Indian importers have a 100% compliance record when it comes to safeguarding imported technology - we have been implementing the End-Use Verification Agreement with US partners for Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton pledged to continue bilateral discussions on their identified ongoing initiatives on global issues of common concern through the Global Issues Forum which is focused on how the world's two largest democracies can form a truly global partnership by working through regional, international and multilateral cooperation.

In Pursuance of the Strategic Dialogue, Secretary Clinton and Minister Krishna expressed their shared view that the India-U.S. Strategic Dialogue and the bilateral mechanisms therein provide an important platform for strengthening the U.S.-India partnership, offering a strategic vision for enhanced future cooperation. The U.S. and Indian delegations look forward to further discussions on specific matters raised at the Dialogue through expanded high-level official engagement, working groups, and existing bilateral dialogues.

Secretary Clinton confirmed President Barack Obama's intention to visit India this year at the invitation of Prime Minister Manmohan Singh for the leaders' fourth substantive bilateral meeting. The co-chairs noted that this inaugural meeting of the Strategic Dialogue has helped lay the groundwork for that visit and pledged to intensify discussions on how to further deepen and broaden their cooperation.

The two sides plan to hold the next meeting of the Strategic Dialogue in New Delhi in the first half of 2011.

Both countries pledged to continue to work together on areas of mutual interest including maritime security, counter-piracy, humanitarian assistance and disaster relief and response.
Disarmament and Non Proliferation

Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton reiterated the two countries' shared vision of a world free of nuclear weapons and restated their commitment to address the challenges of global nuclear proliferation. Minister Krishna reiterated India's appreciation for President Obama's initiative to host the Nuclear Security Summit in Washington DC. They expressed satisfaction with the Summit's outcome and the adoption of a Communiqué and Work Plan.

Secretary Clinton welcomed India's announcement of establishing a Global Centre for Nuclear Energy Partnership with focus on advanced nuclear energy systems, nuclear security, radiological safety and applications of radio isotopes and radiation technologies and appreciated India's intent to welcome participation by international partner countries and IAEA in the work of the Centre.

They also committed to continue working together to achieve an early start of negotiations on a multilateral, non-discriminatory and internationally and effectively verifiable Fissile Material Cutoff Treaty at the Conference on Disarmament.

Trade and Economic Relations

Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton, though encouraged by signs of global economic recovery, recognized that the recovery is fragile and requires sustained international support, including through concerted efforts by G-20 countries and continuing openness in trade policies and promoting innovation and growth. They looked forward to the next meeting of the G-20 in Canada. They called for a balanced and ambitious conclusion to the Doha Development Round, consistent with its mandate. As members of the G 20, they agreed to advance the G 20 understandings including with regard to energy security and resisting protectionism in all its forms.

Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton noted that both Governments have taken steps to strengthen their bilateral engagement and understanding in three broad areas - macroeconomic policy, financial sector, and infrastructure financing - through the launch of a new Economic and Financial Partnership' between India’s Ministry of Finance and the Department of the Treasury in April 2010. The partnership is intended to help both countries to promote strong, sustainable, and balanced growth, as well as share experiences on infrastructure financing and financial sector regulation. They also took note of the accelerated work under the U.S.-India Trade Policy Forum (TPF) led by the U.S. Trade Representative and India's Minister of Commerce and Industry. One key result was the signing of a 'Framework for Cooperation on Trade and Investment' in March 2010 which, uniquely, is expected to contribute to realizing the further potential in bilateral trade and investment, supporting job creation in both countries.

High Technology

Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton underlined the importance of facilitating co-operation in strategic and high technology sectors such as through the 7th meeting of the High Technology Cooperation Group in Washington in March 2010 as a key instrument to achieve the full potential of the strategic partnership. Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton confirmed the shared objective of a strong 21st century partnership in high technology. They committed to approach the issue of export controls in the spirit of the strategic partnership between the two countries.

Energy Security, Clean Energy and Climate Change

The United States and India have taken crucial steps towards full implementation of civil nuclear cooperation. Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton reiterated that nuclear energy can make a significant contribution to building a sustainable and clean energy future. They highlighted the Civil Nuclear Energy Cooperation Action Plan recently signed by the two countries.

They welcomed the successful conclusion of negotiations on the Arrangements and Procedures Agreed between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of India pursuant to Article 6(iii) of the India-U.S. Agreement Concerning Peaceful Uses of Nuclear Energy, which sets forth the arrangements and procedures for India's reprocessing of U.S.-obligated spent nuclear fuel.

Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton discussed progress on energy and climate change issues since the signing of the U.S.-India Memorandum of Understanding on Energy Security, Clean Energy, and Climate Change. They stressed that the Clean Energy and Climate Change Initiative they finalized last year would contribute to achieving sustainable development and a clean energy future for the people of both countries. The goal of establishing a Joint Clean Energy Research Center and accelerating collaborative efforts to deploy clean energy technologies in both countries remains a priority. They reiterated that the "Partnership to Advance Clean Energy," to be launched by both countries to take full advantage of multi-agency coordination and engagement with the private sector, constitutes an important step forward in developing and deploying clean energy.

They discussed their respective national action plans and initiatives to address the challenge of climate change. They noted the enormous potential for scientific and commercial collaboration in clean energy technologies and recognized that their respective experience and expertise in renewable energy and energy efficiency provided a sound platform for building their bilateral partnership further and supporting similar efforts in other countries, especially developing countries.

Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton reaffirmed their support for the Copenhagen Accord as a positive step forward in meeting the global climate challenge, and underscored its importance in building consensus in the ongoing negotiations under the UNFCCC in pursuance of the Bali Action Plan, towards a successful outcome at the Sixteenth Conference of Parties at Cancun, Mexico, later this year. They also welcomed the launch of the India-U.S. Climate Dialogue, which seeks to enhance bilateral U.S.-India cooperation with a view to achieving a successful outcome of the ongoing multilateral climate change negotiations. They reiterated the importance of the Climate Dialogue in focusing and coordinating both countries' priorities in dealing with climate change consistent with their national policies and strategies. In this regard, both sides recognized that further cooperation in knowledge on climate science can enhance our shared understanding of the planet's climate. The two sides reaffirmed their commitment to cooperate in the area of unconventional gas resources, as outlined in the Memorandum of Understanding to Enhance Cooperation on Energy Security, Energy Efficiency, Clean Energy and Climate Change.

Agriculture

Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton noted that the signing of the Memorandum of Understanding on Agricultural Cooperation and Food Security would increase cooperation in agricultural research, human resources capacity building, natural resource management, agri-business and food processing, and collaborative research for increasing food productivity. They noted that India’s experience with agricultural development in the framework of low capital intensity and diverse conditions offers useful lessons for other developing countries. They resolved to continue to look for innovative ways to work together to promote agricultural development and reduce rural poverty, promote global food security, and improve weather prediction and crop forecasting capabilities for agricultural purposes in order to improve livelihoods in the rural sectors. They also pledged to work together to improve the farm to market supply chain, food processing, and agricultural extension programs.

Education

Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton acknowledged the positive contribution of cooperation in education and science and technology to bilateral relations. They noted the enormous potential for enhancing academic exchanges and collaboration, including through participation of U.S. universities in India, in the context of the ongoing reforms and expansion of the higher education and professional training sectors in India. Education cooperation is an area of high priority for the two Governments. They welcomed the steps taken towards implementation of the Obama-Singh 21st Century Knowledge Initiative launched last year with the goal of increasing university linkages and junior faculty development exchanges between U.S. and Indian universities. They further welcomed in this context the formation of the India-U.S Higher Education Forum under the auspices of the U.S.-India Business Council.

Health

Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton reviewed progress on the collaborative effort to establish a Regional Global Disease Detection Center in India. They acknowledged that the Health Dialogue would provide a framework to discuss ways to accelerate bilateral cooperation and collaborations, including exchanging views on extending affordable healthcare to all sections of the population and to continuing education and training for health care practitioners at all levels of service. Both governments pledged to enhance bilateral collaboration in controlling and preventing diseases, assuring food... and medical product safety, and increasing biomedical and translational research and development with the goal of identifying new and effective methods of medical treatment and ensuring equitable access of such outcomes to the citizens of both the countries.

Science and Technology

Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton emphasized the importance of science and technology collaboration, both in economic and strategic areas. They welcomed the progress on the India-U.S. Science and Technology Joint Committee and the endowment. The United States and India are using their strong common scientific expertise to improve the lives of their citizens, push the boundaries of scientific knowledge, and identify projects to encourage engagement on innovation and entrepreneurship. They noted the upcoming U.S.-India Joint Committee Meeting in late June to push this agenda forward; both governments reinforced the need to support science and technology research aimed at innovation.

Development

Minister Krishna and Secretary Clinton noted with satisfaction the emphasis that the two governments place on empowerment of women and advancement of their welfare, as an integral part of social and economic development worldwide. They stressed the importance of empowerment of women for global prosperity and stability. They resolved to place special emphasis on integrating women's interests in all aspects of their strategic dialogue and bilateral cooperation. They welcomed the second meeting of the Women's Empowerment Dialogue held on 27th May, 2010, where both sides discussed women's social and economic empowerment, capacity building for self help groups, support for micro finance, political participation of women, addressing violence against women, early childhood education and gender budgeting. They also agreed on the need to work out modalities for supporting Afghan women leaders in the area of economic opportunity.
573. Remarks of External Affairs Minister at the reception hosted in his honour by Secretary of State Ms. Hillary Clinton.

Washington (D.C.), June 3, 2010.

Mr. President,

Last year, you and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh launched a new phase in the 'India US Global Strategic Partnership'. I bring you greetings from Prime Minister Manmohan Singh. Prime Minister has asked me to reiterate the importance he attaches to the Strategic Dialogue and his personal commitment to it.

I am grateful to for the warmth and gracious hospitality that has been extended by Secretary Clinton to me and to my colleagues and officers. Her commitment and involvement in working for a positive transformation of India-US relations has been a key factor in the achievement of the global strategic partnership that we have established today.

Mr. President, we consider our mutually beneficial relationship with the United States to be one of our foremost foreign policy priorities. Our two countries, given our dedication to our fundamental freedoms, openness and diversity, are well placed to be pacesetters in an era of globalization. There are few relationships in the world that have so much potential as India-US relations, because, I believe, that our cooperation is not only for great mutual benefit, but is destined to have a strong impact on global peace, prosperity and stability in the 21st century.

Mr. President, as India regains the momentum of our economic growth, new opportunities are emerging to empower rural communities, especially women. Time and again, we have seen in other developing countries, for example in the pioneering efforts of S. Ann Seotoro, your late mother, Mr. President, in Indonesia, the transformational impact of innovation and microfinance. That is our hope for transforming our economy and society in an equitable, inclusive and sustainable manner.

My colleagues and I have had very productive meetings yesterday and today in our Strategic Dialogue. We reviewed progress in all areas of our ongoing cooperation, and also focussed on our vision and the roadmap... for future. We also discussed how we would work together to realise the immense potential of our cooperation across the spectrum of human endeavour - from strategic cooperation to sustainable growth and economic and developmental partnerships - to achieve real benefits for our peoples and for the world.

Mr. President, we are pleased that you, with your deep personal links with the Asia-Pacific region, are taking strong interest in the future of this rapidly evolving region. We look forward to a stable, secure, prosperous future for this region, defined by cooperation, openness and inclusion.

Mr. President, our agenda is broad and rich. I thank you once again for your belief in and commitment to this relationship and look forward to your visit to India - where a very warm and heartfelt welcome awaits you.

574. Address by Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao at the annual dialogue on 'India US Strategic Partnership' at Brookings Institution.

Thank you, Ambassador Indyk, Mr. Mittal, Dr. Cohen, Bill, distinguished former colleagues who are present here, Foreign Secretary Sibal, Foreign Secretary Mansingh, Mr. Ajay Shankar, Amit Mitra. If I've anybody out, please forgive me, dear friends. There are a number of familiar faces in the audience here today. It's indeed an honor and a privilege for me to be present here with my esteemed colleague and friend, Bill -- Bill Burns -- at the first annual dialogue on India-U.S. strategic partnership jointly hosted by the Brookings Institution and FICCI.

I believe that this decade has been a truly transformational one in the India-U.S. relationship. Many milestones have been crossed, and a year ago when Secretary Clinton was in India, and after her discussions with our External Affairs Minister, Mr. Krishna, our two governments announced their decision to establish a Strategic Dialogue. And in November last year, Prime Minister Manmohan Singh came to Washington at the invitation of President Obama on the first State Visit of the new U.S. Administration. It was a very successful visit that yielded rich dividends in terms of cooperation between our two countries in many areas, underscoring the vitality and the relevance of our strategic partnership. And the recently released National Security Strategy of the United States has stressed the importance attached to comprehensive U.S. engagement with India, which it sees as a center of influence in the 21st century.

Yesterday we held the first round of our Strategic Dialogue. Both External Affairs Minister Mr. Krishna and Mrs. Clinton -- Secretary of State Clinton -- shared this dialogue. The visit of President Obama to India in November this year will take our endeavor onward to greater heights. President Obama's gracious presence at the U.S.-India Strategic Dialogue reception at the State Department yesterday was an abiding affirmation of what he eloquently called the unprecedented partnership between our two countries.

The transformation of our relationship has taken place against the backdrop of India's initiatives to reform its economy and the geopolitical changes in the post-Cold War world. To my mind, there are three main drivers that have led to this transformation.

First are shared values of democracy, pluralism, and tolerance and respect for fundamental freedoms which provide the underpinning of a durable relationship.

Second, there is the reality of growing economic linkages and people-to-people contact. Over the last two decades, our businesses have formed strong and mutually beneficial partnerships. Mr. Mittal talked about cooperation touching the lives of ordinary people about the power to connect and reaching out to the common denominator. I think that very eloquently expresses the nature of what we are doing in some areas of our partnership today. Our trade in goods and services has grown. It is broadly balanced. We have launched a new financial and economic partnership and have agreed on a new framework for promotion of trade and investment. These are all catalysts of closer ties. They build what Ambassador Indyk referred to as the zone of trust between our two countries.
And, third, there is an increasing convergence of interests and major global issues. The imperatives of a multi-polar and interconnected world today set the stage for us to work together to address global challenges whether it be the rising threat of terrorism and extremism or ensuring a balanced, equitable, and sustainable development for all - energy security and food security for both our peoples and for the world at large.

While the rapidity and the evolution of our bilateral relations with the United States has surprised some observers, there is today broad-based political support and public goodwill in India for a strategic relationship with the United States. We see the United States as a friend and as a valuable partner in our developmental efforts. Thus, even as we strengthen our ties in defense, in security, in counterterrorism, trade, and the economic sphere, areas of cooperation such as in agriculture, energy, environment, innovation, and education are also coming to define the structure of our strategic partnership. Bill referred to this in his remarks just now.

The joint statement that we issued yesterday at the conclusion of the strategic dialogue reflects this growing partnership that not only encompasses our bilateral cooperation but also charts the path for us to work together on regional and global issues. Again to quote Ambassador Indyk or was it Mr. Mittal, there is a sense of destiny about what we do in this partnership.

While there are no major irritants in our relationship, we need to ensure, of course, that our partnership does not become hostage to regional dynamics and that we realize its full potential. Some months ago at an address at the Woodrow Wilson Center, I had noted that the future of our relationship will depend not only on the momentum of our strategic dialogue and its outcome but eventually on how our respective peoples perceive our cooperation as safeguarding their aspirations and sensitivities. We need to be mindful of this aspect.

There is no doubt that India's democratic, pluralistic, and stable society encompassing over a billion people, makes it unique and, in many senses, exceptional; and with a sister democracy -- the United States -
- we share a strategic interest in fostering security and stability in a rapidly changing Asia. Even as the face of Asia, and indeed the world, changes with the rise of China and with India, we, India and the United States, must work together to engender an open, balanced, equitable, and inclusive architecture of economic and security cooperation. In a related context, the question of reform of the U.N. Security Council and the expansion of its membership is an important item on the agenda of our dialogue as we seek U.S. support for India's case for permanent membership of the Security Council.

In our neighborhood, we have a vision of enhanced South Asian cooperation for development. That vision is, however, challenged by violent extremism and terrorism, which originates in our region and finds sustenance and sanctuary there. The recent failed terrorist attempt at the Times Square in New York has again revealed the global reach of terrorist organizations. Whether it be the Lashkar-e-Taiba, the Jaish-e-Mohammed, the Al-Qaeda, or the Taliban, all these groups are driven by a similar ideology, an ideology that is opposed to freedom, to democracy, to development, and the peaceful resolution of differences. Our two countries, India and United States, have a vital interest in defeating terrorism and in ensuring that its safe havens and breeding grounds cease to exist. In this context, our bilateral cooperation in counter-terrorism is crucial. Our concerns in this area are shared, and our cooperation in information sharing and improving our infrastructure to resist and deal with terrorism is of great relevance.

We are supportive of the U.S. efforts to fight terrorism in Afghanistan and to bring stability there. Indian assistance amounting to over U.S. $1.3 billion has helped build vital civil infrastructure, develop human resources and capacity in the areas of education, health, agriculture, rural development, among many others, in Afghanistan. In this process, we have been guided by the needs of the Afghan people. The Indian Medical Mission in Afghanistan, for instance, has treated over 300,000 people there in 2009 alone. We stand by our development partnership with Afghanistan despite repeated terrorist attacks on the Indian Mission and our brave men and women who are working there to help transform the lives of ordinary Afghan citizens.
Like the United States, India would like to see the emergence of a strong, stable, and prosperous Afghanistan. We also believe that any reconciliation or reintegration efforts there should include only those who abhor violence, renounce terrorism, and pledge to abide by the values of democracy and pluralism and the Afghan constitution.

In the larger Asian context, both the United States and India have an interest in protecting the global commons -- maritime, cyber, and space domains. The free flow of information and trade across these global commons is vital for both our economies. Our naval forces have been working with each other in ensuring the safety and the security of shipping lanes of communication, including in the Gulf of Aden. We need to also create appropriate norms for cyberspace to ensure that the freedom and the anonymity provided by these pathways are not misused. Our space agencies have had fruitful cooperation in the past, and there is immense potential for the future.

Defense cooperation, as Bill Burns just pointed out, has become an important strand in our strategic partnership. Today our armed forces have regular interaction and conduct joint exercises. In fact, the Indian armed forces conduct more joint exercises with the United States armed forces than with any other country. We are increasingly also looking to partner with the U.S. as we modernize our armed forces with the latest technology and equipment. An important element in this regard would be progress on easing of U.S. export control restrictions as they apply to India. This would not only be a logical outcome of the Civil Nuclear Initiative, but would also be a catalyst for promoting trade and cooperation in high technology, defense, and the space sectors. It would also be consonant with the nature of the strategic partnership that exists between us and the growing mutual trust and confidence that is an important driver in our relations today.

Economics and trade of course constitute an important plank of our bilateral relations. For us, the United States remains a prime source of investment and an important trading partner. As we make efforts to increase investment in infrastructure and give a fresh impetus to the manufacturing sector, the importance of partnership with the United States is only going to increase. This mutually beneficial partnership of course creates jobs. It creates opportunities in both countries. There’s also been a surge in Indian investment in the United States. On the global stage also, as members of the G20, we have worked closely together on formulating policy responses to deal with the global financial and economic crisis and to address the needs of balanced and sustainable development worldwide.

Issues such as agriculture, energy, education, and health have a direct impact on the lives of ordinary people. Development has become an important focus of our strategic partnership.

Agriculture remains an important sector of our economy. While we have become self-sufficient in food production, the rapid growth in agriculture is essential for increasing the incomes of our farmers and rural folk and achieving the objective of inclusive growth. In the 1960s, India and the United States have partnered to usher in the green revolution in India. The spirit that animated our cooperation and which resulted in the green revolution must be revived. It is our hope that we can work together to bring a second green revolution to India.

Separately, India has also developed capabilities and expertise in agriculture especially suited for a low-capital intensive environment. There is immense scope for us to share our respective experiences and work together to address food security in third countries and this is where I think the development of cooperation in Africa becomes particularly relevant. We have agreed to establish working groups in diverse areas relating to agriculture, which would help us to increase productivity and also contribute towards regional and global food security.

Both our countries also face similar challenges of dependence on energy imports and fossil fuels, and we recognize, both of us, the importance of addressing the challenge of climate change. We have, in India, a long-term prospective plan on energy and an ambitious national action plan on climate change, which seeks to increase the share of clean and renewable energy in our energy mix; increase energy efficiency across the economy; and expand our forest cover. In November 2009, our Prime Minister and President Obama agreed to launch a Clean Energy and Climate Change Initiative to advance cooperation in clean and renewable energy and energy efficiency. We are working together to ensure a speedy implementation of its various provisions, that is, of the MOU, including of establishing a Joint Research Center.

The conclusion of the historic and very important Civil Nuclear Initiative with the United States in 2008 opened new vistas of cooperation between our two countries. We have finalized the arrangements and procedures relating to reprocessing, and it is our hope that we can move soon towards practical cooperation in the field of nuclear power.

Education is another important area for our cooperation. It plays a vital role in empowering and transforming the lives of our people. The government of India has therefore launched an ambitious program for reform and expansion of the education sector. It is our hope to partner and benefit from the excellent U.S. university system. The Singh-Obama Knowledge Initiative announced during our Prime Minister's visit would be one important instrument for this purpose. Meanwhile, there are at least a hundred thousand students from India who study in U.S. universities today.

The field of women's empowerment is another aspect of our strategic dialogue, and yesterday at our meeting we were able to talk about recent developments in our dialogue on women's empowerment, but first we had an interesting meeting on this subject here in Washington a few days ago.

There is, thus, today a very broad canvas before us to strengthen our strategic partnership. This is a relationship which can be, as President Obama has said, one of the defining partnerships of the 21st century. There are no major issues on which our long-term interests do not converge. We may occasionally differ on the manner in which these shared objectives can be achieved. We need to weave all these various strands that I refer to and intensify the momentum of consolidating our cooperation. In this endeavor, we will certainly benefit from the valuable inputs from the FICCI-Brookings dialogue. I wish you success in your meeting today. I look forward to knowing more about the results of your deliberations.

Thank you so much.
575. Response of Indian Ambassador to the United States Meera Shankar on a question regarding visit of the National Investigative Agency team to USA.

“In response to a question from PTI regarding the visit of the NIA team, the Indian Ambassador Meera Shankar said that the Government of India had requested the Government of the United States of America for access to question US national, David Coleman Headley, who has been charged for his role in the planning of the Mumbai terrorist attack of November 26, 2008. Following discussions with US Attorney General, Eric Holder, a team from the National Investigation Agency of India has visited the US for questioning David Headley. This took place over several days, beginning from June 3, 2010, and the team is now returning to India on the conclusion of a useful visit. The Government of India attaches importance to this in investigating the full dimension of this heinous act of terrorist violence. The support and cooperation extended by the US authorities is appreciated and is in keeping with the commitment of the two countries to strengthen their cooperation in meeting the challenge of terrorism.”

President Obama: Well, I want to express my pleasure having the opportunity to meet once again with my good friend, Prime Minister Singh. I said before and I continue to believe that the extraordinary leadership that Prime Minister Singh has provided not just to India, but to the world, has helped us navigate through some very difficult times.

And I can tell you that here at the G20, when the Prime Minister speaks people listen, particularly because of his deep knowledge of economic issues, as well as the fact that he understands that as India rises as a world power, not just a regional power, that it also has enormous responsibilities to work with the rest of the world community around issues of peace and prosperity.

The last time that Prime Minister Singh visited the United States, as part of a wonderful State Dinner, we instituted what we termed a strategic partnership that involves all of our ministers at the highest levels working together to try to find ways to enhance commercial ties, security ties, coordination on critical multilateral issues like climate change. And as a consequence, Minister Krishna led a delegation to Washington to follow up, and working with Secretary Clinton, conducted some very high-level talks. I had the opportunity to participate in that dialogue.

We also wanted to make sure that in addition to government-to-government ties, we were initiating people-to-people ties, and so an Indian-American CEO conference took place. And we’re going to continue to see how we can get our businesses to work together, and then generating recommendations to each of us in terms of how we can improve ties between the United States and India.

I am very pleased to have accepted a visit on behalf of myself and Michelle to India. It is a trip that I’m very much looking forward to, and I know that the Prime Minister and his gracious wife will extend great hospitality to us. We are also just excited because of the tremendous cultural, as well as political and social and economic examples that India is providing the world and has in the past.

So, Mr. Prime Minister, thank you so much for your friendship, and we look forward to working with you in the months to come, leading up to the visit, so that we know that we're going to have a very productive stay when we're in India.

Prime Minister: Mr. President, thank you very much for your warm words. I attest that India attaches the greatest importance to this relationship with the United States, with which we have a steady partnership.

It is our common endeavor, Mr. President, to give this strategic partnership a new thrust, a new meaning, a new content. And it's my privilege to be associated in this global endeavor with you, Mr. President. You are a role model to millions and millions of people all over the world. Your life history is a history which inspires millions of people everywhere where there are people who have risen by the sheer depth of their austerity, of their hard work, and their commitment to the values on which you have worked and you've stood for.

It has been my privilege, Mr. President, to enjoy your friendship, and this is something which I will cherish forever in my life.

The dinner that you hosted for me and for my wife last year was a most memorable evening for both of us. And we look forward to your visit, the First Lady's visit, and your children's visit to India later this year. A very warm welcome awaits you, Mr. President. And I have every reason to believe that you will find it a productive and exciting journey to a country of India's diversity, of India's complexity.

And we are engaged in getting rid of chronic poverty, ignorance and disease, which still afflict millions and millions of our people. And it's our common desire to work together to get rid of this scourge in our lifetime. And in that, the United States' support means a great deal to us. Your personal commitment to social justice is something we cherish.
And I look forward to have the privilege of welcoming you and your family to our country so that you can see for yourselves what we are trying to do, the difficulties of managing social and economic transformation in the framework of a democracy committed to the rule of law, committed to all fundamental human freedoms. I think that's what India seeks to achieve.

And in this, we seek your active involvement and active participation. Thank you very much.

President Obama: Thank you, everybody.

577. Press Release on the visit of U. S. National Security Advisor General James L. Jones' visit to India.

New Delhi, July 15, 2010.

General Jones' visit to India is part of the institutionalized dialogue mechanism between the National Security Advisers of India and the USA which has served as a useful channel of communication between the two countries. During the visit the two sides reviewed the status of the strategic partnership between India and the USA, and discussed preparations for the State visit of President Barack Obama to India later this year. Discussions were positive, constructive and forward looking.

Apart from bilateral relations, regional and global issues, including the situation in Afghanistan and Pakistan, international terrorism, the global governance architecture and emerging threats to international security were also discussed.

During his visit, General James Jones also called on Prime Minister, Defence Minister, Home Minister and Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee
The India-US Agriculture Dialogue held its inaugural meeting on 13-14 September 2010 in New Delhi. Foreign Secretary and Mr. Robert Hormats, Under Secretary (Energy, Economic and Agricultural Affairs) in the US State Department co-chaired the Dialogue, on behalf of the Governments of India and USA respectively. Senior officials from the Ministries of Agriculture, Food-Processing Industries, Earth Sciences and other concerned Departments participated.

Under the Agriculture Dialogue the two governments have set-up three Working Groups for: Strategic Cooperation in Agriculture and Food Security, Food-Processing, Agriculture Extension, Farm-to-Market linkages, and Weather and Crop-forecasting respectively.

The Working Groups discussed proposals for cooperation and will finalize the specific initiatives and modalities for cooperation through mutual consultation.

The Agriculture Dialogue provides a platform for implementing the India-US Memorandum of Understanding for Cooperation in Agriculture and Food Security signed in March 2010, in pursuance of a decision taken during Hon'ble Prime Minister's visit to USA in November 2009.

579. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Commerce on the meeting of India - USA Trade Policy Forum to discuss trade and investment relations between India and the United States.

New Delhi, September 22, 2010.

Shri Anand Sharma, Minister for Commerce & Industry and Ambassador Ron Kirk, the United States Trade Representative co-chaired the Ministerial Indo-US Trade Policy Forum (TPF) at Washington DC yesterday. Shri Sharma and Ambassador Kirk noted that the Trade Policy Forum had given both countries an opportunity to focus together on the state of the burgeoning US-India trade and investment relationship, which is becoming an increasingly significant factor in the economic life and prosperity of the two countries, as well as in the global economy. The Indian delegation included the Commerce Secretary, Shri Rahul Khullar along with other senior government officials.

Shri Sharma along with Ambassador Kirk received feedback from the 5 Focus Groups on Agriculture, Innovation & Creativity, Investment, Services and Tariff and Non-Tariff Barriers to Trade that work under the TPF. The focus groups held comprehensive discussions on a wide range of issues, identifying areas for future constructive engagement between the two trading partners. The Minister welcomed the reports of the Focus Groups and appreciated the fact that both sides are engaged in constant dialogue. He expressed his firm belief that this session of the TPF has moved the Indo-US relationship in the direction of realizing tangible benefits, and looked forward to continued cooperation to this end in the coming year.

Earlier in a closed-door meeting with Ambassador Kirk, Shri Sharma expressed India’s concern about the trade restrictive and protectionist policies adopted by the United States in recent times. The Executive Order of Ohio state Governor that imposes restrictions on outsourcing and the Border Security legislation, that directly impacts Indian software companies and increases their costs by millions of dollars were raised by him. In his words, “Protectionism kills growth and innovation. In order to ensure that we continue our high growth trajectories, we have to be strong to resist domestic calls and pressures to increase barriers to trade." The Minister also stressed upon the need for a Totalisation Agreement between India and the United States that will go a long way towards supporting growth in the Services sector.

Both the Ministers co-chaired the meeting of the PSAG (Private Sector Advisory Group) and observed that the private sector serves to remind us that it is the small and medium-sized companies, that are key to maximizing the trade and investment flows. "Through cooperative engagement in this area, we will be able to provide sustained employment, higher incomes, and other critical economic benefits", Shri Sharma said.

580. Press Release issued by the Ministry of Finance on the visit of Finance Minister Pranab Mukherjee to the United States and his call on the US Secretary of State Ms. Hillary Clinton.

New Delhi, October 8, 2010.

Union Finance Minister Mr. Pranab Mukherjee called on US Secretary of State Ms Hilary Clinton in Washington yesterday. Both the leaders discussed the issues of bilateral interest. They also discussed about the forthcoming visit of US President Barack Obama to India early next month. Mr. Mukherjee said that the said visit will further strengthen the relations between the two largest democracies of the world. He said that this will be a defining moment in their relationship especially when most of the countries are still struggling to come out of the global financial crisis. Both the leaders also discussed about the current status of global financial crisis and sluggish recovery in developed economies while emerging developing economies are performing much better in this regard. Mr. Mukherjee said that forthcoming meeting of G-20 countries in Seoul would also discuss the various options for early recovery and would also focus on developmental agenda.
Mr. Mukherjee also said that the free flow of trade, business and money between the countries is good for every country's development and policies of protectionism wouldn't help anyone. Both the leaders also discussed about the final stages of nuclear deal implementation. Mrs Clinton mentioned about the issues relating to export of agricultural and dairy products from US to India.

Earlier, the Finance Minister met the President of World Bank and Managing Director, International Monetary Fund on the sidelines of Annual Fund Bank Meetings in Washington. He discussed with them their role in helping the world economy especially the poor countries to come out of the recession successfully. They should provide maximum aid and grant to these economies. He also said that they should help these developing economies in creating more job opportunities beside helping them in food security, poverty alleviation, rural upliftment. These financial institutions should focus on providing clean energy to these economies, Mr Mukherjee added

Later, Sri Lankan Deputy Minister for Finance and Planning called on the Indian Finance Minister. Both the leaders discussed the issues of mutual interest and their close cooperation in the region. Mr Mukherjee also met South Korean Finance Minister Yoon Jeaug Hyun on the sidelines of World Bank and IMF meetings. Both the leaders also discussed about the forthcoming G-20 Finance Ministers Meeting in Gyeongju, South Korea and likely issues to be discussed therein including developmental agenda. They also discussed to have a common strategy on the issues of increase in quota for emerging economies in IMF as they are contributing much more to the growth of the world economy.
Speech by Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao at the concluding session of the FICCI-Brookings Dialogue on 'U.S.-India Strategic Partnership'.

New Delhi, November 2, 2010.

It is a great privilege to be with you at the concluding session of the Second FICCI-Brookings Dialogue on India-US Strategic Partnership. I believe you have had a long and productive day of discussions on a truly comprehensive range of subjects, with an impressive array of speakers from both countries.

I had the honour to be present at the birth of this dialogue in June 2010 in Washington DC, a day after the first India-US Strategic Dialogue at the ministerial level. I am glad that this dialogue is already acquiring the character of a regular institutional dialogue, anchored in two premier organizations of India and the United States. Indeed, one of the most important aspects of the transformed India US relations is the extraordinary level of discourse and debate through non-government channels on the strategic future of this relationship.

This welcome development in our relationship is clearly evident, as we prepare for the visit of President Barack Obama to India from 6-9 November 2010. There has been a plethora of news and leaks on the visit, the deliverables and the themes; and, many valuable editorials, seminars and think tank reports that take a long-term and comprehensive view of the relationship. This excellent dialogue, for one, is a great help for us in planning and preparing for this visit. This is a reflection not only of the obvious interest in the first visit of President Obama to India, but also, I think, a widely held view that this visit could be a milestone in shaping the next phase of the relationship.

While there has been much debate and speculation on whether the relationship has sustained its momentum, it is reassuring to see consensus on at least one fundamental point: a strong India-US strategic partnership is in the interest of both countries and is good for the world.

For us in the government, though, the state of the relationship has not been a subject of doubt or debate. Over the past two years, the relationship has made a seamless transition through the democratic cycles in the two countries. The intensity of our engagement and the momentum of our cooperation have not only been sustained, they have actually deepened and intensified.

Since April 2010, PM and President Obama have met six times. Besides the Prime Minister’s State visit to Washington DC in November 2009, the two leaders have met within the G-20 framework; in the context of discussions on climate change in Copenhagen; and for the first ever Nuclear Security Summit in Washington DC. This reflects the growing global nature of our engagement.

During this period, the two governments have signed a Counter-terrorism Cooperation Initiative and a Framework for Cooperation in Trade and Investment; launched an India-US Financial and Economic Partnership; signed an MoU on Agriculture and Food Security Cooperation; continued to expand counter-terrorism cooperation, which included access to David Headley in the US; expanded our strategic dialogue; launched a dialogue on what is referred to as Global Commons; announced our intention to cooperate in the Global Center for Nuclear Energy Partnership, which India is establishing.

The two governments have also completed the remaining steps for the implementation of their Civil Nuclear Cooperation Agreement, including conclusion of the reprocessing arrangements and procedures and completion of Part 810 assurances. India has also enacted a Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage Act and has signed the CSC. We welcome the commencement of the commercial negotiations between the Indian operators and the US companies, and look forward to an early realisation of our shared goal of a robust India-US cooperation in the civil nuclear sector.

These are just a few examples of steps, small and big, that the two governments are taking to expand their cooperation across the full spectrum of our expanding bilateral agenda, not only in traditional strategic and security domain, but also in the areas of national development priorities for India and, I believe, of importance to the United States as well - areas such as trade and investment, science and technology, clean energy, health, higher education, and agriculture.
It is heartening that the frequency, quality and the range of our political dialogue on all regional and global issues have reached a new level. Our mutual understanding on critical issues, including on global economic situation, terrorism, Afghanistan, regional challenges and Asian stability has become stronger.

President Obama’s visit to India is, therefore, taking place at a time when our relationship has matured significantly. So, it is natural that this visit would be somewhat different from the visit of President Clinton, which took place 22 years after the visit of President Carter and, after a time of great strain in our relationship; or that of President Bush, when we were at an important build phase of the relationship.

President Obama’s visit will reflect this essential continuity in our relationship. It will be an opportunity to consolidate all that we have built in the past decade. We are not at a stage in our relationship for dramatic breakthroughs and big bang. But, we will see concrete and significant steps in a wide range of areas that will expand the long term strategic framework of the relationship in a way that we can create a productive partnership for the mutual benefit of our two countries and, equally important, to give substantive content and shape to our global strategic partnership.

This will be an opportunity to once again underscore that our shared values of democracy, openness, pluralism and fundamental freedoms.

This is a time to showcase the vibrant nature of our economic and technological partnership, which is balanced, growing rapidly in both directions, driven by innovation and knowledge, and which is creating jobs and prosperity in both India and the United States. People and services have been at the heart of our economic ties, and they have done more than just boost trade and investment between the two countries - they have played a vital role in bringing our two countries closer.

This visit comes at a time of significant global and regional challenges. Prime Minister looks forward to continuing the extremely productive dialogue on the global economic situation; the threat of terrorism that our two countries face continually; our convergent interests in Afghanistan; the challenges emanating from Pakistan, and our shared goals of sustained security, stability and prosperity in Asia.

We intend to expand and intensify our strategic consultations on regional and global issues. We will explore the possibility of sharing our experience, expertise and resources in promoting development, in partnership with interested countries, in other parts of the world including in regions like Africa. We will deepen our bilateral cooperation in a broad range of areas, including space, clean energy, healthcare, education and agriculture. We will further strengthen our partnership in non-proliferation and our cooperation in high technology.

This visit, therefore, could be an important milestone in our shared journey. There has been far too much focus on the transactional aspects of this visit. All relationships entail transactions, but sustained, long term partnerships are built on certain basic principles.

In the case of India and the United States, the relationship is not anchored on a single issue, idea or challenge. This is only natural in a complex world, characterized by pluralism of challenges and, rapid and unpredictable changes. I believe there can be three basic organising principles for a sustained and strong long term partnership.

Shared values will be the bedrock of our relationship. It creates comfort in our ties and minimizes the possibility of any fundamental disagreement between the two countries. But beyond that, success of the world’s two largest democracies and a strong relationship between them will remain the best advertisement for our shared values. Today, however, we are at a stage in our relationship where we can give concrete shape to our partnership based on shared democratic values - for example, in reforming the global institutions of governance to make them representative of contemporary realities and weighted in favour of democratic values; in working together to strengthen democratic institutions and capabilities in fellow democracies; and, advancing inclusive and broad-based social and economic development across the world.
Secondly, economic partnership will be another important pillar of this relationship. We are among the largest economies in the world anchored in democracy and diversity. We are blessed with enormous enterprise and skills. We are endowed with synergies drawn from India's rapid growth and US's global economic leadership. We have an impressive track record of partnership based on innovation. Our economic partnership has great promise and potential, not only to be an engine for global competitiveness of our companies and generating employment and prosperity in our two countries, but also in but, above all, to use technology and innovation to find solutions for economic and social challenges facing our people and the world.

The third important basis for our relationship is the security of our people and stability in the world. All of us are familiar with the challenges that our two countries face, both conventional and long term, and asymmetric and immediate. Our interests increasingly converge; our understanding of the nature and the source of problems that we face have also become increasingly similar. But, we face the challenge of reconciling our objectives and approaches in dealing with a complex range of challenges, which have sometimes been irritants in our relationship in the past and sometimes create lingering doubts in the minds of our people about the merit of this strategic partnership. So, as we deepen our strategic partnership, we must - I am confident that we will - be more sensitive to each other's vital interests and always be guided by our long-term objectives and by the shared recognition the more secure we are individually the more we will be effective partners in promoting peace, stability and security.

Our relationship is in a state of constant evolution in a rapidly changing world. This is, therefore, an exciting time in our relationship, because we have a unique opportunity at this stage to work together to influence the course of this world. That is the hope and the promise of the India-US partnership in the 21st century

Thank you
The breadth of Indo-US relations extends to all areas of human endeavour, to bilateral and regional issues and the big picture is often not appreciated because "we get caught in transactional issues, such as outsourcing", Mr. Shiv Shankar Menon, National Security Adviser said here today. His remarks were seconded by Mr. Strobe Talbott who said "US companies that have done strategic outsourcing are actually doing well, creating jobs and helping the US economy".

In his keynote address at the Dialogue on 'US-India Strategic Partnership' organised by FICCI and Brookings Institution, Mr. Menon said that "Indo-US relations have changed in a fundamental way in the last decade. We have more than just a transactional relationship with the US. The two nations have an open, democratic and inclusive architecture, we have learnt overtime that mercantilism and protectionism do not serve us well and it is time to be ambitious about the relationship".

He said the two democratic nations respect the rule of law, open trading arrangements, and rule-based multilateral trade. India and the US, he said, were capable of institutional innovation and "we need to be pragmatic to work this relationship where it works and go beyond what's in it for me and move to a more holistic and strategic level of engagement".

Asked where China stood in the India-US relationship, Mr. Menon said China was India's biggest neighbour and a major trading partner. There were sensitivities on both sides and just as all major powers were talking to each other, there is need to engage with China. "I therefore do not see our relations with the US affecting our relations with China".

Mr. Strove Talbott expressed optimism on taking the US-India ties to the next level as there is minimal temptation amongst the two sides to re-argue all the issues in the strategic partnership. "Both nations can and must work together to mitigate the effects of climate change which poses an existential threat to the future of mankind. They must engage with the European countries and China to combat the fall-out of climate change”, he added.

On counter-terrorism, Mr. Talbott said the Mumbai massacres were a wake-up call for the two governments. “We are now building on and upgrading our efforts on counterterrorism,” he said.

For peace and security in the region, he expressed the hope that the triangular relationship amongst US, India and China will be in the larger interest of peace in the region and “for this to happen there is need to deal and discuss issues candidly with Beijing and amongst ourselves”

583. Briefing by Foreign Secretary Mrs. Nirupama Rao on the visit of U.S. President Barack Obama.

New Delhi, November 4, 2010.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good afternoon to you and lovely to see you in such numbers. Welcome to XP Division and the Media Hall.

You are aware that we are awaiting the visit of President Barack Obama of the United States of America who is coming to Mumbai on the 6th of November. Foreign Secretary Shrimati Nirupama Rao is here to brief you about the visit. Let me also introduce Mr. Javed Ashraf sitting to the right of the Foreign Secretary. He is our Joint Secretary (Americas). Foreign Secretary would be making an opening statement and thereafter she would be most happy to take a few questions.

May I now invite Foreign Secretary for her opening remarks?

Foreign Secretary (Shrimati Nirupama Rao): A very good afternoon to all of you! President Barack Obama will visit India from 6-9 November 2010 on the invitation of the Hon’ble Prime Minister. As you are aware our Prime Minister visited USA in November 2009 and was given the honour of the first State visit of the Obama Administration. President Obama’s visit will reciprocate that visit and lend continuity to the bilateral engagement and high-level dialogue. The last Presidential visit to India from USA was that of President George Bush in 2006.

President Obama will be accompanied by the First Lady Michelle Obama, and a high-level delegation which is likely to include his National Security Adviser Tom Donillon; Mr Timothy Geithner, Secretary of the Treasury; Gary Locke, Secretary of Commerce; Thomas Vilsack, Secretary of Agriculture; Dr Rajiv Shah Administrator of USAID, and others. A large business delegation and media delegation are also accompanying the President.

President Obama will reach Mumbai in the forenoon of 6 November. He will begin his program by paying homage to the victims of the 26/11 terrorist attack in Mumbai, visit Mani Bhavan to pay homage to Mahatma Gandhi - his admiration for Gandhiji is well known - and attend a Business Summit organized by the US India Business Council in association with FICCI and CII. On 7th November he will address a ‘Town Hall’ meeting and associated events at the St Xavier’s College, and celebrate Diwali at a Primary School.

He will leave Mumbai and reach Delhi in the afternoon of 7th November. His program includes a brief visit to Humayun’s tomb. He will be the guest of honour at a dinner hosted by Prime Minister and Mrs Gursharan Kaur.

The official component of President Obama’s visit is on 8th November beginning with the ceremonial reception at Rashtrapati Bhavan, followed by a visit to Raj Ghat. President Obama and Prime Minister will meet in the forenoon and discuss bilateral, regional and global developments of mutual concern. They will also discuss how to expand the strategic framework of India-US relations on the basis of our shared values and interests.

Prime Minister will be assisted by the Ministers of Finance, External Affairs, Defence, Home, Agriculture, Human Resource Development, Commerce and Industry, Deputy Chairman Planning Commission, Principal Secretary to Prime Minister, National Security Adviser, myself and our Ambassador to the USA.

On conclusion of the Summit level meeting, they will preside over the meeting of the India-US CEO Forum.
Thereafter the two leaders will address a Joint Press Conference. In the afternoon, the Hon'ble Vice-President, Leader of Opposition and Chairperson UPA Smt. Sonia Gandhi will call on President Obama. That evening President Obama will address Members of both Houses of our Parliament, in the Central Hall. His official program concludes with a meeting with Hon'ble President, and a State Dinner for him and the First Lady at Rashtrapati Bhavan. President Obama leaves Delhi in the forenoon of 9 November 2010 for Indonesia.

The US Administration under President Obama has expressed its commitment to strengthen Indo-US bilateral relations further, building upon the existing level of cooperation in various areas of bilateral and global engagement. Both Prime Minister and President Obama share the belief that this will be one of the defining partnerships of the 21st century.

A very warm welcome awaits President Obama. The visit comes at a time when India-US relations have matured significantly. The intensity and frequency of dialogue is unprecedented. In addition to their meeting in November 2009 in Washington DC, Prime Minister and President Obama have met five times in the course of the last 18 months, most recently at the Nuclear Security Summit in April 2010 in Washington and the G20 Summit in June in Toronto. This is President Obama's first visit to India.

The India-US relationship is founded on shared values, increasingly convergent interests, enormous opportunities for mutually beneficial bilateral cooperation and a shared commitment to work together to address regional and global issues.

Since Prime Minister's State visit to Washington in November 2009, cooperation has become broad-based and continues to grow and expand across sectors. Our Strategic Dialogue in June 2009 chaired by EAM and Secretary Clinton, the first of its kind between the two countries, with high-level inter-Ministerial participation on both sides was itself a landmark. Our strategic dialogue, including through institutional mechanisms, has expanded to cover all regional and multilateral issues of mutual interest. Our defence cooperation, including defence trade, continues to grow.

The two governments have signed a Counter-terrorism Cooperation Initiative and a Framework for Cooperation in Trade and Investment; launched an India-US Financial and Economic Partnership; signed an MoU on Agriculture and Food Security Cooperation; continued to expand counter-terrorism cooperation, including on the investigations into the Mumbai terror attack; and, announced our intention to cooperate in the Global Center for Nuclear Energy Partnership, which India is establishing.

We have also completed the remaining steps for the implementation of their Civil Nuclear Cooperation Agreement, including conclusion of the reprocessing arrangements and procedures and completion of Part 810 assurances. India has also enacted a Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage Act and has signed the CSC. We welcome the commencement of the commercial negotiations between the Indian operators and the US companies, and look forward to an early realisation of our shared goal of a robust India-US cooperation in the civil nuclear sector.

The two governments have worked purposefully to expand cooperation in trade and investment, science and technology, clean energy, health, higher education, agriculture etc which are national development priorities for India.

Bilateral commerce and economic relations have flourished. Trade has also diversified and encompasses a wide range of products, services and technology. Bilateral trade in goods and in the services sector is largely balanced. The economic partnership between the two countries will be one important area of focus. There are a lot of synergies between the two countries. The economic relationship is growing well in both directions.

The US is the third largest source of foreign direct investments in India. Cumulative FDI inflows from the US from April 2000 amount to $8.86 billion constituting nearly 8 percent of total FDI into India.

According to US officials, India is the fastest growing source of foreign direct investment in the US. This investment from India is creating, saving or supporting tens of thousands of jobs in the US. India’s defence acquisitions and major purchases in the energy and aviation sectors, for example, are contributing in a substantive manner to the US economy.

We have recently signed a Framework for Cooperation in Trade and Investment; and launched an India-US Financial and Economic Partnership to further boost our bilateral economic partnership.
The relationship also derives strength from the 2.7 million Indian-origin community in USA and the vibrant people-to-people linkages between the two countries.

President Obama’s visit will reflect this essential continuity in our relationship. It will be an opportunity to once again underscore that our shared values of democracy, openness, pluralism and fundamental freedoms form the bedrock of our strategic partnership. It will be an opportunity to consolidate our relationship. We will see concrete and significant steps in a wide range of areas that will expand the long term strategic framework of the relationship in a way that we can create a productive partnership for the mutual benefit of our two countries and, equally important, give substantive content and shape to our global strategic partnership.

Our Prime Minister looks forward to continuing his extremely productive dialogue with President Obama on a range of issues, including the global economic situation; the threat of terrorism; the challenges in our neighbourhood; and our shared goals of sustained security, stability and prosperity in Asia.

We look forward to this visit as an important milestone in elevating our global strategic partnership to a new level.

Question: Madam, yesterday President Barack Obama gave an interview to PTI wherein he talked about some complexities in supporting India’s case for a permanent seat in the UN Security Council. Are you disappointed that as a friend of India and a strategic partner of India, while the US have endorsed Japan’s case for a permanent seat it has not done so for India, and maybe when the President was coming to India, this was the right time to do so?

Foreign Secretary: I do not think we can structure a relationship on the basis of drawing hasty conclusions of the nature you referred to. The issues that you mentioned are by nature very complex. They are the subject of ongoing and continuing discussion with the United States. We have used the opportunity of the official discussions, and the meetings, the strategic dialogue that we had recently, to talk about these issues in a very candid, in a very open and transparent way. I think the United States is increasingly aware of the great potential for India's contribution to global affairs, to global peace and security, and to global development. And that really is the crux of the matter, the fact that the United States recognises this potential.

Question: India has expressed serious concerns as far as the talks with the Taliban are concerned of the Afghan Government, especially the role of Pakistan in terms of a mediator. Though US calls us a strategic and natural ally, we do not see that translating into action vis-a-vis their approach on Pakistan. So, what would New Delhi's message and expectations be on the issue from Washington?

Foreign Secretary: Again I think a very stark conclusion. As far as the situation in Afghanistan is concerned, India and the United States have maintained constant contact. The subject of the situation in Afghanistan is something that we discuss very closely with the United States. There have been a number of interlocutors who have come to Delhi. We have been in Washington. And certainly the situation in the region has figured very prominently. Both India and the United States share similar goals as far as stabilisation of the situation in Afghanistan is concerned. We are categorically against terrorism. We are categorically against religious extremism. We are for Afghan democracy; we are for Afghan pluralism; we are for Afghan development. I think that is really the focus that we and the United States have brought to bear on these discussions.

Question: The other issue Mr. Obama yesterday described in the interview as very difficult and complicated was on the issue of dual use technologies to India. Are we to understand that there will not then be any major announcement on that front? Are those talks still going down to the wire? Have you lowered your expectations on that front as well?

Foreign Secretary: Here again I am not going to jump to hasty conclusions. Yes, I think the President is correct when he refers to these issues as being complex. Obviously, these are issues which have existed between India and the United States for some time now. But what is different, and I would like to stress and underscore this difference, is that with the growth and the growing maturity of the strategic partnership, both Governments have been of the view, are of the view that these controls, these obstacles that have existed in the way of dual use technology trade between the two countries need to be reviewed, need to be looked at anew with the intention of seeing how we can reduce these obstacles, and ultimately eliminate them altogether. So, that is the focus at the moment.

Question: Will the Prime Minister raise specifically Warren Anderson's extradition?

Foreign Secretary: I cannot say that at the moment. There is a textured and a fairly rich agenda for the talks. But I cannot say whether this will be raised.

Question: Will the issue of Cold Start be discussed in this meeting?

Foreign Secretary: No, it will not be discussed. There is no reason why it should figure in the talks.

Question: India has passed all the necessary legislation to pave the way for foreign nuclear companies to make investments in India. But the American companies do not seem terribly excited. They still think that the liability might be very high and all that. What does India propose to do to clear their doubts and how hopeful are you of American companies investing in Indian nuclear plants?

Foreign Secretary: First of all let me say we are very hopeful about American companies participating in our nuclear energy sector. Our Department of Atomic Energy and the NPCIL remain in touch with the US companies concerned. The idea is to provide a level-playing field for all foreign companies who are keen on participating in this sector. This is a sector of great importance for us in the context of the development of clean energy resources for India. So, obviously we give a lot of importance to it.

Question: The United States describes India as a strong partner in bolstering global non-proliferation regime. Are we expecting support from President Obama on India's desire to join elite nuclear clubs like the NSG, Australia Group and other such groupings?

Foreign Secretary: When I spoke about the dual use technology regime and the removal of obstacles in that context, the issues that you referred to also form a part of this discussion.
Question: What is our expectation?

Foreign Secretary: I would not like to predict the outcomes of this. But let me say that the discussions that we have held so far between the two sides have covered considerable ground and we are reasonably optimistic about the outcomes.

Question: Madam, this is regarding the 26/11 attack. I am again going to refer to the PTI interview of President Obama in which he says Pakistan has a special responsibility to see to it that the perpetrators are brought to book. Is that going to be one of the issues that would be discussed?

Foreign Secretary: In my opening remarks I referred to the fact that discussions relating to counter-terrorism and the cooperation that India and the United States can strengthen in this area have been very much a part of the discussion that we have had over the last few months. Obviously the issue of counter-terrorism would figure in the agenda of the discussions during the President’s visit.

Question: Officers of both the countries were finalising a deal on C17 Globemaster aircraft. Is this deal likely to be announced during the visit?

