions and fairs held in our region of benefit and use, and encourage them to do so.

Science and Technology, and in a wider sense, the whole IOR Academic effort are areas which, in our opinion, need close attention with a recalibration of methodology and approach. We need to understand our region and our shared maritime domain better, we need to look at the development of technologies relevant to our peoples’ needs. Meteorology and the study of the monsoons, marine biology and management of our coastal zones are all areas of relevance; so also are energy efficient and renewable energy technologies, capacity building in ICT, analytical studies on investment promotion etc. We emphasize the need for cross-fertilization of ideas between the Academic and Business Forums and the Working Group on Trade and Investment to strengthen overall cooperation under IOR-ARC. We are convinced that educational mobility and academic exchanges have the potential to contribute to this effort.

We appreciate the diversity and richness of the region’s tourism potential and tourism promotion is an attractive vehicle for socio-economic growth and development in the IOR-ARC region. We believe that intra-regional tourism offers interesting possibilities and suggest that relevant authorities of member countries target this sector for growth to realize the potential of cooperation to fuller extent. We have noted that the second phase of Tourism Feasibility Study is being undertaken at the initiative of the Sultanate of Oman and look forward to its early completion.

We also agree that cultural exchanges would help in promoting people-to-people contacts, contribute to greater appreciation of our diverse capacities, social and cultural values, build mutual confidence and enhance the visibility and value of our Association.

In all these sectors, capacity building is a key instrument. We encourage Member States to make full use of capacity building programmes and workshops that members organize. We would like this aspect to be studied and remedial action suggested, so that the considerable efforts that are put into organizing these activities are put to optimum use.

We agreed to consider a new name for our Association. We directed our senior officials to undertake necessary consultations and report at our next meeting.

We express our appreciation for the leadership provided to the Association by Yemen as the Chair of IOR-ARC over the last two years. We welcome India as the incoming Chair and Australia as Vice Chair of the Association and extend our support and cooperation to it during its Chairmanship in our collective efforts.

We welcome the new Secretary General Ambassador K.V. Bhagirath of India. We would also like to record our appreciation of the contributions of Ambassador Morteza Sarmadi, Secretary General during his term of office.

We thank the Minister of External Affairs of the Republic of India for hosting the 11th COM at Bengaluru.
Government of India is hosting an India-LDC (Least Developed Countries) Ministerial Conference on 18-19 February 2011 in New Delhi. It is the first of its kind being hosted by India. The UN Office of High Representative for LDC, Landlocked Developing Countries and Small Island Developing States (UN-OHRLLS) is assisting Government of India in hosting the event.

The theme of the Conference is "Harnessing the positive contribution of South-South Cooperation for development of the Least Developed Countries (LDCs)"

The objective of the Conference is to provide inputs to the 4th UN-LDC Conference to be hosted by Turkey in Istanbul during 9-13 May 2011. The Istanbul Conference is the fourth in the series of the UN-LDC Conferences held so far: the first two in 1981 and 1991 were held in Paris and the third was in Brussels in 2001.

The Conference will provide an opportunity to Government of India to hear from the Foreign Ministers, Ministers and Permanent Representatives of the LDCs about their approach to the 4th UN-LDC Conference, an event that takes place once every 10 years.

The India-LDC Conference would also be an occasion for Government of India to share with the LDCs the nature and state of our development cooperation with them. The contribution of the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) Program, Duty Free Quota Free Scheme, Africa E-connectivity Project, Lines of Credit and other development assistance initiatives in addressing the special needs of LDCs would be discussed.

The Conference will be inaugurated by the External Affairs Minister. Some 35 Foreign Ministers and Ministers and 40 Permanent Representatives to the UN from the LDCs are expected to attend the Conference. The Foreign Minister of Turkey the host of UN LDC IV will also be present. The participating Ministers are likely to call on Prime Minister.

Apart from the LDCs, the Conference will see participation of Finland, Australia, Slovenia, Hungary, Croatia, Georgia, European Union, China, United States, Germany, China and Hungary as Observers.
The 4th UN-LDC Conference would be an opportunity for the members of the international community to reiterate their highest commitment to the cause of LDCs and to announce new measures in support of the Istanbul Program of Action for the LDCs.

At present, there are 48 Least Developed Countries: 33 in Africa; 14 in the Asia/Pacific region and 1 in Latin America and Caribbean. Since the creation of the LDC category in 1971, only three countries have graduated out of the Group: Botswana (1994), Cape Verde (2007) and Maldives (2011).

NOTE on LDC countries: The United Nations (UN) established the Least Developed countries (LDCs) as a separate category of Nations in 1971. The International Development Strategy for the second UN Development Decade for the 1970s incorporated special measures for the LDCs. Thereafter, the UN decided to hold a dedicated Conference once every 10 years to address the development needs of the LDCs. The First United Nations Conference on the LDCs was held in Paris in 1981; the Second in 1991 again in Paris and the Third in Brussels in 2001 hosted by the European Union. The three Programs of Action adopted so far have had limited impact on the development process of the LDCs. As a result, only three countries have graduated out of the Group since 1981: Botswana (1994), Cape Verde (2007), and Maldives (2011).

UN-OHRLLS:

The United Nations Office of the High Representative for Least Developed Countries, Landlocked Developing Countries and Small Island Developing States (UN-OHRLLS) was set up in 2001 as a follow-up mechanism to the Third UN Conference on the LDCs held in Brussels.

Fourth UN-LDC Conference: Turkey would be hosting the Fourth UN-LDC Conference in Istanbul during 9-13 May 2011. The LDCs and host Turkey are expecting an ambitious outcome from the Istanbul Conference; one which would allow at least 50% of the countries to reach the threshold of graduation by 2020. In the new Program of Action to be finalised in Istanbul, the LDCs are looking for stronger international support measures to meet their development needs: greater Official Development Assistance (ODA) support from the North, enhanced assistance from South-South Cooperation, increased FDI (Foreign Direct Investment) and financial flows from innovative sources and leveraging triangular cooperation.

The Least Developed Countries: The LDCs represent the most vulnerable and the poorest segment of the international community. Of the 48 LDCs, 33 are in Africa, 14 in the Asia Pacific region and one in Central America. These 48 countries account for approximately 815 million people, of which 50% live below the poverty line.
Criteria for LDC classification: The criteria for classifying a country as an LDC are based on: Per capita income; Human asset index; and Economic vulnerability index.

Special needs and vulnerabilities of LDCs: Extreme poverty, lack of productive capacity, absence of infrastructure and institutions; food and energy shortages; weak domestic market; dependence on commodity exports; high global health burden; vulnerability to external shocks and structural weaknesses have long held the LDCs in a state of under-development. They are the most off-track on the Millennium Development Goals.

Dependence of LDCs on global trade: Due to limited structural transformation, the LDCs are heavily dependent on exports of commodities and natural resources for economic growth. However, their total exports in 2009 were only about 1% of the total global trade. In 2009, out of US$ 128 billion LDC exports, US$ 68 came from fuels, US$ 30 from primary commodities, US$11 billion from foods and US$4 billion from agricultural products.

Least Development Countries (48)

Africa (33): Angola, Benin, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Central African Republic, Chad, Comoros, Democratic Republic of Congo, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Gambia, Guinea, Guinea Bissau, Lesotho, Liberia, Madagascar, Malawi, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Rwanda, Sao Tome Principe, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Sudan, Togo, Uganda, Tanzania, Zambia

Asia/Pacific (14): Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, Cambodia, Kiribati, Laos, Myanmar, Nepal, Samoa, Solomon Islands, Timor-Leste, Tuvalu, Vanuatu, Yemen Latin American and the Caribbean (1): Haiti LDC Chair Nepal is the current Chair of the LDCs.

India-LDC partnership:

India has traditionally been a strong supporter of the LDCs. In fact, India played an active role in the setting up of the Group: the idea of creating a separate category of LDCs was discussed in detail and took shape in the 2nd UNCTAD Session held in New Delhi in 1968. India has excellent bilateral relations with each LDC and has longstanding development partnerships with them. Our development assistance to the LDCs is aimed at building productive capacities, institutional strength, infrastructure development and technical expertise to create long term sustainability in these countries.

He noted that 'without the progress of the Least Developed Countries (LDCs), there could be no equitable global growth and prosperity'. He also observed that since 2003, India had offered $ 4.3 million in lines of credit to LDCs, a significant portion of which had already been utilized. Also, public and private sector Indian companies had already invested over $ 35 billion in LDCs.

2. In her welcome remarks Foreign Secretary Smt. Nirupama Rao, affirmed India's steadfast support to the LDCs and stated that 'India believes that stimulating economic growth in LDCs will be an important driver of global growth in the years to come.' Foreign Secretary reiterated India's firm commitment to the needs of the LDCs and for the success of the Fourth UN-LDC Conference in Istanbul in May this year.

3. Earlier in the morning, Heads of Delegation called on the Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh, who reiterated India's commitment to the development of LDCs and the importance that India attaches to South-South cooperation.

4. In the course of the day, EAM held a series of bilateral meetings, including with H.E. Ahmet Davutoglu, Foreign Minister of Turkey; H.E. Ganga Lal Tuladhar, Minister of Nepal; H.E. Moctar Ouane, Foreign Minister of Mali; H.E. Dr. Toga Gayewea McIntosh, Foreign Minister of Liberia; H.E. Alexis Thambwe Mwamba, Foreign Minister of Democratic Republic of Congo; H.E. Dr. Edouard Nyankoye Lama, Foreign Minister of Guinea; H.E. Joseph Bandabla Dauda, Foreign Minister of Sierra Leone; H.E. Adelino Mano Queta, Foreign Minister of Guinea-Bissau; H.E. Ped Shanel Agovaka, Foreign Minister of Solomon Islands; H.E. Mahmoud Ali Youssouf, Foreign Minister of Djibouti; H. E. Fahim Said Ibrahim, Foreign Minister of Comoros, H.E. Mr. Mamadou Tangara, Foreign Minister of Gambia and H.E. Mr. Maitre Madicke Niang, Foreign Minister of Senegal.

5. EAM's interlocutors expressed appreciation for India's principled and sustained support to LDCs and for the additional pledge of assistance made earlier in the day, including a $500 million credit line for specific projects and programmes in LDCs over a five year period; additional five scholarships each year to every LDC under the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation Programme (ITEC) and a Special Fund of $5 million over the next five years for the follow-up to UN LDC4.

6. The next UNLDC Summit would be held in Istanbul from 9 to 13 May 2011. EAM had a very good exchange of views with Foreign Minister Davutoglu of Turkey, on a range of bilateral and other issues of mutual interest. The Foreign Minister cordially invited India to participate in the Summit meeting. He also invited EAM to pay an early visit to Turkey which was accepted with pleasure.

7. In his meeting with Minister Tuladhar of Nepal, EAM spoke of the traditionally close bilateral ties, which were to mutual benefit and hence required nurturing by both sides. He hoped that the peace process and constitution drafting would gain further momentum, ushering in an era of stability, growth and prosperity in Nepal. Minister Tuladhar conveyed greetings of the people and leadership of Nepal to the people and Government of India and said that the two countries enjoyed historically close ties. He apprised EAM of the developments in his country and sought continued assistance and support of India. On behalf of his Government, he also extended an invitation to EAM to visit Nepal at the earliest, which was accepted.
Inaugural Address by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at India - Least Developed Countries (LDCs) Ministerial Conference.

New Delhi, February, 18, 2011.

Excellencies,

Distinguished guests,

Ladies and gentlemen,

I am delighted to welcome you to my country. Your presence here, Excellencies, is as an affirmation of our common resolve and shared vision.

It is a privilege for India to host this first-ever India- Least Developed Countries Ministerial Conference in New Delhi. This provides an opportunity for us to explore the untapped opportunities of South-South cooperation which can contribute significantly to the sustained development of Least Developed Countries.

This morning, you have had the opportunity of meeting Hon'ble Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh. He provided to you a reiteration of our commitment at the highest level to the development of the Least Developed Countries and the importance we attach to the instrument of South-South cooperation in the pursuit of that cause.

Excellencies, I would like to begin by recalling the words of India's first Prime Minister Pundit Jawaharlal Nehru in 1947 which encapsulate India's commitment from the earliest days after its independence to sharing its development experience with fellow developing countries. I quote:

"The service of India means, the service of the millions who suffer. It means the ending of poverty and ignorance and disease and inequality of opportunity. The ambition of the greatest men of our generation has been to wipe every tear from every eye. That may be beyond us, but as long as there are tears and suffering, so long our work will not be over. And so we have to labour and to work, and to work hard, to give reality to our dreams. Those dreams are for India, but they are also for the world, for all the nations and peoples are too closely knit together today for any one of them to imagine that it can live apart. Peace is said to be indivisible, so is freedom, so is prosperity now, and also is disaster in this one world that can no longer be split into isolated fragments." Unquote.

These inspiring words from India's first Prime Minister have guided and shaped our approach to South-South cooperation. Successive Indian leaders, beginning with Pundit Jawaharlal Nehru followed by Indira Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi and now Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh, have tirelessly nurtured and pursued the process of sharing our knowledge and experience with our friends from the developing world.

As we endeavour to transform a post colonial economy into a modern vibrant state, we continue to draw inspiration from those who fought for our freedom, particularly our first Prime Minister. Today, as the world’s largest democracy, which supports fundamental human rights and human freedoms, we are proud of the progress we have been able to register to meet the economic aspirations of our people. We stand ready to share our experience with our friends and brethren in the Least Developed Countries.

I personally believe that this Conference will be meaningful and successful only through full and frank participation of the Least Developed Countries. We would like to hear your ideas and listen to your suggestions. We would like you to guide us towards the solutions to the problems which you face. As they say, the wearer knows where the shoe pinches. Let there be a collective brainstorming in this Conference on the theme of the Conference to facilitate an innovative, meaningful, pragmatic and ambitious outcome at the end.

The share of 48 Least Developed Countries in global trade remains a mere 1%. Of the 33 countries in a permanent state of food insecurity, 22 are Least Developed Countries. This situation is further exacerbated by their rapidly expanding urban population and declining agricultural productivity.

We have seen significant growth in a few Least Developed Countries, attributed mainly to concerted national efforts and some international support. But the overall progress continues to be halting, uneven and fragile. Most of the Least Developed Countries are still struggling to meet the objectives and targets set in the Brussels Programme of Action, a decade after its adoption. They are also behind schedule in achieving the Millennium Development Goals.

The number of Least Developed Countries has almost doubled from 25 in 1970 to 48 in 2011. Only three countries have so far graduated out of their Least Developed Country status. This pace of progress is clearly unacceptable. It is time that we take up the cause of the Least Developed Countries on a war footing and work together. Without the progress of the Least Developed Countries there can be no equitable global growth and prosperity.

The expectations from the forthcoming Fourth UN Conference on the Least Developed Countries in Istanbul are naturally very high. The Istanbul conference provides us with a valuable opportunity to self-introspect, make course corrections, and adopt a result-oriented agenda for action.
Given the enormity of the challenges facing the Least Developed Countries and the less than satisfactory results of international efforts so far, it is imperative that we explore new and innovative ways to supplement the mainstream effort to assist Least Developed Countries and look for out-of-the-box solutions to assist our least developed country partners.

South-South cooperation, the theme of this conference, and one of the cornerstones of Indian foreign policy, is one such innovative solution that has the potential to deliver real and tangible benefits to the Least Developed Countries and effectively supplement and complement existing international efforts. However, I must emphasise that South-South cooperation is not a substitute for North-South cooperation.

India's rich and expansive agenda of technical and economic cooperation with developing countries, particularly the Least Developed Countries, is the result of our abiding belief in South-South cooperation. It is our intention to continue to augment our development cooperation initiatives with developing countries in general and Least Developed Countries in particular. In our initiatives with Least Developed Countries, we are principally guided by the priorities set out by Least Developed Countries themselves.

India already has a substantive development cooperation programme with Least Developed Countries. We have extended a comprehensive scheme for Duty Free Quota Free treatment to imports from the Least Developed Countries. The core thrust of our development partnership with Least Developed Countries has been capacity building. In this regard, the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) programme merits mention. The cumulative value of our Lines of Credit to Least Developed Countries since 2003 is US$ 4.3 billion, a significant part of which has already been utilized. But more significantly, the total investment by Indian public and private companies in the Least Developed Countries now stands at about US$ 35 billion. India's annual imports from Least Developed Countries are over US$ 10 billion.

I am happy to make the following additional announcements for the Least Developed Countries:

(i) Additional 5 scholarships every year under the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation Programme for each Least Developed Country.

(ii) A special fund of US$ 5 million over the next five years for the follow up to UN LDC Four.

(iii) US$ 500 million credit line facility over the next five years to be used specifically for projects and programmes of Least Developed Countries.
Excellencies, it is my expectation that your deliberations at this Conference will be meaningful and productive and that we will be able to embody the outcome in a Declaration. This Declaration has been agreed upon in New York by our Permanent Representatives and the text will be circulated to you this afternoon. I am confident that this Declaration will serve as a useful input for the Istanbul Conference.

I thank you, Excellencies, for joining us in New Delhi for this Conference. I wish you successful deliberations and a pleasant stay.

Thank you

124. Remarks by Minister of State Mrs. Preneet Kaur at the concluding session of two-days India-LDC Ministerial Conference in New Delhi.

New Delhi, February 19, 2011.

Honourable Ministers,
Permanent Representatives,
The High Representative for the Least Developed Countries,
Ambassadors, High Commissioners and distinguished delegates,

Our deliberations yesterday and today have given us a better understanding of the developmental concerns of the LDCs. We are greatly encouraged by your appreciation of and the value you attach to South-South Cooperation. The warmth and goodwill that marks our mutual ties are a source of inspiration and hope for the future. I am particularly grateful for the appreciation you have shown of the India-LDC partnership and of India's development cooperation programmes.

I wish to thank all of you for your active participation in making this event a success. I know many of you came to this event in spite of your extremely busy schedules, travelling from the farthest corners of the world. Your contributions at this meeting will guide us in our cooperation with you to enable you to meet the aspirations and development goals of your countries.

I am thankful to our fellow partners from the South for joining us at this conference. I am also grateful for the participation of delegations from developed countries whose commitment and enhanced support are vital for the LDCs to achieve socio-economic transformation.

The Brussels Program of Action of 2001 had given us valuable inputs on the pressing needs of the LDCs. Our deliberations here have produced further meaningful recommendations on South-South Cooperation that would feed into the Istanbul Program. The Delhi Declaration, which we have adopted today, and the promises and aspirations therein, will guide our collective vision for the development of LDCs. We are keen to build upon them and ensure that they provide useful inputs to the Istanbul Conference.

We welcome the multi-stakeholder strategy that has been adopted for the Istanbul Conference and compliment Turkey for taking the initiative. This is the time to establish partnerships. Involving Parliaments, the private sectors and the civil societies will be most meaningful in drawing upon the ideas and energies of all relevant stakeholders.

With just three months to go for the Istanbul Conference, I call upon the international community to express its strongest commitment, solidarity and support for the fulfillment of aspirations of the LDCs.

India on its part will meet all expectations and more; and I am confident that our fellow countries in the South will be equally enthusiastic and supportive of the LDCs.

I once again thank you all for your distinguished presence here. You will be going shortly to Agra to see the Taj Mahal. I wish you a pleasant trip and a safe journey back home.

125. Delhi Declaration issued by the INDIA-LDC Ministerial Conference.

New Delhi, February 19, 2011.

DELHI DECLARATION

We, the Foreign Ministers, Ministers and Representatives of the Least Developed Countries and India attended the India-LDC Ministerial Conference on "Harnessing the Positive Contribution of South-South Cooperation for Development of Least Developed Countries" in New Delhi during 18-19 February 2011 to foster and further strengthen our mutually reinforcing development partnership, solidarity and commitment to socio-economic advancement of the LDCs. The conference was organized in cooperation with UN-OHRLLS to develop meaningful inputs for the Fourth UN-LDC Conference (UN-LDC IV) to be held in Istanbul from 9-13 May 2011.

2. We call upon the international community to express its highest political commitment in support of the Istanbul Program of Action and to the successful and ambitious outcome of the Fourth UN-LDC Conference.

3. We underscore that the interconnected and globalized world has made it essential for the international community to accord its highest priority to the cause of LDCs to ensure global peace, security and prosperity; and urge that the Istanbul Conference must galvanize global action in support of the development needs of LDCs, whose progress would bring greater global growth and opportunities for all. The LDCs' perspective must be taken into account while making decisions on global economic governance.

4. We underline that addressing extreme poverty, building productive capacity through structural transformation, spurring economic growth, enhancing participation in international trade and building resilience against vulnerabilities are key development challenges of the LDCs.

5. We note with concern that international efforts so far have lacked a comprehensive approach to effectively address the challenges faced by the LDCs, evident in the number of LDCs having increased from 25 in 1971 to 48 in 2011, and press for strengthening of international support mechanisms in favour of LDCs to augment their resources, productive capacity, institutional strength and policy space to lead their respective national development processes; and in this regard call for augmenting ODA, South-South cooperation and triangular cooperation for a comprehensive implementation of the Istanbul Program of Action.

6. We call for an ambitious Istanbul Program of Action that aims to get at least 50% of LDCs at the threshold of graduation by 2020.
7. We underscore the need to have a strong in-built review mechanism in the Istanbul Program of Action for monitoring and evaluating progress and to provide a smooth and effective transition to graduating countries.

8. We note with satisfaction the increase in South-South Cooperation and South-South trade and investment flows and its positive impact on the LDCs' development process and commit to further strengthening this partnership, which we see as a complement, and not a substitute to North-South cooperation.

9. We note that the Nairobi outcome document of the High-level United Nations Conference on South-South Cooperation, the Marrakech Framework for the Implementation of South-South Cooperation and the Yamoussoukro Consensus on South-South Cooperation constituted a comprehensive framework for continuing efforts by developing countries to resolve their shared problems and acknowledged the various national, sub-regional and regional initiatives to promote South-South cooperation and called for greater dialogue and exchange of experiences to increase their coherence.

10. We acknowledge the need to reinvigorate the United Nations development system in supporting and promoting South-South cooperation, and to this effect urge the United Nations funds, programs and specialized agencies to take concrete measures to mainstream support for South-South and triangular cooperation to help developing countries, at their request, to develop capacities to maximize the benefits and impact of South-South and triangular cooperation in order to achieve their national development goals and internationally agreed development goals, including the Millennium Development Goals.

11. We emphasize that promoting economic growth is fundamental to reducing poverty and attaining the Millennium Development Goals and in this regard note the importance of creating a domestic environment conducive to growth of private enterprise and attracting foreign direct investment in LDCs.

12. We express deep concern at the precarious state of global food security including food price volatility and inflation and its destabilizing impact on the LDCs, and call for bringing about an agricultural revolution in LDCs to achieve self-sufficiency in food.

13. We reaffirm our commitment to promoting access to energy and strengthening energy security to reduce poverty and meet other development challenges in LDCs.

14. Noting that the share of LDCs in global trade in spite of the Duty Free Quota Free scheme extended by development partners continues to be around 1%, we appeal to countries to address the bottlenecks in the program including stringent rules of origin, complex procedures and supply side constraints to enable LDCs to have a greater share in global trade.

15. We call for an early conclusion of the DOHA Round with a development based outcome to allow meaningful integration of the LDCs in the multilateral trading network.

16. We underscore the significance of science and technology, research and innovation in stimulating development in the LDCs and in this regard call upon developed countries to facilitate transfer of technology to LDCs to support science & technology initiatives.

17. Citing the success of the India- Africa E-Network, mobile telephony, mobile-banking and renewable energy programs in LDCs, we appreciate that technological leapfrogging has brought immense socio-economic gains and also opened vast opportunities for addressing developmental challenges in LDCs.

18. Deeply concerned at the debt situation of several LDCs, we strongly appeal for the creation a debt sustainability framework for LDCs to address their systemic vulnerabilities and to build resilience in their economies.

19. We recognize that Climate Change presents a major threat to livelihoods in developing countries, particularly in LDCs and other vulnerable countries and pledge to work together to take forward the Cancun agreements to find effective solutions based on the principle of equity and common but differentiated responsibility and respective capabilities. We call for immediate disbursement of fast start funds agreed under Cancun Agreements to the LDCs and special allocation of resources under the Green Climate Fund for LDCs along with transfer of environmentally sound technologies to LDCs to meet their urgent adaptation and mitigation needs. We urge the parties to urgently reach agreement on the design of the Fund and the measures to significantly scale-up long-term financing for meeting mitigation and adaptation needs in developing countries in accordance with the provisions of the Convention.

20. We thank the participation of Turkey, Finland, Australia, Hungary, Slovenia, China, United States of America, Germany, Croatia, Georgia European Union, Italy, France, UNDP and UNCTAD as Observers in the Conference.

21. The Ministers and Representatives of LDCs and other participants at the Conference welcomed and thanked the Government of India for announcing new initiatives in support of the development needs of LDCs comprising 5 additional slots annually under the Indian Economic and Technical Cooperation (ITEC) Program to each LDC; US$ 5million over the next five years for follow-up activities of the Istanbul Program of Action; and a Line of Credit of US$ 500 million over the next five years to be used specifically for projects and programmes of Least Developed Countries.

22. The Ministers and Representatives of LDCs thanked the Government of India for the warm hospitality and excellent arrangements made for hosting the India-LDC Ministerial Conference and for India’s continued commitment and support to the cause of the LDCs.

126. Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the UN- LDC IV.

Istanbul, May 12, 2011.

Mr. Chairman,
Excellencies,
Distinguished delegates,

It is an honour for me to participate in this Fourth United Nations Conference on Least Developed Countries.

I am grateful to the people and Government of Turkey for graciously hosting this conference and for the warm hospitality extended to me and my delegation.

This historic city of Istanbul bridging the East and the West provides the perfect metaphorical setting to build a durable partnership between the international community and the Least Developed Countries (LDCs).

Mr. Chairman,

The Least Developed Countries are the most vulnerable and the poorest segment of the international community. Their marginalised existence, is a matter of grave concern to all those who believe in a just and humane society.

The plight of the LDCs remains immeasurable. They have little or no capacity to absorb external shocks.

Mr Chairman,

We live in an interconnected world where the global community shares a common destiny. What we do for the LDCs in reality is a matter of our collective interest. Supporting the cause of the LDCs goes far beyond the moral argument; it is an economic imperative and a political necessity.

Without putting the LDCs in the forefront of the global development agenda, we can hardly expect progress on the Millennium Development Goals.

Mr. Chairman,

International support for the LDCs since 1971, when they were created as a special category of countries in the UN, has not been commensurate with their special needs. The Brussels Programme of Action has had limited success. It is no surprise then that so far only 3 countries have been able to graduate out of the Group in the last forty years.

With their limited domestic resources and meagre international support, the LDCs have worked hard to overcome their developmental challenges. But their structural weaknesses make their development a vicious cycle.

The global financial, food and energy crises have had a debilitating impact on these countries reversing their hard won development gains.

The LDCs are excessively dependent on global trade for economic sustenance. However, their share in global trade, in spite of preferential market access, was only 1% in 2009. There is an urgency to work for an early conclusion of the Doha Round to create more space for the LDCs in global trade.

Food and energy price volatility, threats posed by Climate Change and new and emerging challenges have further eroded the productive capacities of these countries.

The debt situation in several LDCs remains untenable.

While they remain saddled with myriad challenges, the LDCs are endowed with vast natural resources, huge potential for clean energy and a dynamic young population. What they need is a strong international partnership to unlock their true potential.

Mr. Chairman,

The LDCs have come to Istanbul with high expectations and so have we. I am hopeful that these expectations will be fulfilled.

The Istanbul Programme of Action is a comprehensive document. It now needs to be backed by the highest political commitment and a genuine international partnership.

I, therefore, urge all stakeholders to pledge their maximum support for the LDCs and enable them give a life of dignity and hope to their people. India, on its part, would do all it can and more for their cause.

In my appeal, I am reminded of the timeless wise words of our Father of the Nation, Mahatma Gandhi who said, "The difference between what we do and what we are capable of doing would suffice to solve most of the world's problems". Unquote.

The commitments made by the donor community on Official Development Assistance, market access, debt settlement, capacity building and transfer of technology must be renewed and scaled up for a meaningful implementation of the Istanbul Programme.

South-South Cooperation no doubt will play an important part in this endeavour but it cannot be a substitute for North-South Cooperation. Developing countries which are themselves faced with insurmountable challenges cannot be expected to take on a responsibility that they don't have the capacity to fulfil.

Mr. Chairman,

Sustained economic growth is fundamental to eradicating poverty in LDCs. In this regard, we are happy to see that the LDCs are taking major steps to attract Foreign Direct Investment and promote private enterprise to boost growth.

We welcome the multi-stakeholder approach of the Conference to involve the Parliamentarians, the private sector and the civil society in addressing the special needs of LDCs.

Mr. Chairman,

India prides itself in standing shoulder to shoulder with the LDCs. Our strong ties with the LDCs have been nurtured through a shared history and common development needs.

We feel particularly privileged to have played a historical role in the creation of the LDC category when we took lead to give shape to the idea at the Second UNCTAD Meeting in New Delhi in 1968.

Our solidarity with the LDCs draws continuous inspiration from what our former Prime Minister Mrs. India Gandhi had to say at the 7th NAM Summit in New Delhi, and I quote "Faith in future has brought so many across the continents and the oceans to meet here. We are here because we do believe that minds and attitudes can and must be changed and the injustice and suffering can and must be diminished. Our world is small but it has room for all of us to live together and to improve the quality of lives for our peoples in peace and beauty". Unquote.
Mr Chairman,

India remains fully committed to the needs of the LDCs. We have extended capacity building and economic assistance to the LDCs in their priority areas of development such as agriculture, infrastructure, telemedicine, energy, banking, and information technology under our flagship Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) Programme.

In keeping with the Hong Kong WTO Ministerial Declaration, we have extended duty free quota free preferential market access to their products.

Our Lines of Credit worth 4.8 billion US Dollars to LDCs since 2003 and Aid for Trade programmes have led to expansion in India-LDC trade from 16.7 billion US Dollars in 2008-09 to 20.5 billion US Dollars in 2009-10, with the balance of trade being in favour of the LDCs.

Our private sector has invested more than 35 billion US Dollars in the LDCs since 2003.

During the India-LDC Ministerial Conference three months ago in New Delhi, we had announced a credit line facility of 500 million US Dollars for projects and programmes for the LDCs over the next five years under the existing Indian credit line regime for developing countries. Today, I have the pleasure to announce enhancement of that amount to 1 billion US Dollars. The additional 500 million US Dollars will come into the credit line immediately after the 500 million US Dollars announced last February are fully utilised by the beneficiaries.

At the India-LDC conference we had also offered 5 additional slots under the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation Programme to each LDC on an annual basis and a grant of 5 million US Dollars for the follow-up of the Istanbul Programme.

Mr. Chairman,

The Istanbul Programme is an opportunity to give to the Least Developed Countries their rightful due. Let us make the most of it.

Thank You.
Mr. Chairman

Excellencies,

Distinguished delegates,

At the outset I would like to congratulate you on your Chairmanship of this conference and express my sincere appreciation for the people and Government of Indonesia for the warm hospitality extended to us.

Aligned Movement.

It is, indeed, befitting that this commemoration is taking place on the soil of Indonesia where the foundations of our Movement were laid at the historic Asian African Conference held in Bandung in 1955. Today I am particularly reminded of the founding fathers of our Movement - Pandit Nehru, President Nasser, President Tito, President Nkrumah and President Sukarno. Their shared vision of freedom of judgement and freedom of action in international relations built upon the basic principles of solidarity, peace, justice and equity gave birth to our Movement. Describing the Movement, Pandit Nehru said, and I quote "The power of nations assembled here is not military power or economic power, nevertheless it is power. Call it moral force".

Mr. Chairman,

The Movement helped close a long and painful chapter of colonialism, imperialism and institutionalized racism. These are achievements of which the Movement can be justifiably proud and draw inspiration. However, fifty years after its founding, our Movement stands at the crossroads and we need to draw on the vision of our founding fathers to guide our perspective as we move forward. We are once again facing significant political challenges that could have a profound impact on the landscape of the global political discourse. Our members have benefited from globalization but still face daunting development challenges.

Much work still needs to be done to attain the Millennium Development Goals for all by 2015. Accelerated and sustained efforts are needed towards eradication of poverty and lasting improvements in nutrition, health and education, the well-being of our children and jobs for our youth. Developing countries are being hit by the rising food and energy prices and excessive speculation in the global commodities market. Our environment and climate challenges need to be ambitiously addressed bearing in mind equity and the cardinal principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

The UN Conference on Sustainable Development to be held next year in Rio de Janeiro should place sustainable development squarely within the development agenda. Developed countries have historical responsibilities and capabilities. They need to meet their commitments and not seek their dilution. This is true not only in the area of environment but also for development cooperation. Developing countries, who all face daunting development challenges, are partnering each other and doing as much as they can.

At the recently concluded UN Conference on the Least Developed Countries, India committed US Dollars One Billion in Lines of Credit for the LDCs. These South-South cooperation actions are voluntary and in a spirit of solidarity cannot be a substitute for long made but still unfulfilled North-South development assistance commitments. A critical essential in developing countries being able to cope with the huge challenges that confront them is to have the necessary policy space at national level and multilateral institutions that are supportive of that space.

Mr. Chairman,

The creation of UN Women last year has been one of the most important transformational aspects of UN reform. This new entity should give a significant fillip to our quest for gender equality and women’s empowerment, which lie at the heart of development and distributive justice. The expectation that political emancipation would lead to rapid socio-economic development and give the developing countries a greater say in the world order are still far from being realized. The world’s international institutions, in particular, the UN and its Security Council and the Bretton Woods Institutions require fundamental changes to reflect contemporary realities. After years of discussion and negotiations we are at the cusp of bringing about real change in the Security Council to expand it in both permanent and non-permanent categories. Developing countries must throw their considerable weight behind this reform so that their voice is qualitatively enhanced in the Security Council.

Mr. Chairman,

Increasing inter-connectedness and inter-dependence has created its own challenges while exacerbating others. Terrorism is the greatest scourge of our times. The Movement should ensure that terrorism is not condoned or justified on any ground whatsoever: political, religious, ethnic or any other.
The fight against terrorism must be directed not only against the terrorists, but also against those who sponsor, abet or support them. It is high time that we agree on a Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT).

Another major challenge is from the handling of weapons of mass destruction. We need to be unwavering in our commitment for preventing the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and their means of delivery. We need to be fully cognizant of the catastrophic dangers that transfers of WMDs to non-state actors and terrorists could entail. States need to remain accountable and ensure the elimination of these dangers. Clandestine proliferation networks have led to insecurity for all and must not be allowed to reappear.

Mr. Chairman,

India has been consistent in its support for global, complete and verifiable nuclear disarmament. In 1988, Prime Minister Shri Rajiv Gandhi presented an Action Plan for a Nuclear Weapon-Free and Non-Violent World Order to the Third Special Session of the UN on Disarmament. In June 2008, Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh asked others to join India in taking the critical first step - a commitment, preferably a binding legal commitment through an international instrument, to eliminate nuclear weapons within a time bound framework.

India's resolutions in the First Committee on a "Convention on the Prohibition of the Use of Nuclear Weapons", "Reducing Nuclear Dangers" give expression to some of these steps and have justifiably found support from a large number of countries. India has also called for a meaningful dialogue among all states possessing nuclear weapons to build trust and confidence and for reducing the salience of nuclear weapons in international affairs and security doctrines.

Mr. Chairman,

African countries form the largest single grouping in NAM. The Movement must continue to work towards ensuring Africa's pre-eminence in the global development agenda. And, we must stand in solidarity with our brothers and sisters from Africa as they address their socio-political challenges. The international community needs to be there to assist as per the wishes of the African countries in their quest for national answers. As we meet in Bali, the Second India-Africa Forum Summit is taking place in Addis Ababa. This Summit process is an important manifestation of South-South Cooperation and signifies the close engagement between India and Africa in fulfilling their aspirations of development and creating a paradigm of mutual support and partnership. India's partnership with Africa is anchored in equality, mutual respect and mutual benefit and we are guided by the wishes and priorities of our African friends.
Mr. Chairman,

Today's world of instant information and communication has provided people with a dramatic ability to be part of and influence political processes. Several countries in North and West Africa and the Middle-East are witnessing challenging developments. It is important that violence is abjured and the route of dialogue taken to meet the legitimate aspirations of the people. It is also important to ensure the sovereignty, unity and territorial integrity of States. The use of force should be avoided.

Mr. Chairman,

NAM has always been in the forefront of efforts on the Palestinian issue and this time we have a special segment on the issue of Palestinian political prisoners. The situation in the Middle-East continues to be grim with no signs of peace talks and with potentially exacerbating situations developing in the region. It is, however, imperative that hopes raised for a Palestinian State during last two years reach fruition later this year itself.

India has a long-standing tradition of solidarity with the Palestinian people. We welcome the reconciliation agreement between Fatah and Hamas and hope that this would promote the realization of the aspirations of the Palestinian people and lead to peace and stability in the region.

We support the Palestinian people's struggle for a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine with East Jerusalem as its capital living within secure and recognized borders, side by side and at peace with Israel, as endorsed in the Arab Peace initiative, Quartet Roadmap and relevant UN Security Council Resolutions.

Mr. Chairman,

As we embark on the monumental task for elaborating a vision for the next fifty years, we must be guided by a new, forward-looking agenda which draws inspirations from our convictions of the past and our aspirations for the future.

The Movement also ought to position itself to play a seminal role in strengthening multilateralism and shaping a multi-polar world order with developing countries having a qualitatively significant voice in critical global institutions.

We need to focus on issues that unite while recognizing the rich diversity of countries that constitute the Movement. We need to strengthen commonality and build on our solidarity.

Thank you.
Mr. Chairman, Excellencies, distinguished guests, Ladies and Gentlemen,

It is an honour to be here, amongst you today, on the occasion of the Post-Forum Dialogue Partners Meeting. I would like to compliment the Government of New Zealand for the excellent arrangements made for the Forum meetings, as also thank our hosts for their warm and gracious hospitality.

2. India’s "Regional Assistance Initiative" for Pacific Island Forum countries, is based on the priorities identified by the leaders of the Pacific Island Forum countries in the Pacific Plan. In keeping with its desire to develop closer engagement with the Pacific region, India increased its annual Grant-in-Aid to US$125,000 from 2009 to each of the Pacific Island Countries for their economic development.

3. The assistance offered by India covers a wide spectrum of economic and social needs as felt by the Pacific countries. This includes supply of equipment and materials for social and economic programmes and for sustainable development initiatives; capacity building course on Small and Medium Enterprise promotion, training courses for diplomats by Foreign Service Institute of India and scholarships in higher studies in different centres of academic excellence in India. This year we have conducted a course for diplomats of the Pacific Island Countries and provided assistance for office equipments to Solomon Islands, renovations of the Liku Village Pastor’s Housing project and re-roofing and renovation of Niue Sports & Recreation and Training Centre, provided three dialysis machines and other medical equipment, 5 new Ambulances and installed 123 water tanks for Rural/Urban Schools in Fiji, and set up a Coconut Oil Mill Plant in Micronesia.

4. India also offers wide ranging technical expertise in non-conventional energy sources, especially wind and solar energy, software and telecommunications. India’s own experience with meeting ever increasing energy demands has helped accumulate considerable expertise in the area of harnessing new and renewable energy sources. We stand ready to share this knowledge and experience with our partners from the Small Pacific Island countries.

5. We keenly follow and appreciate the steady progress made by Pacific Island Countries Forum towards regional integration. This Forum provides an excellent opportunity to identify common areas of cooperation in different sectors for sustainable development. India has always stood for the cause of the developing countries at multinational forums such as the UN and the WTO and has been at the forefront of South-South cooperation.

6. In order to strengthen our engagement with PIF countries, India is considering appointing Honorary Consuls in those Pacific Island countries where there is no resident Indian Mission. We will also ensure setting up of a PIF Trade Commission office in India in order to increase trade and investment relations with the region.

7. I would like to reiterate India’s commitment for the economic development of the Pacific Island Countries and its greater integration with the Indian economy. I would also like to mention that those countries which did not utilize the grant-in-aid of US$ 1,25,000/- offered annually in previous years may avail of the same, along with the offer made this year.

Thank you

SAARC

129. Opening Remarks by Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao at the 38th Session of the SAARC Standing Committee.

Thimphu, February 6, 2011.

It gives me great pleasure to be here in Thimphu for the 38th Session of the Standing Committee during this 33rd Inter-Summit Session. My delegation and I would like to express our grateful thanks to the Royal Government of Bhutan for the warm hospitality accorded to us, as well as for the excellent arrangements made for the Meeting; and also for facilitating the informal meeting of the Council of Ministers at the margins of the 65th UNGA session in New York last September.

I would like to thank the Secretary General of SAARC, H.E. Dr. Sheel Kant Sharma, and his very able team of officers and staff for the excellent preparatory work done for this Inter-Summit Session and its preceding meetings.

In considering the Periodical Analytical Report before us, I wish to, at the outset, commend the Secretary General for presenting a very comprehensive assessment of the progress achieved in SAARC on various issues of regional cooperation since the last session of the Standing Committee. As several issues raised in the Secretary General's Analytical Report would be revisited under specific agenda items, I would like to restrict my intervention, at this stage, to general comments on some of the key issues raised in the Report. Our specific comments would be made against individual agenda items.

In perusing the report it becomes evident that valuable progress has been achieved in developing a regional framework of cooperation in areas such as environment, energy, agriculture, rural development and trade. SAARC has also facilitated some encouraging steps towards greater cooperation in the prevention of trafficking of women and children. Increased people-to-people interaction has been facilitated by greater cultural and social exchanges under the auspices of SAARC. The Secretary General's Analytical Report reveals a degree of progress in some areas but also considerable scope to do more in others.

Having just completed 25 years of SAARC, we can say that the process is maturing and we are now gradually focusing on providing more services for the economic and development needs of our people.

SAFTA can be an important instrument to deepen intra-regional trade if it is complied with by all member states and implemented in letter and spirit. Early ratification of the SAARC Agreement on Trade in Services signed at the 16th SAARC Summit will give a boost to realizing the full potential of trade in services in the region. India has already submitted its sector-specific request list of services to various Members and we hope that the 'request-offer process' can soon gather pace at the meeting of the Expert Group scheduled for the end of March 2011. The Group on Customs Cooperation is also doing good work for the harmonization of customs standards within the region. We are hopeful that with the appointment of its first Director-General, the SAARC Arbitration Council will also contribute to facilitating the trading environment in the region.

The SAARC Development Fund is an important pillar of SAARC in implementing collaborative projects that bring tangible benefits to our people. I am glad that apart from the two ongoing projects on Women's Empowerment and Maternal Healthcare, a third project on Zero Energy Cold Storage has been approved by the Governing Board of the SDF. Other projects in the pipeline should also be processed soon for implementation.

I am very pleased that in August 2010, the first academic session of the South Asian University (SAU) commenced in New Delhi with 50 students from all across the region. The Seventh Steering Committee Meeting has, in September 2010, finalized all the modalities of the University and plans are now afoot for the first meeting of the Governing Board of the SAU to be convened. We would urge those Member States who have not yet done so to quickly nominate their members to the Governing Board so that its first meeting can be held soon. We also call upon remaining Member States to ratify the Agreement on the establishment of the SAU at the earliest.

We are fully committed to working with other Member States to enhance the prosperity of the South Asian region through social development and regional economic integration. In this context, India is pleased that we were able to launch projects in the important areas of health, education, food, water and energy in some of our neighbouring countries. The thrust of most of our regional projects and activities is at the grassroots levels having a direct bearing on the lives and livelihoods of the people.

We have noted the aspect of the Secretary-General's report relating to SAARC's interaction with Observers and Inter-governmental organizations. As we explore consensus to deepen and broaden the Association's global engagement, we must not lose sight of fundamental principles of such cooperation, which should continue to be based on mutual self respect of each others identity. Such engagements need to be rooted in SAARC's Charter and its objectives and priorities, and be based on concrete assessed regional developmental needs in mutually agreed areas.

We also take note of the Secretary General's stress on the need to hold SAARC meetings on schedule to ensure timely implementation of decisions. We will do our utmost to make this a reality. In this regard, we welcome the offer by Maldives to host a meeting to finalize the Draft Agreement on Natural Disaster Rapid Response Mechanism, something that we have been keen to pursue for some time and was almost ready for the last Summit.

In concluding my opening remarks, Mr. Chairman, I wish to also formally acknowledge the stellar contribution of the Secretary-General, Dr. Sheel Kant Sharma, to further regional cooperation during his tenure. I would like to place on record our deepest appreciation for his valuable and untiring efforts towards achieving this objective. My delegation and I wish him the very best in his future endeavours.

Thank You.

130. Opening remarks by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the 33rd Session of the SAARC Council of Ministers.

Thimphu, February 8, 2011.

Your Excellency, Chairperson of the Council of Ministers

Your Excellencies, Ministers of Foreign Affairs of SAARC Member States,

Your Excellency the Secretary General,

Distinguished delegates,

It gives me great pleasure to be here in Thimphu for the 33rd Session of the Council of Ministers as part of the Inter-Summit Session. My delegation and I are deeply touched by the warm hospitality accorded to us by the Royal Government of Bhutan and greatly appreciate the excellent arrangements made for this Meeting. I am very pleased to be back in Thimphu and recall with appreciation the successful hosting of the 16th SAARC Summit here last April.

I wish to take this opportunity to also thank the Secretary General of SAARC, Dr. Sheel Kant Sharma, and his very able team of officers and staff for the excellent preparatory work done for this Inter-Summit Session and its preceding meetings.

As SAARC completes 25 years of its existence, the need of the hour is to identify ways and means for the Association to become a more dynamic component of the larger Asian resurgence, characterized by increasing inter-linkages and growing inter-dependence. We are, of course, fully committed to the SAARC processes. There has been progress in various fields in SAARC but I am sure my colleagues will agree that we face a continuing challenge to implement our agreed decisions. We need to move faster in executing the plans of action.

Terrorism is a very serious challenge facing the entire South Asian region. In this regard, I am very glad to note that the Third SAARC Home Ministers Meeting took place in Islamabad in June 2010. During the course of that meeting, important decisions were taken including the adoption of the Ministerial Statement on Cooperation against Terrorism. Other significant decisions, on the guidelines for the SAARC Visa Exemption Scheme and Standard Operating Procedures to prevent trafficking in women and children, were also taken. We fully support the decisions taken by our fellow Home/Interior Ministers in these areas.

I am glad to note that the Third SAARC Transport Ministers Meeting took place in New Delhi in November 2010 and discussed matters relating to the SAARC Regional Multimodal Transport Study as well as progress in the implementation of pilot, sub-regional and regional projects. I was also pleased to learn that a demonstration container train run is being planned, initially from Bangladesh to Nepal via India. This would hopefully show the potential for reducing freight costs in the region and give an impetus to trade. However, some forward movement is still required with respect to the two draft Agreements on Motor Vehicles and Railways for the enhancement of intra-regional connectivity in South Asia. I hope progress can be made with regard to these two Agreements.

I am pleased to note that our fellow Finance Ministers had their fourth meeting in Thimphu in August last year, where they considered matters of financial sector cooperation among our countries. I note, in particular, the progress made on a draft Agreement on Promotion and Protection of Investments. This would be an extremely useful agreement to give a fillip to trade in the region and we look forward to its early finalisation so that it can be signed at the next SAARC Summit in the Maldives later this year. We also welcome the work being done by SAARCFINANCE to promote greater cooperation among the Central Banks of our countries, especially with regard to monetary coordination and harmonization of banking rules.

I am glad that SAARC Tourism Ministers met recently in Kathmandu and noted that Member States are taking necessary steps for tapping the vast potential in the tourism sector with due regard to its impact on society, culture and environment. Promoting intra-regional tourism through collective efforts will also contribute towards our shared vision of building a common South Asian identity.

I am particularly pleased with the progress achieved to establish the South Asian University in New Delhi. It is heartening to note that the University has started functioning from August 2010 and 50 students from all over the region are already studying at the University. I am also glad that in September 2010 the Steering Committee of the SAU finalized all the modalities of the University and plans are now in place to convene the first meeting of the Governing Board of the University. We look forward to greater participation of students and faculty from all across the region as we work together to make this University a world class institution that can contribute in a significant manner to the larger objectives of our association.

I am glad that the new CEO of the SAARC Development Fund (SDF) is taking a keen interest in the follow up to ongoing projects under the social window of the Fund. We look forward to more projects being developed by different Member States for the benefit of people at the grassroots level in our region. India will provide all necessary help to the SDF in furthering this institution for regional development.
I am pleased that trade under SAFTA is growing and has crossed $1.2 billion. This is, however, still well below its potential. India is taking steps to reduce its sensitive lists, especially for LDCs and I hope this will encourage others to respond too. The signing of the SAARC Agreement on Trade in Services (SATIS) in Thimphu last year was a big step forward in broadening the scope of trade in SAARC from goods to also include services. I am glad to note that four SAARC Member States have already ratified SATIS and would urge Member States that have not yet done so to take steps to do so soon.

Mr Chairman, India remains fully committed to enhancing the prosperity of South Asia through implementation of social development projects. In this regard, I am pleased that projects funded by the Government of India in Tele-medicine, Tele-education, Rain Water Harvesting, Seed Testing Laboratories and Solar Rural Electrification are being implemented in some SAARC Member States. I must express my gratitude to my colleagues around the table for fully supporting these projects. In due course, we look forward to implementing these projects in all Member States who would like us to do so. I recall the ambitious Statement on Climate Change adopted by our leaders at the Sixteenth SAARC Summit at this very venue. I hope that all Member States will take urgent steps to ensure that the objectives of that Statement are implemented in full.

Mr. Chairman, it was particularly heartening to see that Bhutan presented a common position for SAARC at the COP16 in Cancun. Congratulations are also due to your leadership as SAARC was accorded Observer status to the UNFCCC Secretariat during COP16. This should spur us to work more closely to identify ways and means to tackle the challenges facing the region in the areas of climate change and global warming.

SAARC belongs to all the people of South Asia and we have to ensure that its processes are so focused. Demonstrating our commitment to make SAARC a people-driven process, India organized a series of cultural events since we last met here in Thimphu. I am pleased to say that the participation of people from all over the region in these programmes of folklore, heritage and music made them a great success. Indian delegations also participated actively in cultural events organized by other Member States during this period.

I am also glad that our proposal to create a South Asia Forum for the exchange of ideas on the future development of South Asia has been endorsed by all members. We now look forward to the early nomination of members to the Steering Committee of the Forum and to hosting the first meeting of the Forum in India before the 17th SAARC Summit in the Maldives.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to place on record our appreciation for the special efforts made by the outgoing Secretary General, Dr. Sheel Kant Sharma, to further regional cooperation during his very productive tenure. His deep personal commitment and belief in the potential of SAARC to contribute to the welfare of South Asians is an abiding legacy of his three years as Secretary General. I wish him the very best for his future endeavours.

Finally, I take this opportunity to felicitate Ms. Fathimath Dhiyana Saeed who has been nominated by the Government of Maldives as the next Secretary General of SAARC. We strongly support Ms. Saeed’s candidature and welcome her warmly to the SAARC family. We look forward to working with her closely and are convinced that the Association will rise to even greater heights under her stewardship.

With these words I once again thank the Royal Government of Bhutan for the excellent arrangements made for this meeting and assure them of India’s enduring support during their Chairmanship of SAARC.

Thank You.

131. Inaugural address by Prime Minister at the 5th Conference of Association of SAARC Speakers and Parliamentarians.

New Delhi, July 9, 2011.

"I warmly welcome all the distinguished delegates at the Fifth Conference of the Association of SAARC Speakers and Parliamentarians in India. I extend a special welcome to the delegates from Afghanistan, who are participating in this Conference for the first time.

South Asia has seen many changes since the first Conference was held in 1995. The winds of democracy have swept across the length and breadth of South Asia. In some cases, there has been a peaceful transition from an old order to a new one. In some, the end of war and conflict has opened new opportunities for political accommodation and devolution of powers. In others, the struggle for the hearts and minds of the people is underway to defeat the forces of terrorism and extremism.

The picture is a mixed one, but what is common is the optimism about the future and the abiding faith of our people in universal adult franchise and free and fair elections."
Parliament is the supreme organ of democracy that reflects the collective will of the people and the sovereignty of the state. Today, more than ever before, a tremendous responsibility rests on our parliaments to safeguard political liberties, protect fundamental human freedoms and the rule of law.

At the SAARC Summit in Thimphu in April last year, SAARC Leaders had agreed that a Conclave of SAARC Parliamentarians be established in order to benefit from the democratic and participatory tradition represented by the Parliamentarians of South Asia.

We had also agreed to form a 'South Asia Forum' with representatives from Parliaments of SAARC countries to engender debate, discussion and exchange of ideas on South Asia and its future development. These are initiatives worthy of our wholehearted support.

We in South Asia face common challenges of mass poverty, unemployment, lack of adequate health care, illiteracy and environmental degradation. Each of us has rich and varied experiences in tackling these challenges. We should learn from each other's experiences, and reinforce each other's efforts to deal with these challenges.

One of the lessons history has taught us is that no country can prosper in isolation. We live in an inter-connected world, and this is especially so in South Asia. We share common borders, whether on land or sea. What happens in one country necessarily affects the other. Our destinies are bound by history as well as by geography. If we act with wisdom and sagacity, we all stand to benefit.

The free flow of information and the explosion in communication technologies imply that physical borders can no longer divide our nations. We must not only keep pace with technology, but also harness its benefits to bring down the psychological barriers that separate us.

We have a shared civilizational and cultural heritage going back many centuries. We celebrate our pluralism and diversity of religion, language and culture while finding our strength in unity. We must learn to speak with one voice on the common challenges that face us.

South Asia is home to perhaps the most youthful population in the world. They demand and deserve a better future, and it is incumbent on us to respond to their aspirations. We can reap a rich demographic dividend if we can equip our youth with the right skills, make them employable and channel their energies to productive ends. Disaffection and alienation provide a fertile breeding ground for intolerance, violence and terrorism which then threaten our societies and rupture the social fabric.
The establishment of the South Asian University is a most timely initiative in this context. I am happy that it has started its academic session in 2010. With the support of all SAARC nations, the University has the potential to become an important centre of learning in the region.

Economic development is a fundamental prerequisite for human progress. Economic growth has to be inclusive and balanced. We cannot allow pockets of poverty to persist either within our countries or within the broader region. India provides opportunities for all of South Asia to benefit from its economic growth and vast market. We have opened our market and we are committed to pursuing policies that benefit the entire regional economy as a whole. South Asia must prosper as a whole.

Intra-regional trade since the introduction of the South Asian Free Trade Area in 2006 has grown to 1.2 billion US dollars. We have declared 2010-2020 as the 'Decade of Intra-regional Connectivity' in SAARC. The SAARC Development Fund is now well-established. The SAARC Regional Food Bank has been set up to meet food emergencies in the region. We are moving in the right direction, but we need to move much faster.

Perhaps no region is more vulnerable to the effects of climate change and other challenges to sustainable development than ours. Regional cooperation is vital for improving the quality of governance in managing our natural resources, in preventing land and water degradation and in strengthening our food, water and energy security. We should do this at all levels - bilaterally, sub-regionally and as a region as a whole. The SAARC Convention on Cooperation in Environment agreed upon at the SAARC Summit in Thimphu in 2010 deserves to be implemented in full.

I am glad that this Conference will focus on the issue of sustainable development. South Asia cannot afford to copy western lifestyles. We have to tap our own genius to develop models of growth which correspond to our resource endowments, and yet enable us to banish the scourge of poverty from our midst.

South Asia cannot realise its full potential until and unless we solve our differences peacefully and develop the culture of solving our problems ourselves. Others cannot solve our problems for us. The scourge of terrorism has taken a huge toll on all our societies. It is a cancer that if not checked, will consume us all. I would like to believe that we have the will and foresight to prevent such an outcome.

Resolving differences and reconciling different viewpoints are what Parliaments and their Presiding Officers do on a daily basis. This is a job Smt. Meira Kumar has done with outstanding success in our own Lok Sabha and I congratulate her. As Parliamentarians you are uniquely placed to help inculcate the sense of a common South Asian destiny in your countries. We would like to see many more exchanges among our Parliamentarians.

India remains firmly committed to principles and ideals of SAARC. We will go the extra mile to make SAARC an effective organisation that benefits all citizens of South Asia.

In conclusion, let me say that we would like our Parliamentarians to act as the conscience keepers of South Asian cooperation and integration. I wish you all success in your deliberations and look forward to your valuable recommendations.

With these words, I have great pleasure in declaring the 5th Conference of the Association of SAARC Speakers and Parliamentarians open.

132. Media Briefing by Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai on Prime Minister’s visit to Male for SAARC Summit.

New Delhi, November 05, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good afternoon and welcome. Sorry to keep you waiting a bit. You know, Foreign Secretary flew back at 8:30 in the morning from Cannes.

Prime Minister of India is leading the delegation to the Seventeenth SAARC Summit to take place at Maldives. Prime Minister leaves on the 9th of November. After the SAARC Summit he is also going to pay a bilateral visit to Maldives. Foreign Secretary would like to brief you about the important forthcoming visit of the Prime Minister of India. Also I would like to introduce Mr. Vikram Doraiswami, who is to the right of Foreign Secretary. He is the Officer on Special Duty handling SAARC affairs.

Sir, the floor is yours.

Foreign Secretary (Shri Ranjan Mathai): Thank you.

As Joint Secretary mentioned to you, I have just got off the flight a little while ago. Essentially I have been travelling since the 27th of October. So, if I look a little grubby, it is because I am. Let me just say welcome all of you and colleagues from the Ministry.

This is the Seventeenth SAARC Summit being hosted by Maldives in the island of Addu which is the southernmost island. It is actually the first time the SAARC will be meeting south of the equator in the island of Addu. The Summit will take place on 10th and 11th of November. The Summit would be preceded by Standing Committee meeting, as is always done, which will be on the 7th and 8th of November, and a Council of Ministers meeting at the level of Foreign Ministers on 9th.

Prime Minister will lead the Indian delegation to the Summit. He would be assisted, as I said, by the External Affairs Minister, National Security Advisor, Foreign Secretary myself, and a number of other senior officials.

After the Summit, as JS (XP) has mentioned, the Prime Minister will proceed to Male, the capital of the Maldives, for a bilateral visit on the 11th and 12th. His visit to Male, Maldives is expected to inject new momentum and content to our relations with this close and strategic neighbour in the Indian Ocean. The last time there was a bilateral visit by the Prime Minister of India to the Maldives was in September, 2002.

The objectives of the visit would be to reinforce India’s close bonds of friendship and solidarity with the Maldives and to review the current status of our bilateral relations with that country. A number of agreements are likely to be signed during the bilateral visit. The Prime Minister has also been invited to address the People’s Majlis, the Parliament of the Maldives.

Coming to the SAARC, this is the third time Maldives hosts the Summit, after doing so in 1990 and 1997. I think the Government of Maldives did make a special effort to take it outside the Capital and, as I said, we are meeting south of the equator in the atoll of Addu.

In its 26th year of existence, SAARC has established itself as the leading mechanism for regional cooperation in South Asia. It is working to intensify regional integration and develop a South Asian identity. More wide-ranging cooperative projects that create momentum for integrating our region will also benefit from a greater sense of a shared destiny.

It is on this broad canvass that SAARC has exercised a positive impact on the lives of South Asia’s people. Over the last quarter century since it came into being, the Association has focused on common concerns ranging from poverty alleviation and enhancing food security to combating trafficking in women and children, coping with environmental challenges to enhancing regional trade and connectivity.
Implementing the provisions of the South Asia Free Trade Agreement (SAFTA) remains central to creating a more prosperous region. Since its entry into force in 2006, SAFTA has been showing significant results. Trade under SAFTA is now at the mark of US$ 1.3 billion. And this is more than double of what it was two years ago. Further forward movement can be expected both in terms of reducing the size of our Sensitive Lists, especially for LDC members of SAARC, but also for reducing peak tariff rates for products that remain covered by the Sensitive Lists.

It is timely and appropriate that the theme for the Seventeenth SAARC Summit is Building Bridges. Literally and metaphorically, our region needs to improve the infrastructure of connectivity and trade. It also needs better people-to-people contact to entrench the habit of regional cooperation.

I would like to mention a few steps taken by SAARC to create new institutions which will anchor the sense of integration and cooperation. The examples include the South Asian Regional Standards Organisation (SARSO) which is set up in Dhaka, Arbitration Council in Islamabad, and a development fund which is called SDF in Thimphu. The South Asian University has opened its doors to Masters level students from the region as of July 2010 in New Delhi.

India hosted the first meeting of the South Asia Forum. This is a platform mandated by the SAARC Leaders at the XVI Summit, to bring together Governments and civil society actors. The Forum will provide inputs to develop a new vision for the region in its next 25 years. And the Summit is going to have a report from the Forum. We also see this as part of a process to widen the range of stakeholders in all the eight SAARC nations.

In this SAARC Summit, four important Agreements are to be finalized. These will include two agreements on regional standards, one agreement to establish a rapid response mechanism to deal with natural disasters, and an agreement to establish a SAARC Seed Bank.

For India, SAARC is a key element in our approach to the region. It is a vital platform for our agenda of mutually-beneficial regional cooperation, leading to economic integration of our wider region. It is also a mechanism through which we can supplement bilateral ties with each of the other seven SAARC states.

Since a proactive, positive and engaged India is central to regional cooperation in South Asia, we remain committed to supporting SAARC projects even in an asymmetrical and non-reciprocal manner. I am confident that the forthcoming Summit will enable us to intensify regional cooperation, while expanding the canvas for such activities. It may be mentioned that since the New Delhi Summit in 2007 India has in fact contributed a substantial sum for various SAARC initiatives.
Thats all I will say at this point. I will be happy to answer your questions.

Question: Mr. Mathai, even 25 years after SAARC came into existence, the intra-SAARC trade continues to be languishing at five per cent whereas in ASEAN it is 50 per cent. The upcoming Summit does not have any plans like in the next 25 years the intra-SAARC trade could be increased to 10 per cent of the total trade, 15 per cent. And considering that Pakistan finally has granted MFN status to India, do you expect that to be a game changer vis-à-vis SAFTA trade and India Pakistan trade?

Foreign Secretary: I do not think the Summit plans to arrive at any numerical figure such as 10 per cent. But I think the basis on which the movement towards reducing the sensitive list, of reducing peak tariffs is that the intra-SAARC trade must grow much faster. It is a fact that if you look at the intra-SAARC trade, there are both the SAFTA element and the element outside SAFTA. And it is remarkable, as I said, that the SAFTA element has literally doubled since 2009. And in 2009 it had doubled from two years earlier. So, it is a fact that the SAFTA process is growing faster than the rest of intra-SAARC trade. As a result, we expect that the measures which are being taken here will certainly propel the overall intra-SAARC trade to a much faster level of development. Whether it will reach ten per cent or not I am quite sure but we certainly expect it to grow much faster.

As to the MFN, certainly the implementation of the MFN process, as and when that actually comes into effect, will we believe have a very positive impact on Indo-Pakistan bilateral trade. And certainly through that it could impact the overall intra-SAARC trade.

Question: Could you just throw some light on this Agreement on Rapid Response System, as to what is this all about? On the MFN status, the Pakistani High Commissioner was there at the Home Ministry yesterday also and he clearly said that what the Cabinet has mandated is a formalization towards the MFN status, which is not equal to giving MFN status. There is a lot of contradiction on that.

Foreign Secretary: I will ask my colleague Vikram to describe the details of the Rapid Response Mechanism and I will come to MFN after that.

Officer on Special Duty (SAARC) (Shri Vikram K. Doraiswami): Thank you, Sir. The agreement essentially aims to provide effective regional mechanisms for a rapid response to natural disasters. Basically the idea is to create the modalities by which countries in the region can provide each other assistance teams, how the assistance teams are to move, to build capacities to deal with post-disaster delivery relief, and also to create contingency planning and post-disaster measures across the region. We do not actually have any such thing.
It builds upon the establishment of the SAARC Disaster Reduction Mechanism which is based in Delhi.

Foreign Secretary: As regards the MFN, the actual statement by the Pakistan Cabinet is that the Ministry of Commerce has the mandate to take forward the process of normalization of trade relations between India and Pakistan which would culminate in the observance of Most Favoured Nation principle in its true spirit. And according to the information available through the Pakistan Government, the Cabinet has approved the process of full normalization of trade relations, of which MFN is a part. The actual implementation would be a culmination of the normalization process which could take some more time. That is the position as explained.

Question: Is there any proposal in the near future to open up new Chapters of SAARC University in other SAARC countries?

Foreign Secretary: Yes, in principle there is a decision that there should be other campuses for the SAARC University. I think three other places were mentioned. The first campus will come up at Maidan Garhi in Delhi which should be ready by 2015. It would have a full-fledged campus by 2015 on a very large plot of land. The second is in fact supposed to come up in Bangladesh. There are proposals for the other countries but Bangladesh is the next country that I am aware of. The idea is that we would be extending campuses to at least two other places.

Question: My question is regarding Afghanistan … to the SAARC Summit. It is now a full member of SAARC. Do you have any plan or a vision to extend the Indian help like you have been doing in Afghanistan what the other members is building bridges, as we can do something in the human made disasters also in Afghanistan. After the pullout of the American troops and all, there should be some kind of an infrastructure building. Does the SAARC Summit have any vision for building up of Afghanistan?

Foreign Secretary: I think what we are doing bilaterally with Afghanistan will of course continue. Afghanistan as an LDC will benefit certainly from those measures which SAARC agrees on specifically for LDCs. There are certain other infrastructure-related issues - I mentioned the Seed Bank, I mentioned certain other development projects – under which Afghanistan can benefit. We also have the specific mechanism of the small development projects under the SAARC agenda including some for dealing with the issues of climate change and issues like that. Certainly Afghanistan would be a beneficiary of those joint mechanisms. But I am not aware that specific infrastructure building is on the agenda of SAARC. The issue on which Afghanistan could really benefit is the connectivity. This is an issue on which Afghanistan could benefit. Also SAARC has capacity-building schemes for education, for training. This will certainly benefit their human resource development. Then there is a thing called the SAARC Development Fund (SDF) under which all countries have contributed. We are in fact the major contributor there. Projects could be developed under that.

Question: You said that after the SAARC on the 12th there would be bilaterals. In those talks, will there be any kind of a discussion on defence assistance to Maldives in view of the apprehensions being expressed by Maldives over Somali piracy?

Foreign Secretary: Defence is one of the areas in which we do cooperate with the Government of Maldives. All aspects of our relations will get covered during the bilateral relationship. Certainly the question of tackling piracy has been raised. But it is not a specific agenda item. It comes under the broad discussion on defence cooperation, joint exercises, joint management of our coastal zones. Certainly yes, we would take this on board as one of the issues which we will continue our cooperation. As you know, our Navy cooperates with the Maldivians but even our Coast Guard does cooperate with the Maldivian Coast Guard authorities. Certainly the fact of some of these pirate ships turning up close to Maldivian shores has been a sense of concern. It has not happened in recent months. But some months ago there were some reports of them having come. I was present in Perth when the subject also came up in the Commonwealth framework. Along with the Maldives, certain other island states like Seychelles, Mauritius had also raised this issue. Certainly at a bilateral level we are going to cooperate with Maldives.

Question: Is the Prime Minister going to have bilateral meetings with some of them from other SAARC countries? More specifically talking about bilateral with Pakistan, do you sense a qualitative change in relations with Pakistan in the past few weeks? And what are you expecting from this forthcoming bilateral meeting?

Foreign Secretary: Yes, the Prime Minister has in principle agreed that he would hold bilaterals with all the South Asian leaders. We are working out the schedules. We certainly expect meetings with all the leaders to take place. With Pakistan, you were right in saying there have been some positive indicators in the last few weeks. I think the Joint Secretary had issued a statement on the release of the helicopter which strayed into their territory. Then there is this decision in principle by their Cabinet on MFN. These are I would say indications of forward movement. Our Prime Minister, as you know, is committed to building the relationship with Pakistan, building it on a more stable and normal basis. We would also look forward to the visit of the Judicial Commission. This is another area where we expect some forward movement. All aspects of bilateral relations will be discussed when the two Prime Ministers meet. I cannot be more specific than that, but certainly when they meet at that level, all issues in our bilateral relations will come up for review.

Question: What is the expected timeframe for actual implementation of MFN status to India?

Foreign Secretary: I do not have an exact timeframe. As they said, it is going to be a normalization process. So, we will establish what exactly would be the timeframe as we go along. But we do not expect it to take a very long time.

Question: Foreign Secretary, India is trying to integrate its economy with the other major economies of Asia. What is our view on bringing in the big ones like say China, South Korea or Japan into it? I know they are observers at the moment, but to give them a kind of a full membership in SAARC.

Foreign Secretary: I think the question of even the observers, someone just remarked the other day that they have nine observers in an eight member organization. So, I think we need to take first of all a look at the observership. As you are aware, there was a moratorium on it. But as to the membership of the organization itself, as its name goes it is South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation. I do not think Korea fits into the category of South Asians. I do not think this is on the anvil or is even being discussed. We are interested in economic integration with the rest of Asia. That is a goal which is driven more bilaterally and our engagement with individual countries. The only group engagement would be our engagement with ASEAN. But SAARC as a whole trying to integrate, I do not think this has ever been discussed.

Question: Just two small points on the bilaterals. In the bilateral with Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina, are you expecting to take forward the unfinished part of the Teesta Accord from Dhaka? Secondly, you mentioned welcoming the Judicial Commission from Pakistan to India. India had also put in a request to send a Commission from here in order to interrogate those who are in the Rawalpindi jail under trial right now. Has that gone any further?

Foreign Secretary: I will answer the second question first. I do not really have a take on that. I do not have the specific date or specific mention on that. As regards the meeting with Sheikh Hasina, I think the overall bilateral relationship and where we are certainly will be discussed. Inevitably we would discuss any unfinished business from the Prime Minister’s visit. But the meeting is in the nature of a meeting on the sidelines of SAARC. So, we expect that some of the SAARC related issues and how they impact our bilateral relationship would be discussed. I do not think we would be going into the specific details of the individual agreements.
Question: Sir, in the last SAARC summit many of us reported that there was quite a mild protest that India-Pakistan bilaterals, when they take place on the sidelines of that event, dominate the entire event. Even Maldives President had told us on record also about this. I think Bhutan and Bangladesh are also privately opposing it. What is your view on that? It becomes such a big event. The big ticket event is always the bilateral relation and not the entire issue.

Foreign Secretary: The question is, who makes it a big ticket event? I think I am looking at those responsible for that. So, I leave it to you to introduce a sense of balance. I think you have a very valid point. We are meeting as eight sovereign countries who are all equals in the SAARC framework, and certainly we would like the focus to remain essentially on the common business of SAARC. And once we get beyond the common business of SAARC we have vital relations with all these countries. And certainly some of them have very substantive business with each other. So, we would certainly hope that the focus will not be diverted to one single event.

Question: Are we concerned about the Chinese military activities in and around Maldives?

Foreign Secretary: We have a very strong relationship with Maldives including a very close defence relationship. In our interactions with the Maldives, they are fully cognizant of our interests and our concerns. We do not see any reason to be concerned.

Question: The aim is to integrate South Asia. Our relationship with Myanmar has improving with the civilian government in place. Will there be a move to accord Myanmar full membership of SAARC?

Foreign Secretary: At the moment there is no proposal on the table for expansion of the membership of SAARC. Certainly, as you said, Myanmar is an important neighbour; I would go even far to say it is a vital neighbour of ours. It is already an observer within the SAARC. We have found in our discussions with Myanmar that it is the bilateral mechanism which they favour to build their relationship with us. After all Myanmar actually borders us and to a limited extent Bangladesh. But as of now there is no proposal for expanding the membership.

Question: Mr. Mathai, it has been more than ten years since friend Laxman Kadirgamar had floated the idea of having a SAARC currency at a New Delhi Summit. Nothing happened after that. Is there likely to be any forward movement on that, at least SAARC countries’ internal trade accepting one country’s currency in another and so on instead of depending on dollar or euro?
Foreign Secretary: I do not think this idea has really been examined in great detail after Mr. Kadirgamar mentioned it because I think many of the other countries did not take it up as an issue. So, my brief response would be to keep your rupees in your pocket and continue to use them.

Question: Under the SAARC framework would you be raising the issue of bilateral trade transit facility between India and Afghanistan?

Foreign Secretary: Under the concept of connectivity, certainly we would hope that this issue can come up. As you are aware, Pakistan and Afghanistan have their own bilateral Afghanistan-Pakistan Trade Transit Agreement (APTTA). But in the SAARC context there are proposals for both rail and road connectivity among all the countries. As and when all the members can agree on that, certainly we would hope this would apply in the context of India-Afghanistan relations also. But this is some time away. On the road agreement, I think there has been one meeting which has been held so far. Railways has made more progress. But we are still not in sight of an actual agreement.

Question: Will this issue of road and railway connectivity be taken up?

Foreign Secretary: It is one of the issues which will be discussed in the Standing Committee and by the Heads.

Question: Just a corollary to Manish’s question on the India-Pakistan relationship. You said that there are indications of forward movement. What led to this forward movement? You have cited the helicopter instance which was very encouraging - the chopper came back in all of four hours - and now the Most Favoured Nation status. Your exact words were, ‘There are indications of forward movement’.

Foreign Secretary: I said these are indications are forward movement, these developments.

Question: Could you tell us what led to this improvement in the India-Pakistan relationship?

Foreign Secretary: I think that is a question you will have to pose to our neighbours. But broadly I think we have been consistent in seeking, as I said, a relationship which is stable, normal, in which minor incidents should not derail the overall trend towards a more cooperative and constructive relationship between us as neighbours. As you are aware, the issue of trading is one on which we have been holding out the hand of cooperation to Pakistan. Prime Minister mentioned yesterday while answering questions in Cannes that we in fact extended MFN status to Pakistan back in 1996. As he remarked, der aaye, durust aaye.
Question: Sir, Bangladesh has made their position clear that unless you sign the Teesta agreement, they will not allow India transit facility. In the context of SAARC, do you think that Teesta has become a stumbling block? Without Bangladesh, how is connectivity possible?

Foreign Secretary: The connectivity being discussed in SAARC is independent of any country’s bilateral relationship. Obviously the agreements on roads and rails will finally go ahead only when all countries are satisfied that it is in their interest and that it is in the common interest to do so. As regards connecting it to individual bilateral relations, that is an issue which we take up as we go along. I do not see individual countries’ bilateral relationships stopping the general forward movement, at least on those where the SAARC has already reached an element of agreement. We shall see in Male whether there is any actual connection with the river waters.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you.

133. Statement of Prime Minister prior to his departure for Maldives to attend the SAARC Summit.

New Delhi, November 9, 2011.

I am leaving today on a visit to the Maldives to attend the XVIIth SAARC Summit being hosted by the President of Maldives, H.E. Mr. Mohamed Nasheed in Addu on 10-11 November 2011. This will be the first SAARC meeting south of the Equator. I will thereafter pay a bilateral visit to the Maldives on November 12.

Over the last 26 years of its existence, SAARC has established itself as the leading mechanism for regional cooperation in South Asia. It has enabled enhanced cooperation within the region in a wide range of areas such as trade, connectivity, poverty alleviation, food security, women and child development, combating organized crime and terrorism, among others. It has also created new institutions to promote regional integration such as the South Asian Regional Standards Organization, the South Asian Development Fund and the South Asian University which is based in New Delhi.

The theme of the XVIIth SAARC Summit is “Building Bridges”. We welcome this focus because India has always emphasized the importance of enhanced connectivity for the socio-economic development of the South Asian region. We have undertaken several initiatives to improve connectivity on a bilateral, sub-regional and regional basis, and are willing to do much more. The theme is also in consonance with the observance of the current decade as the “SAARC Decade of Intra-Regional Connectivity”.

At the SAARC Summit, we expect to move forward on the process of liberalization of trade under the South Asian Free Trade Area Agreement. We also expect to sign agreements on Implementation of Regional Standards, Multilateral Arrangement on Recognition of Conformity Assessment, Rapid Response to Natural Disasters and establishment of a SAARC Seed Bank.

India will work to promote greater integration as well as the development of a South Asian identity at the forthcoming Summit.

On the margins of the SAARC Summit, I look forward to the opportunity of holding bilateral discussions with other South Asian Heads of State and Government who will be participating in the Summit.

My bilateral visit to Male after the SAARC Summit will be the first Prime Ministerial visit to the Maldives from India in nine years. During this period, our relations have been significantly transformed. I look forward to holding in-depth discussions with President Nasheed on all aspects of our relations and to the honour of addressing the Peoples Majlis in Male. We also expect to conclude concrete agreements to enhance our cooperation in both traditional as well as new areas.
Statement by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Inaugural Session of the XVII SAARC Summit.

Addu City (Maldives), November 10, 2011.

I am delighted to be here in the Maldives - a country of breathtaking beauty. There can be no better setting for our Summit than this exquisite Addu Atoll. I convey our deep appreciation to the Government and people of Maldives for the excellent arrangements and their warm hospitality.

I wish to join my other distinguished colleagues in congratulating you, Mr. President, on your election as the Chairperson of SAARC. We look forward to your dynamic leadership of our organization. I assure you of India’s full cooperation.

I wish to thank His Excellency the Prime Minister of Bhutan for his exemplary stewardship of SAARC as the outgoing Chairman.

As someone who has had the privilege of attending the last four SAARC Summits, I can see the impressive progress we have made as an organization in recent years. The momentum and scope of our cooperation has undoubtedly increased. Since our last Summit alone, our Ministers of External Affairs, Home, Finance, Transport, Tourism, Commerce, Energy and Environment have met. Greater exchanges and communication among ourselves should be followed by concrete outcomes.

In my discussions with the leaders of South Asia, I sense a collective commitment and desire to give greater meaning and content to SAARC. Admittedly, there is a lot to be done but the political will is there. We have all come to believe that regional cooperation is good for each one of our countries.

I reaffirm that India will do whatever is within our capabilities to make SAARC an effective instrument to deliver on our vision of common peace, shared prosperity and cooperation.

Our Summit takes place at a time when the global economy is under acute stress. This has imposed a fresh and entirely uncalled for burden on our development efforts. We hope that the leaders of the major economies, particularly in the Eurozone, will show the wisdom and will that are required to revive the global economy.

However, the world economy is going to take time to recover. In the meantime developing countries like ours will be squeezed for capital, investments and markets for our exports.
We should seek imaginative ways to create new avenues and sources of growth and investment in South Asia. If we can create favourable conditions for development at home, there is no reason why our investors should seek greener pastures elsewhere. The complete normalization of trade relations will create huge opportunities for mutually beneficial trade within South Asia.

We should work to create a climate whereby the wealth generated by us is invested back into our own region. This will be the most ringing endorsement of our vision of a regional economy without boundaries.

There are promising signs that South Asia is increasingly getting plugged into the growth dynamic of Asia. Despite all the difficulties, we have been able to maintain a respectable growth rate in the last few years.

This encouraging trend has coincided with the growing pace of SAARC integration. This shows that we are on the right path.

I believe the process should move faster, though at a pace we are all comfortable with. I recognize that India has a special responsibility that flows from the geography of our region and the size of our economy and market.

I am happy to announce that, in a major trade liberalization effort, the Government of India has issued a notification to reduce the Sensitive List for the Least Developed Countries under the South Asian Free Trade Area Agreement from 480 tariff lines to 25 tariff lines. Zero basic customs duty access will be given for all items removed with immediate effect.

I recognize that non-tariff barriers are an area of concern. India is committed to the idea of free and balanced growth of trade in South Asia. Competition begins at home. Our industries have to learn to compete if our economies are to have a future in this globalised world that we live in.

We can all benefit from our respective comparative advantages. These include our hydropower and natural resource endowments, possibilities of earnings from transit, marine resources, our scientific and technological base and above all our young population which will drive consumption and investment in the years ahead.

We should expedite the finalization of the SAARC Agreement on Investment.

The theme of this year’s Summit is “Building Bridges”. This eloquently summarizes the imperative of greater regional integration, and is an objective to which India is fully committed. One such initiative taken last year was the launch of the South Asia Forum that has brought eminent South Asians from different walks of life together.
In our Summit in Dhaka in 2005, I had suggested a reciprocal initiative to provide unrestricted access to airlines from SAARC States to our four metropolitan cities, and to 18 other destinations in India. Connectivity has partially improved since then. We must take this further.

We should aim to conclude a regional Air Services Agreement, for which India would be happy to host a meeting of officials next year.

We have been talking of a Regional Railway Agreement and a Motor Vehicle Agreement for a long time. Let us agree to conclude these agreements as a matter of priority. India, Maldives and Sri Lanka are in the process of developing regional ferry services. We should replicate many more such connectivity arrangements in other parts of our sub-continent.

I commend the Postal Administrations of SAARC for agreeing to establish a South Asian Postal Union. India is happy to host the ad hoc Secretariat for the Union, and to sponsor training courses at our Postal Staff College to train up to ten SAARC officials per year, belonging to interested Member States.

We should follow up this agreement by improving our telecommunication linkages to reduce call rates and telecommunication tariffs and interconnection termination charges. India will be ready to facilitate the development of a regional telecommunications infrastructure to improve the quality of connectivity.

We should encourage greater broadcasting, television and film exchanges among our countries. It is time that we overcome the information deficit among the SAARC countries. We should encourage our people to know more about each other.

In this spirit, I wish to announce the following initiatives that India will take.

We will host a conclave of the top dozen tour operators from the SAARC region to boost tourism exchanges.

We will take the initiative to establish a travelling exhibition on the ancient history of South Asia. This could comprise of a hundred archeologically significant pieces per country to be selected by member States. The exhibition can be hosted in each of our national museums in turn for three months.

Post-graduate courses in the South Asian University have started in July 2010. India will increase the number of SAARC Silver Jubilee Scholarships for the South Asian University from 50 to 100. 75 of these will be at the Masters level and 25 at the doctoral level.
Protecting our environment even as we pursue rapid growth is essential. The India Endowment for Climate Change which I had announced last year has been established. We look forward to receiving project proposals from our SAARC partners.

We will provide a total of ten scholarships per year to SAARC Member States for post-graduate and doctoral studies in forestry courses at the Forestry Research Institute of India, Dehradun.

The destiny of South Asia lies in our own hands. SAARC provides a platform for us to put aside our differences and work towards a higher calling. We have a long way to go, but I am confident that we can realize our true potential through sustained effort.

We have to learn to trust each other and to learn from each other. The security and stability of our countries are closely interlinked. None of us can prosper in isolation to each other. We cannot afford to allow the many problems we face to stand in the way of our ambitions and dreams.

Let us challenge ourselves to do even better. I thank you.
Media Briefing by Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai on Prime Minister’s engagements in Addu City.

Addu City (Maldives), November 10, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good evening and once again apologies to keep you waiting.

Prime Minister has had a very active calendar, a packed calendar. Foreign Secretary would like to brief you about the engagements of the Prime Minister. He will make some opening remarks and thereafter he will be happy to take your questions.

Foreign Secretary (Shri Ranjan Mathai): Thank you, Vishnu. Let me add to those apologies which he has conveyed with my own. It was not just a meeting but in fact building bridges. The theme of this Summit I think is very apposite. If there were a bridge between the island and I am on, I would have been here a long time ago. I think Vishnu was over-optimistic. I kept telling him that 8:30 is about the earliest I think I can physically get to this island. But he was convinced that I could do it earlier. But that was not possible.

This morning, after the bilateral meeting with the Prime Minister of Pakistan I had come out and made a statement and given a general briefing. So, I will leave that out of my initial statement and then go on to Prime Minister’s engagements. I will start with last night.

After his arrival here Prime Minister met the Prime Minister of Bhutan for a discussion on our bilateral relationship with that country. The Prime Minister of Bhutan expressed great appreciation for the very successful and very happy visit of His Majesty the King of Bhutan and his royal bride after their royal wedding their visit to India. He also expressed great appreciation of the exposition of Buddhist relics from the Maha Bodhi Society which was held in Bhutan, and finally on the successful completion of the discussion on Indian assistance for the Tenth Plan. The Tenth Plan is actually finishing in a year and a half but there were some discussions on re-appropriations and the smooth disbursement of Indian assistance to Bhutan’s Plan.

Prime Minister underlined the importance and the unique special relations between India and Bhutan and emphasised our continuing commitment to assist Bhutan in its development. He also spoke on the shared security concerns of the two countries. And there was a further discussion on all aspects of our bilateral relations.

Later in the evening, Prime Minister met President Nasheed of the Maldives. As you are aware, after the SAARC Summit, Prime Minister would be visiting Male for a standalone bilateral visit to the Maldives. However, the President wished to have a separate bilateral meeting in Addu to discuss essentially matters relating to the SAARC Summit. The two leaders met later in the evening and spoke again on the theme of Living Bridges which is the theme chosen by the Maldivian Presidency. President Nasheed highlighted the importance of this theme to the lives of common people, and spoke essentially in terms of connectivity, transport. He highlighted the need for the SAARC to complete the railways agreement. And then he spoke at some length on the planned ferry service which is to link India, Sri Lanka and Maldives.

Prime Minister in his response also spoke on the theme as being linked to the larger issue of poverty eradication, development, building bridges between our countries as we work together to meet these common challenges. There was also discussion on certain specifics of the SAARC like the SAARC Development Fund, the role of the Secretary-General, and the improvement in the SAARC Regional Centres. There was also a reference to the bilateral relations briefly during which the Maldivian President expressed appreciation for India’s assistance including for the SAARC Summit and for our bilateral economic assistance to the Maldives.

This morning, as I have said already, Prime Minister met the Prime Minister of Pakistan and I have already spoken on that. Subsequently, he had a bilateral meeting with President Rajapaksa of Sri Lanka. During this discussion, essentially three issues were discussed. One was the issue of the fishermen which continues to be an issue between our two countries. The Prime Minister stressed the need to ensure that the waters between India and Sri Lanka are free of violence, and that any incidences of attacks on Indian fishermen are a matter of great concern to India. The Sri Lankan President assured the Prime Minister that Sri Lankan Navy have been under very strict instructions to ensure that there is no violence, that in fact it had been instructed to provide assistance to fishermen in case they are in distress. He highlighted the fact that the Sri Lankan fishermen were again very active after a long time in their own waters, and that there was some evidence of large scale crossing of the international boundary line between India and Sri Lanka.

The two leaders discussed this further and it was felt that it would be appropriate for the Joint Working Group between India and Sri Lanka to actually meet and see what measures could be taken to ensure that there is peace and harmony in the waters. It was also felt, and both leaders agreed, that the fishermen’s associations between the associations of fishermen of India and associations of fishermen in Northern Sri Lanka, who are also Tamils, that these groups of people should meet together and talk about their common interests, their common concerns.
The second issue which was discussed was that of the resettlement of internally displaced persons. Prime Minister spoke on the importance in terms of opinion in India, sentiment in India on the resettlement of those who had become internally displaced. President Rajapaksa mentioned that of the very large number which had been internally displaced a year and a half ago or two years ago, there are about 7,000 still awaiting resettlement. And he expected that this process of resettling them would be completed by the end of December. The two leaders also reviewed Indian economic projects in Sri Lanka and also had a general discussion on other matters of mutual interest and concern.

After the meeting with the President of Sri Lanka, Prime Minister met Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina of Bangladesh. Prime Minister once again expressed his gratitude for a very fruitful visit which he had had in September to Dhaka, and discussed with Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina how to take forward cooperation on all issues of bilateral relations. Prime Minister once again expressed India’s appreciation of the cooperation on the security front with Bangladesh which has made a marked improvement in the situation in the North East with respect to Indian insurgent groups being brought under control.

Prime Minister also noted that on the land boundary issue, a protocol to the land boundary agreement had been signed during his visit, that further steps were being taken to actually implement this very soon.

Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina also spoke on the importance of these issues; expressed appreciation of Prime Minister’s visit when he was in Dhaka and the progress which has been made. She then spoke about her visit to the Teen Bigha where the corridor has been opened on a 24-hour basis. And she said she was very happy with her visit. She expressed appreciation that this, what she called the dream of 24-hour access had been provided and that it had been provided in an efficient and workable way. She also said that she had been very well received and she was very happy with the outcome of her brief visit to that place.

In the afternoon, Prime Minister attended the opening session of the SAARC Summit. I am sure all of you have seen the text of Prime Minister’s address. Prime Minister mentioned a number of initiatives. In fact his speech was received with a great deal of enthusiasm because it contained a number of very specific issues on the reduction of items in the sensitive list under SAFTA, on increase in our assistance by way of scholarships and capacity-building, and including one specific on environmental issues which was a common theme of many people that we would be providing training for SAARC officials at the Indian Forest Institute.
There was a considerable discussion on the need for SAARC to move forward. Basically, I think this was a recurring theme of all of the leaders. One was in the area of the common obligations of all countries under SAFTA that we need to make progress on these. The second was on building bridges, the theme, they need to do something on transport and connectivity. Many leaders spoke on the importance of concluding a railways agreement among the countries and also starting further discussions on motor vehicles agreements between the three countries.

Prime Minister also expressed an interest in having the SAARC accord on investment promotion finalised as soon as possible. We believe the SAARC Summit, which will continue tomorrow, will take up these issues and take the entire region as a whole forward in these very vital areas which are of particular interest to the people of all the countries of SAARC. I think I could stop here now. If you have a few questions, I can take them.

Question: Sir, today there was an important opportunity to speak to the Interior Minister of Pakistan, who today yet again said that India has till now not provided any evidence against Hafiz Saeed or Jamaat-ud-Dawa. As far as Hafiz Saeed is concerned, is it the end of the road for India? How can we achieve our goal of seeing 26/11 perpetrators behind bars or being brought to justice unless anything happens on Hafiz Saeed?

Prime Minister Gilani said Kashmir and Siachen were also discussed. Could you elaborate on what discussion has taken place?

Foreign Secretary: We have provided extensive documentation on Hafiz Saeed and those who are under trial for their involvement in the Mumbai attacks. This evidence has been provided, a number of dossiers have been handed over. We believe there is enough information in that for Pakistan to be able to take forward their case against those seven accused.

As regards your question about Siachen, there is a process of dialogue on various themes. We have plans to have meetings between the Commerce Secretaries, in fact in a few days' time, meetings between the Home Secretary and the Pakistani Interior Secretary, and the discussions on Tulbul between the Secretaries of Water Resources, perhaps also in December but these have still to be worked out. Prime Minister Gilani did mention that among the other dialogue processes which we have to engage in, Sir Creek and Siachen are among those. He did raise that in that context saying that this is part of the dialogue and we need to make progress on those issues also.

Question: Sir, this is again about Pakistan Interior Minister Rehman Malik equating the demand for justice for 26/11 to the Samjhauta case, linking it up with the Samjhauta case, and also very specifically equating the demand for sending Ajmal Kasab to the gallows and to also giving similar treatment to the accused in the Samjhauta blast. Is there a possibility of India's case that it is a victim of terror sponsored from across the border getting diluted in the process?

Foreign Secretary: I do not think there is any possibility of India's case getting diluted. The Samjhauta Express issue to which you refer is a terrible attack that took place in India and there is no question of any cross-border element being involved in that. So, I frankly do not see how these two can be linked in terms of diluting India’s concerns on cross-border terrorism. It is interesting that you have quoted the Interior Minister as having said that Mr. Kasab should be sent to the gallows. It would seem that he then believes that there is evidence against him.

Question: Foreign Secretary, just to start with I would like to ask if India now believes that now Pakistan has taken any steps in terms of cracking down on the groups responsible for 26/11, whether they think that Pakistan is in fact serious about taking the 26/11 trial ahead because it would seem that the fact that the bilateral dialogue has now been resumed comes on the back of positive steps which, I think, you have spoken about, the Prime Minister spoke about. I would like to get your assessment of what are those steps. Secondly, did that long-pending invitation to Prime Minister Manmohan Singh to visit Pakistan come up in talks, and is there any date for that?

Foreign Secretary: I think if one were to talk in terms of steps, the fact that Pakistan has now said it would send a Judicial Commission to India to record the statements of the Chief Investigating Officer, the Additional Chief Metropolitan Magistrate, and two doctors - that is the list of those whose statements have to be recorded - that this is part of the action being taken by them to make some progress on the case against these people. We have to set up a court, or appoint a judge to receive this Judicial Commission. It seems this is a step forward. They have also indicated that on many of the concerns which we have expressed and which we have expressed again that these could be addressed in the discussions which are scheduled between the Home Secretary of India and the Interior Secretary of Pakistan. So, to that extent, yes there have been some developments even on the cases against those responsible for the Mumbai attacks.

You mentioned resumed dialogue. I would like to clarify that dialogue actually was resumed in the month of February following the Thimphu talks. That first stage, you might say, culminated in the visit of the Foreign Minister of Pakistan to India in July. And during the meetings with our External Affairs Minister and subsequently the call on Prime Minister it was felt that we need to take this dialogue forward, and another second round of discussions on all these issues in our bilateral relationship would be resumed or taken forward, whichever you like. But that is where we are. And that is why we place a great deal of importance on the outcomes of these dialogues which are now going to take place. As I said, the Commerce Secretaries’ dialogue, the Home Secretaries’ dialogue, and we have planned also the dialogue between the Water Resources Secretaries on Tulbul.

A mention was also made of the Joint Commission. There is a Joint Commission between our two countries which last met in 2005. It has eight Technical Groups working under it. There is a proposal to get those Technical Working Groups restarted. Some of them have actually met in the past, and their work and their conclusions are available. But if there is need to restart any of those Technical Groups, we will certainly look at it. That is where we are.

In terms of the invitation, Prime Minister Mr. Gilani said that he was very keen that Prime Minister should visit Pakistan, and he put it in very emotional terms saying this would be an opportunity not only to build the relationship between our two countries and put it on a very firm footing, but also gave Prime Minister an opportunity to visit his ancestral home which happens to be on the other side of the border. Prime Minister said that he certainly does look forward to visiting Pakistan and this would be decided by mutual consultation.