Foreign Secretary: I cannot say. I will not be able to give you an answer on that. Yes, this is a subject of discussion in the context of our defence purchases from the United States. We have made considerable progress in completing the various procedures that are connected with such purchases. But the final outcome I will not be able to give you at this moment.

Question: Madam, you just talked about the Indian investment in the US and said that we are creating tens of thousands of jobs and they are supporting the US economy. In the light of what you have said, are we going to discuss the issue of outsourcing because there is a ban in some of the States in the US which has been imposed by Obama so far as outsourcing is concerned? Are you going to take up this issue and what are the expectations?

Foreign Secretary: The issue of outsourcing and the recent developments connected with the hike in visa fees will obviously figure very much in the discussions held with the business community that President Obama will have in Mumbai. For instance, there is a Business Summit that is going to take place, there would be discussion with some of the CEOs and entrepreneurs. So, it is obviously going to figure very much in the discourse during the visit. As far as the economic cooperation component of our relationship is concerned, you must understand that this relationship has become so big in so many areas and the issue of the outsourcing is one issue in this relationship. But overall I would say that the prognosis for our economic relationship is very bright given the extent of US investment in the Indian economy, the fact that there is outward investment from India into the US economy which is creating jobs, which is something we would like to convey to President Obama and his delegation while they are here, to give them the picture as we see it from our side. The recent studies that FICCI and others have conducted have clearly shown that thousands of jobs have been created by our green field investments, by our acquisitions in the United States. That is something we would like definitely to stress.

Question: Madam, what are our expectations in the space and the agriculture sectors?

Foreign Secretary: On the space sector, we have been talking about a commercial space launch agreement between the two sides, and the two Governments have been looking at the text of a possible agreement in this area. So, we hope that there will be a satisfactory conclusion of such an agreement during the visit although one cannot guarantee this. On agriculture and food security, as I mentioned, during the course of this year we signed an MoU in agriculture and food security. Very possibly during this visit we hope to conclude an MoU on weather forecasting and crop forecasting which will really take its reference from the MoU on agricultural cooperation that we have signed.

Question: I want to follow up on the nuclear energy question from earlier. The US companies have been looking for India to do something to mitigate the law that was passed. They feel that the liability law is not actually compliant with the CSC India had signed. And so they are looking either for a regulation in the interim or some sort of long-term promise to amend that law. Can you say whether or not you have indicated that India can take such a measure?

Foreign Secretary: I just want to emphasise once again that firstly we look forward to the participation of US companies in the civil nuclear energy sector in India. We are now at a stage where commercial negotiations could begin between Indian operators and the US companies. We have invited the US companies in order that we can explain the provisions of the civil liability law to them so that we can address any concerns that they may have and also begin discussions on the next steps for implementation of our civil nuclear power projects. And I am pleased that a commercial delegation from the United States is likely to visit India very shortly in this connection. That is as much as I can say.

Question: Mrs. Rao, America has recently released over two billion dollars to Pakistan in aid. Would you be raising the question of Pak-based groups targeting Indian interests in Afghanistan? There have been so many reports about Pakistani intelligence agencies even sheltering senior Al Qaeda leaders. Afghan Taliban is also working for them. So, would you be raising this issue and specifically what are the various aspects that you would be talking to the US?

Foreign Secretary: We will obviously talk about the situation in the region. One of the major threats we face is the threat from terrorism, terrorism directed at us from across our borders, and also the problem of terrorism in Afghanistan which has directly targeted Indian interests there. So, in the context of the concerns that we have about the operation of terrorist elements, and that would include all the major global terrorist organisations that operate in our region, we will obviously be talking about our concerns.

Question: Madam, a few days ago the Home Secretary, Mr. Pillai, talked about the Americans refusing to give India access on the Headley issue. A day ago the National Security Advisor said completely the opposite. He said there was unprecedented access. Why is the Government speaking in different voices? Can you tell us what exactly is the situation on this?

Foreign Secretary: I do not the Government is speaking in different voices. I think you are trying to segment these various statements, if I may say. Do not take them out of context please because the bottom line is that there has been unprecedented cooperation. And there has been an excellent and a very responsive attitude from the American side on the investigation into the Mumbai terror attacks, and we have not been denied access to any information. That is the situation as it exists. There is no contradiction, in my view, between any of these statements.
Question: Madam, what is your response or rather our assessment of Democrats' loss yesterday in the election? How do you think it will impact Indo-US relations in the tenure of President Obama, because now he will be a relatively weaker President?

Foreign Secretary: Obviously I would not comment on the internal affairs of the United States. But let me add that the subject of India-US relations is a subject of bipartisan consensus within the United States. So, we look forward to working with the new members of Congress. Many of them are well-known old friends of India who have been associated with the India Caucus in the Congress, many of whom have visited India, they know the India-US relationship very well. So, we are looking forward to working with them.

Question: You would have seen reports of the Chinese sprawl or presence in Pakistan Occupied Kashmir with army troops building bridges. This report was taken seriously by the Indian Government as well as it expressed concern officially. Will this feature in your talks with the United States given that we have a high-level Chinese delegation visit in just barely a month after President Obama’s visit?

Foreign Secretary: India’s interests in the region go beyond South Asia, and I have said this before. They stretch into the Southeast Asian region, into East Asia. Obviously our relations with China are very important. Obviously when we meet friends and partners including the United States, we discuss the situation in the region, and that would include our relations with our major partners and our neighbours. So, in that context, yes, we will be talking about the situation in the region. But let me emphasise that both believe, for the United States as much as it is for India, dialogue with China, an open, transparent dialogue that seeks to engage China across the board on a number of areas - whether they are security-related, strategic concern related, issues of trade and economic cooperation and investment, people-to-people contact - all these really form the subject of the relationships that both India and the United States seem to build with China today.

Question: Madam, Please tell us a little about the agreements to be signed and their field and number; please tell us some details of the MoUs.
Foreign Secretary: Normally we do not talk about the agreements that we are going sign or conclude before the visit is over. So, I would prefer not to go into those details. But let me say that they will include development-related subjects. I just mentioned about agriculture and space. I would add health. I would add clean energy. These are some of the areas, areas that really impact on lives of people at the grassroots. We are talking about agreements like that.

Question: Madam, I think we have heard from the National Security Advisor that the visit of Mr. Obama, especially on the terrorism issue, is a wakeup call for both the countries to counter terrorism measures to take. But I would like to know a little elaboration on what is the mechanism. Are you having any kind of an action to be taken place because and specially in regards to not only Afghanistan or Pakistan which is your great concern, it is also about Afghanistan where America would be pulling out at least the combat troops from next year onwards. So, what would be the fall out on India's internal security and anti counter measures of India along with the US satisfaction?

Foreign Secretary: That is a very long question I am afraid. I said to you that counter-terrorism cooperation is one of the pillars of the strategic dialogue between the two sides. We have signed an MoU, a counter-terrorism initiative MoU between the two sides. Now what we intend to do is to draw up a plan of action that will concretise specific areas of cooperation whether it is information sharing, whether it is in the area of forensics, whether it is in the area of coastal security, megacity policing - these are all areas in which we hope to strengthen cooperation.

Question: What are the prospects for the defence agreements during the President's visit?

Foreign Secretary: I do not have anything to say on that at the moment.

Question: Madam, can you elaborate on the health and the education sectors? Are there any agreements on that?

Foreign Secretary: On health there is a plan to set up a regional disease detection centre which will involve global participation, especially with the United States. We will have collaboration with the National Institute of Health in Washington apart from the Centre for Disease Control.
Question: And in education are you going to sign any agreements?

Foreign Secretary: We are planning an education summit in 2011. So, both Governments under the Singh-Obama Knowledge Initiative have been discussing an education summit.

Question: Despite the problem of the liability law, when you look forward to robust cooperation in civil nuclear trade, what are the reasons for optimism?

Foreign Secretary: As they say, ‘watch this space’.

Question: Is there any proposal for Indo-US partnership in open government or any such proposal for democratisation of information?

Foreign Secretary: Internationally, multilaterally India and the United States have been doing enough together to strengthen that aspect of their partnership that concerns the issues relating to democracy, governance, leadership. And we have been working together in the United Nations also on initiatives that strengthen the systems, of structures of democracy worldwide. So, when I speak of shared values and shared approaches, this is particularly relevant when it comes to the strengthening of our democratic values. Working together particularly in the field of development, how democracy promotes economic development, that is how we have started using our expertise and our experience in such areas as e-governance and e-technology for governmental purposes, for developmental purposes, and also under the access to open information as in the RTI. That is also an area where we share common approaches and values.

I wanted to add, when I spoke of the engagements that President Obama has in Delhi, let me once again refer to the fact that he will meet with various dignitaries. I spoke of his meeting with the Hon. Vice-President, and the Leader of the Opposition. And Shrimati Sonia Gandhi will be calling on President Obama. That is also a very important meeting that will take place. All this will happen before he addresses the Joint Session of Parliament on the 8th of November.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much.

584. Speech by President Shrimati Pratibha Devisingh Patil at the Banquet hosted by her in honour of the United States President Barack Obama.

Your Excellency, President Barack Obama,

Mrs. Michelle Obama,

Excellencies,

Distinguished Guests,

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It is a great honour and privilege, Mr. President, to welcome you this evening. You are in our midst at a time when India-US relations have never been stronger and the promise and potential of our partnership has never been greater.

From different paths and different circumstances, Indians and Americans have reached the same conclusion: that democracy is a universal ideal and justice, dignity and opportunity are universal aspirations.

At important moments in our history - for example, during India’s freedom struggle and the American Civil Rights Movement - we have inspired each other. The lives and message of Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King reflect our shared vision, our common struggles and our collective hopes. Nothing echoes this better than the words of Martin Luther King, "If humanity is to progress, Gandhi is inescapable. He lived, thought, and acted, inspired by the vision of humanity evolving toward a world of peace and harmony." Your own admiration for Mahatma Gandhi reflects this continuing philosophical bond between our peoples.

Today, we have built a strong strategic partnership on the solid bedrock of shared ideals and common interests. The historic civil nuclear initiative is an instrument and a symbol of our transformed relations. But, across virtually every field of human endeavour, we have explored new frontiers and redefined the paradigm of co-operation.
There are many ties that bind our two nations together. Nearly 3 million people of Indian origin in the United States act as a bridge of friendship, including over 100,000 Indian students in the United States, who along with the growing number of young Americans coming to India, are sowing the seeds of future partnerships. Our enterprises, scientists, engineers, technologists and academics are creating partnerships that generate hope for the future.

We have, therefore, enormous potential to work together for a sustainable and inclusive global economic development, to address the challenges of infrastructure, clean energy, food security and health security, and educate and empower the youth, especially our women, for the responsibilities of the new era. Our two nations are well placed to harness the power of innovation, not only for technological leadership and global competitiveness, but also as a tool for economic empowerment and social transformation.

I am pleased that today we have announced initiatives to benefit not only our peoples, but also fulfill our responsibility to humankind. We have the humility to know that we do not have all the answers, but we have the strength of our values and the benefit of our experience to make our own modest contribution to this cause.

Excellency, we cannot make our world more prosperous without making our people safer. As democracies, we have a profound responsibility to work together for peace, stability and security in the world. We must continue our joint efforts to reform global institutions to reflect contemporary realities, and increase their effectiveness in meeting current challenges.

This is a time of great challenges in the world, but never has the opportunity been greater, the environment better, and the need more urgent for our two countries to work together and lead global efforts to seek a safer, more prosperous and more sustainable future, full of goodwill for this world.

Your visit, Mr. President, has been a historic milestone in our shared journey.
Excellencies and Distinguished Guests, may I now request you to join me in raising a toast to:-

— the good health of His Excellency President Obama and Her Excellency Mrs. Obama; — to the prosperity and well-being of the people of the United States; and — to further strengthening of the bonds of co-operation and friendship between India and the United States.

585. Joint Statement issued during the visit of U.S. President Barack Obama.

Reaffirming their nations’ shared values and increasing convergence of interests, Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and President Barack Obama resolved today in New Delhi to expand and strengthen the India-U.S. global strategic partnership.

The two leaders welcomed the deepening relationship between the world’s two largest democracies. They commended the growing cooperation between their governments, citizens, businesses, universities and scientific institutions, which have thrived on a shared culture of pluralism, education, enterprise, and innovation, and have benefited the people of both countries.

Building on the transformation in India-U.S. relations over the past decade, the two leaders resolved to intensify cooperation between their nations to promote a secure and stable world; advance technology and innovation; expand mutual prosperity and global economic growth; support sustainable development; and exercise global leadership in support of economic development, open government and democratic values.
The two leaders reaffirmed that India-U.S. strategic partnership is indispensable not only for their two countries but also for global stability and prosperity in the 21st century. To that end, President Obama welcomed India's emergence as a major regional and global power and affirmed his country's interest in India's rise, its economic prosperity, and its security.

A GLOBAL STRATEGIC PARTNERSHIP FOR THE 21st CENTURY

Prime Minister Singh and President Obama called for an efficient, effective, credible and legitimate United Nations to ensure a just and sustainable international order. Prime Minister Singh welcomed President Obama's affirmation that, in the years ahead, the United States looks forward to a reformed UN Security Council that includes India as a permanent member. The two leaders reaffirmed that all nations, especially those that seek to lead in the 21st century, bear responsibility to ensure that the United Nations fulfills its founding ideals of preserving peace and security, promoting global cooperation, and advancing human rights.

Prime Minister Singh and President Obama reiterated that India and the United States, as global leaders, will partner for global security, especially as India serves on the Security Council over the next two years. The leaders agreed that their delegations in New York will intensify their engagement and work together to ensure that the Council continues to effectively play the role envisioned for it in the United Nations Charter. Both leaders underscored that all states have an obligation to comply with and implement UN Security Council Resolutions, including UN sanctions regimes. They also agreed to hold regular consultations on UN matters, including on the long-term sustainability of UN peacekeeping operations. As the two largest democracies, both countries also reaffirmed their strong commitment to the UN Democracy Fund.

The two leaders have a shared vision for peace, stability and prosperity in Asia, the Indian Ocean region and the Pacific region and committed to work together, and with others in the region, for the evolution of an open, balanced and inclusive architecture in the region. In this context, the leaders reaffirmed their support for the East Asia Summit and committed to regular consultations in this regard. The United States welcomes, in particular, India's leadership in expanding prosperity and security across the region. The two leaders agreed to deepen existing regular strategic consultations on developments in East Asia, and decided to expand and intensify their strategic consultations to cover regional and global issues of mutual interest, including Central and West Asia.

The two sides committed to intensify consultation, cooperation and coordination to promote a stable, democratic, prosperous, and independent Afghanistan. President Obama appreciated India's enormous contribution to Afghanistan's development and welcomed enhanced Indian assistance that will help Afghanistan achieve self-sufficiency. In addition to their own independent assistance programs in Afghanistan, the two sides resolved to pursue joint development projects with the Afghan Government in capacity building, agriculture and women's empowerment.

They reiterated that success in Afghanistan and regional and global security require elimination of safe havens and infrastructure for terrorism and violent extremism in Afghanistan and Pakistan. Condemning terrorism in all its forms, the two sides agreed that all terrorist networks, including Lashkar e-Taiba, must be defeated and called for Pakistan to bring to justice the perpetrators of the November 2008 Mumbai attacks. Building upon the Counter Terrorism Initiative signed in July 2010, the two leaders announced a new Homeland Security Dialogue between the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Department of Homeland Security and agreed to further deepen operational cooperation, counter-terrorism technology transfers and capacity building. The two leaders also emphasized the importance of close cooperation in combating terrorist financing and in protecting the international financial system.

In an increasingly inter-dependent world, the stability of, and access to, the air, sea, space, and cyberspace domains is vital for the security and economic prosperity of nations. Acknowledging their commitment to openness and responsible international conduct, and on the basis of their shared values, India and the United States have launched a dialogue to explore ways to work together, as well as with other countries, to develop a shared vision for these critical domains to promote peace, security and development. The leaders reaffirmed the importance of maritime security, unimpeded commerce, and freedom of navigation, in accordance with relevant universally agreed principles of international law, including the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, and peaceful settlement of maritime disputes.

The transformation in India-U.S. defense cooperation in recent years has strengthened mutual understanding on regional peace and stability, enhanced both countries’ respective capacities to meet humanitarian and other challenges such as terrorism and piracy, and contributed to the development of the strategic partnership between India and the United States. The two Governments resolved to further strengthen defense cooperation, including through security dialogue, exercises, and promoting trade and collaboration in defense equipment and technology. President Obama welcomed India’s decision to purchase U.S. high-technology defense items, which reflects our strengthening bilateral defence relations and will contribute to creating jobs in the United States.

The two leaders affirmed that their countries’ common ideals, complementary strengths and a shared commitment to a world without nuclear weapons give them a responsibility to forge a strong partnership to lead global efforts for non-proliferation and universal and non-discriminatory global nuclear disarmament in the 21st century. They affirmed the need for a meaningful dialogue among all states possessing nuclear weapons to build trust and confidence and for reducing the salience of nuclear weapons in international affairs and security doctrines. They support strengthening the six decade-old international norm of non-use of nuclear weapons. They expressed a commitment to strengthen international cooperative activities that will reduce the risk of terrorists acquiring nuclear weapons or material without reducing the rights of nations that play by the rules to harness the power of nuclear energy to advance their energy security. The leaders reaffirmed their shared dedication to work together to realize the commitments outlined at the April 2010 Nuclear Security Summit to achieve the goal of securing vulnerable nuclear materials in the next four years. Both sides expressed deep concern regarding illicit nuclear trafficking and smuggling and resolved to strengthen international cooperative efforts to address these threats through the IAEA, Interpol and in the context of the Nuclear Security Summit Communiqué and Action Plan. The two sides welcomed the Memorandum of Understanding for cooperation in the Global Centre for Nuclear Energy Partnership being established by India.

Both sides expressed deep concern about the threat of biological terrorism and pledged to promote international efforts to ensure the safety and security of biological agents and toxins. They stressed the need to achieve full implementation of the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention and expressed the hope for a successful BWC Review Conference in 2011. The United States welcomed India's destruction of its chemical weapons stockpile in accordance with the provisions of the Chemical Weapons Convention. Both countries affirmed their shared commitment to promoting the full and effective implementation of the CWC.

The two leaders expressed regret at the delay in starting negotiations in the Conference on Disarmament for a multilateral, non-discriminatory and internationally and effectively verifiable treaty banning the future production of fissile material for nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices.

India reaffirmed its unilateral and voluntary moratorium on nuclear explosive testing. The United States reaffirmed its testing moratorium and its commitment to ratify the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and bring it into force at an early date.

The leaders reaffirmed their commitment to diplomacy to resolve the Iranian nuclear issue, and discussed the need for Iran to take constructive and immediate steps to meet its obligations to the IAEA and the UN Security Council.

TECHNOLOGY, INNOVATION, AND ENERGY

Recognizing that India and the United States should play a leadership role in promoting global nonproliferation objectives and their desire to expand high technology cooperation and trade, Prime Minister Singh and President Obama committed to work together to strengthen the global export control framework and further transform bilateral export control regulations and policies to realize the full potential of the strategic partnership between the two countries.

Accordingly, the two leaders decided to take mutual steps to expand U.S.-India cooperation in civil space, defense, and other high-technology sectors. Commensurate with India’s nonproliferation record and commitment to abide by multilateral export control standards, these steps include the United States removing Indian entities from the U.S. Department of Commerce’s "Entity List" and realignment of India in U.S. export control regulations.

In addition, the United States intends to support India’s full membership in the four multilateral export control regimes (Nuclear Suppliers Group, Missile Technology Control Regime, Australia Group, and Wassenaar Arrangement) in a phased manner, and to consult with regime members to encourage the evolution of regime membership criteria, consistent with maintaining the core principles of these regimes, as the Government of India takes steps towards the full adoption of the regimes’ export control requirements to reflect its prospective membership, with both processes moving forward together. In the view of the United States, India should qualify for membership in the Australia Group and the Wassenaar Arrangement according to existing requirements once it imposes export controls over all items on these regimes’ control lists.

Both leaders reaffirmed the assurances provided in the letters exchanged in September 2004 and the End-Use Visit Arrangement, and determined that the two governments had reached an understanding to implement these initiatives consistent with their respective national export control laws and policies. The Prime Minister and President committed to a strengthened and expanded dialogue on export control issues, through fora such as the U.S.-India High Technology Cooperation Group, on aspects of capacity building, sharing of best practices, and outreach with industry.
The possibility of cooperation between the two nations in space, to advance scientific knowledge and human welfare, are without boundaries and limits. They commended their space scientists for launching new initiatives in climate and weather forecasting for agriculture, navigation, resource mapping, research and development, and capacity building. They agreed to continuing discussions on and seek ways to collaborate on future lunar missions, international space station, human space flight and data sharing, and to reconvene the Civil Space Joint Working Group in early 2011. They highlighted the just concluded Implementing Arrangement for enhanced monsoon forecasting that will begin to transmit detailed forecasts to farmers beginning with the 2011 monsoon rainy season as an important example of bilateral scientific cooperation advancing economic development, agriculture and food security.

The two leaders welcomed the completion of steps by the two governments for implementation of the India-U.S. civil nuclear agreement. They reiterated their commitment to build strong India-U.S. civil nuclear energy cooperation through the participation of the U.S. nuclear energy firms in India on the basis of mutually acceptable technical and commercial terms and conditions that enable a viable tariff regime for electricity generated. They noted that both countries had enacted domestic legislations and were also signatories to the Convention on Supplementary Compensation. They further noted that India intends to ratify the Convention on Supplementary Compensation within the coming year and is committed to ensuring a level playing field for U.S. companies seeking to enter the Indian nuclear energy sector, consistent with India’s national and international legal obligations.

India will continue to work with the companies. In this context, they welcomed the commencement of negotiations and dialogue between the Indian operator and U.S. nuclear energy companies, and expressed hope for early commencement of commercial cooperation in the civil nuclear energy sector in India, which will stimulate economic growth and sustainable development and generate employment in both countries.

Just as they have helped develop the knowledge economy, India and the United States resolved to strengthen their partnership in creating the green economy of the future. To this end, both countries have undertaken joint research and deployment of clean energy resources, such as solar, advanced biofuels, shale gas, and smart grids. The two leaders also welcomed the promotion of clean and energy efficient technologies through the bilateral Partnership to Advance Clean Energy (PACE) and expanded cooperation with the private sector. They welcomed the conclusion of a new MoU on assessment and exploration of shale gas and an agreement to establish a Joint Clean Energy Research Center in India as important milestones in their rapidly growing clean energy cooperation.

The leaders discussed the importance of working bilaterally, through the Major Economies Forum (MEF), and in the context of the international climate change negotiations within the framework of the UNFCCC to meet the challenge of climate change. Prime Minister Singh and President Obama reiterated the importance of a positive result for the current climate change negotiations at the forthcoming conference of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) in Mexico and affirmed their support for the Copenhagen Accord, which should contribute positively to a successful outcome in Cancun. To that end, the leaders welcomed enhanced cooperation in the area of climate adaptation and sustainable land use, and welcomed the new partnership between the United States and India on forestry programs and in weather forecasting.

INCLUSIVE GROWTH, MUTUAL PROSPERITY, AND ECONOMIC COOPERATION

The two leaders stressed that India and the United States, anchored in democracy and diversity, blessed with enormous enterprise and skill, and endowed with synergies drawn from India’s rapid growth and U.S. global economic leadership, have a natural partnership for enhancing mutual prosperity and stimulating global economic recovery and growth. They emphasize innovation not only as a tool for economic growth and global competitiveness, but also for social transformation and empowerment of people.
Prime Minister Singh and President Obama celebrated the recent growth in bilateral trade and investment, characterized by balanced and rapidly growing trade in goods and services. They noted positively that the United States is India’s largest trading partner in goods and services, and India is now among the fastest growing sources of foreign direct investment entering the United States. The two leaders agreed on steps to reduce trade barriers and protectionist measures and encourage research and innovation to create jobs and improve livelihoods in their countries.

They also welcomed expanding investment flow in both directions. They noted growing ties between U.S. and Indian firms and called for enhanced investment flows, including in India’s infrastructure sector, clean energy, energy efficiency, aviation and transportation, healthcare, food processing sector and education. They welcomed the work of the U.S.-India CEO Forum to expand cooperation between the two countries, including in the areas of clean energy and infrastructure development. They also encouraged enhanced engagement by Indian and American small and medium-sized enterprises as a critical driver of our economic relationship. They looked forward to building on these developments to realize fully the enormous potential for trade and investment between the two countries.

Recognizing the people-to-people dynamic behind trade and investment growth, they called for intensified consultations on social security issues at an appropriate time. The two leaders agreed to facilitate greater movement of professionals, investors and business travelers, students, and exchange visitors between their countries to enhance their economic and technological partnership.

To enhance growth globally, the Prime Minister and President highlighted both nations’ interests in an ambitious and balanced conclusion to the WTO’s Doha Development Agenda negotiations, and in having their negotiators accelerate and expand the scope of their substantive negotiations bilaterally and with other WTO members to accomplish this as soon as possible. They agreed to work together in the G-20 to make progress on the broad range of issues on its agenda, including by encouraging actions consistent with achieving strong, balanced, and sustainable growth, strengthening financial system regulation, reforming the international financial institutions, enhancing energy security, resisting protectionism in all its forms, reducing barriers to trade and investment, and implementing the development action plans.

Building on the historic legacy of cooperation between the India and the United States during the Green Revolution, the leaders also decided to work together to develop, test, and replicate transformative technologies to extend food security as part of an Evergreen Revolution. Efforts will focus on providing farmers the means to improve agricultural productivity. Collaboration also will enhance agricultural value chain and strengthen market institutions to reduce post-harvest crop losses.

Affirming the importance of India-U.S. health cooperation, Prime Minister and the President celebrated the signing of an MOU creating a new Global Disease Detection Regional Center in New Delhi, which will facilitate preparedness against threats to health such as pandemic influenza and other dangerous diseases.

Embracing the principles of democracy and opportunity, the leaders recognized that the full future potential of the partnership lies in the hands of the next generation in both countries. To help ensure that all members of that generation enjoy the benefits of higher education, the Prime Minister and the President agreed to convene an India-U.S. Higher Education Summit, chaired by senior officials from both countries in 2011, as part of a continued effort to strengthen educational opportunities. They welcomed the progress made in implementing the Singh-Obama 21st Century Knowledge Initiative that is expanding links between faculties and institutions of the two countries and the expansion in the Nehru-Fulbright Programme for Scholars.

Noting that the ties of kinship and culture are an increasingly important dimension of India-U.S. relations, President Obama welcomed India's decision to hold a Festival of India in Washington DC in 2011. Recognizing the importance of preserving cultural heritage, both governments resolved to initiate discussions on how India and the United States could partner to prevent the illicit trafficking of both countries' rich and unique cultural heritage.
A SHARED INTERNATIONAL PARTNERSHIP FOR DEMOCRACY AND DEVELOPMENT

Consistent with their commitments to open and responsive government, and harnessing the expertise and experience that the two countries have developed, the leaders launched a U.S.-India Open Government Dialogue that will, through public-private partnerships and use of new technologies and innovations, promote their shared goal of democratizing access to information and energizing civic engagement, support global initiatives in this area and share their expertise with other interested countries. This will build on India’s impressive achievements in this area in recent years and the commitments that the President made to advance an open government agenda at the United Nations General Assembly. The President and Prime Minister also pledged to explore cooperation in support of efforts to strengthen elections organization and management in other interested countries, including through sharing their expertise in this area.

Taking advantage of the global nature of their relationship, and recognizing India’s vast development experience and historical research strengths, the two leaders pledged to work together, in addition to their independent programmes, to adapt shared innovations and technologies and use their expertise in capacity building to extend food security to interested countries, including in Africa, in consultation with host governments.

Prime Minister Singh and President Obama concluded that their meeting is a historic milestone as they seek to elevate the India-U.S. strategic partnership to a new level for the benefit of their nations and the entire mankind. President Obama thanked President Patil, Prime Minister Singh, and the people of India for their extraordinary warmth and hospitality during his visit. The two leaders looked forward to the next session of the U.S.-India Strategic Dialogue in 2011.
586. Statement of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh to the media at the Joint Press Conference with President Barack Obama.

New Delhi, November 8, 2010.

Your Excellency President Barack Obama,

Distinguished representatives of the media.

I am delighted to welcome President Obama on his first visit to India.

I welcome the President as a personal friend and a charismatic leader who has made a deep imprint on world affairs through his inclusive vision of peace, security and welfare for all peoples and nations. The President and the First Lady have made an abiding impression on the people of India, with their warmth, their grace and their commitment to promoting ties between our two great democracies.

President Obama yesterday characterized the India-US partnership as one of the defining and indispensable partnerships of the 21st century. In my discussions with the President, we have decided to accelerate the deepening of our ties and to work as equal partners in a strategic relationship that will positively and decisively influence world peace, stability and progress.

We welcome the decision by the United States to lift controls on export of high technology items and technologies to India, and support India’s membership in multilateral export control regimes such as the Nuclear Suppliers Group. This is a manifestation of the growing trust and confidence in each other. We have agreed on steps to expand our cooperation in the space, civil nuclear, defence and other high end sectors.

We have announced specific initiatives in the areas of clean energy, health and agriculture. These include a Joint Clean Energy Research and Development Centre, the establishment of a Global Disease Detection Centre in India and an agreement for cooperation in weather and crop forecasting. We have decided to hold a Higher Education Summit next year. Cooperation in the education sector holds great promise because no two other countries are better equipped to be partners in building the knowledge economy of the future.

The United States is one of our largest trading partners. Our trade is balanced and growing. India is among the fastest growing sources of investment in the United States. Indian investments have helped to increase the competitiveness of the US economy. We welcome US investment and high technology in key sectors of our economy, including nuclear energy. We have agreed to facilitate trade and people-to-people exchanges, recognizing that protectionism is detrimental to both our economies.

I conveyed our gratitude to the President for the cooperation we have received in our counter-terrorism measures post Mumbai. We will start a new Homeland Security Dialogue to deepen this cooperation.

We had a detailed exchange on the situation in our extended region, including East Asia, Afghanistan, Pakistan and West Asia. We have a shared vision of security, stability and prosperity in Asia based on an open and inclusive regional architecture. We have agreed to broaden our strategic dialogue to cover other regions and issues, and initiate joint projects in Africa and Afghanistan.

As States possessing nuclear weapons, we have today put forth a common vision of a world without nuclear weapons, and decided to lead global efforts for non-proliferation and universal and non-discriminatory global nuclear disarmament. This is a historic and bold bilateral initiative. We have also decided to strengthen cooperation to tackle nuclear terrorism, and we welcome US participation in the Global Center for Nuclear Energy Partnership which will be set up in India.

President Obama is a sincere and valued friend of our country and our discussions have led to a meeting of minds. Ours is a partnership based on common values and interests, a shared vision of the world and the deep rooted ties of friendship among our two peoples. I look forward to working with the President to realize the enormous potential of this partnership.

Thank you.
Address by Vice President and Chairman, Rajya Sabha M. Hamid Ansari at the Meeting of Members of Parliament held under the auspices of the Indian Parliamentary Group in honour of the President of the United States of America, Barack H. Obama, at Central Hall, Parliament House. This was followed by the speech of U.S. President.

New Delhi, November 8, 2010

This is one of those infrequent occasions when the Rajya Sabha and the Lok Sabha Members come together for a meeting to honour, and hear, a visiting dignitary of great eminence. Our guest today is from one of the world’s oldest democracies and we, in the largest, rejoice in welcoming him.

Relationships between countries, Mr. President, are reflective of a complex web of considerations. Some of these are ephemeral, others more durable. The latter pertain to principles and values that transcend material considerations. Elements of what has been called the American Creed with its focus on liberty, constitutionalism, the law, democracy, individualism and political and cultural egalitarianism inspired and influenced our own Constitution.

We admire the tenacity of the American spirit and its capacity for introspection and course correction. You have demonstrated both during your presidency. The troubled world we live in necessitates it. We appreciate your initiative to "seek the peace and security of a world without nuclear weapons" and to take concrete steps towards it. We ourselves have been for long an advocate of non-discriminatory and universal nuclear disarmament.

In over six decades of independence, India has endeavoured to impart substance to the principles of liberty, equality and fraternity and to promote political as well as social and economic justice. We have accommodated diversity. Above all, we have sought to eschew conflict and promote peace.

The United States and India, Mr. President, have much to do together. Our areas of agreement are considerable, and expanding. We venture to hope that our two countries would work purposefully for an open world based on the principles of equity and dedicated to peace, freedom and prosperity for all people. We both repose faith in John Rawls’ dictum that ‘rights secured by justice are not subject to political bargaining or to a calculus of social interests.’

We are geographically removed from each other but face similar threats and challenges and have to be sensitive to each other’s concerns and critical interests. As vibrant democracies we cherish the right to disagree within a framework of our endeavour for the common good.

We are confident that your visit would bring our two people closer, help create a world order free from the evils of extremism, intolerance, injustice and terrorism, and devoted to the pursuit of new vistas of humanism and technological innovation in the service of humankind.

I now invite the distinguished guest to address the gathering.

Remarks by the U.S. President Barack Obama to the Joint Session of the Indian Parliament in New Delhi, India.

Mr. Vice President, Madam Speaker, Mr. Prime Minister, members of Lok Sabha and Rajya Sabha, and most of all, the people of India.

I thank you for the great honor of addressing the representatives of more than one billion Indians and the world’s largest democracy. (Applause.) I bring the greetings and friendship of the world’s oldest democracy -- the United States of America, including nearly three million proud and patriotic Indian-Americans. (Applause.)

Over the past three days, my wife Michelle and I have experienced the -- and dynamism of India and its people -- from the majesty of Humayun’s Tomb to the advanced technologies that are empowering farmers and women who are the backbone of Indian society; from the Diwali celebrations with schoolchildren to the innovators who are fueling India’s economic rise; from the university students who will chart India’s future, to you --leaders who helped to bring India to this moment of extraordinary promise.
At every stop, we have been welcomed with the hospitality for which Indians have always been known. So, to you and the people of India, on behalf of me, Michelle and the American people, please accept my deepest thanks. (Applause.) Bahoot dhanyavad. (Applause.)

Now, I am not the first American President to visit India. Nor will I be the last. But I am proud to visit India so early in my presidency. It's no coincidence that India is my first stop on a visit to Asia, or that this has been my longest visit to another country since becoming President. (Applause.) For in Asia and around the world, India is not simply emerging; India has emerged. (Applause.)

And it is my firm belief that the relationship between the United States and India -- bound by our shared interests and our shared values -- will be one of the defining partnerships of the 21st century. This is the partnership I've come here to build. This is the vision that our nations can realize together.

My confidence in our shared future is grounded in my respect for India's treasured past -- a civilization that's been shaping the world for thousands of years. Indians unlocked the intricacies of the human body and the vastness of our universe. It's no exaggeration to say that our Information Age is rooted in Indian innovations -- including the number zero. (Applause.)

Of course, India not only opened our minds, she expanded our moral imaginations -- with religious texts that still summon the faithful to lives of dignity and discipline, with poets who imagined a future "where the mind is without fear and the head is held high" -- (applause) -- and with a man whose message of love and justice endures -- the father of your nation, Mahatma Gandhi. (Applause.)

For me and Michelle, this visit has, therefore, held special meaning. See, throughout my life, including my work as a young man on behalf of the urban poor, I've always found inspiration in the life of Gandhiji and his simple and profound lesson to be the change we seek in the world. (Applause.) And just as he summoned Indians to seek their destiny, he influenced champions of equality in my own country, including a young preacher named Martin Luther King. After making his pilgrimage to India a half-century ago, Dr. King called Gandhi's philosophy of non-violent resistance "the only logical and moral approach" in the struggle for justice and progress.  (Applause.)

So we were honored to visit the residence where Gandhi and King both stayed -- Mani Bhavan.  And we were humbled to pay our respects at Raj Ghat.  And I am mindful that I might not be standing before you today, as President of the United States, had it not been for Gandhi and the message he shared and inspired with America and the world.  (Applause.)

An ancient civilization of science and innovation; a fundamental faith in human progress -- this is the sturdy foundation upon which you have built ever since that stroke of midnight when the tricolor was raised over a free and independent India.  (Applause.) And despite the skeptics who said this country was simply too poor, or too vast, or too diverse to succeed, you surmounted overwhelming odds and became a model to the world.

Instead of slipping into starvation, you launched a Green Revolution that fed millions.  Instead of becoming dependent on commodities and exports, you invested in science and technology and in your greatest resource -- the Indian people.  And the world sees the results, from the supercomputers you build to the Indian flag that you put on the moon.

Instead of resisting the global economy, you became one of its engines -- reforming the licensing raj and unleashing an economic marvel that has lifted tens of millions of people from poverty and created one of the world's largest middle classes.

Instead of succumbing to division, you have shown that the strength of India -- the very idea of India -- is its embrace of all colors, all castes, all creeds.  (Applause.) It's the diversity represented in this chamber today. It's the richness of faiths celebrated by a visitor to my hometown of Chicago more than a century ago -- the renowned Swami Vivekananda.  He said that, "holiness, purity and charity are not the exclusive possessions of any church in the world, and that every system has produced men and women of the most exalted character."

And instead of being lured by the false notion that progress must come at the expense of freedom, you built the institutions upon which true democracy depends -- free and fair elections, which enable citizens to choose their own leaders without recourse to arms -- (applause) -- an independent judiciary and the rule of law, which allows people to address their grievances; and a thriving free press and vibrant civil society which allows every voice to be heard. This year, as India marks 60 years with a strong and democratic constitution, the lesson is clear: India has succeeded, not in spite of democracy; India has succeeded because of democracy. (Applause.)

Now, just as India has changed, so, too, has the relationship between our two nations. In the decades after independence, India advanced its interests as a proud leader of the nonaligned movement. Yet, too often, the United States and India found ourselves on opposite sides of a North-South divide, estranged by a long Cold War. Those days are over.

Here in India, two successive governments led by different parties have recognized that deeper partnership with America is both natural and necessary. And in the United States, both of my predecessors -- one a Democrat, one a Republican -- worked to bring us closer, leading to increased trade and a landmark civil nuclear agreement. (Applause.)

So since that time, people in both our countries have asked: What's next? How can we build on this progress and realize the full potential of our partnership? That's what I want to address today -- the future that the United States seeks in an interconnected world, and why I believe that India is indispensable to this vision; how we can forge a truly global partnership -- not just in one or two areas, but across many; not just for our mutual benefit, but for the benefit of the world.

Of course, only Indians can determine India's national interests and how to advance them on the world stage. But I stand before you today because I am convinced that the interests of the United States -- and the interests we share with India --are best advanced in partnership. I believe that. (Applause.)

The United States seeks security -- the security of our country, our allies and partners. We seek prosperity -- a strong and growing economy in an open international economic system. We seek respect for universal values. And we seek a just and sustainable international order that promotes peace and security by meeting global challenges through stronger global cooperation.
Now, to advance these interests, I have committed the United States to comprehensive engagement with the world, based on mutual interest and mutual respect. And a central pillar of this engagement is forging deeper cooperation with 21st century centers of influence -- and that must necessarily include India.

Now, India is not the only emerging power in the world. But relationships between our countries is unique. For we are two strong democracies whose constitutions begin with the same revolutionary words -- the same revolutionary words -- “We the people.” We are two great republics dedicated to the liberty and justice and equality of all people. And we are two free market economies where people have the freedom to pursue ideas and innovation that can change the world. And that's why I believe that India and America are indispensable partners in meeting the challenges of our time. (Applause.)

Since taking office, I've, therefore, made our relationship a priority. I was proud to welcome Prime Minister Singh for the first official state visit of my presidency. (Applause.) For the first time ever, our governments are working together across the whole range of common challenges that we face. Now, let me say it as clearly as I can: The United States not only welcomes India as a rising global power, we fervently support it, and we have worked to help make it a reality.

Together with our partners, we have made the G20 the premier forum for international economic cooperation, bringing more voices to the table of global economic decision-making, and that has included India. We've increased the role of emerging economies like India at international financial institutions. We valued India's important role at Copenhagen, where, for the first time, all major economies committed to take action to confront climate change -- and to stand by those actions. We salute India's long history as a leading contributor to United Nations peacekeeping missions. And we welcome India as it prepares to take its seat on the United Nations Security Council. (Applause.)

In short, with India assuming its rightful place in the world, we have an historic opportunity to make the relationship between our two countries a defining partnership of the century ahead. And I believe we can do so by working together in three important areas.
First, as global partners we can promote prosperity in both our countries. Together, we can create the high-tech, high-wage jobs of the future. With my visit, we are now ready to begin implementing our civil nuclear agreement. This will help meet India’s growing energy needs and create thousands of jobs in both of our countries. (Applause.)

We need to forge partnerships in high-tech sectors like defense and civil space. So we’ve removed Indian organizations from our so-called “entity list.” And we’ll work to remove -- and reform our controls on exports. Both of these steps will ensure that Indian companies seeking high-tech trade and technologies from America are treated the same as our very closest allies and partners. (Applause.)

We can pursue joint research and development to create green jobs; give India more access to cleaner, affordable energy; meet the commitments we made at Copenhagen; and show the possibilities of low-carbon growth. And together, we can resist the protectionism that stifles growth and innovation. The United States remains -- and will continue to remain -- one of the most open economies in the world. And by opening markets and reducing barriers to foreign investment, India can realize its full economic potential as well. As G20 partners, we can make sure the global economic recovery is strong and is durable. And we can keep striving for a Doha Round that is ambitious and is balanced -- with the courage to make the compromises that are necessary so global trade works for all economies.

Together, we can strengthen agriculture. Cooperation between Indian and American researchers and scientists sparked the Green Revolution. Today, India is a leader in using technology to empower farmers, like those I met yesterday who get free updates on market and weather conditions on their cell phones. And the United States is a leader in agricultural productivity and research. Now, as farmers and rural areas face the effects of climate change and drought, we’ll work together to spark a second, more sustainable Evergreen Revolution.

Together, we’re improving Indian weather forecasting systems before the next monsoon season. We aim to help millions of Indian farmers -- farming households save water and increase productivity, improve food processing so crops don't spoil on the way to market, and enhance climate and crop forecasting to avoid losses that cripple communities and drive up food prices.

And as part of our food security initiative, we're going to share India's expertise with farmers in Africa. And this is an indication of India's rise -- that we can now export hard-earned expertise to countries that see India as a model for agricultural development. It's another powerful example of how American and Indian partnership can address an urgent global challenge.

Because the wealth of a nation also depends on the health of its people, we'll continue to support India's effort against diseases like tuberculosis and HIV/AIDS, and as global partners, we'll work to improve global health by preventing the spread of pandemic flu. And because knowledge is the currency of the 21st century, we will increase exchanges between our students, our colleges and our universities, which are among the best in the world.

As we work to advance our shared prosperity, we can partner to address a second priority -- and that is our shared security. In Mumbai, I met with the courageous families and survivors of that barbaric attack. And here in Parliament, which was itself targeted because of the democracy it represents, we honor the memory of all those who have been taken from us, including American citizens on 26/11 and Indian citizens on 9/11.

This is the bond that we share. It's why we insist that nothing ever justifies the slaughter of innocent men, women and children. It's why we're working together, more closely than ever, to prevent terrorist attacks and to deepen our cooperation even further. And it's why, as strong and resilient societies, we refuse to live in fear. We will not sacrifice the values and rule of law that defines us, and we will never waver in the defense of our people.

America's fight against al Qaeda and its terrorist affiliates is why we persevere in Afghanistan, where major development assistance from India has improved the lives of the Afghan people. We're making progress in our mission to break the Taliban's momentum and to train Afghan forces so they can take the lead for their security. And while I have made it clear that American forces will begin the transition to Afghan responsibility next summer, I've also made it clear that America's commitment to the Afghan people will endure. The United States will not abandon the people of Afghanistan -- or the region -- to violent extremists who threaten us all.

Our strategy to disrupt and dismantle and defeat al Qaeda and its affiliates has to succeed on both sides of the border. And that's why we have worked with the Pakistani government to address the threat of terrorist networks in the border region. The Pakistani government increasingly recognizes that these networks are not just a threat outside of Pakistan -- they are a threat to the Pakistani people, as well. They've suffered greatly at the hands of violent extremists over the last several years.

And we'll continue to insist to Pakistan's leaders that terrorist safe havens within their borders are unacceptable, and that terrorists behind the Mumbai attacks must be brought to justice. (Applause.) We must also recognize that all of us have an interest in both an Afghanistan and a Pakistan that is stable and prosperous and democratic -- and India has an interest in that, as well.

In pursuit of regional security, we will continue to welcome dialogue between India and Pakistan, even as we recognize that disputes between your two countries can only be resolved by the people of your two countries.

More broadly, India and the United States can partner in Asia. Today, the United States is once again playing a leadership role in Asia -- strengthening old alliances; deepening relationships, as we are doing with China; and we're reengaging with regional organizations like ASEAN and joining the East Asia summit -- organizations in which India is also a partner. Like your neighbors in Southeast Asia, we want India not only to "look East," we want India to "engage East" -- because it will increase the security and prosperity of all our nations.

As two global leaders, the United States and India can partner for global security -- especially as India serves on the Security Council over the next two years. Indeed, the just and sustainable international order that America seeks includes a United Nations that is efficient, effective, credible and legitimate. That is why I can say today, in the years ahead, I look forward to a reformed United Nations Security Council that includes India as a permanent member. (Applause.)
Now, let me suggest that with increased power comes increased responsibility. The United Nations exists to fulfill its founding ideals of preserving peace and security, promoting global cooperation, and advancing human rights. These are the responsibilities of all nations, but especially those that seek to lead in the 21st century. And so we look forward to working with India -- and other nations that aspire to Security Council membership -- to ensure that the Security Council is effective; that resolutions are implemented, that sanctions are enforced; that we strengthen the international norms which recognize the rights and responsibilities of all nations and all individuals.

This includes our responsibility to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. Since I took office, the United States has reduced the role of nuclear weapons in our national security strategy, and we've agreed with Russia to reduce our own arsenals. We have put preventing nuclear proliferation and nuclear terrorism at the top of our nuclear agenda, and we have strengthened the cornerstone of the global non-proliferation regime, which is the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Together, the United States and India can pursue our goal of securing the world's vulnerable nuclear materials. We can make it clear that even as every nation has the right to peaceful nuclear energy, every nation must also meet its international obligations -- and that includes the Islamic Republic of Iran. And together, we can pursue a vision that Indian leaders have espoused since independence -- a world without nuclear weapons.

(Applause.)

And this leads me to the final area where our countries can partner -- strengthening the foundations of democratic governance, not only at home but abroad.

In the United States, my administration has worked to make government more open and transparent and accountable to people. Here in India, you're harnessing technologies to do the same, as I saw yesterday at an expo in Mumbai. Your landmark Right to Information Act is empowering citizens with the ability to get the services to which they're entitled -- (applause) -- and to hold officials accountable. Voters can get information about candidates by text message. And you're delivering education and health care services to rural communities, as I saw yesterday when I joined an e-panchayat with villagers in Rajasthan.

Now, in a new collaboration on open government, our two countries are going to share our experience, identify what works, and develop the next generation of tools to empower citizens. And in another example of how American and Indian partnership can address global challenges, we're going to share these innovations with civil society groups and countries around the world. We're going to show that democracy, more than any other form of government, delivers for the common man -- and woman.

Likewise, when Indians vote, the whole world watches. Thousands of political parties; hundreds of thousands of polling centers; millions of candidates and poll workers -- and 700 million voters. There's nothing like it on the planet. There is so much that countries transitioning to democracy could learn from India's experience, so much expertise that India can share with the world. And that, too, is what is possible when the world's largest democracy embraces its role as a global leader.

As the world's two largest democracies, we must never forget that the price of our own freedom is standing up for the freedom of others. (Applause.) Indians know this, for it is the story of your nation. Before he ever began his struggle for Indian independence, Gandhi stood up for the rights of Indians in South Africa. Just as others, including the United States, supported Indian independence, India championed the self-determination of peoples from Africa to Asia as they, too, broke free from colonialism. (Applause.) And along with the United States, you've been a leader in supporting democratic development and civil society groups around the world. And this, too, is part of India's greatness.

Now, we all understand every country will follow its own path. No one nation has a monopoly on wisdom, and no nation should ever try to impose its values on another. But when peaceful democratic movements are suppressed--as they have been in Burma, for example--then the democracies of the world cannot remain silent. For it is unacceptable to gun down peaceful protestors and incarcerate political prisoners decade after decade. It is unacceptable to hold the aspirations of an entire people hostage to the greed and paranoia of bankrupt regimes. It is unacceptable to steal elections, as the regime in Burma has done again for all the world to see.
Faced with such gross violations of human rights, it is the responsibility of the international community -- especially leaders like the United States and India -- to condemn it. And if I can be frank, in international fora, India has often shied away from some of these issues. But speaking up for those who cannot do so for themselves is not interfering in the affairs of other countries. It's not violating the rights of sovereign nations. It is staying true to our democratic principles. It is giving meaning to the human rights that we say are universal. And it sustains the progress that in Asia and around the world has helped turn dictatorships into democracies and ultimately increased our security in the world.

So promoting shared prosperity, preserving peace and security, strengthening democratic governance and human rights -- these are the responsibilities of leadership. And as global partners, this is the leadership that the United States and India can offer in the 21st century. Ultimately, though, this cannot be a relationship only between presidents and prime ministers, or in the halls of this Parliament. Ultimately, this must be a partnership between our peoples. (Applause.) So I want to conclude by speaking directly to the people of India who are watching today.

In your lives, you have overcome odds that might have overwhelmed a lesser country. In just decades, you have achieved progress and development that took other nations centuries. You are now assuming your rightful place as a leader among nations. Your parents and grandparents imagined this. Your children and grandchildren will look back on this. But only this generation of Indians can seize the possibilities of the moment.

As you carry on with the hard work ahead, I want every Indian citizen to know: The United States of America will not simply be cheering you on from the sidelines. We will be right there with you, shoulder to shoulder. (Applause.) Because we believe in the promise of India. We believe that the future is what we make it. We believe that no matter who you are or where you come from, every person can fulfill their God-given potential, just as a Dalit like Dr. Ambedkar could lift himself up and pen the words of the constitution that protects the rights of all Indians. (Applause.)
We believe that no matter where you live -- whether a village in Punjab or the bylanes of Chandni Chowk -- (laughter) -- an old section of Kolkata or a new high-rise in Bangalore -- every person deserves the same chance to live in security and dignity, to get an education, to find work, to give their children a better future.

And we believe that when countries and cultures put aside old habits and attitudes that keep people apart, when we recognize our common humanity, then we can begin to fulfill these aspirations that we share. It's a simple lesson contained in that collection of stories which has guided Indians for centuries -- the Panchtantra. And it's the spirit of the inscription seen by all who enter this great hall: "That one is mine and the other a stranger is the concept of little minds. But to the large-hearted, the world itself is their family."

This is the story of India; this is the story of America -- that despite their differences, people can see themselves in one another, and work together and succeed together as one proud nation. And it can be the spirit of partnership between our nations -- that even as we honor the histories which in different times kept us apart, even as we preserve what makes us unique in a globalized world, we can recognize how much we can achieve together.

And if we let this simple concept be our guide, if we pursue the vision I've described today -- a global partnership to meet global challenges -- then I have no doubt that future generations -- Indians and Americans -- will live in a world that is more prosperous and more secure and more just because of the bonds that our generation has forged today.

So, thank you, and Jai Hind. (Applause.) And long live the partnership between India and the United States. (Applause.)
Madam Speaker, I rise to make a statement on the visit of the United States President Barack Obama to India from 6-9 November 2010.

2. India and the United States have in the recent years built a broadbased framework of cooperation. Government attaches high importance to the India-US strategic partnership, both in the pursuit of achieving India's national development goals and for advancing global peace, stability and progress. President Obama has characterized the India-US relationship as one of the defining partnerships of the 21st century.

3. President Obama's wide-ranging programme in Mumbai and Delhi, included in addition to the official engagements, events that covered diverse aspects of our wide-ranging bilateral cooperation. President Obama expressed his gratitude for the honour and privilege of addressing Members of Parliament on 8 November 2010.

4. The visit was successful in strengthening mutual understanding on regional and global issues; accelerating the momentum of our bilateral cooperation; and creating a long-term framework to elevate the India-US strategic partnership to a new level.

5. I place on the table of the House a copy of the Joint Statement issued after the visit which summarises the outcomes of the visit.