Question: The Joint Working Group on fishermen was supposed to meet last month but then it was called off. Has a fresh date been set? Secondly, fishermen’s associations have met twice, once in Chennai and Nagapattinam and then in Colombo. But it was very clear that Sri Lankans did not want Indians to come into their waters. So, what ...(Unclear)... is on the table?

Foreign Secretary: On the Joint Working Group, in fact the Convenor on the Indian side is sitting next to me. So, I think we have to ask him when he is planning the next visit. We had a bit of a scheduling problem in fixing it last time. There was no substantive issue involved. In the JWG we would like to ensure that the Government of Tamil Nadu is also represented through its Fisheries Department. It includes representatives of Ministry of External Affairs in Delhi, the Ministry concerned with fisheries in Delhi as also the Tamil Nadu Government. We certainly have proposed asking for the mutual convenience of all for another meeting. The Sri Lankans certainly are very keen that they should meet and the meeting is scheduled in Colombo. Even the President said he attaches importance to this meeting being held. The idea is to see whether the Joint Working Group can come up with suggestions and ideas of ways in which the incidences of friction and difficulties could be avoided.
Involving the Fishermen’s Associations, you are quite right, they have had meetings. I have not seen the details but there is one version which has gone about is that the meetings which took place earlier did not really involve directly the fishermen, but there were some people from some NGOs and others claiming to represent fishermen who were also part of the Groups who may not have focused entirely only on the fishermen’s particular concerns. The idea is to see whether there is a limited amount of water between our two countries and there are fishermen communities on both sides. On the Sri Lankan side they have reactivated after many years of having been unable to fish. When I was myself in Sri Lanka I visited Jaffna. And the government agent, the equivalent of the Collector, who happens to be a Tamil officer showed me a statistical chart showing how fishing had been affected by the large scale crossings from India and the difficulties faced by the Sri Lankan fishermen. The Sri Lankans would always put it that the real issue they face is with the large trawlers which do bottom trawling. The ordinary small boats, they do not really have too much of problem there. So, what is it that can be discussed between the fishermen is, is there a possibility for both countries doing something to assist their fishermen’s groups to go a little beyond these restricted waters into the wider area of the Indian Ocean where there are foreign fishing fleets actually harvesting a lot of the fish which really belongs to this region. So, these are the kinds of issues we thought if the fishermen’s associations would come up with some specific suggestions, then maybe the Governments could take some action to help on both sides.

Question: Sir, the Prime Ministers of India and Pakistan spent nearly forty to forty-five minutes one on one. Overall, did any new initiatives or confidence-building measures figure in the discussions? Also both the leaders struck a very upbeat note promising to start a new chapter in the relations between the two countries. In what areas can we see a breakthrough or a significant improvement in the coming days or months?

Foreign Secretary: The two leaders of course did meet with their delegations as well as one on one. They discussed all issues quite openly. The Prime Minister said there is a need for us to be able to discuss all issues which bedevil our relations or which stand in the way of a normal friendly relationship between our two countries. The Prime Minister believes firmly that ultimately the destinies of us as a people are quite interlinked, and we need to work out a new chapter in our relationships. For this, the next round of our discussions should be made more productive than the first round. But, Prime Minister did mention that there are, as he called it, perennial concerns about terrorism in India. And he stressed the fact that terrorism is a threat to India, it is now a threat to Pakistan also, but acts of terrorism have the capability of being a spoiler in our relationship of setting back any kind of progress that we could make in our dialogue, and that therefore Pakistan needs to address this in all earnestness. These were the specific words Prime Minister conveyed to us.

Question: Sir, if I could just press you a little more on the previous question, both Prime Ministers said that they look forward to, as they put it, a new chapter in India-Pakistan relationship. So, before the next meeting comes, along the way will there be any sort of verifiable steps, maybe action against Lashkar camps in PoK, a decrease in infiltration, can there be steps that we can say are verifiable steps which would indicate that Pakistan is delivering on the content of its interactions?

Foreign Secretary: As I said, the discussions covered all aspects of our relationship. Certainly we would need to be completely satisfied that the Pakistanis are taking the kind of steps that you have mentioned. The Home Secretary will be meeting, as I said, his counterpart from Pakistan hopefully next month. We are hoping it will take place around the third week. These specifics would be discussed at that level. I think what Prime Minister was trying to stress is that there is a past which hangs on us, there is a future which lies ahead of us if we can work together, but we are in the present now and we need to deal with these issues here and now. The idea is to move towards a more constructive agenda. But as I said, Prime Minister made quite clear that our ability to move such a constructive agenda certainly does require dealing with the concerns which we face in the present.

Question: Sir, you said the next round has to be more productive in India-Pakistan talks. Will the next round follow the same structure as that of the Composite Dialogue, or do you plan to rejig a bit, scale it up a bit? Secondly, has the issue of early formalisation of Teesta and Feni water agreements come up during our Prime Minister’s discussions with Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina?

Foreign Secretary: I believe here on this question of what kind of dialogue, I happened to glance at what my predecessor Mrs. Rao answered when she was in Thimphu and she said we do not need to get into nomenclature. So, I can take refuge behind my predecessor’s comments. So, I will just say that this is a resumed dialogue. Certainly the dialogue is to cover, as I said, all outstanding issues in our relationship. And it is structured in a way that you have different Ministries, Secretaries of different Departments involved in different elements of the dialogue. So, certainly we should be going through all of them. The aim is to culminate, as was mentioned by Hon. External Affairs Minister when he met the Pakistani Foreign Minister in July, in a meeting between the two Foreign Ministers perhaps by the end of the first half of 2012. That was the calendar which they had set. That remains as the target.

As regards the waters issue with Bangladesh, certainly the question of Teesta was mentioned. The two leaders discussed it. Prime Minister mentioned that on our side we need some more time to build a consensus. Certainly we underlined that whatever agreement we do arrive at, and we hopefully will arrive at, will have to take into account the interests of all concerned. In this particular case it certainly was the interests of West Bengal. As regards Feni, we understand that it was for all practical purposes ready to be signed but since it was one of the water-related issues in Dhaka, it just happened to get postponed for the future. But there are really no substantive differences between India and Bangladesh on it. And certainly in regard to Feni, the State Government of Tripura also has no issues regarding our finalising the agreement as it stands.

Question: Foreign Secretary, when Prime Minister Manmohan Singh calls Mr. Gilani a man of peace, it is obviously not an assessment made by an individual, it is an assessment made by the Prime Minister of a country. My question is, what has made him come to the conclusion that has further reinforced his belief that he is dealing with a man of peace? And what steps taken by Prime Minister Gilani make him feel that he is a man of peace?

Foreign Secretary: I think Prime Minister’s assessment is based on the frequent meeting he has had with Prime Minister Gilani. He has met him a number of times now. And it is an assessment based on the nature of his discussions with Mr. Gilani, and our own Prime Minister’s own pursuit of peace, and the fact that he finds a resonance in this. I would presume that is why he has come to this assessment. It is based on a large number of meetings and the desire which Prime Minister Gilani has expressed for resolving all issues between our two countries on the basis of dialogue, and that this dialogue should take place in an atmosphere of peace and free of hostility. This is the express wish of the Pakistanis also.

Question: Sir, the Pakistani Interior Minister kept on saying that India gave us only information and dossiers, not credible evidence. What makes credible evidence for them? Have the two sides ever sat together and discuss what would make credible evidence for Pakistan?

Foreign Secretary: I am not a lawyer, so, I do not have the benefit of being able to make a legal distinction. But, as I said, the dossiers have provided a great deal of information which should give enough leads to the Pakistani authorities to be able to take the case forward. He says that it is mere information.
I am not quite sure what is intended. As far as we are concerned, there is enough information in the dossiers which have been provided for the Pakistanis to be able to take action. I would only say that in these dossiers is also the confession of Mr. Kasab. Somebody mentioned that the Interior Minister has declared him fit for being hanged. So, if his confession is a part of the dossiers which we have given on the basis of which he has decided he should be hanged, maybe he finds there is some evidence after all.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much.

Remarks of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh on board his special flight from Male to New Delhi.

November 12, 2011.

Prime Minister: We just had a very successful SAARC Summit. SAARC has still miles to go before its full potential is realised. But there is a growing awareness among all countries of the region about the importance of regional cooperation.

The fact that the global economy is not doing too well, is a further incentive for countries of the SAARC region to learn to cooperate with one another. And there is a growing realisation that a country like India, with its vast market, with its strong growth rate performance, can help other countries in the region to raise their sights for economic development.

That’s a hopeful development and as you know, four agreements were signed at the Summit, the SAARC Agreement on Rapid Responses to Natural Disaster, SAARC Agreement on Multilateral Arrangements on recognition of conformity assessment, SAARC Agreement on implementation of regional standards and SAARC Seed Bank Agreement.

Already the South Asian University is now a functioning entity, SAARC Development Fund is a functioning entity, so bit by bit SAARC is moving forward to promote the cause of regional integration and regional cooperation.

The number of meetings that are taking place at various Ministers level, I think creates a climate where there is growing mutual awareness of each others potential, of each others limitation and that itself is conducive to the promotion of regional cooperation.

Apart from SAARC Summit, I had good meetings with all the leaders of SAARC countries.

I should begin by mentioning my discussions with Prime Minster Gilani. We reviewed the whole gamut of our relationship. We agreed that the resumed round of dialogue should continue. We took note of the encouraging developments in the area of trade, the changing attitude of Pakistan to giving India the status of Most Favoured Treatment and the willingness of Pakistan to discuss all matters including that of terrorism.

So I come back with the expectation that the second round of resumed dialogue which will begin very shortly, will have the advantage of a more informed dialogue.

What will be the outcome of that dialogue, I am optimistic, but India Pakistan relations are subject to accident, and therefore we both recognise that if there is another incident like the Mumbai terror attack, that could give a big setback to the process of normalization*, I think that is fully understood by Prime Minister Gilani.

With regard to my meeting with Sri Lanka, we reviewed with President Rajapaksa, the problems of Indian fishermen, who stray into Sri Lankan waters and then are arrested by Sri Lankan authorities. We explained this to President Rajapaksa and he agreed that the use of force to deal with Indian fishermen is totally unacceptable, that it is a human problem and it must be dealt in a humane manner. And we explored various options like growing involvement of fishermen of two countries in discussing their mutual problems. Also there is a bilateral working group to discuss these issues. We agreed that the working group should accelerate its work.

Principally, my concern was with regard to resettlement of internally displaced Tamil refugees, and the treatment of fishermen. President Rajapaksa gave me assurances that Sri Lanka will and has been moving forward. How far that satisfies the common public opinion, there is now a structured dialogue between the Sri Lankan government and the Tamil National Alliance and also there is a Parliamentary Select Committee which has been appointed to go into this question of what can be done to find a permanent political and acceptable solution to the Tamil problem.

With regard to other countries also, I had very useful talks. Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina and I reviewed the road map for the implementation of the Agreement on Boundaries. As you we have reached an Agreement but it requires constitutional amendment. We will work to that end. There was also other discussion about providing electricity to Bangladesh from India and we

* Pakistani welcomed the positive trend of interaction and its Foreign Minister Hina Rabbani Khar sounded upbeat with her remarks that Islamabad was willing to bend backward to improve relations with its neighbours. Welcoming the trend she said “the ‘Thimphu spirit’ has given way to ‘Addu hope’,”. Refusing to react negatively to Prime Minister’s remarks that he would visit Pakistan only if there was forward movement on the Mumbai terror attack case, and that another such strike would be a setback to the accident-prone Indo-Pak relationship, Ms. Khar simply said that “Some statements are made for domestic consumption, but we also heard what he said before the international media. Prime Minister Singh was exceptionally positive. We have managed to create the space we needed to pursue issues meaningfully.” Sounding a positive note she said: “Addu onwards trust deficit is zero or it has shrunk to a large extent and now we need to start building on the trust. We have invested far too much in seeking out hostility towards each other and too less in seeking out peace with each other. I told the Indian Foreign Minister that I am competing with you on positivity.” While flagging the Kashmir issue she avoided its negativity by saying “Pakistan does not want to remain hostage to disputes. We want to resolve issues and don’t want to be pulled backwards.” said within the limits of our capabilities we will certainly be helpful. There was also a brief discussion of the Teesta problem and I mentioned to the Prime Minister that we will work to build a national consensus so that an agreement can become a realistic proposition.

With Maldives our relations are very good. We have signed many agreements, but the most important agreement is the framework agreement on cooperation which sets out a road map of cooperation in a large number of areas covering economy, trade, investment and security related issues in the context of security of sea lanes in the Indian Ocean.

With regard to Nepal, I had a very good meeting with Prime Minister Babu Ram Bhattarai. We reviewed the progress made with regard to peace keeping and peace initiated and on that the Prime Minister was true to his word, what he had told me that he would work hard within this month to see the peace process moving forward and that the political parties in Nepal have reached an agreement with regard to the rehabilitation and resettlement of Maoist combatants and now they are moving forward to prepare a draft of the constitution.

Prime Minister Bhattarai also told me that the avoidance of double taxation agreement has now been cleared by the cabinet of Nepal and that we can now go ahead to sign it. You recall that there were some problems with regard to our being not able to sign the avoidance of double taxation agreement when he visited, but now he has got his Cabinet approval and now we will proceed to sign the agreement.

With regards to Afghanistan, both President Karzai and I expressed our happiness at the signing of the Strategic Partnership Agreement between our two countries and President Karzai mentioned to me that this agreement is universally popular in Afghanistan. Unlike the agreement which they are proposing with the United States, where they would require ratification only after the Loya Jirga has met and approved the draft. He said that it is a matter of great satisfaction for India Afghanistan relations that there is no such demand for the ratification of the Strategic Partnership Agreement that he has signed in India. We also discussed the security situation, the challenges that Afghanistan faces. On the whole are relations with Afghanistan are in very good shape, and there is enormous scope for expanding areas of cooperation between our two countries.

President Karzai also mentioned to me that in the changed situation he would like Indian investments in Afghanistan. Well in this connection he mentioned the iron ore mines which will soon be available for participation by foreign investment.
With regard to Bhutan, I complimented Prime Minister Thinley on excellent conduct of the SAARC during the last one year of his Chairmanship. We reviewed our bilateral relations which are in exceedingly good shape. And therefore on the whole I can say that other than the regional issues, my dialogue with the SAARC leaders on bilateral issues has helped in both settings, has enabled me and the other leaders to get a better idea of each others point of view.

I have often said that the SAARC process is an essay in persuasion and because of the fact that we cannot change our neighbours, we can change our friends, we cannot change our neighbours, we have learnt to live together in peace and amity, ave to learn to cooperate with each other and I do think that at long last SAARC is getting on to that process, even though I do think that there is a long arduous journey ahead of us.

138. Briefing by Official Spokesperson of Ministry of External Affairs, Joint Secretary (CE) and Joint Secretary (ERS) on visit of Slovenian Prime Minister and External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna’s visit to ASTANA for SCO Summit.

NEW Delhi, June 13, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good afternoon. My colleague Mrs. Banashri Bose Harrison, Joint Secretary (Central Europe), and Mr. Ajay Bisaria, Joint Secretary (Eurasia) and I will like to brief you about two important visits.

First the state visit which has already begun of the Prime Minister of Slovenia HE Borut Pahor who would be in India till the 16th. Let me take you through the outline of his programme and delegation. The dignitary has already landed in Mumbai. Today he would be meeting with the Governor, and as we speak he is paying homage at the 26/11 Memorial at the Taj Mahal Palace.

He arrives in New Delhi later in the evening. Tomorrow, Prime Minister of India accords a ceremonial welcome to him, at Rashtrapati Bhavan. There would be calls on him by EAM. He calls on the President. At 1300 hours tomorrow there will be a Joint Business meeting organized by CII, FICCI and ASSOCHAM. Thereafter there is a call on him by the Leader of Opposition Shrimati Sushma Swaraj.
Next there is a call by him on the Vice-President and tomorrow evening he meets the Prime Minister and holds delegation-level talks, which will be followed by signing of agreements and a banquet. On Wednesday, 15th, he visits Agra and thereafter proceeds to Bangalore where he would be meeting with the Governor and visiting some of the centres of excellence including the Indian Institute of Sciences, Infosys, Biocon and also Narayana hospital. He leaves for home on the 16th evening.

PM Pahor is leading a high-power delegation including the Minister of Economy, Minister of Health, Minister of Transport, the State Secretary for Higher Education, a large number of senior officials as well as businessmen.

This is the first formal visit of a Head of State or Government from Slovenia although the former President and present President of the country, have come here on a private visit and for an international conference last year, respectively. We recognized Slovenia as a separate nation on the 11th of May 1992 paving the way for the official visit of their Foreign Minister within a week thereafter. Slovenia is a fellow democratic nation and a developed country which is already a member of EU, with a per capita income of more than $22,000. Our relations have been expanding steadily. Like India, Slovenia sees India as a priority country.

We do enjoy a similarity of outlook on a host of international and regional issues. Furthermore, Slovenia has been supportive of India’s aspirations and sensitive to our concerns, including our permanent membership of the UN Security Council and the threat of terror that we face. Slovenia had strongly condemned the terror attacks on Mumbai.

Trade is growing rapidly and quadrupled in five years to cross Euro 245 million last year with a balance in India’s favour. We are exporting non-traditional goods to Slovenia. The country also has strengths in sectors like pharmaceuticals, auto components, electrical and engineering services and products. A number of Indian companies are looking at servicing the Central and Southeastern European markets like Austria, Southern Germany, Hungary, Czech and so on through Slovenia. Tata Motors have already entered the Slovenian market in 2009.

To spur the process of economic development we already have an agreement on trade and economic cooperation, a double taxation avoidance agreement, and more agreements are in the pipeline. Slovenia also sees India as a potential source of investments and hence the business team that is traveling with the Prime Minister. We are both interested in widening the scope of cooperation including in areas like science and technology, culture, parliamentary exchanges and so on.
A bust of Gurudev Rabindranath Tagore is likely to be installed later this year in Slovenia. And as I said, a number of agreements are likely to be signed during the state visit of the Prime Minister of Slovenia.

Let me then quickly turn to the visit of EAM to Astana for the 11th SCO Summit which is to take place on the 14th and the 15th of June. You are aware that India became an Observer in SCO in 2005 and in the very first year then EAM represented India both at the Council of Heads of States and later in the Council of Heads of Governments. Iran and Pakistan became Observers along with India and Mongolia was inducted as an Observer one year earlier in 2004.

We regard SCO as an important regional forum addressing itself to a wide range of issues in our Eurasian region, including security, counterterrorism, narco-trafficking and trans-border organized crime. SCO member states and observers comprise close to 50% of the global population and occupy half of the entire globe. Naturally developments in SCO impact not only the region but are felt far beyond.

SCO was created by Russia, China and four Central Asian countries in 2001. Ever since becoming an Observer in 2005 India has participated actively and constructively taking a forward looking approach to our engagement with this forum. For the first time in 2009, the Prime Minister of India at the invitation of Russia attended the SCO Summit at Yekaterinburg.

SCO brought in Afghanistan as a special invitee in 2005, and every year since then the country has been represented by President Karzai. Given the geographical proximity that SCO countries and observers have with Afghanistan, the situation in the country has been engaging SCO's attention quite regularly.

In 2009 SCO created a new category of dialogue partners and within that rubric invited Belarus and Sri Lanka for the first time at the Yekaterinburg summit. Again in June 2010 at the Tashkent summit, SCO decided to lift the moratorium on expansion of the forum and approved the 'regulations on the procedure for admitting new members in SCO'. It is understood that SCO Secretariat which was established in Beijing in January 2004, is now engaged in working out a model draft on 'memorandum of obligations' which would be applicable to new members.

The SCO Council of Heads of States and Governments meets every year. In addition they also have regular annual meetings at the levels of Foreign Ministers, Defence Ministers and Finance Ministers besides the Trade, Transport, and Culture Ministers meetings. Trade, Transport and Cultural Ministers meetings we have begun to attend since 2009 as an Observer.
We have already expressed our willingness to play a larger role in SCO being an integral part of the Eurasian region and enjoying good relations with all SCO member countries. India shares similar concerns and challenges on security, terrorism, narco-traffic as well as in economic development.

Let me pause here. We will be happy to take your questions.

Question: I would like to know what hopes does India have with the SCO? The problems which could not be resolved earlier, will this meeting of the SCO be particularly able to help resolve? For example, maybe transit from Central Asia of course to India through Afghanistan, Pakistan. What other issues can be only addressed in SCO and no other forum?

Joint Secretary (ERS) (Shri Ajay Bisaria): We have a great deal of respect and we value highly the contribution the SCO can make both currently and potentially to solve a all lot of regional issues particularly those of economic development and security. In economic development, as you mentioned, we feel that this organisation can develop the synergies given its membership of the countries in the Central Asian space as well as China and Russia, to talk for instance of transport corridors which address India's connectivity issues with Central Asia. And we feel that addressing these collectively in the SCO Forum can speed up the development of regional projects like transport connectivity and even energy projects, pipelines for instance. This is certainly one potential area where SCO can contribute and the other is security. We feel there is a great deal of potential for counterterrorism cooperation. In the region of the SCO Observers and members lies the epicenter of terrorism, in the Pakistan and the Pakistan-Afghanistan region. Each or most of the countries are afflicted by the terrorism that has been ...(inaudible)... And we feel that joining hands in counterterrorism is one very very promising area where we can contribute. For instance, we already have the Regional Antiterrorism Structure (RATS) based in Tashkent which the SCO has initiated and where India is a member. So, we feel that that is an area where we can contribute technically towards intelligence sharing as well as developing solutions to counterterrorism. And apart from that, on the security front we also have Afghanistan and the countries most of which fall within the contiguous neighbourhood of Afghanistan are well placed to discuss regional solutions to the Afghanistan problem.

Question: Since you said just now that India is ready to play a larger role in the SCO, what do you think are the prospects of India moving from an Observer status to a member status? Is there a possibility of India becoming a member soon?
Joint Secretary (ERS): As JS(XP) mentioned, watching closely the process that the SCO itself is evolving of its expansion, the last summit in June 2010 in Tashkent basically lifted the moratorium on membership. It announced that it would be declaring the rules of engagement for new members. This summit is expected to spell out the rules of engagement for expansion, what JS(XP) mentioned, a memorandum of obligations that the new applicant state would need to sort of fulfill to become full member. So, this is a process where we have said publicly several times that India stands ready to play a larger role. Essentially it means that we are waiting for the SCO to complete its consideration of its expansion plans. And then we will carefully look at those expansion plans and the kind of obligations it places on members and then we would be happy to play a larger role, should our interests meet.

Official Spokesperson: And I can also add that we are of course in touch with the SCO member countries.

Question: At the last summit in Tashkent the indication was that in the next few months we would get a clear picture of becoming a member. What has delayed it?

Official Spokesperson: As far as I know there was no such signal ---

Question: I am sure you were there because you also briefed.

Official Spokesperson: I was there and so were you and I remember what we had said. Nobody had put a timeframe on that. Therefore, today we have taken you through the different steps. In 2010 what evolved we have shared with you. And also we have mentioned to you in particular that the SCO Secretariat is working on further details. So, it is a process and a process as you can well appreciate would take the time that it takes.

Question: Can you just clarify which are the areas where it is really slowing down the process?

Official Spokesperson: I am afraid I do not get that sense at all. It is a process. This is the eleventh year of SCO and the eleventh summit. As it has evolved the role has evolved, the activities have evolved. First they had Observers, then they had a Special Invitee, then they created a group of dialogue partners, and then they decided to lift the moratorium. So, it is curve and a process. But if my colleague would like to add anything?

Joint Secretary (EA): I agree with what JS(XP) has said. But just additionally the perspective you need to have is that the way the organization is structured is that its apex decision making body is the Council of Heads of State which is meeting two days from now. And that is the body that decides. So, essentially the way the decision making is structured is that you make decisions summit to summit. And, therefore, there is an in-built slowness if you will in the whole process because it is only the next summit which will actually possibly admit members. It does not happen intra-summit. But certain processes and discussions would certainly continue.

Official Spokesperson: And further to that decisions are taken by consensus. That is where it is.

Question: I have a question on Slovenia. If we are in as much synergy as we are supposed to have with Slovenia, why does it take a Prime Minister from there nineteen years to travel here?

Joint Secretary (CE) (Mrs. Banashri Bose Harrison): Thank you, Nilova for that question, I was trying to get my bit in.

Slovenia itself is twenty years old. In fact it is celebrating its 20th anniversary. Once it had emerged into independence - and it was the first country out of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to emerge into independence in almost entirely nonviolent manner - it was economically the most advanced Republic of the region, and it got membership of EU in 2004. I think that answers your question. From 1992 to 2004, it is a short period within which to complete the requirements of Euro integration. And that was its understandable priority. But do remember that its Foreign Minister visited India within seven days of our recognizing the country and the Prime Minister was invited by us in 2006 and there was some issue which came up internally and since then we have been trying to schedule these visits. So, this scheduling predates the actual date of the visit.

Official Spokesperson: And as I said, the President of the country did visit India in February 2010 for attending the Delhi Sustainable Development Summit. And we have had regular exchanges at different levels. And also, just to reiterate what Banashri has just mentioned, in 2004 they became a member of EU and in the last five years our trade has shot up 400 per cent. So, things have been moving at a pace which is more than satisfactory.

Question: About the SCO and Afghanistan, you said that Afghanistan is abutting most of the countries so there is a risk for them. Do you see any specific role for the SCO in Afghanistan where they can maybe replace the foreign troops that are ...(Inaudible)... leave Afghanistan?

Joint Secretary (ERS): I would not go as far as that. But the point I made was that for Afghanistan, particularly when one looks at regional solutions, regional answers or regional approaches to stabilizing the Afghanistan situation, SCO offers one alternative forum. And that is exactly what it looks at itself as. It does not look at itself as a security body. It look sat itself as a platform. Since Afghanistan itself is a member and the members and observers are mostly countries abutting the region including India, we feel that it offers an important platform and this platform has been used particularly by Russia. There was an Afghanistan contact group that the SCO had floated. The Russian Government has floated an SCO discussion forum which is on Afghanistan under the aegis of the SCO which has had a couple of meetings in Moscow. So, at this point it is a platform for discussion on the Afghanistan situation. It is one of the several alternatives that is available.

Question: Any important bilateral engagement during the SCO Summit?

Joint Secretary (ERS): The way the SCO summit is structured, there is a group of Heads of States and Heads of Delegations in a small room. So, there is a lot of informal bilateral interaction that takes place. But there is a formal structured interaction with the President of Kazakhstan which we are expecting to schedule, and possibly one with the President of Kyrgyzstan that we might schedule. But these things happen even at the last minute. And there is no clear structured programme to meet other Heads of State, partly because of the lack of time, and each one of the Heads of State is just flying in and flying out of the meetings. So, it is not very …

Question: This is an add-on to Ranjit's question. In those informal that you are talking about, would there be an informal meet with the representatives with China especially in the light of the fact that today there are certain media reports about China trying to divert Brahmaputra river.

Joint Secretary (ERS): That is very clever.

Official Spokesperson: This very legitimate question has already been answered by Mr. Ajay Bisaria.

Question: Do you see a distinct trend ...(Inaudible)... vis-à-vis Arab uprising and particularly India has also a very clear stand?

Official Spokesperson: At the moment what we know of the agenda and of the focus of SCO, we have already shared with you. The SCO is basically a forum of four Central Asian countries - Russia, China and the Observers. Their focus is on areas like security, counterterrorism, narco-trafficking, trans-border organized crime and so on. That is the focus. But if the Heads of States want to discuss any other matters, they are the Heads of States.
Question: This is a follow-up to the previous question on SCO membership. We know that Pakistan is also lobbying hard to become a full member of SCO. What are our chances compared to that of Pakistan considering that Islamabad unlike us now seems to be getting support both China as well as Russia?

Official Spokesperson: We compare ourselves with ourselves only and I can only talk about India’s stated interest to play a larger role in the SCO process. Let me also invite your attention to the Joint Media Statement that had been issued in Wuhan after the Tenth RIC Foreign Ministers’ Meet in November 2010. I am slightly paraphrasing that, but it noted that the Foreign Ministers of China and Russia welcomed India’s constructive participation in SCO as an Observer and attached importance to India’s intention to play a larger role in SCO. So that is one of the outcomes of the 10th RIC Foreign Ministers’ meeting. The rest we have all shared with you how it has evolved, what our approach is, what our thinking is.

Thank you very much.
139. Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the SCO Heads of State Summit.

Astana, June 15, 2011.

Your Excellency, President Nazarbayev,

Distinguished Heads of State and Government of the Members and Observers of SCO, Representatives of Dialogue Partners,

Secretary General of the SCO,

Excellencies, Ladies & Gentlemen,

It is a privilege for me to join you in this dazzlingly modern city of Astana, to represent India at the 10th Anniversary Summit of the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation. It was here in 2005 that India participated in the SCO Summit for the first time, after being inducted as an Observer and we are delighted that we celebrate today the 10th Anniversary of the forum in this beautiful city. I would like to begin by thanking the Government and the people of Kazakhstan for their gracious hospitality and warmth.

Excellency, India attaches great importance to our association with the SCO and values the consistent and mature contribution made by the organisation to peace, stability and prosperity in the region. India has demonstrated its strong commitment to the SCO by participating constructively at SCO meetings open to Observers. It is of great importance to us that most SCO member countries are our neighbours or belong to our extended neighbourhood, with a strong historical and cultural legacy of centuries binding us together.

We are impressed that the SCO has taken several significant initiatives in recent years especially in two major areas: in combating terrorism; and in the promotion of economic cooperation in the region. SCO’s emphasis on the need for all countries to cooperate in the fight against terrorism, extremism and narcotics is the only meaningful approach to this global menace that threatens us all equally.

Terrorism and extremism show no respect for boundaries. India is only too familiar with this evil, which not just wantonly claims human lives, but threatens the social and economic progress of our societies. India would like to see the SCO zone emerge as a terror-free zone, free of safe havens and sanctuaries for terrorists and free of infrastructure of terrorism that poisons our common region. Regional counter-terrorism cooperation can indeed play an important role in supporting action taken by individual countries. We see the Regional Anti-Terrorist Structure (RATS) as an important regional answer to the terrorism challenge. We look forward to India's greater engagement with RATS and in counter-terrorism exercises in the region.

SCO has played a constructive and forward-looking role in contributing towards peace in Afghanistan. SCO's discussions on Afghanistan and particularly the recent initiatives by Russia, have all added to our understanding of the difficult situation there and helped us examine regional solutions. India on its part, is doing its best for the reconstruction of Afghanistan to improve the social and economic lives of the friendly people of Afghanistan who have been suffering from conflict for the last almost three decades. We are helping our Afghan friends even at the cost of the lives of our people. India stands committed to the prosperity of the Afghan people and our Prime Minister was in Afghanistan recently to reaffirm India's unwavering commitment to this cause. Afghanistan has the promise of becoming a geo-strategic bridge between Central Asia and South Asia as well as a trade and transit hub with modern infrastructure.

Connectivity between SCO countries is in fact central. One bottleneck to trade and economic activity among the SCO members and observer countries is the lack of viable transport linkages. SCO can address the problem of limited connectivity through regional solutions and break barriers that inhibit trade and investment flows between our countries. India is ready to cooperate with member countries to find viable solutions to this problem and contribute to the endeavour to build bridges between Central and South Asia.

Ten years since its founding, the SCO faces a historic moment. Like other successful multilateral organisations, it must choose the path of its evolution. The draft of the Memorandum of Obligation being discussed by this Summit would pave the way for expansion of the organisation in a natural process of its evolution. India would be happy to play a larger and deeper role in the SCO when the rules and criteria for full membership are clear. We value the role of the SCO in bringing security, stability and development to our region and stand ready to contribute more to the SCO for the common good of the people of our region. We have friendly ties with all the member states and we wish to bring to the table our technical expertise, markets and financial commitment, all of which equip us to fulfil greater responsibilities in this forum.
SCO members and observers could cooperate more in the future on regional and global threats arising out of climate change, environmental security, food security, energy security, particularly non-conventional sources of energy and other emerging issues which require a joint response for sustainable development. India stands ready to make a constructive contribution in these areas.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to once again thank the Government of the Republic of Kazakhstan for the wonderful arrangements. I take this opportunity to wish the people of Kazakhstan continued peace and prosperity in the coming years and congratulate Your Excellency for successfully organising this important Summit.

Thank you.

INDIA’S FOREIGN RELATIONS - 2011

SECTION - V

DIASPORA
"I am very happy to join you once again in this wonderful annual homecoming of Pravasi Bharatiyas. I extend a very warm welcome to each one of you.

I extend a very special welcome to His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Anand Satyanand, the Governor General of New Zealand, who is our honoured Chief Guest this year. He has taken keen interest in revitalising relations between India and New Zealand and has been a source of great encouragement for the expansion of our bilateral relations in all fields. His achievements in the fields of law, jurisprudence, public service and international relations, and his deep knowledge of several languages are a matter of inspiration for the entire overseas Indian community.

I also take this opportunity to pay tribute to the memory of a very accomplished global Indian who is no longer with us - I am referring to Professor CK Prahalad, one of the foremost management gurus of our time. We will sorely miss his vast knowledge and experience in the Prime Minister’s Global Advisory Council of Overseas Indians and other bodies where he made valuable contributions to the evolution of public policies particularly directed at raising the living standards for the poorest section of our community. We honour Professor CK Prahalad by dedicating the Pravasi Bharatiya Divas Oration to his memory this year.

The year gone by has been a busy year for Indian diplomacy. We had the honour of receiving leaders from all countries which are permanent members of the UN Security Council in India. The world expects India to play a more important role in the management of global polity and economy. India’s rise as an emerging nation is welcomed as a positive factor in international relations. Our contributions whether in the G 20 or in the Climate Change conference held recently in Cancun were noteworthy and derived from our unique experience of tackling the challenge of developmental challenges, our emphasis on values and our tradition of building consensus among different sections and interests.

We have this year become a member of the United Nations Security Council for a period of two years. We will play our due and commensurate role in international bodies and we will seek to promote what is good for India and good for the world at large.

Last year I had the opportunity of visiting many countries with large Indian communities, to renew our contacts and bonds of affections. I visited Saudi Arabia, Canada and Malaysia. In Malaysia I had the privilege of inaugurating the Little India district in Kuala Lumpur with Prime Minister Dr. Najib.

It was a very emotional experience for me. It was a symbolic acknowledgement of the contributions that have been made by many other 'little Indias' to local communities across the world. I felt very proud when leaders of these countries praised and appreciated the role of Indian communities in their nation building efforts and processes.

India’s soft power is an increasingly important element in our expanding global footprint. This is a matter which came up yesterday in Prime Minister’s Advisory Council and several distinguished members led emphasis on the more effective use of India’s soft power. The richness of India’s classical traditions and the colour and vibrancy of contemporary Indian culture are making waves around the world. The Government of India has decided to establish new Indian cultural centres in US, Canada, Saudi Arabia, France and Australia. I urge the Indian communities in these countries to support and patronise these centres so that they become effective instruments for projecting the diversity and splendour of composite Indian culture.

The welfare of the large number of workers that emigrate from India is a matter of special concern to us. To improve the conditions for migration overseas we have signed Social Security Agreements with twelve countries and finalised Labour Mobility Partnerships with two others. We are negotiating a generic arrangement with the European Union. As a further measure we have now extended the facility of the Indian Community Welfare Fund to all Indian Missions. I take this opportunity to commend the efforts of my colleague Mr. Vayalar Ravi in this matter.

Our Government had introduced the Overseas Citizen of India card and the People of Indian Origin card to facilitate visa-free travel to India as well as to provide the rights of residency and participation in business and educational activities in India. We have recently reviewed the functioning of these schemes, and have decided to merge the OCI and PIO cards into a single facility. We hope to iron out some of the problems that have arisen in the implementation of these schemes.

This year the North Eastern States of India are the partner States for the Pravasi Bharatiya Divas. I represent the beautiful state Assam in Parliament and I know what boundless potential the North Eastern region has to contribute to our nation building given the right opportunities. Providing gainful employment opportunities for the youth is a real challenge. I encourage the diaspora to join hands with local and national efforts to accelerate the pace of development of this region.
I am glad that the Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs is planning to initiate a 'skills initiative' for overseas employment of people from the North Eastern region. Towards this end, we will identify an Institute of Excellence to promote technical skills in the region in the areas of hospitality and healthcare.

Since we met last year, we have enacted a law which has accorded Non-Resident citizens the right to register themselves in the electoral rolls of their constituencies. Our government is framing appropriate procedures to give effect to this new legal provision which will give NRIs their legitimate right to participate in the country's electoral processes. I have no doubt that their participation will be welcomed by the constituencies in which you do participate. They will bring a breath of global fresh air to our politics, I sincerely hope.

Despite the uncertain global economic scenario, I am happy that our economic recovery is progressing very well. In the last two quarters, our growth rate of Indian economy has been 8.9% and we expect that for the entire year it will be around 8.5%. We expect that from the next year onwards we will be able to grow at a rate between 9 and 10%. This growth is vital to fund our ambitious social development programmes and create employment opportunities for our young population. I will also create new bonds of interactions and connectivity between India and the overseas Indian communities.

We are examining seriously how to make systemic changes that ensure more transparent procedures and safeguards in our governance processes. I believe our democracy is sturdy, vibrant and has their own inbuilt mechanisms for redressal and course correction. We need to build consensus on far-reaching changes that may be required in processes of governance and in our legal or electoral systems. We are determined to work sincerely towards this end.

I believe that the Pravasi Bharatiya Divas has become an important event in our calendars because in this era of globalisation and instant and constant connectivity a new bond has been established between India and her own children who live around the world. It is a new bond based on our pride in the achievements of people of Indian origin worldwide and their pride in India's re-emergence as a cradle of creativity adventure and enterprise.

These interactions have enabled you to discover a new India and feel enthused by our progress. When you see the knowledge explosion in Bangalore, the entrepreneurial vibrancy of Gujarat, the creativity of Tamil cinema, the awakening of a new India, you feel proud to say you are a person of Indian origin.

Similarly, there is today great appreciation in India of the impressive achievements of the people of Indian origin around the world. Your hard work, your creativity inspire us.
I do sincerely believe the coming of age of the Pravasi Bharatiya has enabled the international community to recognise that India and the people of Indian origin have a new message for the world at large.

India has a message for the world. It is the message of pluralism, of tolerance, of the balance between individual rights and collective responsibilities. It is this message that every daughter and son of this great Mother Land of ours symbolises. Each one of you - living in different countries, different faiths, different languages, different beliefs - are a symbol of that great idea of "unity in diversity" that India represents.

Yesterday, at the meeting of the Prime Minister's Global Advisory Council of Overseas Indians, I was struck by how many of the distinguished members spoke about education and health care and what more India should be doing to develop Indian brain power. I think it would not be an exaggeration to say that the sterling achievements of our diaspora represent a triumph of the value that Indian culture places on education. We hope to use the wisdom, experience and resources of the global Indian community to develop a world class education system, particularly in the field of higher education.

In conclusion, I wish to say that I am very happy to inaugurate today the Pravasi Bharatiya Kendra which we hope will become a focal point for interaction, for exchange, for facilitation and for advocacy for the NRI community.

With these words, I wish you success, prosperity and fulfillment in all your endeavours in the year ahead."
141. Speech by President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the Valedictory session of the 9th Pravasi Bharatiya Divas.

Jaipur, January 9, 2011.

Distinguished Ladies and Gentlemen,

We are gathered here today from all parts of the world to celebrate Pravasi Bharatiya Divas, on this 96th Anniversary of the homecoming of Mahatma Gandhi back to Indian shores. He returned to India, providing leadership to our freedom struggle and inspiring a whole generation of Indians to follow his path of Non-Violence, and to adhere to the highest values of truth, integrity and respect for all. Gandhiji’s thinking had a tremendous impact in India and globally, making him one of the greatest personalities of our times. I am happy to know that Ela Gandhi, the grand daughter of Mahatma Gandhi has also participated in the Pravasi Bharatiya Divas in New Delhi. This gathering of “Global Indians” should pledge to work actively for upholding Gandhian philosophy and values, which will promote peace and understanding so essential in the world today.

We are especially honoured to have with us the Governor General of New Zealand, His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Anand Satyanand. We are proud of his achievements and I thank him for being with us today. I have had the opportunity to interact with him on two earlier occasions, when he paid a State Visit to India in September 2008, and when he came here during the Commonwealth Games. In discussions about Gandhiji, he mentioned that a statue of Gandhiji has been installed in a prominent location in Wellington. Indeed, Gandhiji’s statues have been established in many countries across the world. He belongs to the whole world. His birthday is observed as the International Day of Non-Violence, as he was a true apostle of peace.

India has had a long and ancient history of contacts with the outside world. In the 19th Century, like Gandhiji, many Indians who went overseas followed the imprint of the British Empire. After India became independent in 1947, Indian emigrants settled in the Americas and the Asia-Pacific, or closer home in the Gulf. At the same time, like Gandhiji, they have carried with them and nurtured Indian traditions and values wherever they have settled. Overseas Indians have shown outstanding capabilities in professional, academic, social, cultural and political fields. They are known for determination in the face of adversity, fortitude in difficult circumstances, and the spirit of never giving up. They have thus endeared themselves to their fellow citizens in their adopted home countries.

We are gathered here today not only because we share common bonds of ethnicity, language, culture and tradition, but also because we are part of a global village - a society and an economy in which, as it rapidly changes due to technological advances, we all have to constantly redefine our roles and positions, while at the same time retain our central values and rich heritage. There are indeed, very few conventions of the kind that we have here today, in which the delegates are so diverse, and yet have so much in common. Looking into the future, we must identify the interests that will continue to hold us together, and explore the common activities that will benefit all of us.

I am informed that deliberations held over these three days of the Pravasi Bharatiya Divas Convention have dwelt on many issues pertaining to the growth and development of India. At the same time, issues pertaining to the welfare and interests of the Indian diaspora have been discussed. Our attempt is to engage with the Indian community overseas in a mutually beneficial manner, in all spheres of life and nation building.

We have a gigantic task of nation building that lies ahead of us. Government of India is focusing on rapidly expanding the coverage and improving the quality of education, health services and infrastructure, combined with conserving and improving the environment and maintaining macro-economic stability. As India grows rapidly, it holds out immense opportunities to the world.

Our economy has been robust in the recent turbulent times, because of the contribution of services and manufacturing sectors, as also of the traditional sectors including, agriculture, animal husbandry and informal services. Government’s efforts at reducing poverty, imparting schooling and skills, improving health and habitats, and increasing participation of women and socially disadvantage groups in economic activity, can only succeed with the help and co-operation of private initiatives and civil society.

The seminars and interactions you have participated on topics pertaining to education, health, and inclusive growth, would have brought to your attention, the increasingly large number of successful initiatives in the social development sector in India, as well as policies and institutions put in place by Government to facilitate public - private partnerships. Last year, I had mentioned that Overseas Indians have come to be recognised as the “Knowledge Diaspora”. Your expertise and skills will be a vital resource for India’s efforts to forge inclusive growth for all its citizens. Your immense capacity in talent, skills, experience and finances are known to all. I hope that we will see a rapid increase in the number, size and scope of developmental activities in India by overseas Indians. I am sure that we will also see these initiatives evolving into more comprehensive and long-term projects that will have a significant positive impact on many lives. We would like to measure such projects not in terms of the money spent on them, but in terms of the humans touched and improved by them. Therefore, I call upon each and every one of you to participate to the best of your ability, in at least one endeavour in India for building a better future for the disadvantaged sections of society. Your contribution in the health and education sectors, in efforts to make India slum-free, as well as your participation in infrastructure development projects would be most welcome.

For close interaction with Overseas Indians, we now have made it a practice to hold a regional Pravasi Bharatiya Divas every year in one of the countries which have a significant number of Indians. The last such regional convention was held at Durban, South Africa, on 1st and 2nd October 2010. It was attended by about 500 delegates from 12 countries in Africa and was graced by President Jacob Zuma of South Africa. The next meeting will be held in Toronto this year.

I congratulate Shri Vayalar Ravi, Minister for Overseas Indian Affairs, for initiatives that have benefited our Diaspora overseas and especially the workers. Just of couple of months ago, I had the occasion to inaugurate the first Indian Workers Resource Centre at Dubai. The Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs has also piloted the efforts of the Government of India to provide voting rights for Non Resident Indians. It has taken steps to set up a Memorial for Indentured Workers at Kolkata Port. This memorial marks the indomitable spirit of Indian emigrants, reminding me of a quotation by Rabindra Nath Tagore:-

“Let us not pray to be sheltered from dangers but to be fearless when facing them”.

I would like to appreciate the work and the outstanding qualities of individuals and institutions that have been conferred the Pravasi Bharatiya Samman Awards this year. I wish all present here success in their endeavours, as well as a happy and a prosperous New Year.

Thank You

142. Speech by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the Indian Community function.

Melbourne, January 20, 2011.

Please see Document No.332.

I rise to share with the House information on the efforts undertaken by my Ministry to assist Indians entrapped in recent crisis situations abroad.

The Hon'ble Members of Parliament are aware of the recent changes in Egypt. Upon request of the Indian community, three special flights were arranged by Air India, which carried around 670 Indians from Cairo to Mumbai. This was not ‘evacuation’ and Government only facilitated arrangement of the special flights of Air India to Cairo which brought back Indians desirous of returning to India.

Libya, Yemen and Bahrain are witnessing violent political protests. In these countries, there is a significant Indian community most of whom have gone there to earn their livelihood and have been contributing to the growth and development of the host country. The Governments of these countries have also acknowledged this fact.

In Libya, there are around 18,000 Indians; 14,000 in Yemen and in Bahrain, the number is over 350,000 who are reportedly safe. Our embassies have been in close and regular contact with the Indian community.

I have personally spoken to our Ambassadors in these countries and conveyed that all measures should be taken for the safety and welfare of our nationals there. The Ministry of External Affairs and the Embassies have set up round the clock helplines.

We also held inter-Ministerial meetings to take stock of the situation in the region and its impact on Indian and Indian origin community in the region and contingency plans required for them. We have also put in place plans for possible evacuation by land, air and sea from Libya. We have also issued travel advisories for our nationals to avoid non-essential travel to Bahrain, Yemen and Libya.

We will continue to closely monitor the situation in these countries.

On the issue of safety and security of Indian fishermen in waters between India and Sri Lanka, allow me to reiterate, at the outset, that the welfare, safety and security of our fishermen have always received the highest priority by Government.
Hon'ble Members are aware of the two tragic incidents in January this year in the waters between India and Sri Lanka, which resulted in the death of two of our fishermen. The first fisherman was killed after being allegedly fired at by the Sri Lankan Navy and the second died after being allegedly strangled on the seas.

As soon as the news of the deaths of our fishermen was received, the Government had immediately taken up the matter with the Government of Sri Lanka both in New Delhi as well as in Colombo. Expressing our deep concern at these incidents, we emphasized that resort to firing or use of force in such situations had no justification. We requested the Sri Lankan Government to seriously investigate these incidents and ensure that they do not recur. We also emphasized that they should scrupulously adhere to the October 2008 Joint Statement on Fishing Arrangements in letter and spirit.