6. Briefly, I draw the attention of the august House to the following:-

i) In the area of economic cooperation, we have agreed to take steps to realise the potential for trade and investment in both directions and to harness the scientific and technological capabilities in the two countries for the benefit of our two countries and the world. We welcome US investments in key sectors of our economy, including in the areas of infrastructure and nuclear energy. We also agreed to facilitate greater movement of professionals, investors and business travellers between our countries.
We announced a number of new bilateral initiatives, which include agreements on establishing a Joint Clean Energy Research and Development Center in India; exploration and assessment of shale gas resources in India; Energy Cooperation Programme; establishment of Global Disease Detection India Centre in India; and an implementing arrangement for enhanced monsoon forecasting that will begin to transmit detailed forecasts to farmers beginning with the 2011 monsoon rain season. iii) To promote collaboration in the field of higher education, Prime Minister and President Obama agreed to convene an India-US Higher Education Summit in 2011.

iv) We welcome the decisions taken by the United States to ease controls on exports of dual use items and technologies to India. These measures include removing Indian entities from its so-called Entity List, realignment of India in US export control regulations, as well the intention of the United States to support India's full membership in the multilateral export control regimes.

v) Prime Minister and President Obama have put forth a common vision of a world without nuclear weapons and decided to lead global efforts for non-proliferation and universal and non-discriminatory global nuclear disarmament. This is a historic and bold bilateral initiative which reflects the evolution of our partnership with the United States. We have decided to strengthen cooperation to tackle nuclear terrorism.

vi) We welcome President Obama's affirmation of US support for India's permanent membership of a reformed United Nations Security Council. This reflects the shared belief of our two sides that an efficient, effective, credible and legitimate United Nations is required to ensure a just and sustainable international order.

vii) India-US understanding and cooperation on the shared challenge of terrorism emanating from our neighbourhood continues to grow. Our two governments have decided to further strengthen counter-terrorism cooperation and to begin a Homeland Security Dialogue.

viii) India has an interest in peace, stability and prosperity in Asia, based on an open, balanced and inclusive regional architecture.
We have decided to deepen our existing consultations with the United States on developments in East Asia and expand our consultations to cover regional and global issues of mutual interest, including Central and West Asia. We have also agreed to intensify our consultations on Afghanistan. President Obama appreciated India’s contribution to Afghanistan and welcomed enhanced Indian assistance to help Afghanistan achieve self-sufficiency.

7. Madam Speaker, India-US relations have matured over the years. We conduct this relationship in a spirit of mutual respect and as equal partners. This relationship stands on its own merits and is not directed against any other country. It is a relationship that is based on shared values and growing opportunities for mutually beneficial bilateral cooperation and a global partnership. It is an important factor for peace, stability and prosperity in the region and the world.

8. In this context, President Obama’s visit was a milestone in the process of strengthening the strategic partnership between the world’s two largest democracies and in bringing our two peoples closer together.

589. Interview of Foreign Secretary Smt. Nirupama Rao by Karan Thapar for the CNN-IBN TV.

New Delhi, November 21, 2010

Interviewer (Shri Karan Thapar): Hello and welcome to India Tonight. What is the Indian Government’s considered view of the Obama visit and the American President’s landmark address to the Indian Parliament? That is the key issue I shall discuss today with the Foreign Secretary Nirupama Rao.

Foreign Secretary, the press and the public are convinced that the Obama visit was a great success. What is your Government’s considered view?

Foreign Secretary (Shrimati Nirupama Rao): I would share that opinion entirely. The visit of President Obama to India was I believe a great success.
It is a reflection really of the state of relations between India and the United States today, two of the world’s largest, biggest, most successfully functioning democracies. We have a global strategic partnership with the United States. When President Obama came to India and addressed our audiences here and reached out to the Indian people if I may say - because that was very evident in his meetings with the youth particularly in Mumbai - and also in his address to our Parliament, he spoke of this defining nature of the partnership between India and the United States today. And this is a partnership that is devoted to innovation, to development, and indeed it is a strategic partnership.

Interviewer: For many people the key point was the President’s commitment to support India’s candidature to a permanent seat in the Security Council. But given that this is neither imminent nor is it going to be easily achieved, how significant a commitment was this?

Foreign Secretary: I think it was a political statement; it was a statement with symbolism; it was a statement with substance. What the United States was conveying to the people of India and indeed to the world when President Obama spoke out in support of our candidature was that firstly the United States is prepared to contemplate a moderate expansion of the Security Council; and secondly that it sees a role for India, the participation, the inclusion of India in an expanded Security Council.

Interviewer: You said this was a substantive statement but The Hindu has pointed out that there was a marked difference in the language President Obama used when he supported India’s candidature compared to the language America had used earlier for Japan. In Japan’s case the Americans had said that they unambiguously support a permanent seat for Japan. The Indian line was not quite that unequivocal.

Foreign Secretary: There are always nuances in such statements, I do not deny that. But I think what we need to understand and agree on is that there is an underlying subtext and underlying meaning to what President Obama had to convey to our people when he spoke about our candidature.

Interviewer: And what is that subtext?

Foreign Secretary: Basically what he is saying is that India is a democratic great power; India and the United States share a defining partnership. In fact, the national security strategy of the United States which was unveiled a few months ago spoke of India, Russia and China as big powers. There is no questioning of India’s arrival on the global stage.

Interviewer: The second concern is that the American President has not committed himself to actually working to achieve that expansion of Security Council, leave aside expediting it. Does not that in a sense dilute the commitment he has made to India’s candidature?

Foreign Secretary: I would not join the Doubting Thomases on this. I would like to say, and I speak here as a practitioner and I am aware of the ground realities, back in New York our two Permanent Missions are closely in touch with each other. Even after President Obama spoke in Parliament and made this expression of support, the two Permanent Representatives have reached out to each other, have exchanged notes, have been speaking of the very positive nature of this development.

Interviewer: So, they are working to take this forward?

Foreign Secretary: They are working together. Let me also add that within the United Nations from the floor of the General Assembly there is a ground swell of opinion and support building on the question of expansion of the Security Council. Vast majority of member states in the United Nations support the principle of expansion of the Security Council.

Interviewer: India of course has unequivocal support from Britain and France. But how strong and unequivocal is the support you have from Moscow for your permanent seat in the Security Council?

Foreign Secretary: Let me say that Russia has said that it regards us as a deserving and as a strong candidate for inclusion in the permanent membership of the Security Council.

Interviewer: Is that … (Inaudible)...

Foreign Secretary: Russia and India have a very time-tested and a solid relationship, a friendship that really goes back over the decades. The bandwidth of our relations is so strong, enduring and wide-ranging that we are very confident that Russia will be supportive of our candidature.
Interviewer: I am just going to get that repeated. You are very confident that Russia will support India's candidature for a permanent seat?

Foreign Secretary: I am confident given the very healthy state of India-Russia relations.

Interviewer: You have just come back from Beijing. Did you get any favourable expression of support? Any shift towards the favourable direction in the Chinese position?

Foreign Secretary: I would like to draw reference to the Joint Statement that was issued in January of 2008 when Prime Minister Manmohan Singh visited Beijing and there was this vision of a shared partnership between India and China in the 21st century that was unveiled at that time. There China stated that it understood India's aspirations to play a larger role in global affairs including in an expanded Security Council. That is where the matter stands. Obviously, China and India need to discuss this further. One of the signal developments I would say in recent months and weeks has been China's readiness to discuss, to have consultations with India on UN related matters including on the expansion of the Security Council.

Interviewer: So, the Chinese position is as it was expressed in January 2008 because there has been no advance on that.

Foreign Secretary: Let me put it this way that you have to embed this in the matrix of the India-China relationship. And this is a relationship that has grown, that has evolved, and that has expanded into a number of areas. I drew reference to the fact that multilaterally there is a great deal of cooperation between India and China.

Interviewer: So, there is room for movement and change.

Foreign Secretary: I believe there is room for movement and change. I am not saying it is going to happen immediately. It is going to be a process and that process is tied to the evolution of our dialogue and discussions with China.

Interviewer: The one discordant note, and it was almost immediate and it was pretty dark, came from across the border in Islamabad. The Pakistanis have found this incomprehensible. They said it is bereft of morals and ideals. And perhaps most ominously they added, it has implications for peace, security and stability in South Asia. How do you read that statement from the Pakistan Foreign Office?

Foreign Secretary: Frankly, Karan, I do not want to dignify it with a response. I think where India and Pakistan are concerned - and I believe Pakistan should understand our approach very well - we have reached out to Pakistan on a number of occasions in the recent past. We have offered dialogue. We have expressed our readiness to discuss all outstanding issues. Frankly, as I said, I do not want to dignify this statement with a response. And I do not think we should be receiving lessons from Pakistan on morality.

Interviewer: So, you are a touch disappointed by Islamabad's outspoken criticism.

Foreign Secretary: Yes, I would say I am disappointed. And I think it is a reflection of the trust deficit between our two countries.

Interviewer: President Obama followed up his endorsement of India's candidature for a permanent seat in the United Nations Security Council by adding the words 'with increased power, comes increased responsibility'. And he went on to express a certain admonition, if I can put it like that, for India's failure to speak out in defence of democratic forces when they are being suppressed. Particular example was Burma. In fact he added pointedly, "If I can be frank, in international fora India has often shied away from some of these issues". How do you respond as Foreign Secretary to this part of his speech?

Foreign Secretary: President Obama spoke frankly. He spoke with candour. But I think between friends and partners we can afford that degree of candour and openness. What I would like to say is that in recent months we have had extensive discussions with the United States not only in the run-up to preparing for President Obama's visit but in the context of our strategic dialogue. We have spoken of various issues concerning the situation in the region. The United States is aware of our concerns about terrorism, about the need to take our fight against terrorism forward, the situation in Afghanistan, the situation in Pakistan. And we have also discussed the other situations in our neighbourhood including Myanmar. We have spoken of the situation in the Asia Pacific, Southeast Asia. Indeed the range and content of our dialogue encompasses a number of areas. When it comes to Myanmar, we have been very open ourselves in relaying to the United States what it is that drives our relationship with that country today. We share a contiguous border with Myanmar. We have concerns of security. We would like to build connectivity because really Southeast Asia begins in Northeast India. Therefore, obviously we would like inclusive political change in Myanmar. In fact, with the release of Aung San Suu Kyi, you are aware of the statement which our Foreign Minister made welcoming her release.

Interviewer: Am I right in, therefore, understanding that there are no hurt feelings or even ruffled feathers on the Indian side after President Obama’s speech?

Foreign Secretary: Karan, let me use the phrase from George Kennan, we are grown up nations and we are perfectly capable of handling differences and divergences. But let me say we are building extensive convergence on a number of issues concerning the region.

Interviewer: So, you can agree to differ?

Foreign Secretary: We can agree to differ, but agree to differ in a perfectly open and friendly and mutually confident way.

Interviewer: What do you say to Indian people, and there are a few of them, who believe that by failing to speak out in defence of democratic forces is Burma and Aung San Suu Kyi in particular, India has in a sense betrayed its own principles and values?

Foreign Secretary: I do not believe we have betrayed our principles and values. Every policy move is based on realpolitik. It is based on the defence of the national interest. It is based on the definition of our security and strategic concerns. And Myanmar is no exception to that. But where Daw Aung San Suu Kyi is concerned, in many ways we have a very close and enduring relationship with Aung San Suu Kyi. She grew up in India. We have wonderful memories of her stay here. She did her doctoral research here. So her association with India and her ties with India can never really be fractured in that sense of the word. The fact is that the situation in Myanmar today is very very complex. And India has sought to engage the leadership of that country and in the process also convey our views and opinions that we are in favour of inclusive political change, we would favour reconciliation between all the different groups in the country, we would like peace, we would like development, we would like progress in Myanmar.

Interviewer: You mentioned her close emotional association with this country. She was in school and college here. In her first interview to the BBC after her release she actually did express disappointment that India was not more forthcoming and open in support of democracy in Burma.

Foreign Secretary: Let me say that following her release, and I referred to the statement that we made, our Ambassador in Myanmar was one of the select group of Ambassadors who met Aung San Suu Kyi and he had the opportunity to have a brief conversation with her. And what came through was her very deep and enduring positive feelings for India and how these feelings and this association should be preserved and should be in a sense allowed to continue to develop. This is what she had to say. As I said, we have welcomed her release and conveyed that to the world, because we see it as part of the process of gradual, inclusive political change in the country.

Interviewer: Did India have any role to play behind the scenes in her release?

Foreign Secretary: We have consistently, whenever we have had the opportunity to talk to the Myanmarese leadership, spoken about the need for reconciliation; we have spoken about the need for peaceful change.

Interviewer: How do you today view the elections that were recently held in Burma but the results of which have still not been announced?

Foreign Secretary: This is part of our dialogue also with the UN Secretary-General and his good offices on Myanmar. I think the view as expressed out of the region - and I am not talking of countries that are on another continent or far away from here, look at the ASEAN countries, and in many ways our policy dovetails into what the ASEAN countries also say - I think they see this as part of a significant process within Myanmar. Obviously a political change is happening and that change has brought to the forefront a number of parties, a number of new and younger leaders. So, we have to see this as part of a process. Obviously there is an undercurrent of change within Myanmar, and we hope and that this is the aspiration that a lot of likeminded countries like India have expressed, that this is a movement that would lead to positive and inclusive political change and reconciliation within that country.

Interviewer: And in a sense that is India's message also to Gen. Than Shwe and the Junta?

Foreign Secretary: I would say that is our message for the region, for our friends in the region, and for the people of that country.

Interviewer: …..Foreign Secretary, let us come to some of the economic aspects of the visit. In large measure the Obama Administration has lifted export controls and removed practically all Indian companies from the Entities List except for those connected with the DAE. How significant is this?

Foreign Secretary: I think it is a significant development. What we have been emphasising to the United States is, given the defining nature of our strategic partnership and the enormous improvements that have taken place in the relationship, that India should be treated as a partner and not as a target. I think that has been echoed also in the statements from the US Administration on this issue.

Interviewer: And is this a first step in that direction?

Foreign Secretary: I would say it is a very very important and substantive step in that direction. Over the last few months, let me tell you that we have engaged in very detailed and intensive discussions with the Department of Commerce in the US Administration on this very subject, on the removal of export controls on dual technology items, on the removal of our entities from the Entities List of the Department of Commerce, and also the inclusion of India in these major export control regimes, the international regimes. And on all these fronts and also on certain, let me say, realignment or a correction in terms of the country-specific categories that exist on the US side on export controls, on all these fronts we have been able to achieve progress.

Interviewer: The only thing is that the DAE-related companies remain on the Entities List.
Foreign Secretary: This is a work in progress. I would say we should celebrate the fact that we have made so much progress, and the fact that ISRO, DRDO and BDL are off the Entities List - as I said, the country-specific categories are being amended - and also the decision that the United States will assist in the inclusion, in the participation of India in these export control regimes that exist internationally.

Interviewer: Except there where it comes to those four major non-proliferation control regimes, the decision will have to be by consensus. Can America deliver? I know George Bush delivered vis-a-vis the NSG. But Obama is a different ...(Unclear)...

Foreign Secretary: On the Australia Group and the Wassenaar Arrangement, I believe the process is fairly uncomplicated. As far as the Nuclear Suppliers Group and the Missile Technology Control Regime arrangements are concerned, yes, we will have to move forward in a phased manner. The United States has signalled its readiness to help take this process forward, and I believe the compass is set in the right direction.

Interviewer: How long will that take? Are we talking about years?

Foreign Secretary: I am not going to be able to give you a timeline on that. We would like it to happen obviously sooner than later.

Interviewer: Before he has arrived in India, Corporate India was concerned about what the American Administration had done vis-a-vis H1B and L1 visas, about outsourcing and the sort of protectionist rhetoric, the fact that Bangalore was a symbol in his mind of this way, he claimed, jobs were being taken away from America. When he came to India, he referred to all of this as outdated stereotype. Is there a sense in which President Obama's thinking has significantly changed on these issues, or are we over-interpreting things?

Foreign Secretary: I certainly think there was a deep felt concern, especially in our business and industry and in the IT industry particularly, about the recent measures on the visa front that had been taken in Washington. Having said that let me say also very clearly that when President Obama came here and when he interacted with our captains of business and industry - and I think it was a very fruitful interaction - he himself spoke of the need for both our countries to work together and to avoid kneejerk reactions as he said. And our Prime Minister said very importantly and significantly that we do not steal jobs from the United States.

Interviewer: A very forceful statement.

Foreign Secretary: It was very unequivocally stated, and that is a fact. If you look at our investments in the United States, we are one of the fastest growing leading investors in the United States in every investment, whether it is in the financial sector, whether it is in IT, whether it is in entertainment, whether it is in chemicals or pharmaceuticals. It creates jobs. It creates jobs for Americans. And I think that fact was very clearly articulated during this visit.

Interviewer: So, the fear, I would not use the word threat, that America was turning protectionist under the pressures of its own economic problems which are proving to be a bit more difficult to handle, has that fear receded?

Foreign Secretary: I think that is very much a factor of domestic politics within the United States today. The US economy has gone through difficulties. There is a high rate of unemployment in the United States. And all this together, there has been a kind of a crescendo of concern about these trends within that country. Obviously we would like the United States to grow because the growth of the US economy impacts very positively on the global economy. But having said that it is very necessary to guard against protectionist trends and to have a free flow in trade of goods and services between the United States and the rest of the world, and particularly with India since we are concerned about the health of our economy, the growth of our trade and the creation of jobs and the preservation of the leads that we have been able to establish particularly in the information technology and communication industry.

Interviewer: One tends to forget that a very important part of that visit was in fact Michelle Obama. There is no doubt that India fell in love with her. You must have met and spoken to the First Lady. What was her response to India? What does she think of this country?

Foreign Secretary: I had a very positive experience I must say interacting, briefly of course, with the US First Lady Michelle Obama. I think she was the epitome of grace and elegance wherever she went. What she had to convey to us was that she was deeply impressed by her meetings and her interactions with ordinary people, with particularly the young boys and girls that she had met. I think she was very very taken in by the magic and the colour and the exuberance, if I may say, of India. And she repeated more than once that she would love to come back and bring her daughters the next time. So, I think it is the beginning of a beautiful friendship.

Interviewer: And is there an invitation to the Obama family to come back again.

Foreign Secretary: Absolutely.

Interviewer: Foreign Secretary, a pleasure talking to you.

Foreign Secretary: Thank you so much, Karan.

New Delhi, November 30, 2010.

In response to questions on the issue of Wikileaks the official Spokesperson said,

“We would prefer not to comment on the issue of Wikileaks* which purportedly are an account of privileged internal US government assessments and correspondence. We have a multi-faceted and forward looking strategic partnership with the United States and there is a regular, open and candid dialogue between the two countries, on a number of matters of mutual interest.”

591. Message of condolence of the Government of India on the demise of Ambassador Richard Holbrooke.

New Delhi, December 14, 2010.

The news of the untimely demise of Ambassador Richard Holbrooke has come as a great shock. An accomplished diplomat, he served his country and the cause of international peace and security, with distinction and exceptional insight, in his long and eventful career. He leaves behind a number of friends and admirers in India and indeed the world over. Our heartfelt condolences to members of his family and friends.

of the international financial crisis. They noted, however, the need for increased efforts to achieve the bilateral trade target of US$ 10 billion by 2010 including the diversification of bilateral trade particularly in value-added sectors. In this context, they noted the positive outcome of the Trade Monitoring Mechanism, the second meeting of which was held on 15 March 2010 in São Paulo, and the scheduling of the next meeting in October 2010 in New Delhi. The Leaders reiterated their intent to hold the Second Meeting of the CEO Forum shortly.

Both Leaders noted that bilateral investments were growing in diverse areas. They called on business and industry in both countries to utilize the opportunities available in the areas of Energy, Agriculture, Mining, Pharmaceuticals, Infrastructure and Construction, among others to further expand bilateral investments.

Both Leaders welcomed the coming into operation from June 2009 of the Preferential Trade Agreement between MERCOSUR and India. They expressed the view that there is a need to significantly increase the number of tariff lines in the PTA, so that the coverage of the Agreement could be expanded to a sizeable level. The Leaders urged that the ongoing negotiations in this regard be concluded successfully in a time bound manner.

The two Leaders reiterated the need for active enhancement of cooperation in Science and Technology, Nuclear Energy, Space and Defence for mutual benefit. They also noted that Biotechnology, IT, Marine Science, and Nano-technology have been identified as areas with significant potential for cooperation.

The two Leaders emphasized the importance of strengthening bilateral cooperation in the energy sector including in Hydrocarbons and New & Renewable energies. In this regard, they directed the Joint Working Group on energy to convene an early meeting. Brazil welcomed the interest of Indian oil companies to participate in future ANP bidding processes for exploration of oil in conformity with its national policies in this sector. They reaffirmed their intention to encourage better coordination of their positions on the issue of Biofuels at multilateral fora.
Both Leaders expressed satisfaction at the ongoing bilateral cooperation in the Defence sector. They welcomed the appointment of Defence Attachés in their respective Diplomatic Missions in Brazil and in India. They noted the increasing contacts between EMBRAER and DRDO towards the joint development of high-technology military aircrafts. They underlined that the recent visit of Minister of Defence of Brazil, H.E. Nelson Jobim, to India in March 2010 had opened opportunities for enhanced Defence cooperation particularly in the field of joint production, research and development. Both Leaders welcomed the decision to host the First Meeting of the India-Brazil Joint Defence Committee, in India, this year, at mutually convenient dates.

The two Leaders reiterated the importance that Brazil and India attach to bilateral electoral cooperation and noted with satisfaction the ongoing dialogue between the Election Commission of India and Electoral Authorities in Brazil, which saw the visit of Mr. Carlos Augusto Ayres de Freitas Britto, President of the Electoral Superior Tribunal, Brazil, to India for the Diamond Jubilee Celebration of the Election Commission of India on 25 January 2010, and would lead to the signing of a Memorandum of Understanding between the Election Commission of India and the Electoral Superior Tribunal of Brazil shortly.

Both Leaders expressed satisfaction at the growing cultural exchanges between India and Brazil. The Brazilian side welcomed India's decision to open a Cultural Center in São Paulo, the first of its kind in the Americas. The Indian side commended the Brazilian side on the successful organization of the "Brazilian Cultural Week" held in India in 2008. The Brazilian side also welcomed India's intention to organize a Festival of India in Brazil in early 2011.

Both Leaders welcomed the convergence of positions between Brazil and India in multilateral fora and in groups such as IBSA and BRIC, which is reflective of the growing importance of developing countries and of their role in shaping a more balanced international order in a multi-polar world.

The two Leaders shared the view on the urgent need to strengthen the participation of developing countries in the decision-making processes within the multilateral financial institutions, such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, and political bodies, such as the United Nations. They reaffirmed their commitment for the reform of the United Nations, particularly of the Security Council, including through its expansion in both permanent and non-permanent membership, with a view to improving its efficiency, representativeness, and legitimacy needed to meet the challenges faced by the international community today. The two Leaders reiterated their support to each other in their quest for permanent membership in an expanded UNSC. They also expressed their commitment to join efforts to convey to other countries the importance and urgency of the expansion of the UNSC in both permanent and non-permanent categories. President Lula expressed appreciation for India's support for the election of Brazil as a non-permanent member of the UNSC for 2010-11 and reiterated the support of Brazil to India's candidature for a non-permanent seat of the UNSC for the period of 2011-12.

President Lula and Prime Minister Singh strongly condemned terrorism in all its forms and manifestations, committed by whoever, wherever and for whatever purpose and stressed that there can be no justification, whatsoever, for any acts of terrorism. They agreed to support the global struggle against terrorism in conformity with the principles of the U.N. Charter, relevant international conventions and International Law. Both sides reiterated their commitment to continue efforts for an early adoption of the Comprehensive Convention on international terrorism.

They recalled the significant progress already achieved in the Doha Round of Trade Negotiations. They called upon all Members to work towards a balanced agreement and to refrain from seeking excessive and additional levels of ambition from a few developing economies. The prolonged inconclusiveness of the negotiations may threaten the credibility of the rule-based multilateral trading system, which has proved its relevance in resisting protectionism during the recent global economic crisis. Brazil and India will continue to make all efforts to build a multilateral trading system that puts development at its center.

President Lula and Prime Minister Singh reiterated that early conclusion of the São Paulo Round of GSTP Negotiations among developing countries in accordance with the agreement reached last December will contribute in a concrete manner towards increasing South-South trade and economic cooperation.

Both Leaders reaffirmed their concern for Climate Change and its adverse impacts. They committed themselves to work in close coordination including in the BASIC group towards a comprehensive, balanced, and effective outcome at the 16th Session of the Conference of Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) and the 6th Conference of the Parties serving as the Meeting of the Parties to the Kyoto Protocol, to be held in Mexico in November-December 2010. They welcomed the Resolution of the UN General Assembly to hold a Conference on Sustainable Development (Rio+20) in Rio de Janeiro, in 2012.

Both Leaders reiterated their commitment to fight hunger and poverty, promote democratic values, and foster socially-inclusive economic development policies in their respective countries.

Prime Minister of India, H.E. Dr. Manmohan Singh, sincerely thanked the President of the Federative Republic of Brazil, H.E. LuizInácio Lula da Silva, and to the Brazilian government for the kind hospitality extended to him and his delegation during their visit to Brasilia.
CHILE

594. Condolence message of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh to the Chilean President Dr. Michelle Bachelet at the loss of life in the earthquake and announcement of a contribution of US $ 5 million towards the relief and rehabilitation of the affected people.

New Delhi, March 5, 2010.

"It is with profound sadness that I have learnt of the massive earthquake that hit Chile on 27th February 2010, causing immense loss of life and damage to property and infrastructure across the country.

On behalf of the Government and people of India, I would like to express deep sympathy and condolences to the people of Chile on this great tragedy. Our thoughts and prayers are with the members of the bereaved families.

As a token of our solidarity with the people of Chile, we would like to make a modest cash contribution of US$ 5 million for relief and rehabilitation work following the earthquake.

Please accept, Excellency, the assurances of my highest consideration."

Message of Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh to the Chilean President Sebastian Pinera Echenique on the successful rescue of 33 trapped miner after 69 days.

New Delhi, October 5, 2010.

"Please accept my warm felicitations on the splendid and successful rescue of the 33 miners. We rejoice with the people of Chile that they are free, safe and reunited with their dear and loved ones. We have watched with admiration the courage and fortitude displayed by the miners and their families throughout this long ordeal, and your personal leadership over the last several weeks."*

COLOMBIA

Joint Statement issued during the visit of Minister of State Shashi Tharoor to Colombia.

The Minister of State for External Affairs of India, Dr. Shashi Tharoor, made an official visit to Colombia 18-19 January 2010 at the invitation of the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Colombia, Dr. Jaime Bermudez Merizalde.

The visit was a culmination of the celebration of the 50 years of the establishment of bilateral relations between India and Colombia, on 19 January 1959.

Dr. Tharoor called on President Alvaro Uribe Velez and Vice President Francisco Santos Caideron and reiterated the growing interest of India in strengthening bilateral relations with Colombia.

* The 33 miners, caught in a collapse of gold and copper mine in the country’s north Atacama desert, spent 17 days in isolation, rationing their meagre supplies and organising themselves before being located by drillers on August 22. They had to withstand nearly two more months of waiting before they were finally rescued.
Dr. Tharoor called on the President of the House of Representatives of the Republic of Colombia, Dr. Edgar Gomez Roman, and discussed the need for regular exchanges between the Parliamentarians of India and Colombia, the two large and vibrant democracies.

The Ministers had extensive discussions in the San Carlos Palace - the headquarters of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Colombia - and comprehensively reviewed the bilateral relations. Dr. Tharoor thanked Foreign Minister Bermudez for the hospitality and recalled the latter's successful visit to India in November 2009. They expressed the commitment of both sides to implement bilateral MOU's and agreements to give further boost to the ongoing cooperation. They hoped that the signing of a Cooperation Agreement on Health will open up new vistas of cooperation in medical and traditional medicine.

Dr. Tharoor also expressed the hope that signing of the International Cooperation Agreement between NUT (National Institute of Information and Technology) and SENA (Servicio Nacional de Aprendizaje) will strengthen cooperation in Information, Communication and Technology sectors and help in the capacity building and talent development in Colombia for mutual benefit.

Dr. Bermudez invited the Indian Government to participate in the High Level Event (HLE) on South-South Cooperation (SSC) and Capacity Development to be held Bogota during March 24th to 26th 2010. He underlined that as India and Colombia are committed to south - south cooperation, the forum would provide an excellent opportunity to share experiences and ideas.

Dr. Tharoor also stressed the need for an early finalization of the Cultural Exchange Programme 2010-12. He expressed happiness over the launch of Festivals and other cultural events of India in Colombia and of Colombia in India as well as the publication of the book "Colombia and India in Perspective" during his visit.

Both sides expressed satisfaction over the excellent state of bilateral economic and commercial relations and noted the growing interest of Indian business houses in investing in Colombia. In this regard they emphasized the importance of taking steps to conclude a Bilateral Agreement on Avoidance of Double Taxation. They noted that the ongoing bilateral cooperation in energy sector is strong and that Indian companies have made significant investments in hydrocarbons.

They also stressed the need for intensifying scientific and technical collaboration especially in outer space, information technology, telecommunications, bio fuels and utilization of natural resources such as Bamboo. It was agreed that all these issues can be discussed in a Joint Commission Meeting which could be held at mutually convenient time.

The Ministers expressed satisfaction over close contacts between India and Colombia in multilateral fora, particularly in the United Nations; the World Trade Organization; and on Climate Change in the recently concluded Summit at Copenhagen. Both sides reaffirmed their determination to collaborate in all multilateral fora to maintain global peace and security, promote economic and social advancement and to tackle global threats and challenges.

The Ministers reiterated the need to implement the process of UN reforms to make it more representative, legitimate and effective. In this regard, any expansion and restructuring of the UN Security Council must reflect contemporary realities, increase transparency, democracy and include developing countries.

Both Ministers exchanged views on the continuing scourge of terrorism and the world drug problem in different parts of the world. The Government of India stands committed to assist the victims of this scourge through the Jaipur Foot project, and set in motion a dialogue between narcotics control and enforcement agencies of both countries. Both countries reiterated their common determination to promote early adoption of a comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism.

The Ministers noted with satisfaction the excellent response to the ITEC programme of India under which the number of scholarships for Colombia has been increased from 25 to 35 in the financial year 2009-2010; as also the excellent collaboration of the Colombian institute, ICETEX, in strengthen academic contacts and exchanges with Indian institutions. Both Ministers urged the academic communities in Colombia and India to enhance their efforts to increase awareness of each other.

Both Ministers expressed their condolence at the death and destruction caused by the earthquake in Haiti on January 12, 2010. The Government of Colombia and the Government of India expressed solidarity and the willingness to provide aid for immediate and emergency relief purposes.

HAITI

597. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative of India at the "International Donors' Conference Towards a New Future for Haiti" at the Trusteeship Council Chamber at United Nations Headquarters.

Please see Document No.629.
598. Announcement by the Government of India of a relief assistance of US $ one million to Haiti for the earthquake-affected people of Haiti.

New Delhi, January 14, 2010.

Government of India is deeply saddened at the death and destruction caused by the earthquake in Haiti on January 12, 2010. Government has also decided to give US$ 1 million in cash to Haiti for immediate and emergency relief purposes.

Communications with Haiti are currently difficult. However, it has been ascertained that all 140 personnel of the Central Industrial Security Force (CISF) deployed with the United Nations are safe. So are all civil police officers deployed with the United Nations Mission in Haiti.

The Ministry of External Affairs is in contact with the Indian Embassy in Havana, which is concurrently accredited to Haiti, to ascertain the welfare of other Indian nationals who are presently in Haiti.

On January 15 the Prime Minister in his personal message to the Prime Minister of Haiti Jean-Maz Bellerive while condoling the loss of life in the earthquake announced a donation of U.S. $ 5 million. The Prime Minister in his message said:

"It is with profound sadness that we have learnt of the vast devastation caused by the earthquake in Haiti on 12 January, 2010.

India stands by the Government and people of Haiti in their hour of need. We would like to make an immediate cash donation of US $ 5 million as a token of our solidarity with the people of Haiti.

I would also like to convey our condolences to the injured and family members of those who have died on account of the earthquake. We have no doubt that the people of Haiti have the strength and resilience to overcome this natural disaster."

New Delhi, August 16, 2010.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good morning to all of you. My colleague Mr. Dammu Ravi, Joint Secretary (Latin America & Caribbean), and I would endeavour to give you a perspective on the visit of the Foreign Minister of Mexico Her Excellency Patricia Espinosa. She will be holding discussions with her counterpart, External Affairs Minister Shri S M Krishna. She had visited India earlier along with the President of Mexico, President Calderon in September 2007.

Let me briefly take you through the programme. She arrived yesterday. Today, she would be visiting TERI, will have a business meeting at FICCI and tomorrow, she has a business meeting at CII. Thereafter in the day today she would be meeting with our Minster of State for Environment and Forests Shri Jairam Ramesh. Tomorrow there will be delegation-level talks with the External Affairs Minister, and there would be some other engagements also.

She would be assisted by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the Mexican Ambassador, the Special Representative for Climate Change and a number of other officials. The External Affairs minister would be assisted in the talks by Secretary (West) Mr. Vivek Katju, our Ambassador in Mexico, and a number of other officials including Mr. Dammu Ravi, Joint Secretary (LAC).

As you are aware, we have historically enjoyed close, warm and cordial relations with Mexico which are issue-free. Both countries are multicultural and multiethnic. We are both vibrant democracies. We also share a unique cultural affinity. There has been a fascination for each other’s music, dance, cultural traditions and so on. Traditionally Mexicans have shown a lot of interest in Indian art, dances, films, yoga, music and so on. Indian personalities like Mahatma Gandhi, Gurudev Rabindranath Tagore, Mother Theresa, Prime Minister Nehru are very well-known and even household names in Mexico. For example, there are statues of Mahatma Gandhi in at least three major cities including Mexico City the capital of Mexico.

Diplomatic relations were established sixty years ago in 1950. In early years after the establishment of diplomatic relations, Mexico played an important role in assisting in India’s Green Revolution. Particularly we remember a high-yield variety of wheat that was provided, which is called Sonora in India, which has been very successful. It is also the second largest economy in Latin America, and like India a more than a trillion dollar economy. Mexico is also very rich in hydrocarbon reserves. In fact their production of crude is now the sixth largest in the world.

During the significant visit of President Calderon, which I had referred to earlier, in September 2007 the two democracies recognizing their mutual strengths, mutual complementarities and a strong desire to further enhance our ties, elevated our relationship to the level of a ‘Privileged Partnership’. That visit was followed up by the important visit of our Rashtrapatiji in April 2007. Hence in recent years a very solid foundation has been laid for building further on the relationship.

As I mentioned, the diplomatic relations were established in 1950. So, we have reached an important milestone and 2010 is being celebrated as the sixtieth anniversary year of establishment of diplomatic relations between Mexico and India. Both sides are organizing several cultural activities to commemorate this important year. You will be happy to know that an Indian Cultural Centre was established recently in Mexico City. Also, an India Chair named after Mexican Nobel laureate Octavio Paz is likely to be established in El Colegio de Mexico later this year. As I said, a series of cultural events are being organized which include film festivals.

Both democracies are also looking at stepping up parliamentary exchanges. We were happy just last week to host an important eight-member Mexican Parliamentary Delegation from 8th to 13th August.
which was led by Senator Carlos Macias, who is the President of Foreign Relations Commission for the Asia Pacific.

Both sides have already put a very good framework in place for our deepening cooperation which includes an extradition treaty, a mutual legal assistance treaty, a bilateral investment protection and promotion agreement (BIPPA), a double taxation avoidance agreement (DTAA).

Trade between the two sides ranges between two billion to three billion dollars and usually in favour of India. There is still a lot of potential and scope to enhance two way trade. To tap that potential, a 'High Level Group on Trade, Investment and Economic Cooperation' was established in May 2007 to conduct comprehensive reviews and impart direction to deepening and enhancing our economic and trade relations. Already two meetings of the High Level Group have taken place, the latest being in April this year which was led by the Commerce Secretaries on both sides.

India is also an important investor in Mexico. Our accumulative investments are already more than 1.5 billion dollars in sectors like IT - in fact, practically all leading Indian IT companies have a significant presence in Mexico - pharmaceuticals, automobiles including tyre manufacturing, electronics, chemicals, packaging and so on. We also regularly hold Foreign Office consultations. Preparatory to the visit of the Foreign Minister, a round of Foreign Office consultations took place in July this year in Mexico which was led by Secretary (West) Shri Vivek Katju.

Mexico has also pledged support for India’s candidature of the UN Security Council for the years 2011 and 2012. We attach considerable significance to the visit of the Foreign Minister of Mexico. During the visit it is expected that a whole range of bilateral, regional and international issues, matters of common interest would be discussed.

Thank you. We will be happy to take questions relating to the visit of the Foreign Minister of Mexico.
Question: You mentioned that President Pratibha Patil visited Mexico in 2008 and that there were talks between her and Calderon the President of Mexico. What has been the follow-up between 2008 and 2010 so far as the agreements and other things in the talks are concerned? Has there been any kind of constructive outcome?

Official Spokesperson: Thank you for that question. In fact, there has been very active follow-up of the two high level visits - that of President Calderon in September 2007 and then in quick succession that of Rashtrapatijii in April 2008. I mentioned that for example, the High Level Group has been set up, because one of the focus areas is our economic, trade and investment cooperation. We have already had the second round of discussions. What is as significant is that despite the economic slow down in 2008-09, the level of trade has been maintained. We would like to enhance trade further because there is tremendous scope given the strengths that Mexico has, given the fact that Mexico is the second largest economy - more than a trillion dollar economy - in the Latin American countries. Sectors like hydrocarbons for example, sectors like mining hold great promise of cooperation. Mexico, is the sixth largest producer of crude and already Indian private sector companies are sourcing some quantities of crude, but there is potential to step that up. So, what is noteworthy is that despite the economic slowdown, we have managed to maintain the momentum and now you have the visit of the Foreign Minister. I would think that the Joint Commission meeting should also be taking place soon. We are trying to work out the dates. These are some of the things that are happening.

Question: Does Mexico support India’s bid for a permanent seat in the UN Security Council? I believe there is a Ministerial Meeting on Climate Change later in Mexico. Are we participating in it?

Official Spokesperson: As far as the UN Security Council is concerned, I have mentioned that Mexico has pledged support for our candidature for 2011-2012. That is where the matter stands in terms of the support concerned. In respect of COP16, the Summit will take place in Cancun in November 2010. One of the items of agenda of the visit is Climate Change. Foreign Minister of Mexico is also the Chairperson for COP16. The Foreign Ministry is leading the discussions with countries on COP16. I mentioned that she is going to meet with Minister Jairam Ramesh today. Certainly climate change is an issue which concerns us all. India, as you know, is one of the most vulnerable countries. We are playing an active and a constructive role in discussions on this very important matter including with Mexico.

Joint Secretary (LAC) (Shri Dammu Ravi): The Foreign Minister of Mexico is, in her capacity as the Chairperson of the COP16, having wide-ranging consultations with many countries. During her visit this time to India that is what she plans to do. She would like to have as much of discussion as possible on this important subject where both India and Mexico are very much interested.

Question: What is the status of agricultural cooperation between the two countries? Do we require the Mexican crude in India? If so, can you quantify it?

Official Spokesperson: What I know is that Reliance, Essar import quantities of crude. This is subject to reconfirmation, but we source heavy crude get from Mexico. I am not sure whether we actually bring it to India or trade/exchange it. Whether we bring it to India is something that I need to check.

Joint Secretary (LAC): In the month of September, our Agriculture Minister will be leading a delegation to Mexico. The Chief Ministers of Punjab and Haryana and a large number of officials are likely to accompany him. Mexicans are very keen to revive research in agriculture with India. Symet is one very important institute where our Minister will be visiting, and then there will be bilateral interactions during the visit. And they are going to reopen up the area of cooperation, research in agriculture …

Question: What is their stand on permanent membership for India on UN Security Council?
Official Spokesperson: Mexico is a member of the group called the Coffee Club. All countries including Mexico agree on the need for UN reforms but different countries have different approaches to the matter. As a member of the Coffee Club they have certain outlook on the matter. But we are very appreciative of the fact that for our nonpermanent seat of 2011-2012 they have already pledged support.

Question: In this visit, is there any scope of talking to Mexico on our permanent membership of the UN Security Council?

Official Spokesperson: Most certainly. In my opening remarks I have noted that we have historically a close relationship, a cordial relationship, a friendly relationship with Mexico. During this visit we will be discussing UN reforms too. So, certainly we are talking. We exchange views, we discuss. We are fellow developing countries. While respecting each other's views, certainly there is a lot of scope for discussion.

Question: This relates to the situation in Australia. As you are aware, a relative of former External Affairs Minister Mr. Natwar Singh has been involved in a scam that relates to currency notes. Has the Australian Government got in touch? If any action has to be taken, the information would have to be passed through the Indian High Commission or the MEA. So, has any information come from Canberra? If it has come, what is the MEA doing about it? Has it passed on the information to the relevant authorities?

Official Spokesperson: Thank you Srinjoy, we will ascertain facts and revert.

Question: Mexico is one of the countries among the many other countries which have raised a lot of objections over the new visa policy of India which earmarks foreign nationals of Pakistani origin and then their visa applications take a lot of time. How does the Indian Government look at this? Is the Indian Government looking at resolving this issue with various countries?

Official Spokesperson: Would you elaborate your question? I am not clear about the question.
Question: Post-Headley, most of the countries have raised objections over the fact that under the new visa policy, visa applications of foreign nationals of Pakistani origin take a lot of time in processing because the High Commission passes them on to the Home Ministry and then they go back. The whole process takes a lot of time whether it is Mexico, the US, or the UK. In fact articles that appeared in The Guardian in the UK had even gone on to say that this is racist in nature. How does the Indian Government react to this?

Official Spokesperson: Since we are talking of the visit of the Foreign Minister of Mexico and you have already said that your question is related to the visit of Foreign Minister of Mexico. To the best of my knowledge - and the Joint Secretary who directly handles Mexico also tells me - we are not aware of any such objection by Mexico.

Thank you very much.
600. Extract Relevant to Mexico from the Media Briefing by Official Spokesperson on Prime Minister's bilateral meetings on the sidelines of the G-20 Summit.

Seoul, November 11, 2010.

Let me next turn to the meeting of our Prime Minister with the President of Mexico His Excellency Felipe Calderon. The two leaders have been meeting regularly on the sidelines of international fora. The leaders warmly recalled the very successful visit of President Calderon to India in September 2007 when, recognizing each other's strengths and complementarities the two countries had decided to elevate our relationship to the level of a privileged partnership.

We have historically enjoyed warm and friendly relations with Mexico. It is a trillion dollar economy and the second largest after Brazil in Latin America. Our diplomatic relations go back to 1950, and we are currently celebrating the 60th anniversary of establishment of our diplomatic relations.

The President of India had paid a significant visit to Mexico in April 2008. And recently in August, amongst other high-level and important visits, we had welcomed the Foreign Minister of Mexico Ms. Patricia Espinosa on her first official visit to India.

We have bilateral trade which ranges between two to three billion dollars, which is certainly below the potential, and a trade target of five billion dollars has been established which we hope to achieve soon. India is also an important investor in Mexico with our investments exceeding 1.5 billion dollars.

India and Mexico have a strong cultural affinity. Mexicans have traditionally shown a lot of interest in Indian art, dances, films, yoga, music and so on. Indian personalities like Mahatma Gandhi, Tagore, Mother Theresa are widely admired in the country. We have decided to have several cultural activities to commemorate and celebrate the 60th anniversary of establishment of our diplomatic relations.
You are aware that Mexico is also hosting the COP 16 Summit on climate change in Cancun between 29th November and 10th of December. Prime Minister and President exchanged notes on the discussions on climate change and the preparations for the forthcoming summit. Prime Minister was of the opinion that initiatives which have a fair chance of garnering consensus should be identified so that the outcome from the Summit is pragmatic, forward-looking and result oriented. They felt that efforts and preparations were moving in the right direction, and that particularly the concerns of the developing countries should be kept in mind, and that the outcome, the decisions, the discussion should conform to UNFCCC and the Kyoto Protocol.

Both with President Calderon and with Prime Minister Cameron - I will come to the other aspects of discussion with Prime Minister Cameron momentarily - Prime Minister had discussions on the G20 process. Both leaders sought our Prime Minister's views as an eminent economist, his assessment on G20. It was felt by all concerned that greater attention should be paid to global imbalances and to achieving economic stability.

They expressed happiness at initial steps to reform the IMF and the quota sharing arrangements. They also, exchanged views on the G20 post the economic crisis phase noting that the response immediately post crisis was magnificent and now the real challenge was take steps to consolidate the efforts that had been initiated. They also agreed that there was no universally agreed diagnosis as to what ails the world economy.

President Calderon invited the Prime Minister of India to visit Mexico and the invitation was accepted with pleasure.

INDIA’S FOREIGN RELATIONS - 2010

SECTION - X

INDIA AND THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Chairman,

It is indeed a pleasure to convey our congratulations on your election to the Chairmanship of this Commission and we assure you the full cooperation of the Indian delegation. We would like to convey our appreciation to the Chairs of the two Working Groups, Mr. Paolo Cuculi of Italy and Mr. Johan Paschalis of South Africa for their diligent efforts.

2. India associates itself with the statement made on behalf of the Non Aligned Movement by the distinguished delegation of Indonesia.

Mr. Chairman,

3. The Disarmament Commission has a unique role as the universal deliberative forum for in-depth consideration of specific disarmament issues. When member-states showed the requisite political will, the UNDC was able to make consensus recommendations on issues ranging from confidence building measures to establishment of nuclear weapon free-zones. India believes that the Disarmament Commission now has an opportunity and in fact a responsibility to once again draw up guidelines and make recommendations of a universal character reflecting a forward looking vision for a more secure world. The UNDC is the universal institutional forum to achieve our objectives on the basis of dialogue and consensus.

Mr. Chairman,

4. We are meeting today against the background of considerable excitement and high expectations regarding a new momentum for global nuclear disarmament. At least in terms of aspirations and proposals, nuclear disarmament has moved up on the international agenda. A number of statements have been made by leaders; various commissions and initiatives have presented reports, and, scholars, academics and NGOs have lent their support to nuclear disarmament. The Disarmament Commission should play its rightful role and help progress our shared objective of attaining a world free of nuclear weapons. The Commission can do so by acting as a platform for deliberation resulting in consensus on specific steps that can be taken up to realize the vision of a nuclear weapons free world.

5. India continues to attach the highest priority to the goal of nuclear disarmament. India has consistently maintained that nuclear weapons can be eliminated through a non-discriminatory and universal convention along the lines of the Chemical and Biological Weapons Conventions. Our support for a Nuclear Weapons Convention providing for elimination of nuclear weapons within a specified timeframe was reiterated by India's Prime Minister at the 63rd UNGA. This is in keeping with the goal enshrined in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan of 1988. We welcome the progress achieved in the bilateral negotiations between the United States and Russia on further cuts in their nuclear arsenals. States with substantial arsenals should take meaningful steps towards nuclear disarmament.

6. Nuclear Disarmament and non-proliferation are mutually reinforcing processes. Pending global and non-discriminatory elimination of nuclear weapons, it is important to take measures to reduce nuclear dangers. Efforts for expansion of nuclear energy and reduction of proliferation risks must go hand in hand.

7. The possibility of terrorist and extremist groups gaining access to nuclear materials is real and could have catastrophic consequences. We are indeed happy that a resolution sponsored by India on this issue in the UNGA continues to garner wide support. We have in that resolution sought to highlight these dangers and to stress the need for national and international cooperative measures to prevent terrorists from gaining access to nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction. India has also welcomed the initiative of President Obama to host the Nuclear Security Summit next month to address this global challenge.
8. India is committed to a voluntary and unilateral moratorium on nuclear explosive testing. We affirm our policy of no first-use and non-use against non-nuclear weapon states. As a nuclear weapon state and a responsible member of the international community, India is prepared to negotiate a multilateral and internationally verifiable FMCT in the CD. The obstacles placed in launching these negotiations in the CD cannot but be a cause for disappointment.

9. The CD must also address the priority task of nuclear disarmament. India has proposed a number of measures that can help in moving toward a nuclear-weapons free world. These measures are the following:

- Reaffirmation of the unequivocal commitment of all nuclear weapon States to the goal of complete elimination of nuclear weapons;
- Reduction of the salience of nuclear weapons in the security doctrines;
- Taking into account the global reach and menace of nuclear weapons, adoption of measures by nuclear-weapon States to reduce nuclear danger, including the risks of accidental nuclear war, de-alerting of nuclear-weapons to prevent unintentional and accidental use of nuclear weapons;
- Negotiation of a global agreement among nuclear weapon States on 'no-first-use' of nuclear-weapons;
- Negotiation of a universal and legally-binding agreement on non-use of nuclear weapons against non-nuclear weapon States;
- Negotiation of a Convention on the complete prohibition of the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons;
- Negotiation of a Nuclear Weapons Convention prohibiting the development, production, stockpiling and use of nuclear weapons and on their destruction, leading to the global, non-discriminatory and verifiable elimination of nuclear weapons with a specified timeframe.
Mr. Chairman,

10. While it is important that we maintain the momentum in Working Group I on Nuclear Disarmament and Nonproliferation, we should redouble our efforts to reach consensus this year with regard to Working Group II on Elements for Declaration of 2010 as the Fourth Disarmament Decade.

11. We should aim for finding consensus on elements that will be of enduring validity; that uphold the priority for nuclear disarmament and complete elimination of all weapons of mass destruction; that address other dimensions of global security including space security; and strengthening international framework for addressing conventional arms, including small arms and light weapons and prevention of their being used by terrorists. The UNDC, as is its tradition, should focus on these issues of security taking into account global interdependence of peoples and nations.

12. We also need a new idiom for conducting the international discourse, which is now no longer confined to states, but must take into account the wider constituencies -peoples voices from the ground expressed in various ways -NGO's, peace activists, scholars and academics. In sum, the elements we draw up must help build a durable foundation for strengthening security in the 21st century.

13. Mr. Chairman, this forum can play its part in revitalizing multilateral institutions and dialogue to build confidence and strengthen international security through multilaterally negotiated legally binding instruments that can provide assurances of verifiability, irreversibility, compliance and universality.

Mr. Chairman,

We remain committed to ensuring a successful session of the UNDC in the coming weeks and look forward to working towards that end.
602. Press Release issued by the Permanent Mission of India at the UN on the election of Ambassador Chandrasekhar Dasgupta to the Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights.

Ambassador Chandrasekhar Dasgupta of India was elected by ECOSOC today to the Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR). Out of the 52 valid votes cast, he obtained the highest number of votes in the Asian Group. Ambassador Dasgupta and candidate from Republic of Korea got elected with 41 and 38 votes respectively.

In addition, India got elected to the Committee on Non-Governmental Organizations (CNGO), Programme Coordinating Board of the Joint UN Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS) and Commission on Science and Technology for Development (CSTD) by acclamation.

Minister of State for External Affairs, Smt. Preneet Kaur, led the Indian delegation to the Third Global Forum of Alliance of Civilisations (AoC) held in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil from May 27-29, 2010.

2. The AoC, an initiative launched under the UN, aims at bridging the differences and overcoming the mistrust and misconceptions among communities and nations. The Rio Forum, attended by 120 countries, saw the participation of a number of Heads of Governments, Foreign Ministers, senior officials and also representatives of civil society and NGOs.
3. In her address, Smt. Preneet Kaur spoke about India's rich and diverse civilisational and cultural heritage. Quoting from Mahatma Gandhi and Guru Nanak, she reiterated India's ethos of openness, acceptance of diversity and religious harmony. These principles are enshrined in the Indian Constitution itself. She emphasised that the AoC should focus on common areas that unites its membership and not get bogged down in divisive issues. Its message and work are particularly important today in the international efforts at combating extremism and terrorism.

4. The Minister also had bilateral meetings with the Foreign Ministers of Morocco, Serbia and Estonia.

Mr. President,

Allow me to begin by expressing my delegation's deep appreciation for your leadership and the work of your team in navigating the ECOSOC process this year towards a meaningful destination.

Mr. President,

Concerted action on the part of the world's largest economies in the G-20 was able to avert a major economic melt-down following the financial crisis of 2008. But the shoots of recovery that we are seeing can easily be upset by shocks and fluctuations as the Euro-zone crisis has shown.

In such circumstances, it is important that we ensure that global economic recovery is durable, balanced and sustainable.

This is also critical for achieving the MDGs for which we have just five years more. Firm and time bound commitments, including on the provision of resources, transfer of technology and capacity building, are the need of the hour on MDGs.

India has a strong interest in the world economy doing well as this is key enabler for us to pursue growth and bring the fruits of development to all sections of our society.

We also need to focus on medium and long-term structural issues of global governance. The reforms at the Bretton Woods Institutions need to be urgently completed. And, at the UN the Security Council must reflect contemporary realities and expand in both permanent and non-permanent categories.

Mr. President,

The Annual Ministerial Review this year focuses on gender equality and the empowerment of women. This is timely as our MDG aspirations will remain unfulfilled if significant progress is not made on empowerment and equality of women and on their health and education.

India's National Policy for the Empowerment of Women seeks enhancing economic and political empowerment and providing equal access to health care, education and employment for women.

Nearly half of the 46 million rural household beneficiaries of the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme, one of the world's largest cash for work programmes, are women. Similarly there are over 2 million women's Self Help Groups under the Swarnjayanti Gram Rozgar Yojna, a huge rural employment programme.

In education, we have recently launched Saakshar Bharat, a national programme for female literacy, to impart functional literacy to around 60 million adult women. Moreover, our newly enacted Right to Education Act, guarantees free and compulsory education to all children in the age group of 6-14 years. Girls will be its obvious focus.

Our figures on maternal and infant mortality continue to be unacceptably high. Our efforts in reducing maternal and infant mortality through various schemes including the Janani Suraksha Yojna, a cash assistance programme, are beginning to yield results.
We are particularly concerned at the low child sex ratio in our country, the disparity between female and male literacy rates, the exceptionally high maternal mortality rates, the far lower women's work participation rate as compared to men and issues of violence against women.

There is perceptible improvement in the social-economic status of women in India today as a result of our sustained efforts. We are, however, mindful of the enormous challenges we have still to overcome.

Mr. President,

We are justifiably proud that today in India women are participating in greater numbers in the political process and in our decision making structures. Visibly, they occupy some of the highest political positions in the country including as our President, the Speaker of the Lok Sabha, the House of Representatives in our Parliament and the Leader of the ruling coalition.

However, less visible but equally important, we have more than a million elected women representatives in local government. This is a fruit of our policy to institutionalize women's participation at local government level by reserving one third of seats in the village panchayats more than 17 years ago. And, recently we have tabled a bill to raise these seats to 50%. Legislative action is also on the anvil to institutionalise women's participation in Parliament and State legislatures.

Mr. President,

The last ten years have seen a continuous chorus of calls for reforms at the UN.

I am very happy that one of the most important such efforts, the setting up of an entity to provide leadership and to mainstream women's issues in a coherent and focused manner at the UN, has finally borne fruit.

This is a transformational moment for the UN and I am glad that the Indian delegation played an active role in resolving key contentious issues and ensuring forward movement.
As I noted earlier in my address, achievement of MDGs hinges crucially on women being specially targeted so that they become equal beneficiaries of the gains of development. It is imperative that UN WOMEN operationalizes itself on an urgent basis and receives our full backing. There is far too much work to do.

Thank You.

605. Press Release issued by the Permanent Mission of India at the UN on the Visit of Minister of State for External Affairs Smt. Preneet Kaur to New York.

Minister of State for External Affairs, Smt. Preneet Kaur, was one of the first Ministers to address the United Nations General Assembly at New York on 2 July, 2010, on the occasion of the creation of UN WOMEN (UN Composite Entity for Gender Equality and Empowerment of Women within UN). The establishment of this new composite Entity meets a longstanding demand and came after four years of intense and difficult political negotiations. The Minister noted that India has always been at the forefront of issues relating to gender equality, mainstreaming and empowerment. She recalled that Smt. Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit was the first woman President of the UN General Assembly in 1953.

The Minister referred to Prime Minister Manmohan Singh’s statement that "No society can claim to be a part of the modern civilized world unless it treats its women on par with men." She also quoted Smt. Sonia Gandhi, UPA Chairperson, who has said that "Complete gender equality, nothing less, must be our over-riding goal. There must be neither compromise nor complacency. The struggle is joined. It must be brought to full fruition."

The Minister was then accorded the singular honour of chairing the plenary session of the General Assembly which approved the establishment of the newly-created entity.
606. Press Release issued by the Ministry of External Affairs about gratuitous Remarks on J&K attributed to UN Secretary General in a section of the media.

New Delhi, August 3, 2010.

Ministry have seen media reports on certain remarks attributed to the UN Secretary General on the security situation in the State of Jammu & Kashmir and revival of composite dialogue with Pakistan. The Government had sought a clarification from the office of the UN Secretary General through our Permanent Mission to the UN in New York. The office of the UN Secretary General has clarified that no such question was raised at the press conference nor was any such comment made by the UN Secretary General.

New York, September 22, 2010.

Mr. President, Excellencies and distinguished delegates,

I am honoured to be present at this august gathering and to speak on the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs), an aspiration which so fittingly captures the global vision and promise for humanity in the 21st century.

Allow me to begin by thanking you for your stewardship, guidance and support to the expansive development agenda of the United Nations including the MDGs.

Mr. President,

In his message on the UN World Public Service Day five years ago, our Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh said

*The Millennium Development Goals that we have set for ourselves cannot be met unless governments are pro-active. No government in any civilized society can ignore the basic needs of people. The goal of the development process must be to include every last member of our society in that process".

As we take stock of the MDGs, we note that the world as a whole has made substantial gains but the progress is uneven and short of expectations.

This is particularly visible in the so called forgotten MDGs, MDGs that deal with women and children's health. We are, therefore, happy that the Secretary-General has set out a Global Strategy on women and children's health.

Natural disasters have also taken a toll on MDG achievements. The death and destruction in Haiti and Pakistan have been on an unprecedented scale.

As a fellow developing country that has itself taken a huge toll from such disasters, we responded duty-bound in solidarity to assist the Governments and people in the affected countries to the best of our ability and in keeping with their priorities.

Mr. President,

A growing concern is the impact of climate change on vulnerable communities and regions in our country. Rain-fed agriculture accounts for sixty percent of crop area in India. Climate change has aggravated the situation in traditionally drought and flood prone regions in the country. The National Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme was designed to provide relief to affected farming communities in the country.

We in India are alive to the challenges of climate, and remain committed to mounting appropriate national and regional responses. Our national action plan on Climate Change will increase the share of clean and renewable energy in our energy mix, increase energy efficiency across the economy and expand our forest cover.

Mr. President,

With just five years to go for the MDG target year and our record of mixed success, it is imperative that we significantly step up our individual and collective commitments and efforts for the realization of the MDGs.
Mr. President,

Our collective efforts have certainly borne fruit on the goal of poverty eradication at the global level.

But, more than 60 million people slipped back into poverty in 2009 following the economic and financial crisis of 2008. This has certainly had a regressive impact on the MDGs.

It is, therefore, important that we ensure that global economic recovery is durable, balanced and sustainable. This is also critical for achieving the MDGs and for us to be able to effectively address the challenges of food and energy security, climate change and natural disasters.

In so far as India is concerned, our economy has shown resilience and is expected to grow by 8.5% in 2010-11, and over 9% in 2011-12. The UN Secretary General’s report on MDGs notes that India’s efforts on poverty reduction have been a major contributor for reduction in global poverty levels and some 188 million people in India would be out of poverty by 2015.

We need to, however, be cognizant that the largest concentration of poor in the world continues to remain in India and South Asia. The long distance we still have to travel to put poverty behind us in India should not be underestimated.

Our efforts, therefore, are to push for growth while at the same time ensuring that the fruits of growth reach out across our society, i.e. inclusive growth. This, indeed, is the main objective of India’s ambitious socio-economic development programmes.

The Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act, with an annual budget of US$ 8 billion, is the largest “cash for work” poverty alleviation programme in the world and has benefited 50 million rural households in India so far.

By law, all Indian children in the age group of 6 to 14 years must now receive free education. The Sarva Shikshya Abhiyan, a universal elementary education programme with an annual budget of US$ 3 billion has dramatically increased primary school enrolment.
To ensure that children remain in school and that this also benefits them nutritionally, we also run the largest school-lunch programme in the world.

This is being supplemented by Saakshar Bharat a special programme focused on female literacy launched in 2009. Enormous strides have been made in the empowerment of women.

India has embarked on perhaps the most ambitious affirmative action ever by mandating that one-third of all elected positions in local government be reserved for women. We are striving to raise this figure even higher. More than a million women representatives already hold elected positions. A legislation to extend reservation of seats in Parliament is under consideration.

Mr. President,

India faces enormous challenges in the areas of women’s and children’s health. The Government of India has adopted a multi pronged strategy under the National Rural Health Mission in 2005 to provide health care in the rural areas which is accessible, affordable, accountable, effective and reliable. This Mission is fully focused on improving our standing on maternal and child health indicators. Under the umbrella of this Mission, recently, in order to accelerate progress, new initiatives have been identified, namely, Name Based Tracking of Pregnant Women, Maternal Death Review, Adolescent Reproductive and Sexual Health, Differential Planning, and Annual Health Survey. Our JANANI SURAKSHA YOJANA, a dedicated safe motherhood programme, has so far benefited 28 million women.

As a result of on-going efforts, the Maternal Mortality Rate (MMR) in India has come down from 301 over 2001-2003 to 254 over 2004-2006, a decline of 47 points over a period of three years. Though, we are still some distance away from the target of 109 by 2015, going by the rate of decline in the past and comprehensive efforts being made across the country, it appears that India is on the right track with regard to MDG-5. We are also trying to take similar strides on Infant Mortality Rate (IMR).

India has made notable progress on combating HIV/AIDS, Malaria and other diseases. The HIV epidemic has reached a plateau in India and we now have a prevalence rate down to 0.34 %.
Mr. President,

India has made valuable use of technology to bring benefits of development to our people. The tele-density in India has increased from 0.67% in 1991 to 37% in 2009. Our innovative and low cost technology solutions in the field of IT and telecommunication have brought development benefits, not just in India, but also to people in Africa, Latin America and elsewhere.

In August 2010, we launched the second phase of the Pan-African e-Network project. The network project will link all the 53 countries in Africa with centres of excellence in India for telemedicine and tele-education services. More than 1700 students from African countries have already registered with different Indian universities for various courses and regular tele-medical consultations have also started between African doctors and Indian specialists.

Mr. President,

The lack of progress on building a robust global partnership needs to be urgently addressed. Unmet financial commitments by developed country partners have widened the financing for development gap. We call upon them to fulfill the long made 0.7% of GNI commitment. Equally urgent is the need to transfer technology and undertake capacity building in developing countries.

The quantum leap in South-South Cooperation has significantly complemented global resources targeted at development agenda, but it cannot be a substitute for the North-South cooperation.

We are happy that today India’s development partnership with countries in the South goes beyond technical cooperation. Our annual outlay on concessional lending and grants is over US$ 1 billion, covering countries in our region, in Africa and beyond. In addition, US$ 5 billion has been extended as lines of credit since 2003.

We are committed to doing more in the coming years with our partners in the South and stepping up our support to South-South Cooperation, both on the development side as well as in support of humanitarian needs.
Mr. President,

India is seized of the MDG challenges that lie ahead of us. Our commitment remains resolute.

Our national goal of inclusive growth and the larger idea of a more humane and just global society that underlines the Millennium Declaration would continue to inspire us to work untiringly to achieve the MDGs by 2015.

In the final march towards the attainment of the MDG, let us be inspired by the belief of Mahatma Gandhi in the limitless potential of human achievement, he said:

"A small body of determined spirits fired by an unquenchable faith in their mission can alter the course of history."

This should be the driving force for nations across the world and to this we dedicate ourselves.

Thank you.

608. Remarks by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the G-4 Ministerial Meeting.

Dear Colleagues,

Let me begin by congratulating His Excellency Mr Seiji Maehara on his appointment as the Foreign Minister of Japan. You bring, Mr. Minister, a wealth of experience to this important and challenging job. I am sure that we will gain from your wise counsel. I would like to thank you and the Japanese Delegation for arranging this meeting.

Excellencies, we are meeting as G4 Foreign Ministers after a period of more than five years. It is a great pleasure for me to attend this meeting. During this interregnum, India, Brazil, Japan and Germany have played a pivotal role, both individually and collectively in progressing the process of UN Security Council reform forward. This meeting will send a very strong political message.

Our meeting assumes added significance as it is being held following the renewed momentum imparted to the reform process by the start of the text-based negotiations from July this year. Our Missions in New York have played a commendable role in mobilizing the support of over 140 countries for this demand. However, we need to build the consensus further to be in a position to force, if required, the changes we seek in the Security Council. In this, the ongoing intergovernmental negotiation process remains useful and important to draw and involve a larger number of the Member States in the UNSC reform process.

I would like to stress that it is very important that we remain steadfast in our demand for expansion of the Security Council in both permanent and non-permanent categories of membership. Any dilution in our principled position or in our unity would make us vulnerable to demands for concessions. I believe that we, as Ministers of the G4 countries need to commit ourselves personally to pushing the process forward and consolidating the gains so far.

Another matter of importance is that we need to work towards achieving early reform. I feel we should instruct our officials both at our capitals and at the Missions here at New York as well as in major world capitals to strengthen their efforts with a view to achieving reform preferably by the end of the 65th session of the UN General Assembly, but not later than the 66th session. I am happy to note that these points are adequately reflected in the draft statement before us, to which I would like to invite your comments.

I feel that at this stage, our strategy should primarily aim at the following objectives:

Build greater support in the inter-governmental negotiations for evolving a consensus document which advocates expansion of UNSC in both categories
Gain greater support for our position among the African, Latin American and Caribbean Countries

Urge USA to take lead in the reform process and work with Russia and China to address their insecurities regarding UNSC reform

Maintain our unity and further build our base by accommodating natural candidates from Africa in our group

All of these would need our united and collective efforts, perhaps more now than ever. I am eager to listen to your views and suggestions on these issues.

609. Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna at the High Level Meeting on revitalizing the work of the Conference on Disarmament.

New York, September 24, 2010.

Excellencies,

India welcomes the Secretary General's initiative to convene this meeting. We believe that its main purpose is to send a clear message of support for the Conference on Disarmament as the single multilateral disarmament negotiating forum and to provide political impetus to the multilateral disarmament agenda. India associates itself with the statement made on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement.

Mr. Chairman,

The Conference on Disarmament adopted a consensus decision in May 2009 on its Programme of work, which included immediate commencement of negotiations on a Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty. Such negotiations, which we support, are without prejudice to India's principled position on other agenda items, in particular the priority issue of nuclear disarmament. We share the disappointment expressed here by a number of speakers that the CD has been prevented from undertaking its primary task of negotiating multilateral treaties. We reaffirm our support for the CD as the single multilateral negotiating forum, recognized as such by the international community. We also support the immediate commencement of FMCT negotiations in the CD as part of its Programme of work in early 2011.

Mr. Chairman,

India remains committed to the objective and vision of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's Action Plan of 1988 for ushering in a nuclear weapon free and non-violent world order. It is a painful reality that this has remained a distant goal, not least due to the continued opposition to negotiations on nuclear disarmament, in the Conference on Disarmament. It may be recalled that the Final Document of the First Special session on Disarmament accorded nuclear disarmament the highest priority. We call for intensification of dialogue amongst UN member states for strengthening the international consensus on disarmament and non-proliferation.

Mr. Chairman,

While it is not possible for this short meeting to deliberate on all issues nor can it take decisions on the disarmament agenda, the Chair's summary that the UN Secretary General will make at its conclusion, will, we hope, add positive momentum for the disarmament agenda and reaffirm the critical role of the CD as the single multilateral negotiating forum for achieving our common goals.

Thank you.
Your Excellency, Mr. President,
Excellencies,
Ladies and Gentlemen

At the outset, please allow me to congratulate you on your election as President of the General Assembly. My delegation assures you of its fullest cooperation and support in the fulfillment of the responsibilities before you.

Mr. President,

Sixty-five years ago, the United Nations was created to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, to affirm faith in fundamental rights, to establish conditions under which respect for international law can be maintained and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom. These noble aims enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations continue to remain as valid today as they were when the United Nations was founded.

The world has changed dramatically in the last six-and-a-half decades. Global integration at an economic, social, cultural and political level has made the world a smaller place. On the other hand, this has also created conditions whereby the problems and challenges of one country or region can very quickly become those of the larger community of nations.

The global threats and challenges of the 21st century are not necessarily those that were prevalent in the 20th century in the aftermath of World War II. Terrorism and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, maritime piracy, pandemics and epidemics, organized crime and narcotics smuggling, recognize no borders or boundaries. Similarly, the fallout of intra-state conflicts, failed states, natural disasters, food shortages, financial or economic crises, transcends countries and regions.

The challenges of global governance in an increasingly inter-connected and multi-polar world are truly formidable as we near the end of the first decade of the 21st century. The international community looks up to the United Nations to overcome the common challenges of humankind through the “harmonized actions of nations” as stated in the UN Charter.

Mr. President,

The United Nations, with its universal membership and equality of nations, enjoys a unique legitimacy that requires it to be at the centre of international governance. We must, therefore, not just reaffirm the central role of the UN in global governance but restore and reinforce it reflecting contemporary realities.

India remains fully committed to the principles and purposes of the United Nations and believes that the UN should be at the core of global governance and efforts to meet the challenges of collective peace, security and development. The UN, however, needs urgent reform to reflect contemporary realities and to effectively meet emerging global challenges. The changes in the global geo-strategic order since 1945 have barely been reflected in the most vital of the UN’s organs, charged with the maintenance of international peace and security. The Security Council spends most, if not all of its time, on issues pertaining to the developing world. Developing countries contribute almost all the troops that are part of the UN’s peacekeeping presence worldwide. Yet, their voice on the Council's high table on decisions relating to international peace and security is barely audible. Despite the agenda of the Council being seized of conflicts in Africa, yet, there is no permanent member from Africa in the Security Council.

In the inter-governmental negotiations on the issue of Security Council reform, an overwhelming majority of the membership expressed clear support for expansion in both the permanent and the non-permanent categories of the Council along with an improvement of its working methods. It is imperative that we take these negotiations to an early and logical conclusion.

The General Assembly, as the chief deliberative, policy making and representative organ of the UN, must set the global political, economic and social agenda. It must reclaim its position on vital matters like the appointment of the Secretary General and in the relationship between the UN and the Bretton Woods Institutions. Along with the ECOSOC, the General Assembly should also set the paradigms of multilateral engagement for the global economy and for development and development cooperation.

Mr. President,

The significant advancement of the UN's reform agenda this year in an area that is clearly a priority of our times, gender equality and women's empowerment, is a matter of satisfaction to my delegation, particularly given the pro-active role played by India in the negotiations. I wish to reiterate our strong commitment for UN WOMEN and its strengthening.

The review of the Human Rights Council this year should contribute to the Council's role as an effective and credible mechanism.

UN peacekeeping and peacebuilding and flagship activities in the core area of maintaining international peace and security, require a new global compact based on greater inclusiveness and participation in the decision making process.

India has contributed over 100,000 peacekeepers in nearly every major UN peacekeeping operation. It stands committed to UN peacekeeping.

Another area in which the UN has a key role is humanitarian assistance. It is important that international humanitarian actions fully subscribe to the humanitarian principles of neutrality, humanity and impartiality.

The capacities of the UN to manage development operations need to be augmented and the funding for these needs-based activities, especially "core" untied funding, requires manifold increase. It is also imperative that the UN and its Funds and Programmes not advance particular ideological objectives linked to preferences of donors but align themselves squarely behind national priorities of developing countries.

India, within its means, has consistently contributed to the developmental and humanitarian activities of the UN, including by way of South-South cooperation through NEPAD and the India-Brazil-South Africa (IBSA) Trust Fund with the UNDP.
Mr. President,

Mahatma Gandhi once described poverty as the worst form of violence. With only five years left until the 2015 deadline to achieve the Millennium Development Goals, there is an ever greater need to ensure that firm and time bound commitments, including on the provision of resources, transfer of technology and capacity building, are made, if extreme poverty, illiteracy, hunger and disease are to be effectively curtailed.

My Government accords the highest priority to the attainment of the Millennium Development Goals. We, in India, understand that there can be no peace and progress unless poverty is eliminated and the fruits of development and progress shared among all countries and people. In this context, we believe that special attention needs to be focused on the Least Developed Countries, the Landlocked Developing Countries, the Small Island developing States, the African countries and others who are vulnerable and need special support to make them institutionally strong and economically resilient to overcome their myriad challenges. We in India are also pursuing one of the most ambitious programmes of socio-economic intervention ever undertaken, designed to free our people from poverty, provide universal education, empower women and ensure health care to all.

Our development challenges, including the attainment of the Millennium Development Goals, were exacerbated by the financial and economic crisis that started in 2008. Acting in concert, the G-20, which includes the largest developed and developing countries, reacted promptly and purposefully to stem the global slowdown and send a strong message of confidence and stability. India believes that the G-20, the premier forum for international economic cooperation, can help catalyze strong, balanced and sustainable growth for the benefit of all.

Mr. President,

As a country vulnerable to and already suffering from the impacts of climate change, India has an important stake in the success of ongoing international negotiations to address climate change.

A framework to guide our action has been painstakingly built around the UN Framework Convention and its Kyoto Protocol, along with the roadmap laid out in Bali three years ago. It is time for the international community to display political vision and perseverance - to follow through and ensure that whatever we do must enhance, and not diminish, the spirit and substance of these important international agreements. There is no substitute to the UN-led process with its inherent inclusiveness and transparency.

We hope that the Conference of Parties at Cancun will take us closer to this goal.

Our collective strategy must be sensitive to the aspirations of hundreds of millions of the world's poor for a better future - including those inhabiting the Small Island Developing States, Least Developed Countries and the countries of Africa - and take account of our differential capacities.

Clearly, with their greater capacity to contribute, the developed countries must take lead in this process and fulfill their obligations - not only in terms of more ambitious commitments for reducing greenhouse gas emissions, but also in helping the developing countries in their mitigation and adaptation efforts. A paradigm for equitable burden sharing that provides for an equal sharing of the resource of the atmosphere for all human beings is a natural expectation we have from the on-going negotiations.

In India, despite our huge developmental challenges, we are doing everything possible, within the limitation of our own resources, to contribute to the global action on climate change through an ambitious National Action Plan. We are willing to work with the international community in a forward-looking and positive spirit, acknowledging our responsibilities as citizens of the globe, to achieve a comprehensive, balanced and above all, an equitable outcome to the on-going negotiations.

Mr. President,

India has an abiding commitment for achieving universal, non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament within a specified timeframe, a vision that was most eloquently articulated here in the General Assembly by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi in 1988. More than two decades later the painful reality is that this goal still remains a distant one. In the meantime, newer threats have emerged, including the threat of terrorists gaining access to weapons of mass destruction.
India tabled a working paper on nuclear disarmament in 2006 containing specific proposals that reflect the spirit and substance of the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan. We call for an intensification of discussion and dialogue amongst Member States and the larger non-governmental communities so as to strengthen the international consensus that can be translated into concrete action on achieving nuclear disarmament. I participated in the High Level Meeting on Disarmament called by the Secretary General on 24th September to lend India's support for the objectives of that meeting.

India remains committed to the negotiation in the CD of a multilateral, non-discriminatory and internationally verifiable FMCT that meets India's national security interests. We hope that the Conference will be able to commence negotiations at an early date. We remain committed to a unilateral and voluntary moratorium on nuclear explosive testing.

Mr. President,

Terrorism has emerged as one of the most serious threats to international peace and security. To defeat this scourge, it is imperative for the global community to build on international cooperation and take concerted action against terrorists and their sponsors. Acts of terrorism need to be condemned by all, wherever and whenever they are committed, by whomsoever and for whatever purposes. There can be no justification for terrorism just as there can be no good and bad terrorists. It is important for every Member State of the UN to note that it is no longer possible to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds.

India is a party to all major international conventions against terrorism and fully supports implementation of the UN Global Counter-Terrorism strategy. However, there remain considerable gaps in the international legal framework against terrorism. The Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism is designed to fill these gaps. We urge Member States to display the necessary political will to finalise and adopt the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism.

Mr. President,

Peace and stability in South Asia is one of our highest priorities. We are committed to good neighbourly relations with all our neighbours, including Pakistan. It is in this spirit of solidarity with the people of Pakistan in their hour of need, that we pledged US$ 25 million aid which is being channeled through the UN for flood relief efforts in that country. As a neighbor we wished to provide succor and relief in a timely manner to the victims of this natural disaster. We are saddened by the loss of life and property that Pakistan has suffered as a result of these unprecedented floods.

It is well known that many countries have deep rooted concerns about the growth and consolidation of militancy and terrorism in Pakistan. We share these concerns, particularly because Jammu & Kashmir, which is an integral part of India, is the target of such Pakistan-sponsored militancy and terrorism. Pakistan must fulfill its solemn commitment of not allowing territory under its control to be used for terrorism directed against India. Credible and firm action by Pakistan against terrorist groups operating from its soil is in the interest of the region as it is in Pakistan's own interest. Pakistan cannot impart lessons to us on democracy and human rights. If, however, Pakistan were to live up to its commitment not to allow use of its soil by terrorists acting against India, this would significantly help reduce the trust deficit that impedes the development of better bilateral relations between our two countries. We are neighbours, and as neighbours, we have an obligation to work together.

The peoples of South Asia share a common destiny and my government has consistently stressed that we will work together with our South Asian brothers and sisters to build a future that brings prosperity and development through strengthened dialogue and cooperation.

Mr. President,

Afghanistan has recently successfully concluded parliamentary elections. We believe the international community needs to be steadfast in its engagement with Afghanistan to ensure the success of its reconstruction efforts and its emergence as a democratic, pluralistic and prosperous society. The continuing existence of safe havens and sanctuaries for terrorists beyond Afghanistan’s borders is the major impediment to the restoration of peace and security in Afghanistan. This should be a primary focus of the international community.
Mr. President,

India was among the original signatories of the UN Charter in 1945. We have, at every step thereafter, done what we could to strengthen this great endeavor that represents the aspirations of all humanity.

Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, India's first Prime Minister, said in 1948, and I quote, "The fundamental principles on which the UN is based are the right principles. We believe in those fundamental principles and want to help the organization in following these principles."

The Government and more than one billion people of India have stood by this commitment.

Mr. President,

I would like to solemnly reaffirm our faith in the principles that underlie the United Nations and in the United Nations system.

Thank you
Mr. Chairman,

India attaches the highest priority to global and non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament. The vision for establishing a nuclear weapon free and non-violent world order was most eloquently articulated by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi here in 1988. Twenty two years later, that vision remains as compelling as before but the goal remains a distant reality. In the meantime newer threats have emerged, including the threat of terrorists gaining access to weapons of mass destruction.

In 2006, India tabled a working paper on Nuclear Disarmament containing specific proposals that reflect the spirit and substance of the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan. The Working Paper suggested a number of measures including reaffirmation of the unequivocal commitment by all nuclear weapon states to the goal of complete elimination of nuclear weapons, reduction of the salience of nuclear weapons in security doctrines, measures to reduce nuclear danger, including de-alerting of nuclear-weapons and negotiation of a global agreement among nuclear weapon States on 'no-First-use' of nuclear-weapons, negotiation of a Convention prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons and negotiation of a Nuclear Weapons Convention for the complete elimination of nuclear weapons, within a specified timeframe.

We believe that the progressive de-legitimization of nuclear weapons is essential to achieving the goal of their complete elimination. There is need for a step by step process underwritten by a universal commitment and an agreed multilateral framework for achieving global and non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament. We support an intensification of dialogue to strengthen the international consensus on disarmament and non-proliferation. This dialogue should cover not just member states but the wider spectrum of non-governmental communities as well.

Mr. Chairman,

Without prejudice to the highest priority we attach to the goal of nuclear disarmament, India supports the negotiation in the Conference on Disarmament of a multilateral, non-discriminatory and internationally verifiable FMCT that meets India’s national security interests. India is a nuclear weapon state and a responsible member of the world community, and would approach these negotiations as such.

Addressing the High level meeting called by the UNSG on September 24th 2010, India’s External Affairs Minister expressed disappointment that the CD, the single multilateral disarmament negotiating forum, had been prevented from undertaking its primary task of negotiating multilateral treaties. He expressed India’s support for the immediate commencement of FMCT negotiations in the CD as part of its programme of work in early 2011.

India remains committed to maintaining a unilateral and voluntary moratorium on nuclear explosive testing. India has a policy of a credible minimum nuclear deterrent. We do not subscribe to any arms race, including a nuclear arms race. India has espoused the policy of no first-use and non-use against non-nuclear weapon States and is prepared to convert these undertakings into multilateral legal arrangements. We support negotiations with a view to reaching agreement on effective arrangements to assure non-nuclear weapon States against the use and threat of use of nuclear weapons. We also support a Global No-first Use treaty.

India is a party to the Chemical Weapons Convention and the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention. The CWC remains a unique treaty providing for elimination of an entire category of weapons of mass destruction through a multilateral, non-discriminatory and internationally verifiable instrument. It is important that all state parties uphold and fulfil their commitments under the treaty. We look forward to strengthening the implementation of the BWC at the 7th Review Conference to be held in Geneva in 2011.

India continues to support efforts to strengthen the international legal framework on the security of space assets to enhance space security for all space users and specifically to prevent the weaponization of outer space, a common heritage of mankind. While universal and non-discriminatory TCBMS are useful complementary measures, we support the negotiation of legally binding instruments to strengthen space security and to prevent an arms race in Outer Space.

Mr. Chairman,

India is strongly committed to the CCW process as a keystone in the edifice of the law of armed conflict and international humanitarian law.
We have ratified all the five CCW protocols. India has actively engaged in the negotiations on a draft Protocol on Cluster Munitions that strikes a balance between humanitarian and security considerations. We welcome the successful outcome of the Fourth Biennial Meeting of States on the implementation of the UN Programme of Action on illicit trade in small arms and light weapons held here in New York in June 2010.
While we have participated actively in the preparatory meetings with regard to the ATT, we believe that the prospects for a viable and effective outcome would be enhanced only if the interests of all the stakeholders are addressed in a transparent and consensus based process.

Mr. Chairman,

As in the previous years, India would be tabling three resolutions in the First Committee on:

Measures to prevent terrorists from acquiring Weapons of Mass Destruction

Reducing Nuclear Danger Convention on the Prohibition of the Use of Nuclear Weapons

We will be making more detailed presentations on these resolutions during the time allocated for that purpose.

Thank you
612. India’s Election to the United Nations Security Council

New Delhi, October 12, 2010.

The United Nations General Assembly today elected India as a non-permanent member of the United Nations Security Council (UNSC) for a two year term beginning 1 January 2011. India received 187 votes, the highest among the candidates for election to the Security Council as non-permanent members. The minimal threshold for election to the Security Council is 128 votes, which is two-thirds of the votes of the 192 Member States of the United Nations.

This will be India’s seventh term on the Security Council as a non-permanent member. India has previously been a member of the Security Council in 1950-51, 1967-68, 1972-73, 1977-78, 1984-85, and 1991-92.

As a founding member of the United Nations, India is fully committed to the Organization’s principles and purposes. During its forthcoming term in the UNSC, India will discharge its obligations as a responsible member of the international community and a representative of the developing countries by remaining fully and actively engaged on all issues before the Council. India looks forward to working with fellow members of the UNSC and other Member States of the UN to these ends.

Statement by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna on India’s Election to UN Security Council.

New Delhi, October 12, 2010.

Friends,

Good evening to all of you. I appreciate your presence here at this late hour in the evening.

I am happy to have this opportunity to inform you of India’s election as a non-permanent member of the United Nations Security Council for a period of two years beginning January 1, 2011. In the elections held at the United Nations Headquarters in New York a short while ago, India received 187 votes, the highest among the countries standing for election to the Security Council as non-permanent members. This represents over 98% of the total membership of the UN and is well ahead of the required 128 votes. This resounding endorsement of India’s candidature at the United Nations serves as a reaffirmation, if any were needed, of the overwhelming support that India enjoys in the international community. On behalf of the Government of India, I extend my sincere thanks to the overwhelming number of the UN Member States who have supported us.

India will take over the Asian seat in the Security Council vacated by Japan at the end of this year. It will re-enter the Security Council after an interregnum of nearly two decades.

There have been significant changes in the international scene since India last served on the Security Council. India has been integral to some of the important processes that induced these changes in the context of the financial and economic architecture, major shifts at the world trade and climate change negotiations as well as the recalibration of the global regime for civilian nuclear cooperation. The overwhelming support we have received is recognition of India’s contribution to these and other developments and, in turn, reflects the expectations of the international community from India. This support is also reflected in the formal endorsement for the UNSC non-permanent seat we received from the Asian Group in February 2010.

Let me now turn briefly to our priorities during our term in the UN Security Council.

The UN Security Council is at the centre of global politics. It is the principal organ of the United Nations entrusted with the maintenance of international peace and security. India’s traditional wisdom and desire to contribute to international peace and amity will result in our being the voice of moderation and constructive engagement in the decisions of the Security Council.

We live in a troubled neighbourhood. Our immediate priorities in the Council will include peace and stability in our near and extended neighbourhood, including Afghanistan, the Middle East and Africa, Counter-terrorism, including the prevention of the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction to non-state actors, and the strengthening UN peacekeeping.

It is of significance to note that, for the first time, the Security Council will witness the simultaneous presence of all BRIC [Brazil, Russia, India, China] and IBSA [India, Brazil, South Africa] countries, and three of the four G4 countries {India, Brazil and Germany}. The Council will also include a number of developing countries with which we have close ties as well as some of our global strategic partners.

India will also continue to work with like-minded countries and groups for bringing about much needed structural reform to the UN Security Council.

India offers a unique and unparalleled example of nation-building. We are willing to share our experience in nation-building with the world.

I have absolutely no doubt that we will utilize our tenure to provide a sense of satisfaction to all our partners and obtain their reaffirmation of the need for a permanent presence for India on the Security Council.

Membership of the UN Security Council, of course, entails higher responsibility. We will live up to that. India will also not only bring ability but add to the legitimacy of the Security Council and be pro-active on tackling the scourge of terrorism and strengthening the UN's peacekeeping and peace-building efforts. We will demonstrate to the international community that India on the Security Council is good for the world.

As a founding member of the United Nations, India is fully committed to the principles and purposes of the UN. As the world's largest democracy, a major contributor to UN peacekeeping operations, strong votary of the rights of developing countries, advocate for human rights and the rule of law, universal disarmament and respect for international law, voice of moderation and firm believer in the peaceful settlement of disputes, India has excellent credentials to serve on the UN Security Council. During its forthcoming term in the Security Council, India will discharge its obligations as a responsible member of the international community by remaining fully and actively engaged on all issues before the Council.

Thank you.
613. Press Conference by External Affairs Minister S. M. Krishna on India's election to UN Security Council.

New Delhi, October 12, 2010.

Official Spokesperson (Shri Vishnu Prakash): A very good evening to you and welcome. It is wonderful to see you in numbers at this hour. I am sure you all are awaiting the news from New York or may have already heard it. It is indeed a very big day for Indian diplomacy.

We have a bonus in XP Division. We get an opportunity for the first time to welcome External Affairs Minister Shri S.M. Krishna to XP Division and to the Media Hall in Shastri Bhavan. Let me also welcome back Foreign Secretary Shrimati Nirupama Rao. We also are joined by two of our colleagues who I would like to introduce. To the right of Foreign Secretary is our Additional Secretary (IO) Mr. Dilip Sinha; and to my left is Mr. Rajiva Misra, Joint Secretary (UNES).

The External Affairs Minister would be making an opening statement and thereafter would be happy to take a few questions. May I invite the External Affairs Minister to please address us?

External Affairs Minister (Shri S.M. Krishna): Friends, Good evening to all of you. I appreciate your presence here at this late hour in the evening.

India's traditional wisdom and desire to contribute to international peace and amity will result in our being the voice of moderation and constructive engagement in the decisions of the Security Council.

We live in a troubled neighbourhood. Our immediate priorities in the Council will include peace and stability in our near and extended neighbourhood, including Afghanistan, the Middle East and Africa, Counter-terrorism, including the prevention of the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction to non-state actors, and the strengthening UN peacekeeping.

It is of significance to note that, for the first time, the Security Council will witness the simultaneous presence of all BRIC (Brazil, Russia, India, China) and IBSA (India, Brazil, South Africa) countries, and three of the four G4 countries (India, Brazil and Germany). The Council will also include a number of developing countries with which we have close ties as well as some of our global strategic partners.

India will also continue to work with like-minded countries and groups for bringing about much needed structural reform to the UN Security Council.
India offers a unique and unparalleled example of nation-building. We are willing to share our experience in nation-building with the world.

I have absolutely no doubt that we will utilize our tenure to provide a sense of satisfaction to all our partners and obtain their reaffirmation of the need for a permanent presence for India on the Security Council.

Membership of the UN Security Council, of course, entails higher responsibility. We will live up to that. India will also not only bring ability but add to the legitimacy of the Security Council and be pro-active on tackling the scourge of terrorism and strengthening the UN's peacekeeping and peace-building efforts. We will demonstrate to the international community that India on the Security Council is good for the world.

As a founding member of the United Nations, India is fully committed to the principles and purposes of the UN. As the world's largest democracy, a major contributor to UN peacekeeping operations, strong votary of the rights of developing countries, advocate for human rights and the rule of law, universal disarmament and respect for international law, voice of moderation and firm believer in the peaceful settlement of disputes, India has excellent credentials to serve on the UN Security Council. During its forthcoming term in the Security Council, India will discharge its obligations as a responsible member of the international community by remaining fully and actively engaged on all issues before the Council.

Thank you.

Question: Sir, first congratulations! It is an important day for Indian diplomacy. A 187 suggests that a lot of the coffee club countries have also supported India's seat at the UN Security Council. Do you think that this is an indication that when the time comes the same coffee club countries would also be supportive of a permanent membership for India at the Security Council? And, in relation to this question, how did Pakistan vote today?

External Affairs Minister: Taking the last question first, it was a secret ballot. So, we do not know how countries have voted. But nonetheless we had made efforts with all friendly countries including Pakistan, to vote for us. And incidentally Pakistan happens to be in the Asian Group and we were representing the Asian Group.
To respond to the other question, I think efforts are on to bring about structural reforms of not only the Security Council but the United Nations itself. It has been going on for some time. And, for the first time, I think more than 140 countries subscribed to a text-based negotiations, I think this April and May. So, when I was in New York I had a meeting with a few countries who are sponsoring the reforms in the Security Council which would include Brazil, Japan, Germany, that is, the G4 countries.

It will take quite some time before we can get the support of the permanent members of the Security Council to the stand that we have taken, that is, to reorganize the structure of the Security Council itself. It is a painstaking effort and it needs hard bargaining, negotiations, engagement with the permanent members and India certainly will continue this effort, and we will be relentless in our efforts.

Question: Minister, the fact that India, Germany, Brazil and South Africa, four of the five aspirants for the permanent membership of UNSC would be on the Council - is this fact likely to influence the way the UNSC is going to function during this two-year term? And how confident are you of persuading the world to go for major UN reforms including expansion of the UN Security Council.

External Affairs Minister: The overwhelming response that they have been able to get is certainly an indication as a fact and also a vindication of the fact that the growing profile of India is coming to be understood by the rest of the world and we will certainly continue this effort. And India will work with other likeminded countries to bring about reforms in the Security Council structure.

Question: Sir, looking at the support which we have got in the election, a 187 countries as you say just announced, what do you think of the stiff opposition which we face so far as the seat in UNSC is concerned by China and the US? Do you think that this particular position which we get here, we will be able to persuade these two nations? Secondly, in India we have 71 nations here for the Commonwealth Games here. In the language of Commonwealth Games, do you think it is a gold, silver or bronze?

External Affairs Minister: It all depends upon how responsibly and objectively we function as a member of the Security Council. Much depends upon India's performance. Much depends upon how we conduct ourselves with a degree of objectivity that we can bring into every issue that comes up before the Security Council. Perhaps on that we should be able to convey to the rest of the countries who are yet to repose the kind of confidence, the kind of trust that overwhelming number of countries have reposed.

On the second question, I think that is for you to judge.

Question: US President Barak Obama is going to be in India in a few weeks' time. Are we expecting an unambiguous declaration of American support for our candidacy for a permanent seat in the Security Council?

External Affairs Minister: A number of bilateral issues will certainly come up for discussion between Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and President Obama. And then they will also discuss some of these aspects of the reformation in the United Nations structure, particularly about the Security Council. So, we are looking forward to President Obama's visit to India.

Question: Sir, is it your sense that old permanent members of the UNSC are equally rigid in opposing expansion of UNSC with some countries opposing more vehemently than the others?

External Affairs Minister: The vote has taken place just now. The counting is just over. So, we will have to await the report from our Permanent Mission in New York as to how the voting took place, what could be the pattern that we can, I think those assessments will be made both by me and our colleagues in the Foreign Office and also you.

Question: Sir, this time all throughout the UNGA session we saw Pakistan raise the issue of Kashmir on various platforms, in particular your Pakistani counterpart as well. Now as a country the objective remains a permanent seat on the high table. What would you describe the approach on the issue? Secondly, with China being an all-weather friend for Pakistan, reports coming out that the Pakistan would in all possible ways block try and block such aspirations. Does that worry us?

External Affairs Minister: With reference to Pakistan, we would like cordial relations with Pakistan. We have made every effort at every stage to be good neighbours with Pakistan, and we expect that there would be reciprocity from Pakistan. I have invited Foreign Minister Qureshi to visit India when I was in Islamabad, and he has agreed to come to India at my invitation. We will look forward to his visit to India and, therefore, we will try to enlarge the areas of cooperation between India and Pakistan and perhaps reduce the areas of differences. Then, with reference to China, we have a cordial and a good working relationship with China, and we certainly will continue in that direction to strengthen that constructive relationship that we have with China.

Question: Sir, you mentioned in your opening address about our immediate priorities being peace and stability in the neighbourhood including Afghanistan. What are your plans regarding Afghanistan? Do we see a shift in policy, an increased military role?

External Affairs Minister: Our Afghanistan stand has been always consistent and very clear. Any solution to the Afghan problem will have to be Afghan led and it has to be Afghan initiated. India will continue to support the duly elected Government of Afghanistan headed by President Karzai. We would like to strengthen his hands and then we would like the rule of law to prevail in that country. And then we in our own way are constructively engaged in Afghanistan to improve the lot of the people of that nation.

Question: For long many years we have been aspiring for a permanent seat in the Security Council. Do you think that this step will strengthen your case for a permanent seat or you wanted it as an assessment of the stature of India?

External Affairs Minister: I think this is a step forward in that direction. And as I said earlier, it all depends upon how responsibly we conduct ourselves, how objectively we take our stand on issues that come up for consideration before the Security Council.

Question: Sir, do you think India will be able to play its required role in the United Nations without a veto power?

External Affairs Minister: Veto power is very rarely used, isn't it, as we have known. It is a very big question mark whether one needs the veto power in order to be effective as a member of the Security Council.

Question: Sir, do you think this seat on the UNSC helps us leverage on the world stage to present our views vis-à-vis Afghanistan and also the terrorism we face from Pakistan? I would like you to give us a sense of how much you think it gives us a greater voice or a greater leverage on the world stage so that we can express our own perspective on what we feel is happening in Afghanistan and secondly from the terrorism coming from Pakistan.

External Affairs Minister: All these issues will certainly be taken up as and when situations arise, and when certain eventualities or such a situation arises, then India will take the right stand.

Question: Sir, there are reports that after the Cabinet meeting today you, Mr. Moily, and Mr. Kharge stayed on for a while. Apart from Karnataka, which surely must have been discussed, if you could tell us that of course, were there any final directions from the Prime Minister on this UNSC issue?

External Affairs Minister: I was not a part of that particular ‘coffee club.’ I was again called by the Prime Minister, so I went inside. I do not know what happened between Mr. Moily and Mr. Kharge.

Question: Sir, 187 members have voted for India. My sources tell me that you either personally spoke or at some point of time met at least 150 of them and flashed through. Is there any express intent by any of the permanent members, have they expressed support in any manner to support India for a permanent seat?

External Affairs Minister: I think in the last one and a half years we have had discussions with a number of Foreign Ministers. Not only I have had discussions with Foreign Ministers visiting, or when we met in a multilateral forum like the United Nations, or SAARC, or ASEAN, or various other forums, but our Embassies are in constant touch with the foreign countries. Also, our Foreign Office here is in constant touch with the Embassies of various countries. So, the credit for this magic number of 187 should be shared by the Foreign Office, all those who are involved in it, and by our Embassies, and then of course the Permanent Mission in New York. I think they have done extremely well. Let us say three cheers to them.

Question: Sir, you used the term bargaining when you talked of some of the things that might be done in the future in terms of getting us a permanent seat. What exactly would we be bargaining with?
External Affairs Minister: But we do engage ourselves with various Foreign Ministers and we try to convince them of the desirability of having India as a permanent member of the Security Council, and we will continue that effort relentlessly. We are in good company of Brazil, Japan and Germany. So, as G4 we will continue to put in our efforts to drive home the point that the United Nations will have to reflect the contemporary realities of today's world. The present UN structure was conceived in 1945. We are in the first decade of the 21st century. So, the whole world has changed. It is a new global system that has emerged. New countries in Africa, in Asia and in Latin America have emerged. So, the United Nations will have to reflect these contemporary developments and we hope that we will be able to convince the powers that are.

A question was earlier asked as to amongst the permanent members how many supported. I think at this point of time UK and France have supported our candidature for a permanent seat.

Question: Sir, in your opening statement you said that India will be proactive. Also you said that on certain issues you will be aggressive. I wanted to know how you would elaborate this pro-activeness in reference with- you said that India will be more aggressive than usual in its foreign policy,- because normally on an international stage we have normally nonalignment. Will we continue to stick to this nonalignment for broader policies?

External Affairs Minister: We are in the forefront of the nonaligned movement. We were in Sharm al-Sheikh participating in the nonaligned meet. Nonalignment is the policy of the Government of India. It is one of the basic pillars of India's foreign policy and we certainly will continue with that.

Question: We all know you follow lawn tennis as a sport. Do you describe this victory as a victory into the semifinals before the finals?

External Affairs Minister: I would just say it is something like what Somdev Devvarman did in the Commonwealth Games.

Question: You started your opening remarks by saying that India's priority is peace, stability in the extended region, tackling terrorism and the issue of Pakistan. Would India ever consider pushing for UN Security Council resolution on terror against Pakistan?
External Affairs Minister: I think the question itself is very speculative in nature. I have said that India will conduct itself very responsibly because the responsibilities that have been showered on us are very difficult, onerous, and we will have to weigh every step that we take. So, I would not like to answer hypothetical questions. Depending upon how a particular issue, whether it is terrorism or something else, comes up before the Security Council, this much I can say that India will be very objective in its assessment and then its stand.

Question: Mr. Minister, with Kashmir issue being raised by Pakistan and the UN Secretary-General describing the situation as grave, do you think that despite your presence in the Security Council, Kashmir would be brought back to the centre stage in the coming days?

External Affairs Minister: Very recently the Kashmir question did come up in the United Nations. Pakistan had its say. India had its stand elaborated. So, there is no hard feeling. I think we stated the positions that the respective countries have taken and we will continue to do the same.

Question: Sir, you said India is good for the world in the United Nations Security Council. You expressed so much of faith to be in the UN Security Council. But many countries like the Arab world have lost faith in the Security Council when it comes to the Palestinian issues. As you said you will be more proactive in that. France has indicated that they may bring back the Palestinian issues to the United Nations Security Council. Do you see India playing a proactive role in this issue?

External Affairs Minister: Even on the Palestinian issue India has taken the stand in support of Palestine and we will continue with that stand. Whether we are in the Security Council or outside, our stand continues, and it is consistent with our stated policies.

Question: Question on Iran. Iran is likely to come up in the UN Security Council yet again even though we had a Resolution that was passed earlier this year. We have traditionally not supported sanctions against Iran. Yet all sanctions against Iran have been unanimous from the UN Security Council. How would you characterize India's position on Iran issue?
External Affairs Minister: On sanctions India's position is fairly well known. On Iran we have had occasions to exercise our vote on one or other occasion. So, India will certainly take a constructive view. We believe that all questions between nations will have to be resolved by mutual discussions. And India will continue to work in that direction.

Question: Previously India, not being a member of the Security Council, was not taking bold positions on such issues outside the region including Kosovo. Now can we expect that we can hear Indian position on whether Kosovo should become a separate state? And can we expect some position the breakaway Republics like Abkhazia, South Ossetia also?

External Affairs Minister: On all these questions, depending upon how they will come up before the Security Council, India will take a stand which is consistent and in keeping with the stand that we as a nation have taken.

A question was asked about Russia when I mentioned about the United Kingdom and France. Russia has expressed support for India's candidature in principle but feels that reform should be undertaken only after a broad consensus, which would mean when more than two-thirds support, has been achieved for the reforms. So, within those parameters Russia has expressed its support.

Official Spokesperson: Thank you very much. Have a good night.

New York, October 21, 2010.

Mr. President,

Allow me to begin by reaffirming India's conviction in your leadership of the 65th UN General Assembly.

I also take this opportunity to warmly thank Member States for electing India as a member of the UN Security Council for the term 2011-12.

India aligns itself with the statement delivered by Yemen on behalf of G-77.

India welcomes the theme you have chosen for the current General Assembly—"Reaffirming the central role of the United Nations in global governance".

A stronger United Nations, reflective of contemporary realities is, indeed, the need of the hour.

This would ensure that the imperatives of maintaining international peace and security are addressed and there is an integrated and coordinated follow up of the UN development agenda.

The United Nations conferences and summits held since the 1990s have generated an unprecedented global consensus on a shared vision of development.

This common understanding was emphatically reiterated at the high level events on MDGs, Mauritius Strategy for Implementation and biodiversity held in September 2010 in New York.

The MDG Declaration clearly articulated that allocation of resources, developing appropriate national and international policies and integrated follow up and implementation are an absolute imperative for the realization of our cherished millennium goals by 2015.

Interlinkages and overlaps between the various UN development summits and conferences are strong.
The Mauritius Strategy for Implementation would derive immense benefits and strength from a comprehensive, ambitious and equitable outcome of the Climate Change negotiations.

Similarly, the Conference of Parties of the Convention on Biological Diversity underway in Nagoya, Japan must fully address the various social and economic development challenges along with its core environmental concerns so as to maximize from the global action to protect biodiversity loss.

Mr. President,

Multiple UN conferences and summits focused on attainment of Internationally Agreed Development Goals must have a seamless, holistic and integrated working relationship with each other.

We must work for developing work models that ensure synergetic resource flows, coordinated assessment and planning and a holistic approach to our global development programmes.

In this context, India sees the creation of UN Women as an important step toward an integrated approach to development within the UN.

The strengthened interaction and institutional linkages between the ECOSOC and the Peace Building Commission are also equally encouraging.

Our successful follow up efforts on pivotal Conferences having significant bearing on global development goals such as the Monterrey Consensus and the June 2009 UN Conference on Global Financial and Economic crisis deserve special mention. We must sustain these efforts.

It is, however, important to remember that no one size fits all and it is imperative that national priorities of countries always have primacy in the pursuance of the development agenda by UN bodies.

Mr. President,

India fully realizes the importance of a strong global partnership supported by international and national development strategies on trade, debt, investment, technology transfer, food security, energy access, climate change and host of other issues to create an environment conducive to development.

India will push for an ambitious, comprehensive and equitable outcome at the Climate Change negotiations; one that is based on the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

We also look forward to a development oriented outcome of the DOHA Round.

To ensure that international policies are pro-development, concerns of developing countries in the formulation and implementation of these policies must be effectively taken on board.

Unfortunately, current institutional structures do not permit this, even though developing countries are the most affected ones.

The economic crisis highlighted the grave imbalance in the structures of global governance, including on the economic side. India, along with fellow developing countries, has been in the forefront to demand a greater voice in the Bretton Woods Institutions.

In order to make this process as inclusive as possible, the United Nations, with its unique position has a key role. But, as I mentioned earlier, it needs urgent reform.

And, no-where is this more needed in the UN than in the Security Council, which must be expanded in both the permanent and non-permanent categories as is the desire of an overwhelming majority of UN Member-States.

I am glad that the 64th UN General Assembly decided that the text based negotiations must be immediately taken up in the 65th session. It is important that these negotiations are progressed on an urgent basis.

The United Nations system also cannot be strengthened without revitalizing the General Assembly. Here too I am glad that in the resolution on this subject adopted in the 64th session, for the first time in several years, there was some progress.

Mr. President,
The Economic and Social Council has a crucial role in fostering a comprehensive development agenda of the United Nations through an integrated and coordinated implementation of its commitments.

The Council has an acknowledged role as a principal body for coordination, policy review, policy dialogue and recommendations on issues of economic and social development.

It is satisfying that the Annual Ministerial Review and the Development Cooperation Forum of the Economic and Social Council have become important events to review efforts to achieve the Internationally Agreed Development Goals including MDGs.

The July 2010 ECOSOC session focused on promoting greater coherence between policy and development goals, and making development partnership more participatory and transparent.

Over the years, ECOSOC has played an important role in advancing a holistic and coordinated approach to global economic and social development taking into account the inter-relatedness of the different goals and targets of major UN conferences.

We must work to make ECOSOC even more meaningful than what was originally envisaged by the UN Charter and subsequently strengthened by the various UN resolutions, particularly resolution 61/16.

Mr. President,

My delegation looks forward to your proposals to strengthen the centrality of the UN system in global governance and its development role. You can count on our express support in this regard.

I thank you.
INDIA’S FOREIGN RELATIONS - 2010
SECTION - XI
INDIA AT THE UNITED NATIONS
615. Intervention by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, During the Informal Plenary: Exchange 2 of the Fourth Round of Negotiations on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council Reform and Related Matters at the 64th UNGA.

Mr. Chairman,

Thank you for giving me the floor.

Permit me to also compliment your efforts at guiding the process of intergovernmental negotiations.

The courage, leadership and commitment that you have displayed have played an invaluable role. We count on your continued guidance in making genuine progress at the earliest.

Mr. Chairman,

As we meet here today, in this first meeting in a new decade, there is a palpable sense that we are at the cusp of a possible decisive phase in the reform process.

Developments over the past month since we last met have clearly underscored the consensus that exists on urgently moving forward on UNSC reform, particularly through text-based negotiations.

Driving this momentum has, of course, been the letter co-signed by 139 countries, including my own. We appreciate that you have recognized the historic nature of this initiative and circulated it along with your letter.