To underline the seriousness with which Government viewed these developments, Foreign Secretary visited Sri Lanka from January 30-31, 2011, to convey Government’s strong concern over the killing of our fishermen. She also called on His Excellency President Mahinda Rajapaksa. A Joint Statement was issued during her visit where both sides agreed that the use of force cannot be justified under any circumstances. The Sri Lankan Government reiterated their commitment to ascertaining the facts behind the incidents though they denied any responsibility in the two incidents of death of our fishermen. Both sides agreed that the October 2008 Understanding on Fishing Arrangements had led to a decrease in incidents and that there was need to discuss further arrangements so as to strengthen the safety and security of the fishermen. It was decided that the next meeting of the Joint Working Group on Fishing would be convened at an early date and contacts between the fishermen associations on both sides would be encouraged.

I had also taken up these issues strongly with the Sri Lankan External Affairs Minister Prof. G.L. Peiris when I met him on 7th February 2011 on the margins of the meeting of the SAARC Council of Ministers in Thimphu, Bhutan. I not only conveyed our deep concern at the violence against our fishermen but had also stressed the need to ensure that these incidents do not recur.

Hon'ble Members would also be aware that in two recent but separate incidents this month, a total of 136 Indian fishermen were surrounded by Sri Lankan fishermen at sea, apprehended and handed over to Sri Lankan Police. Our fishermen had strayed into Sri Lankan waters close to Jaffna and Point Pedro. Some of our fishermen were injured in the skirmish at sea.

On receiving the news of the arrests, Government took up the matter immediately with the Sri Lankan Government. I personally spoke to my Sri Lankan counterpart on 17th February and conveyed our deep concern at Sri Lankan nationals taking law into their own hands. I requested for their immediate release. In response to my request, the Government of Sri Lanka released the fishermen on 18th February.

I would also like to point out to this august House that almost all instances of arrests and harassment to our fishermen seems to have occurred in Sri Lankan waters, when our fishermen stray across the International Maritime Boundary Line (IMBL). While this by itself does not provide any justification for use of force against our fishermen, we need to be conscious of the sensitivities on the Sri Lankan side and of the many Sri Lankan fishermen who have, after a long hiatus, started fishing in that area.

In fact, it is keeping in mind the humanitarian and livelihood dimensions of this issue, that the two Governments on 26th October 2008 had issued a Joint Statement on Fishing Arrangements under which both agreed to put in place practical arrangements to deal with bonafide fishermen from either country crossing the IMBL. It was agreed that there will be no firing on Indian fishing vessels. While the incidents in 2011 have no doubt caused much consternation and concern in India, it is also pertinent to point out that after October 2008, there has been a significant decrease in 2009 and 2010 in apprehension of Indian fishermen and use of force against them in 2009 and 2010.

Both our countries have agreed that the Joint Working Group on Fisheries will meet in March this year. We would also encourage the fishing associations of both countries to continue with their informal contacts since such contacts have proved to be mutually beneficial. I hope that, in the days to come, our countries move forward to ensure that our fishermen can fish with safety and security.

Hon’ble Members would be aware that the US Government closed last month Tri-Valley University in California for alleged immigration fraud and other irregularities. The university was authorised in February 2009 to admit a limited number of foreign students, but did not enjoy state accreditation. Approximately 1500 Indian students, constituting 95% of the enrolment at the University, face an uncertain academic future. The students were on valid visas or authorization.

US authorities questioned a number of Indian students and 18 of them were initially detained and then released with radio monitoring devices on their ankles, pending completion of the investigations for possible involvement in the irregularities.

The Government, as well as our Embassy and Consulate Generals in the United States, are fully engaged in addressing the welfare and the academic future of the affected students. I have personally raised this issue with the US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. Foreign Secretary also conveyed our concern to US officials during her recent visit to the United States. While we recognise the right of every government to investigate and prosecute fraud, we have asked the US Government that the students, who are themselves victims of fraud, should be given adequate time and opportunity to transfer to other universities or adjust their status and, if they desire, return to India honourably. We have also strongly protested the radio collars as unacceptable, which should be removed immediately.

Despite the fact that a significant number of students at the university were dispersed across the United States and had not registered their contact details with the Indian Mission, our Embassy and Consulates were able to contact a large number of students and have provided all possible assistance to them, including through direct meetings with them, by organising a free legal aid camp and issuing appropriate guidance and advisories.

The US authorities have begun progressively removing the radio tags and have assured us that innocent students would have adequate opportunity to readjust their status or transfer to other US universities.

The Government expects that the United States would take steps to prevent such universities from exploiting foreign students. Government would also advise Indian students to exercise due diligence in applying to foreign universities.

I am confident that this unfortunate development will not affect the excellent cooperation between India and the United States in higher education, which includes the presence of over 100,000 Indian students at US universities, who enjoy a strong reputation for academic accomplishments and responsible conduct.

Thank you.
144. Press Release issued by Ministry of Overseas Indians on the Fourth Ministerial Consultation of Colombo Process.

Dhaka, April 20, 2011.

The Overseas Indian Affairs Minister, Shri Vayalar Ravi said that Indian Government has taken significant initiatives for the protection and welfare of Indian migrant workers. These include, revamping emigration rules to facilitate movement for overseas workers, with stringent penal provisions for unscrupulous agents and those aiding and abetting irregular migration. A fully computerized web-based emigration clearance system has also been installed to integrate all stakeholders in the migration process for a smooth transparent and orderly management of labour migration.

Addressing the Fourth Ministerial Consultation of Colombo Process in Dhaka today, Shri Ravi said that India will extend all cooperation for a dynamic and productive outcome to the ensuing deliberations for the adoption of the two important documents, namely, the Operating Modalities and the Dhaka Declaration, which envisage greater cooperation among the Member States to address common issues affecting migrant workers. He said that the member countries must work to establish a credible and effective joint consultative mechanism with the employers as well as between diplomatic missions and local governments for grievance redressal. As home to 58% of the current population, Asia must have a major say in any discussion on Globalization and Migration. He said that in the Colombo Process itself represent not only very large populations but also countries that are and will provide a large number of workers to global markets in future. There is a need to recognize through collective cooperation of all the Colombo Process Member States and the established consultation processes with the destination countries, that we would be able to ameliorate the conditions of our overseas workers and to realise the theme of ‘migration with dignity’.

In his address, the Minister listed five key areas of regional cooperation for this Ministerial Consultation’s consideration, namely,

- A model contract,
- Domestic and informal sector workers and their special needs,
- Harmonizing instruments of legal entry of workers,
- Exchange of labour-related information between sending and destination countries and
- Cooperation on grievance redressal mechanisms.
He said the overseas worker in domestic and informal sector constitutes the most vulnerable section of emigrant population. There is a need to strengthen the mechanisms of coordination and cooperation with the Governments of the destination countries to give them the requisite social and economic protection. Given fluctuations in currencies and continued increases in cost of living, in most countries the real wage is way below the cost of living. There is need to consider the concept of the accepted international norm of linking the wage structure to the cost of living index.

Highlighting the initiatives taken by the Indian Government for the protection and welfare of Indian migrant workers, Shri Ravi said that an Overseas Workers Resource Centre (OWRC) in New Delhi, equipped with a 24-hour toll-free helpline that provides information, and grievance redressal mechanisms to migrant workers and their families. The helpline operates in several regional languages of India besides international lines for callers from UAE. The Indian Government has also provided on-site support and information to its overseas workers, through the establishment of special centres in destination countries, a recent one having been established in Dubai called the Indian Workers Resource Centre. He said that the Indian Government, in cooperation with Government of UAE, is initiating a web-based attestation of contracts to be made mandatory for all workers, especially women care-givers and workers in the unskilled category. He further said that the Indian Community Welfare Fund in all our missions abroad have been established to provide on-site help and assistance on a means tested basis to overseas workers and migrants in distress. The Indian government has also entered into agreements, including social security agreements, with almost all major destination countries in the Gulf and Europe for the protection and welfare of our overseas workers.

The Colombo Process was established in 2003, as a Regional consultative process on management of overseas employment and contractual labour for countries of origin in Asia. It has expanded its collaboration with labour destination countries through bilateral talks and meeting of the Abu Dhabi Dialogue in January 2008 and the Asia-EU Dialogue later in the same year. It has eleven members, who are meeting in Dhaka to review past activities and chart the future roadmap through the adoption of ‘Operating modalities’ and a ‘Ministerial Declaration’.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I am delighted to be here in Mongolia, the land of the “Blue Skies”, and for the opportunity to interact with Indian friends of Mongolia and Mongolian friends of India. At the outset I would like to place on record the important role the small Indian community in Mongolia is playing in carrying forward our bilateral relations step-by-step on a daily basis. You represent the face, spirit and soul of India in Mongolia. At the same time, I would like to pay tribute to the Mongolian friends of India, who have opened their hearts to my country and the people of India. You are the present day torch-bearers of this age-old relationship between our peoples and our two countries.

I look forward to my meetings with the leadership of Mongolia to discuss the current status, and the future prospects of our multifaceted partnership, which naturally is to our mutual benefit. We are determined to preserve what we have; yet move on towards co-operation in new areas of partnership. India will focus on the ways and means to impart more economic content to our relationship and to see how India can play a more dynamic role in the core strengths of the Mongolian economy for example in coal and steel.

We are proud to see that Mongolia cherishes and upholds its democratic credentials, sending a loud and clear message to the region and the world beyond, that democracy is the ideal platform to provide for the welfare of its citizens. I congratulate Mongolia for assuming the Chair of the Community of Democracies. As a Parliamentary democracy, India assures Mongolia of all support as it provides leadership to this group. As two sister democracies we have a lot in common, and a lot to share with the world.

An old Mongol proverb says “Supreme treasure is knowledge”. This sentiment appropriately marks our centuries old traditional relationship, which has been a transaction of ideas primarily through the vehicle of Buddhism in the past. Here, I recall one such great son of India who was much revered in Mongolia. The Kashmiri monk Namu and his brother came to Mongolia during the reign of yýgedie Khan in the early decades of the 13th Century AD. Later, he was appointed as Guo-shi the State preceptor, or what we know in India as Rajguru. He was given a jade seal to administer Buddhist affairs. He was much honored at the Mongolian court.
In a more contemporary context, we seek to connect with Mongolia through what I call the 3 Es i.e. Enterprise, Economics and Education. In today’s milieu, I see a responsibility for all assembled here, as you are the people who interact on a regular basis and propel India-Mongolia relations. You are the vehicle, the via-media to take the relationship forward, to provide the relationship content, substance and meaning. I congratulate all of you for the initiative you have taken to organize yourself as part of the ‘India Club’. I am sure that with concerted action, your efforts in fostering close and friendly India-Mongolia relations will go a long way. My Government, through the Embassy of India in Mongolia, is happy to provide all possible assistance, to see the success of your efforts to promote our bilateral relationship.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

The Indian economy has recorded high rates of growth on a sustained basis since our process of economic reforms began. India is among the most attractive destinations globally for doing business. Several Indian companies have expanded their global presence in various sectors across the world, including here in Mongolia. One of the important tasks in which all of us are engaged, is to see how the economic dynamism of India, and Asia in general, can be harnessed to benefit our peoples and raise their living standards. It is in this context that I see the future of India-Mongolia relations. By cooperation and sharing, we can leverage our strengths and capabilities and provide opportunities to our peoples to realize their true potential.

Before I end, may I say that I am confident that my visit will provide additional impetus and momentum, towards expanding the scope of our ever expanding bilateral co-operation. I am certain that my compatriots in Mongolia will also serve as Ambassadors of India, and pursue excellence in whatever field they choose to, and be a source of pride for India and benefit to Mongolia. I also thank our friends from Mongolia for their abiding friendship and goodwill towards India, and I would like to assure them that we in India fully and substantively reciprocate your sentiments.

To all of you present today and your families, I convey my good wishes. I would urge that each one of you continue to work hard, as you have done so far, towards preserving, nurturing, promoting and strengthening the enduring friendship that exists between India and Mongolia.

Long live India-Mongolia friendship.

Thank you.

A comprehensive Social Security Agreement (SSA) was signed by the Minister of Overseas Indian Affairs and Civil Aviation, Shri Vayalar Ravi and the Federal Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of Germany, Dr. Ursula von der Leyen in Berlin. The Agreement which subsume the earlier Indo-German agreement on Social Security on 8th October 2008 will enhance cooperation on social security between the two countries. The Agreement with Germany will provide for the following benefits to Indian nationals working in Germany:

a) For short term contract up to five years, no social security contribution would need to be paid under the German law by the detached workers provided they continue to make social security payment in India.

b) The above benefits shall be available even when the Indian company sends its employees to Germany from a third country.

c) Indian workers shall be entitled to the export of the social security benefit if they relocate to India after the completion of their service in Germany.

d) The self-employed Indians in Germany would also be entitled to export of social security benefit on their relocation to India.

e) The period of contribution in one contracting state will be added to the period of contribution in the second contracting state for determining the eligibility for social security benefits.

This is the 60th year of diplomatic relationship between India and Germany. There are about 68,500 Indians in Germany most of whom are working as professionals and self-employed. During the visit of German Chancellor to India in May 2011, both India and Germany reaffirmed that the bilateral trade should reach US$ 20 billion by 2012. There is a huge potential for Indian workers to take employment in Germany. As such, a bilateral Social Security Agreement with Germany is a significant requirement from the futuristic point of view to take advantage of the emerging employment opportunities and to strengthen the trade and investment between the two countries.

India has signed similar agreements with Belgium, Germany (Social Insurance for detached workers), France, Switzerland, The Netherlands, Luxembourg, Hungary, Denmark, Czech Republic, the Republic of Korea and Norway.

155. Press Release issued by Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs making a Year-End-Review of the several Social Security and Labour Agreements signed for Welfare of Overseas Indians.

New Delhi, December 30, 2011.

2011 was an eventful year for Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs with several Labour and Social Security agreements signed with foreign countries for protection and betterment of Indian workers and professionals. An equally large number of initiatives were taken for constructive and mutually beneficial engagement with the Indian Diaspora. Some highlights are given below.

Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs has entered into Bilateral Labour Agreements with UAE, Oman, Qatar, Kuwait, Bahrain, Jordan and Malaysia. Ministry of Overseas Indian Affairs has taken several initiatives for safeguarding the welfare and protection of Indian workers going abroad. The Bilateral Labour Agreements include (i) Establishment of Indian Community Welfare Fund (ICWF) in the Indian Missions to provide immediate relief to the Indian workers in need and distress, (ii) Overseas Workers Resource Centre (OWRC) at New Delhi. This centre has 24x7 helpline and walk-in counseling centre to provide information and to handle workers problems. This centre uses 8 Indian languages and has a toll free number. (iii) Bilateral Social Security Agreements (SSA) for protection of the interests of Indian professionals going abroad and (iv) Indian Workers Resource Centre (IWRC) at Dubai for providing information to the Indian workers and to handle their problems.

A revised Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) on manpower was signed in September 2011. The MoU will strengthen the symbiotic relationship and mutual cooperation between the two countries. The revised MoU will boost the initiative of the Ministry in implementing Web Based Attestation Procedure for employment contracts for emigrant workers in UAE by the Embassy of India, Abu Dhabi. A need has been felt over the years to revise the MoU, which was signed between India and the UAE in December, 2006 to address various problems faced by the Indian emigrant workers in the UAE. The MoU in the field of manpower between India and the UAE provides (i) Facilitation of the recruitment of Indian manpower for working in the UAE (ii) Broad procedure for employment of workers; Responsibilities of the employers and workers (iii) Exchange of knowledge and experience in job-creation and generation of employment opportunity iv) Protection and welfare of workers under the labour laws and regulations of the host country (v) Authentication of the work contract between the Employer and the employee by the Ministry of Labour, Government of UAE (Vi) and (vii) Constitution of a Joint Committee comprising of at least three Members each from both the Governments to implement the provisions of the MoU.

The Ministry has concluded the Social Security Agreements (SSA) with Belgium, France, Switzerland, Luxembourg and Denmark. A comprehensive SSA was signed with Germany at Berlin in October, 2011. The SSA between India and France came into force with effect from 01.07.2011 and the SSA between India and Luxembourg came into force with effect from 1st June, 2011. The administrative Arrangement of the SSA between India and the Republic of Korea was signed at Seoul in July this year. A Norwegian Delegation and a Japanese delegation visited New Delhi this year for finalization of forms of the SSA. Countries with which India has already signed SSA but the agreements have not come into force due to finalization of forms being under process are; Netherlands, Hungary, Czech Republic, Norway. The Government is in negotiations on Social Security Agreements with Portugal, Canada, Finland, Austria, Sweden, Australia and Japan. The bilateral Social Security Agreements protect the interests of Indian professionals by providing following benefits:

Exemption from social security contribution for the posted (detached) workers (provided the worker is covered under the Indian social security system and continues to pay his contribution to the Indian system during the period of contract).

Totalization of the periods of contribution pertaining to both countries for the purpose of assessing eligibility for benefit/pension under the legislation of each country.

Social Security Agreements provides for pension and insurance benefits to Indian workers working abroad in the countries with whom India has entered into an SSA.

156. Speech of Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee delivered at the Governors' Seminar on "ASIA - 2050" at the Annual Meeting of the Asian Development Bank.

Hanoi, May 4, 2011.

"I would like to congratulate the ADB for its timely study on ASIA 2050. Asia has experienced high economic growth over the past few decades, and emerged as the lynchpin of the global recovery. With Asia firmly leading the global economy out of the morass of the crisis, the fulcrum of economic power is surely tilting towards Asia. The study rightly points out that despite its blistering pace of growth, Asia is not on the autopilot mode and in fact would require careful steering to realize the goal of a prosperous Asia which will not only make lives of Asians better but augur well for world economic growth.

Permit me to present some views on what needs to be done to make the Asian century a reality.

First and foremost, I believe that if Asia has to reach the level of an affluent region, achieving broad-based, inclusive and sustained growth would be a paramount necessity. Inclusive growth is critical for a sustained assault on poverty and for containing inequality. If we fail to achieve inclusive growth, we will end up with islands of prosperity within a largely poor Asia. Equally, important is the quality of growth. Asian countries should aim to transform their economies into knowledge- and skill-based economies over the next 40 years to ensure high sustained growth.

The second point is meeting the challenge of the region's food and energy needs. Over the next four decades, as Asia grows, its demographic footprint will be much larger. Asia with an estimated population of 5.1 billion would account for 56 per cent of the world population and 65 per cent of the population of the developing world in 2050. Even today there are 1 billion people, majority of them Asians, who live below the poverty line and face chronic undernourishment. Lifting them out of poverty and feeding the extra mouths will require increasing cereal production by over 70 per cent. Moreover, with increase in prosperity and changing consumption pattern, the demand for food will increase. We need to step up the pace of agriculture growth and achieve improvements in agriculture productivity by building forward and backward linkages, efficient credit delivery, water management, improved farming practices and rural infrastructure. Similarly, meeting the energy needs of the region will be a major challenge. Asia would have to ensure energy security by utilizing all available sources of energy including fossil fuels and renewable resources in an efficient and sustainable manner, while carefully managing climate-change issues."
The third point I would like to make pertains to the demographic dividend. It is felt that in developing countries in Asia, a key economic force is their young working population, which will contribute to higher growth. While this argument is sound in itself, what needs to be emphasized is the quality of this workforce that we are producing. We will need to invest much more in human resource development through higher investments in education and health. Furthermore, Asia would have to take leadership in technology, innovations and be at the forefront of the knowledge curve and this will be possible only if its human resources is highly skilled.

Managing urbanization and overcoming infrastructure constraints is the fourth area I would like to touch. Between now and 2050, Asian urban landscape will be transformed as its urban population is slated to double from 1.6 billion to 3.1 billion. Many of Asia's cities today are already bursting at the seams and face ever increasing infrastructure deficit. If the Asian mega cities and secondary cities are to serve as growth centres, attracting investments in economic activity, huge investments in urban infrastructure and improved and efficient service delivery through innovative modalities involving public and private sectors would have to be ensured.

Fifth, regional cooperation has to become a major development agenda as it has the potential to create synergies between the fast growing major economies and the neighbouring economies and push the region into a higher growth orbit. As the Asian economies try to rebalance growth towards internal demand, regional cooperation and integration through transport and energy connectivity could pave the way for the emergence of a vibrant regional market. We have seen that improved trade and investment ties and regional integration of production has been critical to Asia's leadership in global manufacturing. However more needs to be done to strengthen these ties. Addressing structural bottlenecks by strengthening cross border infrastructure linkages in transport, communications and energy sectors would help in addressing structural bottlenecks that are impeding growth. Similarly, integrating financial markets and channelising investments in the region would be critical to growth. In short, we need to work towards a broader more inclusive pan Asian regional community.

Lastly, for the growth story of Asia to unfold an enabling environment and appropriate institutional structure is a pre requisite. When we talk about governance, it is not just corruption but also accountability and predictability. All countries need to work towards improving governance, transforming their institutions into high quality, modern institutions and apply transparency and accountability filters to domestic policy making and implementation.
To recapitulate, for 21st century to truly belong to Asia, the Asian growth story would have to be based on inclusivity, making full use of its human and natural resources, overcoming resource and infrastructure constraints and fully utilizing the potential of the region through fuller cooperation.”

157. Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai’s media interaction during curtain raiser for 1st meeting of South Asia Forum.

New Delhi, August 25, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good evening and welcome. In the last SAARC Summit in Thimphu a decision was taken to set up the South Asia Forum (SAF). The first meeting of the Forum will take place in New Delhi between the 7th and the 9th of September. Foreign Secretary is here to apprise you of this very important initiative.

He is also joined by Mr. Asoke Mukerji, Additional Secretary MEA and Senior Vice-President of FICCI, Mr. R.V. Kanoria.

Briefly the programme is that we will have the Additional Secretary make introductory remarks, thereafter there will be an address by the Foreign Secretary followed by remarks by Mr. Kanoria. And thereafter Foreign Secretary will be happy to take a few questions. After that at 1900 hours, as you are aware, there is a reception that the Foreign Secretary is hosting and all of you are very cordially invited.

Asoke, the floor is yours.

Additional Secretary (Shri Asoke Kumar Mukerji): Thank you, Vishnu.

Foreign Secretary, Mr. Kanoria, friends in the media, I want to take this opportunity to briefly mention the reason why we are meeting today. The idea of the South Asia Forum was proposed at SAARC Summit in Thimphu in April last year. Subsequent to that, since it was an Indian proposal we followed up with the concept note on what we thought the Forum could look like and discussed it in a meeting of SAARC countries in January this year again. I was chairing the process of the SAARC group back in January and subsequently informed a Steering Committee which met in April. Both these meetings were endorsed by the SAARC process, by the Foreign Ministers. Subsequent to the endorsement of this process we have now an agreement among all the eight member countries of SAARC to collaborate together in convening the first meeting of the South Asia Forum.

It is a public private partnership and we are grateful to FICCI which is the nodal chamber of commerce in India represented in the SAARC Chambers of Commerce for partnering the Government of India and the Ministry of External Affairs within the Government of India in hosting this Forum.

Foreign Secretary I think would be the best person to provide us with the details of what we had conceptualized in terms of what the Forum would intend to do and how it could help. I would like to, therefore, turn the floor over to Foreign Secretary to ...(Unclear)...

Foreign Secretary (Shri Ranjan Mathai): Thank you very much, Asoke.

Ladies and gentlemen of the media, Mr. Kanoria, friends from FICCI, and my colleagues:

I would like to thank all of you for joining us in what we are calling a curtain raiser for the forthcoming South Asia Forum which, as you have been told, India is hosting early next month.

As Asoke mentioned, this is an initiative that emanates from the Silver Jubilee Declaration of the SAARC Summit which was held in Thimphu in April last year. This is we believe a very unique construct for our region. We already have some Track II processes which are in the way in the region, but this is the first of its kind to be formally endorsed by the SAARC Summit as a platform that explicitly includes business, academia and non-governmental entities.

The Summit at which SAF emerged, visualized that the Forum would be a platform to generate debates and facilitate an exchange of ideas on what you might call our shared South Asian home, and how its future development could take place. The Forum has been tasked to provide inputs to the next Summit which will be held in Maldives in November. At that point we hope to take stock of where SAARC stands after 25 years of its existence. And the suggestions which emerge from the Forum will also provide something of a roadmap for the medium and long term for the SAARC as a whole.

So, I think it is fair to say that the Forum will provide the Governments who meet in the Summit an opportunity to listen to some new thinking, fresh thinking, as a group on what we can do to energise our cooperation programmes to move forward on the larger goal creating a South Asian community and a South Asian Economic Union. This concept is timely and relevant as SAARC's potential as a driver of regional integration all the way from Afghanistan to Bhutan, and from Nepal to Maldives is steadily being realized. And I think it is important to note that it is also recognized worldwide that economic integration in this region could be a factor for stability.

Within the history of SAARC it is inevitable that the Forum will develop in an evolutionary manner. We do not expect the entire process to be completed in a single meeting. We are, therefore, happy that India is hosting the very first meeting as a partnership between MEA and FICCI. The Government's presence in this event is rather extensive, and it is intended to provide the initial support to establish the Forum and to encourage its future development.

FICCI’s partnership underscores the need for many more private initiatives, especially from business, to underpin SAARC’s focus on a more cooperative future for the region. The fact that this is a public private partnership signals that SAARC is today building a sense of South Asian identity across the region and that the linchpin of the future any integration schemes will inevitably be driven by the economic integration and business partnerships. That is the way in fact many other regional entities have developed and the cohesion of many of those in the other parts of the world has in fact been driven by business and by non-governmental agencies. In fact, as I said in the beginning, the aim is to really provide a lead, to provide a catalytic process in the beginning, and then ensure that FICCI and its partners will carry the weight from there.

The theme for this first SAF is, therefore, integration in South Asia: Moving Towards a South Asian Economic Union. I understand that Vishnu has provided a media kit which will give you all the details of the programme. So, I would not go into them. You will see that the event is structured in three sessions and the focus is on enabling a free-flowing discussion while promoting a conversation, a genuine conversation.

Sessions 2 and 3 are intended to draw up ideas that could contribute to starting a vision for SAARC over the next twenty-five years. These include themes which are of great topical interest like business and economic integration, culture, sports, climate change and the environment, and finally demographic issues which are politically relevant to our region, which has the largest growing population of young students.

How we will work is that each SAARC member state will nominate a delegate to anchor a thematic panel and one delegate to present the paper on the theme that is intended to initiate the discussions. We are currently awaiting these nominations from each of the SAARC states though the programme is well under way.

So, thematic sessions are also reflective of areas of our Government’s focus on our immediate neighbourhood and on ways in which we can work with our partners in South Asia to embed the habit of beneficial regional cooperation. The key is to find ways of building institutions and mechanisms of regional relevance which provide benefit to our peoples to improve connectivity, development opportunities and trade facilitation in an environment of peaceful cooperation and energy.

We have a good panel of participants from among our SAARC neighbours the details of which you will find in the media kits. I am particularly gratified that the Deputy-Chairman of the Planning Commission has consented to inaugurate the Forum and to participate in the stocktaking sessions that will follow. A very eminent predecessor of mine Ambassador Lalit Mansingh will be chairing the entire meeting. He would then be requested to summarise discussions and draw together plans for convening future meetings of the South Asia Forum which is intended to meet annually somewhere in our region.

We are happy that we will be having a number of eminent participants from among our partners in SAARC including at the Ministerial and Deputy Ministerial level from Afghanistan, Bhutan, Maldives and Nepal who have confirmed so far. The delegations list which is in your media pack includes many eminent academics and former civil servants who have contributed significantly to the process of establishing SAARC and developing the habit of regional cooperation. We hope this first meeting of the South Asia Forum will, therefore, help us to achieve the objective of creating new and effective mechanisms for regional cooperation in our immediate neighbourhood.

Ladies and gentlemen, I would now like to hand it over to Mr. Kanoria, and thereafter we will take questions.

Shri R.V. Kanoria (Senior Vice-President, FICCI): Thank you very much, Sir.

Mr. Ranjan Mathai, Hon. Foreign Secretary to Government of India; Mr. Asoke Mukerji, the SAF’s Steering Committee head and Additional Secretary of Ministry of External Affairs; Mr. Vishnu Prakash, Joint Secretary in the Ministry of External Affairs; and friends from the media:

We are absolutely delighted in FICCI that we will be part of this very important new initiative of the public private partnership between the Ministry of External Affairs and FICCI to launch the South Asia Forum within the context of SAARC. I would like to thank the Ministry of External Affairs for supporting FICCI in jointly organizing the first meeting of the South Asia Forum.

As the Secretary has already said, friends, the South Asia Forum is the first of its kind and will facilitate the active sharing of experiences and best practices and allow an exchange of ideas to be an enabler for enhanced engagement among South Asia’s intellectual diaspora. We can endeavour to evolve a vision for South Asian regionalism in the coming twenty-five years. And as the Secretary has mentioned, there is no better way than economic integration to ...(Unclear)... not only ...(Unclear)... but as Foreign Secretary mentioned that it is perceived that any economic stability in this region actually is contributing to global stability.

FICCI and the Indian constituent of the SAARC Chamber of Commerce and Industry have already made pioneering efforts to bring the business community of SAARC countries closer together. It is our desire in FICCI to pursue the agenda of bringing together both the Track I through the political process as well as the Track II through the business process towards greater regional economic cooperation.

I would like to say that business leaders of SAARC countries have confidence in their abilities to compete with the best and the brightest anywhere in the world. They have the desire and they intend to raise the potential to make South Asia an economic powerhouse of the world. We need to look at inter-related South Asian future where trade and cross border links flourish and bring prosperity to all our people. As a region blessed with an abundance of natural and human resources, a youthful population, and a unique spirit of enterprise, this surely should be an achievable goal.

On behalf of the business community, may I just reiterate what the business community endeavours and perhaps the entire civil society of South Asia would like to look forward to.

1. Freedom to trade without barriers
2. Freedom to invest across the borders
3. Freedom to travel seamlessly
4. Connectivity across the borders through world class linkages, open skies, open roads and open seaways
5. Building a South Asian brand equity.

The first meeting of the South Asia Forum should aim at successfully gauging the interest of the member states. The Forum is bringing together, as the Foreign Secretary has already mentioned, a group of eminent persons comprising of key policy makers, prominent industry players, and active representatives from think tanks, civil society and the media. The overarching theme remains South Asia Economic Union. The meeting’s focus is on the economic dimension of SAARC and on the socio-cultural dimension. To this end FICCI has already launched a website which is www.southasiaforum.in for the forthcoming South Asia Forum. I hope that this website ultimately would become popular in this region to continue to foster trade and business amongst the business community. The finding of this unique forum would be an excellent input to the forthcoming SAARC Summit at Male in November 2011.

I would like to thank again the Ministry of External Affairs for partnering with us. Thank you very much.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you, Mr. Kanoria. The Foreign Secretary will be happy to take a few questions pertaining to the SAARC process and the South Asia Forum.

Question: If the idea is to have a South Asia Economic Forum on the lines of the European Union and African Union and ASEAN and NAFTA, are we working with a time limit in mind as to when it is going to be a reality considering that at the moment intra-SAARC trade is less than five per cent or around 20 million dollars or whatever? What are your expectations from South Asia Forum as well as SAARC in the next 25 years?

Foreign Secretary: Before starting to answer that question I would like to acknowledge the presence of an ex-colleague of ours who has actually been the Secretary-General of SAARC, Ambassador Sheel Kant Sharma. If any of us does not have very fine technical details we will always be able to turn to Sheel because he has actually been Secretary-General.

You pointed to the ASEAN and the European Union. These are indeed very successful examples of economic integration in our area. I think the Forum is not intended to head in that direction. Forum is intended to be a clearinghouse for ideas, thinking out of the box through people who are not necessarily directly related to the official channels of how SAARC is moving, but who can bring to bear their knowledge, as FICCI has said, what is best in terms of how the movement called the SAARC can move forward towards an economic union.

Certainly the very outstanding examples you have mentioned would be a long-term direction but if one were looking for a model of what the Forum is trying to achieve, I would like to say with a degree of modesty because we are just starting but if we see the way in which certain other fora like the World Economic Forum in Davos has contributed through its own deliberations, non-official, to inputs into official agencies, into official channels, into official fora, in the same way this forum could contribute by bringing people together, the people from diverse disciplines from outside Government, from business, from think tanks, from academia, from media, from civil society at large, to assist you might say the Governments and the officials in the process of developing a common vision. I think that is what we intend to do.

You mentioned quite rightly that intra-SAARC trade is not very impressive. I would just like to say that I was shown a figure which, while indeed is not impressive, has grown remarkably in the last five years from something around a 150 million within the SAFTA process to something like a billion in five years. So, the potential for a very rare rapid growth if we all agree is indeed very great.

Question: You said that the region will not truly be a free trade area as long as free movement of people, labour, currency and other forms of capital is hampered. That is what you said in conclusion. I just want to ask you since you are looking for twenty-five years ahead, just to follow up on what Mr. Venkat has said, is there any possibility of this emerging into a kind of a South Asian Parliament on the same pattern as the EU? Secondly, is there a possibility of a common currency? Are you talking about a common currency like in Schengen countries?

Foreign Secretary: If I can just seek some further clarifications, I would ask our Additional Secretary to add. What I would like to say is, whether it is a movement towards a common parliament or a common currency, these are ideas which will have to emerge, be discussed, be approved at the Summits. I think they are quite far away from any kind of plan in that direction. But certainly, on the path between now and moving towards any such goal, if all the leaders jointly agree on that, an agency like the Forum, a group like the Forum, can throw up ideas on where you can go, what is the advantage in it, what is it that other regional groupings have achieved, what was the process by which they achieved it, what was the role of non-governmental personalities, eminent personalities, academics, thinkers in achieving that? And we believe that by throwing open the Forum to such an idea perhaps the next Summit could in fact think in terms of, okay yes this is a roadmap which we need to start on. It is a journey of a thousand miles but it always starts with the first step.

Additional Secretary: I would just like to add that this was keeping in mind the fact that we are entering into a completely new concept that we structured the Forum in as flexible manner as possible. I think the ideas that we have put forward of the Parliament and the currency and issues of that nature would find resonance within the SAARC process if the Forum deliberates on these ideas and then provides these ideas after deliberating on them as inputs to the Summit. So, we have taken a conscious decision in the SAARC process that every Forum would more or less be held linked with the Summit so that the outcome of the Forum would feed into the Summit.
Foreign Secretary: In fact, in the very first Summit connectivity is one of those themes. Connectivity is not just transport. It is communications, it is the ability of people to use transport systems and move, travel just along the lines you mentioned. Certainly we would expect the Forum to contribute with suggestions and ideas as to what the best way forward is.

Question: Members of chambers of commerce used to exchange visits of delegations to each other’s countries, especially with Pakistan. Is there any move to resume those visits, especially organise exhibitions and things like that?

Foreign Secretary: Mr. Kanoria, maybe you can throw some light on this?

Shri R.V. Kanoria: We already have delegations between the countries. In fact, in November there is a FICCI delegation which will be going to Pakistan. It has been our constant endeavour to continue to build up economic relationships including with Pakistan. In fact, we would very much like to see that there is an engagement where there is a stake of business in each of our neighbouring countries to improve relationships through economic cooperation. So, delegations continue. There is a regular framework of delegations. I know that it is not just FICCI which is doing it but PHD chamber also has delegations to Pakistan.

Foreign Secretary: Would you like to add anything on the chambers of commerce and their role in SAARC?

Shri Sheel Kant Sharma (Former Secretary-General of SAARC): There is a SAARC Chamber of Commerce and Industry which has all the national chambers of commerce and industry in SAARC countries as its members. They keep meeting with a considerable regularity. In the past three years that I used to be Secretary-General of SAARC, they have an economic summit where people from the chambers of commerce got together and met in SAARC capitals. That process is actually under way. The idea of the Forum is to harness everything together.

Question: One of the major stumbling blocks when we talk about the huge potential or untapped potential of SAARC has been the troubled relations between India and Pakistan. The core problem is not just India and Pakistan but also the trust deficit between different countries in the region that has hindered the movement of people and trade and ideas. What are we doing to address this which is often being overshadowed by India-Pakistan issues? How do we take this forward?

Foreign Secretary: You are quite right. There has been a fairly slow movement in many of the areas where movement could have been a lot faster, if what you might say the confidence in each other was greater. We have seen in other areas of the world, ASEAN and Europe are the two examples which are very often mentioned, that what happens is that when you have a high degree of convergence of ideas and trust and confidence in each other, that cooperation becomes like a habit. And it is the rare area where you do not cooperate which you can find people raising questions that why it is not taking place. So, certainly this has been a factor. I would say that the answer is at two levels. One, the SAARC itself does not address bilateral issues. But we have seen that within the region there are concerted efforts by the various countries, I have been speaking only for India, to have discussions and dialogue to resolve all outstanding bilateral issues with all our neighbours. And I think we have had a considerable degree of success in this regard certainly even with Pakistan which you referred to. If you note the recent visit of the Foreign Minister, this was part of that process, to try and rebuild trust and confidence and to ensure that any such lingering leftover, residual doubts do not come in the way of the SAARC process.

That said, one has to also see that in the last five years SAARC has indeed been able to achieve a very substantial progress on issues which some years before you might have thought were not moving ahead fast enough. To mention a few examples, we have had the South Asia University, we have had the SAARC Development Fund, and a number of developments of this nature. So, I think the answer is that things have really speeded up in the last few years but certainly progress could even still be faster.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you, Sir.
158. Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the first meeting of South Asia Forum.

New Delhi, September 8, 2011.

Your Excellencies, Ministers and Deputy Ministers from South Asia Delegates at this Forum

Ladies and Gentlemen;

It is a distinct pleasure for me to welcome you to New Delhi for the first meeting of the South Asia Forum. Your presence here is testimony to the importance that you attach to the Forum and its laudable objectives.

The fact that this meeting is in fulfilment of a mandate from the highest political levels of SAARC adds, on one hand, political weight to the effort, but on the other hand, it also adds the weight of expectations over its outcomes.

Excellencies, friends,

I understand that the discussions at the SAF today have been frank, free and extensive. This is an excellent start and therefore a good sign for the future. The guiding principle of the Forum must be its capacity to produce practical and implementable recommendations that are oriented towards a medium-to long-term vision of what our South Asian region should look like in the next quarter century. The biggest challenge is in focusing our attention forward, and in tempering it with practicality. Managing to tread a fine balance in this regard is critical.

From this perspective, I would be interested in seeing the recommendations of this Forum. The first element that, in my view, is to see whether the Forum manages to assemble a robust argument in favour of progressive integration of the region. This is neither the time nor the place for a detailed discussion on this issue, but the imperative for integration at a pace and in a manner that is acceptable to all our member States needs to be made clear.

Proceeding on this basis, the Forum should recommend ways in which the process of integration can be supported, and areas of cooperation that are least difficult for us to rapidly build an integration agenda.

We all know, of course, that our region is among the least economically integrated in the world; there are adequate studies that offer statistics in this regard. However, for me, the litmus test of integration is really whether we are able to make it viable for our businesses to expand intra-regional trade and investment flows. If this can be incentivized either through policy measures or by means of forward-looking steps by our premier chambers of commerce and industry, the connective tissue of a South Asian economic community can begin to be created.

Much of what we consider to be limiting factors, such as high costs of telecom and physical connectivity are more symptoms of the lack of trade and investment flows within our region. Unless we work collectively to make it rewarding for our businesses to look within our own region for joint ventures, partnerships and expansion, our region will continue to lag other similar regional cooperation mechanisms.

Excellencies,

It is only through an expansion in the number of stake-holders in the processes of regional cooperation that we can create a critical mass in favour of deepening and widening integration in our region. The South Asia Forum creates precisely such a platform. The utility of the Forum, over and beyond that of our excellent national think-tanks lies not only in the fact that it includes members from each of our eight nations. It also lies in the fact that the Forum is anchored within official SAARC structures.

However, for future editions of the Forum, we may perhaps need to consider widening representation from civil society, media, academia and business, while proportionately reducing the scale and extent of Governmental presence. The recommendations of the Forum will always have official weight because the Chairman of edition will provide his conclusions to the succeeding Summit.

That apart, for future editions of the SAF, we need to consider how best to derive value from the presence of observer nations of SAARC. Can we find ways of encouraging academics and other specialists on our region in the observer States to participate in discussions, not merely as spectators, but as discussants?

Excellencies, delegates and friends,

It is not my intention to try and suggest outcomes or directions to the Forum. I did however want to point to areas of enquiry that I would be interested in seeing explored by this valuable initiative. I also hope to make explicit the fact that India believes in the utility of this Forum, and is committed to working both domestically with our partners in civil society and business, in particular FICCI but also within our region, to ensure that the Forum is soon seen as an integral part of the South Asian landscape.

Thank you for your attention, and once again, thank you for contributing to the success of this event through your presence.
Your Excellencies, Ministers and Deputy Ministers from South Asia
Madame Secretary-General of SAARC,
Chairman of the first South Asia Forum meeting, Ambassador Mansingh
Members of the Diplomatic Corps, Friends from the media, Delegates at this Forum,
Ladies and Gentlemen;

It is a pleasure to be able to welcome our friends from the SAARC family to India.

It is also a privilege to be given the honour of hosting this opening event of the first meeting of the South Asia Forum, which in many ways, represents a unique experiment in our region.

Sadly, we meet in the wake of brutal and cowardly acts of terrorism. As many of you were flying into New Delhi, not far from here, eleven innocent people lost their lives outside the Delhi High Court, and dozens were seriously injured.

While all of you have joined us in a minute's silence in respect to the victims of terror in separate incidents in India and Pakistan, I must underline that we will not be deterred from our positive and forward-looking agenda for our region.

Acts of terror only alienate the perpetrators from civilized humanity. They also do not understand the will of our people, or our determination to ensure development of our people and our region, in a spirit of peace and friendship with our neighbours.

Our shared commitment to the development of our region will continue to inspire us as we begin an important set of discussions tomorrow. This dialogue should be an important contribution to securing the future of our region through the SAARC process.

Excellencies,

Last year, at the historic 16th SAARC Summit in Thimphu, our Leaders issued a Silver Jubilee Statement that was remarkably forward-looking.

In it, they mandated the creation of the South Asia Forum as a platform to bring together eminent people from diverse backgrounds, to engage in a future-oriented discussion based on out of the box thinking.

It is one of the first occasions in our region that our leaders have mandated a platform that brings business, civil society and media in a public-private partnership to provide inputs to enable SAARC to evolve a vision for the future of our region in the next 25 years.

It is certainly a sign of our changing times that our Association is formally seeking the views of all stakeholders in the region, to enable the fullest ownership of the policies that will drive integration of our region in the next 25 years.

Today, as we realize the mandate given to us by our leaders last year, I felicitate all of you for your support in getting this shared endeavour off the ground.

I want to particularly highlight the fact that this experiment has reached here because of the joint effort of FICCI and my Ministry, in a public-private partnership. I commend you for your work.

Excellencies, delegates and friends,

Now that the Forum is a reality, and as you prepare for almost two days of intensive discussions, I should also request you to bear in mind that the purpose is to start the process of evolving a roadmap for our shared future.

It is essential therefore that this first meeting of the Forum generates implementable and practical suggestions.

Equally, delegates should focus on firmly establishing a platform upon which subsequent editions of the Forum can be built.

Your efforts will be watched closely by our Heads of State and Government. Not only because of their mandate last April, but also because the outcomes of this event will feed into the 17th Summit that will be held in the beautiful atolls of the Maldives. As you begin your work tomorrow, you will not only have the blessings of our leadership, but also the good wishes of over one point five billion South Asians.

I wish you every success. Thank you.

New Delhi, November 15, 2011.

Inaugurating the 5th South Asia Conference on Cooperative Security, Defence Minister Shri A. K. Antony said New Delhi is committed to build networks of interdependencies in the region. “Our people deserve peace, security, education, healthcare facilities and sustainable development in equal measure. With regard to our neighbours, we have always demonstrated our willingness to go the extra mile for the sake of peace and security, even on a non-reciprocal basis, if required,” he said.

Referring to Pakistan, he said there are already clear signs that Indo-Pakistan trade relations might improve and expand. Shri Antony said the expansion in cooperation has created an atmosphere to expand the dialogue on cooperative security. However, “we need to change our mindsets, if we really wish to reap the benefits of mutual cooperation,” he said.

Welcoming the foreign delegates including those from Pakistan, Afghanistan and other South Asian countries, Shri Antony said that asymmetries among countries in South Asia need not stand in the way of regional cooperation. “Asymmetries in size, resources and military capabilities must be used as “building blocks” to enhance cooperation and not be allowed to become “blocks” to regional cooperation,” he added.

Pointing out that India has recently signed a Strategic Partnership Agreement with Afghanistan and a Framework Cooperation Agreement has been drawn up with Bangladesh, Shri Antony advocated bilateral and regional defence cooperation including exchange of delegations. “We pay special attention to defence cooperation by increasing the frequency of defence exchanges with defence forces from a large number of friendly countries. These defence exchanges are aimed at enhancing capacity building, training and cooperation among friendly nations. Indian defence forces have made a significant contribution towards disaster management and humanitarian relief work and received widespread appreciation for their efforts,” he added. Exhorting a regional security model on the patterns of South East Asia and Central Asia, the Defence Minister mooted a cooperative security architecture focusing on issues related to soft security. “The ambit of the concept of security today includes a range of other issues affecting human security. Several UN summits have been held in the past two decades on diverse issues pertaining to human security viz-population, food, information, society, environment and climate change. This expansion in the concept of national security has created new opportunities for cooperation between nation states," he said.

"India too has set up regular mechanisms of dialogue and cooperation with SAARC countries at bilateral level. We must further expand the scope of such discussions to include issues pertaining to human security. At the non-official level, there is an even greater scope for expanding the dialogue and further intensifying people-to-people contacts," he added.

Pointing out that terrorism continues to be a problem, Shri Antony said that “the gamut of security issues facing various nations is largely non-traditional and asymmetric. Increasingly, non-state actors with cross national linkages pose critical challenges. Nations need to draw up collective and innovative measures to effectively counter such evil designs".

161. Keynote Address by Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai at the Conference jointly organized by the Ministry of External Affairs-International Institute of Strategic Studies-Institute of Defence Studies and Analysis on Forging Stability in Asia.

New Delhi, November 21, 2011.

Thank you for inviting me to address the fourth in this continuing series of dialogues between the Ministry of External Affairs, International Institute for Strategic Studies, London and IDSA, New Delhi. My predecessors have spoken at these dialogues about the priorities and goals of India’s Foreign Policy. It is my intention today to build upon that foundation in order to examine, in particular, the future and importance of forging a new stability in Asia. I hope my brief remarks can set a tone for the discussion but it is not my intention to anticipate what you will be discussing in depth.

Sometimes it is useful to spend a minute on definitions. To us in India, Asia has always meant the entire continent, not just the Eastern part of it as seen from across the Pacific. At the Asian Relations Conference in March 1947, Prime Minister Nehru presciently spoke of a rising Asia……and welcomed delegations from China, Egypt and the Arab world, Iran, Indonesia & Indo-China, Turkey, Korea, Mongolia, Thailand (Siam), Malaya, Philippines, Central Asia (he referred to the Soviet Asian republics), all our neighbours, Australia and New Zealand. This is a vast canvas, and it needs retelling that India is in a sense a meeting point of influences of West, North, East and South East Asia. The theme of forging stability across such a vast expanse requires a look at whether Asia can be considered a single strategic entity. Perhaps not, despite decades of globalization.