The purport of the letter is simple. It seeks to empower you to move the negotiation process forward by presenting a text that can serve as the basis for negotiations.
We are encouraged that the UFC countries and others have also supported this initiative and expressed their readiness to engage in text-based negotiations.

This clearly demonstrates the across-the-board desire for taking immediate actions towards transformative change in the UNSC.

The fact that the current composition and structure of the UNSC does not permit it to address the challenges of the 21st century is beyond question.

It is imperative that any remedy to this must be commensurate with the scale and depth of the problem and truly address the shortcomings.

It is no use providing palliatives for the symptoms rather than treating the underlying malaise.

It is only through genuine and comprehensive reform that such underlying problems can be addressed.

And we all must acknowledge such a reform needs to make the UNSC reflect contemporary realities, including through an expansion in its permanent membership and non-permanent membership, and an improvement in its working methods.

This is the view that the overwhelming majority shares, and has been reflected repeatedly in the negotiations till now.

Tinkering with the margins will not lead us to our common goal of genuine reform. This has been tried in the past, without success.

It is crucial that we all come together to ensure that this key organ of the UN, and indeed the UN at large, does not become irrelevant because it could not adapt to the times.

Mr. Chairman,

The entire membership now looks to you for providing at the earliest a document that can be the basis for negotiations.

We are happy at your clarification that the next round of negotiations will be text based.
This text must faithfully reflect the progress made in the negotiations from March last year. This would be in keeping with the unanimous decision 63/565 that we adopted last September, wherein we decided to build on the progress achieved in the negotiations during the 63rd session.

And while it is useful to hold consultations on the possible contours of such a text, we must caution against procedural discussions blocking the common desire for urgent movement.

I would like to take this opportunity to respond in an interactive mode to the comments made earlier today to illustrate that we must not enter into procedural discussions that could slow down our progress.

One of my colleagues stated that the ratio of permanent to non-permanent members must remain at 1:2, and hence argued against creating 6 new permanent members. However, when the UNSC was created, there were 5 permanent members and 6 non permanent members viz. a ratio of 5:6.

A review was mandated after 10 years. Yet, in 1963, all that the mandated review was able to achieve was an enlargement of the non-permanent membership from 6 to 10.

Do we seriously believe, 27 years later, that a similar tinkering will help restore the credibility of the UNSC and achieve genuine reform?

The other issue relates to signatories of the letter co-signed by 139 countries. This needs to be placed in perspective.

This was not an initiative of a "small group of countries", but rather captured the sentiment of a large number of countries to break the impasse on UNSC reform. I personally canvassed support for it, including among members of the UFC, as my distinguished friend from Pakistan graciously admitted.

The list of signatories is still open, and any delegation that feels it was not invited is free to sign-up even now. Even after the letter was delivered, some delegations have signed and more may be forthcoming.
The third point is that the letter has sent a clear message, though it was not its original intent, that those who are opposed to reform per se should reconsider their position.

In our view, the simplest way to proceed would be through a text, with options that have some reasonable degree of support, and hence the potential to become an area of convergence.

Naturally, all the proposals made would remain on the table. Perhaps these could be presented as an annex to the negotiating text.

Mr. Chairman,

During this fourth round, you have requested us to identify areas of convergence.

It is now clear that there is complete convergence on the need for a negotiating text by the Chair. Discussions on details of proposals should be relegated to the text-based negotiating stage.

We, therefore, look forward to such a negotiating text well before the fifth round of negotiations commence.

We should be cognizant, Mr. Chairman, that after 15 years of meandering around in the OEWG process, and at the end of four rounds of intergovernmental negotiations that have clarified positions of all delegations, the membership at large is now eagerly waiting to engage in real negotiations based on a text.

This is a truly significant development in the long and arduous road of UNSC reform.

We are confident that with your continued effort, a decisive breakthrough can take place soon. It is important that we take the necessary steps to impart an irreversible momentum to the process.

My delegation has full confidence in your ability to provide the necessary catalyst through a text for negotiations.

Thank you.
616. Intervention by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative at the Meeting of the Organizational Committee of the Peacebuilding Commission.

Mr. Chairman,

Since this is the first time that my delegation is taking the floor this year, let me wish you, the PBSO and all the other delegations gathered here a very successful new year.

Let me express my gratitude to Ambassador Heraldo Munoz for his work as Chair of the Commission for 2009, especially the whole idea of enhancing the visibility of the Commission, not only among the international community but also in the real world. Peacebuilding is a peculiarly UN-centric word but the idea and concepts are of great relevance to peace and development and hence the importance to connect it to the real world.

I would also like to join the others and congratulate the new Chairperson of the Commission, H.E. Dr. Peter Wittig, the Permanent Representative of Germany as well as the new Vice Chairs, the Permanent Representative of the Czech Republic and the Permanent Representative of Benin as well as other officers including the Chairs of the various country-specific configurations for assumption of their responsibilities. I am also glad to see someone with the rich qualifications and experience like Ms. Judy Cheng Hopkins at the helm of affairs at the Secretariat office.

On behalf of our delegation, I wish to assure of all possible support from India.

Mr. Chairman,

This year is a particularly important year for the PBC when we will be undertaking a review of the work of the Commission in the three years since its inception. Our delegation hopes that the review will result in adoption of necessary changes to the peacebuilding architecture which will make it more responsive to the immediate and long-term needs of countries recovering from conflicts.
We are interested in identifying means and ways that enable the PBC to fulfill, in its entirety, its mandate articulated in General Assembly Resolution A/RES/60/180 and Security Council Resolution S/RES/1645 of December 2005.

We should be particularly active in involving the national governments by enabling national ownership of the process. This will help deliver more on the ground and reap the benefits of the peace dividend in post-conflict societies.

Mr. Chairman,

India has a unique experience of nation-building in a large, complex and most diverse setting as we have strived to give our people a better life. This has allowed us to develop multifaceted capacities relevant to peacebuilding and development. We have shared this experience and expertise in a number of countries transiting from conflict to peace. We are very happy to continue to make available our capabilities in nation building to countries in post-conflict situations and cooperate with the United Nations’ in its peacebuilding activities, including for development, social sector reform and rule of law and security.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to stress the need for ensuring that the work that we do here helps the countries in the process of transition from conflict to peacebuilding, consolidation and institutional building, in particular by helping to retain the interest of the international community in such countries, even after the peacekeeping phase has been crossed. In our view, the sine qua non of peacebuilding is to ensure that all the available resources that are geared towards peacebuilding in post-conflict situations are properly harnessed in the shortest possible time which responds to the needs of the country concerned.

Thank You.
617. Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative, at the Handover Ceremony of the Chairmanship of the Group of 77.

Mr. Chairman,

Before I begin on the formal part of our presence here, I would like to convey our deepest condolences to Haiti, and to all other countries whose nationals that have suffered the devastating calamity in Haiti.

Let me underscore that India stands with the people of Haiti in its time of need. We have no doubt that Haiti, with the support of the international community, will be successful in its courageous efforts to rebuild itself.

Mr. Chairman

Permit me to felicitate Your Excellency on Yemen’s election as Chairman of the Group of 77. My delegation wishes you all success in your important efforts during this year. You can count on our continued support in your endeavours.

I would also like to thank Sudan for its leadership of the Group during 2009, a year that presented enormous challenges to the collective interests of developing countries.

Be it the financial and economic crisis, climate change, South-South cooperation or budgetary issues here at the United Nations, 2009 was indeed a year in which the solidarity and unity of the G-77 was tested.

We should take particular satisfaction that despite these challenges, the G-77 remained united and emerged stronger.

This is not to gloss over the undeniable divergence of interests in such a diverse Group as this. However, the success of this group has been, and will continue to be, in its ability to forge common positions based on shared interests, solidarity and a sense of common destiny.

It is important that this spirit of unity and solidarity among developing countries be maintained and strengthened. This is key to ensure the continued success of this Group.
However, we must be cautious against complacency. Despite signs of recovery in some of our economies, the impact of the crisis continues to be with us, particularly in the poorest and most vulnerable amongst us. We need to continue to focus on the needs and concerns of such countries, including the Least Developed Countries, the Landlocked Developing Countries, the Small Island Developing States, the African countries, among others. In this context, the G-77 must continue to be active the work of the ad-hoc working group on the financial and economic crisis.

In the area of climate change, as we move towards Mexico, the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities as well as UN Framework Convention on Climate Change and the Kyoto Protocol must continue to guide our work. In this context, it is essential that the two-track approach towards the AWG-KP and AWG-LCA processes lead to an ambitious and equitable outcome. We also need to ensure that the needs for financial and technological transfer are met and the specific needs of SIDS, LDCs and the African continent are addressed. As a group, the G-77 must work diligently to protect its interests with a sense of purpose and remain together. Though the road ahead will be difficult, the unity and solidarity of the group is critical. We have no doubt, that you will well steer this process. Let me also assure you of our full support and whatever we can do to assist you in your endeavours on this important issue.

We also have the high-level meeting in September on the MDGs. This meeting, and its outcome document, will be important in charting the course ahead till 2015. It is imperative that developing country concerns are articulated in a coherent and forceful manner in this process.

We also look forward to the important meeting review to review the Mauritius Strategy for sustainable development of SIDS.

Overall, it is quite clear that 2010 will also be a very challenging year for our Group and we need to continue to work together. Let me, therefore, wish Yemen the very best, and reiterate our continued support to the G-77.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.
Mr. Chairman,

As I am taking the floor for the first time this year in a G-77 meeting, please allow me, at the outset, to congratulate you on your election as Chair of the Group of 77 for 2010.

This is yet another challenging year for our Group with many a critical multilateral negotiation staring us in the face. I have no doubt your vast experience will allow you to provide the Group leadership that will allow a successful pursuance of the common interests of the developing countries. Please be assured of my delegation's full support in your efforts.

I would also like to thank you for your initiative in organizing today's meeting on the very important and topical issue of climate change. It is vital that the G-77 remains actively engaged in unity on this issue that has very significant implications for all of us.

Mr. Chairman,

India, like other developing countries, faces enormous development challenges.

Nearly 200 million of our citizens live on less than US $1 a day and nearly 500 million do not have access to modern sources of energy. Our overriding priority, therefore, has to be eradication of poverty.

Yet, like many other developing countries, we are among the worst affected by climate change.

India, therefore, has a major interest in ensuring that climate change is addressed substantively and constructively. Hence our repeated assertions that we would like to be part of the solution.
We are voluntarily and proactively undertaking numerous measures to address climate change. We have a detailed National Action Plan on climate change.

Key elements of the Plan include enhancing solar energy production to 20,000 MW by 2022, accelerating afforestation, promoting sustainable agriculture, utilizing clean coal technologies, mandating fuel efficiency standards, establishing a nation-wide climate observatory network that will also involve the launch of our own satellite next year, and improving energy efficiency.

While our economy already has one of the lowest emissions intensity, we have set ourselves a voluntary domestic target to further reduce emissions intensity by 20-25% by 2020 on 2005 levels. This has also been conveyed to the UNFCCC Secretariat in terms of the relevant provisions of the UNFCCC.

However, Mr. Chairman, there cannot be any renegotiation or dilution of the principles and provisions of the UNFCCC, in particular the principle of equity and common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

Mr. Chairman,

In December 2007 the international community decided to start negotiations under the UNFCCC to enhance its implementation, the so-called LCA track. It was also decided to proceed apace with the negotiations under the Kyoto Protocol for quantified emission reduction commitments of Annex I parties for the period beyond 2012.

It is imperative that these two tracks of negotiations, under the UNFCCC and under its Kyoto Protocol, together known as the Bali Road Map, proceed in an invigorated manner and deliver on ambitious and equitable outcomes in Mexico at the end of this year. We cannot accept attempts to simply do-away with the Kyoto Protocol, which must continue to deliver as a valid legal instrument and Parties to the Protocol should deliver on their solemn commitments under the Protocol.
Moreover, efforts to address climate change must be firmly embedded in a demonstrably equitable access to atmospheric space for every citizen of the globe, with adequate finance and technology available to all developing countries.

It is imperative that the G-77 remains united in pursuing these common objectives. The solidarity that has been the bedrock of this diverse Group must be maintained and strengthened.

Mr. Chairman,

To brainstorm on climate change negotiations post Copenhagen India organized a meeting of the Environment Ministers of Brazil, South Africa, India and China, the BASIC countries, in New Delhi on January 24, 2010. We had invited the Chair of the G-77 but unfortunately, and as you are aware, the Honorable Environment Minister of Yemen could not attend.

In their joint statement, the BASIC countries re-emphasized the importance of the G-77 working closely together and their own commitment in this regard. They underscored the centrality of the UNFCCC process and the COP decisions to carry forward the negotiations on the two tracks of the AWG-LCA and the AWG-KP leading up to COP-16 and COP/MOP 6 in Mexico. They also stressed that all negotiations must be conducted in an inclusive and transparent manner.

In this regard, the BASIC countries called upon the COP President to convene the two negotiating groups next month and to ensure that the AWGs meet at least 5 times before the Mexico Conference.

The BASIC countries also called for urgent action by developed countries to ensure the flow of US$ 10 billion in 2010 for financing adaptation, with focus on LDCs, SIDS and African countries.

As regards the Copenhagen Accord, while acknowledging that this was a high-level political understanding among the participants on some of the contentious issues, they hoped that it would facilitate the two-track negotiating process under the Bali Roadmap.
In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me quote my Prime Minister, who said at Copenhagen that whatever emerges from the negotiations must address the glaring injustice that those worst affected by climate change are the least responsible for it.

This injustice is acute to countries of Africa, to the LDCs, and to the SIDS whose very survival as viable nation states is in jeopardy. The G-77 must remain united as we strive to redress this injustice.

Thank you.

619. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative at the Sixteenth Session of the High-level Committee on South-South Cooperation.

Mr. President,

We offer our felicitations to you and other members of the Bureau on your election and thank the outgoing Bureau for the work accomplished over the last two years.

We align ourselves with the statement delivered by the distinguished Permanent Representative of Yemen on behalf of the G-77 and China.

India welcomes the Nairobi Outcome Document adopted at the High-Level UN Conference on South-South Cooperation held in Kenya from 1-3 December, 2009. We call for its full and effective implementation to really strengthen South-South Cooperation.

Mr. President,

India’s approach to South-South Cooperation has been moulded by our own experience in nation building. We have, therefore, been a steadfast believer in South-South Cooperation. This constitutes a fundamental pillar of our external policy. For decades, we have endeavored to share our experiences and knowledge with our fellow countries from the South treading similar paths of development. This has taken several forms.

As early as 1964, India recognized that capacity building is a key development need, and established the Indian Technical and Economic Co-operation (ITEC) Programme as an important means of channelizing India's technical assistance to fellow developing countries. This flagship programme covers 158 developing partner countries with over 5000 participants being offered training in 200 courses spread across 42 leading institutions each year in a wide range of areas from hi-tech like IT, S&T, pharmaceuticals to agriculture, rural development, SMEs, etc. The ITEC programme is demand-driven and response-oriented.

We are happy that today we are also able to extend our partnership in a significant manner financially. Our annual outlay on concessional lending and grants is over US$ 1 billion, covering countries in our region, in Africa and beyond. In addition, US$ 5 billion has been extended as lines of credit since 2003.

Apart from countries in our neighborhood, we have a rich agenda of technical cooperation with Africa, a continent with which we have age-old ties, that currently spans several initiatives including the path-breaking Pan African E-network project and the TEAM-9 initiative focused on West Africa that seeks to bridge the 'digital divide' between Africa and the rest of the world. The Government of India has extended over US$ 3 billion concessional lines of credit to countries in Africa. During the India-Africa Forum Summit held in April 2008 in New Delhi, we had announced additional lines of credit of US$ 5.4 billion for the next five years. Further, on the same occasion, we had proposed to undertake projects against grants in excess of US$ 500 million over the next 5 - 6 years. These are being implemented in consultation with our African partners. We have also unilaterally agreed to duty free and quota free market access to goods from 34 Least Developed Countries in Africa.

Furthermore, India has endeavored to be of assistance in times of humanitarian crisis both in our region and beyond. Recently, as a token of our solidarity with the people of Haiti, we have contributed US$ 5 million for relief measures following the earthquake.
The IBSA initiative undertaken by India, Brazil, and South Africa is another manifestation of our commitment to South-South Cooperation. IBSA is intensifying its partnership efforts in several regions across the developing world and more initiatives are in the pipeline.

Mr. President,

India is committed to doing more in the coming years with our partners in the South and stepping up our support to South-South Cooperation.

Our cooperation with fellow developing countries is premised on the principles of voluntary partnership, free from conditionalities that are typical of ODA, and are based on national ownership and in line with national priorities of our partners. We believe that South-South cooperation is a partnership in solidarity between developing countries involving sharing of experiences, expertise, knowledge and provision of assistance based on capacity to partner. Its paradigm, therefore, is distinct from that of North-South development cooperation.

We must also be clear that South-South cooperation cannot replace the critical need for enhanced and invigorated development cooperation from the North for developing countries to overcome their considerable development challenges. This is even more important as we draw close to the 2015 deadline for achieving the Millennium Development Goals.

The United Nations, with its universal membership and strong mandate for development, is uniquely placed to perform a catalytic role in this process. We hope to receive strong support from the UN development system in invigorating South-South Cooperation and triangular cooperation. We also hope that our developed country partners will strive to ensure that they meet their development cooperation commitments to help developing countries meet their development goals.

Thank You, Mr. President.

Mr. President,

India would like to thank the French Presidency for organizing this thematic debate on the issue of Peacekeeping. This is the fourth time in seven months that the Indian delegation is speaking in the Security Council on peacekeeping, a fact that attests to the centrality of this activity at the UN.

I would, at the outset, also like to thank the French delegation for their recent efforts that have led to improvements in the consultative mechanisms of peacekeeping. My delegation is appreciative of the spirit behind these initiatives. We also note with appreciation the efforts of DPKO to reach out to Member States in the ongoing work of developing operational concepts. I am optimistic that this spirit of cooperation will find reflection in the forthcoming deliberations of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations, the C-34.

The concept paper circulated by the French Presidency for today’s debate is comprehensive and useful.

My delegation would also like to take this opportunity to align itself with the statement made by the delegation of Morocco on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement.

Mr. President,

The Council today has to manage its primary responsibility of responding to threats to international peace and security, in an environment that has changed very substantially since 1945. The Council has to deal with situations that have complex multi-dimensional aetiologies. These cannot be labeled or categorized easily. They have also proved to be very tenacious and have defied straightforward solutions.
We are in this situation because the Council ever so often mandated operations without a clear understanding of what was required. In the rush to "do something", it got into a situation where objectives were confused. Mandates were unrealistic. Timeframes were too ambitious. A "band aid" approach was used and the resources allocated for the task, financial, logistical, and above all, human, were pegged at minimal levels. Our conclusions are reinforced by the joint DPKO-OCHA study on the Protection of Civilians, and I quote "confusion over the Council's intent is evident in the lack of policy, guidance, planning and preparedness." unquote

It is evident that the Council requires a new paradigm and new approaches if it is to discharge its responsibilities.

Mr. President,

We first need to recognize that there are no short-cuts to peacekeeping. We are not dealing with classical belligerents who are looking for a quick victory. We are dealing with forces that have a stake in continuing instability. We are dealing with forces that flourish in the absence of the rule of law and in the presence of violence and intimidation. We cannot deal with these forces unless we are committed for the long-haul. Transition and exit strategies need to be approached accordingly.

80% of UN peacekeeping resources, financial and manpower, are deployed in post-Colonial societies. The problems that they face are not unique and have been confronted in many nations in Asia and Africa. It stands to reason that successful post-colonial nation building experience is the most relevant in understanding how to approach successful management of complex peacekeeping operations.

I am proud to represent a nation which has been an active participant in UN peacekeeping since 1956 and has contributed more than 100,000 peacekeepers to 40 UN operations. I also speak on behalf of a country is a well-established and successful democratic polity that responds to the aspirations of one of the most diverse populations of the world; a country that is among the fastest growing economies of the world.

Imperialist thinking at the height of the colonial era described all such countries as ungovernable. Facts and history speak otherwise.
Mr. President,

Peacekeeping and peacebuilding are not mutually exclusive. It is our understanding that both need to continue simultaneously over extended periods of time. Precipitate withdrawal of peacekeepers is a recipe for disaster and is a temptation that should be avoided at all costs.

As a peacekeeping operation gathers momentum, it requires more resources - not less. The military component will have to be supplemented, and not supplanted, by police and rule of law capacity and a capacity for development administration. By development administration capacity, we mean the ability to respond to the basic aspirations of the people beyond law and order.

It is also important to remember that UN operations are essentially in aid of national authorities and national capacities. National authorities usually have a good idea of what they require. The Council and the Secretariat must not just listen more to national governments but also listen carefully.

There is no substitute for national capacities. The only role the UN can play is to help in creating conditions where these capacities can be exercised. We believe that support for national authorities is key in two areas. One is Security Sector Reform and the other is in provisions of primary inputs for socio-economic development.

Security Sector Reform in particular, needs far greater coordination, cohesiveness and unity of purpose. The training, equipment and working methods of national police and other rule of law institutions must be structured in a manner that is consonant with the wishes of national authorities and not the priorities of donors. In the case of economic development, national authorities, as the experience of the Peacebuilding Commission indicates, are capable of developing strategies and plans. What they need is resources and social investment.

Mr. President,

Peacekeeping, which is the main contribution of the United Nations to the maintenance of international peace and security, has a budget of US$ 7.8 billion. This is a little more than 0.5 per cent of worldwide military expenditures. The concept paper circulated by the Presidency points out,
MONUC has a ratio of 1 peacekeeper per 3500 inhabitants. This is also the equivalent of 1 peacekeeper every 120 sq.km. It needs very little imagination to grasp the utter insufficiency of 17,000 peacekeepers in the task of providing support to national authorities in an area of responsibility of the size of Western Europe.

It is evident that resources for peacekeeping are utterly inadequate.

It stands to logic that an increase in the number of quality troops is the first requirement. It also stands to logic that troops require proper equipment and enablers. We would like to see an increase in the deployment of police and rule of law capacities.

The current composition of the DPKO as it exists today does not have the capacity to plan for the nation-building activities that are central to peacebuilding. This capacity requires to be developed and will require a multi-disciplinary approach involving the development pillar of the UN and greater cooperation with countries in the global South.

Mr. President,

It is very difficult to use objective parameters to determine an exit point from complex peacekeeping operations. A peacekeeping operation will have succeeded if there is durable peace. Durable peace can only follow from a successful peace agreement. The conditions that can lead to a successful peace agreement are also difficult, if not impossible, to define. Peace processes and political settlements cannot be subjected to budgetary discipline and evaluation by administrators. The creation of peace, as we are all learning in many different parts of the world, is not a business process. It is a complicated political undertaking with many imponderables.

The Security Council is not bound by benchmarks on when and where it decides to intervene. Each decision is unique and subjective judgments are involved. Similar subjective judgments will be involved on when an operation can be wound up.

Mr. President,

I would like to conclude by referring to the issue of accountability. Should there not be an accountability requirement for those who mandate? Surely, their responsibility cannot end with the generation of mandates. If unachievable mandates are generated for political expediency or if adequate resources are not made available, who should bear responsibility? A deficit in the willingness and ability to enforce mandates is leading to an erosion of credibility of the UN.

Mr. President, let me thank you again for organizing this debate. India pays tribute to peacekeepers who have fallen, most recently in Haiti, and reiterates its commitment to contribute, through its peacekeepers and its national capacities, to the promotion of peace and security and to the role of the United Nations.

621. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative at the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations [c-34].

New York, February 23, 2010.

Madam Chair,

Let me begin by congratulating you and other members of the bureau on your election. My delegation attaches the greatest importance to the work of C-34 and will cooperate with you fully in conducting the business of this session.

My delegation would like to take this opportunity to align itself broadly with the statement made by the Delegation of Morocco on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement.

We thank Under Secretaries-General Alain Le Roy and Susan Malcorra for their remarks. We take note of the report of the Secretary General on the recommendations of this Committee.

Madam Chair,

Peacekeeping is a flagship activity of the UN. The mere fact that the Security Council has organized four debates under four different Presidencies during the last seven months is an indication of the enduring relevance of this activity.
In the last two decades, Peacekeeping budgets have increased twenty-seven times; the number of peacekeepers has grown about ten-fold and the number of peacekeeping operations is at an all time high.

With no new mandates having been accorded in the past few years, this is a good time to take stock.

Madam Chair,

It is evident that despite severe problems, many induced by the decision-making process itself, peacekeeping has delivered results. There are serious shortcomings. Imperfections abound, but none of these, however, detract from the achievements of the peacekeepers.

Since the last meeting of the C-34, holding of meetings with the TCC at least a week prior to renewal of mandates is a welcome development. This new practice needs to be strengthened further. Meetings have to be predictable and structured, with pre-determined agendas. This would enable TCCs, with their often considerable presence and experience on the ground, to provide meaningful inputs. The system of consultations must also be extended to cover all stages of the mission cycle.

The base of TCCs needs to be expanded further. Enhanced efforts must be made to encourage more countries to engage with the UN peacekeeping as troop and police contributors. The permanent members of the UNSC must also demonstrate their political commitment to this endeavour by contributing troops under UN command and control.

The DPKO must also integrate the gender dimensions in all Peacekeeping missions. The effectiveness of the female Indian Formed Police Unit in Liberia provides testimony.

The Secretariat has been reaching out to Member States in relation to their ongoing work of drafting the New Horizons report and in relation to the development of operational concepts in the area of Protection of Civilians and Robust Peacekeeping. There have been a large number of developments in this area. DPKO and OCHA have commissioned a study on the Protection of Civilians led by my distinguished colleague from Tanzania. DPKO organized a conference on Robust Peacekeeping for practitioners in Wilton Park last year. Draft operational concepts have been circulated. We have contributed to these processes and continue to remain engaged with them.

We would, however, like to strike a note of caution. The work that is currently being undertaken has serious implications on international law and on state sovereignty. A key issue in this context is the distinction between the actions of the Council under Chapters VI and VII. There is a time and a place for both and there should be no back-door method to obliterate the Council’s responsibility to attempt peaceful settlement of disputes. The temptation to augment the theory and practice of intervention as a convenient short-cut must be avoided at all costs. On protection of civilians we must remember that this is primarily the responsibility of the host country.

The application of international humanitarian law and human rights law to UN peacekeepers is also an area where we need to tread with caution. This is because the paradigms of IHL have largely evolved without taking into account UN peacekeeping, which is based on the guiding principles of consent of the parties, non-use of force except in self-defence and impartiality. Human rights law is predicated on the paradigm of a repressive state and a helpless individual in Western political theory. The armed militias whom the peacekeepers face today can hardly be described as helpless individuals even if the label of non-state actor applies to them.

Madam Chair,

Today, the bulk of peacekeeping presence is in operations that have undergone protracted conflict. Peacekeepers find that their presence, while leading to an improvement in the situation, does not contribute to a lasting peace. This situation has arisen due to the tendency of the Security Council to move into certain conflict areas without adequate deliberation. The Council, as the DPKO-OCHA study on Protection of Civilians says, was confused. It acted first and thought later.

We must, at this juncture, avoid the temptation to add further to the repertoire of "quick-fixes." There cannot be any short cuts in such operations. Where effective and durable peace agreements cannot be arrived at, peacekeeping operations need to be prepared for the long-haul.

In this context, we must remember that peacekeeping and peacebuilding are not mutually exclusive. Both may be required to continue simultaneously over extended period of time. As a peacekeeping operation gathers momentum, it requires more resources - not less. The success of a Peacekeeping Mission depends on its capacity to shoulder the implementation of early peacebuilding activities. Thus, the military component will have to be supplemented, and not supplanted, by police and rule of law, and a capacity for development administration.

There is no substitute for national capacities. The UN's role must be to serve national priorities and to create an enabling environment where these capacities can be developed in local and national authorities as quickly as possible.

We believe that support for national authorities is especially key in two areas. One is security sector reform and other is in provisions of primary inputs for socio-economic developments. Security Sector reform, is an area where greater concentration is required across most operations. It has been our experience that Security Sector Reform, unless driven by national priorities, as against donor priorities, will not produce good results.

Madam Chair,

The discourse over peacebuilding should not drown out the fact that much is left to be done in peacekeeping. A decade after the landmark Brahimi report, it is interesting to note which of its recommendations have been adopted and which ignored.

The recommendation that mandates should be clear, credible and achievable is one of the areas where there has been virtually no movement. The need for clear and achievable mandates has also found mention in the draft New Horizons report. There is a steady stream of complaints from troops on the ground about unrealistic and confusing mandates and rules of engagement. It is also obvious that the resources that were provided were completely inadequate.

Should the Council not mandate responsibly? Does the responsibility of the Security Council end with the generation of a mandate? Should there not be accountability for those who mandate on the grounds of expediency and do not provide adequate guidance and resources?
These are difficult questions. But they require answers because a continuation of the current situation is likely to impact adversely on the credibility of the Council and the United Nations.

Madam Chair,

I would like to take this opportunity to reiterate our position that we follow a policy of zero tolerance in respect of disciplinary and conduct issues.

My delegation would also like to point out that troops are contributed by contributing countries to a larger cause: that of peace in far off lands. The safety and security of UN peacekeepers must be of paramount concern to this organization, in whose name they serve.

Madam Chair,

India has a proud history of UN peacekeeping dating back to its inception in the 1950s. As I speak today I salute the 118 Indian peacekeepers, as well as those from other countries, who have made the supreme sacrifice and laid down their lives while serving in UN Missions, most recently in Haiti.

After over sixty years of nation-building in one of the most diverse circumstances, India today has the experience and expertise that could be most useful for the UN in its peacekeeping and its peacebuilding efforts.

While we have contributed nearly 100,000 troops, eminent Force Commanders and participated in more than 40 missions, we stand ready to do more in furtherance of international peace and security as a partner of the UN.

Thank You.
Mr. President,

At the outset, please allow me to congratulate the two Co-Chairs Ambassador Sanja Štiglic of Slovenia and Ambassador Jorge Argüello of Argentina on their nomination as co-facilitators for the Ad-hoc Working Group on 'Revitalization of the Work of the General Assembly'. Our sincere appreciation also goes to the previous Co-Chairs from Norway and Ecuador for their significant efforts to guide the Working Group during the 63rd session of the General Assembly. I would also like to thank the President of the General Assembly Dr. Ali Abdussalam Treki for his leadership and commitment to carry forward this process. For the first time in the past several years, we have a President who has been closely associated with the UN system. I am confident that under his guidance, we will be able to achieve substantive progress this year on the revitalization of the General Assembly. My delegation aligns itself with the statement made by the distinguished Chair of the Non-Aligned Movement. I would also like to take this opportunity to reiterate the commitment of my delegation to remain actively engaged in this most important of processes for UN reform.

Mr. President,

The world today is obviously not the one of 1945. The need for change is, therefore, obvious given the vastly changed contemporary realities. It is my considered belief that among the UN Member States there is now an unprecedented desire to usher in substantive reforms. There is a palpable sense that we are at the cusp of a possible decisive phase. In this context, I am happy that the intergovernmental negotiations on UNSC reform are now at a defining moment with an overwhelming majority of the membership articulating itself in favour of expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories. It is, therefore, imperative that the General Assembly also move for its revitalisation.
This is critical so that the General Assembly can play an effective role as the chief deliberative, legislative, policy-making and representative body of the international community. India, a founding member of the UN, stands for a UN that is truly responsive to the priorities and aspirations of the Member States, particularly for the developing countries, who constitute the vast majority of the membership. Its working methods must also embody efficiency and transparency. Inability to reform runs the inherent risk of its marginalization in the international decision-making architecture.

Mr. President,

The UNGA resolution 63/309 adopted during the last session delineates the contours of the GA revitalization. The strengthening of procedures, working methods, documentation and ensuring due follow up are integral to the revitalization process. Enhanced visibility and outreach of the General Assembly are equally important. However, more important is the need to continue the focus on substantive measures to restore and enhance the role and authority of the General Assembly including in exercising control over legislation, material and manpower, and its role as the chief oversight organ of the United Nations. Being the voice of the international community, the General Assembly must have a greater say in the process of selection of the Secretary General. The mandate for the appointment of the UN Secretary-General flows from Article 97 of the UN Charter, which envisages a role for both the General Assembly as well as the Security Council. However, the modalities of the appointment process have come to be governed by para 4(d) of General Assembly resolution 11(1) of 24 January 1946.

Since the adoption of resolution 11(1) over six decades ago, we live in a different world today. The need for changing the process of appointment of the Secretary-General has been recognized by all Member States. Fully cognizant of the imperative need, the General Assembly adopted resolutions 51/241 of 22 August 1997 and 60/286 of 9 October 2006, which outline in detail proposals on improving this process. Unfortunately, there has been no further progress. The General Assembly’s role cannot be merely to rubber-stamp the recommendation of the Security Council.

Mr. President,

The revitalization process also implies that the General Assembly should take a lead in setting the global agenda and restoring the centrality of the United Nations. Unfortunately, a perception has gained ground that the prerogatives and authority of the General Assembly have been undermined at the expense of the Security Council. Of special concern is the increasing role of Security Council on issues that traditionally fall within the General Assembly’s competence, such as the process of standard-setting and codification of international law. Of concern also is the holding of thematic debates in the Security Council on issues that frequently fall within the purview of the General Assembly or the Economic and Social Council. Serious introspection is needed by Member States to correct these aberrations. The balance between the principal organs of the United Nations, as envisaged in the Charter, must be maintained and respected. And, it is important that a truly representative body such as the General Assembly have a much greater say in the international economic and financial matters.

Mr. President,

We have the structure, framework and necessary tools in place to carry forward this process. The experience of the last session is anything but indicative of the challenges that lie ahead. What we need is the political will and courage to take bold decisions particularly on substantive elements, which are the sine qua non for the revitalization of the General Assembly. We are hopeful that this time, we would not falter and would be in position to make genuine substantive progress.

623. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, on Agenda Item 46 - Global Road Safety Crisis at the UNGA.

New York, March 2, 2010.

Mr. President,

India welcomes the opportunity to participate in this debate on the important issue of road safety. We would like to thank the Government of the Russian Federation for their initiative in hosting the First Global Ministerial Conference on Road Safety in Moscow on 19-20th November, 2009. We would also like to express our appreciation to the Government of Oman for their consistent support for this agenda item.

We have carefully gone through the report transmitted by the Secretary General on Improving Global Road Safety. We thank the World Health Organization [WHO] for preparing the report in consultation with the regional commissions and other partners of the United Nations Road Safety collaboration.

According to this report, low-income and middle-income countries witness over 90 percent of the world's fatalities on the roads, despite accounting for only 48 percent of the world's vehicles. Apart from the personal suffering these road traffic injuries cause, these also threaten health and development gains. The importance of addressing road safety, thus, has a key development dimension. It is, therefore, encouraging that the United Nations has recognized road traffic injuries as an extensive and serious global health problem, requiring coordinated international cooperation efforts.

Mr. President,

In India, road transport is the dominant mode of transportation, accounting for 70% of freight movement and 85% of passenger traffic. We have one of the largest road networks in the world, with 3.3 million kilometers of roads. National Highways account for about 2% of the country's road network, but carry 40% of total traffic, leading to severe congestion.

Road traffic accidents claim over 80,000 victims a year, constituting a major public health problem, with considerable social and economic costs. Almost half of those who die in road traffic crashes are "vulnerable road users" including pedestrians, cyclists or users of two-wheelers.

India is therefore acutely conscious of the imperative to address road safety and reduce the adverse consequences of traffic accidents. India’s economic growth lies in part upon the rapid expansion of our infrastructure, including roads.

We are actively engaged in efforts to enhance road safety. We believe that road safety requires the coordination of three aspects: Engineering and design; Enforcement; and Education involving civil society to spread awareness. Our response entails a coordinated and multi-sectoral approach, incorporating relevant parts of government, civil society, and the private sector. Our interventions seek to cover the following phases of road traffic injury control - prevention of crashes and injuries in the first place; provision of prompt and high quality care to those injured in traffic crashes; and provision of rehabilitation and long-term care to those who need it in order to minimize disabilities. We are striving to make road safety a health, transportation, law enforcement, education and development priority.

The national highway system is being widened and strengthened under various schemes. Plans for the development of a Indian National Expressway Network in a phased manner by the year 2022 are currently underway. Many of the recommendations made in the WHO report are being used as a framework for addressing road safety.

We recognize the significance of strengthening capacity to collect, use, and share road safety information. Legislation is being reviewed comprehensively to meet the emerging requirements of road safety. Information technology is also being used in the road transport sector, including through Smart-Card based Driving Licenses and Registration Certificates. We are also taking steps to develop a Road Safety Culture in the country. The 21st annual road safety week was observed from 1-7 January 2010 throughout the country involving regional governments, voluntary organizations and vehicle manufacturers.
Mr. President,

International cooperation is imperative in assisting developing countries to effectively address issues of road safety. Availability of adequate financial resources, technical assistance, capacity building, sharing of best practices and advocacy are crucial in this regard. While we are encouraged by an increase in funding reported in the WHO report, including through private sector and civil society involvement, we agree with the report’s assessment that levels of funding for road safety are still not commensurate with the scale of the problem, and increased efforts must be made to secure additional financial support for road safety projects. However, we would caution against setting universal standards based on what may have been developed in one region, and stress that specific circumstances in various parts of the world must be taken into account in addressing road safety.

We strongly support the intent to increase cooperation at the national, regional and global levels for achieving the objectives of road safety as part of the Decade of Action for Road Safety. We also look forward to a concrete Plan of Action to implement the objectives by the end of the decade, which will take into account the need of developing countries for adequate support to build capacities in this area.

Thank you, Mr. President.
624. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, on the Implementation to the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action and the Outcomes of the 23rd Special Session of the General Assembly at the 54th Session of Commission on the Status of Women.

New York, March 5, 2010.

Mr. Chairman,

Please allow me to congratulate you on your election to chair this Commission. I would also like to congratulate the other members of the Bureau on their election and thank the Secretary General for his reports.

We align ourselves with the statement made by Yemen, on behalf of the G-77.

Mr. Chairman,

Gender equality and women’s empowerment lie at the heart of development and distributive justice. Empowering women is the most effective tool for development as well as for poverty reduction and an essential pre-requisite for achievement of the Millennium Development Goals. The agenda of development will remain incomplete in so long as it excludes more than half the world’s population.

It has now been fifteen years since the Beijing Platform for Action was adopted. This session of the Commission offers an opportunity to evaluate our performance in attaining gender equality and empowerment - a task that still remains incomplete in the world, in our region and in our respective countries. Our deliberations here are important not only for taking stock but also to look at ways of overcoming the considerable challenges that still remain before us.

India is resolutely committed to the implementation of the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action. It is critical that the international community lives up to its commitments of financial resources, technical cooperation and capacity-building for developing countries in meeting their national priorities in the areas of gender empowerment. As a country that has considerable experience in nation building, we stand ready to share our expertise and knowledge with fellow developing countries.

We favour the early establishment of a comprehensive gender entity in the United Nations. This should be carefully conceived and designed to serve as a focal point for all gender related activities and programmes in the UN. It should be well-resourced. It should be designed to mainstream the interests of women and serve their cause. In this context, we are appreciative that the Joint Coordinating Committee, consisting of countries of G-77 and the Non-Aligned Movement, has submitted to the co-facilitators of the system-wide coherence process, a comprehensive, forward-looking and progressive document containing concrete and essential elements for the new Entity.

Mr. Chairman,

In India, we have a proud legacy of celebrating the role of women that stretches back to time immemorial. It is captured in our civilizational and cultural ethos, scriptures, and philosophies. For example, as far back as the third millennium BC, women's empowerment was recognized in the form of worship of Mother Goddess during the Indus Valley civilization. The terracotta figurines of the Mother Goddess, recovered in excavations, are the earliest manifestations of the power vested in women. This idea runs through the ages in Indian religions and philosophy. Centuries later, in the 19th and 20th century, women played a stellar and unique role in India's freedom struggle. Women took part in large numbers and fought shoulder to shoulder with men. No democratic revolution had ever before given women equality of status as was evidenced during India's freedom struggle. It was unprecedented and served as a point of historic departure by upholding women's rights. With the birth of the modern Indian nation-state, the principles of gender equality were further codified and enshrined in the Constitution of India, which not only guarantees equality to women, but it also advocates positive discrimination in favour of women, wherever necessary. These are reinforced through periodic amendments in legislation and policy. In 2001, we formulated the National Policy for the Empowerment of Women. It's main objectives include creating a positive economic and social environment, enhancing political empowerment, providing equal access to health care, education and employment, strengthening legal systems to eliminate all forms of discrimination against women, developing programmes to change societal attitudes and harmful community practices and most importantly, building and strengthening partnerships with civil society, particularly women's organizations.

The ongoing Eleventh Five Year development plan of India (2007-12), which serves as our strategic framework for development, has recognized the role of women as agents of sustained socio-economic growth and change. Gender is a cross-cutting theme in all the development plans. There are a large number of programmes and schemes being implemented today for the mainstreaming of gender activities and concerns throughout the Government of India. I would like to highlight a few. The Education for All Campaign (Sarva Shiksha Abhiyaan) with a special focus on girls' education, aims to target the 'hardest to reach' girls through residential schools, mid day meals and other incentives. The National Literacy Mission has been recast as the Female Literacy Mission and aims to target 70 million adults in the next 5 years, out of which 60 million will be women. Health constitutes another focus area. The National Rural Health Mission aims to provide quality health care for women, with provision for institutional deliveries. An additional programme, Conditional Maternity Benefit Scheme (Indira Gandhi Matritva Sahayog Yojana) aims at improving the health and nutritional status of pregnant and lactating women. There is perceptible improvement in the social-economic status of women today as a result of decades of development programmes implemented on the ground. A major milestone has been the Self-Help Group (SHG) movement. We have over 2.2 million Self Help Groups at the grass roots level throughout the country, which translates into more than 33 million households. There has been a decline in the infant and maternal mortality rates with the IMR at 53 (2008) and MMR at 254 (2006). While we are the first to acknowledge that we still have distance to cover in order to achieve the Millennium Development Goals we have set for ourselves, we are heartened by the progress we have made so far.

Mr. Chairman,

India is conscious of the significance of political empowerment in the overall empowerment of women. We are happy that today women leaders occupy the highest positions in several countries, including India. In India, we took the historic initiative of reserving one-third of the seats in local bodies for women. As a result, more than a million Indian women are now politically empowered at the grassroots level. This has enabled them to engage in the mainstream discourse of development as well as wield decision making authority at the very cutting edge. Parliament now has bills before it to raise this percentage to 50%.

Political empowerment of women in India received a further shot in the arm with the recent Cabinet decision to agree to table a bill for 33% reservation of seats for women in the Parliament.

Mr. Chairman,

More than eighty years ago, Mahatma Gandhi had declared in the Indian context that as long as women did not take part in public life there was no salvation for the country. This is equally true for every corner of the globe. As we gather here to commemorate the 15th Anniversary of Beijing Declaration and Platform of Action, let us use this opportunity to recommit ourselves to the goals of gender equality and empowerment. The time for genuine and full empowerment of women is here and now. This is an idea whose time has truly come, but whose realisation we must all now work to ensure at the earliest. I would like to end by quoting from one of our ancient scriptures: Yartra naryastu pujyante ramante tatra devataha (Manusmriti 3.56) Where women are worshipped, there the Gods reside.

Thank you Mr. Chairman.
625. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, at the Informal Meeting of the Plenary of the United Nations General Assembly to Hear a Briefing by the Secretary-General on his Recent Visit to Chile, at the Trusteeship Council Chamber.

Mr. President,

The Government and the people of India are deeply saddened by the loss of human life and damage that resulted from the earthquake in Chile on 27 February. As a country familiar with the consequences of natural disasters, we fully understand the trauma and suffering that our Chilean brethren are living through.

Mr. President,

Immediately on hearing the news of the earthquake, the Government of India initiated measures to show our solidarity with the people of Chile. Last week, the Prime Minister conveyed to the Chilean President, Dr. Michelle Bachelet that the Government of India would be making a modest cash contribution of US$ 5 million for relief and rehabilitation work following the earthquake.

My delegation would, therefore, like to join others in conveying our sincere condolences to the family members of those who have lost their lives on account of the earthquake. We also express our sympathy and support for the injured. We have no doubt that the people of Chile have the strength and resilience to overcome this natural disaster.

In conclusion, let me thank the Secretary General for his very comprehensive, timely and useful briefing. We appreciate the leadership he has displayed in coordinating the UN's response to the Chilean earthquake. This is truly commendable.
Mr. President, Please allow me to congratulate you on assuming the Presidency of the Security Council for this month. I would also like to thank you for scheduling today’s debate on the situation in Afghanistan and the UN Assistance Mission in that country. This is of immediate and abiding interest for India, both as a close neighbour and a civilizational partner of Afghanistan. We are grateful for the latest report of the Secretary-General and are appreciative of the briefing by the Under Secretary General Alain Le Roy. We also thank Ambassador Zahir Tanin, Permanent Representative of Afghanistan for his statement. We welcome the appointment of new SRSG Staffan De Mistura. He has taken over at a particularly challenging time for the UN in Afghanistan with major concerns regarding security of its personnel requiring to be addressed. Mr. President, The international approach to Afghanistan in recent months, in particular the London Conference of January 2010, has focused on security, reintegration, development, governance and regional and international cooperation. The forthcoming political processes - the Loya Jirga, the Kabul Conference and the parliamentary elections scheduled later this year would be important milestones in this context. For these processes to be enduring, Afghan ownership should go hand in hand with Afghan leadership.

Both on the military and the civilian efforts, while working complimentarily and within indicative timelines, the international community must reaffirm its long-term commitment to stability, peace and development in Afghanistan. Without tangible and sustained improvements on the security front, it would be too much to expect the Afghan Government to exercise greater responsibility. Indeed, improved security could create an enabling environment for an accelerated progress on development and governance issues. This is also critical in expanding the footprint of the Afghan Government and ensuring the greater ownership of these processes by the Afghan people.
Mr. President,

The latest report of the Secretary General highlights that the deterioration in security situation has continued, with 2009 being the most volatile year since the fall of Taliban in 2001. Despite reinforced presence of International Security Assistance Force, asymmetric warfare and complex terrorist attacks have increased. There have been a spate of such recent attacks all over Afghanistan, including in urban centres such as Kabul and Kandahar, killing innocent Afghans and foreigners, including Indian experts and workers involved in our development partnership. Those behind these attacks do not want peace and progress in Afghanistan. Such acts of terrorism will not deter us, but will only strengthen our resolve to fulfill our pledges towards the reconstruction of Afghanistan and to cementing our traditional friendship with the Afghan people. In the interest of stabilizing the security situation in Afghanistan, it is essential to ensure that support, sustenance and sanctuaries for terrorist organizations are ended forthwith. Security and stabilization of Afghanistan will remain a distant goal unless we are able to isolate and root out the syndicate of terrorism, which includes elements of Al Qaida, Taliban, LeT and other terrorists and extremists groups operating from within and outside Afghanistan borders. Therefore, in addition to the strengthening of the International Security Assistance Force, it is critical that the Afghan National Security Forces are enlarged and developed in a professional manner, at a much faster pace. They should be provided appropriate resources, combat equipment, enablers and training before considering any plan for a phased, province-by-province transition to Afghan led security. We welcome the expansion of the capacities of the Afghan National Security Forces and also appreciate the efforts being made by third countries to strengthen the capacities of the Afghan National Security Forces.

Mr. President,

Against the backdrop of today's worrying security situation, the issue of reintegration should be tackled with prudence, the benefit of hindsight, foresight and caution. We believe that any integration process in Afghanistan should be Afghan-led, and should include only those who abjure violence, give up armed struggle and terrorism and are willing to abide by the values of democracy, pluralism, and human rights and women’s rights, as enshrined in the Afghan Constitution. The process must be inclusive and transparent.

Mr. President,

A sustainable strategy for stabilization of Afghanistan must focus on development and governance issues. In order to strengthen governance and institution-building, priority should be accorded to building adequate capacity to deliver on developmental objectives. Presently, the overall civilian approach continues to remain fragmented. The Secretary General's report strikingly points out, even after the last eight years of engagement in Afghanistan, 80% of international community assistance still bypasses the Afghan Government and is not closely aligned with Government priorities. This trend must be reversed and our efforts must concentrate on strengthening of Afghan Government institutions, particularly through the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board which has endorsed new initiatives in agriculture, private sector development, technical assistance and capacity building.

Mr. President,

India's efforts towards stabilization of Afghanistan have focused on socio-economic development. The principal objective of India's development partnership, covering the entire country and straddling all sectors of development, is to build indigenous Afghan capacities and institutions. This will enable an effective state system to improve the delivery of goods and services to Afghan people and contribute to stability. Our assistance, now over US$ 1.3 billion, is spread over a large number of provinces in Afghanistan. In addition to several small and medium development projects, India has built the Zaranj-Delaram road and the power transmission line from Pul-e-Khumri to Kabul. We are also constructing Afghanistan's new Parliament building, a symbol of our common commitment to pluralism and democracy. At the recent London Conference, we have announced new initiatives in the agriculture sector and in institutional capacity building.

Mr. President,

Perseverance and tenacity are critical to effectively confront the challenges facing Afghanistan and for ushering peace and security in the region. There are no quick-fix solutions and it is imperative that the international community remains engaged in Afghanistan in a sustained manner providing both on the security side as also on providing developmental and national building support for as long as it takes. We support the good work of the UN Assistance Mission in Afghanistan. We need to be clear that a stable Afghanistan is in the interest not only for all of us in its neighborhood but for the international community as a whole. Thank you.

627. Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Acting Permanent Representative, during the Plenary Session of the Fourth High Level Dialogue on Financing for Development at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

At the outset, permit me to associate with the statement delivered by Yemen on behalf of the Group of 77.

We are happy that the 4th High-level dialogue on Financing for Development has finally been held after repeated delays. Our preference, of course, remains that this event be held either during the main session of the UN General Assembly, or along with the meeting of ECOSOC, BWIs, WTO and UNCTAD.

Such a format facilitates high-level participation in this important event. We hope that future sessions of the High-level Dialogue will be structured in that manner.

Mr. President,

The core concept of the Monterrey consensus i.e. ensuring enhanced and predictable financial resource flows for developing countries in order to assist them in pursuing their development agenda, is all the more relevant today.
As has been mentioned repeatedly, the multiple global crises have had a severe adverse impact of financing abilities of developing countries, particularly the most vulnerable amongst us.

These countries were in no way responsible for the crises, but in many ways, they have been the hardest hit. Even as we see recovery in a few countries, most developing countries continue to face the consequences of a reversal of capital flow to their countries. ODA flows have been far below commitments, private capital has flown out, access to capital markets are more limited, remittances have reduced, exports have fallen, debt repayments have become difficult, and balance of payments situations have worsened. The consequent impact on development efforts, and on social sector investment, is evident. As a recent report of the Secretary-General notes, in most countries, the number of people living in extreme poverty has actually gone up between 1990 and 2005! This issue merits special consideration in our meeting. The subsequent crises have made the situation worse. It is imperative that the international community makes good this loss of capital. Apart from fulfillment of ODA commitments, there is an urgent need to provide additional funding so that countries can implement appropriate countercyclical policies. Onerous conditionalities on disbursement of funds are unhelpful. We have been urging multilateral development banks to finance infrastructure investment and investing in green and clean technologies, which are an ideal form of countercyclical activity. And we have been supportive of proposals to expand their capital bases, if necessary. It is necessary to ensure enhanced market access of developing countries. Large agricultural subsidies by developed countries must be addressed meaningfully. Encouragement by source countries to Foreign Direct Investment would also be useful in resuming flow of capital to the developing world.

Mr. President,

Systemic issues are the other area that deserves enhanced attention of the international community. Indeed, this is perhaps at the heart of genuine implementation of the Financing for Development process. The need for comprehensive reform in the international financial and monetary architecture has been well recognized after the economic crisis. India has been working with other countries, including at the G-20, to ensure that international financial institutions reflect current realities in their structure, composition and mandates.

It is crucial that institutions created at Bretton Woods have a greater voice, role and effective participation of developing countries. Membership of norm setting bodies must be more broad-based. Regulatory mechanisms must be improved. Some progress has been made in this regard. However, much more remains to be done. We need to accelerate progress in this area. Mr. President, The Financing for Development process, as embodied in the Monterrey Consensus and the Doha Review Conference, is a crucial element of the global partnership for development. We must ensure its full implementation, rather than making more and more commitments. Despite some changes in the follow-up mechanism instituted at Monterrey, it is clear that a more structured and periodic follow-up mechanism would immensely benefit this important process. We hope that genuine progress can be made shortly in this regard.

Thank you.

Madam Co-Chair,

At the very beginning, let me express appreciation for the decision taken by you (Ambassador Sanja Štiglic of Slovenia) and Ambassador Jorge Argüello of Argentina (the other Co-chair) to discuss implementation of General Assembly resolutions on revitalization and the working methods of the General Assembly including operational and technical issues like voting and balloting.
Madam Co-Chair,

The world today is obviously not the one of 1945. The need for change is, therefore, evident given the vastly changed contemporary realities.

Since the very beginning, India has been of the firm belief that that the General Assembly will only be empowered if its position as the chief deliberative, policy-making and representative organ of the United Nations is respected in letter and in spirit.

With this background, let me proceed to share our views on the two issues at hand in a brief manner.

Madam Co-Chair,

The resolutions of the General Assembly in general and those on revitalization in particular have special significance both for the member states and the international community. Depending on the willingness of the member-states, such resolutions have the potential to act as the catalyst for bringing about transformative change in the international system. Of course, we can engage in stock-taking exercises on the reasons behind the delays in the implementation. But the overriding consideration should be the need to continue the focus on those measures that restore and enhance the role and authority of the General Assembly.

Madam Co-Chair,

India is no stranger to the application of newer and modern technologies to enhance the efficiency and effectiveness of electoral processes. In our considered view, the revitalization process of the General Assembly will benefit immensely if we are able to introduce those technologies that are efficient, and that ensure the security and confidentiality of the voting process.

Madam Co-Chair,

In conclusion, let me reiterate that our delegation attaches importance to the on-going processes of revitalization of the General Assembly, including the various aspects of strengthening of its procedures, working methods, documentation and also ensuring due follow up. We will continue our active support and continue to be there to help you in these efforts.

Thank you.
Distinguished Co-Chairs,

The Government and the people of India were shocked and deeply grieved at the loss of human life and damage that resulted from the catastrophic earthquake that struck Haiti on 12 January 2010. India is familiar with the consequences of natural disasters and therefore understands very well the trauma and the suffering that Haitians are living through.

Immediately following the earthquake, the President and Prime Minister of India conveyed to Haitian leaders our condolences and solemn pledges to stand shoulder to shoulder with them in their moment of sorrow. The Government and the people of India also paid homage to men and women of the United Nations family, including one of our own, who were struck down at their posts.

I would like to take this opportunity to express appreciation for the excellent work done by the UN family under the leadership of the Secretary-General in coordinating the international response to the humanitarian and other needs in Haiti. In this context it is important to recognize the sterling efforts of MINUSTAH, both on its civil side as well as on the military and police side, despite the tremendous losses that they themselves faced. We also welcome the appointment of Mr. Edmond Mulet as the Special Representative of the Secretary General for Haiti.

We are particularly pleased that the Central Emergency Response Fund (CERF) was put to good use in the earliest stages of recovery work and we commend the Secretary-General for this important decision. India attaches importance to this facility to which we have made significant contributions since its inception and to which we are committed to contribute US $ 500,000/- each over three year period till 2011.

Distinguished Co-Chairs,

Soon after the earthquake, India announced a cash contribution of US $ 5 million towards relief measures as a token of solidarity with the people of Haiti and transferred the entire amount to the Government of Haiti on 2 February, 2010.

Moreover, in response to a request for additional peacekeepers following adoption of UN Security Council resolution 1908 in the immediate aftermath of the earthquake, India is sending two additional Formed Police Units to Haiti to strengthen MINUSTAH.

We have also joined Brazil and South Africa in deciding to expand our IBSA, the India-Brazil-South Africa Trust Fund, waste management project in Haiti, both in its area of coverage and its scope of handling different types of waste. IBSA plans to spend over US$ 2 million in this effort and for reconstruction of a community health centre in Haiti this year.

The Government of India is in touch with the representatives of the Government of Haiti to explore the possibility of reconstructing one of the main Government building in Haiti destroyed by the earthquake. We look forward to coordinating the details with the Haitian authorities and will be guided by their wisdom and advice.

We have no doubt that the people of Haiti have the strength and resilience to overcome this natural disaster and build a stronger Haiti. The Government and people of India will do what we can to help in this major national effort.

Thank you.

630. Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative, on Agenda Item 4 - General Debate of National Experience in Population Matters: Health, Morbidity, Mortality and Development at the 43rd Session of the UN Commission on Population and Development.

Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, please let me allow to share our grief with the Government and people of Poland on their tragic loss. We would like to express our support to them in this hour of need as well as challenge, which the nation faces.

Let me begin by congratulating you and other members of the Bureau on your election and assure you of our full support and cooperation in the deliberations of the Commission.

We would like thank the Secretary General for all his reports under various agenda items of the Commission. I would also like to express our appreciation to all the distinguished keynote speakers who have made excellent and insightful presentations during this session.

My delegation associates itself with the statement made by Yemen, on behalf of the Group of 77.

Mr. Chairman,

Last year, we commemorated the 15th anniversary of International Conference on Population and Development, held in Cairo in 1994 to mark the unprecedented global consensus and integration of diverse aspects of population, development and human rights.

This Programme of Action laid a comprehensive 20 year roadmap, recognizing the complex interplay amongst economic and sustainable development with population, gender equality and empowerment of women, urbanization and migration. This, in fact, provided the necessary impetus for the formulation of the MDGs.
Mr. Chairman,

This year’s special theme of the Commission, “health, morbidity, mortality and development”, is particularly timely as we look forward to the high level plenary meeting of the General Assembly on the MDGs in September, later this year.

Health indicators account for 3 out of the 8 MDGs. Moreover, health has direct implication on the realization of rest of the MDGs. Last year’s ECOSOC Ministerial Declaration rightly brought forward this issue succinctly and clearly.

The fact that implementation of ICPD Programme of Action has a direct implication on the realization of the MDGs cannot be overemphasized. The international community needs to be seized of this priority and further deepen its efforts in order to achieve the targets which it has set forth itself.

While there are indications that some of the health related MDGs may not be achieved by 2015; that should not deter us from reinforcing political will as well as national, regional and global efforts to attain them.

India is committed to the realization of the ICPD's Programme of Action as well as the MDGs. Our progress has been steady. The Government of India continues to attach highest importance to the realization of these goals, by a strong inclusive growth philosophy, i.e., promoting development with social justice. There has been a steady increase in budgetary allocation to health, along with other related sectors.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me highlight some of our major programmes and achievements in the field of health.

Since its launch in 2005, our flagship National Rural Health Mission (NRHM) has been one of the biggest interventions of its kind in the health sector in the world.

With the aim to cover more than 600 million people, especially women and children in rural areas, this Mission has successfully provided equitable, affordable, accountable and effective primary healthcare to them.

One of its main components - the Reproductive and Child Health Programme, includes an ambitious Janani Suraksha Yojana (JSY), a safe motherhood intervention programme, to promote institutional delivery with specific focus on poor pregnant women.

Our comprehensive programme for child development, namely, the Integrated Child Development Services (ICDS) is today the world’s largest early child development programme covering over 78 million children as well as pregnant and lactating mothers.

So far, NRHM has benefited more than 10 million women and has emerged as a major successful intervention in reducing maternal and infant mortality. Reports of the latest survey have shown that Infant Mortality Rate has reduced to 55 per 1000 live births in 2007 and Maternal Mortality Ratio has declined from 437 in 1992-93 to 254 in 2004-06.

Despite all the progress, we remain acutely cognizant of the challenges we face in realizing the health MDGs by 2015.

Mr. Chairman,

International cooperation has not been forthcoming when we speak about achieving the health related goals. Provision of financial resources, transfer of technology, technical assistance, access to medicines or capacity building especially to the developing countries has not reach optimum levels. We must not forget that success of MDGs in each and every country is an imperative for the international community as a whole.

Our international community must continue to play its cooperative and mutually supportive role. In this regard, India has been proactive in sharing its development experience, including in the health and related sectors, with fellow developing countries.

One significant example has been the linking major hospitals in Africa with super-specialty hospitals in India through a pan-African e-network project for providing quality tele-medicine.
India is also uniquely positioned as a source of cost-effective generic medicines, which are critical to public health strategies in many developing countries by ensuring easy and ready availability of affordable vaccines and medicines to vulnerable people. We call on all countries to support rather than hinder or create barrier to such legitimate efforts.

Mr. Chairman,

21st century is seeing a gradual shift of burden of disease from communicable to non-communicable diseases. As we continue our efforts to tackle communicable diseases, the prevalence of preventable non-communicable disease is proportionately increasing.

While focusing on these new challenges, we should not dilute our ongoing efforts in the fight against communicable disease, till it is eliminated. We should particularly be wary of any diversion of scare resource from the efforts towards achieving MDGs; instead we should devise and encourage new, additional and innovative financing to tackle non-communicable diseases.

Mr. Chairman,

Let us continue our efforts in sustaining and strengthening our national health systems in a comprehensive manner, with primary health care at its core.

Investment in the health of a society is investment in the overall well being of a society. Development will not be sustainable if it is not created by a health population. Mahatma Gandhi has once said, "It is health that is real wealth and not pieces of gold and silver". After all, prosperity will follow the healthy.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.
Mr. President,

Thank you for convening today's debate on "post-conflict peacebuilding" and for the concept note. At the outset, let me echo the Secretary General's assertion, in his report last year, on peacebuilding in the aftermath of conflict. The imperative of national ownership and the anchoring of international peacebuilding efforts at the country level cannot be overemphasized. Security is a key pillar for peacebuilding. It is equally important to focus on building economic opportunity, particularly for the youth along with political and social stability. This requires a holistic approach that is sensitive to the economic, social and political milieu of the post-conflict situation. This is also critical so that there is a real stake for the country in the peacebuilding efforts. It also means that even in cases where it is difficult to locate national ownership, international peacebuilding efforts are geared towards strengthening the capacity of a post-conflict State to govern effectively and to govern well. Capacity building also assumes importance especially in instances where countries find it difficult to completely utilize the financial assistance they have been provided. My delegation is, therefore, of the view that the international community, acting through the instrumentality of the PBC, must always strive to ensure that there is effective two-way dialogue between countries on the Agenda of the PBC and the Commission itself through all stages. Another key issue is that of financing. Let us be clear and acknowledge the fact that lack of funding continues to be a major impediment to the success of peacebuilding initiatives. It goes without saying that other elements such as human resources, technical assistance, managerial assistance, assistance in kind and other programmes of assistance through provision of appropriate technologies are also important.
Given the sensitive nature of the peacebuilding tasks such as security sector reforms and development administration, there must be a high degree of coordination within the UN system. Work in the country-specific configurations has been a positive dimension. In particular, the Council would do well to really consult major troop and police contributing countries, both individually and through the instrumentality of the PBC, while formulating and revising mandates of UN missions.

Mr. President,

India has shared its unique nation-building experience and expertise in a number of countries transiting from conflict to peace. We are very happy to continue to make available our capabilities in nation building to countries in post-conflict situations and cooperate with the UN in its various peacebuilding activities. Ever since the creation of the PBC in December 2005, India has actively participated in its working as a member of its Organisational Committee and by contributing to the resources of the Peacebuilding Fund. We will continue this active association with the PBC and the PBF with a view to enable these institutions to fulfill in their entirety the tasks as assigned to them by the General Assembly and the Security Council. Further, we are of the view that the Fund should act as a catalyst for good governance. In this regard, we note with approval the creation of the Senior Advisory Group for the Review of International Civilian Capacities in fulfillment of the “agenda for action” outlined by the Secretary General in his 2009 Report on Peacebuilding in the aftermath of Conflict.

Mr. President,

We need to be cognizant that peacebuilding is still a concept in its infancy and is continuously evolving. The international community has taken on board the idea of peacebuilding to fulfill the important need of handling post-conflict situations. It is therefore, imperative that we ensure that peacebuilding and the institutions that constitute the peacebuilding architecture are successful.

Thank you.
Mr. President,

Thank you for convening today's debate on an issue to which we attach great importance. We thank the Japanese Presidency for the concept paper and for its continued stewardship of the Council's Informal Working Group on Documentation and Other Procedural Questions since 2009. The very fact that the Security Council is holding an open debate on the issue of its working methods is in and of itself of some significance. While we acknowledge the prerogative of the Council to set its working methods, we have always argued that since the Council acts on behalf of the UN membership, it is both natural and legitimate for the latter to discuss the Council's working methods.

India associates itself with the growing clamour for early reform of working methods of the Council, which is an integral part of the broader imperative of comprehensive reform and expansion of the membership of the Council in both permanent and non-permanent categories. The overwhelming majority of the membership of the United Nations has already reiterated its support for such reforms.

Mr. President,

The Council will render great service to the cause of maintaining international peace and security by deepening and enriching its consultations with troop and police contributing countries in the devising, revision and implementation of mandates of the UN's peacekeeping and peacebuilding missions. In addition, such constructive consultations can and will have a salutary impact on the on-going efforts towards enhancing the transparency and effectiveness of the Council's work.
Mr. President,

Another area that cries out for urgent reforms relates to the Council's annual report to the General Assembly. At present, the annual report continues to be a statistical compilation of events, a bland summary and listing of meetings and outcome documents. It is important the General Assembly be aware not only of what decisions were taken, but also the rationale, efficacy and impact of the Council's decisions, in terms of crystallized take-away for the membership of the General Assembly. Further, it is important for the Council to submit, when necessary, special reports to the General Assembly, in accordance with article 24 (3) of the Charter, for consideration of the Assembly in accordance with Article 15 (1) of the Charter.

Mr. President,

Apart from the specific areas of reform that I have already mentioned, my delegation believes that the Council should urgently undertake the following measures. First, as a general rule the Council must meet in sessions open to all UN member states. Second, implement Articles 31 and 32 of the Charter by consulting with non-Council members on a regular basis, especially members with a special interest in the substantive matter under consideration by the Council. Third, grant non-Council members access to the Council's subsidiary organs, including, the right to participate, as appropriate. Fourth, make available to non-Council members draft resolutions and presidential statements, as well as other draft documents that are tabled at informal consultations of the whole of the Council for action on its agenda items, as soon as such documents are tabled, or earlier, if so authorized by the author of the draft.

Fifth, hold frequent, timely and substantive briefings for non-Council members on the matters discussed in the Council and its subsidiary organs, including briefings on its ad hoc missions, their terms of reference and the findings of such missions. Sixth, hold regular consultations with the Presidents of the General Assembly and the ECOSOC.

Mr. President,

My delegation is supportive of the on-going efforts, including and particularly those of the S5 grouping, to bring about improvements in the Council's working methods. Such efforts have succeeded in keeping the issue of working methods high on the reform agenda. Yet we must acknowledge that real progress has been minimal, despite years of efforts. Some permanent members continue to argue that reform of working methods cannot be discussed by non-Members. Even many decisions already taken by Council in Note S/2006/507 remain unimplemented. And there appears to be little appetite for the far-reaching reforms that the large majority is demanding. This only strengthens our view that the many flaws in the Council's working methods are only symptoms of a deeper malaise that lies in its structure and composition. Clearly, genuine and lasting improvement of the working methods of the Council can only be possible as part of a comprehensive process of Security Council reform, based on both reform and expansion of its composition in permanent and non-permanent categories. Till there is a change in the real power structure of the Council i.e. its permanent membership, we cannot realistically expect the deep-seated changes that the large majority seeks. We invite the S-5 and others to work closely and actively and in lock-step with the wider international community seeking comprehensive reforms of the Council. In the absence of such a comprehensive reform, a fundamental improvement in the working methods would either escape us as it has for more than sixty years or, even if miraculously achieved, would not last without the institutional memory, continuing commitment and peer example of new permanent members. Thank you.

New York, April 26, 2010.

Madam Co-Chair,

Let me start by expressing appreciation for the decision taken by you (Ambassador Sanja Štiglic of Slovenia) and our distinguished colleague from Argentina, Ambassador Jorge Argüello (the other Co-Chair) to dedicate one entire meeting to discuss the role and authority of the General Assembly and its relationship to other principal organs of the United Nations.

Today's discussion is both important and timely. Whilst this issue has been engaging our attention for many years, the time has come for the General Assembly, the G-192 to take remedial action. Not to do so would not only further fuel the prevailing apathy but also strengthen trends to look for solutions elsewhere both within and outside the UN system.

Madam Co-Chair,

India has consistently held the view that the General Assembly can be revitalized only when its position as the chief deliberative, policy-making and representative organ of the United Nations is respected in letter and in spirit. The General Assembly should take the lead in setting the global agenda and restoring the centrality of the United Nations in formulating multilateral approaches to resolving transnational issues. This was the role intended for the Assembly in Article 10 of the UN Charter, namely that it discuss any questions or matters within the scope of the present Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organs provided for in the Charter, i.e. the Security Council, the ECOSOC, Trusteeship Council, the ICJ as well as the Secretariat.

Madam Co-chair,

A perception that the prerogatives and authority of the General Assembly have been undermined, in particular by the Security Council has gained ground. First, the Council is increasingly encroaching on issues that traditionally fall within the Assembly’s competence, such as the process of standard-setting and codification of international law and by holding of thematic debates on issues that frequently fall within the purview of the General Assembly or the ECOSOC. Second, the Council’s annual report continues to be a mere statistical compilation of events, a bland summary and listing of meetings and outcome documents which merely informs without educating, illustrates without elucidating. We associate ourselves with such concerns.

As is to be expected, such concerns have led to calls for urgently recalibrating the relationship between the General Assembly and the Security Council. The Council would do well to eschew the tendency to give extremely creative and permissive interpretations to the consideration of what constitutes a threat to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression and to the situations under which it can take action under Chapter VII. And in terms of its reporting obligations, the Council should not only inform the Assembly of the decisions taken, but also the rationale, efficacy and impact of the Council’s decisions, in terms of crystallized take-aways for the membership.

At the same time, however, we believe that remedial measures would only be half complete in the absence of serious introspection on what the General Assembly itself can do to mitigate the situation. Clearly, the Assembly will not be empowered merely by strengthening procedures. More important is the presence of political will to take concrete measures to reinforce the role and authority of the Assembly. Foremost in this regard is the need to properly appreciate and then correctly situate the Assembly within the plurality of multilateral mechanisms that deal with global issues. In our view, the primacy of the Assembly flows from the universality of its membership as well as the diligent application of the principle of sovereign equality of all its members. Ownership therefore, of the Assembly’s decisions and activities, is reflected in the degree of participation by member-states. So, if there is a foreboding sense of apathy towards the work done in the Assembly, the member-states are also partly to blame.

If the member-states, instead of engaging in substantive deliberations in the six main committees that could result in setting new norms, spend considerable resources on procedural issues they will only encourage the usurpation of their role by other institutions both within and outside the UN. A case in point is the agenda of the Assembly which contains a large number of items which have little or no bearing whatsoever with the most pressing contemporary concerns of relevance to all Member States as well as the international community as a whole. Similarly, there is an embarrassing reluctance to hold thematic debates on issues of relevance to the international community and of concern and interest to the Organization. In our view this is a matter of particular concern since outsourcing of such discussions, especially beyond the UN, militates against the notion of the Assembly’s centrality to multilateralism.

Madam Co-Chair,

I would now like to address two other important issues of relevance to our meeting here today, namely the oversight role of Assembly vis-à-vis the UN staff and as reflected in the working of the Fifth Committee. In our view the Charter provisions clearly reflect the desire of the UN membership to have an international civil service which displays the highest standards of professionalism, neutrality and integrity and which is accountable therefore, if not in higher, but at least in equal measure as the Secretary General is to the General Assembly. In addition, we would welcome closer consideration of procedures for selecting, appointing and confirming the heads of the major Specialized Agencies, Funds and Programmes with a view to ensuring transparency, legitimacy and balanced representation. Regarding the working of the Fifth Committee, we are of the view that as long as the brooding omnipresence of jobs-related concerns continue to be a major pre-occupation for the international community, the Assembly’s oversight of the allocation of financial resources towards development-related activities should remain sacrosanct. Clearly, the role of the Assembly as the interface between Member-States and the Secretariat should be reinforced so that the policies and priorities set by Members are better reflected and accounted for within the UN machinery.

Madam Co-Chair,

In conclusion, let me re-emphasise the need to discuss substantive measures that would strengthen the role of General Assembly as the chief deliberative, legislative and policy-making and representative body of the international community.

You can expect our constructive support and participation in your efforts. Thank You.
Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative, on the Committee on Information.

Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, let me congratulate Mr. Shalva Tsiskarashvili of Permanent Mission of Georgia on his election as Vice Chair of the Committee. We welcome the reports of the Secretary-General on the three-fold activities of the Department of Public Information, namely strategic communications, new as well as outreach services. India aligns itself with the statement made by the Chair of the G-77.

Mr. Chairman,

This debate provides an occasion to reiterate the central concerns of Member States over the process of dissemination of information. For us, the defining characteristic of the work of this Committee lies in its relationship with the Department of Public Information, and the ensuing cooperative effort to continually improve upon the delivery of relevant information inputs to millions of potential users across the world.

The DPI's role is pivotal as it has to strategically communicate the message of the United Nations with the greatest public impact in a situation where the UN confronts a variety of complex challenges and opportunities. Let me illustrate this with some encouraging facts. According to the report on news services, between July 2009 and January 2010 more than 1,100 press releases containing statements by and messages from the Secretary-General and other officials and departments as well as 682 summaries of press briefings of the Secretary-General's spokesperson and other press conferences here at UN Headquarters were disseminated. This represents a quantum jump in comparison to the figures for the corresponding period in earlier years.

However, it must also be pointed out that such impressive improvements are occurring in the midst of the continuing anachronism of press briefings which remain off limits for delegates from various Permanent Missions accredited to the United Nations. In other words, this means, that while I can make a statement on the working of the DPI here at the UN headquarters, I cannot sit in as a silent observer in a press conference at the Dag Hammarskjold Library Auditorium!

Mr. Chairman,

The Committee’s focus has to be on how to make the work of the Department of Information as pertinent and accessible as possible to the largest number of users, making it an effective channel for the flow of information between the UN and the peoples of the world. To achieve this, the widest possible range of technologies needs to be harnessed. As many countries simultaneously span several centuries in technological terms, it is essential that the end product offered by DPI is dispensed through a wide spectrum of media channels. Thus, while the selection employed should incorporate the latest technologies, such as webcasts and podcasts, a strong emphasis must also be retained on using traditional and very cost-effective means of communication, such as radio and print. These remain of tremendous importance in reaching out to ordinary people in many parts of the developing world and must constantly be kept in sight.

We also fully support the effort to enable the emergence of a more linguistically equal world, in which information is disseminated not merely in the official languages of the UN, but also in other languages. We congratulate the DPI for now producing information in roughly 80 local languages and note with satisfaction that UN radio programmes are being made in Bengali, Hindi and Urdu, among other languages. This promotion of multilingualism by the DPI in its activities needs to be further widened and intensified, including in particular parity among the six official languages in terms of content on the website.

There is also much value in raising the level of local content and local involvement in the production of DPI programme material. Doing so will also encourage local talent and creativity to involve itself in the work of the UN. A related issue is the question of UN Information Centers, which are crucial in enhancing the public image of the UN and in disseminating its message, particularly in the developing world. We agree with the views expressed by many that our goal should be to strengthen, rather than weaken, these information outposts of the United Nations. Hub and spoke models may appeal in certain managerial contexts, but make little sense in a people-intensive sector such as the media. We would encourage the Department to work closely with host countries in these efforts. We would also support adequate budgetary resources being made available to strengthen the public outreach and ensure the effective functioning of Information Centres in developing countries. We would like to commend the useful and creative work being undertaken by UNIC in New Delhi, including in the promotion of the Millennium Development Goals.

Mr. Chairman,

The information being disseminated has to be relevant and meaningful and, to the extent pertinent, it has to be spread in a manner that makes it not only interesting but also enjoyable for the target audience. This is not easy to achieve and those working on content management must be driven by a constant yearning for further improvement. Moreover, DPI’s programmes must seek to further deepen and strengthen their coverage and projection of the most noteworthy activities of the UN, in particular, those that directly impact upon the lives of ordinary people. These include humanitarian activities as also the work performed, often under extremely demanding circumstances, by UN peacekeepers in strife-torn lands.

As regards the latter, we would like to see DPI, DPKO and DFS working closely in highlighting UN peacekeeping success stories and providing accurate, impartial and timely information on the regular activities of UN peacekeepers, as also on the exceptional work that they often do that goes beyond the routine keeping of the peace and the call of duty. To provide just one example with which I am somewhat familiar, Indian soldiers serving as UN peacekeepers have consistently carved a very special place for themselves in the hearts and minds of the local population in their area of operations as a result of their healing touch via enthusiastic involvement in providing medical and veterinary support, promoting local community development projects aimed at soil conservation and water harvesting, provision of free vocational training, etc. It is such stories of goodwill and down to earth cooperation that the world needs to hear more of!

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to assure you of India’s full backing as you guide the work of this Committee, as well as to the DPI as it projects the UN story and builds support for the Organization and its noble aims.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.
Madam Co-Chair,

Thank you very much for giving me the floor. At the outset, let me thank the two Co-Chairs for their efforts. I recall that at an earlier occasion when we discussed the revitalization of the General Assembly, I had called for energized participation. We would have liked to have greater participation by member-states in today's meeting.

We welcome the decision to hold this meeting to discuss the role and responsibilities of the General Assembly in the process of selection and appointment of the Secretary-General. This is a clear affirmation of the importance that the UN membership attaches to the issue. We will therefore try to sincerely and faithfully address all relevant aspects with a view to contribute positively to the work of this Working Group.

Naturally we align ourselves with the statement made by our colleague from Algeria on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement.

Madam Co-Chair,

The fact is that the political role of the Secretary-General is writ large both in terms of the functions envisaged for him or her under the Charter as well as those that accrued to him or her over the years. The specific content of the Secretary-General's political role is outlined in Articles 12 para 2 and 99 of the UN Charter and relevant rules of procedure of both the General Assembly and the Security Council. Further, over the past six decades, the good offices and mediatory roles of the Secretary General as well as the work of his Special Representatives have only served to reinforce and flesh out the political nature of the job.

In such a scenario, the continued circumscribing of the General Assembly's role and responsibilities in the process of selection and appointment of the Secretary General needs to change in the interests of the United Nations system in general and the Assembly's prerogatives in particular. Permit me to elaborate on this.

Madam Co-Chair,

Member-states are well-aware of the fact that General Assembly Resolution 11 (1) of February 1946 which lays out the "Terms of appointment of the Secretary-General" was the product of an era gone by. It was the result of irreconcilable differences between the pre-eminent yet opposing power camps in the international system on the implementation of Article 97 of the Charter which states, "The Secretary-General shall be appointed by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council." These differences arose because the Charter provision was not self-executing.

In our view, the 1946 Resolution erred on the side of caution when it broke down the decision-making process into two compartmentalized, linear procedures, one of which was to be carried out in the Council and the other in the Assembly. As a result, what we have today is one decision taken in the Council on nominating a candidate and another decision taken in the General Assembly on appointing the candidate. The error was compounded by the subsequent practice of the UN system of not insisting on a panel of candidates for the Assembly's consideration despite the fact that the 1946 Resolution merely stated that it would be "desirable" as against obligatory "for the Security Council to proffer one candidate only for the consideration of the General Assembly."

Further, the Security Council's consideration of the process of recommendation of the only candidate for the post of Secretary-General was defined as a decision which "shall be made by an affirmative vote of nine members, including the concurring votes of the permanent members", while in the case of the Assembly it was to be a decision in which "a simple majority" of the members present and voting is sufficient. Herein lies the second error, that is similar processes having differential weightage. In other words, the "recommendation" stage of the process which is carried out by the Council overwhelmed the "appointment" stage which is the responsibility of the Assembly.
The combination of the factors and developments I have just mentioned has resulted in a situation whereby the Assembly’s role and responsibilities have gradually whittled away. Many have characterized this as converting the Assembly into a mere rubber-stamp of the Council’s recommendation.

Madam Co-Chair,

What is to be done? The answer is clear. Being the voice of the international community, the General Assembly must have a greater say in the process of selection of the Secretary General. In this regard, there are a number of important elements that the UN membership can consider as medium-term measures that could be applied the next time the post of Secretary General becomes vacant.

For instance, the General Assembly adopted resolutions 51/241 of 22 August 1997 and 60/286 of 9 October 2006, which outline in detail proposals on improving the process of selection and appointment of the Secretary-General. Further, the practice established by GA Resolution 11 (1) can be modified to allow for the Council to send a panel of names that the Assembly could choose from as against a single nomination. Additionally, if the member-states attach high importance to the role and responsibilities of the Assembly, we see no reason why the matter should not be “decided by a two-thirds majority” in terms of Article 18 (3) as against the one with a simple majority requirement in Resolution 11 (1). We could also identify objective criteria for the candidatures, including commitment to the purposes and principles of the Charter, extensive leadership, administrative and diplomatic experience with due regard being given to regional rotation and gender equality. Equally useful and practical would be to encourage formal presentation of candidatures in a manner that allows sufficient time for interaction with member-states, and also requires candidates to present their views to all member-states of the General Assembly.

Madam Co-Chair,

Only with real changes can we ensure that the General Assembly exercises its judgment in the matter of the appointment of the Secretary-General, rather than merely rubber stamping proposals by the Security Council while ensuring that the appointment process does not become a divisive issue between the General Assembly and the Security Council. Indeed, as envisaged in the Charter, this is a process that involves both these organs and needs to be carried out in a collaborative exercise respecting each other's mandate.

In conclusion, Madam Co-Chair let me re-emphasize the need to discuss substantive measures that would strengthen the role of General Assembly as the chief deliberative, legislative, policy-making and representative body of the international community.

You can expect our constructive support and participation in your efforts.

Thank You.

636. Extempore remarks by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative of India on Agenda Item No. 126 - "Sixty-fifth anniversary of the end of the Second World War : Special solemn meeting in commemoration of all victims of the war" at General Assembly Hall.

Madam President,

World War II was one of the most devastating conflicts witnessed in human history and it is imperative that we remember all the victims of this war and pay homage to them and to their memory.

We are, therefore, grateful to the General Assembly for convening this session and to the delegation of the Russian Federation for having piloted the resolution.

As I stand here, I salute the valiant young men and women and populations of all the countries who fought and ensured that we live in a world free from fascism. It is also absolutely imperative that we use this opportunity to pledge and ensure our commitment to the most fundamental principle and purpose of the United Nations that is to ensure that successive generations are saved from the scourge of war.

Madam President,

We are commemorating the end of the Second World War in the western theatre. In this context, as we pay homage, tribute and salute soldiers and populations from all the countries in Europe and across the Atlantic, it is very important to also note and remember the huge contributions and sacrifices made by people in other parts of the world.

This is certainly true of my country. The Indian Army at the start of the World War II was a mere 200,000 men. This swelled to 2.5 million men, the largest volunteer force ever raised in history and it participated in most of the crucial campaigns of World War II, suffering nearly 35,000 fatalities and over a 100,000 injured. Sacrifices of our valorous young men and their families have ensured that we live in a world free of fascism.

Madam President,

India had participated in the San Francisco Conference and, as a founding member of the United Nations is strongly committed to the purposes and principles of the UN and its Charter. I am further honoured to restate our absolute determination to be part of the international community committed to save the successive generations from the scourge of war and be with the United Nations in the maintenance of international peace and security.

I thank you Madam President,
637. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative of India, at the Informal Meeting on the 2010 Review of the Peacebuilding Commission at the General Assembly Hall.

Madam Co-Facilitator, Distinguished Co-Facilitators,

Thank you for convening today’s informal meeting and for the “Emerging Issues” paper which is both comprehensive and focused. This can form a very useful basis for the on-going review of the Peacebuilding Commission. Let me at the outset, Madam Co-Facilitator align my delegation with the statement delivered by my distinguished colleague from Bangladesh on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement. Since my statement was prepared before you invited delegations to focus on specific individual issues, I request your indulgence as I deliver a comprehensive statement that addresses all relevant issues.

Co-Facilitators,

I wish to begin by echoing the Secretary General’s assertion, in his report last year, on peacebuilding in the aftermath of conflict. The imperative of national ownership and the anchoring of international peacebuilding efforts at the country level cannot be overemphasized. Even in cases where it is difficult to locate national ownership, international peacebuilding efforts should be geared towards strengthening the capacity of a post-conflict State to govern effectively and to govern well. Security clearly is the key pillar for peacebuilding. Capacity building also assumes importance especially in instances where countries find it difficult to completely utilize the financial assistance they have been provided.

It is equally important to focus on building economic opportunity, particularly for the youth along with political and social stability. In most situations, unemployment amongst youth is a major factor for perpetuation of the underlying causes of conflict. Peace cannot therefore be achieved and consolidated unless and until employment opportunities are available in the economy. The impact of employment-generation activities would be both positive and immediate. The international community must pay greater attention, facilitate and strengthen the ability of the national authorities concerned in promoting employment generation. Co-Facilitators, my delegation is of the view that the international community, acting through the instrumentality of the PBC, must always strive to ensure that there is effective two-way dialogue between countries on the Agenda of the PBC and the Commission itself through all stages. In this regard, it is important that the on-going review result in re-orienting the current peacebuilding architecture in such a manner that would enable the Organizational Committee of the PBC to play a more decisive role in formulating the Commission's approach towards post-conflict situations. Also, country-specific configurations must not run ahead of the national government concerned in setting targets. On the question of the type of UN presence most conducive to ensuring a broader, coherent and integrated approach to peacebuilding, my delegation believes that there cannot be any fractured or piece-meal approach to the maintenance of international peace and security. The international community must therefore, in the interests of ensuring continuity and credibility of the transition process, give greater say to the major troop and police contributing countries in the various peacekeeping operations. In particular, the Security Council should heed the advice of these countries both individually and through the instrumentality of the PBC while formulating and revising mandates of UN missions.

Co-Facilitators,

The international community needs to constantly improve the governance structures of the peacebuilding architecture. Such improvements must primarily seek to ensure that all the available resources that are geared towards peacebuilding in post-conflict situations are properly harnessed in the shortest possible time. This we believe is the sine qua non of peacebuilding. In this regard, the PBF should be truly transformed into an effective mechanism for translating the international community's resolve into prompt and responsive financing. Such financing would then be able to encourage the rest of the actors in the peacebuilding architecture to make complementary contributions.

Co-Facilitators,

It is not always possible to transplant models of internal political reconciliation specific to one region and one context to a different region and context. And the international community must not show undue eagerness for such arrangements in its hurry to bring peace. The most evident corollary to this approach is to further encourage regional and sub-regional organizations in Africa to play a more important role both in peacekeeping and peacebuilding issues within Africa. The peacebuilding architecture must institutionalize structures and processes to this end. Co-Facilitators, Peacebuilding is a peculiarly UN-centric word. It is very important to connect it to the real world. We need to properly communicate to the international community the nature and content of the Commission’s work. In this context, peacebuilding is essentially an activity based on consolidation. Even when carried out in parallel with peacekeeping, it is distinct from the latter and therefore it is critical that the phrases we use do not obliterate such distinctions. The efforts of the various strategies of the peacebuilding architecture must be to strengthen a representative and effective Government in the country concerned. Eventually, it is the Government of the country that is answerable if it is unable to deliver on peace consolidation strategies; and that answer must be given to the people it represents. It is also the Government of that country that will need to manage processes beyond the country’s engagement with the PBC.

Co-Facilitators,

I would be remiss if I did not stress on two very important imperatives. First, while the work of the PBC should draw on the synergies of three principal organs of the United Nations, namely the General Assembly, the Security Council and the Economic and Social Council when they are handling post-conflict situations, the experience till date has shown that we are still some distance away from such a harmonized partnership. In particular, the General Assembly and the ECOSOC should step up its dialogue and coordination with the PBC and its various constituents. This would ensure that the Commission is able to successfully play its assigned role of "an intergovernmental advisory body" that handles post-conflict situations. Second, the PBC should not take on the task of advising States on post-conflict peace consolidation; instead it should help the State concerned identify and utilize genuine international expertise in addressing such sensitive issues.

In conclusion, Co-Facilitators, let me reiterate that India has a unique experience of nation-building in a large, complex and most diverse setting as we have strived to give our people a better way of life. This has allowed us to develop multifaceted capacities relevant to peacebuilding and development. We have shared this experience and expertise in a number of countries transiting from conflict to peace. We are very happy to continue to make available our capabilities in nation building to countries in post-conflict situations and cooperate with the United Nations in its peacebuilding activities, including for development, social sector reform and rule of law and security.

638. Intervention by Vijai Sharma, Secretary, Ministry of Environment and Forests, on the occasion of SIDS Day/Preparatory Meeting for the 5-year review of the Mauritius Strategy of Implementation during CSD-18.

Mr. Chairman,

We associate ourselves with the statement made by the distinguished representative of Yemen on behalf of the Group of 77. It is heartening that the CSD has established a practice of holding a SIDS Day during each review session. The fact that today’s meeting will lay the groundwork for the September 2010 review of the Mauritius Strategy of Implementation makes our discussion even more relevant. It is satisfying that our meeting has been preceded by a comprehensive preparatory process, including regional meetings in Vanuatu, Maldives and Grenada, as well as an inter-regional meeting. Full participation of SIDS in the review process is key to the event.

Mr. Chairman, We thank the Secretary-General for the detailed reports on the subject, which provide updated information for a meaningful review of the progress made. We note that the SIDS have progressed well on MDGs related to socio-economic parameters including health. However, there is reason for concern as economic growth, which is vital for poverty eradication and for achieving MDGs on a sustained basis, has not kept up with the pace required. The debt situation of some SIDS has also deteriorated sharply.

The Secretary-General's reports have correctly highlighted the intrinsic vulnerabilities of SIDS and the income distribution inequalities, not captured in the statistics on per capita GDP and Human Development Indices. At the same time, it is apparent that the global Financial crisis, the other external shocks and the adverse impacts of climate change have had a significant adverse impact on the sustainable development efforts of SIDS. We concur with the assessment in the Secretary-General's reports that the Economic Vulnerability Index of SIDS demonstrates that incomes do not automatically translate into greater coping ability. There is need for more objective criteria to evaluate vulnerability. We look forward to the results of the vulnerability-resilience methodology being developed by DESA. The thematic issues of this CSD meet - transport, mining and sustainable consumption & production - are particularly relevant for the developmental effort of the SIDS given their narrow resource base and remoteness. The high cost of transport of goods to SIDS, for example, is clearly a result of small volumes and long distances.

Mr. Chairman,

India recognizes fully the special challenges faced by SIDS in the pursuit of sustainable development. We know the issues on account of the large number of small islands in India and low lying coastal areas. Also, because we have, in recent times, revisited our two-decade-old coastal management system in light of the challenges from climate change induced sea level rise and the growing pressures on both biodiversity and on the unique benefits that coastal ecosystems confer. We in India have looked at new approaches to secure the livelihoods and habitats of the coastal people through space-technology aids, tighter standards of environmental protection, cumulative assessments at higher levels of sophistication and resolution, and the strengthening of our knowledge base on impacts, vulnerabilities and adaptation. As part of South-South cooperation, India has been privileged to share its development experience and technological resource with SIDS in the belief that human and institutional capacity-building is key to sustainable development. We have also assisted in implementing projects in the areas identified by SIDS. Our cooperation has been in diverse sectors, including adaptation to the adverse effects of climate change, information and communication, waste management, remote sensing, hydrographic survey, telemedicine, public transport, education, irrigation systems, food and agriculture, and fisheries. Overall, India has committed project aid of US $ 70 million to SIDS, in addition to US $ 350 million in concessional loans and credit lines.

Such efforts by sister developing countries cannot substitute the commitments made by our developed country partners that remain unfulfilled for providing financial and technological resources, building capacities and providing market access. This should be remedied, and we hope that the meeting today will help provide the necessary momentum in this regard. Let me say, as I conclude, that I have felt very privileged to speak at this important meeting. Thank you.
Mr. President,

Allow me at the outset to congratulate you on assuming the Presidency of the Security Council. I would also like to thank the three distinguished Chairs of the Committees established pursuant to Security Council Resolutions 1267, 1373 and 1540 for their painstaking efforts in steering the work of their respective Committees. This periodic stocktaking is timely and critical. We are happy to participate in today's open debate.

Mr. President,

Terrorism poses an extremely serious threat to all states and all societies. It threatens democracy and democratic values. It aims to destroy lives and reverse development. The backdrop of the latest terrorism related incidents once again underscore that terrorism is a global threat and requires a coordinated and concerted global response. There are deep concerns about the potential nexus between clandestine proliferation and terrorism and the ever-present danger of such weapons or vulnerable nuclear materials falling into the hands of non-state actors. To effectively combat the scourge of terrorism, it must be resolutely opposed, resisted and overcome through undiluted commitment and effort by the international community. International solidarity and shared determination are absolutely imperative to combat this scourge effectively. It is important to bear in mind that the success of implementation of counter-terrorism measures not only requires the fullest collective effort by the entire membership, but also their fullest participation in processes that affect the collective security of all the nations equally.

Mr. President,

India has an abiding interest in expeditiously concluding the long-pending Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT).
An early adoption of CCIT is in the interests of all Member States and would provide impetus to multilateral and collective action to countering international terrorism efforts. Almost, all the elements of the proposed CCIT have passed muster by legal experts. What is required now is the necessary political will to ensure the early adoption of the CCIT.

Mr. President,

We support the anti-terrorism mechanisms established by the United Nations, including United Nations Security Council Resolution 1267, related to sanctions against Al-Qaeda/ Taliban; United Nations Security Council Resolution 1373, which led to the establishment of the Counter Terrorism Committee; and United Nations Security Council Resolution 1540, which addressed the issue of non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. We also support the subsequent resolutions that renewed, strengthened or amended these three original resolutions. India’s regulatory and legislative framework is fully geared to implementing the obligations under these resolutions. We look forward to greater efforts to bring together inter related aspects of the operational mechanism of the 1267 Committee, 1540 Committee and the Counter Terrorism Committee and dovetailing these with the Counter Terrorism Implementation Task Force. It is our earnest hope that all these efforts within the UN body will be integrated more closely with the core tasks being taken forward by specialized bodies such as the UNODC, Interpol, ICAO, IMO etc. We strongly affirm the importance of collective effort to focus on technical assistance in helping a State implementing the mandate of the Counter Terrorism Committee and 1540 Committee and the related instruments. We are willing to extend assistance, bilaterally as well as multilaterally, in the larger effort to counter the threat of terrorism.

Mr. President,

For strengthening and effective implementation of counter-terrorism measures, the Security Council has focused on upgrading the existing mandates to ensure effective compliance with its resolutions. These efforts need to be supplemented with a more collaborative approach of extending assistance, utilizing available regional expertise and appropriate technologies.
The latest UNSC Resolution, 1904, has attempted to streamline the functioning of the Al-Qaida and Taliban Sanctions Committee. We support measures to strengthen the review process of the listings in the Consolidated List through the Office of the Ombudsperson with a view to increasing fairness and transparency of the sanctions regime. At the same time, Mr. President, we are concerned that the process of listing and de-listing in the Consolidated List continues to be subjected to political will and pressure - a scenario that we can ill-afford in our united fight against terrorism. We would encourage the Committee to continue to work towards improving both the content and functionality of its website. We fully support the Counter Terrorism Committee and the Counter Terrorism Executive Directorate's efforts to play a more effective role in countering terrorism. We welcome the Committee's efforts to organize thematic briefings, streamlining its working methods and give more focus to substantive and analytic work. We have taken note of the latest progress made by the 1540 Committee towards the comprehensive review of status of implementation of Resolution 1540. We support efforts to prepare guidelines for handling assistance requests by countries and to find means to address the most commonly found gaps in the implementation of Resolution 1540. It is important that these activities are performed at the request of Member States and keeping in mind their varying national capacities, procedures and systems.

Mr. President,

In conclusion, let me reiterate that we will continue to work closely with the counter terrorism mechanisms established pursuant to Security Council Resolutions 1267, 1373 and 1540. We welcome efforts to use open dialogue as a means to build closer cooperation within the international system. What we need is the necessary political will accompanied with concerted and resolute action to effectively combat the scourge of terrorism.

Thank you.
640. Intervention by Rajiva Misra, Joint Secretary, Ministry of External Affairs, in the Round Table: Mining for Sustainable Development—High Level Segment-CSD 18.

Mr. Chairman,

We associate ourselves with the statement made by the Group of 77.

Mining in India is an important contributor to the country's GDP and is also a significant source of employment generation. The total value of mineral production during the year 2009-10 in India stood at roughly US$ 27 billion.

Mr. Chairman,

It is well recognised that mining, unless properly regulated, can have adverse environmental and social consequences. On one hand, mining disturbs the soil, water and ecological regimes and on the other hand, unless accompanied by proactive measures to promote inclusiveness, it can lead to the alienation of the local population and assume socially unacceptable dimensions. This brings me to the first of the three major issues related to the sustainability of mining operations.

Indian experience has shown that Relief and Rehabilitation (R&R) solutions are not as easy as they seem and unless properly designed and implemented, can have law and order implications as well. India has come up with a comprehensive National R&R Policy in the year 2007 and the newer R&R plans like that of Jharia (2009) incorporate self-contained new townships for the displaced population and also a detailed programme for skill upgradation.

Mr. Chairman,

The second issue is, how do you plan upfront for sustainable mining operations? India has managed to evolve a fairly robust system of environmental clearances as well as forest land diversion related clearances. However, the real challenge lies in monitoring and enforcing the conditions stipulated in these clearances. Since mining activities are mostly carried out in remote and far flung areas, institutional innovation and creation of empowered monitoring authorities to take care of such concerns, has to be ensured on a priority basis.

Mr. Chairman,

The third issue related to mining is land degradation. A country like India has about 0.7% of its land mass under mines. Despite detailed guidelines of the Indian Bureau of Mines, restoration of land after mines closure remains a big challenge. A two pronged strategy is needed to address this issue: one, capacity building of mining companies along with greater stress on Corporate Social Responsibility; and two, enacting a more effective regulatory regime. Application of GIS/GPS based monitoring mechanisms and related technologies could prove to be very useful and this needs to be encouraged through greater flow of technology and resources to the developing world.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.
Mr. Chairperson, Excellencies, and Distinguished Delegates:

We associate ourselves with the statement made by the Group of 77. The deliberations in this conference reflect the global community's shared interest to make this planet safe for the present and future generations. Chemicals represent a vital element of economic development encompassing virtually the entire spectrum of human activity. Indian chemical industry manufactures more than 70,000 commercial products and contributes significantly towards industrial and economic growth accounting for 3% of our GDP. Sound management of chemicals, therefore, is essential to achieving long term growth, including eradication of poverty and improvement of quality of life of our people.

Mr. Chairperson,

Solid waste generation is predominantly an industrial and urban problem, which has exacerbated over the years due to changing lifestyles and increasing consumerism, resulting from rapid urbanization. Presently about 200 million tonnes of non-hazardous waste of industrial and mining origin, 6.23 million tonnes of hazardous waste, 57 million tonnes of municipal solid waste (MSW), and about 350 million tonnes of other waste from agricultural sources are generated in the country. India has developed a robust, overarching legislative framework for sound management of chemicals and waste. I would like to focus my thoughts on some of the issues, which in my view are basic to meeting the objectives of a sound management of chemicals and waste. The first issue is how to integrate the informal sector into the formalized regime as in India a large number of informal sectors are involved for collection and segregation of e-waste. The second issue is to explore alternative utilization of Hazardous Waste instead of traditional disposal on land.
and thus maximizing their optimal use. India has about 36,000 industrial units generating hazardous waste. Waste having high calorific value is being co-processed in cement industries and the experience has been encouraging. The utilization of such waste is being attempted for other sectors like power and steel industry as well.

The third issue relates to the positive results in India in setting up of Treatment, Storage and Disposal Facilities (TSDF) for Hazardous Waste in Public Private Partnership (PPP) mode. As on date we have 25 such facilities and 8 are under construction. The fourth issue relates to food security and public health. Use of chemicals and pesticides is critical to food security. There is an equally important public health dimension to the use of chemicals. We use DDT for malaria control and are conscious of the harmful effects of DDT. Many Countries, including India feel compelled to continue using DDT as it has overriding utility from public health perspective. The fifth issue relates to listing of new chemicals within the purview of ban and restrictions under the multilateral environmental agreements. We need to follow a calibrated and scientific approach and not be overzealous to quickly bring more chemicals into the purview. The sixth issue relates to prevention, mitigation and management of chemical accidents. India has developed an IT enabled Web Based Chemical Emergency Planning and Response System comprising digitized maps and location specific data of the maximum accident hazard units. This has improved our emergency preparedness. To facilitate flow of chemical accidents information, an online web based Chemical Accident Information and Reporting System (CAIRS) has been developed. The seventh issue is regarding the limited availability of financial resources and the need for technical capacity building for Chemical and Waste management for developing countries. Only limited financial resources are available for implementation of the obligation under the Stockholm Convention. This needs to be supplemented.

Thank you, Mr. Chairperson.

Thank you very much, Madam Under-Secretary General. I am indeed very grateful to you. I thought I would depart from what my colleagues have written because I have been following the trend of what is being discussed today and I thought let me try and make a few brief points, noting the time constraints.

Madam Undersecretary General, Panelists, thank you very much for your deliberations today. We much appreciate what all of you have brought to the table, here at the United Nations, for us to mull over here on the issue of piracy off the Somali coast.

It is important for us to acknowledge that there are political, legal, social and economic aspects and that these need to be addressed. There should be no issue on that. I think we are all one on that.

I think we also need to recognize that what is happening is that the pirates are becoming much more sophisticated. The pirates' capacities are increasing, these are also increasing as a result of the acts that they undertake for a variety of reasons which are well-known to us. This makes the situation extremely worrying because of its capacity to impact global trade. The impact on trade in our region is, in any case, is immense. We suffer the consequences of this. India is also faced with the fact that a large proportion of the seafarer community comes from our country. This has social consequences for us, apart merely from the fact that our nationals are caught-up.

We certainly and fully respect what UNCLOS has to say, jurisdictions of flag states and all other rules and regulations which fall in this ambit. But I think the need of the hour for all of us today is to find solutions where States have the preponderance of being able to take action which is through collaboration. Individually, they are always going to be ahead of us, because of the kind of motivations that drive the pirates including the lure but we as the Member States of UN and as States have capacities which are huge but which need to be tapped and brought into collaborative action. It is therefore extremely important that we look at what we can do for this collaboration both on the legal framework side as well as in terms of practical collaboration. We, therefore, would be very supportive of these deliberations to see what we can do, what are the kind of innovations that we can look at, evolutions if necessary in terms of international law.

And I think, it is extremely important that we also look at issues on strengthening capacities of countries in the region to deal not only with the situation as it prevails but also the situation as with regard to the question of handling the people who get caught, when you capture pirates, when you bring them to the shore and their trials. It is quite clear this is well beyond the capacities of many of the States with whom we are also trying to have arrangements and so on and so forth.

I want to stop here, Madam Under Secretary-General, and say that we of course are very supportive of various international arrangements which are already in place and which are being worked on, in the International Maritime Bureau, the ReCAP and, in particular the activities of its Piracy Reporting Center as well as the multifaceted initiatives recently taken by the IMO.

We also believe very strongly in the role of the UN and I am very happy that you have convened the meeting here at the United Nations. This gives all of us, the global community, the ability to be able to participate, to understand, to contribute and have the United Nations in a pivotal role to be able to see what we can do as a global community to address this particular issue which is of very serious concern to everyone.

Thank you very much.
Thank you very much Mr. President for giving me this opportunity.

Let me at the outset, express my delegation's appreciation to the President of the General Assembly for this useful interaction.

The briefing provided on the progress till date on the World Development Report 2011 highlights the inter-linkages between “conflict, security and development.” This opportunity for interaction between member-states and the World Bank, coming as it has in the midst of the on-going review of the Peacebuilding Commission, is particularly welcome.

I have had the privilege of interacting with two of the panelists some time back at a weekend retreat. I am, therefore, aware of the high quality of their presentation. The other two panelists have also contributed immensely to the rich discussions today.

Having paid compliments, we need to have a reality check regarding the issues at hand. There a few stark facts that stare us in the face. All countries except Haiti on the Peacebuilding Commission's agenda are in Africa. And the continent of Africa, in spite of all the lofty pronouncements of the international community, continues to face endemic problems.

The mandates of the various bodies that make up the global governance architecture were devised sixty years ago. There are many of us who believe that unless this architecture is changed to reflect current realities, the contributions that these bodies can make will be somewhat limited.

In the context of the World Bank, we cannot think of any other way for its useful contribution to global issues other than by focusing on the issue of poverty alleviation which lies at the core of problems in Africa.
Along with poverty alleviation, the other requiring the Bank's attention is youth unemployment. This is particularly relevant as we are dealing with fragile states that have the potential of lapsing back to conflict unless adequate steps are taken to address the immediate challenges at hand.

Several interventions before me, including that by the Permanent Representative of Ireland referred to the nature of interaction between the UN and the World Bank. In my view, nice exchanges of pleasantries, documents, analysis by themselves will not take us very far. We need to see where resources that would benefit these countries can be mobilized. We see that in similar discussions, there is fatigue and ennui in Africa about the UN's role. Why is it so? Is it because the development quotient or development dividend has not been forthcoming in the UN's activities there?

Now I would like to move to my speaking notes.

The issues of conflict prevention in a globalised world do not merely cover situations wherein we have a repressive states and helpless individuals. We have conflicts created by the result of the acquisition of war-fighting capabilities and techniques by non-state actors.

Let us be clear, that when countries are confronted with such challenges, the international community should be able to provide the necessary resources to enable them to deal with the situation. I have repeatedly stressed the imperative of national ownership. Even in cases where it is difficult to locate national ownership, international peacebuilding efforts should be geared towards strengthening the capacity of a post-conflict State to govern effectively and to govern well. Creating economic opportunities and capacity building needs to be flagged.