Stability in other regions has essentially been forged by what we can call architecture; the creation usually by general consent, of structures of regional dialogue and cooperation. These arrangements help either subsume, resolve or put aside bilateral differences, within a construct aimed at collaboration on issues of general interest or towards achievement of a common vision of the general interest. The EU was traditionally considered the exemplar. After the recent East Asia Summit, the ASEAN is probably an equally good example of the search for stability through architecture.

We are supposed to be in a post-Westphalian world in which globalisation has reduced classical identity of States as autonomous entities. Recent events suggest, however, that the nation state remains the primary unit of international politics, and regional architecture cannot end competition among nation states; it can however moderate it through the quest for common interests. It also appears that requirements for stability do have a substantial constituency; even in an era of mobilized, politically active populations, the dangers of unrestricted competition are increasingly recognized. Also recognized is that multilateral constructs provide avenues for compromise that may not be politically saleable on purely bilateral levels.

I do not wish to ramble on on a theory of international politics. Your sessions focus on asymmetric warfare, stability in Pakistan and Afghanistan and engaging a rising China. So let me touch on these themes within the overarching idea of stability in Asia.

Asymmetric war is actually war by other means (I say this with caution because this is a field for experts). But such war is possible because of the balance created by mutually assured destruction, or because of the difficulty of finding the appropriate targets to respond to. Hence state sponsored terrorism is a form of asymmetric warfare, that we best know currently. As the range and firepower of terrorists increases, the capacity of asymmetric warfare to endanger international security increases. The ultimate danger of nukes falling into the hands of terrorists needs the attention of all those concerned about stability across the globe.

Let me turn to the topic of stability in Pakistan and Afghanistan. This area is currently the focus of much of the world as the US and ISAF begin their countdown to the transition in 2014. Stability in Afghanistan and Pakistan, on the border between them, and in the regions abutting them are of vital importance to the countries directly involved; and the perceived outcome of the ten years’ war and reconstruction efforts (the latter to which we have contributed) hinges on the maintenance or otherwise of stability in these regions. The Istanbul Conference on November 2 sought consensus for an architecture, built on a concept of economic cooperation in a region stretching from Turkey to South Asia and Central Asia to the Gulf passing through Afghanistan which was described as the “heart of Asia”. This (along with political elements) would be taken forward at Bonn in December when one can expect to hear more on what US Secretary of State Clinton described in India in July, as the New Silk Route.

For a moment this idea transports us back in time to an era when the Silk Route was an important part of the relationship between Europe, Asia and Africa for several centuries. Extending some 6000 kilometers with mostly overland (but also some sea) routes, the Silk Route was not only important for the exchange of goods and precious metals, but also for the spread of ideas and knowledge. It was, in fact, a major factor linking the developments within the great civilizations of India, China, Persia, Egypt and Rome. There was no conception of a strategic interlinking of all these regions, hence the role of the Silk Route in maintaining stability is uncertain.

The metaphor of the Silk Route (by whatever name) could be a useful one today, especially for those seeking common structures to lock in the kind of common interests that can foster Asian stability. A new Silk Route in Asia seeks to highlight the synergies between us, and the acceptance of interdependence that has not only become part of our lives, but which could give us competitive advantages for intra-regional trade and in dialogue with the world outside. None of this will be cheap. There will be a requirement for deep pockets, but the outcomes could be very positive.

Nehru hinted at the idea of Silk Route earlier in 1947, when he said “one of the notable consequences of European domination of Asia has been the isolation of Asian countries from each other. India had contacts and intercourse with her neighbour countries in the North West, North East, and East and South East Asia. With the coming of British rule these contacts were broken off and India was completely isolated from the rest of Asia. The old land routes ceased to function and our chief window to the world looked out to sea routes which led to England”.

That we should be talking of “New Silk Route” even today six decades later, when there has been ample time to recreate old routes, suggests that political obstacles apart, maritime routes are, in fact, quite natural to us in Asia and must be part of any architecture we build. For us in India, the New Silk Route is another name for connectivity we seek to Central Asia and beyond. But with apologies to Bismarck, we are both a land rat and a water rat. If I were to look at the prospects for stability in Asia in connection with Afghanistan, I would add Iran to the list of countries needing to be discussed.

Security and Terrorism

Terrorism is now recognised as one of the greatest scourges of our times and a serious source of instability in regions across Asia and the wider world. Earlier in the 1980s and 1990s, it was easy for the outside world to watch as India went through trials of terrorist fire. Today, no one is immune from terrorism emerging from the same swamps that produced the terror groups targeting India. There is also a growing recognition that while India has suffered grievously, it has preserved the values of democracy and secularism at home and acted with a great sense of responsibility abroad. Such preconditions for stability are less assured in other countries.

In a new emerging world, it is, of course, necessary to find solutions to terrorism, beyond the obvious, to understand the contexts rather than to give one-size-fits-all solutions. But concerted international efforts to counter terrorism and to pressurise those who provide them safe haven, must continue and become the norm in policy making. Institutional mechanisms of states must find ways to deal with subterranean and ideological regional groups, and the asymmetric warfare resorted to by some states. The CCIT at the UN is one place to start.

South Asia

In our search for stability we have tried to help Afghanistan in nation building. We have also engaged with Pakistan to maintain a structure of normalised state relations. There have been some modest successes as seen in the move towards trade normalisation. There is today, more successfully, a greater degree of stability in countries like Bangladesh, Bhutan, Maldives and Sri Lanka. There has also been considerable progress in India’s relationship with Bangladesh in dealing with outstanding problems, including settling the border, security, sharing of river waters and increase in trade linkages. In fact, progress with Pakistan and better relations among and with countries in South Asia could leapfrog the SAARC region into a high economic growth trajectory.

The potential of the dynamic SAARC market is considerable with the Indian economy growing at a steady rate of about eight per cent per annum. With greater assistance to other countries in South Asia from India, I think we could create opportunities for inter-linkages for stability and economic growth. The destiny of South Asia to some extent lies within. SAARC provides a platform to aim for a higher calling even as we try to resolve our differences.
Central, West & East Asia

Afghanistan and the Central Asian region are not new areas for Indian engagement. India and Afghanistan are not just neighbours, joined together by history and civilisational contacts stretching over millennia, but we are also strategic partners. Our close relations based on cultural affinities, the shared values of multi-ethnicity and pluralism and the common quest of our peoples for peace and development have ensured that the relationship between our two peoples remains warm and friendly.

The strongest testimony of this is reflected in our reconstruction and development assistance to Afghanistan. Continuing aid and assistance to Afghanistan is a major strategy of our engagement with Afghanistan. This includes an important agreement for capacity building of Afghan working in a new economy, for the civil services and security forces. Whether you call it a New Silk Route or simply connectively through links of trade, transport and energy, the potential of the routes and networks that can emerge from regional cooperation through Afghanistan would not just be economically beneficial but confidence building measures. In the run up to 2014 and beyond, there will be scope for expanding the networks to link with other arrangements that we could consider after India’s full participation in the SCO.

West Asia

The upsurge that began in Tunisia in early 2011 has transformed West Asia. The changes set in motion in early 2011 still echo in the region: more regions are affected, more regimes have fallen, and among those which have survived, many have been forced to adopt new policies. Taken together, these changes herald an epochal shift primarily in the Arab world, possibly one of the most significant geo-political developments of the 21st century.

The rise of a new democratic West Asia will bring its own set of challenges and opportunities. The biggest challenge to stability will be the creation of employment opportunities and satisfying aspirations of the growing young generation who believe that dictators have stifled their prospects. This will require governments and businesses in each of these countries coming together to foster entrepreneurship in a sustained manner, with international support. The EU, GCC, US and to a lesser extent Japan, Russia, China and India may have a role to play. But so far, there is no sign of a coordinated move to work to support democratic and economic aspirations of the people. We are doing our bit by being helpful with election management, training programmes, etc.

China

I think China has already risen, though it is likely to continue to rise. It is not just a cliché but a fact that we are likely to be both competitive and complementary.
As two of the largest developing economies in the world, India and China are significant engines of economic growth in the world. The promise of an India-China engagement is mirrored with China having emerged as India’s largest trading partner, with prospects of growth continuing and a bilateral trade target of US 100 billion dollars by 2015. Peaceful development of relations between India and China will also lead to the strengthening of BRICs at a time when large parts of the world in Europe and the United States are facing the heat of global recession. On global issues such as climate change, the need for a development dimension in trade negotiations, and reform of international financial institutions, there are many common interests between China and India.

Therefore, there is need for continued engagement with China across all spectrums, despite outstanding problems on the border issue. China will be an important partner in fostering Asian stability, and in ensuring economic linkages between countries that could work to dissuade conflict. There will, of course, be many balancing acts required.

India, China and the United States

The rise of China as a major economy and global power has implications for the world’s superpower, the United States. At the same time, the two countries are chained together by a shared economic destiny in view of their close trading and financial linkages. In India, we have been able to engage constructively with both China and the United States despite some ups and downs. An India that continues to grow rapidly and build its relations with both China and US may be in a position to participate effectively in, if not initiate, a trilateral dialogue between the three countries which could be a major factor of stability in Asia.

India and a revitalized Asian economy

Today, the global economy has several stress points. The world economy will take time to recover and the effectiveness of the initiatives taken in the Euro Zone remain a work in progress. Attention is increasingly focussed on domestic concerns. It is, therefore, possibly time to dwell on the concept of an “inclusive Asia” that could be the basis for a new Asian identity and stability.

Sometime ago it was popular to talk of “Asian values” and a new Asian outlook on the world. This has not proved decisive in the search for stability. A vibrant Asian economy will also involve the creation of a new energy architecture for Asia; harnessing technology and innovation for economic growth; and providing for the region’s infrastructure needs. It may be too early to say that for the stability of Asia, “it’s the economy stupid”. But clearly anyone who fails to see that the economy gives us the best prospect for working on an architecture of stability is being somewhat “stupid”.

New Delhi, November 24, 2011.

With India looking at increasing power availability by 800,000 GW by 2030 to sustain GDP growth rates of 8-9%, the country's demand for energy will drive the formation of the SAARC energy grid, said Shri Sudhir Vyas, Secretary (ER), Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India, while releasing a report on "South Asia Energy Cooperation and Business Opportunities in the Power Sector" published by the Confederation of Indian Industry (CII) at the Round Table Session focusing on the same subject. He further stated that while initial steps have been taken, much more needs to be done to expedite regional cooperation in this space. "A lot is being done at the bilateral level but this needs to be scaled up to the regional level" he said.

Focusing on the policy issues that need to be addressed for energy security through regional cooperation, Dr Kirit Parikh, Chairman, IRADe (Integrated Research and Action for Development) emphasized that a competitive electricity sector with independent regulators is imperative to meet the goals of power to all and poverty alleviation. "There is clearly a strong argument for energy cooperation given the advantages of lower costs, more effective utilization of resources and an increase in capacity factor. However, the way forward is not only a strong reliance on large scale government interventions. It is also important to promote private sector participation on smaller platforms. This can be done by the development of an institutional set up which facilitates the set up of transmission lines and true open access extended across borders." He further added that the power purchase agreements need to be symmetric with clauses like formula-based tariff setting built into these agreements so that developers are assured of getting the right price. Functioning of a transparent power exchange and minimization of political risks is essential to expedite energy cooperation among these countries.

Dr Sudhir Kapur, Member CII National Committee on Power and Chairman & Managing Director, Country Strategy Business Consultant Pvt Ltd, said in his welcome remarks that given the growth potential in the entire south Asian region, an almost four fold increase in energy demand and also supply is expected. "Currently, thermal plants account for the bulk of the power supply in these regions at 65% followed by hydro power at 20%. Given the twin objectives of ensuring energy security and addressing the climate change challenge, it is important to capitalize on the over 200 GW of hydro potential in countries..." including India, Bhutan and Nepal. A comprehensive approach comprising an integrated policy, and integration of the grids as well as substantial investments has the potential to be a game changer in providing the countries in this region with uniform access to power," he said.

Highlighting the benefits of cross border trading Shri Jayant Deo, Member CII National Committee on Power and Managing Director, Power Trading Corporation Ltd. said, "With key advantages including the creation of transparent & neutral platforms; savings on operating costs, utilization of cheaper generation; optimal use of resources and enhanced efficiency and reliability of power supply, cooperation among countries in the energy space is increasing globally. In India, as well, to facilitate the development of cross border power exchanges, it is important to develop mechanisms for deviation settlement, payment security and clearing &settlement. This will pave the way for a single South Asia electricity market.

Assessing the business opportunities in this segment, Shri Amulya Charan, Chief Mentor, Tata Power Company Ltd stated, "All our neighboring countries including Nepal, Bhutan, Pakistan and Sri Lanka either have the demand or the supply resources which are unfulfilled and therefore setting up a SAARC grid has huge potential. For instance, Nepal and Bhutan have adequate hydropower resources which if harnessed effectively can provide these countries with adequate national income. This has already been happening very effectively in Bhutan where hydropower exports account for a substantial portion of the country’s GDP." Citing the example of Europe, he said, “The multiple nation grid is a well established phenomenon and needs to be replicated in South Asia. This will lead to a win-win situation for all the countries in this region.”

Kabul, January 9, 2011.

Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen.

It is a great pleasure for me to be in Kabul, and in Afghanistan, a country so closely linked to India throughout history. His Excellency Dr. Zalmai Rassoul and I have had today a productive round of detailed consultations. We discussed a broad range of bilateral, regional and international issues of mutual interest.

The strategic partnership between India and Afghanistan is based on the strong foundations of rich historical and civilisational bonds and shared interest in regional peace and prosperity. I assured Foreign Minister Rassoul that India is committed to partnering the Government and people of Afghanistan in the building of modern Afghanistan. Assisting Afghanistan in capacity building and for skills and human resource development, and building Afghanistan’s own public institutions is a special area of priority for us.

The two sides also discussed the issue of terrorism, and the need to deal firmly with the safe havens for terrorist groups that continue to exist outside Afghanistan’s borders. My delegation was also assured that all necessary steps would be taken for the security of Indians in Afghanistan.

I will be calling on President Karzai. I called on the First Vice President Fahim and the Second Vice President Khalili and conveyed India’s long-term commitment to Afghanistan and to the people of this great country. I will also be meeting National Security Advisor Dr. Spanta and other high dignitaries.

I am happy to announce our decision to set up a Chair of Pushto and Dari Studies in Jawaharlal Nehru University in New Delhi. This will further strengthen the symbiotic relationship which our two countries enjoy.

I am also happy to announce that taking into account the prevailing drought situation in Afghanistan, India has committed to provide one hundred thousand tonnes of wheat for the government and people of Afghanistan.

The true strength of the relationship between India and Afghanistan is the love and friendship between the people of our two countries, and I am confident that these ties will only grow stronger with the passage of time.
164. Interaction of Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao with Visiting Afghan Journalists.

New Delhi, January 27, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Once again a very good morning to you. Foreign Secretary of India, Shrimati Nirupama Rao is here to meet you. I have mentioned to the Foreign Secretary that we are delighted and privileged to have such a distinguished group of journalists and friends from Afghanistan. Madam, 14 of our guests are women journalists and they have been here for the last about two weeks, with the Indian Institute of Mass Communications. Prof. K.N. Shrivastava, the Course Director is also here. May I invite you to kindly share some of thoughts on our relations with Afghanistan Foreign Secretary: Thank you Vishnu and Prof. Shrivastava.

Dear friends, I want to welcome you to the Ministry of External Affairs. I hope you are enjoying your visit to India. I am sure this must be in many ways a learning experience for you coming to this neighbour of your country. In fact we have had with Afghanistan and Afghanistan has had with India a very deep and enduring friendship. That is a friendship that cannot be disturbed or weakened by any external forces. It has endured through the centuries and it will continue to endure in the centuries to come.

This traditional framework, this traditional foundation of good relations has been further strengthened in recent years by the big assistance programmes that we have in Afghanistan and also our dialogue and our cooperation with your Government, with your political leaders and with your civil society that is ordinary Afghan citizens including professors, students, engineers, doctors, farmers and the ordinary men and women of Afghanistan. India has made some sacrifices also over the last few years as we have lost precious lives in Afghanistan to terrorism which is a problem that affects you, affects us, is affecting the region. So, we have a common interest and common concern to fight this threat, to resist it, and to overcome it. There again we share similar values and similar concerns.

In the field of women empowerment, I am so happy to see 14 out of 30 of this group are women. I am so happy to see that because the field of women empowerment is a special focus for India in its efforts in Afghanistan in terms of building capacity and promoting awareness, education and skill-building. I think that is an area that we have given great focus and importance to.

Afghanistan is a very important country from many angles. It is not only our neighbour but in terms of the region you are very well positioned because you are linked to Central Asia, you are linked to West Asia, you are linked to South Asia. So, you have a very unique position. Once peace returns to the country, you can become a hub, a connecting point for all these regions and in the field of energy. So, you will have the opportunity to build very good communication, transport linkages, energy pipelines, transit facilities. So I hope Afghanistan will be able to fulfill that potential also in the future.

But I wanted to say that we are committed in India, we are determined to help you to build a peaceful Afghanistan, a stable Afghanistan, a prosperous Afghanistan and a democratic Afghanistan which embraces pluralism and diversity because you have so many different ethnic groups in Afghanistan, so many different communities and all of you belong to one country just as in India we have diverse groups, different languages, many religions, all have come together to form one country. Similarly, I think Afghanistan is in a situation that is not so different in terms of diversity. And I am sure you could benefit from our experience in building that kind of pluralistic society and as a nation that builds unity out of diversity. So, I would urge you to look at that aspect also during your stay in India.

I wanted to say that one major initiative that we are planning to undertake is to help the development of Afghanistan's agricultural sector. This will involve 300 scholarships every year for the next five years to study in our universities in agriculture. This would be over and above the existing schemes that we have for your students to come for education and training here. The Afghan national institution building project, which is aiming at building Afghan capacities and institutions is also another programme that we are actively supporting.

I do not need to tell you about the other projects that we have done in Afghanistan, the infrastructure projects, the work in the health field, in education, in humanitarian assistance and human resource development. These are all areas where we have given a lot of emphasis in promoting assistance and development cooperation. Afghanistan is our development partner. We have a development partnership with Afghanistan. And it is through development that all communities can benefit and you can alleviate poverty and you can fight ignorance because ignorance becomes the breeding ground for violence, for terrorism, and for radicalism and extremism. So, we have to fight ignorance. And you can fight ignorance only through development and giving people the opportunity to widen their horizons and educate themselves and to build a better life for themselves in the process. So, I will stop here.

Afghan Media: Since there was an act of terrorism on Indian Embassy a couple of years ago, could you please describe what measures have been taken by the Indian Government to stop that kind of radicalism?
Foreign Secretary: I do not know if you were there at the Republic Day Parade yesterday. You know that the Major who died in Kabul last February got the Ashoka Chakra which is the highest bravery decoration in peace time that we give to anybody. So, that brought back memories of the attack in Kabul. We have taken measures to strengthen the security of our personnel, our Embassy and our projects, people working on projects. We are working with the Afghan Government to be vigilant, to safeguard against the possibility of such attacks happening in future. But terrorism is a problem that continues to affect your country and the region. So, these safe havens that exist for terrorists in the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan and in the vicinity of your country, they will need to be tackled and removed, and people who are engaging in these activities will have to be dealt with properly. So, this is a larger issue and I know that the ISAF troops and the foreign military presence in Afghanistan are also working in that direction. But as far as the security of our establishments is concerned, we are working with your Government, and we are doing whatever we can to protect our people. But there is a constant threat. It is not over.

Afghan Media: My other question is about the TAPI gas pipeline project which has been given coverage by almost all the media here in this region. Could you please give your views, as a Government official in India, about the importance of that? Like in Pakistan even from outside of Pakistan they say that the security of that project is very important. So, maybe they are not able to give security to that project. So, could you please explain the important of that project?

Foreign Secretary: The project is important because India is a growing economy, it has very large requirements in terms of energy. So, we would like to source energy from wherever we can because the requirements are so huge and they are going to be even more in the years to come because the economy is expanding very fast and we are a hydrocarbon importing country. People are focused on the need to develop renewable sources of energy, to develop alternative technologies for energy security, all that is fine, we are focused on that. But for years to come and in the short-term and medium-term we will have to depend a lot on imports of such resources. So, that is why we are discussing with energy-rich countries how we can augment our own supplies, our imports of these hydrocarbons from outside. Anyway, this pipeline that we are thinking of - and your country is involved and Pakistan and Turkmenistan are involved - is basically going to bring benefits also to these countries. It will help your economy, it will create jobs in your country as in other countries through which it transits. Of course, security is important. You will have to be sure about the security aspects, the pricing, the financial aspects. These are all in the process of being worked out. The pipeline has to be built. These are all important points that will have to get more and more attention as this project takes shape. But right now, yes there is this consensus among all these countries that we should work on this project which is a good thing. I think it will help to build more stakes in ensuring that there is peace in our region, that there is stability, because otherwise how can such projects move forward?

Afghan Media: Madam my question is regarding the scholarships on which Afghan students came to India for learning. Is there any Committee to see what are they doing? I mean months before we heard that… even some of them sent back from India for no reason. My second question regarding the Masters Degree programme of… there is much scholarships in the Masters Degree area. Would it be possible to increase these scholarships because we really need some professionals in Afghanistan?

Foreign Secretary: I just mentioned the issue of agriculture, how we are going start giving scholarships to focus on agriculture. Some of these will be at the Masters Degree level and the Ph.D. level. So, that answers your question about more professional training and experience building up through such training.

The largest number of foreign students in India today receiving assistance from the Indian Government in terms of scholarships is the Afghan community of students. There may be two or three cases where people have had to be sent back. Because they indulged in activities that were incompatible with their status as students, we had to send them back. But otherwise, the large proportion of these students are studying here without any problem. My colleague Mr. Sinha handles this on a day-to-day basis. He knows the situation very well. As a journalist you should please represent the truth on this. It is wrong to say that students are being sent back and they are not happy here which is not the case at all. Just two or three students going back should not lead you to conclude that the entire community of students of Afghan origin in India, are having problems. That is not the case. So, please represent it properly.

Afghan Media: Other countries just think that terrorism is not in Afghanistan it is a problem in Pakistan. Do you think the same?

Foreign Secretary: Yes, I certainly think so. I think the Pakistan Government also is aware of this because every other day there is an attack in Pakistan, there is some terror attack, people are getting killed. You saw what happened in Lahore the other day. The word epicenter is used very freely - there are so many groups operating there, so many radical, extreme elements. So, it is a big problem for Pakistani society today. They will have to root out this evil definitely. And that will help all of us, it will help Afghanistan, it will help India, it will help Pakistan.

When we had the Mumbai attack, the attackers, the people who were involved, came by boat. They came from Pakistan, they landed in Mumbai on the coast and then they came into the city. That is the evidence that we have. We found the boat, we found the dead body of the boatman, we found that these people had abandoned the boat at the entrance to Mumbai harbor and then come into the city. That lone surviving gunman Kasab is from Pakistan. So, there is a lot of proof that confirms our suspicions and our misgivings on this score.

Afghan Media: Do you think that Pakistan supports terrorism? If not, who supports terrorism?

Foreign Secretary: There are elements definitely in Pakistan that have just decided that terrorism is the means to further Pakistan's interests. I am not saying everybody in Pakistan is like that. I have no doubt that the people of Pakistan want peace and they want stability. But there are groups in Pakistan definitely who are saying violence is the best way to do these things, we have to attack, we have to terrorize. That is the problem. In the past and perhaps even now, within the Pakistani state not enough has been done to control this. And that is in danger of consuming the country today. It is like a Frankenstein.

Afghan Media: What is the specific role of Indian Government to remove terrorism along with the Afghanistan Government?

Foreign Secretary: As I said, we are working. The security agencies work with each other. We share information. We share intelligence. Similarly we work with other democracies. We have counter-terrorism dialogue with the USA, with France, with UK, with China, with some of the Central Asian countries, with Russia. All these countries have to cooperate together. How do we deal with terrorism? We have to defeat the terrorists by being very systematic and very serious in collecting the information that is needed to counter the plans and programmes of these terrorists, then to improve our technology to deal with terrorism, the kind of technological input that we need in terms of the equipment, in terms of examination of evidence, in terms of the security barriers and checks that we need to put in place, and training people. We need to train personnel, security people. We need to train ordinary citizens also to be vigilant about these things, to report if they see anything that is suspicious. So, ultimately everybody is involved in this to fight this. Each and every one of us has to think that we are soldiers in this struggle. So, this is the way to deal with it.

167. Statement by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh prior to his departure for Afghanistan.

New Delhi, May 11, 2011.

I will be leaving on an official visit to Afghanistan at the invitation of His Excellency President Hamid Karzai.

My visit to Afghanistan is in keeping with the healthy tradition of regular high level exchanges between our two countries. President Hamid Karzai was in India in February 2011.

India and Afghanistan enjoy a deep and abiding relationship that goes back in time and history. We are people of the same region. We cannot remain unaffected by developments in Afghanistan. We take a long-term view of our partnership with Afghanistan.

If our region has to prosper and move ahead, Afghanistan must succeed in rebuilding itself. Its people have suffered far too long. India's commitment to assisting the people of Afghanistan is enduring and has weathered many storms. Since my last visit to Afghanistan in 2005, our cooperation has expanded significantly. Today, our development assistance commitment to Afghanistan is about US $ 1.5 billion. What is heartening is the support it enjoys among the Afghan people.

I look forward to wide ranging discussions with President Hamid Karzai and the Afghan leadership on ways to advance our partnership to a new level in the coming years. We will also exchange views on developments in the region and our common fight against the scourge of terrorism. The quest of the Afghan people for peace, stability and reconciliation needs the full support of all countries in the region and the international community.

Kabul, May 12, 2011

Your Excellency President Hamid Karzai,

Distinguished Ministers,

Distinguished guests,

Thank you for your warm words of welcome and most generous hospitality. This is indeed in the best traditions of Afghanistan, and I feel extremely privileged to experience this hospitality first hand today. Thank you, Mr. President, for hosting me and my delegation to this extraordinary banquet.

I am delighted to be here in Afghanistan. This is an ancient land steeped in history and culture. When I see the love, affection and friendship in the eyes of the many faces around me, I know that I am visiting not just a neighbour but a very special friend. The presence of such a large number of prominent Afghan personalities here is enriching and humbling.

The bonds between India and Afghanistan have been forged over centuries. They have tied us together in traditions and faiths. Afghan fruits and dry fruits are treasured delicacies in India.

I have come here with a message of solidarity, friendship and goodwill from the people of India to the people of Afghanistan. India is your neighbour and partner in development. You can count on us as you build your society, economy and polity.

Afghanistan has endured great suffering and violence. The time has come to put an end to this violence. Afghanistan should be allowed to rebuild itself, in the way its people want it to. Afghanistan deserves to occupy its rightful place in the global community.

We wish to see a peaceful, stable, democratic and pluralistic Afghanistan, that is in harmony with the culture, genius and temperament of its people. We strongly support the Afghan people's quest for peace and reconciliation. India supports the unity, integrity and prosperity of Afghanistan.

Afghanistan has made significant strides under President Karzai. He is a great patriot who has led his country without fear or favour. His friendship towards India has won the hearts and minds of Indians, and made a strong partnership between India and Afghanistan a living reality.

The journey ahead for both India and Afghanistan to fulfil the aspirations of our peoples is a long one. There will be obstacles, but if we stand together we will achieve our goals. We will prevail, we will win.

We should have a long term vision of our relations and act accordingly. We should be ambitious in shaping our future ourselves. We should harness the goodwill that exists between our people and encourage much greater exchanges at all levels both within and outside government.

Your Excellency,

I once again thank you for such a special welcome. This will remain forever etched in my memory.

In conclusion, allow me to wish the people of Afghanistan peace, prosperity and happiness.

171. Address by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh to the Joint Session of the Afghan Parliament.
Kabul, May 13, 2011.

I am overwhelmed by the honour given to me today to address the joint session of the Parliament of Afghanistan.

I am conscious that this is a rare honour given to a foreign leader. I am humbled by this gesture of love and affection for India.

You, the Honourable Members of the Wolesi Jirga and the Meshrano Jirga, represent the magnificent diversity, hopes and aspirations of this great and ancient land.

I bring to you the greetings and good wishes of the people of India.

Honourable Members,

Afghanistan is a country richly endowed in culture, heritage, architecture and natural resources.

Afghanistan has been a centre of civilization. It has given to the region and the world the richness of Dari and Pashto literature, the Sufi traditions of the Chistis, the legacy of the Buddha and Buddhist art in Bamiyan, the Gandhara School of art and much more.

Afghanistan has been the junction between South and Central Asia and a gateway to India.

Our ties of history and culture go back many millennia.

The founder of the Mughal Empire Emperor Babar lies interred here in his favourite garden in Kabul.

In his brilliant reign of five years, Sher Shah Suri built the Grand Trunk Road from Kabul to Delhi. This facilitated the traditional exchange of religious ideas, the carriage of goods, travellers, kings and commoners. Kagazi badams and Kandahari anars are well known delicacies in India.

Bacha Khan, who was known as the Frontier Gandhi because of his friendship with Mahatma Gandhi, was laid to rest in Jalalabad according to his wishes.

Our forefathers have bequeathed to us a rich heritage of social, cultural and political ties. These civilisational connections have tied together our traditions and faiths and our terrain and temperament.

As leaders and representatives, we have the sacred duty to strengthen and enrich these bonds forged by our people over centuries.

I have come to Afghanistan to renew these ties of friendship, solidarity and fraternity. This is the only agenda that I have come with. This is the only agenda that the people of India have in Afghanistan.

Honourable Members,

Afghanistan has undergone great trials and tribulations. But we know that the Afghan people are proud, brave and fiercely independent. We know that they are strong and resilient in the face of adversity. These are qualities widely admired in India.

In the ten years since it decided to turn its back on the past and face the future, Afghanistan has made significant progress in many areas. There are undoubtedly many challenges ahead. The process of nation building is long and full of hurdles. National reconstruction needs sustained hard work and sacrifice and is a process of learning.

Our two countries face similar development challenges. India is ready to partner the Afghan people as they rebuild their country in accordance with their own priorities and national circumstances.
Many of Afghanistan's priorities are also our priorities. Many of your problems are also our problems.

We fully support the vision of a secure, prosperous and democratic future for Afghanistan outlined in the National Priority Programmes initiated by the government of Afghanistan.

Our experience of policy implementation in India has been that participative democracy is a vital agent of social and economic empowerment at the grassroots. It has brought in more transparent and accountable governance. The Afghan parliament already has reservation for women. We have found that similar reservation in local bodies in India is creating a new dynamic of development with a human face.

School enrolment in your country has increased from 1 million to 7 million since 2002 and enrolment of girls has doubled over the past four years.

I know that it is your topmost priority to put every child in school and keep him or her there. In India the mid-day meal scheme has been very successful in our schools. We have been supplying fortified biscuits to Afghan school children for the last few years.

But what we teach our children is equally important. In India we have recently overhauled the school curriculum. What children learn in school should be related to their lives outside it. They should imbibe a sense of nationhood and values of tolerance and respect for others. They should be taught about the importance of the environment. Education should stimulate and open their minds to creative thought and imagination. The hopes and dreams of our nations rest on the little shoulders of our children. So we need to teach them well.

I know that Afghanistan has made strides in providing health care to its people over the past decade. We would be happy to strengthen the Indira Gandhi Institute of Child Health and the work of our medical missions in different provinces.

Building infrastructure is another challenge. We have tried to provide such assistance as we could to provide electricity and roads in Afghanistan.

I am happy that the transmission line built from Pul-e-Khumri is now bringing a steady supply of electricity to the capital.

I am happy that the sacrifices made in building the Zaranj - Delaram highway have not gone in vain. The population of Zaranj has increased. Trade is thriving and customs revenues have grown.

Honourable Members,

The people of India feel privileged to see their development cooperation receive such a warm welcome in Afghanistan. Nothing would give us greater satisfaction than to see Indian resources being utilized for more roads, more electricity, more schools, more hospitals or more community projects - activities that directly benefit the common Afghan people.

We will increase development outlays towards capacity building and skill development. This will include more scholarships for Afghan students for studying in India, institution building efforts, social development and higher investment in the health sector by way of a medical package. We will provide buses for Kabul and other municipalities.

We propose to upgrade the agricultural department at the Kabul University to an agricultural university, donate tractors to farmers and give scholarships for the study of agricultural sciences.

We will significantly enhance our commitment for the Small Development Projects Scheme across provinces to further facilitate development at the grassroots with the involvement of local communities.

We will help in the preservation and revival of Afghanistan's archeological and cultural heritage and restoration of the historic Stor Palace in Kabul.

The total outlay on these and other additional initiatives that we will take in consultation with the government of Afghanistan in the next few years will amount to 500 million US dollars. This will take our total commitment of assistance to around 2 billion US dollars.

Honourable Members,

Our ambitions and aspirations for growth and prosperity cannot be realized unless there is peace and tranquility that will allow our people to live and work in honour and dignity.

I pay tribute to all those innocent men, women and children who have lost their lives in the search for a better tomorrow. The people of India feel and share the pain and suffering of their Afghan brothers and sisters.

Terrorism and extremism are alien ideas to our people. They bring only death and destruction in their wake. They provide no answers to the problems of poverty, illiteracy, hunger and disease. They have no place in a civilized society. Eventually, our centuries old traditions of peaceful co-existence, of living in peace and harmony with each other and with nature will prevail over these deviant ideologies. We cannot and must not allow the flames of extremism and terrorism to be fanned once again.

Afghanistan has embarked upon a process of national reconciliation. We wish you well in this enterprise. It is up to you, as the peoples' representatives, to make decisions about your country's future without outside interference or coercion. This is your sovereign right. India will respect the choices you make and the decisions you take.

Our only interest is to see a stable, peaceful and independent Afghanistan living in peace with its neighbours.

We hope that Afghanistan will be able to build a framework of regional cooperation that will help its nation building efforts.

As Afghanistan moves towards assuming full responsibility for its security, we stand ready to widen our cooperation in this area.

Honourable Members,

The people of this region have lived together for centuries. This is our region and we have to survive together and flourish together.

While the international community can help, ultimately it is the people of the region who must take charge of their own future.

We have to learn to solve our problems ourselves. This is the lesson of history.

Honourable Members,

Afghanistan’s entry into the South Asian Association of Regional Cooperation was a historic step. We must invest and work together for our common future. The countries of South Asia have been most prosperous and stable when they have been well connected to each other and the world. Geography and history make it imperative that we cooperate to realize our common destiny.

If we are to build a common regional identity, we need to learn more about each other. I have often said that we know more about the countries of the West than we do about each other. That is why it is very important to multiply our people to people contacts.

Honourable Members,

Yesterday, President Karzai and I have agreed on a Declaration of Strategic Partnership.

We have agreed to reinvigorate our relationship in all sectors on the basis of mutual respect and mutual equality.

This will be a long term partnership. Its main pillars will be greater political interaction, a comprehensive economic partnership, a trade development strategy, a social development strategy, an agricultural outreach strategy, a cultural development strategy, and a civil society strategy. A Partnership Council will be set up under the two Foreign Ministers.

I would especially like to underline the decision to enhance people to people exchanges, including between intellectuals, youth, women and the media. Parliamentary exchanges are extremely useful and helpful. I would suggest for your consideration the formation of an India-Afghanistan Parliamentary Friendship Forum.

We will revitalize links between our business and trading communities so that Afghanistan's economy can fully benefit from India's economic growth.

Honourable Members,

I am happy that the people of Afghanistan are emerging from the ravages of war and rebuilding the country as a peaceful home for the confluence of cultures, for commerce and development and where the countries of the region cooperate rather than compete with each other.

As an abiding friend, India will always stand by you in this noble task. We have always stood by our Afghan friends and I want to reaffirm that we will do so in future as well.

I once again thank you for giving me this great honour of sharing some of my thoughts with you.

I am deeply grateful to President Karzai for his personal friendship, and thank the people and Government of Afghanistan for the warm hospitality extended to me during my stay in this beautiful country.

Long live India-Afghanistan friendship

173. Press Release issued by Ministry of Defence on the talks between the Indian and Afghan Defence Delegations.

New Delhi, June 1, 2011.

India is committed to building the capabilities of the Afghan Security Forces. This was conveyed by the Defence Minister Shri AK Antony to General Abdul Rahim Wardak, Minister of National Defence of Afghanistan, here today.

During the hour-long delegation level talks, Shri Antony said that as a longstanding friend of the Afghan people, India remains fully committed to supporting Afghanistan in its reconstruction and development efforts. He conveyed the Government of India's willingness to work with the Afghan government in building the capabilities of the Afghan Security Forces in accordance with the priorities of the Afghan government. Both sides noted that terrorism continues to pose a threat to all countries in the region and noted the need to ensure cessation of support to such organizations in the interest of peace and development.

Shri Antony said that India attaches high importance to bilateral relations with Afghanistan, as is evidenced in the multifaceted relationship between the two governments. General Wardak, who is accompanied by a seven-member Afghan delegation, conveyed the appreciation of the people and the government of Afghanistan for the friendship and support of the Indian government and people.

The Afghan Defence Minister, who is on a three-day visit to India at the invitation of Shri Antony, earlier laid wreath at the Amar Jawan Jyoti and was presented a Tri-Services Guard of Honour.

There have been periodic exchanges between the Armed Forces of the two countries since General Wardak last visited India in April, 2008. The Afghan Chief of General Staff, General Sher Mohammad Karimi visited India in October last year. The visit of Afghan Defence Minister to India marks another step in the steady progress in bilateral relations, particularly as his visit comes soon after the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh's visit to Afghanistan earlier this month.

New Delhi, September 20, 2011.

"I am shocked to receive news of the assassination of Chairman of the High Peace Council and former President of Afghanistan Professor Burhanudin Rabbani, earlier today.

I fondly recall my meetings with him in Kabul and again in New Delhi last July, when he had shared his vision of a harmonious and prosperous Afghanistan. Tragically, the forces of terror and hatred have silenced yet another powerful voice of reason and peace in Afghanistan. We unreservedly condemn this act of great brutality.

I offer my deepest condolences to and solidarity with the members of the family of Prof. Rabbani and the people of Afghanistan. I would also like to reiterate the steadfast support of the people and government of India in Afghanistan's quest for peace and efforts to strengthen the roots of democracy".

 Burhanuddin Rabbani, former President of Afghanistan and Chairman of the High Peace Council - leading the year-old Afghan effort to negotiate with the Taliban - was killed in a bomb blast at his residence in the centre of Kabul's high-security diplomatic district. The blast reportedly took place when he was meeting two members of the Taliban as part of the ongoing efforts at reconciliation.

181. Intervention by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the meeting on new Silk Road in Afghanistan.

New York, September 22, 2011.

His Excellency, Mr. Zalmai Rassoul, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Islamic Republic of Afghanistan,

His Excellency, Mr. Guido Westerwelle, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Federal Republic of Germany,

Her Excellency Mrs. Hilary Clinton, Secretary of State of United States of America,

And Fellow Ministers,

At the outset, on behalf of the Government and people of India, I would like to convey my deepest condolences on the tragic demise of Prof. Burhanuddin Rabbani, Chairman of the High Peace Council and former President of Afghanistan in a dastardly act of terrorism which we strongly condemn.

It was not so long ago, about two months back, in the month of July, that I had an opportunity to receive Prof. Rabbani in Delhi and exchange views with him on his mission to bring about peace and reconciliation in Afghanistan.

We welcome the initiative of the international community to support and assist Afghanistan in building a self-reliant and sustainable economy, at a time when the country seeks to take control of its own destiny. With the onset of the drawdown of foreign security forces and the transition process, it is all the more important for the international community, especially the regional countries, to remain committed in this crucial phase, when Afghan national institutions are still being developed and consolidated.

It is also important that Afghanistan's growth strategy is built upon the country's comparative advantage of abundant natural resources and its strategic geographical location. These would have to be the building blocks of our vision for Afghanistan as a hub linking Central and South Asia through pipelines, trade and transit routes for the common good of the people of our region and the world. In our opinion, the New Silk Road initiative is an important step in that direction and will receive our support.

We are already undertaking reconstruction and development activities in Afghanistan, with our total bilateral assistance commitment reaching US $ 2 billion approximately. India has taken up projects in all parts of Afghanistan and in a wide range of sectors, which have been identified by the Afghan Government as priority areas.
We have laid special emphasis on capacity building and human resource development, which in our opinion would form the basis for a robust and self-reliant economy. Indian companies have presented bid for the development of the Hajigak iron ore reserves to the Afghan Government and India is participating in the TAPI (Turkmenistan, Afghanistan, Pakistan and India) gas pipeline project. These are projects which would call for large investments and express our resolve to cooperate with Afghanistan on plans involving regional integration for the mutual benefit of all stakeholders. SAARC, of which Afghanistan is a full member, is an important vehicle for regional economic cooperation within the South Asian region. We have always considered Afghanistan as a South Asian country with natural complementarities and synergies with other countries of South Asia and one which is uniquely placed to build bridges even beyond it. India's rapidly growing economy and its large market make it a natural destination for Afghan exports. Similarly, India can be a cost effective and efficient source for Afghan imports. In this regard, we welcome the operationalization of APTAA (Afghanistan Pakistan Trade and Transit Agreement). This could serve as a start for trade and transit through the land route for other countries including India.

Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh had succinctly articulated his vision for the region much before the idea of a New Silk Road initiative. I conclude by reiterating what he so eloquently stated: "I dream of a day, while retaining our respective identities, one can have breakfast in Amritsar, lunch in Lahore, and dinner in Kabul. That is how my forefathers lived. That is how I want our grandchildren to live." The time has come for all of us to start the process of building a better future for the generations to come.

Thank you

183. Statement to the media by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh during visit of President Karzai.

New Delhi, October 04, 2011.

His Excellency Mr. Hamid Karzai, President of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan, Distinguished members of the media

I am delighted to welcome His Excellency the President of Afghanistan, Mr. Hamid Karzai to India.

President Karzai’s visit takes place soon after my own visit to Afghanistan in May. This reflects the tradition of regular high level exchanges that so happily exists between our two countries.

My discussions today with President Karzai have once again underlined the importance of a strong and broad based partnership between India and Afghanistan.

Our cooperation with Afghanistan is an open book. We have civilizational links, and we are both here to stay. We have to live and work together in times both good and bad.

Based on intensive consultations and deliberations, we have finalized an Agreement on a Strategic Partnership between India and Afghanistan which the President and I have signed today. The Agreement creates an institutional framework for our future cooperation in the fields of political and security cooperation, trade and economic cooperation, capacity building and education, and social, cultural, civil society and people-to-people relations.

We have also concluded two Memoranda of Understanding for cooperation in Mining and Hydrocarbons. These will add a new dimension to our economic relations.

We both agree that Afghanistan’s economic integration with the Indian economy and South Asia as a whole is in the national interest of the people of Afghanistan, and one of the ways to achieve this is to promote closer trade, investment and transit links.

I reiterated to the President that India stands by the people of Afghanistan in their journey towards capacity building, reconstruction, development and peace. We will do all that is within our means to help Afghanistan.

We had detailed and frank discussions on the issue of terrorism. This threatens our entire region, and no country can remain immune to its lethal effects.
I conveyed my sympathy and condolences to the Government and people of Afghanistan on the acts of terrorism that have taken place in Afghanistan recently, particularly the tragic assassination of Professor Burhanuddin Rabbani. Professor Rabbani was our guest in India in July and we were greatly encouraged by his vision. His brutal assassination should serve as an occasion for all of us to strengthen our resolve to jointly confront the menace of terrorism that threatens to undermine the security and stability of our region.

The people of Afghanistan have suffered enough. They deserve to live in peace and decide their future themselves, without outside interference, coercion and intimidation.

It is in this context that India will participate in the forthcoming conferences in Istanbul and Bonn to contribute to international and regional initiatives to support Afghanistan’s efforts at nation building. The greatest need today is for the Afghan people to have peace and stability. All countries of the region must work to facilitate this.

India will stand by the people of Afghanistan as they prepare to assume the responsibility for their governance and security after the withdrawal of international forces in 2014.

I pay tribute to the sagacious leadership of President Karzai in seeking solutions that are inclusive and led by the Afghan people themselves. He has shown great courage in very difficult circumstances.

I look forward to working with President Karzai and his Government in the period ahead to further advance our relations across a wide spectrum.

Thank you.

In a development of considerable importance for regional security, the all embracing Strategic Agreement that the two countries signed takes care of all round relationship between the two countries. It specifically provides for the training of Afghan security forces by India, to enable the Afghan security forces to gear up to deal with the situation arising from the withdrawal of the NATO forces by 2014. The proposal has been on the drawing board for quite some time but it matured now when Kabul felt its need. The significance of the Agreement was further underlined by the fact of it being signed at the highest level by Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and President Karzai. Another major initiative that the Agreement underlines is that the two countries would cooperate more closely at the United Nations and other international fora to achieve policy synergies. In addition to dealing with political and security cooperation aspects, the Agreement spells out trade and economic cooperation in much greater detail, covering aspects ranging from assisting Afghanistan in developing trading routes to exploring for hydrocarbons and mineral ores the country is abundantly endowed with. The Agreement also aims to create a favourable trading and investment environment by simplifying customs and other procedures, starting air cargo operations and improving credit and insurance facilities. Both Dr. Manmohan Singh and Mr. Karzai made it clear, that the Agreement would not be directed against any state or a group of states. It only seeks "to creates an institutional framework for … future cooperation in the fields of political and security, trade and economic cooperation, capacity building and education, and social, cultural, civil society and people-to-people relations."

Your Excellency President Hamid Karzai,
President ORF Ambassador Rasgotra,
Distinguished Members of the Afghan delegation,
Ladies and Gentlemen,

It is a distinct pleasure for me to address you on the occasion of the third R.K. Mishra Memorial Lecture.

I would like to convey my profound appreciation to His Excellency President Hamid Karzai for his gracious presence today and for delivering the R.K.Mishra Memorial Lecture. We have greatly benefited from President Karzai's insights and his vision of India Afghanistan relations.

Mr. President, we are humbled by your affection for India and her people. Your appraisal of the constructive role played by India in reconstruction and development of Afghanistan is gratifying. It is our privilege to be Afghanistan's partner in her nation building efforts.

I also thank Your Excellency for your farsighted and forthright views on ushering in a new era of peace in Afghanistan and the region.

At the outset, I would like to once again convey our deepest condolences on the brutal assassinations of Mr. Ahmed Wali Karzai and Prof. Rabbani. We have condemned these dastardly acts in no uncertain terms and reiterated that we stand solidly by the side of our Afghan brothers and sisters.

Excellency, Ladies and Gentlemen,

India and Afghanistan share a civilizational relationship interwoven by cultural, social and people-to-people contacts. This bond has not only endured but strengthened over the centuries.

India's goodwill and friendship for Afghanistan, as well as, confidence in its leadership, was eloquently articulated by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh, during his address to the Parliament of Afghanistan earlier this May. He observed, "Many of Afghanistan's priorities are also our priorities. Many of your problems are also our problems. We fully support the vision of a secure, prosperous and democratic future for Afghanistan", outlined by the government of Afghanistan.
This confidence and commitment, has been fully reflected in the, landmark bilateral Agreement on Strategic Partnership, concluded yesterday, between our two countries.

We are clear in our minds that it is for the people and government of Afghanistan to take decisions about the future of their great nation, without any outside prescription. We as always, would be happy to be guided by your choices and decisions.

Excellency, Ladies and Gentlemen,

Afghanistan is at a crucial phase in its history. Quite apart from being a victim of terrorism and targeted assassinations, it also bracing for drawdown of NATO forces by end-2014. The twin challenge therefore is of strengthening national security institutions, in tandem with, stepping up the pace of socio-economic development.

Our efforts are aimed precisely towards such an outcome. During our Prime Minister's visit to Afghanistan in May 2011, India announced an additional assistance of US $ 500 million for capacity building and Human Resource Development. We are working closely with our Afghan friends for early implementation of this commitment.

Despite persistent attacks on Indian interests, engineered by forces inimical to India Afghan friendship, we remain steadfast in our commitment to assist the valiant people of Afghanistan in their endeavour to build a peaceful, democratic and pluralistic Afghanistan, as well as, to enhance socio-economic ties with its neighbourhood. Afghanistan's entry into the South Asian Association of Regional Cooperation - SAARC - in 2005 was a key step in enhancing regional synergies.

We see Afghanistan as an economic hub connecting Central and South Asia through a network of trade and transit links, and pipelines. The Memoranda of Understanding on cooperation between India and Afghanistan signed yesterday, in the fields of development of Hydrocarbons and mineral resources, will be conducive to such an outcome.

And that was the principal factor for my participation in the New Silk Road Ministerial Meeting held last month in New York, to underline India's support, for this very constructive initiative towards positioning Afghanistan as an economic hub in the region. India will also actively participate in the forthcoming international conferences on Afghanistan in Istanbul and Bonn.

At the same time, it is essential that global efforts be renewed with greater vigour, to suitably strengthen the capacity of Afghanistan's own institutions, including its National Security Forces, to enhance peace and stability in the country. A prerequisite for this, is to liquidate the terror sanctuaries and safe havens that exist beyond Afghanistan's borders. It has to be understood by each and every nation, that a democratic Afghanistan, a stable Afghanistan and an economically developed Afghanistan would also enhance regional peace and prosperity.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

In conclusion, I would like to once again, profusely thank President Karzai for so eloquently delivering the third R K Mishra Memorial Lecture today. I am also appreciative of the Observer Research Foundation for inviting me to present my thoughts. It is indeed a great honour.

Istanbul, November 2, 2011.

Excellency President Gul of Turkey,
Excellency President Karzai of Afghanistan, Distinguished Foreign Ministers,
Ladies and Gentlemen,

It is a great honour for me today to represent India at the ‘Istanbul Conference on Afghanistan: Security and Cooperation in the Heart of Asia’.

India has age-old historical, cultural, civilizational and economic ties with neighbouring Afghanistan. Our relationship has, since 2001, been renewed and consolidated by our contribution to the rebuilding and reconstruction of Afghanistan; to helping this neighbor build a modern and sustainable economy and the strong administrative capacities necessary for a self-reliant nation.

India supports the aims and objectives of this Conference: - to bring regional countries together on an inclusive platform to address the common challenges facing the region, and working towards cooperative confidence-building measures and solutions. I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Government of Turkey for its timely initiative in convening this Conference of all of Afghanistan’s extended neighbours and its international supporters, and facilitating this regional process.

Excellencies,

In the decade since 2001 when the international community took up the stabilization and development of Afghanistan, the role that regional countries could play in bringing stability to Afghanistan has not been given adequate importance.

Today as NATO-ISAF prepares to drawdown its combat role in Afghanistan by the end of 2014, it is evident that Afghanistan’s regional neighbours and friends can work with the wider international community to provide Afghanistan a helping hand to assist it in the transition and beyond. Afghanistan needs our assistance to build its capacity to tackle the critical challenges of terrorism including suicide terrorism, the religious extremism that fuels it, and the drug trafficking that sustains it.

Excellencies,

Allow me to set out India’s perspective on security and cooperation in the Heart of Asia with Afghanistan at its centre:
First, India believes in a strong, independent, sovereign, stable, united, democratic and prosperous Afghanistan at peace with itself and its neighbours. Reconciliation on the basis of the Constitution of Afghanistan should be an Afghan-led, Afghan-owned and Afghan-driven process.

Second, recent history has shown that an end to Afghanistan’s suffering requires an end to external interference in its internal affairs. This Conference is addressing issues including safe havens and sanctuaries beyond Afghanistan’s borders.

Third, critical requirements for Afghanistan are security, good governance and development. It is for this reason that as a developing neighbour itself, India has pledged up to 2 billion US Dollars in development and humanitarian assistance, and recently signed a comprehensive Strategic Partnership Agreement with Afghanistan looking at 2014 and beyond.

Fourth, our partnership does not look at Afghanistan and the region in ‘competitive’ terms; it is based on a vision of regional economic cooperation spanning all the countries in the vast theatre radiating out from the Heart of Asia. This cooperation would be founded on trade and transit routes, railways and highways, energy pipelines and electricity networks, economic projects and cross-investments. This cooperation would not be only between governments, but have civil society and business as stakeholders.

Excellencies,

The idea of linking South and Central Asia recalls the historical roots of regional trade routes. Today our investments in Afghanistan require a framework of regional collaboration for their success.

From our vantage point in the SAARC region, we would like to highlight the potential of the dynamic SAARC market of over 1.5 billion, and the Indian economy of over US $1.5 trillion growing at a rate of 8% per annum. Cooperation linking our region with Central Asia through Afghanistan could be a critical confidence building measure.

Excellencies,

In our deliberations we need to work simultaneously on economic cooperation along with political, security and other confidence building measures that could ensure peace and stability for Afghanistan and through it for the entire region. Our vision for this period of transition must take account of the conditions on the ground and the capacity of Afghanistan’s security forces to preserve the independence and the integrity of their nation. We also need to overcome the deficit in trust through regional cooperation, linked to a larger vision of how our region relates to the world.
Excellencies,

So far, the attempts to grapple with these challenges have been made in an ad hoc and piece-meal manner, in exclusive groups of three, four or more, more often than not with different foci, and competing interests.

Our Conference today and its follow up is an opportunity to bring all the countries of the region together, along with international supporters to address the common problems, referred to earlier. It is our hope that the final document that we will be adopting today, will reflect this vision. We need a road map that follows up our conclusions with processes to address the common challenges facing the region and build trust and confidence in addressing them. We in India look forward to working with you in this great endeavor.

Thank you.

188. Address by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at International Afghanistan Conference.

Bonn, December 5, 2011.

Your Excellency President Karzai,

Your Excellencies the Foreign Ministers of Afghanistan and Germany,

Excellencies ladies and gentlemen,

We are getting together in Bonn once again after 10 years for another historic and fateful moment in Afghanistan's recent history, a moment of hope as well as anxiety. What we decide here today, will decide the fate of Afghanistan and the region, and probably beyond, for at least another generation. Therefore, we must decide well and wisely.

Over the last 30 odd years, Afghanistan has seen domestic political struggles, destabilizing foreign intervention of various kinds, internal conflict and civil war, repressive fundamentalist rule, and foreign interference in Afghanistan's internal affairs on a large scale. These left the Afghan state and society devastated, and Afghanistan itself a staging ground for regional and international terrorism.

The task before Afghanistan and the international community since the end of 2001 therefore, has been to reverse that fate and set Afghanistan firmly on the road to recovery, reconstruction, security, development and prosperity.
Much has been achieved since then: a new democratic Constitution adopted, Presidential and Parliamentary elections held twice around, new institutional foundations laid, schools, health centres and roads built, school enrolment up, girls educated, health services brought to people, infant mortality reduced, women restored to public life, and large numbers of refugees and expatriates returned to rebuild a new Afghanistan of their hopes. The physical and socio-economic security provided by international forces and international assistance program has been a sine qua non for these dramatic improvements.

But much remains to be done, and there have been reverses in the security situation on the ground and in public faith in the future of Afghanistan. Ten years is too short a time to rebuild a country even with the best will and efficiency in the world. The international community needs to stay engaged in Afghanistan for the long term, for both its security and development.

Let us not forget why the international community came to Afghanistan. It came because Afghanistan, under the control of an extremist ideology and under the influence of foreign countries, had become a sanctuary for International terror. Terrorism radiated outwards to the region, affecting firstly India, and then other countries. It culminated in the September 11, 2001 terror attacks. The international community then decided that this would not stand, that this bastion of extremism and terrorism was a threat to mankind and had to be replaced.

Today, we have to ask ourselves, if that job is done, whether we have succeeded in eliminating terrorism, and the safe havens and sanctuaries from where it is emanating, right from its source. We have to ask whether, if we withdraw our holding hand, Afghanistan will be able to withstand the forces of (radicalism), extremism and violence, and stand on its own feet. The answer to that question should decide the nature and level of our long-term engagement with Afghanistan.

Fortunately, this extraordinarily well attended Bonn Conference, for which we congratulate the Government of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan and thank Germany, is an expression of the international community’s determination, that even as it reduces its footprint in Afghanistan, it does not abandon Afghanistan as it did in the 1990’s. It marks a political commitment to stay engaged with Afghanistan well into the future.

The strategic partnership agreement that Afghanistan has signed with India, and will in due course sign with the US, EU, France, the UK, Australia (etc) is an encouraging pointer in this direction.

But political commitment and conference decisions alone are not enough. We need to back up our commitments with both resources and actions. We need to avert the possibility that Afghanistan is let down or made to feel abandoned by a withdrawal of assistance, at least in terms of quantity if not quality, of international assistance required, in the era after 2014.

There is a real danger that as international forces withdraw from a combat role and in numbers, there will be a transition ‘recession’; i.e. that attention and aid will decline, just as the Afghan government’s security demands increase. We should not make the mistakes of the past and let Afghanistan slip back. We must ensure that Afghanistan's security is ensured through non-interference in its internal affairs. It also needs support for economic development. The World Bank study on the looming recession and the fiscal gap that needs to be bridged during this period of transition is a timely warning of the danger of leaving the country to its own devices. We hope that the upcoming conferences in 2012, the Chicago conference in May (on security), the Kabul conference in June (on regional cooperation) and the Tokyo conference in July (on development), will ensure the continued engagement of the international community in Afghanistan's growth.

Afghanistan today faces at least four deficits: a security deficit, a governance deficit, a development deficit, and an investment deficit. All four of these deficits Afghanistan's will require enormous assistance for a long time if it is to address these four deficits adequately.

To address these deficits, Afghanistan needs time, development assistance, preferential access to world markets, foreign investment and a clear end-state and strategy to make sure that it does not once again plunge into lawlessness, civil war, and externally sponsored extremism and terrorism. Conceptually there is need for something like a 'Marshall Plan' for Afghanistan, involving all the major stakeholders. Afghanistan is not like any other country. It is a Least Developed Country that has suffered three decades of conflict and devastation resulting in the decimation of virtually a generation of not only its citizens and its institutions and infrastructure. It continues to face a potent threat to its security from terrorism and insurgency being fuelled from outside its borders. The international community must ensure that as it reduces its military commitment to Afghanistan, it increases rather than decreases its economic commitment to the security and rebuilding of Afghanistan so that it does not once again slide back to the dark ages of the 1990s.

Of course, such assistance has also to take into account hard global realities of public fatigue and economic and financial crisis in most troop contributing countries, and Afghan responsibilities. It cannot be open-ended. But it also cannot be avoided. In the long run, Afghanistan clearly has to move away from international dependence and take responsibility for its own development. Afghanistan has the natural and human resources to sustain a future of economic growth. Issues of corruption, investment climate, development of its own resources, rule of law and governance have to be addressed. There have to be "credible mutual commitments", but we should be aware that Afghanistan is not yet an equal partner, and may need help even in fulfilling its own commitments.

In speaking for an international commitment to Afghanistan's security and economic growth we are clear that long-term international assistance to Afghanistan is not offered an expression of our collective munificence. It stems from our shared recognition that instability and radicalism in Afghanistan poses a threat to our common security.

In this context, let me underline that India is willing to contribute its share. In May this year, addressing the Afghan parliament, Prime Minister Manmohan Singh pledged an additional US $ 500 million to the US $ 1.5 billion already pledged by India to its development effort for Afghanistan until the period 2014. The Strategic Partnership Agreement signed in October this year commits us to all-round assistance to Afghanistan well into the future.

We offer our growing market to Afghanistan's products. In early November, India announced the virtual elimination of sensitive lists affecting exports of all least developed SAARC countries to India. India is also assisting Afghanistan in building an Agricultural University to tap the potential in Agriculture in Afghanistan. We have extended our assistance to Afghanistan for capacity building; increased the number of civil scholarships offered to Afghanistan to enable more students from Afghanistan get requisite training in art, culture and technology among other areas to further the process of nation building in Afghanistan. We have extended our assistance to Afghanistan for capacity building; increased the number of civil scholarships offered to Afghanistan to enable more students from Afghanistan get requisite training in art, culture and technology among other areas to further the process of nation building in Afghanistan. We are also prepared to make long-term investments in Afghanistan. When we last met in Istanbul I mentioned that Indian companies are willing to invest up to US $ 10 billion in mining, setting up a steel plant, and related infrastructure in Afghanistan. I am happy to announce that the Indian consortium has been awarded the bid for three blocks of the Hajigak iron ore reserves by the Government of Afghanistan.

These are concrete manifestations of our long-term political commitment to Afghanistan. If others do the same, we could set off a virtuous cycle of healthy economic competition in Afghanistan that benefits Afghanistan and the region, indeed, set off, as President Karzai has called it, a cooperative rather than competitive 'Great Game' in the region.

We need to offer a narrative of opportunity to counter the anxiety of withdrawal, uncertainty, instability and foreign interference.

We visualize Afghanistan's mineral resources, agricultural products and human resources as possible drivers of regional economic development that together with the energy resources of Central Asia, Iran and the Gulf, the growing economic prowess and markets of China, Russia, Turkey and India, could knit the entire region between Turkey in the West, Russia in the north, China in the east, and the Gulf, Arabian Sea and the Indian Ocean in the south, in a web of trade, transit and energy routes and economic cooperation. This vision requires international support in the form of institutional finance and foreign investment.

Let us look at the Bonn conference and the upcoming conferences of 2012 as providing a road map for such future.

191. Briefing by Special Secretary (Public Diplomacy) Jayant Prasad on Vice President M. Hamid Ansari’s visit to Bangladesh in connection with the 150th Birth Centenary commemoration of Rabindranath Tagore.

New Delhi, May 4, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good afternoon and welcome. You are aware that Hon. Vice President of India would be leaving tomorrow for Bangladesh to participate in the 150th birth anniversary commemorations of Gurudev Rabindranath Tagore. Special Secretary (PD) Mr. Jayant Prasad is here to brief you about this very important visit of the Vice President of India. He is joined by two of my colleagues - to the right of Special Secretary (PD) is Mr. Harsh Shringla, the new Joint Secretary (BSM); and to my left is Mr. P. Harish, Joint Secretary in Vice President’s Office.

Special Secretary (PD) would be making an opening statement and thereafter he will be happy to take a few questions.

Special Secretary (PD) (Shri Jayant Prasad): Thank you, Vishnu.

As you have heard, Hon. Vice President Mr. Hamid Ansari will represent India at the 150th anniversary celebrations in Dhaka, which is being scheduled for Friday morning, 6th May. He will leave for Dhaka early tomorrow morning and return the day after in the afternoon.

The Vice President will be accompanied by Minister of State for External Affairs Smt. Preneet Kaur, and two Members of Parliament - Shri O.P. Mathur of the BJP and Shri Moinul Hassan from the CPI(M). Secretary (Culture) is part of the official delegation along with DG (ICCR) and Joint Secretary (BSM).

During his visit, the Vice President will call on hon’ble President of Bangladesh Mohammad Zillur Rahman, Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina. Foreign Minister Dr. Dipu Moni will call on him, and the Leader of Opposition Dr. Khaleda Zia will also call on him.

During Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina’s visit to India last January, the two sides had agreed to oversee the joint celebrations together. It is a response befitting the occasion, the Bangladesh side has arranged a whole range of activities beginning from Friday, and therefore the Government of India decided that our representation should be also befitting at the level of the Vice President. From the Bangladesh side, Air Vice Marshal (Retd) A.K. Khandkar, who is their Minister of Planning, will be the Special Guest for the Inaugural Ceremony that we are hosting in New Delhi on the 7th of May.
The Vice President's visit will be the first high-level visit after the state visit of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina to India last January. Since the Prime Minister's visit last year both sides have maintained satisfactory pace in bilateral interactions and considerable progress has been recorded in many areas including the signing of the billion dollar line of credit agreement; signing of a Memorandum of Understanding on border haats; India facilitating the electrification of the Bangladeshi enclaves Dahagram and Angarpota; designating Ashuganj in Bangladesh and Silghat in India as ports of call for the inland waterways transport; India agreeing to provide transit for Bangladesh nationals across Teen Bigha, you know this is a long-festering issue, and commencement of work on inter-grid connectivity between India and Bangladesh. This is really exciting for export of power from India to Bangladesh. This visit will be useful in taking stock of the progress in the implementation of decisions.

Bangladesh is, as you all are aware, a very important neighbour of India, our largest trading partner within SAARC region. India and Bangladesh share strong historic, cultural and linguistic ties and the visit will provide to us an opportunity to reiterate our commitment to partner in the economic development of Bangladesh.

Hon. Vice President will also be visiting the National Mausoleum Savar to pay homage to the martyrs who sacrificed their lives in Bangladesh's Liberation War in 1971. He will visit also the Bangabandhu Memorial Museum where Sheikh Mujibur Rahman lived until the fateful night of 15th August 1975 when he was assassinated. The Museum is an enduring symbol of the love and admiration that the people of Bangladesh feel for him.

The visit is completely in sync and congruent with the ongoing high-level bilateral interchanges between our two countries, and is expected to further strengthen the close bilateral relations and accelerate the pace of many of our ongoing activities in some of the areas that I have enumerated.

I thank you. I will be most happy to take a few questions.

Question:... (Inaudible) ... You said that we have extended the biggest line of credit. Can you give us a status of how many projects have been implemented and how much of that line of credit has been utilized so far?

Special Secretary (PD): The line of credit agreement has been signed. The principal beneficiary, which is the counterpart bank of EXIM Bank in Bangladesh, has been identified. Now it is for the Bangladesh side to present to us proposals which are commercially viable, which can be funded under the credit line. So, they have made good deal of effort. And last month, fifteen Detailed Project Reports (DPRs) have arrived on our desk, and we have sent them to the technical Ministries for vetting, and we hope to begin work on this quite soon. I am glad you asked the question because we have made progress there.

Question: Any details of the programme on the 6th May in Dhaka of the birth centenary?

Special Secretary (PD): The birth centenary programme per se is a series of presentations of different cultural troupes from the main cultural organizations of Bangladesh. Essentially it is in one venue and there are a whole range of performances, some short dramas, plays - very short but mostly musical performances. Then there are of course, as on all such occasions, some important statements to be made because it is after all a commemorative event.

If there are no further questions and if any of you is interested in India-Bangladesh relations, I would just want to add something of significance that you all ought to know. The January 2010 visit of Sheikh Hasina was a significant one. We have been trying to make a breakthrough bilaterally, Bangladesh with India and India with Bangladesh. It is of mutual benefit. Whatever is contained in the Joint Communiqué is significant. One of the areas that we are looking at is how to increase our interaction in terms of communications and how to increase our interaction in terms of infrastructure. We have seen that in Bangladesh, work on the 40-kilometre, 400 KV high voltage direct current line has begun, and by the end of next year that will be completed. India has indicated that it could provide up to 250 MW of electricity to Bangladesh because right now, believe it or not, despite its riches and natural gas it is energy deficient and in fact it is dragging the potential growth rates down. But the line that we are building is up to a capacity of 500 MW. So, as and when the two countries decide in future, something more can be done.

Another significant event is that NTPC has signed an agreement with its counterpart organization in Bangladesh, which is their power corporation or Power Board to set up a huge coal-based plant in Khulna. This is an over 1300 MW power station and it is well-located because it is not far from the coast. So, coal can be brought in from the outside because Bangladesh does not have coal deposits.

Then we are building a gas station in Tripura and there was no way of taking the heavy gas turbines through the Chicken's Neck by road. It would have been very very expensive. So, 23 oversized packages, the bulk of the cargo has been transshipped through a new transshipment point on the Indo-Bangladesh Protocol Route, which is the river navigation route by which India connects to India through Hooghly-Kolkata, through the Sundarbans we can go all the way up. Earlier the trade was mainly trade picked up from India for Bangladeshi destinations like cement, fly ash, etc, some cargoes for India but mainly for Assam. But this particular cargo was meant for Tripura and that went to Karimganj and this is the first time we have used it. So, that is again exciting news. I thought I will mention these two points to you.

Question: Do we consider this as the first step towards total transit to the North-East?

Special Secretary (PD): There is no such thing as total transit. I have lived seven and a half years of my life in Switzerland and it is supposed to be the transit country of Europe. But each and every new transit agreement in terms of the quantities, in terms of earmarking the roads, in terms of allocating the tunnels which will be used to take merchandise from Germany to Italy, all that is by prior agreement. So, it will be a step-by-step process. But there are things embedded in the January 2010 Agreement, which I have not mentioned, and if you read that agreement you will find plenty more material about connectivity there on which work is going on, but I do not want to hold all of you up.

Question: What was the name of the transit point?

Special Secretary (PD): Ashuganj. I have brought along the map. This pink dotted line is the normal traffic. Our normal traffic goes up here and then ultimately India is developing a big port centre in Bandu for looking after the trade interests of all the North Eastern States. This equipment had to be taken to Akhaura and from Akhaura across to Agartala. We took it to Ashuganj port over here. That is the transit point.

Official Spokesperson: I take it there are no more questions. Thank you.

192. Media Briefing by High Commissioner for India in Bangladesh Rajeet Mitter on Vice President M. Hamid Ansari's visit to Bangladesh.

Indian High Commissioner in Dhaka (Shri Rajeet Mitter): Good afternoon and a very warm welcome to all of you to Dhaka on this occasion of a very important visit from India. Let me introduce myself. I am Rajeet Mitter. I am the Indian High Commissioner here. Mr. Subbarayudu is a Counsellor in the High Commission here. I will just give you a general background on India-Bangladesh relations at present, and of course I will be happy to take any questions thereafter.

I think the visit of the Hon. Vice-President comes at a very important time where our bilateral relations are growing from strength to strength and new areas of cooperation are being developed. I think there is a broad area of agreement in the political leadership in both countries that we need to strengthen our cooperation and move quickly forward so that both our countries and peoples can benefit from this enhanced cooperation.

As you know, much of the outline of what work we are presently engaged in arises from the historic visit of Bangladesh Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina to Delhi in January of 2010. A very elaborate Joint Communiqué was concluded and I presume most of you have seen that document. It charts a very ambitious programme of cooperation, and I am happy to note that good progress is being achieved in many areas.

Let me flag some of these. I would term our cooperation in two ways. One is that we are looking at problems which have been left over from the past and we are also looking at issues where we can enhance cooperation and get into new areas for future bilateral contacts. Of issues left over from the past, we can flag the unresolved boundary issues which really go back all the way right up to from 1947. There is a new urgency to try and settle these and what work has been going on now is actual surveys that are going on across West Bengal, Meghalaya, Assam, Tripura to just ascertain on the ground what are the issues involved. And these are jointly being done by both Indian and Bangladeshi teams.

Other issues also which are historical in nature are questions of sharing of river waters. As you know, in 1996 we had a historic agreement for sharing of what is called the Farakka Agreement for sharing of the waters of the Ganga. And now we are engaged in looking at some of the other rivers principally the Teesta and how we can share these waters. Various technical level discussions have been held and the matter is moving ahead. We hope that some of the issues can come to a satisfactory conclusion on this. But there is still some technical work to be done.

If we look at new areas of cooperation, I think one big thing is the grant of a one-billion dollar line of credit by the Government of India. This umbrella agreement was signed in August of last year when the Finance Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee came to Dhaka. It was an umbrella agreement because the agreement itself did not specify which project it will be used for. And separately we have been working with the Bangladesh side to finalise project proposals. Till recently, they have submitted about 17 proposals for coverage under the Line of Credit. These are mainly in the area of railways which includes supply of locomotives, passenger coaches, tank wagons, some railway bridge projects, some rehabilitation projects.

Then the second area is in the area of dredging where they have requested us to provide some dredgers. As you know, Bangladesh is a riverine country and dredging is an important issue here to prevent the water ways getting blocked up. The third area is supply of buses for the urban transportation system. There are also some other miscellaneous projects such as building of inland container ports, upgrading the Bangladesh Testing Institute and things like that. These seventeen so far have been received and they have been examined from the technical point of view within India and we hope to move forward on these very soon. In fact, particularly on railways there has been continuous interaction over the last year between our railway experts and their railway experts to finalise the technical specifications and the issues involved in that.

The other very new area of cooperation is the area of energy. I think there is a landmark agreement to link the electricity grids of the two countries will whereby supply up to 500 MW of power from India would be possible. This project is moving ahead on schedule. We expect completion by the end of 2012 or early 2013. It is a big project. It is almost a thousand crore project because one of the issues here is to set up what is called the HVDC substation which is the major cost component in this. But Bangladesh presently has an urgent requirement for power and I think this was a much needed boost to their domestic requirements as it comes on stream. Similarly, our national power company NTPC has gone ahead in a joint venture to set up a 1300 MW green field power plant in a place called Khulna for which again the feasibility study has been done and some more technical details are being worked out but again there has been good progress on this.

The other new area of cooperation is the whole issue of connectivity. As you know, the cross-connectivity from mainland India to the North-East was in the past restricted mainly to the water route. We have always enjoyed what is called the Treaty of Inland Water Trade and Transit since 1972 where barges from Kolkata and Haldia could come up through the waterways and go right up to Assam. But we have now extended this and in between there is a place called Ashuganj which has been declared a multimodal transport hub. So, barges can come up to there and then unload and then they can go by road to Tripura. That would be the closest contact point of destination. So, Ashuganj has now been declared as a port of call under this treaty.

We are working towards linking the railway lines between Tripura and eastern Bangladesh. The joint satellite survey, joint survey for the alignment has been completed. We have now an agreed alignment and now again a detailed project is being formulated. Similarly there is another proposal to open up a route in southern Tripura from a place called Sabroom to Ramgarh where one of the problems is the need to cross a river called the Feni river and again it has been decided that a bridge will be built across this river for which a joint inspection has also been completed and the site has been selected, and now we have to go ahead and plan the exact design and how it will be linked up.

In the area of trade, as you know, we are already offering Bangladesh duty free access to the Indian market for some 4800 tariff lines under the SAFTA agreement. In addition we are giving eight million pieces of quota for garment exports from Bangladesh to India. Garments is of course one of the strongest export items of Bangladesh. Recently our Commerce and Industry Minister Mr. Anand Sharma was here just about two weeks ago and he has increased this quota to ten million pieces while we continue to examine ways of further liberalizing this trade.

One positive development has been that there has been a regular exchange of business delegations. In fact, in the other hotel you will find there is a big India-Bangla trade fair going on and CII are coming with a delegation of 25 people just after you leave. Mr. Anand Sharma brought a business delegation. There have been a lot of exchanges of visits. And this has resulted in several joint venture agreements being concluded in areas such as packaging, animal foods, auto components, denim, and the household utensils. These are all new areas because it will help to utilize Bangladesh's advantages as a manufacturing base today. And since Bangladesh also enjoys duty free preference to the European Union, it is a way of building up and diversifying the export basket of Bangladesh. So, this is also a very positive development results of which will show within a year as these factories and all come on stream.

Then we come to the immediate purpose of the visit of the Hon. Vice-President and that is the decision in the Joint Communique to jointly celebrate the 150th birth anniversary of Rabindranath Tagore. This is also again a unique project. We have drawn up an elaborate programme of events throughout the year where our people would be coming, their people would be going to India covering various aspects of Tagore’s life and work. Immediately at the opening ceremony tomorrow we have the famous actor, Soumitra Chatterjee from Kolkata who is coming to give a recitation; and Prof. Udaya Narayana Singh, Pro Vice-Chancellor of Shantiniketan will be giving a lecture; and we also have a noted Rabindra Sangeet singer, Swagata Lakshmi Dasgupta. And similarly Bangladesh is sending a high power delegation to Delhi led by their Planning Minister Air Marshal (Retd) A.K.M. Khandakar, who is also one of the veteran freedom fighters and he will be leaving in fact tomorrow morning for Delhi.

As I said, this is just the beginning, this is just the inauguration but we hope through the year we will have many events. Another thing that will be inaugurated day after tomorrow is a painting exhibition where ICCR has donated over 100 very high quality digitized prints of Rabindranath’s paintings to Dhaka University which was handed over just a few days ago but those have been loaned now for this exhibition at the Shilpa Kala Academy where also various artistes from India and Bangladesh also painted specially for this exhibition on themes related to Rabindranath.

As you know, Rabindranath belongs not just to India and Bangladesh but to the whole world but there is a particular synergy because it is well-known that the national anthems of both our countries are written by Rabindranath. He spent many years in what is today Bangladesh in places like Kushtia, Shilaidaha, Shahzadpur and of course his in-laws also came from what is today Bangladesh. I have actually visited these places and all these old houses have been very well preserved and kept open to tourists.

One project that will come on stream maybe at the end of this year or early next year is a joint India-Bangladesh car rally which will visit the sites in India associated with Tagore and then come here and visit the sites associated with Tagore in Bangladesh.

We find that the visit of the Vice-President is at a very opportune time. As you know, he has come with a high-power delegation - MoS for External Affairs plus two Members of Parliament. I think the intention is not just for the opening of the Tagore celebrations but also to demonstrate our commitment to further strengthen and take our bilateral relationship forward across these various new sectors that we are working on.

Thank you. If there is anything particularly you would like to know, please feel free.

Question: Has any date for the Prime Minister’s visit decided? When is it likely to be?

Indian High Commissioner in Dhaka: No dates have been decided yet but it is being talked about because Bangladesh Prime Minister went to India last year so normally you have a return visit. But no dates have been fixed as yet.
Question: When the Prime Minister comes here, will the boundary issue be one of the major subjects?

Indian High Commissioner in Dhaka: We do not know what will be discussed at the PM level but all these things are complicated and a lot of technical preparatory work is required so that we are ready to take decisions. That is why these joint surveys are being done. We also have, as you know, one of the leftovers of history this problem of enclaves. There are little pockets of Indian territory within Bangladesh and little pockets of Bangladesh territory within India which we call enclaves. So, we are also doing a joint headcount on the people living in these enclaves so that we know exactly how many people are involved and then some decision will have to be taken on what to do with these enclaves also. So, as I said, it is leftovers from history which are complicated but there is an urgency and a commitment to move forward on these issues and not let them just lie because ultimately it is for the benefit of not just the two countries but the peoples also living in these areas that there should be some finality to their position in these places.

Question: The joint survey particularly in Meghalaya sector was stopped because of interference from BDR. Will it resume? What is the situation?

Indian High Commissioner in Dhaka: When you are looking at where are the people living, which areas people have been traditionally using, there are certain differences of opinion but let me assure you there is a complete commitment on both the BGB side and the BSF side to our land boundary people, Survey of India people, and counterparts over here to solve these issues and not to place obstacles. The idea of the survey is really to pinpoint what exactly is the nature of the problem so that then a decision can be taken at the political level on how to handle this.

Question: What about area of terrorism? How Bangladesh and India are cooperating with each other to tackle this issue?

Indian High Commissioner in Dhaka: One of the things that was concluded during Sheikh Hasina’s visit to India was signing of three security related agreements. These three agreements have now been ratified by both sides and are now in operation. But apart from that there is close contact between our security personnel on both countries. I think there is a commitment equally in India and Bangladesh that terrorism is totally unacceptable and that our countries will not be used for terrorist activities against the other. I think on that there is total unanimity and there is good cooperation in exchanging information in dealing with this problem of terrorism.

Question: Would it be fair to assume that the Prime Minister’s visit will come about once the water sharing agreement and the border dispute nearly get sorted out?
Indian High Commissioner in Dhaka: That is speculative. One really does not know. Prime Minister’s itinerary, we are not privy to it.

Question: Long back we heard that they will open a corridor through Bangladesh connecting the Districts of Jalpaiguri and North Dinajpur in West Bengal. Is there any proposal like that?

Indian High Commissioner in Dhaka: No, I do not think that proposal is under consideration. I mentioned two or three of the new connectivity issues. One is of course this rail link - the Akhaura-Agartala rail link. One is the Feni bridge. I did not mention and in fact what is probably the most important is the use of Chittagong and Mongla ports by India. We have submitted some draft modalities on how these will operate. When you start something new you have to have some modalities on how the goods will come, what will be the treatment by the customs, how will the transportation be arranged. So, this is again technical level discussions are needed. But ultimately once these two ports become available to India, obviously from the North-East goods going or reaching the North-East through these ports it might be much more advantageous particularly if you are dealing with southern India or third countries also. If say Tripura needs to import something from a third country, this could be the most easy route to use instead of coming to Kolkata and then going round the Chicken’s Neck.

Question: I have a question on the three border haats to be opened.

Indian High Commissioner in Dhaka: I think two border haats are to be opened on a trial basis in Meghalaya. The sites have been selected. The agreement on how these border haats will be operated has also been finalized. It is just that the Meghalaya Government are working on preparing the infrastructure. When Mr. Anand Sharma was here a tentative target was put that by end of June we should try to inaugurate these border haats. This is really for trade in local products amongst the local populations.

Question: By when do you think India can get access to Chittagong and other ports?

Indian High Commissioner in Dhaka: Again I cannot give a timeframe but as I said, this is under discussion. That commitment is there in the Joint Communiqué. So, I think both sides are eager to fully implement the Joint Communiqué.

Thank you very much.
Excellencies and Distinguished Guests

Brothers and Sisters of Bangladesh

Visiting a neighbour is always a matter of happiness. The pleasure is enhanced manifold when the occasion is such a rarity. In history, as in cricket, a score of 150 is worthy of special mention; it becomes doubly so when it relates to a personality who cannot be situated in conventional terms, who transcends categories and national boundaries, and simply remains sui generis.

Some in this audience would recall that half a century back, we celebrated the Tagore Centenary separately and that you did it here notwithstanding many odds.

For these reasons, and more, I am delighted to be here today to represent the Government of India on this historic occasion emanating from the decision of the Prime Ministers of Bangladesh and India in January 2010 to hold joint commemorations to mark the sesqui-centenary of the versatile and multifaceted genius who both our nations and our people refer to as kobiguru, Vishwa-kavi and Gurudev and whose pen wrote our respective national anthems.

We are looking forward to welcoming tomorrow in New Delhi the Hon’ble A.K. Khandker to join us in our National Inaugural Function. These parallel celebrations highlight the enduring impact of Rabindranath Tagore on our cultural and intellectual ethos.

We cherish it as you do; together we shall endeavour to enrich it for future generations.

It is well know that Tagore spent the most creative decades of his youth in Bangladesh where he absorbed the beauty of nature. Enchanted by the river Padma and on his ‘Padma’ boat, Tagore produced some of his finest work.

It was here that the serene environs of Shilaidaha, Kushtia, Patisar and Shahzadpur worked their magic on young Rabindranath, thereby becoming an integral part of his inspirational canvas. "I knew not then", he said in the sylvan paradise of Shilaidaha, "that it was so near, that it was mine, and that this perfect sweetness had blossomed in the depth of my own heart".
It was here that Tagore was drawn closer to the toiling masses and took the opportunity to work tirelessly for their upliftment.

It was here that he began his pioneering experiments in education, rural reconstruction and development, as also in affirmative action to set right the existing social inequities. Much of his philosophy, world-view and vision can be traced to these highly productive years.

Madam Prime Minister

Your historic state visit to India last year laid the road-map for our bilateral relations. We have made considerable progress regarding implementation of the far-reaching decisions taken during your visit and remain committed to addressing your developmental priorities, strengthening bilateral relations and enhancing economic engagement.

Rabindranath Tagore represents much that is precious in our common heritage and has influenced our intellectual and cultural ethos in an enduring and distinctive manner. His vision and outlook binds us as perhaps nothing else can. Today's joint celebration is a momentous occasion and the first of its kind in the history of our two nations.

It is also recognition that Tagore was a man ahead of his time; his ideas on culture, gender, poverty, education, freedom, and a resurgent Asia remain relevant today.

Tagore worked for one supreme cause, the union of all sections of humanity in sympathy and understanding, in truth and love. He expressed himself in an invocation penned in April 1919. It bears recalling in the troubled world that we live in:

Give me the supreme courage of love, this is my prayer, the courage to speak, to do, to suffer at thy will, to leave all things or be left alone

Give me the supreme faith of love, this is my prayer, the faith of life in death, of the victory in defeat, of the power hidden in the frailness of beauty, of the dignity of pain that accepts hurt, but disdains to return it.

I take this opportunity to compliment the Government of Bangladesh for its initiative to honour and perpetuate the memory and legacy of Rabindranath Tagore.
The Union Finance Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee said that India attaches great importance to its bilateral ties with Bangladesh. He said that good relations with neighbours especially with Bangladesh is a foreign policy priority for India. Shri Mukherjee was speaking when a group of eleven Bangladesh journalists called on him in his office here today.

The Union Finance Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee said that a Joint Communiqué issued at the end of Bangladesh Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina's last visit to India in January, 2010, is a landmark document leading to further cementing of the ties between the two countries.

The Union Finance Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee said that both sides have been making strenuous efforts to implement each and every element of the aforesaid Joint Communiqué expeditiously including in the areas relating to security, power, connectivity, border haats, electrification of Dahagram and Angarpota, capacity building especially in standards and certification among others.

In this regard, the Union Finance Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee specifically mentioned about his last visit to Dhaka in August 2010 to witness the signing of the historic $1 billion Line of Credit Agreement, the largest amount ever offered by India to any country and on soft terms which is the testimony to India's desire to partner in the economic development of Bangladesh.

The Union Finance Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee said that the LOC will be utilized for building infrastructure in Bangladesh including supply of buses, railway coaches and locomotives, railway infrastructure, upgrading standards and dredging among others.

The Union Finance Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee said that work on the transmission line to connect India and Bangladesh for supply of the 250 MW power promised by India is proceeding apace. He said that we expect power to flow by 2013.

On security cooperation, the Union Finance Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee said that we appreciate the support extended by Bangladesh in the recent past. He said that both of us have recognized that terrorists are friends to none and we have to collectively fight against them. The Minister said that we cannot afford to allow them to disrupt our relations. He said that we have agreed in principle to facilitate 24 hour access to Bangladesh nationals across the Tin Bigha Corridor and have handed over a Non-paper to Bangladesh side on modalities.

In the end, the Union Finance Minister Shri Pranab Mukherjee said that India has both political will and ability to bring about a paradigm change in our ties which would be beneficial not only to both the countries but also to the region as a whole.

195. Press Release issued by Ministry of External Affairs on the creation of an ICCR's Long Term Tagore Chair at the University of Dhaka.

New Delhi, May 17, 2011.

Indian Council for Cultural Relations (ICCR) and University of Dhaka, Dhaka signed a Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) on May 12th, 2011 for establishment of ICCR’s Long Term Tagore Chair at the University. High Commissioner of India in Bangladesh, Shri Rajeet Mitter signed the MoU on behalf of ICCR along with the Vice Chancellor of the University of Dhaka, Prof. A.A.M.S. Arefin Siddique.

Under the terms of agreement, ICCR, in consultation with the University, shall appoint an Indian academician who would be visiting the University for a period of one year. The Visiting Professor would contribute to the academic life of the University by engaging in teaching and research in his/her respective specialization. The Chair would commence from July 2011.

This Chair is ICCR’s first Chair in Bangladesh and second in the series of ‘Tagore Chairs’ being established by ICCR to commemorate the 150th anniversary year of Gurudev Rabindranath Tagore. Establishment of this Chair is a major step in propagation of Tagore related studies in Bangladesh and thereby fulfilling ICCR’s mandate of fostering and strengthening academic and cultural links and towards enhancing knowledge and awareness about India.

At the outset, I would like to thank the Government of Bangladesh and my counterpart His Excellency Mijarul Quayes for the invitation and excellent hospitality extended to the Indian delegation and arrangements made for the Foreign Office Consultations. It is always delightful to visit Dhaka.

2. We have had very comprehensive consultations earlier today covering a range of issues of mutual interest and bilateral cooperation. The talks were marked by great warmth and cordiality reflecting the close ties and friendship between the two countries.

3. The Joint Communique signed by PM Dr Manmohan Singh and Her Excellency Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina during her landmark visit to India in January last year has outlined the roadmap for the relationship between India and Bangladesh. Both sides have made considerable progress in implementation of the Joint Communiqué since the visit. Implementation of projects under the $1 billion LOC from India has been high priority for both sides. We have just conveyed our concurrence for a number of projects under the LOC in Railway infrastructure and the purchase of buses for the city of Dhaka. These can be implemented immediately. India is committed to implementation of far-reaching decisions taken by the leaders of both countries.

4. Our cooperation in the power sector, including grid connectivity, supply of upto 500 MW of power from India, including 250 MW of power at a preferential rate and Bangladesh request for setting up of a high technology joint venture thermal power plant of 1320 MW capacity is progressing well. During the visit of Minister for Commerce and Industry of India in April this year, the annual duty free quota for export of Bangladeshi garments to India has been raised from 8 to 10 million pieces. Cooperation to upgrade BSTI is progressing well. Both sides are working on several projects to improve trade infrastructure and connectivity. A new LCS at Fulbari-Banglabandha was opened in January and the Government of India has now undertaken to set up five ICPs and the foundation stone of the ICP at Agartala was laid by the Home Minister Shri P. Chidambaram in May. Border Haats in Meghalaya are expected to be inaugurated soon.

5. There has been regular exchange of business delegations. This has resulted in several joint venture agreements being concluded for export oriented manufacturing activities in Bangladesh. Indeed, we are happy to note that Bangladesh exports to India have, according to our figures, increased by 52% in the first nine months of 2010-11. I am sure that Indian investments in Bangladesh will provide employment and also generate export potential, including to India.

6. We have made substantial forward movement in respect of both water and land boundary issues. The Joint Boundary Working Group (JBWG) meeting was held in November 2010, and the Bangladesh Water Resources Secretary held talks in Delhi yesterday. Both sides are discussing interim water sharing of Teesta and Feni rivers. The work on river bank protection and embankment construction along the common rivers is progressing and the dredging of the Ichhamati River along the 20 km common stretch is nearing completion.

7. The joint Inaugural Ceremonies of the 150th Birth Anniversary of Rabindranath Tagore in both our capitals were very impressive. Several events are planned for the whole year.

8. India attaches the highest importance to its relations with Bangladesh and seeks a deeper and stronger partnership. The historic bonds between India and Bangladesh are deep rooted and peoples on both sides want mutual prosperity and cooperation.

9. Prime Minister Dr Manmohan Singh is looking forward to his visit to Bangladesh at the invitation of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina to take forward the mutually beneficial cooperation agreed by the two Prime Ministers in January 2010.

10. I am looking forward to calling on Her Excellency Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina right after this interaction. Yesterday, I had very productive interaction with H.E. Dr. Mashiur Rahman and H.E. Prof. Gowher Rizvi, Advisers to Prime Minister. I shall also call on Foreign Minister Dr. Dipu Moni later today.

11. I thank you for your presence.

197. Extract from Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh's interaction with newspaper editors.

New Delhi, June 29, 2011.

Q 1: Sir, you did not mention anything about our neighbourhood.

A: Well, neighbourhood worries me a great deal, quite frankly

You have a situation in Sri Lanka. The decimation of the LTTE was something which is good. But the Tamil problem does not disappear, with the defeat of the LTTE. The Tamil population has legitimate grievances. They feel they are reduced to second-class citizens. And our emphasis has been to persuade the Sri Lankan government that we must move towards a new system of institutional reforms, where the Tamil people will have a feeling that they are equal citizens of Sri Lanka, and they can lead a life of dignity and self-respect. It is not easy. Within Sri Lanka's population, there are hotheads, the Sinhala chauvinism is a reality. But we have to find a difficult balance because what happens in Sri Lanka has a domestic dimension also. The Tamil Nadu government and assembly have often shown great worry about what is happening. Our challenge is to keep the Tamil Nadu government on our side. I have had good cooperation with Jayalalithaa-ji. I raised this matter with her the very first time. What she asked of me was moderate. Whatever be the resolutions that were passed in the assembly, I found her fully conscious of the complexities and the realtities of managing this relationship.

With Bangladesh, we have good relations. Bangladesh government has gone out of its way to help us in apprehending the anti-Indian insurgent groups which were operating from Bangladesh for a long time. And that is why we have been generous in dealing with Bangladesh. We are not a rich country. But we offered it a line of credit of one billion dollars, when Sheikh Hasina came here. We are also looking at ways and means of finding a practical and pragmatic solution to the sharing of Teesta waters. I plan to go there myself. The external affairs minister is planning to go later this week. So, Bangladesh, our relations are quite good. So Bangladesh, our relations are quite good. But we must reckon that at least 25 percent of the population of Bangladesh swear by the Jamiat-ul-Islami and they are very anti-Indian, and they are in the clutches, many times, of the ISI. So, a political landscape in Bangladesh can change at any time. We do not know what these terrorist elements, who have a hold on the jamiat-e-islami elements in Bangladesh, can be upto.
So a very uncertain neighbourhood. A very uncertain international, economic environment. We have to swim and keep our heads high.

Clarifying the Prime Minister’s remarks the Spokesperson of the Ministry of External Affairs on July 2 said:

"Our attention has been drawn to some off the record remarks attributed to the Prime Minister during his interaction with Editors in New Delhi. It is clarified in this regard that these attributed remarks were by no means intended to be judgemental. The Prime Minister and his Government and the people of India have the greatest affection for the people of Bangladesh and hold our relations with Bangladesh to be of the highest importance.

India recognises the stability of the democratically elected Government and is committed to the non-interference in the internal affairs of sovereign states. In recent years, ties between India and Bangladesh have seen exceptional heights with close cooperation in a wide range of areas. The focus on both sides has been development cooperation, poverty alleviation, capacity building and education. It is in this context that the External Affairs Minister of India is undertaking an official visit to Bangladesh. We are fully committed to our bilateral relationship with the people and the Government of Bangladesh."

198. Statement of External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna to Media prior to his departure for Bangladesh.

New Delhi, July 4, 2011.

Following the visit of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina to India in January 2010, both sides have moved forward purposefully to implement a series of initiatives outlined in the Joint Communiqué. Both sides have identified a number of infrastructure developmental projects to be undertaken under the US$ 1 Billion Line of Credit extended by India, including for Bangladesh Railways and procurement of buses for Dhaka city. Progress has been made on issues relating to river waters sharing, land boundary, provision of 250 MW of power from India to Bangladesh, facilitation of 24-hour access to Bangladesh nationals through the Tin Bigha Corridor, electrification of Dahagram and Angorpota enclaves, among others. Both sides are working on projects for inter-grid connectivity, setting up power plants under joint ventures and continuing our close cooperation in security related matters and the environment.