We need to constantly improve the governance structures of the peacebuilding architecture. Such improvements must primarily seek to ensure that all the available resources that are geared towards peacebuilding in post-conflict situations are properly harnessed in the shortest possible time. This we believe is the sine qua non of peacebuilding. In this regard, we welcome the role that the World Bank has been playing and call for its continued association with the Peacebuilding Commission.
I would like to touch briefly on Afghanistan which is one of the countries that you are dealing with in your study. India has remained committed to assisting Afghanistan in its development efforts in accordance with the wishes and priorities of the people of Afghanistan. India’s development partnership with Afghanistan, currently to the tune of more than US$ 1.3 billion, is focused on the areas of infrastructure development, human resource development and capacity building, food assistance and small development projects that bring immediate benefit to the people at the grass-roots level. Bilateral cooperation apart, India is also actively partnering with the UNDP, especially in capacity building for the Afghan public service as well as for building of national institutions.

In the case of Haiti, soon after the devastating earthquake, India announced a cash contribution of US $ 5 million towards relief measures as a token of solidarity with the people of Haiti and transferred the entire amount to the Government of Haiti on 2 February, 2010. Moreover, in response to a request for additional peacekeepers following adoption of UN Security Council resolution 1908 in the immediate aftermath of the earthquake, India is sending two additional Formed Police Units to Haiti to strengthen MINUSTAH. We have also joined Brazil and South Africa in deciding to expand our IBSA, the India-Brazil-South Africa Trust Fund, waste management project in Haiti, both in its area of coverage and its scope of handling different types of waste. IBSA plans to spend over US$ 2 million in this effort and for reconstruction of a community health centre in Haiti this year.

In conclusion, let me reiterate that India would be very happy to continue to make available our capabilities in nation building to countries in post-conflict situations and cooperate with the United Nations in its peacebuilding activities.
644. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, on Agenda Items 48 and 114: Consideration of the Secretary General's Report on "Human Security" at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

Let me begin by thanking all the panelists as well as participants for their presentations and useful insights on the emerging concept of "Human Security". We would like to recognise the personal interest of the Permanent Representative of Japan in pursuing this debate in the UN and thank the Secretary General for his report A/64/701.

Mr. President, The concept of human security from a layman's perspective might appear quite obvious and is perhaps well captured in the World Summit Outcome document paragraph 143 as freedom from fear, freedom from want and right to live with dignity for all individual in order to fully develop their potential. However, as noted in paragraph 143 there is a need to clearly define the concept of human security in the multilateral context. The basic framework for this discussion was, of course, provided in the same paragraph by referring to the three mutually interlinked issues of security, livelihood, and dignity, with individual at its centre. In our discussions on the definition, it is important to ensure that human security is clearly situated within the parameters of non-aggression, non-interference in the domestic affairs of States, right to national self-defence and State sovereignty, which is the bedrock of international relations and domestic governance. The definition needs to recognize that the primary responsibility for human security rests with States and Governments. Obviously there can be no place for interventionism in the concept of human security.

The concept must be people centric and should go beyond the narrow framework of protection of population from physical security like war and conflict to a much broad framework to encompass multi-dimensional and comprehensive parameters with development as an important pillar.
Mr. President, We recognise the complexity associated with this concept and its multidimensional linkages at national, regional and international level. Major international challenges of today, in-fact, require the tackling of persistent and chronic social and economic challenges, which confront States. At the UN we have pledged to address these challenges in numerous ways, but most importantly by focusing on the achievement of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs). The SG’s report also meticulously establishes the direct linkage of exacerbation of these challenges by the recent global crises, including the financial and economic crisis, energy price fluctuations, food security challenges as well as the adverse ramifications of climate change. These challenges, of course, are no longer confined within national boundaries. In this regard, it is imperative to stress the need for genuine international cooperation, which recognizes the inherent constraints many developing countries face especially in mobilizing internal and external resources for the socio-economic and developmental activities.

Mr. President, In India we are committed to ensure fundamental rights and dignity to every citizen. In recent years the thrust of our socio-economic development has, moreover, focused on “inclusive growth”, i.e. bringing the fruits of economic development to all sections of our society, particularly in rural India and among the vulnerable. It is our belief that a comprehensive approach to human security is the only way that this concept would help every human being explore his/her potential to the maximum, while pursuing a life of dignity in a safe and healthy environment.

Thank You Mr. President.
Mr. Chairman,

Thank you very much for giving me the floor. Let me at the outset express my deep gratitude to you and your team in producing the negotiation text.

You are aware that India has been a firm supporter of actual negotiations for reform of the Security Council. To this end we actively supported the demand requesting you to produce a text on which the negotiations could start. The involvement of 140 Member-States in raising this demand clearly shows the overwhelming nature of the support in the international community for real reform of the Security Council. We applaud the effort undertaken by you and your team in producing the negotiation text.

Mr. Chairman,

Your negotiation text is a good basis for starting serious inter-governmental negotiations. It is imperative that all of us engage in these negotiations going beyond the general statements of our positions and intent. Equally important is the need for the process of Council reform to remain the exclusive preserve of the UN member-states at these inter-governmental negotiations. Efforts that in any way detract from these negotiations need to be eschewed.

As regards the text, it is, of course, obvious that in the first instance we need to make it shorter and focus it on the middle-ground, i.e. where the views of the overwhelming majority lie on the key aspects of reform.
Mr. Chairman, the voices in this room today and as we proceed to discuss the five specific elements in detail over the coming weeks, we believe, would give you a clear idea of where this middle ground is. In the view of my delegation, the following are significant.

First, the overwhelming majority of UN member-states have expressed their clear preference for expansion of the Council in both its permanent and non-permanent categories. There cannot be any reform without expansion in both the categories of membership. Equally, expansion only in the non-permanent category or any of its other variants does not constitute reform and is merely the perpetuation of the current inefficiency by the same ineffective means in vogue since 1963.

Second, on the size of the Council, there is convergence on the need for expansion from the current fifteen to a figure in the mid-twenties. Also, most of the positions have called for a mandatory review after a period ranging from eight to fifteen years.

Third, the G4 position on the ‘question of the veto’ is unambiguous and constructive. We stress the need for an outcome that ensures the democratization of decision-making within the Council. India is willing to engage with all concerned with an open mind on this key issue.

Fourth, India associates itself with the growing clamour for early reform of working methods of the Council, which is an integral part of the broader imperative of comprehensive reform and expansion of the membership of the Council in both permanent and non-permanent categories.

Fifth, on the issue of regional representation, we lay great store by the principle of equitable geographical distribution. India supports a Charter-based distribution of seats that addresses the lack of representation of African, Latin American and Caribbean countries and the lack of adequate representation of Asian countries in the permanent membership; as well as the lack of adequate representation of developing countries, including least developed, landlocked countries and small island states in the non-permanent membership.
Sixth, India calls for the General Assembly and the Security Council as two principal organs of the United Nations to respect each other’s distinct roles, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter, and strive to secure the effective functioning of the United Nations as a whole.

Mr. Chairman,

Before I conclude, let me restate the obvious. Unless and until we are either resigned by fate or circumscribed by design to an unrepresentative, ineffective and underperforming Security Council, we must hasten to achieve results. We owe it primarily to ourselves and to our succeeding generations to bring about genuine reform at the earliest. To this end, India, alongwith its partners in the G4, L.69 and other like-minded countries and groupings is committed to play its due role in a spirit of accommodation and flexibility. We call on the others to do so likewise and thus rise up to the challenge.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

646. Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative, on Agenda Item 44- Implementation of the Declaration of Commitment on HIV/AIDS and the Political Declaration on HIV/AIDS at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

Let me begin by thanking you for convening this plenary meeting on the implementation of the Declaration of Commitment on HIV/AIDS and the Political Declaration on HIV/AIDS. I would also like to thank the Secretary General for his report on this important issue. We have taken note of the various recommendations which are contained in the report.
This report provides us with a good overview of the global HIV/AIDS scene prior to next year’s comprehensive review of the achievements of 2001 Declaration of Commitment as well as 2006 Political Declaration on HIV/AIDS.

At the outset, let me extend my support to the draft decision which you have put before us under this agenda item. We look forward to the consultations which will be held later this year to discuss the modalities and organizational arrangements for the next year’s comprehensive review of the Declaration of Commitment on HIV/AIDS.

Mr. President,

In 2001 and later in 2006, we embarked upon an ambitious task of achieving universal access to HIV prevention, treatment, care and support by 2010. This, along with the target set forth in MDG 6, namely, halting and reversing the spread of HIV/AIDS epidemic by 2015, acted as the guiding principles in our joint efforts to combat this pandemic. While some progress has been made, however, targets still appear quite far.

Moreover, this year, we will also be reviewing the progress made in all the MDGs in September at the High-level Plenary meeting of the General Assembly. This will give us yet another opportunity to reaffirm our political will and commitment to reach the goals we have set forth ourselves.

Mr. President,

The SG’s report points to mixed progress in the fight against HIV/AIDS, worldwide. On the positive side, as of December 2008, four million people in low and middle income countries were receiving anti-retroviral therapy - 10 times more than that of five years ago—and new HIV infections decreased by 17% between 2001 and 2008.

However, on the other hand, it can be seen that the epidemic continues to outpace the HIV response; and for every two people starting antiretroviral therapy, five are getting newly infected. Unfortunately, the HIV pandemic continues to remain one of the leading causes of death among reproductive age women worldwide.

Mr. President,

In India, in terms of prevalence, adult HIV rate is as low as 0.36%, nonetheless, in absolute terms, it is estimated that the HIV positive population is around 2.46 million. The primary objective of our national programme to combat HIV/AIDS, i.e., the National AIDS Control Programme, is in line with MDG 6 of halting and reversing the spread of HIV/AIDS epidemic by 2015.

One of the important feature of this programme is to scale up its efforts through Targeted Interventions for High Risk Groups, strategizing comprehensive Information, Education and Communication packages for specific segments, and scaling up of the service delivery component.

Mr. President,

For us, the fight against HIV/AIDS has socio-economic and developmental dimensions, not merely a public health dimension. We have also mainstreamed HIV/AIDS prevention, care and treatment in all government schemes and activities and have actively involved corporate sector, NGOs and other stakeholders as a partner, towards this end. The need for a holistic approach that includes effective prevention strategies and access to low-cost affordable treatment for all cannot be overemphasized, for the effective combat of the HIV/AIDS pandemic. Having realized that politic commitment is of paramount importance to combat HIV/AIDS, our National Council on AIDS is chaired by the Prime Minister and the State Councils by the respective Chief Ministers.

Mr. President,

There is a need for greater cooperation and coordination at international level to fight this challenge in a concerted manner. India has also been at the forefront of global efforts on AIDS research and has been working in collaboration with the International AIDS Vaccine Initiative in this regard.
One of the major obstacles in the achievement of universal treatment is the high cost of anti-retroviral drugs. Indian pharmaceutical industry has been filling this critical gap by reducing the costs of these life saving generic drugs by producing high quality affordable drugs for its use in India and also in other developing countries. These efforts need to be fully recognized and supported by the international community. This has become all the more critical as universal access to anti retroviral treatment become mainstreamed in public health policies of governments. Further, availability of second generation anti retroviral drugs will not have any meaningful impact, if low cost generic versions are not made available in the market.

Mr. President,

Fight against HIV/AIDS is one of the keys to achieving the MDGs by 2015. We have come a long way since we committed ourselves to goals related to the HIV/AIDS pandemic but the task at hand continues to remain difficult and formidable. Let me reiterate our full commitment to effectively control HIV/AIDS pandemic in a comprehensive, multi-pronged and multi-sectoral manner, both nationally and internationally.

Thank you, Mr. President
Mr. Chairman,

I did not have the privilege of delivering our statement at the meeting on 2 June 2010 as I was sent by my Government to represent my country elsewhere. If I had been here that day, I would have expressed appreciation for your leadership of the process and extended my support for the approach you have outlined for carrying our work forward. I was particularly pleased to note that you had invoked former American President John F. Kennedy in describing the potential inherent in the negotiation text. Specifically, you enquired: Ask not what the text can do for you but what you can do for the text.

If the text had been animate it would have cried out for help, for trimming out all the fat and for making it lean and thin. In other words, it would have liked to be reduced from the current 28/29 pages to something like two or two and a half pages. In my view, this is not difficult to accomplish.

I am happy to hear the views of Italy which said that they have been flexible. Let me also add that we are ready to show flexibility. Whatever be the criteria we use to shorten the text-and my good friend Maged [PR of Egypt], with his usual brilliance has made even the NAM position look like that of the African Group-we can work together to reduce the overlaps and repetitions and shorten the text.

Mr. Chairman,

You have given us a carefully constructed document. You have been fair in reflecting all positions and proposals in the text. We also understand why you are asking us, the member-states to indicate the support for those proposals that should remain in the text and why you have refrained from passing judgment on the support that each proposal commands. But what we now have is a good and constructive process that needs to become more robust. For reducing the length of the text from the present 28 to something like two and a half pages, we must go through the current process.

I heard the statement from the US side which mentioned that they do not support the subordination of either principal organ by the other. And this is precisely our position as well.

Mr. Chairman,

In India’s view, the General Assembly should lead in setting the global agenda and ensuring the centrality of the United Nations in formulating multilateral approaches to transnational issues. This was the role intended for the Assembly in Article 10 of the UN Charter, namely that it may discuss any questions or any matters within the scope of the present Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organs provided for in the Charter.

I say this, of course, with the full knowledge of Article 12 that the GA should refrain from making recommendations on specific disputes or situations dealing with international peace and security that are before the Council but also being cognizant that the GA has risen to the occasion when the Security Council was grid-locked. I refer in particular to the Uniting for Peace resolution.

As I have stated earlier, Mr. Chairman, a perception that the prerogatives and authority of the General Assembly have been undermined, in particular by the Security Council, has gained ground. There are good reasons for this perception.

First, the Council is increasingly taking up issues traditionally dealt by the GA by accepting very wide and innovative interpretations to the threat of international peace and security by holding of thematic debates on issues that frequently fall within the purview of the Assembly or ECOSOC. Such encroachment has also affected the Assembly’s competence in process of standard-setting and codification of international law.
Second, the Council has given short shrift to the Assembly by continuing to produce annual report that are a mere statistical compilation of events, a bland summary and listing of meetings and outcome documents which merely inform without educating, illustrate without elucidating.

We therefore associate ourselves with such concerns and would like to see a recalibration of the relationship between the GA and the Security Council.

In this we believe the Council would do well to eschew the tendency to give in to creative and permissive interpretations to the consideration of what constitutes a threat to international peace and security.

And in terms of its reporting obligations, the Council should not only inform the Assembly of the decisions, but also of the rationale, efficacy and impact of the Council's decisions, in terms of crystallized take-aways for the membership.

At the same time, however, we believe that remedial measures would be incomplete in the absence of serious introspection on what the General Assembly itself can do to mitigate the situation.

Clearly, the Assembly will not be empowered merely by strengthened procedures. What is really needed is the political will to take concrete measures to reinforce the role and authority of the Assembly keeping in mind the fact that today there is a plurality of multilateral mechanisms that deal with global issues.

Further, ownership of the Assembly's decisions is reflected in the degree of participation by member-states. So, if there is a foreboding sense of apathy towards the work done in the Assembly, all the member-states are also partly to blame, not just those who serve permanently on the Council.

And in this context, I must share with you that I sense a certain degree of apathy among delegations when they are attending the Assembly. There also seems to be a lacklustre atmosphere when the Security Council is meeting.

Mr. Chairman,

Having clarified our general views on the matter let me turn to the specific proposals noted in the negotiation text.
In our assessment, there is a clear convergence on the need for all organs to stick to their Charter mandates, regular consultations between the President of the General Assembly and the President of the Security Council as well as enhanced institutional linkages between the two organs and substantive annual and special reports by the Security Council to the General Assembly.

There are, however, also divergences. These are really on the issue of the GA's jurisdiction with respect to the maintenance of international peace and security.

In our view, therefore, it would be useful for the negotiation process if the Chair could produce a shorter version of the text which reflects the large middle ground of convergences along with a clear listing of the divergences. And should you, Chair, have any difficulty in doing so-and many of the other colleagues with whom I have had consultations are also of the same view-we the delegations can step in and produce such a text.

Thank you.

648. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, During the Open Debate of the United Nations Security Council on the Agenda Item "Children and Armed Conflict".

Mr. President,

Let me begin by congratulating Mexico on its assumption of the Presidency of the Security Council for the month of June 2010.

Mr. President,

The use of children in situations of armed conflict is an abhorrent practice that militates against fundamental principles of humanity. There can be no excuse for subjecting children to the depravity and ravages of armed conflict.
I am participating in this debate today because the Secretary General's latest report on “Children and armed conflict” mentions instances of recruitment and use of children and systematic attacks on schools by Maoist armed groups in some parts of central and eastern India.

At the outset I should make it clear that the violence being perpetrated by these groups, though completely abhorrent and condemnable, certainly does not make this a zone of armed conflict as defined by international law. We, therefore, cannot accept reporting on these incidents as falling within the mandate of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General on Children and Armed Conflict. Having clarified this specific point, I would like to state that the Government of India is seized of such abhorrent acts targeting innocent children by these armed groups. We strongly condemn these despicable acts of Naxal violence and are fully committed to controlling such diabolical activities. The Government of India, along with the concerned state governments, has developed a holistic strategy to address Naxal issues by focusing on security, development, administration and the public perception. We have initiated awareness raising programmes through media and mass contact, including by the police through their community policing programmes. The entire government machinery has been dutifully implementing the extant laws, including laws that prohibit child labour.

Mr. President, India is a State Party to the Convention on the Rights of the Child and its Optional Protocols. We are, of course, fully committed to meet our obligations under these instruments.

Thank you, Mr. President.
Thank you very much for giving me the floor in this third session of the text based negotiations. At the start of these negotiations, on 2 June, you had encouraged us to draw inspiration from the words of former American President John F. Kennedy by posing the question "Ask not what the text can do for you but what you can do for the text". In our view, the critical issue that we need to face up to now is to recognize that the text, as I said last time, is crying out for help; that it needs to be trimmed of all the fat and for making it lean and thin. What I heard this morning renews my faith in human nature and the atmosphere of goodwill in which we are conducting our deliberations. My distinguished colleague from Pakistan outlined his position and also explained how his position was different from that of the G4 even though the size of an enlarged Council, as proposed by the UFC and the G4, were similar. The limited difference is in the number of permanent members that the two proposals call for. My distinguished colleague from Pakistan seems to believe that having more permanent members would make the Council more opaque and elitist! I also heard other arguments stating that only a smaller number would make an effective Council. If we were to carry this reasoning to its logical conclusion, the Council would be at its effective best when it has only one member! The issue is not whether a Council with five permanent members and ten elected ones is more efficient than one with 25 members with a few more permanent members. We should go into the causes for the Council being ineffective, as composed today, which is why we are having these negotiations.
I can appreciate the difficulty in the Secretariat prioritizing amongst delegations if 23 flags go up simultaneously. I understand the reason for the PR of Sierra Leone conveying his disagreement with the procedure that was followed today. It may, therefore, be useful to revert to a speaker's list. Let me also take the liberty of adding another small request. It would be especially useful for some of our delegations to be informed in advance of the programme of work or a timetable for the conduct of the reminder of the negotiations. Other than these small issues, I think our text-based negotiations are proceeding well and discussions on issues have been of a substantive nature. At the same time, I must stress that everything is not hunky-dory. While I can understand why you said that proposals cannot be removed from the text till removal is acceptable to the member-state which proposed their insertion. I feel it necessary to point out the danger inherent in such an approach. Unless explained, this approach appears to allow an unintended inference to be drawn, that is, those who propose ideas which are of a somewhat extremist nature, on the fringe, would also be vested with a veto. In other words, if someone wants to wreck these negotiations, all that they have to do is to get up and say that they want the Council to be expanded from the current 15 to 49, then proceed to give a one hour lecture on why democracy is better than dictatorship, why bigger numbers are better than smaller numbers. Your position on revisions would give such delegations the right to insist on their proposals for eternity. Surely, that cannot be the message that the Chair wishes to signal. But, since words have meanings, it would be better to place matters in perspective. In our view, the Chair should eliminate those options that do not reflect the middle-ground. If this is not feasible, at least we should be able to quantify the support that different options have received, either in the body of the text or in footnotes. Not to do so could invite a number of rash proposals and circumscribe the already limited flexibility and autonomy that I believe the Chair enjoys. We also need to ensure that we move speedily in our negotiations and not take another six months between the conclusion of this round of negotiations and the announcement of the next revised text. In other words, we need a programme of work with an automatic and immediate issuance of Rev. 2 as we go into the next phase. Mr. Chairman, Let me now turn to the subject at hand. We are willing to work with other delegations in a spirit of flexibility and compromise in order to shorten the text. I must add that we see a great deal of convergence on both issues that are the subject of discussions today.

Mr. Chairman,

On the size of an enlarged Council, most proposals veer towards expansion from the current 15 to 25 or 26 and the similarly defined number of "mid-20s." We would suggest that this middle-ground be reflected in the next revised text and the other proposals at the extremities be dropped as part of a process of natural elimination.

Mr. Chairman,

We also associate ourselves with the growing clamour for early reform of the working methods of the Council. This is an integral part of the broader imperative of comprehensive reform and expansion of the membership of the Council in both permanent and non-permanent categories. On working methods, the large middle ground consists of four sets of proposals for improvement of working methods. First, the call for the full implementation of Articles 31 and 32 of the UN dealing with the participation of non-Council member states whose interests are involved in a discussion on any question or dispute under consideration by the Council. Second, a great deal of support for enhancing transparency and accountability as well as increased access to non-Council members, including through more open briefings by UN officials, more open debates and meetings and the like. I heard one of our colleagues, who spoke earlier, say that it is quite intriguing that while the Secretariat can sit in closed consultations of the Council, member-states whose interests are involved cannot do so! Third, calls for enhancing the Security Council's consultations with TCCs and PCCs. And finally, there is convergence on the need to improve the working of the subsidiary bodies of the Council. Having identified these areas of convergence, I must place on record, our backing for other measures such as the call for formalizing the rules of procedure of the Council, wider and early circulation of draft Resolutions and draft Presidential Statements, enhancing the coordination and cooperation with regional organizations, rationalizing the use of the Council's powers under Chapter VI and Chapter VII of the Charter with the aim of best achieving the objective of the maintenance of international peace and security.

There are, Mr. Chairman, however, also divergences that pertain mainly to the jurisdictional basis of the improvements in the working methods. What does this mean? Everyone is in favour of improving the Council's working methods. But I did hear a few statements, bordering on the arrogant, which seemed to imply that since the Council belonged to them they would decide its working methods. This would be unacceptable in any other organization. If we had a Charter that was not founded on the democratic principle of one country, one vote there could have been scope for such an argument. But the name of the game here is different. No one is as yet questioning the continuance of those who are on the Council. When talking about improvements in working methods, where discussions involve the interests of the member-states and where the decisions taken by the Council will inevitably have a bearing and impact on those who are not members of the Council, there is great merit in the wider membership having a say in the process. We acknowledge that members of the Council are in the driving seat, but it must also be acknowledged that the decisions taken in the Council affect the rest of the UN membership and so the involvement of the latter is also a must. Equally, one must look into the interlinkages in the relationships the Council has with the General Assembly and the ECOSOC. We are of the view that this matter does not pose an insurmountable obstacle and can be sorted out through discussions in a spirit of flexibility and compromise. It would be useful for the negotiation process if the Chair could produce a shorter version of the text which reflects the middle ground of convergence along with a clear listing of the differences. In this context, I would like to extend an invitation to the S-5 and others to work actively and in lock-step with the wider international community seeking comprehensive reforms of the Council. Because I believe that in the absence of such comprehensive reform, a fundamental improvement in the working methods would either escape us as has been the case for more than sixty years or, even if miraculously achieved, would not last without the institutional memory, continuing commitment and contribution of new permanent members. Thank you.
Madam Co-Chair,

I would like to begin by expressing my appreciation for the leadership displayed by you (Ambassador Sanja Štiglic of Slovenia) and your co-chair (Ambassador Jorge Argüello of Argentina) in guiding our deliberations on the Revitalization of the General Assembly. It is a measure of your commitment to the work of the Revitalization of the General Assembly that you have chosen to guide us here just now even as Slovenia is playing an important match in the World Cup. When last heard, you were doing quite well in the game, and you are doing equally well in this process of the Revitalization of the General Assembly.

Madam,

I would also like to thank the President of the General Assembly Dr. Ali Abdussalam Treki for his leadership and commitment to carry forward this process. I did not have the privilege to listen to him address us earlier today, as I was in another meeting. But I believe he spoke from the heart and made a very passionate case for addressing some of these issues. The fact that he has chosen to do this even as his successor has been elected shows that this is not a personal issue for our PGA, but is a requirement for the institution, the office of the PGA. I would like to place on record our appreciation for his doing so.

Madam, in so far as my delegation is concerned, we view this exercise as an overall package which will result in the revitalization of the General Assembly. This should, inter alia, ensure that the sanctity, and the role of this principal organ of the United Nations system is not only preserved but strengthened. Why do I say this? Essentially, Madam because there is a perception that in the world of real politic, the General Assembly has had its authority either circumscribed or eroded by another of the principal organs. It is not my intention to deal with the causes of this here. My delegation strongly believes that we need to revitalize, and by revitalization, I mean restore as was originally intended, preserve and strengthen the role of the General Assembly. And that in turn, raises issues which are both of a kind that deal with the aura and dignity of the General Assembly and the office of the PGA, and those which are of a substantive nature. In so far as the recommendations made by the PGA are concerned, and I would like to go through them ad seriatum, they appear to me to be eminently reasonable and doable. Let me now start with the first of the recommendations. The first recommendation relates to the budget allocation for the PGA's office. If, as I am given to understand, the present budget has seen no increase since 1998, it stands to reason that more than a decade later, this issue should be addressed. In order to address this issue, we would require some information. I am told that one of the previous speakers, my distinguished colleague from Kazakhstan, referred to an amount of US$ 250,000 as being the annual budget allocation. Clearly, this is inadequate and I don't believe that the office of the PGA can function within such a small budget. But equally, I don't believe that the office of the PGA has been run solely on this amount. There must be a system of extra-budgetary support. I heard some earlier statements mention that some individual governments have been making resources available. And as the PGA said, this may be possible in the instant case, but tomorrow it may not be possible in case of a country which either does not have the resources or the inclination to make the required resources available. Surely, the office of the PGA which is one of the most important institutions in the UN system should not be made vulnerable to ad hoc or unpredictable sources of funding. We, therefore, strongly support this recommendation. We would like to know what the system of extra-budgetary support has been so far and how it has been operating in the past. Now, I come to the second of the recommendations, namely that the geographical balance of General Assembly membership should be reflected in the composition of the Cabinet of the President of the General Assembly. I admire and salute the spirit of this recommendation. We have always looked at this in a particular way, i.e., the incoming PGA must have the autonomy and flexibility to choose his or her own team. It is not surprising, therefore, that when Father d'Escoto was the PGA, he had a lot of people who were readily associated with him. I also note that the PGA has said that not one of the members of the Cabinet currently is from his country. This is admirable. Selecting people according to geographical balance, if you are selecting people for one year poses some problems. Surely, people who are selected would not easily accept appointment for only one year. If we are selecting according to the criterion that the UN is supposed to follow, and here I choose my words carefully, I am not suggesting that it does not follow, the system is supposed to follow, a merit based system based on geographical balance. How many people will you get who would agree to serve only for a period of one year? That leads me to another issue, that is, to have continuity in the PGA's office. If you want to have people there on the basis of geographical balance, then they must be allowed to stay longer. But, if you do that you are not going to be able to give the PGA the flexibility to bring along the persons with whom he or she is comfortable.

That brings me to the next issue of institutional memory. The recommendation states that one or more staff members could be retained from the preceding office in the incoming President's Cabinet. The total number of posts available is so limited that one cannot but come to the conclusion that this is a basket which allows very little scope for experimentation. If there are two D2s in the office of the PGA, and you extend both of them into the life of the next Presidency, then clearly the next PGA will not be able to have his team in place. Therefore, I ask myself a question, is institutional memory going to be predicated on continuity in the workforce or any other criterion? My delegation would welcome a certain degree of continuity between the incoming and outgoing Presidents and their Cabinets; some of the eminent persons in the current PGA's office could transition into the next one based on arrangements to be worked out by the two Presidents. What do we do in our national administrations? We have something called the 'handing-over note' which could be area-specific, subject specific and also resource specific. This problem can be resolved with the computer, memory chip and a handing over note. But then as I said, if the two Presidents want to innovate on the issue of institutional memory we would have no problems with that. I now come to issues that I regard as having to do with the aura and dignity of the office. Surely, the system must provide for the basic requirements of protocol and security. It goes without saying that any eminent person who rises to the position of the PGA should never have the feeling that the system short-changed him and so on and so forth. There are, however, some issues on the number of the security people who will travel with the PGA on his foreign tours. Again, I think we should be flexible on this. There are some countries where the PGA's security personnel will not be able to do very much. There are countries, for instance, where the receiving government will not allow the visiting security personnel to carry side arms or other weapons, because the receiving governments take responsibility for the security. When the PGA travels, he is received with full protocol honours, he meets the Head of State and/or Government, the Foreign Minister, and the receiving governments provide security. So as I said, we need something which is a sensible augmentation, but not one such that the travel budget of the security component takes away a sizeable chunk of the overall budget of the PGA's office. We would welcome further information and would be happy to support specific recommendations in this respect. There was talk about a Trust Fund having been established. I am very happy to hear that. I was under the impression that such a Fund already existed and that it received extra-budgetary assistance. Here again, I would like further information so that we can look at the issue in greater detail. Let me now come to one very basic issue. Before I do that let me unambiguously clarify our position that we are in favour of strengthening the office of the PGA. We call for augmenting the resources to ensure the efficient and successful functioning of the office of the PGA in keeping with its dignity and prestige. I also believe that there is a palpable desire among the wide UN membership to have a PGA's office that displays the highest standards of professionalism, neutrality and integrity. We, the member-states should help in this process.

I would now like to turn my attention to the second issue, namely visibility and enhanced public awareness of the work of the General Assembly. On this, our position is two-fold. First, we, the member-states need to make the Assembly and its work more relevant to the evolving international system. In other words, the presence of political will to take concrete measures to reinforce the role and authority of the Assembly. We need to properly appreciate and then correctly situate the Assembly within the plurality of multilateral mechanisms that deal with global issues. Of late, I have heard a lament that the UN is being by-passed. If indeed that is the case, then we need to do some soul-searching as to why that is happening. There are a number of best practices available in this regard in various international organizations, albeit on a smaller scale. Such best practices could be used as a guide to promote visibility and enhanced public awareness of the work of the General Assembly. We are of the view that if we proceed on the basis of these principles we can discern without any difficulty the resources we need to provide and the measures we need to take towards our goal.

Madam Co-Chair,

In conclusion, let me reiterate my delegation’s basic position that the General Assembly can be revitalized only when its position as the chief deliberative, policy-making and representative organ of the United Nations is respected in letter and in spirit. We will continue to support your work in the future to ensure the success of our common endeavour to revitalize the General Assembly.

Thank you very much.

651 Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative, on Agenda Item 104 - Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice [High Level Meeting on Transnational Organized Crime] at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

Thank you for giving me an opportunity to speak at this commemorative meeting to mark the 10th anniversary of the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime.

At the outset, I would also like to join others to express appreciation for all the panelists, who shared with us their views and brought to light different perspectives on how to promote a coherent multilateral approach to transnational organized crime.
Mr. President,

Ten years ago, when the UN General Assembly adopted the Convention against Transnational Organized Crime and its three Protocols dealing with trafficking in persons, the smuggling of migrants as well as the illicit manufacturing of and trafficking in firearms, it represented a significant advance in the battle against transnational organized crime. Since then 154 countries have ratified the Convention.

I have the pleasure today to convey to you, and through you to this august Assembly that the Government of India have also decided to ratify the Convention and its three Protocols.

India is also committed to working through various regional and international cooperation mechanisms towards a world free of transnational organized crime, illicit drugs, money laundering, illegal arms transactions, human trafficking and people smuggling and above all, terrorism.

Mr. President,

India has been a victim of terrorism for decades and we have lost countless innocent lives to heinous terrorist attacks. Terrorism has also affected most other countries and, indeed, is the scourge of our times. It undermines peace, democracy and freedom, endangering the international community and humankind as a whole.

While the Transnational Organized Crime Convention makes for strengthened cooperation among law enforcement apparatuses of countries, it is critical that we strengthen the specific multilateral terrorism targeting legal framework. The Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT) has reached a point where the legal issues have been well resolved. We now need to give the necessary political push so that the Convention is urgently adopted.

Mr. President,

We recognize that international cooperation in criminal matters is the cornerstone of efforts of States to prevent, prosecute and punish transnational crime. It is important that we clearly acknowledge the critical role of cooperation among States in the fight against transnational crime, and particularly transnational organized crime, and take steps for enhancing and reinforcing international cooperation at all levels.

The international community, including the UN, must also be willing to contribute and help States that seek financial and technical assistance in their efforts at capacity-building and training and in putting in place the administrative and legal framework, institutional reforms that are required for fighting transnational organized crime.

Mr. President,

We are also concerned at the growing scale worldwide of trafficking of persons and complexities involved in dealing with this issue. While national efforts to eliminate trafficking are essential, it is also critical to have greater cohesion in the international community’s efforts in addressing this issue. In this context, the establishment of institutional arrangements at the bilateral, regional and international levels has become indispensable.

The international community must also come together for a coordinated and far-sighted global approach. A United Nations Global Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons is presently being debated at the General Assembly. It is important that we bring the debate to an early conclusion and adopt the plan.

Mr. President,

The stepped up pace of globalization in recent years has seen vastly increased movement of people, goods and services across borders. There have also been very significant improvements in information and communication technology. While these have overall benefit to humankind, we need to reckon with the fact that these have also provided a platform for organized crime to increase its transnational footprint.

In this context, we are deeply concerned about new areas of transnational crimes like cyber-crime, economic fraud and identity-related crimes and their links with other criminal and terrorist activities. In our view, these developments demand that we agree to take a wider look at transnational organized crime encompassing these new and emerging threats while also dealing with crime prevention, criminal justice and treatment of offenders.

At this 10th anniversary of the Convention, it is critical that we commit ourselves to translate our obligations into actions with an even greater degree of cooperation.

Thank you, Mr. President.
Mr. President,

Let me begin by congratulating you for organizing this thematic debate in the General Assembly. Your decision to convene a debate on peacekeeping addresses a long-standing gap. It is a strong political signal about the importance that all Member States attach to this activity. It also signals their intent to engage constructively and substantively. It would pertinent, in this regard, to note that the Security Council has, during the past year, organized at least four debates under four different Presidencies on peacekeeping and on related thematic issues.

We have heard with interest the remarks of their Excellencies the Ministers and those of the Secretary General and Mr Brahimi.

Mr. President,

Coming from a country that has contributed more than 100,000 peacekeepers to virtually every peacekeeping operation in the past six decades, we believe that the subject of this special session, that of "Building Partnerships and Securing Capabilities" captures the essence of the challenge that peacekeeping now faces. It signifies, among other things, that much has changed since 1956, the year in which the first major peacekeeping operation was launched.

To being with, the formula of 1945 is obsolete. Global capacities, be they economic, military or in other areas, are distributed in a significantly different pattern. The talk of partnership and capabilities reflects the changes that have occurred and the need for these changes to be accommodated in the global division of labour in the maintenance of international peace and security.

Mr. President,

Under the current formula, those member states that are not represented in the Security Council, are supposed to get their say in peacekeeping
The productive deliberations of the last C-34 notwithstanding, my delegation is pained to point out that attempts are often made to bypass the C-34 on substantive matters. Recent efforts to fundamentally alter the peacekeeping support structure without entering into a substantive engagement with the C-34 and TCCs are a case in point.

My delegation acknowledges that improvements have been made in the timing of triangular meetings. We have suggested a number of simple changes to make these meetings more useful and relevant. Predictability in terms of timing and circulation of agendas are two of these measures. The system of consultations must also be extended to cover all stages of the mission cycle.

Peacekeeping, in our assessment, will remain the major UN activity for the next few years. It will need more partners, not less; more capabilities, not less. The tendency in some quarters, in the name of expediency, to avoid intergovernmental discussions is counter-productive. There is no shortage of capacities in today's world. The challenge that the United Nations faces is in its efforts to harness these capacities. My delegation submits that greater involvement of member states, not lesser, is the best way of obtaining these capacities for the common benefit of all.

Mr. President,

Two-thirds of UN peacekeeping resources are presently devoted to operations that are at least five years old. The international community must find the capabilities that are required to ensure that the gains that have been painfully accrued by peacekeepers in these mature operations are not squandered while facing the challenges of an altered operating environment.

My delegation would like to stress that Peacebuilding is a far more complicated endeavor than peacekeeping. The number of stakeholders is higher. The requirement for resources is also higher. It requires much greater coordination and joint activity with national authorities than is currently the norm. National needs, not priorities driven by external and donor interests, should be the yardstick used to approach peacebuilding. DPKO, which is currently a military-driven organization, will have to transform itself in the face of these challenges. It will need more policemen and more rule of law and development administration personnel in future. Member states will need to focus on the division of responsibilities between DPKO and UN Country Teams in order to prevent duplication and waste. 80% of peacekeeping resources are devoted to areas with a legacy of colonialism. Peacebuilding must take into account the experience and insights of countries that have undergone successful post-colonial national building exercises. Failure to do so would lead to sub-optimal results.

Mr. President,

A debate on peacekeeping must address the normative and legislative aspects. Indian troops have been at the forefront in protecting civilians in the ground. India has also engaged constructively in the legislative debate on human rights and international humanitarian law.

The Charter, with good reason, distinguishes between the actions of the Council under Chapters VI and VII. We, as members of the General Assembly, have the responsibility of being vigilant against back-door methods to obliterate the Council’s responsibility to attempt peaceful settlement of disputes.

Mr. President,

India strongly favours a greater female presence in peacekeeping. The effectiveness of a female Indian Formed Police Unit in Liberia is testimony to the power of an example in empowering the weak and the vulnerable.

I would like to take this opportunity to reiterate our position that we are in favour of a policy of zero tolerance in respect of disciplinary and conduct issues.

Mr. President,

In ending I salute Indian peacekeepers, as well as those from other countries, who have made the supreme sacrifice and laid down their lives while serving in UN Missions, most recently in Haiti.

Thank You.
Mr. Chairman,

Thank you very much for giving me the floor.

Today’s key issue, namely "regional representation" has particular relevance in the contemporary international system. I say this because of the sheer inability of the UN system to grasp the significance of the changes in the international landscape since World War II.

In this context, I am reminded of the prescient remarks of His Excellency President Nicolas Sarkozy during this keynote address at Columbia University in March this year. He said and I quote,

"Do you young students at Columbia know that not a single African country is a permanent member of the Security Council? [And yet the continent has] a billion inhabitants!

Do you know that not a single Arab country-[although the Arab world has] about a hundred million inhabitants-is a permanent member of the Security Council?

Do you know that India—with a billion inhabitants, and becoming the world's most populous nation in 30 years' time—is not a permanent member of the Security Council?

That Japan, the world's second-largest economy, is not a permanent member of the Security Council? Why? Because 60 years ago they lost the war. Is that reasonable?

Do you know that not a single Latin American country is a permanent member of the Security Council?
How can anyone expect us to resolve major crises, major wars and major conflicts within the framework of the UN without Africa, without three-quarters of Asia, without Latin America, without a single Arab country? Is that reasonable? Is that sensible? Is it even imaginable? Who can believe that?" Unquote.

Mr. Chairman,

If we want to be judged fairly by our succeeding generations, I believe we must rise up to the occasion in addressing these anomalies.

The UN Charter is unambiguous in providing for permanent members by name and not by rotating nomination by regional organizations. This should serve as our guide on the issue of regional representation.

Permanent members are expected to act in such a manner that transcends narrow national interests when dealing with issues relating to international peace and security. It is, therefore, important that the category of permanent membership reflect contemporary realities and include adequate representation from all regions of the world.

Non-permanent members must also bring to bear similar qualities not encumbered by limited and short-term national or regional considerations. But here we have the possibility to look for innovative solutions that ensure representation of cross regional groups such as the AOSIS on the Security Council on a regular basis.

Mr. Chairman,

The various proposals under the heading of "regional representation" in the negotiation text bear the imprint of the relevant Charter provisions. It also reflects the general thinking of the international community in this regard. It therefore lends itself to revision without any major difficulties.

The large middle ground consists of four areas of convergence.

First, is the call for additional permanent seats - two from Africa and Asia, at-least one from GRULAC and one for WEOG. Additionally, there are calls for more non-permanent seats for all existing regional groups.

Second, most of the proposals call for continuing with the existing categories of regional groupings, namely Africa, Asia, GRULAC, WEOG and EEG.
Proposals that call for enhanced representation in the Council on the basis of other groupings could also be suitably reflected in Rev 2.

Third, the concept of "equitable geographical distribution" finds traction across the wide spectrum of proposals.

Fourth, in terms of the criteria for enhancing representation in the Council, there is a clamour for more developing countries in both categories of membership. Further, the aspect of "contribution to the maintenance of international peace and security and to other purposes of the organization" finds wide acceptance. Other criterion such as "country specific qualifications"; "representation of different civilizations and cultures"; "rotation"; and "sub-regional representation" have also been proposed.

Mr. Chairman,

It is the view of my delegation that Rev 2 could merge the relevant portions under this key issue of "regional representation" on the basis of the provisions of the UN Charter making use of the four convergences that I have just mentioned.

We further believe that the Chair should eliminate those options that do not reflect the middle-ground. If this is not feasible, at least we should be able to quantify the support that different options have received, either in the body of the text or in footnotes.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me reiterate that the Indian delegation is willing to work with other delegations in a spirit of flexibility and compromise in order to shorten the text.

Thank you.

Mr. President,

At the outset, I would like to thank you for scheduling today’s debate on the situation in Afghanistan. We are grateful for the latest report of the Secretary-General and are appreciative of the briefing by the SRSG Staffan de Mistura. We also thank Ambassador Zahir Tanin, Permanent Representative of Afghanistan for his statement.

Mr. President,

As we move forward, the international approach towards Afghanistan, including the London Conference has focused on areas of security, reintegration, development, governance, and regional and international cooperation. We support the efforts of the Afghan Government to reintegrate those individuals who are willing to abjure violence, do not have ties with terrorist groups, and are willing to abide by the values of democracy, pluralism and human rights as enshrined in the Afghan Constitution. The process must be inclusive and transparent.

The forthcoming Kabul Conference and the parliamentary elections scheduled in September later this year would be important milestones in consolidating the progress made so far.

Mr. President,

Complimentary to the military effort, a sustainable strategy for stabilization of Afghanistan must focus on development and governance issues. In this context, UNAMA’s focus on its priorities, in particular support for elections, regional cooperation and aid coherence would be helpful in achieving greater synergy and coordination of efforts with the Afghan government.

Success of all our endeavours could only be enduring if their ownership vests in the Afghan Government and people. In this context, closely intertwined is the need for tangible and sustained improvement in the security situation. This is also absolutely critical in expanding the foot-print of the Afghan government and towards creating an enabling environment for lasting peace and stability in Afghanistan.

Mr. President,

As we discuss today, an overall deterioration in the security environment underscores the significant challenges that confront Afghanistan. The UNSG report notes that there has been a 94% increase in incidents involving IEDs during the first four months of 2010, a 45% rise in killings of civilians by insurgents, and an increase in complex suicide attacks. I join others Mr. President, in expressing our condolences to the UN staff member killed yesterday.

Despite reinforced International Security Assistance Force’s presence, continuous deterioration in the security situation is a stark reminder that the challenge from a resurgent Taliban and Al Qaeda is real, and it is one that threatens us all. The well-springs that sustain such terror still show no signs of being drained. Civilians, humanitarian personnel, international and UN staff and diplomatic personnel- including our Mission in Kabul have been repeatedly targeted in terrorist attacks.

There is a broad recognition that the increase in terrorist actions in Afghanistan is due to the support and sanctuaries available beyond its borders. Security and stabilization of Afghanistan will remain a distant goal unless we are able to isolate and root out the syndicate of terrorism, which includes elements of Al Qaeda, Taliban, LeT and other terrorist and extremist groups operating from within and outside Afghanistan’s borders.

We fully support efforts towards expansion of capacities of the Afghan National Police and the Afghan National Army. They should be provided appropriate resources, combat equipment, enablers and training before considering any plans for progressive handover of security responsibilities.

Mr. President,

The security of Afghanistan and what happens there impacts us, as a country in the region, as a close neighbor and a civilizational partner whose ties with the Afghan people stretch into antiquity.

A stable and settled Afghanistan, where the rank and file of the Taliban has given up violence against the government, and the people, cut all links with terrorism, subscribe to the values of the Afghan Constitution and its laws, and where development is the hard rationale, is what we seek and quest for. It is important also that for such a structure to be durable and enduring, Afghanistan's neighbours, and regional partners, will need to be in the picture - both by consultation and by adherence to the principle of non-interference in the country's affairs, ensuring that it thrives as a trade and transit hub for the region, and by eradicating transnational terrorism.

While moving forward on the sensitive issues on reintegration and reconciliation, we need to guard against impulses to arrive at quick-fix solutions. Against the backdrop of today's worrying security situation, these issues need to be tackled with prudence, the benefit of hindsight, foresight and caution.

Mr. President,

In India's efforts towards stabilization of Afghanistan, the focus has been on developmental and humanitarian work to assist the Afghan people as they build a peaceful, stable, inclusive, democratic and pluralistic nation. We have sought to assist Afghanistan within our means. Our US $ 1.3 billion assistance programme is aimed at building infrastructure, capacity building in critical areas of governance, health, education, agriculture etc. and generating employment. Last year, over 300,000 Afghans, mainly women and children, were provided free medical treatment at the Indian Medical Missions in Kabul, Jalalabad, Kandahar, Herat and Mazar-e-Sharif. The economy of battle-scarred Nimroz province was transformed with the building of the Zaranj-Delaram highway and the homes of the people of Kabul have been lit after more than a decade by the Pul-e-Khumri transmission line from the Uzbek border.

Mr. President,

The international community as a whole has made a great contribution in assisting Afghanistan to stand on its feet. We welcome these efforts and are fully supportive of them. We support the good work done by UNAMA. For lasting peace and stability in Afghanistan, it is critical that the international community remains engaged in Afghanistan both on the security side as well as on development and capacity building efforts.

Thank you.

♦ ♦ ♦ ♦ ♦
Mr. President,

It is my privilege to address the General Assembly as we adopt today the landmark decision to create UN WOMEN, a composite entity for gender equality and the empowerment of women within the United Nations. My congratulations to you, Mr. President, for your leadership on this transformational reform at the UN. I say this with particular pride as India has the distinction of giving the General Assembly its first woman President, Mrs. Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit. I am naturally happy that my delegation under the leadership of Hardeep Singh Puri played a very active role in the success of the negotiations. My congratulations also to the Co-Facilitators, the Secretary General, the Deputy Secretary-General and all others involved in the process.

Mr. President,

India is home to more than half a billion women. Our Constitution enshrines gender equality and affirmative action to ensure women's empowerment and this has been a key focus of our socio-economic policies. Prime Minister Dr Manmohan Singh has said, and I QUOTE "No society can claim to be a part of the modern civilized world unless it treats its women on par with men." UNQUOTE India has also taken major strides in the area of political empowerment of women. Today, more than a million women elected representatives participate in political decision-making at the grassroots level. A move to provide similar reservation of seats for women in the Indian Parliament is in advanced stage of the legislative process, already having received the approval of the Upper House of our Parliament.

Mr. President, India welcomes the creation of the UN WOMEN as a significant victory for the cause of women worldwide. It is a reflection of our collective commitment to the pursuit of gender equality and the empowerment of women. Our decision here today also takes a step towards restoring the faith of those Member-States, including mine, who often regard the UN as an anachronistic body resistant to organizational reform and innovation. We, of course, hope that it creates a momentum for much-needed reform in other areas as well.

I would like to take this opportunity to pledge India's full support to UN WOMEN. We urge early operationalisation of the entity so that the international community can work with renewed vigour and commitment for gender equality and the empowerment of women. In conclusion, I would like to recall the words of Mrs. Sonia Gandhi, the Chairperson of the United Progressive Alliance and the leader of my party, and I QUOTE "Complete gender equality, nothing less, must be our over-riding goal. There must be neither compromise nor complacency. The struggle is joined. It must be brought to full fruition." UNQUOTE

I thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President,

Allow me to begin by expressing my delegation's deep appreciation for your leadership and the work of your team in navigating the ECOSOC process this year towards a meaningful destination.

Mr. President,

Concerted action on the part of the world's largest economies in the G-20 was able to avert a major economic melt-down following the financial crisis of 2008. But the shoots of recovery that we are seeing can easily be upset by shocks and fluctuations as the Euro-zone crisis has shown. In such circumstances, it is important that we ensure that global economic recovery is durable, balanced and sustainable. This is also critical for achieving the MDGs for which we have just five years more. Firm and time bound commitments, including on the provision of resources, transfer of technology and capacity building, are the need of the hour on MDGs. India has a strong interest in the world economy doing well as this is key enabler for us to pursue growth and bring the fruits of development to all sections of our society. We also need to focus on medium and long-term structural issues of global governance. The reforms at the Bretton Woods Institutions need to be urgently completed. And, at the UN the Security Council must reflect contemporary realities and expand in both permanent and non-permanent categories.

Mr. President,

The Annual Ministerial Review this year focuses on gender equality and the empowerment of women. This is timely as our MDG aspirations will remain unfulfilled if significant progress is not made on empowerment and equality of women and on their health and education. India’s National Policy for the Empowerment of Women seeks enhancing economic and political empowerment and providing equal access to health care, education and employment for women.

Nearly half of the 46 million rural household beneficiaries of the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme, one of the world’s largest cash for work programmes, are women. Similarly there are over 2 million women’s Self Help Groups under the Swarnjayanti Gram Rozgar Yojna, a huge rural employment programme. In education, we have recently launched Saakshar Bharat, a national programme for female literacy, to impart functional literacy to around 60 million adult women. Moreover, our newly enacted Right to Education Act, guarantees free and compulsory education to all children in the age group of 6-14 years. Girls will be its obvious focus. Our figures on maternal and infant mortality continue to be unacceptably high. Our efforts in reducing maternal and infant mortality through various schemes including the Janani Suraksha Yojna, a cash assistance programme, are beginning to yield results. We are particularly concerned at the low child sex ratio in our country, the disparity between female and male literacy rates, the exceptionally high maternal mortality rates, the far lower women's work participation rate as compared to men and issues of violence against women. There is perceptible improvement in the social-economic status of women in India today as a result of our sustained efforts. We are, however, mindful of the enormous challenges we have still to overcome.

Mr. President, We are justifiably proud that today in India women are participating in greater numbers in the political process and in our decision making structures. Visibly, they occupy some of the highest political positions in the country including as our President, the Speaker of the Lok Sabha, the House of Representatives in our Parliament and the Leader of the ruling coalition.

However, less visible but equally important, we have more than a million elected women representatives in local government. This is a fruit of our policy to institutionalize women's participation at local government level by reserving one third of seats in the village panchayats more than 17 years ago. And, recently we have tabled a bill to raise these seats to 50%. Legislative action is also on the anvil to institutionalise women's participation in Parliament and State legislatures.

Mr. President, The last ten years have seen a continuous chorus of calls for reforms at the UN. I am very happy that one of the most important such efforts, the setting up of an entity to provide leadership and to mainstream women's issues in a coherent and focused manner at the UN, has finally borne fruit. This is a transformational moment for the UN and I am glad that the Indian delegation played an active role in resolving key contentious issues and ensuring forward movement. As I noted earlier in my address, achievement of MDGs hinges crucially on women being specially targeted so that they become equal beneficiaries of the gains of development. It is imperative that UN WOMEN operationalizes itself on an urgent basis and receives our full backing. There is far too much work to do.

Thank You.
657. Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative, on the Thematic Debate on "Protection of Civilians" at the UN SC.

New York, July 7, 2010.

Madam President,

India would like to thank the Nigerian Presidency for organizing this thematic debate on the Protection of Civilians. In our understanding, this is a theme that falls within the broader rubric of peacekeeping, which with more than 100,000 peacekeepers and a US$ 8 billion budget, remains the most visible operational activity of the United Nations. The fact that both the Security Council and the General Assembly have organized thematic debates on peacekeeping within two weeks of each other is a reflection of the centrality of peacekeeping to both the Council and to the Assembly.

This is the second time in less than a year that the Council is debating the issue of Protection of Civilians. There has been considerable movement in the normative sphere in the intervening period during these debates. Protection of Civilians and other associated concepts have been discussed in detail by the Member States during the deliberations of the C-34. Work is also underway on developing operational doctrines that will actually bring succour to the weak and the helpless in the face of violence and conflict. The debate is no longer on "if" we protect civilians; it is about the "how" of protecting them.