Dhaka, July 7, 2011.

Your Excellency Dr. Dipu Moni Foreign Minister of Bangladesh,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Good Afternoon.

At the outset, I wish to convey the greetings and best wishes of the people and Government of India to the friendly people and Government of Bangladesh. I thank the Government of Bangladesh and Foreign Minister Dr. Dipu Moni, in particular, for the warm welcome and excellent arrangements made for me and my delegation.

2. My visit has been very productive. I had the opportunity to call on Her Excellency Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina. I also met Finance Minister AMA Muhith yesterday. Foreign Minister Dr. Dipu Moni and I had very fruitful discussions this morning. We reviewed a range of bilateral issues, including implementation of Joint Communiqué and projects under the 1 billion US Dollars Line of Credit. Later this evening, I will be calling on His Excellency President Zillur Rahman. I am also looking forward to the inauguration of Kalabhaban at the University of Dhaka and delivering an address on India-Bangladesh relations at the BIiSS.

3. We have signed two agreements today - exchange of instruments of ratification in respect of the Bilateral Investment Promotion and Protection Agreement (BIPPA) and SOP (Standard Operating Procedure) for entry of trucks from Bhutan into territories of the two countries near the border.

Ladies and Gentlemen,
4. The bilateral cooperation between India and Bangladesh is on a high trajectory in recent times with both sides embarking on a comprehensive, forward looking, pragmatic and mutually beneficial initiatives and projects. We have been working together on implementation of the Joint Communiqué adopted by the two Prime Ministers during Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina’s landmark visit to India. Both sides have made considerable progress in this regard. I am happy to convey that a number of the proposals received for utilisation of the 1 billion US Dollars Line of Credit from India are under implementation.

5. We have made significant forward movement in our cooperation in the power sector, including establishment of grid connectivity upto 500 MW of power from India of which 250 MW will be at a preferential rate. India responded positively to Bangladesh's request for setting up of a high technology joint venture thermal power plant of 1320 MW capacity at Khulna and has completed the feasibility report.

6. Both sides are working on several projects to improve trade infrastructure and connectivity. A new Land Customs Station (LCS) at Fulbari-Banglabandha was opened in January 2011 and the Government of India has now undertaken to set up seven Integrated Check Posts (ICP). Border Haats in Meghalaya are expected to be inaugurated later this month.

7. The constant interaction between the two business communities has resulted in several joint venture agreements for export oriented manufacturing activities in Bangladesh. Indian investments in Bangladesh will provide employment and also promote bilateral trade. The Bilateral Investment Promotion and Protection Agreement (BIPPA) will greatly facilitate two-way investments between our countries.

8. We are happy to note that exports from Bangladesh to India have increased by 56% in the first 10 months of 2010-11. We want exports from Bangladesh to grow further. The annual duty free quota for export of garments from Bangladesh to India has been raised from 8 to 10 million pieces. Cooperation to upgrade the BSTI is progressing well.

9. We have made substantial forward movement in the field of water resources. Both sides are discussing interim water sharing of Teesta and Feni rivers. The work on river bank protection and embankment construction along the common rivers is progressing and the dredging of the Ichhamati River is nearing completion.

10. The Joint Boundary Working Group (JBWG) meeting was held in November 2010. I am happy to note that both sides are engaged in a process to seek a comprehensive resolution of outstanding land boundary issues.

11. Both countries recognize the importance of cooperation in the field of security and are determined to jointly combat the menace of insurgency, militancy and terrorism. Our leadership has been in agreement that the territory of either would not be allowed for activities inimical to the other.

12. Cooperation in the field of culture, education and training between our two countries is expanding at a rapid pace. The joint celebration of the 150th Birth Anniversary of Rabindranath Tagore in both our capitals is progressing well. A Tagore Chair has been set up at Dhaka University. A Parliamentary Friendship Group with Bangladesh has been set up in the Indian Parliament.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

14. Let me reaffirm that India attaches the highest importance to its relations with Bangladesh and seeks a deeper and stronger partnership. We are guided by the fundamental premise that a stable, prosperous, democratic and peaceful Bangladesh is in our mutual interest. We are committed to pursuing such cooperation with Bangladesh that brings prosperity to our peoples and development to the two countries.

15. Prime Minister Dr Manmohan Singh has conveyed to me that he is looking forward to his first visit Bangladesh on 6-7 September 2011 at the invitation of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina. 16. I take this opportunity to convey my best wishes to the friendly people of Bangladesh. Thank you
"India and Bangladesh: Partners In Progress"

Maj. Gen. Firdaus Mian, Chairman, BIISS
Maj. Gen. Imrul Quayes, Director General
Ambassadors, academicians and scholars

Ladies and gentlemen,

I am delighted to be addressing this august gathering on "India and Bangladesh: Partners in Progress". I am delighted because India and Bangladesh share a very unique relationship. Our relations are as old as history; our peoples share a bond embedded in our common cultural heritage; and our destinies have been forged by our shared principles and values.

Mr. Chairman,

I thank you for organizing this session at Bangladesh Institute of International and Strategic Studies (BIISS). As a leading think-tank of Bangladesh, BIISS has advanced knowledge and understanding of contemporary international and strategic issues in national and regional perspectives. I congratulate your efforts and appreciate the links you have developed with the academic fraternity in India to improve understanding on both sides.

Ladies and gentlemen,

You would have seen reports of my meetings with the leadership in Bangladesh. I am very satisfied with the outcome and am positive that we are poised for significant developments. I had excellent understanding in my discussions with Foreign Minister, Dr. Dipu Moni as also with Finance Minister AMA Muhith. Both the Prime Minister and President indicated their desire to take our relations to a higher level. I shall also be meeting the Leader of Opposition immediately after this meeting.

I am delighted to be meeting the intellectual community of Bangladesh at a juncture when our bilateral engagement is both deepening and broadening and our intellectual dialogue is expanding. Your experience and practice of international and strategic affairs is vast. You play an influential role in the shaping of policy and many of you are also engaged in its implementation. We look to you to draw up your vision for our relations which will be of benefit to our peoples. I wish to share with you some of my thoughts.
Ladies and gentlemen,

We are witnessing a transformation, unparalleled in the annals of history. At a global level, never before have we brought hope and aspiration to so many people as we are doing today. Hundreds of millions of people, hitherto underprivileged and destitute, are moving out of poverty to shape their own destinies.

At a regional level, India and Bangladesh are the beneficiaries of the development-democracy-demography dividend. The economic development we are experiencing is even more remarkable than the global trend. It is the outcome of the commitment of our leadership to improving the living conditions of our people. The experience of democracy has empowered our people and built institutions that deliver peace, prosperity and stability. Our demographic trend with a high proportion of educated and trained youth, despite the large population, has a potential to provide the growth impetus into the second half of the century.

This transformation is also bringing in a paradigm shift in the philosophy that will govern the world we live in. We are casting aside suspicion and conflict to embrace trust and cooperation, recognizing the pursuit for common good. Our experience of co-existence, tolerance, plurality and a holistic interface with nature is gaining currency. This is a mission in which we may join hands to create a new global architecture.

India and Bangladesh cannot afford to miss this historic opportunity to work together to be a part of the new future. We have the potential to play a greater role in regional, and global, affairs in the years ahead.

Ladies and gentlemen,

India and Bangladesh have come a long way in developing a mature relationship that is based not only on our history but also recognizes our common values and shared destiny. Equally significant is the fact that the potential of our relationship has grown over time and is a factor of stability, development and confidence. Our geographical proximity makes us natural partners. Our cultural identity will promote this partnership. Most significantly, the economic and social developments that have taken place in the region and the institutions that are being built will provide the complementarities for the partnership to flourish.

I have noticed a new momentum in our bilateral relations in recent times. Not only is this reflected in a common perception and approach at a leadership level but it is also seen in the desire of opinion makers, businessmen and the people to forge closer ties of goodwill and amity and to build bonds of cooperation and mutual benefit. I can emphatically state that our relations today are perhaps the best ever in recent times.
The joint communiqué adopted by our Prime Ministers during the landmark visit of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina to New Delhi in January 2010 outlined a vision for our partnership. We are now marching in that direction. We have achieved success on many fronts, including implementation of the joint communiqué and signing of contracts in the transportation sector under the 1 billion US dollar Indian Line of Credit. Yet, this is still work-in-progress. We need a framework for cooperation on development, which will help us build the physical and institutional infrastructure to meet the aspirations of our people not only in improving their livelihood but also in preparing them for the challenges in this age of transformation.

India and Bangladesh have a natural propensity to work together in varied and diverse areas but let me look at just a few of them, today.

First, as friendly neighbours that respect national sovereignty, we have sought to put behind us the threat of war and the recurrence of armed conflict. However, we face new challenges and non-traditional security threats. The rise of religious fundamentalism, extremism and terrorism are not unfamiliar to our region. Such forces sap away the strength of our societies, threaten our state systems and are an impediment to our advancement. India and Bangladesh have had good cooperation in fighting such forces. It is imperative that we continue to join hands to fight terrorism in all its forms and manifestations. Only then can we ensure that this creed will never gain ascendency and we shall secure for ourselves and our peoples the hope of stability, development, peace and prosperity.

Second, I am hopeful that the outstanding land boundary issues between us will be resolved in the near future in a fair, reasonable and mutually acceptable manner. Discussions are ongoing and I sense willingness on both sides to resolve this age old issue. The resolution of boundary and its demarcation will remove an impediment to our collaborative efforts for growth and development and enhanced people-to-people exchanges.

Third, we have expanded our understanding on water issues. We have a very good agreement on the sharing of the Ganga Waters which is being implemented sincerely by both sides. I am optimistic that we shall reach similar conclusion on the sharing of the Teesta and Feni waters. Between neighbours, it is necessary to deal with each other in a spirit of transparency and sincerity. As our populations grow, the demand for water, which is a vital resource, will also increase. However, I am positive that we shall find mutually acceptable and pragmatic solutions that meet the needs of our people while recognizing the need for mutual sacrifice in view of declining of flows due to climate change.
Fourth, I see a growing enthusiasm for trade and economic cooperation between the two sides. Both our economies are robust and have weathered the global economic downturn. I have noticed that our trade volumes are low and the share of our bilateral trade in the global context still remains small. The bulk of your imports from India are raw materials which are processed further in Bangladesh for exports. The priority should be to significantly increase the volumes of trade. I believe this can be made possible if we look at trade and investments in conjunction. Cross investments will not only provide gainful employment and production but will also lead to increased export earnings. A number of Indian corporate entities are looking forward to opportunities for investments in Bangladesh. If you can welcome them warmly it will be to mutual benefit. I also wish to point out that there is potential for Bangladesh investments in India.

Fifth, I would like to refer to the issue of connectivity. We live in a global community, interacting across borders. Technology and communication have made connectivity possible. In fact, not only do these flows improve efficiencies and provide access to goods and services across frontiers but they also bring improvement to the living conditions of people. We cannot deprive them this opportunity. Further, we should see connectivity in a dynamic concept of markets that are growing rapidly on both sides of the borders; in the north east of India, the growth could be even more rapid than the rest of India. As the pie expands on both sides, the opportunities for business also expand exponentially. Our economies are not fully integrated. I can visualise connectivity will spur economic growth and development on both sides of the border; it is not simply a flow of goods and services across frontiers in the context of transit.

Finally, I cannot but see the growth of this partnership without special attention being devoted to the cultural and educational dimension. India and Bangladesh are organising joint events to celebrate the 150th birth anniversary of Rabindranath Tagore. It will showcase the tremendous contribution of Tagore in areas such as women's empowerment and rural development, explore his contemporary relevance and rejoice in his intellectual genius. Tagore shows these issues remain relevant for us even today and he provides guidance towards realizing our true potential in the modern world.

I was in the University of Dhaka a short while ago to inaugurate the newly constructed Kalabhaban. India considers it a privilege to cooperate in this project. As you may know, a Tagore Chair in the University has also been established. An Indian Tagore scholar of great eminence will assume the seat of the first Chair next month. I am confident that this will enrich the dialogue between us and deepen exchanges and scholarship.
Ladies and gentlemen,

We share a unique bond. We seek to strengthen it further through collaborative effort. Our hand is always extended for you to grasp. We seek stability, peace and prosperity for all our peoples on both sides of the border. We wish to realize our shared destiny with Bangladesh.

Thank you.

203. Ceremony to hand over Cyclone resistant Core shelters in Bangladesh to affected families.

Dhaka, July 12, 2011.

High Commissioner of India in Dhaka Sh. Rajeet Mitter along with Minister for Food and Disaster Management H.E. Dr. Abdul Razzak, handed over the first batch of Sidr Core Shelters, built in Sharongkola, Bagerhat on 9 July, 2011 to the affected families, at a public function. The event was witnessed by political leaders, members of the civil society, officials and a large number of local residents.

Government of India had offered to provide 2800 Core Shelters in more than 11 villages in Sharongkola and Morelganj for the families affected by cyclone Sidr. The beneficiaries were selected by the Government of Bangladesh. The project is being executed by local Bangladesh contractors selected through an open tender. Work on the project commenced in October 2010. Over 1600 families have moved into the newly constructed Shelters and the remaining Shelters are being built.

The innovative design of the core shelters, verified by the Indian Institute of Technology, is ideal for cyclone prone areas and follows Bangladesh National Building Code. The shelters take into view, requirements of the beneficiaries as well as, the local climatic and seismic conditions. They are capable of withstanding moderate cyclones and floods. The Shelters use local material and manpower so as to contribute to the socio-economic development of the region. The Shelters are constructed on a raised platform with foundation of precast RCC stumps and a wooden-frame structure for maximum stability. The frame is covered with Corrugated Galvanized Iron Sheets for walls and sloping roof. It has an open verandah, two wooden doors and two windows for cross ventilation. An independent toilet has been provided with each Shelter.

The Core Shelters will provide a permanent home to people in an area which is vulnerable to natural disasters such as cyclones and floods.

204. Interview of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh with the Bangladesh news agency Bangladesh Sangbad Sangstha (BSS) on his upcoming visit to Bangladesh.

New Delhi, September 5, 2011.

Bangladesh Sangbad Sangstha (BSS): Bangladesh eagerly awaits your visit to Dhaka in a few days time, which is widely expected to be an historic event. Nineteen months ago your Bangladesh counterpart visited New Delhi when the two neighbours issued a joint communiqué raising huge expectations that it would mutually benefit both the countries through enhanced bilateral cooperation. How far optimistic you are about the successful implementation of the commitments made in the communiqué?

Prime Minister (Dr. Manmohan Singh): The joint communiqué issued jointly by Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina and me at the end of her state visit to India in January 2010 was comprehensive and forward-looking. The focus on both sides has been to work together to expeditiously implement various initiatives outlined in the joint communiqué. I am satisfied with the implementation of those initiatives, but there is always scope to do much better.

I am encouraged by the fact that we have put in place a broad-based agenda of action covering every sector, whether it is political exchanges, trade and economic cooperation, power exchange, water resources, border management, education, cultural contacts, people-to-people exchanges, better border and transport infrastructure or connectivity. Some of the initiatives will have immediate impact, while others, by their nature, will take more time to make a difference. What is clear is that we have a blueprint and a roadmap and we are well on the way to its implementation.

BSS: Dhaka-Delhi ties witnessed an initial euphoric phase soon after Bangladesh's independence with crucial Indian support. But in subsequent years it saw several ups and downs particularly after the 1975 political changeover in Bangladesh. Most analysts said an opportunity has now come for both the countries to take this ties to a new height by resolving longstanding issues. What do you think about it?

Prime Minister: India has always valued its relations with Bangladesh based on sovereign equality and mutual respect. Besides several common features, our relationship is anchored in shared history and similar developmental aspirations. Our destines are interlinked. Hence it is natural for both sides to follow the path of close cooperation and partnership.

The Government of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina has shown the political will and desire to not only resolve longstanding issues, but to broaden the horizons of our cooperation. We hold the wishes of the people of Bangladesh in the highest esteem. I agree that both our countries have an historic opportunity before them to open a new chapter in the relationship. My visit to Bangladesh is a demonstration of India's readiness to do so.

BSS: South Asia region in recent years witnesses a growing campaign for enhanced regional connectivity and most Bangladeshis also now believe isolation in this age of globalization would retard their progress. Yet there are some concerns among certain quarter in Bangladesh about offering transit facilities to India. How would you dispel the fears?

Prime Minister: This is entirely a sovereign decision for Bangladesh to take. We respect whatever decision Bangladesh takes. However, I see no reason for Bangladesh to be fearful of improving transport and infrastructure connectivity with India. There is a lot that can be done for the benefit of both countries in this regard, including through inland waterways.

I am extremely pleased that the Chief Ministers of the States neighbouring Bangladesh will be accompanying me to Bangladesh. Bangladesh can become the springboard for the development of India's North-East Regional economic integration has become the trend in all parts of the world. India has, for example, opened up rail and road routes for transit to link Nepal and Bhutan with Bangladesh. Nevertheless, we will move only at a pace with which Bangladesh is comfortable.

BSS: As a big neighbor how India looks at the socioeconomic progress of Bangladesh under the leadership of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina? Don't you think that India has a great role to play in promoting economic development of its South-Asian neighbours as a whole by rendering assistance to the smaller countries?

Prime Minister: Bangladesh has experienced sustained and high rates of economic growth under the leadership of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina. We commend her leadership. As a neighbouring country, we welcome and support the socio-economic advancement of Bangladesh. Bangladesh has taken major strides in women empowerment, child welfare, entrepreneurship and democracy at the grassroots level. Its social indicators have shown a constant and steady improvement. We are ready to render whatever assistance we can within our resources to enable Bangladesh to realise its enormous development potential.

India is ready to play its part in the building of a prosperous and peaceful South Asia. All our countries have a lot to learn from each other, and a lot to share. Our destinies are linked by geography and history. It is up to us to shape our future by cooperating and collaborating with each other. We would like India's economic growth to be seen as an opportunity by our neighbours, particularly Bangladesh. India will leave no stone unturned to promoting balanced, sustainable and inclusive development of the entire South Asia region.

BSS: Terrorism has gripped a number of countries in the South Asia region hindering socioeconomic development. How India and Bangladesh could fight together this menace more effectively?

Prime Minister: Security remains a common concern for both our countries. Terrorists and criminals do not respect any national borders. They pose a serious threat to peace, stability and prosperity of each and every country. It is therefore paramount importance that we work together to confront this challenge head on. We must not allow our territories to be used for activities inimical to interests of the other. I am happy that India and Bangladesh recognize this imperative and have been cooperating well in the recent past.

BSS: Sir, what message will you carry to Dhaka during your visit for the people of Bangladesh?

Prime Minister: The message that I have for the people of Bangladesh is that there is great affection, respect and regard for the people of Bangladesh in our country, and that it will be my effort to work with Her Excellency the Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina to strengthen our links in trade, in economy, in investment, in culture, in security matters, in every possible way that we have outlined in the joint communiqué which was issued in January, 2010.

BSS: Sir, a very personal question.

Prime Minister: Yes.

BSS: Hilsa fish is very popular in India. I think you are a vegetarian, Sir. Singh: I am vegetarian.

BSS: Sir, we would like to offer you Hilsa.
Prime Minister: I am willing to break my vegetarian vow because I have heard about the delicious dish of hilsa fish. So, I am willing to make that exception.

BSS: Finally, Sir, we want strong, stable and good Bangladesh-India relationship.

Prime Minister: I assure you. I was in Bangladesh very soon after Sheikh Sahib came to power in December 1971, I and Bangladesh officials, particularly Nurul Islam Sir who was then the Chairman of the Planning Commission, jointly worked out an economic vision of our relationship. Since that time I have been very much involved in the development of India-Bangladesh of relations, and it has been my effort to strengthen this relationship in every possible way. Our destinies are closely interlined. Therefore, whatever I can do as Prime Minister of India to strengthen, widen, deepen our relationship with the friendly people and Government of Bangladesh, I will do all that is necessary.

BSS: Sir, thank you very much.

Prime Minister: Thank you

The bilateral visit by the Prime Minister is happening after a gap of 12 years. We are trying to put in place a broad-based agenda of cooperation in areas including trade and investments, infrastructure, power, water resources, border management, education, cultural contacts, people-to-people exchanges, better border and transport infrastructure or what is called connectivity.

Both sides are determined to iron out any divergences and lay a firm foundation of mutually beneficial engagement, to enhance trust, cooperation and stability not only between our countries but in South Asia as a whole. 7. We have concluded the SOP for the facilitation of movement of trucks between the Land Customs Stations between India and Bangladesh.

8. The Bilateral Investment Protection and Promotion Agreement has been ratified.

As regards of Lines of Credits Projects you would recall that India had agreed to extend the largest ever Line of Credit of one billion dollars to Bangladesh, when Sheikh Hasina was here. I am happy to tell you that 13 of the 20 projects which we considered, which amount to about US$ 750 million, have already been finalized.

In the area of culture, the joint celebrations of the 150th birth anniversary of Rabindranath Tagore have been held.

In the recent months we have witnessed a number of high-level visits from India to Bangladesh reflective of the great attention that this relationship is receiving. These include the visit of our Commerce Minister in April, 2011, the Hon'ble Vice President in May, External Affairs Minister and Home Minister in July. Shrimati Sonia Gandhi, Chairperson of the UPA, also visited Dhaka in July for an autism conference when she was awarded the Bangladesh Swadhinata Sammanona (Bangladesh Freedom Honour) Award on behalf of the late Prime Minister Shrimati Indira Gandhi for the latter's contribution to the "liberation of Bangladesh".

We are pleased at the manner in which our ties have evolved in the recent years. We are particularly appreciative of the sensitivity shown by the Government of Bangladesh to India's security concerns. Sizeable Indian investments have started to flow into Bangladesh and the pace is likely to pick up in the months and years ahead. Two-way trade has crossed five billion dollars in 2010-11, and Bangladesh exports to India have grown by 68 per cent in the last one year. We acknowledge that there is still a large trade imbalance favouring India, which we are determined to address by providing better market access into India for Bangladeshi goods, and we are also thinking of other imaginative measures.

The Prime Minister of India is looking forward to his visit starting tomorrow. Thank you.
Question: Mr. Mathai, how does the absence of the Chief Minister of West Bengal, or Paschim Banga, affect the signing of the river waters sharing agreements, Teesta and Feni?

Foreign Secretary: As you know, the subject of water, it is acknowledged, is a very sensitive issue. And we have been trying to arrive at an agreement on the Teesta which is acceptable to all parties. In our federal scheme of things nothing is done or will be done without consultation with the State Government. Any agreement that we conclude will have to be acceptable to them. At the same time, it would also have to be acceptable to Bangladesh. I think that is very clearly understood. I would not like to get into further details of where we are now, but that is in effect what our position is right now.

Question: Sir, what is the basic reason for her not going to Bangladesh? There are reports in the newspapers but we are in the dark. Could you please clarify this?

Foreign Secretary: Actually I have also seen the reports in the newspapers, I have not seen the actual reasons. But what I have understood from the newspapers is that it relates to the Teesta agreement.

Question: But has she formally admitted to the Prime Minister?

Official Spokesperson: The question has been answered already.

Question: Sir, there is a report in some local channels in West Bengal today that in fact Teesta pact is not going to happen I think as a result of Mamata Banerjee’s absence. So, can you give us some clarity on whether the treaty will actually go ahead?

Foreign Secretary: I think I have already said that any agreement we conclude will have to be acceptable to West Bengal and also to Bangladesh.

Question: Sir, can you help us understand if the Chief Minister of West Bengal was adequately consulted by the Centre? I know you are not the nodal Ministry but you are the Ministry in charge. Also, what about the extradition treaty and Anup Chetia’s fate?

Foreign Secretary: I can only recall what I said that in our federal scheme of things nothing is done or will be done without consultation with the State Government. As regards the extradition treaty, it is still under discussion. As regards Mr. Anup Chetia, the matter came up when the Home Minister visited Dhaka in the month of July and we were told that the procedures under which Bangladesh is to consider further action are still under way. We respect that.

Question: Sir, this problem of illegal migration from Bangladesh has assumed drastic proportions in Assam and in parts of West Bengal. The Home Minister had already described it as a serious issue. In its recent report, the Institute of Defence and Strategic Studies suggested that Bangladesh should be made to acknowledge that this issue arises. So, what steps is the Government of India taking to take up with the Government of Bangladesh to accept the reality of this issue, and also take up other issues like extradition treaty so that there is smooth deportation of people who come illegally into India?

Foreign Secretary: This subject of migration was discussed when the Home Minister visited Dhaka. I think the issue was also looked at in the context of the Border Management Plan which has been accepted by both countries. In regard to extradition I have already said that this matter is still under discussion. We certainly intend to pursue this.

Question: Mr. Mathai, coming back to the Teesta water sharing agreement, the general impression is that the West Bengal Chief Minister had agreed to a certain quantity of water being released for Bangladesh and now the Centre is giving more. Could you please clarify what was the quantity which was actually agreed upon?

Foreign Secretary: This is a matter actually being dealt with by the Ministry of Water Resources. As I have said already, I do not want to go beyond that. Anything that is agreed between India and Bangladesh would have to be acceptable to the State of West Bengal and we have consulted and we will continue to consult the State Government.

Question: Sir, is the Prime Minister going to be meeting with opposition leaders there? And is the relationship still just hinging on Sheikh Hasina and Awami League, or is there a Plan B in action? What if Awami League is not there anymore? If the Jamaat and the others come into power, then what happens? Every time it has been one step forward and two steps backward with relationship with Bangladesh. Now where?

Foreign Secretary: The Prime Minister will be receiving Begum Khaleda Zia who is the Leader of the Opposition. He will also be meeting Gen. Ershad who is the leader of the Jatiya Party, which of course is part of the Coalition in Bangladesh. Our contacts with Begum Khaleda Zia have been ongoing. Both the Vice-President and the External Affairs Minister during their visits to Dhaka had also met Begum Khaleda Zia. We have been engaging in discussions with the Opposition party whenever the occasion is appropriate. And we would certainly hope that the manner in which the Indo-Bangladesh relationship has been progressing, particularly in those areas which bring benefit and connectivity to the people-to-people contacts, these would be appreciated and accepted by all sections of opinion in that country.
Question: You said that an understanding has been reached between India and Bangladesh on issues of security concern. Can you explain that?

Foreign Secretary: Subsequent to the visit last year we have had three agreements which have been concluded. One was on the transfer of sentenced prisoners. One was on what is called Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty (MLAT). The third was an agreement on combating terrorism, illicit-trafficking in drugs. These are the kinds of areas. Of course, you are aware that we have made very substantial progress in the last year or two in the security-related matters. Bangladesh has been extremely helpful on this score. During the Home Minister's visit we have had very productive discussions on, as I said, the overall management of our border, and dealing with each other's security concerns.

Question: Mr. Mathai, strip maps have been prepared by the two sides - so have all boundary related issues including that of enclaves been sorted out? How much is the loss of territory for us?

Foreign Secretary: I would like to just say that the effort which is under way is to implement the agreement which was signed in 1974. So, it is a very long time that we have been unable to conclude the demarcation of the boundary, the exact boundary between the two countries. The issues of the adverse possessions in the enclaves flow out of that. This is a very major task. We believe it will be a very major achievement. Once that is completed, only then we will be able to address the issues. I do not think we have to look at this issue in terms of loss or gain of territory. It is the implementation of an agreement which was actually signed in 1974 and had not been ratified because of these pending issues.

Question: What are some of the other agreements that are expected to be signed in the next two days, that are expected actually to be concluded?

Foreign Secretary: Actually, I do not want to prejudge the outcome of the visit before it takes place. But we would look at areas including trade and connectivity, the land boundary as we have been talking about, water resources, culture, the area of environment, these are broadly the areas. Is there anything I have left out? Would you like to say something?

Joint Secretary (BMS) (Shri Harsh Vardhan Shringla): There is also fisheries; there is also textiles in terms of design between the National Institutes in both countries; there is also television cooperation in terms of television institutes. There is a number of agreements, as the Foreign Secretary has said, and I think it is only on that particular day that we will have a full list. But, for the time being it is indicative of areas that we would be concluding agreements in.
Question: Is the border agreement likely to be signed or is that still being worked out?

Foreign Secretary: We will see it on the 7th.

Question: Sir, anything on railways cooperation?

Foreign Secretary: We are working on possibilities of railway cooperation. I would also like to mention that of the Line of Credit of $1 billion a very large amount is in fact both railways and road transport.

Question: When did the Bengal Chief Minister’s office officially conveyed to the Centre that she will not be travelling to Dhaka with the Prime Minister?

Foreign Secretary: I frankly do not know because I was not the person who received the message. So, I cannot tell you.

Question: Bangladesh has also been seeking extradition of two alleged killers of Bangabandhu who are believed to be in India. Is there work in progress in that? There are reports of Indian Mujahideen’s footprints in Bangladesh especially in the context of the recent Mumbai blasts. Will that also be on the table?

Foreign Secretary: As I understand, both these issues were in fact discussed when the Home Minister went to Dhaka. The Home Minister did assure the Bangladesh authorities that in whatever way we could cooperate, we would in fact cooperate with them in this matter. We have been assured by Bangladesh that our security concerns are very much in their minds when they are looking at the issue of security cooperation.

Question: There was one off transit arrangement when Sheikh Hasina came to India ...(Inaudible)... project in Tripura through Ashuganj-Kolkata roadway and from Akhaura to Tripura. And the other was there is Rangpur-Singabhad, that was India’s giving that access. That was one off thing. Are you going to kind of make this transit agreement common which happen only for once? And the other is that there are 61 items India is going to give market access to Bangladesh which has been reported, out of which 47 are textile based items. Can you elaborate on that whether that is going to happen?

Foreign Secretary: First of all on the transit related issues, the Akhaura-Agartala rail link is one of the issues we are working on, as I said. On Rangpur-Singabhad, I will ask my colleague to elaborate.

Joint Secretary (BMS): I think as you mentioned both of these were given on a trial basis. But I think we are looking to operationalise Ashuganj. In fact, bulk cargo movement is already beginning. Rohanpur-Singabad, of course as and when there are requests we are accommodating them on that sector.

Foreign Secretary: I would like to add that broadly speaking we are trying to look at the whole issue of these transport connections in a way which makes commercial sense, that is to try and take it out of the ambit of very strictly governmental arrangements and to see that once the facility is developed, leave it to the market forces to ensure that it works in a smooth and transparent manner. To your second question, yes textiles is one of the major chunk of the requests which Bangladesh had conveyed to us. As I said, these are being addressed very seriously and you will hear the outcome on the 7th.

Question: Mr. Mathai, will Mamata's absence in any way mar the importance or minimize the importance of this crucial trip of Prime Minister to Dhaka? Do you think so?

Foreign Secretary: I think the fact that the Prime Minister is taking Chief Ministers is very important, very significant of the importance we attach to this relationship. Certainly the presence of one more Chief Minister would have been very useful but I do not wish to comment on that.

Question: Foreign Secretary, you did not mention the name of the West Bengal Chief Minster as part of the Prime Minister's delegation, and you also explained that no agreements will be there without the State support. Does it mean that the water sharing agreement is off the table?

Foreign Secretary: I would just like to say that the water sharing agreement I think I have already explained it in great detail that nothing will be done without consultation with the State Government. This is the position as it is now. Beyond that I do not wish to comment.

Question: Are you still hopeful that something will work out?

Foreign Secretary: I think I do not want to speculate at this point as to what will or will not be the outcome.

Question: Sir, you have been saying that as long as the State Government does not agree, we cannot go ahead with the Teesta waters agreement. But what about Feni, the other one? This was also on the table. Has this also been put off or what?

Foreign Secretary: My understanding is that on the Feni that whatever was being planned is under way and we should be able to reach a conclusion on it. But as I said, the actual outcome, I will only be able to confirm to you when the visit does take place.
Question: Sir, Bangladesh has always been averse to erection of fences along the border. Now that we are going to conclude this Border Management Agreement, will there be any issue after the agreement is signed if we go ahead with fencing the border to contain illegal immigration issue?

Foreign Secretary: I think my colleague who was part of the Border Management Plan discussions could answer this question.

Joint Secretary (BMS): The signing of the Comprehensive Border Management Plan during Home Minister's visit to Bangladesh addresses the issue of fencing on vulnerable and priority patches. So, it will certainly accelerate the process of fencing along the border where it is necessary and certainly will lead to more coordinated action to address the issues of security on both sides.

Question: Mr. Mathai, you spoke about transfer of prisoners. Are there any prisoners that will be sent back to Bangladesh from India or that have been sent back?

Foreign Secretary: I do not have the details. Do you have any details on that?

Joint Secretary (BMS): In the first instance both sides have agreed to share a list of sentenced prisoners. I think on our side we have certainly shared our entire list with the Bangladesh side. And I think this is going to be a normal trend from here onwards that we will declare those prisoners that are there in jails on both sides and accordingly governments can take action and start the legal process for transferring prisoners.

Question: How many Bangladeshi prisoners do we have?

Joint Secretary (BMS): That is a matter of detail. Obviously there is no static figure and I do not think at this time we can quantify the numbers.

Question: There was talk at one time of India using the Chittagong port for exports. Is anything happening on that … front?

Foreign Secretary: I think discussions on Chittagong and Mongla ports are at a fairly advanced stage. As I said, the broad outline is that it would be in the form of an enabling provision and actual implementation will be dependent on the commercial elements of whatever we agreed to. Yes, Chittagong and Mongla are on the anvil.

Question: A lot of experts have written on this visit. One of the western press has written that this visit is historic in one way and it will have a terrific, it will touch regional security issues also. In that they have little nasty I would say, mentioned about China that transit routes which will be allowed can be used in other ways in other times. Can you comment on that that how this visit, and if and when transit route is allowed, if and when borders … is finally settled, which will be a historical event, how it will change the mood in the region and security issues in the region?

Foreign Secretary: I think we see this as a very major, very substantive visit. As I said, this is the first visit in 12 years by an Indian Prime Minister bilaterally to Bangladesh. We have had visits in the context of SAARC and bilaterally. The visit of the Bangladesh Prime Minister here last year has been prescribed as landmark. I think the fact that we have been able to actually make progress on those decisions which were taken a year and a half ago already shows that there is a major shift in our relations. The kind of discussions the Prime Minister will engage in and the levels of cooperation which we expect to enter into with Bangladesh would I think create, if I may use the expression again, a paradigm shift in our relationship with Bangladesh when cooperation is seen as a natural, it is seen as being in the mutual interest of the people of both countries, and really takes us forward. And we have also engaged in a discussion with the Bangladesh authorities on projects for the future. In broad framework terms, what are the areas in which we can cooperate in which we have looked at not only just purely bilateral but including subregional and regional levels of cooperation. I think once those take effect you will see a very major transformation in the eastern part of our subcontinent. And that is I think the direction in which the Prime Minister would like to move this relationship. I do not think we see it in terms of a zero sum game with the Chinese. No, we see this as being relevant to the entire SAARC region and beyond that, the regional cooperation in the eastern part of our country.

Question: I would like ask you on the enclaves. Could you throw some light on the enclaves and the size of these enclaves?

Foreign Secretary: This is a very detailed subject and will take a considerable amount of time as well as a lot of detail to trying to get you that. But the important point I think is that the exchange of enclaves which is being envisaged flows out of the agreement we are reaching to finally demarcate our boundary. And that is the first step which we need. The enclaves will follow. But if you want the full details, once the agreements are all done I am sure we will be able to sit down with you and give you a long list between us and the State Governments.

Question: The kind of questions being asked notwithstanding, the fact remains that this is again changing the kind of visit it has immense potentialities for expanding trade in South Asia and Southeast Asia and the use of Chittagong and Mangla. So, you have certain last mile problems as regards connectivity which used to exist before Partition which was why British Raj was a jewel in the British Crown. Now all that we are trying to do is restoring the connectivity to pre-1947 or whatever. So, how many months or years will be required for the use of Chittagong and Mangla ports which are very important?

Foreign Secretary: The last mile is always the best mile, is not it? I cannot speculate on how long it will take. What I can tell you is that the manner in which the discussions have been held on dealing with these last mile issues has been very positive, very cooperative. It has to be recognized that it is not easy sometimes to overcome. If these last mile problems were easy to overcome they would have been overcome long ago. But it is on and I do not think it will be a very long time, certainly between now and way into the distant future. Our expectation is that it will be done fairly soon.

Question: Mr. Foreign Secretary, the issue of the using of extremism in the region has been worrisome for India especially from Bangladesh or using other neighbouring country against India. Now, we can see that the relation between India and Bangladesh has moved in a very good direction especially with Sheikh Hasina in power. What assurances are you having that these sleeping cells will not be awake when change of guard in the Government of Bangladesh takes place?

Foreign Secretary: As I said, we have already had a very substantive dialogue with the Bangladesh authorities. In fact, the three subjects on which the last agreement, I was just reminded by my colleague, one was terrorism, the other is organized crime and the third was the illegal trafficking in narcotics. We are confident. We have a dialogue which extends first of all at the level of our Prime Ministers; we have had the dialogue now at the level of our Home Ministers; we have a regular exchange between the Home Secretaries. Our security level dialogue has very dramatically improved in the last few years. We believe that with these steps we will be able to deal not only with the issues of the present but also we are confident that we should be able to deal with the problems that may arise in the future.

Question: Coming back to the Teesta agreement, as far as the reports are concerned, we were on the final stage of signing the agreement. Now according to you you are stepping back. Do you think there was something wrong on the part of the Centre that you have not consulted the State Governments like Mamata Banerjee, and now since Mamata is not agreeing you are not going to sign the agreement. And after that, will you ask Mamata Banerjee since the agreement is not going to be signed?

Foreign Secretary: As I said, nothing is done or will be done without consultation with the State Government. Any agreement we conclude will have to be acceptable to them. At the same time it would also have to be acceptable to Bangladesh.
Question: Are those consultations with Mamata Banerjee still on? That is the only question. It is not a closed chapter?

Foreign Secretary: I do not want to get into the details.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much.

 RESPONSE OF FOREIGN SECRETARY RANJAN MATHAI TO QUESTIONS REGARDING TEESTA AGREEMENT.

New Delhi, September 5, 2011.

In response to questions on the ongoing discussions on Teesta Agreement with Bangladesh, Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai said,

"The subject of water is a sensitive issue. We have been trying to arrive at an agreement on Teesta which is acceptable to all parties. In our federal scheme of things, nothing is done or will be done without consultations with the State Government. Any agreement that we conclude will have to be acceptable to the State Government; at the same time, it would also have to be acceptable to Bangladesh".

Question: Are those consultations with Mamata Banerjee still on? That is the only question. It is not a closed chapter?

These remarks of Foreign Secretary were made in view of Chief Minister of West Bengal having some reservations on the share of West Bengal state in the Teesta Waters as envisaged in the proposed Agreement.
I will be visiting Bangladesh tomorrow at the invitation of the Prime Minister of Bangladesh Her Excellency Ms. Sheikh Hasina. This will be my first bilateral visit to Bangladesh.

We attach the highest importance to further developing and strengthening our relations with Bangladesh. Our relations with Bangladesh are rooted in history, culture and the struggle for freedom. Both our countries share common democratic values and development aspirations.

During the visit, I will be accompanied by the Chief Ministers of all the Northeast States neighbouring Bangladesh. This reflects our desire to have across the board engagement with Bangladesh, so that the fruits of our cooperation are available to people on both sides of the border.

Our two countries are today witnessing an extraordinary period of cooperation and friendship. My visit will provide an opportunity to review the progress achieved in the implementation of the decisions taken during the historic visit of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina to India in 2010. It is a matter of satisfaction that we have made concrete progress in several areas such as security, boundary issues, water resources, power connectivity, improvement of border infrastructure, trade facilitation and economic cooperation. Our endeavour will be to sustain and build upon this positive momentum.

I expect my visit to lead to greater cooperation between India and Bangladesh in all these areas. We also expect to conclude concrete agreements which will help us to elevate the level of our cooperation in the traditional areas of cooperation and to develop cooperation in new areas.

During my visit, I will call on the President of Bangladesh His Excellency Mr. Mohammad Zillur Rahman, and meet the leaders of other political parties in Bangladesh. I look forward to addressing a cross-section of Bangladeshi society at the Dhaka University.

As a close neighbour and friend, India is committed to extending its full support to Bangladesh in its development efforts. Our partnership with Bangladesh is important for the stability and prosperity of own Northeast region. It is a partnership which can have a profound positive impact on the South Asian region as a whole.

208. Media Briefing by Foreign Secretary Ranjan Mathai during Prime Minister’s visit to Bangladesh.

Dhaka, September 6, 2011.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): Good evening and sorry to keep you waiting. As you are aware PM Sheikh Hasina was hosting an official banquet for the Prime Minister and his delegation. It has just gotten over and Foreign Secretary immediately rushed across to interact with you. He is joined by our High Commissioner to Dhaka.

Trust you have received all the ten documents that were signed today, as also texts of PM’s remarks to the media and the banquet. FS would like to share some thoughts with you with brief opening remarks and thereafter will be happy to take your questions.

Sir, the floor is yours.

Foreign Secretary (Shri Ranjan Mathai): As the Prime Minister has also said when addressing the media, we have all been struck by the warmth of the welcome accorded to us here in Bangladesh. The fact that we have several Chief Ministers of India’s Northeastern States reflects our desire to project, to ensure this visit is seen as one of intensifying the friendship and tactical cooperation between our two countries.

The background of course to the Prime Minister’s discussions was the historic visit of Sheikh Hasina, Prime Minister of Bangladesh, who came to India last year. And what the Prime Minister did look at is the extent to which we have been able to accomplish many of the goals that were set out during that 2010 visit.

They did find that they had in fact made very great progress in these areas but also that the kind of success they have had so far simply cannot be taken for granted, and that we have to more steps to make the friendship, cooperation, the collaboration between our two countries irreversible, making it a kind of, in normal course you might say, like a habit of cooperation between our two countries.

The planning for the future is encapsulated in what is called the Framework Agreement on Cooperation for Development which I think all of you have seen. It was signed by the two Prime Ministers. The Prime Minister also noted, and this was acknowledged, that the one billion dollar line of credit which was extended in January, 2010 has been in fact substantially utilised and to the extent of commitments of about 750 dollars, mostly in the area of transport and transport infrastructure.
Today we also signed the Protocol to the 1974 Land Boundary Agreement thus bringing to a conclusion, if I might say, to a chapter which began in 1974. As the Prime Minister of Bangladesh repeated again and again, this was an agreement signed in 1974 by her father the first Prime Minister of Bangladesh and Madam Indira Gandhi, then the Indian Prime Minister.

Our Prime Minister while acknowledging that this was a major step forward noted that we have been able to make this progress because of the cooperation of the State Governments who had to assist in the process of demarcation on the ground, and he thanked the Chief Ministers for their cooperation on that.

The issue of border management has been addressed in a number of different fora between our two countries, most recently when our Home Minister visited Bangladesh in July and they completed the Border Management Plan. The two Prime Ministers reviewed the functioning of this Border Management Plan and said that this is really an opportunity for us to work together and ensure that the kind of incidents which have taken place on the border do not take place, that we develop new structures and methods of cooperating across the border.

The issue of border infrastructure, the improvement of our transportation links was also one of the issues discussed, as was increased trade through Land Customs Stations, Integrated Check Posts, Border Haats and so on. As you are aware, the movement of goods through Ashuganj to India has already begun, and we are hoping to make some progress on the Akhaura-Agartala rail link. On this particular issue we had an exchange of information between the two Railways. We have not been able to complete that exercise yet, but we hope that we will be able to take this forward.

On the electricity supply, the work on the transmission lines for supply of bulk power to Bangladesh is making progress, and we hope that with the completion of this India would be able to contribute to meeting the electricity demand of Bangladesh.

Prime Minister also announced in the area of trade that India would be giving duty-free access, which means zero per cent duty, on 46 textile tariff lines which are of great sensitivity for Bangladesh into the Indian market. He also assured that as we move forward we would be willing to look at other measures to address the issue of Bangladesh’s trade balance which is the large trade deficit with India. We have also pointed out that one way this could be addressed, one way the issue of economic development could be taken forward is by having greater Indian investments into Bangladesh.

The Prime Minister recalled also the great assistance received from Bangladesh in terms of dealing with security-related matters. This was one of the big issues discussed when the two Prime Ministers met last year and there have been a number of steps taken by the two Governments to take this forward.
The two Prime Ministers also reaffirmed that they would be willing to cooperate not just in a purely bilateral setting but in a sub-regional setting with the other countries in the sub-region, as also regional whether it is SAARC and also across the region in BIMSTEC and other fora.

I think this kind of a roundup of the issues which were discussed will give you a flavor of the extraordinary depth as well as the variety of our relationship.

There is one issue which we had thought we might conclude before we came here, I addressed this in New Delhi, was in regard to the sharing of river waters. We were not able to take forward the proposed agreement on the Teesta. That will need some further consideration and further discussion. Because of that the river waters issue itself was not tackled in great depth today. The other agreement on the Feni also was not signed.

I will leave it there and take such questions as you might have.

Question: Mr. Mathai, the sense of disappointment that we gathered from the Bangladesh side, from the people that we met in the Prime Minister’s house, seemed fairly acute. And ... (Inaudible) ... obviously concentrated on the Teesta issue. They also indicated that the Land Boundary Agreement almost did not get signed. So, we were wondering if you could share your thoughts on the matter.

Foreign Secretary: On what you are saying about the Teesta, as I said in Delhi, we had hoped to make this another step forward. That has not been possible. This will require further consultations within India, in our own system. As regards the land boundary, there were a couple of issues which still had to be tackled, which is why there was requirement for further discussion. Once that discussion was completed, we did in fact sign it.

Question: Sir, there is a report in the Bangladesh media that the Indian High Commissioner was called to the Foreign Affairs Ministry of Bangladesh and they protested against whatever happened with the Teesta river water-sharing agreement. Is it true?

Foreign Secretary: I have to ask the High Commissioner who is sitting right here.

Indian High Commissioner to Bangladesh (Shri Rajeet Mitter): It is true I met the Foreign Secretary this morning. All High Commissioners and Ambassadors regularly meet the Foreign Secretary. It was not about Teesta in particular, it was generally in the context of the Prime Minister’s visit, the programme, the documents that were to be signed. So, it was an all encompassing discussion. I do not think one should read too much into it because we meet Foreign Secretaries very regularly.
Question: The two sides were also supposed to exchange documents on the transit. There was supposed to be roadmap on taking the protocols forward. At least that had not been addressed in this.

Foreign Secretary: There was no protocol generally on transit. What we had thought we would do was to have an exchange of letters on the use of Chittagong and Mongla ports. The Government, as it had been drafted and negotiated, dealt with the issue in broad terms and said that many of the aspects of that like the actual utilization, for example the costs and so on, would be determined by the market as it developed. There was a feeling here in Bangladesh that it would be advisable before you move to that step to try and develop a framework and an understanding between the two Governments as to how these charges would be fixed, who would fix them, we have to have a Committee and so on. So, as we went into this in some detail we found that we would need another round of discussion perhaps with some more of our experts on our side. So, it has been just put for another round of discussions. So, discussions will continue on this.

Question: You would not see it as a politically difficult issue for the Prime Minister, the Teesta not being signed?

Foreign Secretary: I would not rather speculate on that part. But this is what actually transpired.

Question: Mr. Mathai, regarding this Land Boundary Agreement you have said that the Prime Minister has thanked the Chief Ministers of the four Indian States for their cooperation in finalizing the agreement. A question arises here that can the permission of the Chief Ministers of the States alone lead to a change in the boundaries of the State without the permission or the consent of the State Assemblies? You cannot change the boundaries of a State only with the consent of the Chief Minister. There are certain Constitutional provisions in the Indian Constitution.

Foreign Secretary: I think I have to clarify that. We were not changing any boundaries. There were segments amounting to I think about 6.5 kilometres which were un-demarcated. That means there was no boundary there. And it had been difficult to actually undertake the demarcation because of certain delays which had accumulated over the years since the 1970s in Tripura, in Assam, and in Meghalaya and also in Paschim Banga. We got the full support of the Governments concerned in ensuring that the surveyors could carry out their work. I think that is what we were referring to. The demarcation, which is a very complex exercise, was completed. Then strip maps had to be prepared. These were of course prepared by the Surveyors of our Central Government but at each point you need the assistance of the State Surveyors. They have to be there, they have to authenticate, they have to verify. So, it is that process which has been completed.

Question: Sir, for early implementation of the Teesta agreement after this visit, what is your future course of action? What is your future roadmap? I think Bangladesh is also in a hurry. Will you share with us what your action plan is now? Did they give any deadline on that?

Foreign Secretary: I think the interest in having a quick agreement is shared by both sides. It is not that it is only Bangladesh which wants an early agreement. We would also like to have this issue resolved. I will be very frank with you, I do not have a timeline, and I do not have a specific plan of action. Obviously this issue came up quite recently when we were engaged in doing the preparations for the visit. I think it will take some time. When we go back we will have our deliberations on the matter.

Question: Mr. Mathai, what about the stateless people who are on the borders of both the countries? Any specific dates for exchanging the lands or exchanging the people? There were no specific dates announced in the Joint Statement, Sir?

Foreign Secretary: I think the issue is not so much 'stateless' in the classical sense of the word but those for whom the headcount was carried out after the exercise started in the joint survey, people living in so-called enclaves and in adverse possessions. The provision in the agreement which we are trying to work on is that they will have the option of either staying there or moving to the country of their choice. The headcount found that the bulk of them would prefer to stay where they are. So, the issue will be resolved on that basis.

Question: On the question of Teesta, today in her banquet speech Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina has said that we have reached an understanding on the sharing of Teesta and Feni. What is the conclusion you have reached? What does that 'understanding' mean? Have you agreed for a joint survey or joint management?

Foreign Secretary: I do not think I should comment on what the Prime Minister of Bangladesh said.

Question: Sir, we heard about the point made by the Prime Minister of India which essentially concentrated on the issues that India is more keen to tackle as far as Bangladesh, long-pending issues that are there with Bangladesh and most of them are essentially, if I am not mistaken, if I have not read wrongly into it, are the ones that India is providing to Bangladesh. My question to you, Sir, is what is India's take away from this whole cooperation and the agreements that you have reached there? What is India's take away?
Foreign Secretary: I will start with the land boundary. I think it is an important step to have your own boundary finally clarified. Please remember that this is the longest boundary we share with any country in the world, the Indo-Bangladesh border. And having it un-demarcated, incomplete to that extent, for such a long period of time involves ...(Inaudible)... So, whether it is in terms of border management, whether security, the completion of this exercise I think is a very big take away as far as we are concerned. Secondly, I think the relationship between our two countries has to be seen not just in terms of 'I get what and you get what'. It is the development of an entirely new paradigm of cooperation, a constructive collaboration with one of our most important neighbours. I must underline this, sometimes it is not recognized just how big and how vital a neighbour Bangladesh is for us. To have a country of this size, this capability on a regular cooperative basis, friendly dialogue working together is I think a very big take away as far as India is concerned. Thirdly, I think the steps we are discussing we hope to be able to move forward on that. The framework agreement refers to them but we have to flesh it out in actual details is the question of transport connectivity. We would like to and we expect that this would emerge over a period of time certainly improve connections between the Northeastern States and the rest of India.

Question: According to the recent survey, there are about 51,590 people living in the enclaves. You just said that majority of them do not want to move to any of the states. Do you have any figure on that?

Foreign Secretary: No, I am relying on the joint headcount which was carried out by the two Governments and the conclusions of that. I do not have a specific figure.

Question: I just wanted to know from you whether Teesta did cast a shadow on the discussions today. Secondly, we spoke to some Bangladeshi people here and they are saying that this Teesta water-sharing agreement is in the discussion level for the last 20 months. It started when Sheikh Hasina visited Delhi. Twenty months were enough time to discuss and prepare a roadmap. At the last moment Mamata Banerjee says she is not interested and that is why Teesta falls from the list. Does that mean bad preparation by the Indian Government?

Foreign Secretary: I will go back to what I said in New Delhi that in our federal scheme things any agreement of this nature is done on the basis of consultations with the State Governments. There is consultation and there will be consultation. Certainly it could have been an addition to the outcomes and conclusions, if we had had the agreement in place. But clearly this is something on which there is more work to be done.
Question: At this stage, can it be categorically stated that a Teesta water-sharing agreement with Bangladesh cannot be ruled out in future?

Foreign Secretary: I am not ruling out or ruling in but certainly the intention is to move towards a water-sharing agreement.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you.

209. Statement of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at joint media interaction with Prime Minister of Bangladesh.

Dhaka, September 06, 2011.

Your Excellency Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina,

Distinguished Ministers,

Honourable Chief Ministers,

Ladies and gentlemen of the media,

I thank Her Excellency Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina for her very kind words of welcome. I also thank the government and people of Bangladesh for the gracious hospitality and excellent arrangements made for my visit to this beautiful country.

This is my second visit to Bangladesh as Prime Minister after 2005. I am deeply impressed by the changes that have taken place since then. The Bangladesh economy is doing well and the socio-economic transformation of Bangladesh is proceeding rapidly ahead.

Relations between India and Bangladesh enjoy our highest priority. There is a national consensus in India that India must develop the best possible relations with Bangladesh.

Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina and I have had very wide-ranging and indepth discussions. These have built upon the momentum of the Prime Minister’s historic visit to India in 2010.

We have agreed on a new architecture for our partnership. This will open new vistas of bilateral cooperation, strengthen regional cooperation within South Asia and set an example of good neighbourly relations.
The Framework Agreement on Cooperation for Development that Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina and I have signed is a contemporary blueprint designed to encompass all forms and sectors of cooperation.

We have signed a Protocol to the Land Boundary Agreement of 1974. With this, both our countries have now demarcated the entire land boundary as well as resolved the status of enclaves and adversely possessed areas.

As the Prime Minister has just announced, we have worked out 24-hour access to the enclaves of Dahagram-Angarpota through the Tin Bigha Corridor.

Our common rivers need not be sources of discord, but can become the harbingers of prosperity to both our countries.

We have decided to continue discussions to reach a mutually acceptable, fair and amicable arrangement for the sharing of the Teesta and Feni river waters.

India is fully alive to the problem of trade imbalance between India and Bangladesh. I am pleased to announce that, with immediate effect, we will provide duty free access to the Indian market to 46 textile tariff lines as requested by Bangladesh.

We have embarked on a series of measures to improve border infrastructure. These will facilitate Bangladesh’s exports to India and provide it greater opening to India and other neighbouring countries. We are addressing issues relating to non-tariff barriers together with Bangladesh.

India is committed to assisting Bangladesh in its development efforts. We will supply bulk power to Bangladesh by connecting our national grids. We will assist in the setting up of a 1320 megawatt joint venture power plant in Khulna.

Projects worth over 750 million US dollars under the 1 billion US dollar Line of Credit announced last year have been identified for implementation.

I conveyed to Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina India’s deep appreciation for the cooperation rendered by Bangladesh in our joint fight against terrorism and insurgency. This has brought much needed stability to both of us, and to this region as a whole.

India is a true and genuine partner of Bangladesh. We will do the utmost to build this relationship on a sustained basis, and I believe this also reflects the approach of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina’s government.

The several agreements that have been signed and the Joint Statement that is being issued reflect the richness and diversity of our cooperation. We now have to ensure that the fruits of our cooperation lead to improvement in the lives of our people.
I am overall extremely satisfied with my discussions today. I convey my very best wishes to the people of Bangladesh, and once again thank them for the warm welcome given to us.

Thank you.

210. Speech of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Banquet hosted in his honour by Prime Minister of Bangladesh.

Dhaka, September 6, 2011.

Your Excellency Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina

Distinguished Guests,

I am delighted and honoured to be in Dhaka. I am touched by the warmth and friendship of the people of Bangladesh and the extraordinary hospitality accorded to me and members of my delegation.

Present here tonight are not only the leading dignitaries of Bangladesh, but also the Chief Ministers of all the States of our North-East bordering Bangladesh.

This is a unique and special moment. It is a demonstration of our collective will to shape a better future for ourselves.

There are few countries in the world whose destinies are so interlinked than ours. We are people of the same region. We share the same religious beliefs, language, customs and aspirations. We have a common ethos.

Madam Prime Minister,

I have come to Bangladesh to build upon your momentous visit to India last year.

We deeply value your commitment to strengthening India-Bangladesh relations. You have served your nation with great distinction. Your personal sacrifices and belief in the values of pluralism, democracy and human dignity have earned you respect throughout the world.

You have upheld the great legacy of your illustrious father, Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman.
Today, Bangladesh is in the midst of a major socio-economic transformation. Your economy has witnessed steady growth during the last several years. You have achieved commendable successes in eradicating poverty, hunger, illiteracy and disease. These are achievements Bangladesh can be justly proud of.

Our talks today and the agreements that have been signed represent a qualitative leap forward in our relations. We have found solutions to seemingly difficult problems; problems which had defied solutions for years.

We have done better. We have put in place a forward looking and comprehensive framework for cooperation in development. We have shown an openness of mind and heart to build bridges of collaboration across sectors.

It is befitting that in this atmosphere of hope and confidence, we are jointly celebrating the 150th Birth Anniversary of Rabindranath Tagore. The establishment of a Tagore Chair at Dhaka University, an India-Bangladesh Parliamentary Friendship Group in the Indian Parliament and the Indira Gandhi Cultural Centre in Dhaka will add to the intensity of people to people interaction.

Allow me to conclude by affirming India’s complete commitment to the progress and prosperity of Bangladesh. We desire to see a stable, secure and self-reliant Bangladesh. India will remain at your disposal in every sphere of your nation building efforts.

Excellency,

I once again thank you, the government and people of Bangladesh for the warm and gracious hospitality extended to us.

May relations between India and Bangladesh continue to flourish.

Thank you.

Fact Sheet on Trade Related Issues

India-Bangladesh trade relations have witnessed a significant improvement in the recent past. In 2010-11, two-way trade crossed the US$ 5 billion mark as a result of a significant increase in Bangladesh's exports to India (68% over the previous year) and India's exports to Bangladesh (43% over the previous year). Bangladesh's exports to India in 2010-11 was $512.5 million and India's exports to Bangladesh in the same period was US$ 4586.8 million. India is the biggest export destination for Bangladesh outside the Western world.

2. The main items of Bangladesh exports to India include Raw Jute ($159 million); Jute goods ($69 m); Fish ($56 m); Mineral distillates ($28 m); Fruits ($28m); Garments ($25 m); Copper/articles ($25 m); Minerals ($13 m); Cotton waste ($11m); Iron/Steel ($8 m) & articles ($11 m); Knitwear ($10m); Leather ($10 m); Ceramic ($7 m) etc.

3. The main items of Bangladesh imports from India include Cotton (raw, yarn, fabrics)-$1505.5 million; Vehicles & parts, other than rail rolling stock ($474m); Animal feed/ food waste ($300m); Boilers, machinery/mechanical appliances ($248m); Cereals ($209m); Iron & Steel ($173m); Organic chemicals ($131m); Electrical machinery & equipment ($115m); Vegetables/ roots & tubers ($111m); Mineral fuels/waxes/ bituminous products ($106 m); Plastics/articles ($97 m); Tanning chemicals ($82m); Man-made fibres ($74m); Rubber/articles ($65m); Coffee, tea, spices ($58m) etc. Inputs imported from India such as cotton, machinery, tanning chemicals etc. are used for value-addition for products such as Ready Made Garments, Knitwear, Leather goods etc., and get reflected in Bangladesh's trade surplus elsewhere.

4. Tariff concessions granted by India to Bangladesh under SAFTA (as SAARC LDC) include a zero-duty market access for ALL but 480 items in the sensitive list. India had further increased the duty-free access to 10 million pieces of readymade garments (RMG) from Bangladesh every year.

5. Taking into account the trade imbalance between the two countries in favour of India, the Prime Minister of India announced on September 6, 2011, during his visit to Bangladesh, the removal of all 46 textile items from the sensitive list and zero duty access in all these 46 items for Bangladesh exports to India. This unilateral gesture is expected to address a major and and long-standing demand from Bangladesh for increased market access for Bangladesh products to India.

6. India is upgrading seven main border Land Customs Stations (LCS) as Integrated Check Posts (ICPs) at a total cost of Rs. 467 crores. ICPs will have facilities for immigration, customs, parking, banks, warehousing, quarantine, fuelling etc The measure will help improve trade with Bangladesh across West Bengal, Assam, Meghalaya, Tripura and Mizoram. Movement of goods between the two countries is covered by the existing 'Protocol on Inland Water Transit and Trade (IWTT)' for use of waterways, 'Fundamental and Subsidiary Rules' guiding movement of railways, 'Standard Operating Procedures for movement of Trucks' between LCSs and 'Air Services Agreement'. Further, to restore the traditional economic and cultural links between people in adjoining states in India and Bangladesh, Border Haats have been established, starting with inauguration of Border Haat in Meghalaya.

7. Bilateral investment will be facilitated by the recent conclusion of the 'Bilateral Investment Protection & Promotion Agreement' and 'Convention for the Avoidance of Double Taxation' between the two countries. So far 225 Indian firms have proposed foreign direct investment totaling $558.77 million as 100% Indian-owned or JV proposals. In 2008 and 2009 the total Indian investment was $400 million. (Source: Board of Investment, BD, April 2011). It is hoped that Bangladesh investments in India will increase with easing of local currency transfer restrictions.

8. Given the geographical proximity, warm and friendly ties, availability of workforce and investment-supportive atmosphere, the quantum of Indian investment and trade with Bangladesh is further expected to improve for mutual benefit.

221. Address by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at the Dhaka University.

Dhaka, September 7, 2011.

I am delighted to be here today in the hallowed precincts of Dhaka University. We have just celebrated the holy festival of Id and I bring with me the good wishes, prayers and greetings of the people of India.

I thank the Vice Chancellor Professor Arefin Siddique and all students and faculty for inviting me to one of the finest seats of higher learning in South Asia. Many renowned scholars and thinkers have passed through its portals and brought glory to their motherland. As a teacher myself, I feel truly at home in this environment.

Dhaka University is more than just an institution of higher learning. It was here that the language movement began, culminating ultimately in the birth of a new proud nation and bringing a new dawn for a proud people.

Every year on Ekushey, thousands of people gather at the Shaheed Minar to pay homage to the martyrs of the language movement. It is an emotional outpouring of their love for their language, their country and their unique culture. It is a renewal of the dedication to the values and aspirations that guided you in your years of national struggle.

The Ekushey Book Fair has become among the largest attended literary events in the world, symbolizing Bangladesh's love for literature, fine arts and poetry.

It was here, at the University of Dhaka, that the fires of intellectual awakening and freedom began to glow.
I pay tribute to the memory of the students and teachers who were killed here defending what they believed in and to the memory of all those who laid down their lives for the liberation of Bangladesh.

I pay tribute to Bangabandhu Sheikh Mujibur Rahman who fought for his convictions and led the nation to freedom.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Bangladesh has firmly rejected extremist ideas and achieved success as an open, moderate and vibrant society and democracy.

India and Bangladesh share these values. Our people have a common civilisational heritage.

Both our countries have been deeply influenced by the tenets of Islam, which teaches peace, compassion and virtuous living. For centuries, our people have lived and worshipped together in harmony. Even today thousands of Indians and Bangladeshis from all creeds go to seek solace at the dargah in Ajmer Sharif.

Our lands and people have been sustained by the common waters of the mighty Ganga and the Brahmaputra. The verses of Gurudev Rabindranath Tagore and Kazi Nazrul Islam are read and revered on both sides of the border. This year we are jointly celebrating Gurudev's 150th birth centenary in a befitting manner.

We fought shoulder to shoulder during the struggle for liberation. Now we must join hands to meet the challenges of equitable social and economic development. We must fight poverty, hunger and disease.

We must live in peace and harmony as good neighbours just like our forefathers did. We must stand by each other in good times and in times of crisis as we have done in the past.

Ladies and Gentlemen:

India celebrates and takes pride in the achievements of the people of Bangladesh.

The world has watched with great admiration Bangladesh stand on its feet in the face of great odds.

The people of India have watched with admiration as the people of Bangladesh have fought poverty, overcome the vagaries of nature and survived political upheaval. And through all this, their faith in democracy has been strengthened.
They have turned out in record numbers in every election to exercise their democratic franchise.

The poor in the villages are finding new livelihoods. Women have become the back bone of the micro-credit sector and the textile industry. The middle class is growing rapidly. Social indicators are improving and in some cases are better than those in India.

Like India, Bangladesh has an active civil society and a vibrant and free media. The institutions of pluralistic democracy are gaining in experience and strength.

These are not small achievements for a young country.

Bangladesh is an influential member of the Islamic world where it is a voice of moderation and reason. It is the largest troop contributor to United Nations peacekeeping operations.

Bangladesh is an important voice of the developing world. It has much to say and contribute in the comity of nations and the affairs of the world. India will support Bangladesh’s efforts to play its due and commensurate role in regional and global affairs.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I have always believed that the destinies of the nations of South Asia are interlinked. We must believe in the vision of a shared future of common prosperity and fulfillment.

It was Bangladesh which proposed the creation of a South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation to give shape to a common South Asian identity and regional cooperation.

I have often said that the people of South Asia are second to none when it comes to their talent, their enterprise or their ability to cope with adversity. But to realize the potential of the region we have to believe in the power of cooperative effort. We have to learn to trust each other and work with each other in our enlightened self-interest.

There are difficulties and obstacles in the way of greater regional cooperation. But the people of our region have the imagination and maturity to find our own solutions to our own problems.

Our borders are a sovereign reality but we can make them frontiers of hope and opportunity as we work to build our common prosperity.

Ladies and Gentlemen,
The effective management of our borders is probably the biggest challenge we face in developing our bilateral relations.

The first essential step is to create a defined and peaceful boundary that will provide a stable and tranquil environment for cross-border cooperation.

That is why both our governments have worked hard to resolve the outstanding boundary issues in the spirit of give and take.

A Protocol was signed yesterday to finalise the unresolved issues of the enclaves, areas under adverse possession and undemarcated areas. This will be done without dislocating people living in the border areas. I congratulate both sides for arriving at this historic agreement in a spirit of friendship, mutual understanding and a desire to put these issues behind us.

India has agreed to 24 hour access across the Tin Bigha corridor. We have facilitated the electrification of Dahagram and Angarpota as a step towards improving the conditions of the people living there.

I am acutely conscious of the problems that arise due to the incidents on the border. We have now put in place mechanisms which we hope will greatly reduce the scope for such incidents and strengthen mutual trust and goodwill among the border guarding forces and people living in the border areas.

There must be even greater co-operation between our respective border forces to ensure that illegal trans-border activities do not cast any shadow on our bilateral relations.

Both India and Bangladesh are vulnerable to the forces of extremism and terrorism. Such forces sap the strength of our societies, threaten our state systems and impede our social and economic progress. It is therefore of paramount importance that we work together to confront this challenge.

I would like to acknowledge the immense cooperation India has received from Bangladesh in this area, which is in the interest of both India and Bangladesh.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Our economic cooperation is growing but is well below its potential.

We recognize the sensitivity of our Bangladeshi friends over the large bilateral trade deficit. We will work sincerely to address this issue.

I commit the Government of India to providing greater market access to Bangladeshi products in India by removing both tariff and non-tariff barriers to trade.
Yesterday the Government of India issued a notification removing all 46 textile tariff lines of greatest sensitivity to Bangladesh from the negative list for Least Developed Countries under SAFTA. There will be zero duty on Bangladeshi exports of these items to India with immediate effect. There will be no quota restrictions on these items.

In my view, what is of greater long-term importance is increased Indian investment in Bangladesh. This will not only lead to greater economic activity but also increase Bangladeshi exports to India and other countries. We should work on both fronts not only to reduce the trade deficit but increase and even multiply total trade.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

The world is in rapid ferment. Globalization and the growing inter-dependence of economies are creating new challenges and opportunities.

It is imperative for India and Bangladesh to find new pathways of cooperation to deal with the common challenges of development. The governments of both countries have the unfinished agenda of providing adequate food, adequate shelter and adequate healthcare to their people; protecting them from floods and other natural disasters and empowering them to earn a decent living.

Yesterday our two governments signed a Framework Agreement for Cooperation on Development. This agreement commits the two governments to work together in areas such as agriculture, health, education and culture. We have identified other areas where cooperation will provide direct benefit to our people. These include power transmission, management of common rivers, road, rail and water transportation and protection of the environment.

We have mutually agreed on projects worth over 750 million US dollars under the 1 billion US dollar credit line India has provided to Bangladesh. These projects, I sincerely believe, will help in strengthening Bangladesh's transport infrastructure, especially the railway sector.

We will further strengthen our cooperation in the area of flood forecasting, disaster warning and disaster management. We will collaborate with Bangladesh to cope with the threat of climate change. This is an area where we should pool our scientific knowledge to develop new joint strategies for adaptation and mitigation.

The management of our common resources is vital for sustainable development in both countries.

Ladies and Gentlemen,
Water is a very sensitive subject in both our countries. But we have shown that, in a spirit of friendship and mutual accommodation, we can agree on cooperative arrangements based on the principles of equity, fair play and no harm to either party. The Ganga Water Treaty signed in 1996 is one such example which has stood the test of time.

I was hopeful that during this visit we would be able to come to an agreement on the sharing of the waters of the Teesta. Both sides worked very hard to arrive at a solution that would be acceptable to all. Unfortunately these efforts did not meet with success within the time available. I have asked all the concerned officials to intensify their efforts towards finding a viable formula which does not cause undue distress to all those, in India or in Bangladesh, who are dependent on the flows of the river.

Concern has been expressed from time to time on the Tipaimukh dam project in India. I wish to make a public statement and make it clear that India will not take steps that will adversely affect Bangladesh.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

We are making serious efforts to improve border infrastructure, particularly the Land Customs Stations. New Integrated Check Posts are coming up at Petrapole in West Bengal, Agartala in Tripura and Dawki in Meghalaya. The border haat at Kalaichar-Bilamari in Meghalaya has been inaugurated, and procedures for movement of trucks from Bhutan and Nepal to Bangladesh have been finalized.

Power connectivity and energy cooperation are emerging as major pillars of our economic relationship. Work on a transmission line which will evacuate up to 500 megawatt of power to Bangladesh from India has begun. A feasibility study for the establishment of a 1320 megawatt power plant in Khulna has been completed.

We have set up a Joint Empowered Group to reduce travel time for passengers on the Maitree Express between Dhaka and Kolkata.

We have agreed on the need to enhance greater exchanges at all levels to foster deeper understanding. We have agreed to further intensify academic, cultural, sports, and youth exchanges.

I am aware that many Bangladeshi citizens are disappointed when they are unable to see their favourite local channels when they visit India. There is no rule which prevents the broadcast of Bangladeshi channels in India. I hope that commercial arrangements can be worked out so that Indian viewers have the opportunity to listen to the great contemporary exponents of Rabindra Sangeet and Baul in Bangladesh or see the films of the late Tareque Masood.

I hope that with all these steps we can make an irreversible shift in India-Bangladesh relations. We seek to build our relations on the basis of equality, mutual benefit and respect for each other.

If we can make a habit of cooperating with each other, the possibilities for mutually reinforcing growth and development are limitless.

I compliment Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina for the statesmanship she has shown in breaking new ground in our bilateral relations. This is what people on both sides of the border want - to turn a new leaf and look ahead.

Our friendship is with the people of Bangladesh. We wish to work with all sections of the people and all shades of public opinion in Bangladesh to foster multi-faceted cooperation between our two countries.

We will always be neighbours and remain friends. If we can make a success of building a new cooperative model for India-Bangladesh relations, it will have a tremendous impact on the fortunes of South Asia.

I believe in all sincerity that India will not be able to realize its own destiny without the partnership of its South Asian neighbours. Therefore, establishing relations of friendship and trust with our neighbours, particularly with Bangladesh, and the creation and consolidation of a peaceful and prosperous regional environment in South Asia are the highest priority of our government.

Ladies and Gentlemen,

Both India and Bangladesh have young populations. The young faces I see here today represent the hopes and aspirations for our future. They will soon take over the mantle of carrying forward the sacred legacy of trust and amity between our two countries that was built by our great leaders. To my young friends gathered here today, I say - just as you work hard to build the Sonar Bangla of the poet's dreams, I urge you to work with the same passion and same sincerity to usher in a golden era of peace, prosperity and friendship among the people of India and Bangladesh.

I thank you for your attention.

New Delhi, November 22, 2011.

“We have seen reports in the Bangladesh media expressing concern over the Tipaimukh Hydroelectric Project. The only recent development pertaining to the project has been the signing of a ‘Promoter’s Agreement’ with the purpose of setting up a Joint Venture Company (JVC) between the Government of Manipur, NHPC Ltd. and Sutlej Jal Vidyut Nigam Ltd (SJVN) on 22nd October, 2011. The JVC will be established under the name and style of “Tipaimukh Hydroelectric Corporation Limited” or any other name as approved by the concerned Registrar of companies.

It would be recalled that a 10-member Bangladesh Parliamentary delegation led by Mr. Abdur Razzak, former Water Resources Minister and current Chairman of the Parliamentary Standing Committee on Water Resources, had visited India in July 2009 at the invitation of Government of India. It had been clarified to the delegation that the proposed project was a hydro-electric project with provision to control floods and that this would not involve diversion of water on account of irrigation.

Subsequently, during the visit of H.E. Sheikh Hasina Prime Minister of Bangladesh to India in January 2010, our Prime Minister had reiterated the assurance that India would not take steps on the Tipaimukh project that would adversely impact on Bangladesh. The assurance was again reiterated during the visit of our Prime Minister to Bangladesh in September 2011.”

Statement by Official Spokesperson of the Ministry of External on the death of Bangladesh nationals near India - Bangladesh border.

New Delhi, December 20, 2011.

"Reports have been received of the deaths of three Bangladesh nationals as a result of firing on the Indian side of the border with Bangladesh in two separate incidents in Govindpur in Malda District (West Bengal) and Narayanganj in Coochbehar District (West Bengal) in the night / early hours of December 16 and 17, 2011, respectively.

The Government of India regrets all incidents of deaths on the border, of Indian and Bangladesh nationals. To prevent loss of lives along the border areas, the Border Security Force (BSF) has exercised the utmost restraint and has resorted to firing in self defence only in rare cases. The Government of India has taken various steps, including strict control on firing, introduction of non-lethal weapons, round-the-clock domination and intensive patrolling. It has also imposed night time restrictions on the movement of people in the border areas.

Unfortunately, this policy of restraint has emboldened criminal elements who have stepped up their attacks on BSF personnel deployed along the border in order to facilitate their illegal activities. A number of attacks have been recorded on BSF personnel and posts along the India-Bangladesh border over the last few months.

In the recent incident at Malda, a group of around 50-60 miscreants involved in illegal activity, not only pelted stones when challenged by the BSF jawan on duty at his post, but also tried to drag him towards the Bangladesh side of the international boundary. Sensing imminent danger to his life, his two colleagues fired four rounds in all resulting in the miscreants fleeing the scene leaving the BSF jawan behind. In the other incident at Coochbehar, around 30-40 miscreants involved in illegal activity attacked a BSF jawan with bamboo sticks and dahs, when challenged by him. Sensing imminent danger to his life, the BSF jawan first hurled a non-lethal stun grenade and then as a last resort opened fire at the armed miscreants in self-defence. Both incidents took place 200 to 250 meters from the international boundary inside Indian territory. One BSF jawan was injured in the incident and is currently in hospital undergoing treatment. BSF has ordered an enquiry into these incidents.

The Coordinated Border Management Plan (CBMP), signed between India and Bangladesh in July 2011, envisions joint responsibility of both the BSF and Border Guard Bangladesh (BGB) to synergize their efforts to ensure effective control over cross-border illegal activities and crimes as well as for the maintenance of peace and harmony along the border. It is the view of the Government of India that illegal activities, which sometimes lead to regrettable loss of lives on both sides along the border, need to be addressed through joint collaborative efforts and mechanisms. The Government of Bangladesh has been urged to take measures to restrict the movement of people along the border, especially during night hours.

The Government of India proposes to continue to work closely with the Government of Bangladesh to maintain peace and harmony along the border”.

The External Affairs Minister recalled his very fruitful visit to Sri Lanka in November last year, when he had inter alia called on the President of Sri Lanka and met with a number of other dignitaries. You would recall that the SLFM had travelled along with EAM both to Jaffna and Hambantota, to jointly inaugurate the Consulates General of India which are functioning actively.

EAM had also participated in the ground breaking ceremony for railway infrastructure projects and the two Ministers had also co-chaired the meeting of the Joint Commission. Both sides expressed satisfaction at the number of key initiatives to enhance people-to-people contacts, including the recent MOU to commence two ferry services - one between Tuticorin and Colombo, and the other between Rameswaram and Talaimannar.

The External Affairs Minister conveyed India's deep concern at the death of two Indian fishermen. Both agreed that use of force against fishermen must not be resorted to under any circumstances. SLFM said that a thorough investigation into the incidents was under way. EAM recalled the understanding that had been reached between the two countries in 2008 and emphasized that it should be observed in letter and spirit so that such incidents do not re-occur in the future. Both Ministers also welcomed the decision that was reached during the visit of the Foreign Secretary to Sri Lanka recently, to hold the next Joint Working Group meeting on fisheries very soon.

SLFM thanked Government of India for the substantial assistance in the rehabilitation of the Internally Displaced Persons and reconstruction of the infrastructure in Northern and Eastern Sri Lanka. He also briefed EAM on the recently held dialogue between the Government of Sri Lanka and the Tamil National Alliance. The two leaders had a very warm and constructive interaction.

Next, EAM received his Bangladeshi counterpart His Excellency Dr. Dipu Moni (BDFM). Both sides expressed satisfaction at the forward movement on a number of issues of bilateral interest and initiatives that were agreed upon during the landmark visit to India in January 2010 of Her Excellency Sheikh Hasina. They also expressed the need and the commitment to maintain and sustain this momentum. The leaders noted with satisfaction that there had been good progress in talks inter alia between the Secretary of Water Resources who had met in January 2011, when they had satisfactory discussions on sharing of water of Teesta and Feni.

Similarly, the Home Secretaries had met in January this year and had very good discussions on strengthening security cooperation. They were also pleased at floating of tenders for several projects that had been envisaged during the visit of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina, within the framework of the one billion dollar line of credit that India has agreed to extend to Bangladesh. They expressed satisfaction at the smooth progress in inter grid connectivity in the power sector. You would recall again that an understanding had been reached during the visit of Prime Minister Sheikh Hasina, for India to supply 250 MW of power from our Central Grid.

They also spoke about the opening of the two border haats along the Meghalaya-Bangladesh border. BDFM thanked India for assistance in upgrading Bangladesh standards and certification. She invited the EAM to pay an early visit to Bangladesh. The invitation was accepted with pleasure. I would like to also add that the meeting between the two Foreign Ministers was very friendly and constructive.

The last was the courtesy call on EAM was by the Foreign Secretary of Pakistan (PFS). At the outset he conveyed the greetings of the people and leadership of Pakistan to Prime Minister, EAM and the people of India. He thanked EAM for guiding the process of bilateral engagement and taking the dialogue further.

The Peoples Majlis is a testimony to the strong faith the people of Maldives have shown in democracy. As a fellow democracy we take delight in your achievements.

In 2008, you adopted a new Constitution and then held Presidential elections in a free and fair manner. The foundations of democracy were further reinforced with the first multi-party Parliamentary elections in 2009 and subsequent elections for the City, Atoll and Island Councils.

You have undertaken the reforms necessary for the independent functioning of the judiciary and other vital organs of the State. The People’s Majlis has upheld the freedom of speech and expression of the people and the media which are the pillars of democracy.

India will be at your side in your transition to a fully functioning democracy. We will assist the Majlis by way of training, formulation of rules and regulations and any other assistance that you may desire.

The Speaker of the Lok Sabha is scheduled to visit Maldives at the invitation of the Hon’ble Speaker of the Majlis. The formation of India-Maldives Parliamentary Friendship Groups in the People’s Majlis and in the Indian Parliament augur well for the development of relations between our two Parliaments.

These are links which are natural between neighbours.

Hon’ble Members,

Well-known Maldivian historian and scholar, Naseema Mohamed, has recorded that, according to legend, the first people who settled in Maldives were a race called Dheyvis from Kalibangan on the banks of river Saraswati during the Indus Civilization.

Today, students from all across Maldives live and study in Thiruvananthapuram, Bengaluru and Mysore. They constitute the largest expatriate Maldivian community abroad. The recent establishment of an Indian Cultural Centre in Malé will further promote people-to-people contacts and facilitate the visits of Maldivian artists and scholars to India. We will be happy to facilitate more intensive exchanges between the Maldives National University and universities in India.
Earlier today I have discussed these and other bilateral initiatives with President Nasheed. We have succeeded in defining new frontiers for our cooperation: cooperation that will have a tangible effect on the lives of common citizens.

The President and I have signed a historic Framework Agreement on Cooperation for Development. This is a blueprint for cooperation in areas such as trade and investment, food security, fisheries development, tourism, transportation, information technology, new and renewable energy, communications and enhancing connectivity by air and sea.

I informed the President of our decision to extend a Standby Credit Facility of 100 million US dollars. This will help Maldives to meet its short term budgetary needs and enable it to import essential commodities.

We have extended a Line of Credit of 40 million US dollars for the construction of new houses. We look forward to the first houses coming up in the not too distant future.

Maldives has made impressive gains in education and gender equality. Your social indicators are among the best in the region. We will collaborate with you to build upon these successes.

We are ready to work with the Government of Maldives to train youth in identified areas of skills development.

The Indira Gandhi Memorial Hospital in Male has served as the main referral hospital for Maldives. We will undertake a major renovation of the Hospital as part of our aid programme.

The tourism and hospitality sectors are the largest revenue earners in Maldives. Indian companies are engaged in various infrastructure projects in Maldives which will further enhance your earning potential. We have decided to forge closer economic links through banking and financial institutions. We wish to cooperate in the modernisation of your fishing and food processing industry.

No enterprise between our two countries can be complete without planning for greater connectivity between us. Our officials are engaged in talks to work on a passenger cum cargo ferry service between Cochin and Male, and to look at the possibility of developing a port north of Male. We have encouraged our airlines to increase direct air links between destinations in India and Maldives.

Hon’ble Members,

I am aware of the threat which Maldives faces from rising sea levels. We understand your concerns because millions of Indians themselves live in vulnerable coastal areas of our peninsula. I wish to state in no uncertain terms that India will stand as one with Maldives in combating global warming. Maldives’ views must be heard with respect in global councils.

We will help Maldives to achieve its aim of becoming carbon neutral. We will help build your capacities through sharing of energy efficiency technologies and provide scholarships for students from Maldives in areas such as coastal zone adaptation and management.

We in India have made a number of commitments on climate change. One is to keep our per capita emission of greenhouse gases below the average for the industrialised countries. Secondly, we have committed to reduce the emissions intensity of our Gross Domestic Product by 20% between 2005 and 2020. We have launched eight national missions under our National Action Plan on Climate Change. The Green India plan seeks to regenerate six million hectares of degraded forest land.

India will be a constructive participant in the global climate change negotiations based on the principles of common but differentiated responsibility.

Hon’ble Members,

As I stand here I am conscious of the vastness of the ocean that surrounds us. This is our extended neighbourhood. We wish to work with the Maldives and other like minded countries to ensure peace and prosperity in the Indian Ocean region. In many ways, India and Maldives are natural partners in this enterprise.

The Indian Ocean is rich in resources. It provides sustenance and livelihood to many island states. Over 97 percent of India’s international trade by volume and 75 percent by value passes through the Indian Ocean. All the littoral states have a common interest in ensuring the safety and security of the sea lanes of communication.

Through the ages, seafarers, traders and merchants from India have ventured across the seas. Today vibrant Indian communities have settled in places such as Mauritius, Seychelles, the East Coast of Africa, the Gulf and East Asia. This movement of people has been accompanied by the exchange of cultural influences from which we have all benefited. We should build upon these and other commonalities and reinvigorate the Indian Ocean Rim Association for Regional Cooperation.

India’s security, like that of Maldives, is closely linked to what happens in the Indian Ocean. The challenges we face are well known - extremism and religious fundamentalism, piracy, smuggling and drug trafficking to name a few. Maldives is additionally concerned about poaching in the coral reefs and illegal commercial fishing by foreign trawlers. We have together experienced the devastation caused by the tsunami in 2004.
Our two countries have agreed upon a multi-pronged approach to deal with these problems. To build capacity within Maldives, India will support the construction of a National Police Academy.

Bilaterally, we have entered into arrangements on Combating Terrorism, Drug Trafficking, Disaster Management and Coastal Security and Transfer of Sentenced Persons. These will strengthen the framework of cooperation on law enforcement and consular matters.

At a regional level, we should enhance our cooperation to increase maritime domain awareness and surveillance. We should have better exchange of information, more training programmes and work towards a cooperative security framework in the Indian Ocean region.

Hon'ble Members,

Ever since your independence in 1965, you have taken impressive strides in nation building. Today Maldives has earned the respect of the world for its achievements in the socio-economic sphere and for its leadership on issues such as climate change and protection of the environment. You have chosen the path of democracy, freedom and respect for human rights.

You have shown how even a small nation can stand up and be counted in the affairs of the world.

I am confident that the people of Maldives will continue to consolidate their achievements. As an abiding friend, India will always stand by you in these efforts. Our relations are time-tested and I wish to reaffirm that they shall remain so in the future.

I once again convey my sincere gratitude to the Hon’ble Speaker and to each one of you for granting me the honour of addressing you.

I thank President Nasheed for his personal friendship and the people of Maldives for the warm hospitality extended to me in Maldives. This has been an unforgettable journey for me which I shall always cherish.

Hon’ble Members,

On behalf of the people of India I wish you all success in your efforts to build a prosperous, dynamic and safe country.

Long live India-Maldives friendship.
Statement by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh at media interaction with President of Maldives.

Male, November 12, 2011.

Your Excellency Mr. Mohamed Nasheed, President of Maldives,Ladies and Gentlemen of the Media,

I have just concluded very fruitful and productive discussions with President Nasheed.

I conveyed to the President my warm felicitations on the holding of an extremely successful SAARC Summit. I am confident that under President Nasheed’s chairmanship of SAARC, the pace of our activities will gather even greater momentum.

The President and I have reviewed our bilateral relations as well as regional and global issues of mutual interest. We have had a meeting of minds on all issues, including on the future direction of our partnership.

Bilateral cooperation between India and Maldives has been on a high growth trajectory in recent times. We have approached our partnership in a comprehensive, forward looking, pragmatic and mutually beneficial manner. We are working together on increasing connectivity and closer economic cooperation. These efforts are bearing fruit.

The President and I have signed a ‘Framework Agreement on Cooperation for Development’. This Agreement puts in place a template for cooperation in a wide range of areas such as trade and investment, food security, fisheries development, tourism, transportation, information technology, new and renewable energy, communications, and connectivity.

The Agreement recognises the role which our two countries can play in the Indian Ocean region.

The Government of India has agreed to extend a 100 million US dollars Standby Credit Facility to the Government of Maldives to help stabilize its fiscal position. We have agreed to examine a comprehensive package to help develop the Maldivian economy, including in the areas of banking and financial infrastructure and capacity building.

At the request of the Government of Maldives, India will undertake extensive renovation of the Indira Gandhi Memorial Hospital in Male. The project to construct the Faculty of Hospitality and Tourism Studies in Male is in full swing. We expect to hand over the project in mid-2013 after completion. The Government of India has also agreed to construct the National Police Academy of Maldives on which work will commence shortly.

We have examined the possibility of commencing regular passenger-cum-cargo ferry services between Cochin and Male at the earliest.

Both countries recognise the importance of jointly cooperating to safeguard our mutual security interests. We are cooperating on issues relating to climate change, piracy, terrorism, drug trafficking and other threats to both our countries. The Memorandum of Understanding signed today on Combating Terrorism, Drug Trafficking, Disaster Management and Coastal Security will provide the framework for expanded cooperation.

India attaches the highest importance to its relations with Maldives. We seek a deeper and stronger partnership with each other. We are guided by the premise that a prosperous, democratic and peaceful Maldives is in the interest of the entire region.

I wish to reiterate our continued commitment to assist Maldives in all possible ways as it seeks to play its rightful role in the comity of nations.

I once again thank the government, the people of Maldives and His Excellency the President for the warm hospitality that has been extended to me and members of delegation during our visit.

I thank you
236. Remarks by the Prime Minister at the Official Luncheon hosted by the President of Maldives

November 12, 2011

His Excellency President Mohamed Nasheed,
Madam Laila Ali
Cabinet Ministers,
Hon’ble Speaker and Members of the People’s Majlis,
Distinguished Guests,

My wife and I have spent the last few days in this country of exquisite beauty and we are overwhelmed by what we have seen and experienced. This has far exceeded all that we had heard about the Maldives.

We have been touched by the warmth, affection and friendship of the people of Maldives and the gracious hospitality accorded to me and my delegation. I wish to thank you wholeheartedly for this.

Excellency,

The progress made by the people of Maldives is a matter of pride for all South Asians.

We value your commitment to the strengthening of democracy and rule of law. Your personal sacrifice and unwavering faith in democratic values and human dignity are widely acknowledged.

Your pioneering leadership on the global arena on environmental issues and advocacy of the cause of small and vulnerable island States has had a profound impact on the global discourse on climate change.

The advent of full democracy in Maldives has also thrown open new opportunities for cooperation between our two countries. I have always believed that India and Maldives not only share common goals and values but that our destinies are interlinked.

The commonality of culture, customs and languages is testimony to our links that are steeped in antiquity. Our ancestors used the Indian Ocean for trade, cultural and social interaction. These linkages continue today, as we take forward our relations as sovereign partners committed to good neighbourly conduct and constructive collaboration.

Our talks earlier today and the agreements that have been signed are indicative of the strong desire of both our sides to take our relations to new heights. We shall continue doing all we can to further strengthen and develop the close relationship our two countries have forged together based on mutuality of interests and benefits.

In keeping with the theme of the 17th SAARC Summit, our two countries must also strive to build bridges over the Indian Ocean to bring our people closer together.

Efforts to increase connectivity between our two nations through transport links such as the introduction of ferry services, increase in air services, development of financial and banking linkages, strengthening of human resources capabilities and enhanced trade and investment are producing tangible results.

The safety and security of our people will always remain a high priority. A stable and peaceful Indian Ocean is an objective we both share. We look forward to continue working closely with Maldives in the attainment of that goal.

Excellency,

We wish to see a secure and self-reliant Maldives. Allow me to reaffirm India’s total commitment to the progress and prosperity of Maldives. India is committed to remaining firmly by the side of Maldives in its nation building efforts.

I was eagerly looking forward to visiting your beautiful country ever since you extended an invitation to me on your first visit to India in December 2008. I am glad that I have now had the opportunity of doing so.

I once again thank you for making our visit so immensely pleasurable and fruitful.

May the people of Maldives enjoy greater peace and prosperity, and relations between India and Maldives continue to flourish!

Thank you.

239. Response of Official Spokesperson of Ministry of External Affairs to media report on likely resumption of arms supply by India to Nepal.

New Delhi, January 17, 2011.

In response to a question on a media report on the subject the Official Spokesperson said that cooperation in defence and security is an integral part of India’s multi-faceted close bilateral relations between India and Nepal. The Indian Army enjoy traditionally close relations. The factual position is that India has not supplied any lethal equipment to Nepal Army since 2005. The report about India resuming supply of lethal equipment to Nepal is speculative. India has consistently supported consensus-based politics and multi-party democracy in Nepal.

I will be conveying the greetings and best wishes of our leadership and the people of India to them and exchange views with them on issues of mutual interest, including on how to deepen and expand our multi-faceted relations. In the next two days, I also look forward to meetings with the political leaders of Nepal. I would like to convey to the leadership of Nepal that India is committed to working with the people of Nepal for a democratic, stable, peaceful and prosperous Nepal.

It has been India’s endeavour to strengthen economic cooperation with Nepal and to contribute to Nepal’s development. I will be visiting Birgunj to lay the foundation stone of the Integrated Check Post and the Terai Roads Project. We believe that these projects would facilitate Nepal’s international trade and economic development.

I am confident that my visit would help further strengthen and expand our bilateral relations and open more avenues for mutual cooperation. Relations with Nepal are and will continue to be a matter of the highest priority for India.

Thank you.
244. Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna during his interaction with Media.

Kathmandu, April 21, 2011.

You are aware of my meetings yesterday with the President and Prime Minister of Nepal and the delegation level talks with Deputy Prime Minister Adhikari. The meetings were useful and cordial.

The Nepalese leadership briefed me about the internal developments in Nepal and about the progress being made towards completing the peace process and drafting of the new Constitution in Nepal. I conveyed that given the special relations shared by India and Nepal, India has an abiding interest in developments in Nepal and remains committed to providing all assistance that Nepal requires in its transition to a stable, inclusive, multi-party democracy.

I conveyed that the peace process must be completed at an early date and that it was essential to moving ahead with resolution of other political issues. I was assured by the Nepalese leadership that they recognized the crucial importance of preserving the professional integrity and apolitical nature of the Nepal Army.

Both the President and Prime Minister of Nepal expressed deep appreciation for India’s continued support to Nepal’s peace process and emphasized that India must continue to play a supportive role for consolidation of democracy in Nepal.

You are aware that I will be travelling to Birgunj tomorrow to lay the foundation stone for the construction of the Integrated Checkpost being built with Indian assistance of ₹86.9 crores. I will also be laying the foundation stone for the construction of PRN120 road project which is part of the first phase of Terai road projects being built with Indian assistance of ₹805 crores. These projects aim at strengthening the cross border connectivity between India and Nepal to facilitate better people-to-people contacts and economic opportunities for the people of Nepal.

The Nepalese side agreed that India’s continued assistance was vital for Nepal’s economic development and assured us that all required assistance to ensure timely completion of these projects and adequate security to Indians working on these projects will be provided.