My delegation is in favour of intergovernmental discussions to develop the normative and operational framework for Protection of Civilians. We stand ready and willing, as our record establishes, to engage. We would, however, like to caution against the tendency, evident in recent debates on important strategies, to pay lip-service to or even bye-pass the consultative process that is built into a multilateral-decision making structure. These attempts will fail and will undermine the trust and credibility that are integral to the efficient and effective functioning of the Departments of Peacekeeping Operations and Field Support.
Madam President,

International humanitarian law, particularly those provisions that protect civilians, arose to deal with the terrible suffering of civilians in war. The Security Council, in its wisdom, attempted to apply some of the provisions of these laws to intra-state conflict. Unfortunately, the situation in the ground in the areas where the UN operates is not entirely satisfactory. Civilians continue to suffer today. It is the non-belligerents who continue to bear the brunt of violence in conflict and post-conflict situations.

The operational reasons behind the UN's inability to fully translate the Security Council's intent to protect civilians on the ground have been spelt out with clarity and precision by the Independent Study commissioned by DPKO last year. It is clear that the major share of the blame lies with the Security Council itself. It has been unable, over more than a decade, to develop a clear understanding of the nature and extent of the problem; has been unable to give clear directions to the DPKO about what it wants and what and how DPKO should operate; and has not taken into account the experience and inputs of countries whose troops are actually on the ground. As the report succinctly states, the "confusion over the Council's intent is evident in the lack of policy, guidance, planning and preparedness."

Representing a country which has been an active participant in UN peacekeeping since 1956 and has contributed more than 100,000 peacekeepers to 40 UN operations, my delegation cannot claim to be surprised by the findings.

Madam President,

More than 8,000 Indian peacekeepers are on the ground, as I speak here, protecting civilians in some of the most challenging operational environments. They operate in situations where violence is low-intensity and often confusing, where belligerents are not necessarily combatants under international humanitarian law, where information is deficient, and where resources and infrastructure are woefully inadequate. Working within these deficiencies, our men and women are trying their utmost to prevent conflict and stabilize post-conflict situations.
Madam President,

My delegation finds that peacekeepers on the ground find it difficult to connect to the debates taking place here. They find that there is insufficient appreciation of the operational challenges of actually executing the mandates of the Security Council. They find that there is an emphasis on normative aspects rather than on implementation. They find that they are being asked to do more and more with less.

80% of peacekeeping resources today are devoted to operations that are more than 5 years old. These operations are being called upon to transition into peacebuilding even as they have not entirely overcome the challenges of peacekeeping. In this context, the normative debate associated with protection of civilians stands the risk of becoming a debate on the strategy to fight yesterday's battle.

Madam President,

We are meeting in the shadow of a demand for reduced UN presence in certain key operational areas. It is unlikely that this demand arises out of the success of the United Nations. It is more likely that the United Nations is now of limited relevance in responding to the challenges facing national authorities as they struggle to consolidate peace. There is no better way of protecting civilians than by consolidating peace.

Debates on issues such as "strategic" consent will not be found helpful by national authorities. This is not what host countries want when they are struggling to build institutions and stimulate economic growth.

Attempts to obfuscate the difference between Chapter VI and Chapter VII of the charter do not serve the ideal of peacekeeping. There is a time and a place for both and back-door efforts to evade the Council's special responsibilities, while retaining its privileges, will affect the credibility of the institution.

Madam President,

There is only so much that peacekeepers and the DPKO can do. It is important to remember - at all times - that the primary responsibility of maintaining peace under a Chapter VI operation is that of the host government. The role of the United Nations is to support these authorities in accordance with their priorities and relevant to ground realities.

We hear from national authorities that the Office of the Rule of Law is now as important as that of the military component in protecting civilians.
We also hear that an augmented police presence is required while the Security Sector is being reformed. Security Sector Reform must be driven by national requirements and not by donor priorities. The capacity driven approach that is being adopted needs to become an exercise of understanding and providing what host governments require, not an exercise in collating what donors can give. Security Sector Reform will fail to consolidate the hard earned gains of peacekeeping unless it is based on organic growth and related to the realities of the developing world.

There are countries that have overcome post-colonial challenges similar to those we are concerned with today. There are nations that have faced these obstacles in democratic and open settings while giving primacy to Human Rights and the rule of law. We need to look at such examples.

Madam President,

The success of the Indian female Formed Police Unit in Liberia is testimony to the power of an example that is relevant to ground realities.

In conclusion, Madam President, let me thank you again for organizing this debate. India is committed to contribute, through its peacekeepers and its national capacities, to the promotion of peace and security and to the role of the United Nations.

Thank you.
658. Intervention by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative of India to the United Nations at the Informal Meeting (closed) of the Plenary on the Intergovernmental Negotiations on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council and Other Matters Related to the Council.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me begin by reiterating my delegation's appreciation of the way in which you have conducted this process of text-based negotiations. The statements that have been delivered till date by the overwhelming majority have also reflected the universal interest in the membership for real change.

Coming to the subject matter of today's negotiations, namely of "the question of the veto", I would like to elaborate our understanding of the various strands of the issue at hand.

Mr. Chairman,

In the negotiations leading to the creation of the United Nations Organisation, it was the firm and fervent belief of the victors of World War II that their continued presence in the Security Council had to be complemented by their unanimity in decision on matters of war and peace. These two attributes, namely uninterrupted representation on the Council and right of veto, came to define what we today refer to as the P5.

The veto had a particular relevance at the time that the UN was set up and during the cold war, serving a useful purpose. At the same time however, our assessment must be tempered by recalling the well-known fact that there have been instances where the use of the veto could have been avoided.
Today’s world, however, is different. We, therefore, believe that there would be and, indeed, there should be much less scope for the use of the veto in addressing issues relating to the maintenance of international peace and security. This is also borne by the far less use of the veto in recent times, and the fact that even when it was used, a far greater play to the use of diplomacy could, perhaps, have avoided its usage.

Mr. Chairman,

A bird’s eye viewing of the various proposals at hand shows that a very small minority wants the veto to be abolished altogether.

The large majority, however, prescribe some restrictions or limitations on the use of veto. These include provisions that state that the veto should not be used under certain circumstances like genocide, crimes against humanity and serious violations of international humanitarian law; war crimes, ethnic cleansing and terrorism, as well as on recommendations under Articles 4(2), 5, 6, 94(2) and 97 and on a matter under Article 96(1); situations of gross human rights violations; R2P situations and the like.

Another group of restraints on the use of the veto consist of those that call for an explanation on the use of veto; those that provide for overruling or setting aside a veto by the UNGA under certain circumstances or by the Security Council itself; and those that call for relevant improvements in working methods.

In so far as those that want the veto to be retained, this category itself consists of two approaches: (i) those that argue that the new permanent members should have the right of veto; and (ii) those that argue that new permanent members should not have this right.

Mr. Chairman,

In the view of my delegation, there is an urgent need to arrive at an innovative solution as we cannot allow the veto to have a veto over the process of Council reform itself.

The membership will recall that the G4 had begun with the position that all new permanent members must enjoy all the rights and prerogatives of the existing permanent members from the day the new permanent members assume their roles. However, to ensure that the veto does not veto Council reform, the G4 has put forth a revised approach that consists of two elements.

First, that the new permanent members should have the same responsibilities and obligations as the current permanent members.

Second, that the new permanent members shall not exercise the right of veto until the question of the extension of the right of veto to new permanent members has been decided upon in the framework of the review mandated fifteen years after the entry into force of the Council reform.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, the issue of veto, just like other issues, lends itself to considerable shortening of the text in Rev 2. Let me reiterate that the Indian delegation is willing to work with you and other delegations to shorten the text.

Thank you.

659. Intervention by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, at the Informal Meeting (closed) of the Plenary on the Intergovernmental Negotiations on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council and Other Matters Related to the Council,

Mr. Chairman,

Thank you very much for giving me the floor. Today's debate goes to the very essence of Council reform. To use a simple analogy, if the final product of Council reform were a building, then the key issue of "categories of membership" would be the foundation, the column, the wall, the lintel, the arch, the vault, the dome, and the roof all rolled into one. And Mr. Chairman, when I say this, I merely echo the views of the overwhelming majority of the UN membership, who are unambiguous that there must be an expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories of Security Council membership. But why does this overwhelming majority want expansion in both categories? Differences in articulation apart, the basic argument has two strands. One, that Security Council continues to reflect the geopolitical realities of 1945 rather than 2010. Two, the remedy to the current state of affairs is to make the Council reflect the contemporary geopolitical realities, critical for its legitimacy but also for the efficiency and effectiveness with which it carries out its primary task of maintenance of international peace and security. Mr. Chairman, India's clear position is that comprehensive reform of the Security Council implies expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories of membership. In this regard, India's stance reflects that of the overwhelming majority of the international community.

Mr. Chairman,

There are some who take the position that repeated elections are the panacea to the Council's weaknesses. Some argue that improvements in the working methods are the be all and end all of the reform process. Some try to apportion ratios to the different strands of the negotiations and call for carrying the reform process forward on the basis of calibrating these ratios. To the proponents of all these arguments, I have to clearly state that the G4 and L.69 positions have incorporated these valuable points and gone two steps further. The G4 and L.69 proposals have recognized that correlation is not causation and has gone in for both the curative and preventive approaches along with provisions for further action as may be required in time through a review.

Mr. Chairman,

The large majority of these proposals, including those from the African Group, the L.69, the CARICOM and the G-4 call for an expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories. This is also the running strand in proposals with some variations. Liechtenstein has called for "six additional members" which "shall be elected to serve on a permanent basis for renewable terms of [8/10 years]"while going onto add that such candidates "shall not be eligible to serve as nonpermanent members in accordance with article 23, paragraph 2, of the UN Charter for the following [8/10] calendar years." Moreover, barring a handful, even other proposals that favour expansion only in the non-permanent category also call for some form of an intermediate model or solution. Most of the proposals, of course, provide for a review clause. Mr. Chairman, The negotiation text thus presents us with what is essentially a three-fold choice with review clauses where appropriate:

i. continuation of existing categories while expanding the size of both of them

ii. creation of a third new category of seats; and

iii. for having only one category of non-permanent seats.

It is the view of my delegation that Rev 2 could merge the relevant portions under this key issue of "categories of membership" on the basis of the three-fold choice that I have just mentioned. We further believe that the Chair should eliminate those options that do not reflect the middle-ground. If this is not feasible, at least we should be able to quantify the support that different options have received, either in the body of the text or in its footnotes.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me reiterate that the Indian delegation is willing to work with other delegations in a spirit of flexibility and compromise in order to shorten this text. Thank you

Madam Co-Chair,

I would like to begin by expressing my appreciation for the leadership displayed by you (Ambassador Sanja Štiglic of Slovenia) and your co-chair (Ambassador Jorge Argüello of Argentina) in guiding our deliberations on the Revitalization of the General Assembly till this important stage. I would also like to thank the President of the General Assembly Dr. Ali Abdussalam Treki for his leadership and commitment to carry forward this process.

Madam Co-Chair,

Let me at the outset, align myself with the statement delivered by Algeria on behalf of the NAM. The report and resolution which are at the draft stage are works in progress and we look forward to active interaction with the rest of the UN membership on this important and vital matter. I take the floor to restate India's positions on the various themes. It is our expectation that these views will find their fullest expression in the report and resolution that the General Assembly finally adopts.

Madam Co-Chair,

India has consistently held the view that the General Assembly can be revitalized only when its position as the chief deliberative, policy-making and representative organ of the United Nations is respected in letter and in spirit. The General Assembly should take the lead in setting the global agenda and restoring the centrality of the United Nations in formulating multilateral approaches to resolving transnational issues. This was the role intended for the Assembly in Article 10 of the UN Charter, namely that it discuss any questions or matters within the scope of the present Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organs provided for in the Charter, i.e. the Security Council, the ECOSOC, Trusteeship Council, the ICJ as well as the Secretariat. Madam Co-Chair, On the role and authority of the General Assembly, we are of the view that the Security Council would do well to eschew the tendency to give extremely creative and permissive interpretations to the consideration of what constitutes a threat to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression and to the situations under which it can take action under Chapter VII. And in terms of its reporting obligations, the Council should not only inform the Assembly of the decisions taken, but also the rationale, efficacy and impact of the Council's decisions, in terms of crystallized take-aways for the membership. At the same time the Assembly must also take remedial measures that extend beyond merely strengthening procedures. Foremost in this regard is the need to properly appreciate and then correctly situate the Assembly within the plurality of multilateral mechanisms that deal with global issues. We also call for enhancing the oversight role of the Assembly vis-à-vis the UN staff and as reflected in the working of the Fifth Committee. We welcome the provisions in the draft resolution under the heading of "role and authority of the General Assembly" and look forward to close and constructive cooperation with others in the days to come so that we get a solution that truly strengthens the role of the General Assembly.

On the issue of the Role and Responsibilities of the General Assembly in the process of selection and appointment of the Secretary-General, we are of the view that General Assembly Resolution 11 (1) of February 1946 which lays out the "Terms of appointment of the Secretary-General" was the product of an era gone by. It was the result of irreconcilable differences between the pre-eminent yet opposing power camps in the international system on the implementation of Article 97 of the Charter. We live in a different period of international relations. Being the voice of the international community, the General Assembly must have a greater say in the process of selection of the Secretary General. In this regard, there are a number of important elements that the UN membership can consider as medium-term measures that could be applied the next time the post of Secretary General becomes vacant. For instance, the General Assembly adopted resolutions 51/241 of 22 August 1997 and 60/286 of 9 October 2006, which outline in detail proposals on improving the process of selection and appointment of the Secretary-General. Further, the practice established by GA Resolution 11 (1) can be modified to allow for the Council to send a panel of names that the Assembly could choose from as against a single nomination. Additionally, if the member-states attach high importance to the role and responsibilities of the Assembly, we see no reason why the matter should not be "decided by a two-thirds majority" in terms of Article 18 (3) as against the one with a simple majority requirement in Resolution 11 (1). We could also identify objective criteria for the candidatures, including commitment to the purposes and principles of the Charter, extensive leadership, administrative and diplomatic experience with due regard being given to regional rotation and gender equality.

Equally useful and practical would be to encourage formal presentation of candidatures in a manner that allows sufficient time for interaction with member-states, and also requires candidates to present their views to all member-states of the General Assembly.

Madam Co-Chair,

I am personally acutely conscious of the fact that setting extremely ambitious targets will not necessarily result in forward movement. Actual progress takes place in small incremental steps and in this regard I would like to stress the need for applying some of these procedures suggested in the case of appointments to heads of specialized agencies. We could consider such interaction of the candidates with the General Assembly at least for a limited purpose of outlining their programme as they envisage, if appointed.

On the matter of the office of the President of the General Assembly, we call for providing the resources that are in keeping with the aura and dignity of that high office. Particularly, we need to address the inadequacy of the current annual budget allocation of US$ 250,000. We would also like to know what the system of extra-budgetary support has been so far and how it has been operating in the past. We call upon the UN system to provide for the basic requirements of protocol and security. We also support other appropriate measures that will strengthen this august office.

Provisions in the draft resolution under the heading of "strengthening the office of the President of the General Assembly" are reflective of the consensus thinking which is emerging through deliberations. We welcome other delegations to support the same.

Madam Co-Chair,

India is no stranger to the application of newer and modern technologies to enhance the efficiency and effectiveness of electoral processes. In our considered view, the revitalization process of the General Assembly will benefit immensely if we are able to introduce those technologies that are efficient, and that ensure the security and confidentiality of the voting process. Finally, we are of the view that resolutions of the General Assembly in general and those on revitalization in particular have special significance both for the member states and the international community. In conclusion, let me reiterate that the Indian delegation attaches importance to the ongoing processes of revitalization of the General Assembly, including the various aspects of strengthening of its procedures, working methods, documentation and also ensuring due follow up. We will continue our active support and continue to be there to help you in these efforts. And let me once again express appreciation for the work that you are doing and we hope that your efforts would result in a landmark resolution this year under your leadership. Thank you.

New York, August 6, 2010.

Mr. President,

Thank you for organizing this discussion on Peacekeeping.

As one of the most active participants in UN peacekeeping operations, India attaches great significance to UN Peacekeeping and its key role in the maintenance of international peace and security.

Mr. President,

The context of UN Peacekeeping is changing and this changing scenario is demanding changes in our response. It is, therefore, good that we are having across the board discussions on UN peacekeeping in different fora. Our delegation has engaged constructively and made meaningful contributions to the evolution of the policy discourse on UN peacekeeping.
Mr. President,

Our experience in UN peacekeeping is unparalleled and our credentials can be matched by few others. We have been present in virtually every UN peacekeeping operation. Today we are present in significant numbers in UNIFIL, UNMIS, MONUSCO, MINUSTAH, UNMIL, UNDOF and UNMIT. In response to a request from the UN we have tripled our police contribution to MINUSTAH.

Indeed, as I speak here, more than 8000 Indian soldiers and police-personnel are deployed in UN Peacekeeping. It is they who are converting the Council's word into action, and, they do so in exceedingly challenging circumstances and situations.

I am happy that in the long tradition of supporting UN Peacekeeping by providing senior leadership, we have just seconded Lt Gen Chander Prakash Wadhwa from the Indian Army to be the Force Commander in MONUSCO. I am happy that he is here in the Council today.

Mr. President,

The role of women in peacekeeping has been a key focus for the Security Council. We have tried to be in the forefront to meet the Council's aspirations in this too. I draw your attention here to the Indian Female FPU in Liberia which has not only brought credit to UN Peacekeeping but have also added possible new and very much required dimensions to the scope to the efforts of UN peacekeeping. We are also working on the possibility of increasing such Female peacekeepers.

Mr. President,

The nature of the Security Council's mandates and the manner in which they are generated is an area of that requires a good look at. In today's context, mandates have been found to be too broad and detached from realities on the ground.

It is important that mandates are clear and achievable and in keeping with the available capabilities and resources. This is particularly true for uniformed personnel, who by virtue of their organizational cultures, are used to clear instructions and objectives. Unrealistic mandates also lead to situations where the Mission starts asking contingents to undertake tasks and utilize COE in a manner that is inconsistent with the legal framework of their deployment agreed between the contributing countries and the UN.

This, of course, demands substantively engaging the countries who contribute manpower and resources to the Peacekeeping Operations and we can only reiterate the critical imperative that such consultations with troop contributing countries are to be substantive, meaningful and provide the bedrock to Council's mandates on Peacekeeping. Though there have been improvements on this front, much remains to be done. For example, we are yet to be briefed in detail about recent developments in the UNIFIL operational area despite our troops being there. We have also had occasions in recent times regarding some specific events in a UN operations in West Africa, where we have peacekeepers on the ground and have command and control issues, in terms of keeping us in the loop in New York.

Mr. President,

Peacekeeping for long was essentially about blue helmets and establishing a measure of security. In the type of crises that we face today we need much broader array of responses than the pure security one. Today's peacekeepers have come to play a critical role in humanitarian emergencies around the world and are often thrust in the midst of civil wars. Frequently they are called upon to protect civilian populations when they have been uprooted from their homes. Law and order challenges have added a civilian dimension to the peacekeeping operations. Disarming the combatants and reforming the security sector have become essential to the peacekeeping strategy.

In such circumstances we need to be particularly concerned in ensuring operational support to the troops on the ground. Lack of equipments, spares, and inadequate living conditions are few critical areas that rarely receive attention. Forces are not given sufficient time to prepare for operations on the ground. It is also important that there is clear recognition that better Peacekeeping would requires more resources, human and material including command.
Mr. President,

In closing, I salute the peacekeepers from my country and fellow nations who have laid their lives for the UN Missions. India reiterates its commitment to work with the United Nations in the maintenance of international peace and security.

I thank you Mr. President.

662. Intervention By Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri Permanent Representative at the Informal Interactive Dialogue of the UN General Assembly on "Early Warning, Assessment and the Responsibility to Protect".

New York, August 9, 2010.

Madam President, I would like to begin by thanking you for convening this discussion and the Secretary General for his report entitled "Early Warning, Assessment and Responsibility to Protect". I would also like to add my voice in expressing appreciation for the contributions of the panelists. I am particularly pleased to see my friend Bertie Ramcharan, on whose experience and expertise I have had the privilege of drawing on for many years. This is an important subject, one to which we attach the highest importance. This is borne out by the excellent attendance, holiday atmospherics notwithstanding.

Madam President, We are not dealing here with merely a conflict resolution, with events which in the ordinary course of events, result in violence or even death. Here, we are dealing with crimes against humanity, war crimes, genocide and ethnic cleansing, which are the result of deliberate, systematic and serious violations of human rights. Clearly the "Responsibility to Protect" must arise in the context of State sovereignty. But we are dealing with situations where the fulfillment of these responsibilities is no longer possible; either the State has failed or is unable to protect or for whatever reason.
And clearly the international community does not want to be an innocent by-stander when crimes of such kind, that we are discussing, are going to be committed. That, I believe, is the crux of the issue. The essential bedrock for ensuring that States always act to protect their populations comes from an abiding commitment to human rights, especially the very basic right, the right to life and fundamental freedoms. Sovereignty entails responsibility, and the “Responsibility to Protect” its population is one of the foremost responsibilities of every State. Internationally, Madam President, we have developed a series of instruments to promote and protect human rights. These form a fundamental pillar of the United Nations and it is incumbent on each one of us, as Members of the United Nations, to do our utmost to inculcate a culture of human rights world-wide.

Madam President,

I come from a country where our founding fathers envisioned that the only way to secure the future of our nation was to anchor it in the values rooted in promotion and protection of human rights, and the establishment of the rule of law, supported by an independent and strong judiciary, with an abiding commitment to uphold human rights, guaranteed in the Constitution. The right to life is one of the rights from which no derogation is permitted even at the time of emergencies. This is a cardinal obligation under our Constitution. The international Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which has 164 State Parties, also has this as its core obligation.

Madam President,

In the World Summit Outcome document, the Heads of State and Government were unanimous on the issue that each individual State has the “Responsibility to Protect” its population from genocide, war crimes, crimes against humanity and ethnic cleansing. This responsibility entails prevention of such crimes, including their incitement, through appropriate and necessary means. Our Leaders agreed to help States, as necessary and appropriate, in building their capacity to protect their populations from these four mass atrocities. Our leaders also agreed to support the United Nations in establishing an early warning capability. Clearly the international community cannot be a helpless by-stander in the event of commission of crimes against humanity, war crimes, genocide and ethnic cleansing.
In his report, the Secretary-General has identified two information and assessment gaps for early warning. The first is insufficient sharing of information in the UN system and the other is the non-viewing of this information "through the lens of the Responsibility to Protect". An institutional collaboration between the Special Adviser on the Prevention of Genocide and the Special Adviser on the Responsibility to Protect, including options for a joint office, has been proposed to overcome this gap. The report of the SG also asks the latter to develop the doctrinal aspects of R2P. Based on information from "various UN sources in the field", this UN Secretariat collaborative mechanism is to trigger early warning alarm bells for the Secretary-General. A Policy Committee is also proposed to allow the SG to invoke internal procedures to expedite UN response.

Madam President,

I always ask myself a basic question or a set of questions when new mechanisms are proposed. And here I come back to my friend Bertie Ramcharan. He has been in the field and in the UN headquarters. He was the acting High Commissioner of Human Rights when I was Permanent Representative in Geneva. He said, in his presentation, that a friend had approached him before we started. He neither mentioned me nor did he say exactly what I had enquired of him. I asked him a simple question, I said, if we had the proposal or the proposed mechanism suggested by the Secretary General in para 18 of his report in place, could Srebrenica and Rwanda have been avoided? And his answer to me was, as usual, full of diplomatic skill, very cautious. I do not want to betray what he said to me. I have been agonizing on this lone question for the last 3 days, including with my younger colleagues. I got them to do some research for me. And I come to the conclusion, somewhat unfortunate, that if you had exactly this mechanism in place, as proposed in paragraph 18, which I support incidentally, those events might not have been averted. I am not going to oppose the mechanism, but I am going to recommend that it be supplemented with other safeguards, because I think the mechanism, by itself is not going to work. What happened in Srebrenica? You had the information. There were qualified personnel in the field and at headquarters. I am told that they were on leave. Is that or is that not a fact? You could not find the Under Secretary General; you could not find his Special Assistant.
I am not suggesting that that kind of unfortunate occurrence will take place again. But it could. Therefore, I am suggesting that to rely on an early warning system which is just based on a few individuals and that also in the Secretariat, involves taking too many chances. You need to supplement that, as one of the distinguished panelists said - through civil society and through Member States. I personally believe that you cannot have an early warning system which does not have the Member States as an integral filtering point in the process. That is the truth that is staring us in the face. I did a little bit of research but before I come to the research on what happened, I look at the Secretary General's own report in para 7, under section III refers to gaps in capacity, and it says "in the case of Rwanda, the Independent Inquiry noted that there was not sufficient focus for institutional resources or early warning or risk analysis" at headquarters and that there was "an institutional weakness in the analytical capacity of the United Nations". And, the crux of this is that the analytical capacities of the United Nations need to be comprehensively improved. Otherwise, you will continue to receive issues and reports which have not been thought through and suffer from an insufficient database or analytical capacities, which will later be questioned. In the case of Rwanda, it is not that someone had not asked for help. Because of shortage of time, I must go back to a public source and it says here, "the UN finally conceded that acts of genocide may have been committed on May 17, 1994. By that time the Red Cross estimated that 500,000 Rwandans had been killed. The UN agreed to send 5,500 troops, mostly from African countries, to Rwanda. This is the original number of troops requested by General Dallaire before the killing escalated". This, Madam President, is the hard truth that there was a person who asked for help, the International community did not have either the determination or the resolve to act before the atrocities were committed and the rest is an unfortunate chapter. We need not revisit those facts today. It will not serve our purpose here. In the case of Srebrenica, on the other hand, it is a slightly different situation. There it was a system again based on a few individuals. That needs to be rectified.

Madam President, The development of the conceptual, political and institutional dimensions of the responsibility to protect cannot be left to any individual, no matter how competent or committed.
This can only be a Member-States driven process and must essentially build on existing international instruments, including the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, the Geneva Conventions and, indeed, the human rights regime. Here it is critical to remember that even the cautious go-ahead for developing R2P in 2005 emphasized the use of appropriate diplomatic, humanitarian and other peaceful means to help protect populations. The responsibility to protect should in no way be seen as providing a pretext for humanitarian intervention or unilateral action. To do so would not only give R2P a bad name but also defeat its very purpose. This was foreshadowed in Bertie’s point on the political aspect and, it was foreshadowed, I think in what my Cuban colleague said and this will come in many other statements. Let us remember that a solution to the avoidance of the four mass atrocities ultimately lies in strengthening the capacity and ability of States through various means so that they can effectively fulfill their human rights obligations rather than in devising a Secretariat driven mechanism without a focus on the promotion and protection of human rights and without the involvement of States. The SG’s proposal to collect information from “various UN sources in the field” and its analyses by a select few in the Secretariat “through the lens of responsibility to protect” must be supplemented through a process of involving member States. It is critical that Member States are integrally included in the information gathering and analysis process, and we do not set up a mechanism that starts acting as a “fishing expedition” for R2P. This could become the case given the R2P stakes of such a Secretariat mechanism, especially if its source of information was “various UN sources in the field” and their analysis was “through the lens of responsibility to protect”. Let us also be clear, as I said earlier, that some of the events noted in the SG’s report of 2009 did not reveal that those tragic events happened behind closed doors. The non-action was also not due to lack of warning, resources or the barrier of state sovereignty or lack of authority to act but because of strategic, political or economic considerations of those on whom the present international architecture had placed the onus to act.

That international architecture has not undergone much change in the last 45 years. And I don’t want to take the time of this group on why the international architecture should be changed.
But let me just make one final submission. That given the present less than perfect architecture, let us find ways and means of interspersing layers of other supplementary safeguards so that the early warning system, which is absolutely necessary, is comprehensive. It should be able to rise to the situation, and that this system draws on support from all information sources, including civil society, if you want to, but certainly the Member States. It must draw on the experience and wisdom of those involved in the region and in the sub-region, to which people have referred to, so that when the analysis takes place, the analysis is based not on half-baked presumptions. The system must act, not in order to act as a “fishing expedition”, but as a genuine R2P so that the international community knows what it is getting into in that situation. Thank you very much.

663. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, at the Plenary Meeting of the General Assembly to consider the Humanitarian Situation resulting from the Floods in Pakistan.

Mr. President,

Let me begin by thanking you, Mr. President, for your personal initiative in organizing this meeting and proposing the resolution for focused action by the international community on the humanitarian situation arising from the floods in Pakistan.

Yesterday, while we commemorated the World Humanitarian Day, Pakistan and the international community are confronted with another calamity, one of the biggest natural calamities of our recent times.

I would also like to express deep appreciation for the Secretary-General’s initiative in visiting the flood ravaged areas of Pakistan and his strenuous efforts to mobilize international assistance for Pakistan at this time of need.
The high-level participation that we have witnessed in this meeting is a testimony of the solidarity and commitment of the international community to being where one of our Member-States requires help.

Mr. President,

India and Pakistan share the same history, same topography, landmass and the river systems that irrigate both sides of the border. Our region is prone to natural disasters and the vagaries of nature continue to take a heavy toll of human lives and material losses in our region. We are familiar with the devastation and human suffering they cause and the trauma they leave behind long after the initial impact. However, in this particular case, the wide-spread devastation is unprecedented and has never ever been witnessed before in recent history. Even some parts of India bordering Pakistan have also been affected by these floods.

Kindly allow me to convey to the people and the Government of Pakistan the heartfelt condolences of the people and the Government of India on the lives that have been tragically lost in this disaster

Kindly allow me, Mr. President, also to convey the deepest sympathy of the people and the Government of India for those who have been injured and traumatized by this calamity and for the material losses that the people and the country have suffered. Our hearts and our prayers are with the near and dear of those who have died and to those who have suffered and continue to suffer. We share the pain and agony and fully understand the trauma and suffering that our Pakistani brethren are living through.

Mr. President,

Even as we meet today, the humanitarian catastrophe is still unfolding. The extent of devastation is unparalleled. Over 10% of the entire country's population has been affected and there has been extensive damage to livestock, crops and the infrastructure.

The magnitude of the tragedy makes it incumbent on the international community to pool its energies and resources and to assist Pakistan in its efforts to rebuild and rehabilitate the devastated region. As a member of the international community and, more significantly as a close neighbor, India recognizes its responsibility in contributing to this global effort to extend its support to Pakistan in its hour of need. We cannot remain unaffected by this humanitarian catastrophe.

We are willing to do all that is in our power to assist Pakistan in facing the consequences of floods. We extend our wholehearted support to the Government of Pakistan in its efforts for relief and rehabilitation of the adversely affected population.

Our Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh called his counterpart from Pakistan yesterday and our External Affairs Minister Mr. S.M. Krishna had also spoken earlier to the Foreign Minister of Pakistan and expressed our sorrow and condolences to Pakistan. As a gesture of our solidarity and sympathy, we have offered assistance of US $ 5 million, in the first instance, for provision of relief supplies from India to be prioritized by the Government of Pakistan in their battle to respond to the crisis. We have offered that the relief supplies could be handed over to the Pakistani authorities at the border for further distribution by the Pakistani authorities. Given our geographical proximity, provision of relief supplies from India would save precious time and provide much needed relief to the flood victims at the earliest. It is our expectation, Mr. President, that the relief supplies would start moving very shortly.

Our Prime Minister has also said that the Government of India is ready to do more to assist in the relief effort. He has also underscored that all of South Asia should rise to the occasion and extend every possible help to the people of Pakistan affected by the tragedy.

As and when Pakistan is able to articulate its requirements for medium to long-term recovery, we will, within our abilities and in accordance with the needs of Pakistan, be privileged to be of assistance.

Mr. President,

While national authorities are, and should be, at the forefront of humanitarian response, international solidarity and assistance guided by humanitarian principles, can play a key role. We believe that the United Nations should coordinate this humanitarian assistance so that it is channeled according to national priorities. This meeting would, therefore, be vital input in developing the framework of response of the international community to the situation which is unfolding.
Before I conclude, I reiterate India's willingness and readiness to contribute to this global effort. What Pakistan needs today is a sustained and long-term commitment of the international community for providing relief and rehabilitation to the affected population. I am confident that the international community would not be found wanting in supporting the Government of Pakistan in its relief and rehabilitation efforts. I have no doubt that the people of Pakistan have the strength and resilience to overcome this natural disaster.

Mr. President,

Let me begin by thanking you for organizing this meeting. We welcome the report of the Secretary General submitted pursuant to the Security Council Resolution 1918 of 27 April 2010 on the possible judicial mechanisms for prosecuting and imprisoning persons responsible for piracy and armed robbery at sea off the coast of Somalia.

The problem of piracy, particularly in the Gulf of Aden and in the Indian Ocean, and the threat it poses to the safety of shipping lanes and maritime trade, is a matter of grave concern to us. Piracy has not only had a destabilizing effect on global and regional trade and security, it has also brought much suffering to sea farers and their families.

India has committed its full support to international anti-piracy efforts. Our naval ship deployed in the Gulf of Aden has successfully thwarted several piracy attempts and provided security escorts to merchant marine in these waters. India is also a founder member of the Contact Group on Piracy off the Coast of Somalia (CGPCS).
Several military groups and independent navies are operating off the Horn of Africa and in the Gulf of Aden. Despite this, the number of pirate attacks in the region continues to be high though their success rates have declined. With the increased presence of international naval forces off the coast of Somalia and in the Gulf of Aden, pirates have moved to other areas and increased pirate activity has been witnessed in the larger Indian Ocean area outside the Internationally Recommended Transit Corridor (IRTC). India has, therefore, called for better coordination of international efforts for escorting merchant ships and patrolling in the region, preferably under aegis of the United Nations.

Mr. President,

Ensuring sound and prompt prosecution of piracy suspects and their imprisonment subsequent to trial is critical to prevent impunity and to deter further attacks. Naval operations against pirates cannot fully succeed if the suspects apprehended by navies are released without proper prosecution as such persons tend to return to piracy. Several approaches, including recourse to bilateral MoUs with countries in the region for prosecution and incarceration, have been tried. These, however, have not been entirely successful because of lack of capacities and resources to prosecute and incarcerate. There are legal issues of jurisdiction too.

India has welcomed efforts for countering piracy by enhancement of regional cooperation and capacity building of littoral states. The international community needs to recognize that any effort for prosecution and imprisonment of pirates cannot succeed without the effective involvement of the States in the region. The issue of imprisonment of convicted persons can be best addressed by building prison infrastructure in the region, ideally in Somalia. It is also important to ensure that sustained and predictable financing is available to the host States to handle the financial burden of prosecuting and imprisoning convicts over long durations.

Mr. President,

The seven options mentioned in the Secretary General's Report were also discussed in Working Group 2 dealing with legal issues of the Contact Group on Piracy off the Coast of Somalia (CGPCS). Let me, at the outset, make it clear that while we are examining all the seven options, our preference at the moment is for option Number One. In our view, the international community must further strengthen the ongoing assistance programmes of the United Nations extended to regional states to build capacities for prosecution and imprisonment of pirates. These programmes, as noted in the UNSG’s report, have achieved some success. UN assistance could focus on the three main components of legal reform, capacity building for prosecution and improvement of prison infrastructure for the host regional States.

Besides being cost effective, this approach will be relatively easier to implement as it would utilize an existing jurisdiction with established crimes and procedures. The regional proximity would be useful for the purpose of the transfer of suspects by patrolling naval States, and the transfer of those convicted to third States for imprisonment. While the financial assistance provided to the regional states for capacity building could be drawn from the International Trust Fund, the remaining funding needs could be met from the UN assessed contributions.

It is important to note that universal jurisdiction over Piracy has been accepted under international law for many centuries. All States may both arrest and punish pirates, provided of course that they have been apprehended on the high seas (including EEZ) or within the territory of the State concerned. As highlighted in the Secretary General’s report, a State can assume jurisdiction over acts of piracy carried out in open seas and EEZ, in cases where they have an interest, for example where their flag vessel has been attacked, or their nationals are victims. In this regard, it may also be noted that the General Assembly has called upon States to take appropriate steps under their national law to facilitate the apprehension and the prosecution of suspected pirates.

Mr. President,

India has a strong interest in ensuring the security of maritime traffic off the Somali coast and the Gulf of Aden. As a country with a coastline of over 7,500 kms, bulk of India’s trade is transported through the sea route. In addition, more than 11% of seafarers engaged by international shipping companies are Indian nationals, some of whom have been taken hostage by Somali pirates. India would be happy to contribute to any international efforts aimed at increasing effective cooperation among States to tackle the growing threat of piracy and armed robbery at sea.

Thank you.
665. Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative, on Agenda Item 115 United Nations Global Counter Terrorism Strategy at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

Let me take this opportunity to congratulate Ambassador H. E. Abulkalam Abdul Momen, PR of Bangladesh for his outstanding efforts in facilitating consultations on resolution on the second review of the UN Global Counter Terrorism Strategy that we are going to adopt later today. We also thank the Secretary General for his report contained in Doc A/64/818 on the activities of the United Nations system in implementing the strategy, highlighting the efforts of the UN system in this regard.

Mr. President,

Terrorism is the most abhorrent and heinous crime against humanity as a whole. Indeed it is a scourge of our time. It continues to be a pervasive and insidious threat not only to global security but also to the core values of the United Nations. It is our firm conviction that no belief, justification, political cause or argument can be used to justify acts of terrorism. We condemn terrorism in all its forms and manifestations, irrespective of its motivations, as criminal and unjustifiable and therefore reiterate that no cause, no matter how seemingly just, can excuse terrorism. Being a victim of terrorism and worst sufferer for the last many decades, India has an abiding interest in greater and more meaningful international cooperation to counter and combat terrorism.

Mr. President,

The adoption of the Global Counter Terrorism Strategy in 2006 was a landmark in the fight against terrorism. The four pillars of the strategy deal with the menace of terrorism in a balanced manner addressing all aspects - contributory as well as preventive.

The institutionalization of the Counter Terrorism Implementation Task Force (CTITF) in 2009 has contributed in strengthening UN efforts to counter terrorism by providing an umbrella under which different UN entities can effectively implement the Strategy in a coordinated and coherent manner. We are confident that the institutionalization of CTITF will streamline the overall work of the UN system in countering terrorism.

Since the primary responsibility for the implementation of the strategy rests with member States, we hope that this institutionalization process would also provide a useful platform for practical engagement of the CTITF with member states guided by their individual needs.

Mr. President,

The UN Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy is a unique universally agreed strategic framework to counter terrorism. The strategy is intended to play a pivotal role in guiding counter-terrorism efforts undertaken at the global, regional, sub-regional and national levels.

The Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy need to be implemented in an integrated manner in all its four pillars. The various UN and other specialized agencies have to ensure that counter-terrorism approaches and measures cater to regional, national and international as well as functional specificities to facilitate multi-dimensional technical assistance needs. In this regard the CTITF has to play a crucial role in ensuring coordinated and coherent efforts across the UN system to counter terrorism.

Mr. President,

India has firmly put in place policy, strategic, administrative, operational and legal framework to implement the Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy in all its four pillars.

We are willing to share our experiences in the implementation of the Strategy and provide assistance bilaterally or multilaterally as necessary and needed in the larger efforts to counter the threat of terrorism at the global regional, sub-regional or national levels. We are also willing to share relevant information with competent UN agencies as and when the need arise.

Mr. President,

The second review resolution on the implementation of the Global Counter-Terrorism Strategy is an important step forward. Stressing on the primary responsibility of States to implement the Strategy, it lays emphasis on the implementation of the Strategy by the UN system in a coordinated and coherent manner and on the need to avoid duplication in efforts undertaken by various UN entities.

We are happy to see that the resolution encourages member states to get involved in the work of the CTITF not merely for receiving regular quarterly briefings from the task force on its work but also to provide CTITF with policy guidance and feed back on its work. This interactive mechanism would be immensely beneficial both for the member State as well as the UN system in their joint efforts to combat terrorism.

We are happy to note the plans of CTITF to bring its work to a wider audience through the development of a comprehensive web site. This is a significant effort as the work of the CTITF is not only relevant to member States and the UN entities but also for the civil society at large. Encouragement of member States in the work of CTITF will further add value to the legitimacy and credibility of UN efforts to counter terrorism.

Mr. President,

The Secretary General has very aptly pointed out in paragraph 139 of his report that the comprehensiveness of implementing the Strategy will not be complete without the conclusion of the comprehensive convention on international terrorism. As committed in the Strategy, Member States should make every effort to reach an agreement on the text and conclude the convention in order to unite behind the global counter-terrorism efforts.

I wish to reassure you that we will actively engage with CTITF and all relevant entities of the UN to effectively contribute to UN efforts in countering terrorism.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, at the launch of the Revised Pakistan Floods Emergency Response Plan.

New York, September 17, 2010.

Mr. Secretary General,

Under Secretary General for Humanitarian Affairs,

My distinguished colleague, H.E. the Permanent Representative of Pakistan

Let me begin by thanking you, Mr. Secretary General, for convening this meeting for the launch of the 'Revised Pakistan Floods Emergency Response Plan'.

Pakistan has been severely affected by the massive floods and the humanitarian catastrophe continues to unfold. The extent of devastation is unprecedented in its geographical spread and around 21 million people are still adversely affected. There has been extensive damage to crops, live stock and infrastructure. The challenge is particularly enormous as 80% of the floods-affected population is dependent on agriculture for its livelihood.

We applaud and support the good work done by the UN agencies, the international community, the NGOs and the civil society present in the field. Their role has been critical in bringing much-needed relief and succour to the vulnerable population. I am happy to note that the UN agencies are ramping up complimentary programmes such as emergency food and nutritional assistance, distribution of agricultural inputs, rehabilitation of damaged lands and infrastructure and micro financing.

Mr. Secretary General,

India is familiar with the consequences of natural disasters and therefore understands very well the trauma and the suffering that our Pakistani brethren are going through.
We cannot remain unconcerned with this grave humanitarian crisis of enormous magnitude in our immediate neighbourhood. As a member of the international community and more significantly as a close neighbour, India recognizes its responsibility to support Pakistan.

Our Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh and Foreign Minister Mr. S.M. Krishna have spoken to their counterparts in Pakistan and offered assistance.

Earlier today I had the honour to hand over to you Mr. Secretary General in the presence of H.E. the Permanent Representative of Pakistan a cheque for US $ 20 Million for the UN's Pakistan Floods Emergency Response Plan. A further US $ 5 million is being contributed by the Government of India to the World Food Programme for its relief efforts in Pakistan.

Natural disasters, Mr. Secretary General, know no boundaries. This contribution is a small but significant gesture from the highest levels of the Indian Government conveying the message that the people of India stand by the people of Pakistan in their hour of need. We are committed to assisting the people of Pakistan in all possible ways in these difficult times.

Mr. Secretary General,

I have no doubt that the people of Pakistan have the strength and resilience to overcome this natural disaster. However, the magnitude of the tragedy makes it incumbent on the international community to pool its energies and resources and to assist Pakistan in its efforts to rebuild and rehabilitate the devastated region. Generous support from the international community to the 'Revised Pakistan Floods Emergency Response Plan' would be critical in providing necessary impetus to ongoing relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction efforts.

Thank you.
667. Statement by Mr. S. M. Krishna, External Affairs Minister at the High-level Plenary Meeting on Millennium Development Goals.

New York, 22 September, 2010.

Mr. President, Excellencies and distinguished delegates,

I am honoured to be present at this august gathering and to speak on the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs), an aspiration which so fittingly captures the global vision and promise for humanity in the 21st century.

Allow me to begin by thanking you for your stewardship, guidance and support to the expansive development agenda of the United Nations including the MDGs.

Mr. President,

In his message on the UN World Public Service Day five years ago, our Prime Minister, Dr. Manmohan Singh said:

"The Millennium Development Goals that we have set for ourselves cannot be met unless governments are pro-active. No government in any civilized society can ignore the basic needs of people. The goal of the development process must be to include every last member of our society in that process".

As we take stock of the MDGs, we note that the world as a whole has made substantial gains but the progress is uneven and short of expectations.

This is particularly visible in the so called forgotten MDGs, MDGs that deal with women and children's health. We are, therefore, happy that the Secretary-General has set out a Global Strategy on women and children's health.

Natural disasters have also taken a toll on MDG achievements. The death and destruction in Haiti and Pakistan have been on an unprecedented scale.
As a fellow developing country that has itself taken a huge toll from such disasters, we responded duty-bound in solidarity to assist the Governments and people in the affected countries to the best of our ability and in keeping with their priorities.

Mr. President,

A growing concern is the impact of climate change on vulnerable communities and regions in our country. Rain-fed agriculture accounts for sixty percent of crop area in India. Climate change has aggravated the situation in traditionally drought and flood prone regions in the country. The National Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme was designed to provide relief to affected farming communities in the country.

We in India are alive to the challenges of climate, and remain committed to mounting appropriate national and regional responses. Our national action plan on Climate Change will increase the share of clean and renewable energy in our energy mix, increase energy efficiency across the economy and expand our forest cover.

Mr. President,

With just five years to go for the MDG target year and our record of mixed success, it is imperative that we significantly step up our individual and collective commitments and efforts for the realization of the MDGs.

Mr. President,

Our collective efforts have certainly borne fruit on the goal of poverty eradication at the global level.

But, more than 60 million people slipped back into poverty in 2009 following the economic and financial crisis of 2008. This has certainly had a regressive impact on the MDGs.

It is, therefore, important that we ensure that global economic recovery is durable, balanced and sustainable. This is also critical for achieving the MDGs and for us to be able to effectively address the challenges of food and energy security, climate change and natural disasters.
In so far as India is concerned, our economy has shown resilience and is expected to grow by 8.5% in 2010-11, and over 9% in 2011-12.

The UN Secretary General's report on MDGs notes that India's efforts on poverty reduction have been a major contributor for reduction in global poverty levels and some 188 million people in India would be out of poverty by 2015.

We need to, however, be cognizant that the largest concentration of poor in the world continues to remain in India and South Asia. The long distance we still have to travel to put poverty behind us in India should not be underestimated.

Our efforts, therefore, are to push for growth while at the same time ensuring that the fruits of growth reach out across our society, i.e. inclusive growth. This, indeed, is the main objective of India's ambitious socio-economic development programmes.

The Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act, with an annual budget of US$ 8 billion, is the largest "cash for work" poverty alleviation programme in the world and has benefited 50 million rural households in India so far.

By law, all Indian children in the age group of 6 to 14 years must now receive free education. The Sarva Shiksha Abhiyan, a universal elementary education programme with an annual budget of US$ 3 billion has dramatically increased primary school enrolment.

To ensure that children remain in school and that this also benefits them nutritionally, we also run the largest school-lunch programme in the world.

This is being supplemented by Saakshar Bharat a special programme focused on female literacy launched in 2009.

Enormous strides have been made in the empowerment of women.

India has embarked on perhaps the most ambitious affirmative action ever by mandating that one-third of all elected positions in local government be reserved for women. We are striving to raise this figure even higher. More than a million women representatives already hold elected positions. A legislation to extend reservation of seats in Parliament is under consideration.

Mr. President,

India faces enormous challenges in the areas of women’s and children’s health. The Government of India has adopted a multi pronged strategy under the National Rural Health Mission in 2005 to provide health care in the rural areas which is accessible, affordable, accountable, effective and reliable. This Mission is fully focused on improving our standing on maternal and child health indicators. Under the umbrella of this Mission, recently, in order to accelerate progress, new initiatives have been identified, namely, Name Based Tracking of Pregnant Women, Maternal Death Review, Adolescent Reproductive and Sexual Health, Differential Planning, and Annual Health Survey. Our JANANI SURAKSHA YOJANA, a dedicated safe motherhood programme, has so far benefited 28 million women.

As a result of on-going efforts, the Maternal Mortality Rate (MMR) in India has come down from 301 over 2001-2003 to 254 over 2004-2006, a decline of 47 points over a period of three years. Though, we are still some distance away from the target of 109 by 2015, going by the rate of decline in the past and comprehensive efforts being made across the country, it appears that India is on the right track with regard to MDG-5. We are also trying to take similar strides on Infant Mortality Rate (IMR).

India has made notable progress on combating HIV/AIDS, Malaria and other diseases. The HIV epidemic has reached a plateau in India and we now have a prevalence rate down to 0.34 %.

Mr. President,

India has made valuable use of technology to bring benefits of development to our people. The tele-density in India has increased from 0.67% in 1991 to 37 % in 2009. Our innovative and low cost technology solutions in the field of IT and telecommunication have brought development benefits, not just in India, but also to people in Africa, Latin America and elsewhere.
In August 2010, we launched the second phase of the Pan-African e-Network project. The network project will link all the 53 countries in Africa with centres of excellence in India for telemedicine and tele-education services. More than 1700 students from African countries have already registered with different Indian universities for various courses and regular tele-medical consultations have also started between African doctors and Indian specialists.

Mr. President,

The lack of progress on building a robust global partnership needs to be urgently addressed. Unmet financial commitments by developed country partners have widened the financing for development gap. We call upon them to fulfill the long made 0.7% of GNI commitment.

Equally urgent is the need to transfer technology and undertake capacity building in developing countries.

The quantum leap in South-South Cooperation has significantly complemented global resources targeted at development agenda, but it cannot be a substitute for the North-South cooperation.

We are happy that today India’s development partnership with countries in the South goes beyond technical cooperation. Our annual outlay on concessional lending and grants is over US$ 1 billion, covering countries in our region, in Africa and beyond. In addition, US$ 5 billion has been extended as lines of credit since 2003.

We are committed to doing more in the coming years with our partners in the South and stepping up our support to South-South Cooperation, both on the development side as well as in support of humanitarian needs.

Mr. President,

India is seized of the MDG challenges that lie ahead of us. Our commitment remains resolute.

Our national goal of inclusive growth and the larger idea of a more humane and just global society that underlines the Millennium Declaration would continue to inspire us to work untiringly to achieve the MDGs by 2015.

In the final march towards the attainment of the MDG, let us be inspired by the belief of Mahatma Gandhi in the limitless potential of human achievement, he said:

"A small body of determined spirits fired by an unquenchable faith in their mission can alter the course of history."

This should be the driving force for nations across the world and to this we dedicate ourselves.

Thank you.

668. Statement by Mr. Jairam Ramesh, Minister, Environment & Forests, at the Panel on "The way forward in achieving the three objectives of the Convention on Biological Diversity and the internationally agreed biodiversity goals and targets", High Level Meeting of the 65th session of the General Assembly on Biodiversity.

Hon’ble Co-Chairmen and distinguished delegates,

It is indeed an honour for me to speak at the first ever high level event on biodiversity of the United Nations General Assembly at its 65th Session.

This now sets the stage for moving biodiversity and the Convention on Biological Diversity to the central place in global environmental discourse and arena, a place that it rightfully deserves, 18 years after the birth of this Convention at the Earth Summit held at Rio de Janeiro in 1992, and years after its sister Convention on climate change has been getting all the headlines.
The Convention on Biological Diversity, through its three goals, sets out commitments for maintaining the world’s ecological underpinnings, while pursuing economic development. The three objectives - conservation of biodiversity, sustainable use of its components, and fair and equitable sharing of benefits arising out of the use of genetic resources, are complementary and mutually reinforcing.

While the global community can take some pride in making strides towards implementation of the first two objectives, it is regrettable that the third objective relating to access and benefit sharing, or ABS as it is called, remains largely unfulfilled.

May I take this opportunity to urge the Ministers of member states to provide the much needed urgent political impetus at this stage of negotiations, to be able to arrive at a practicable and implementable ABS protocol which provides for a balance between access and compliance provisions and which holds the sanctity of domestic legislation? As a major victim of bio-piracy in different ways, India believes that the ABS Protocol is a key missing pillar of the CBD.

Biodiversity and ecosystem services are considered largely as public goods, their loss therefore goes unaccounted for in the present economic system, and therefore can continue unabated. We hope and expect that the TEEB study, led by Pavan Sukhdev, the final report of which would be launched at CoP-10, would be able to address this anomaly. The key messages from the TEEB reports being released in phases, including the one for local and regional policy makers, which I had the honour to release in New Delhi earlier this month, have already sharpened awareness on the value of biodiversity. I hope in due course, this study may facilitate development of cost-effective policy responses and better informed decisions.

My government is committed to inclusion of biodiversity as an integral part of the growth process, since this is the only path whereby we can sustain high economic growth. The debate today is no longer on development versus environment, since biodiversity is an essential ingredient of inclusive growth. GDP must be redefined as Green Domestic Product and not stand for Gross Domestic Product.
Another important matter that is awaiting the final approval is the establishment of an Intergovernmental Panel on Biodiversity and Ecosystem Services. The IPBES, proposed to be set on the lines of IPCC, aims to provide a science-policy interface on biodiversity, especially in the backdrop of the looming ecological crisis owing to widespread loss of biodiversity and ecosystem services. The expectation is that this step too will motivate political action.

India as you know is a megadiverse country with very strong science base in terms of manpower and institutions. We would therefore be happy to host the secretariat of IPBES, as and when it is established. The IPBES secretariat could be modelled on the lines of the Global Development Network (GDN), the headquarters of which are located in New Delhi.

As you may be aware, India has offered to host the eleventh CoP to the CBD to be held in the 20th anniversary of the Rio Summit in 2012. We are looking forward to your support in this endeavour.

A few days back, at the invitation of the UNGA President, Switzerland, the eleven past, present and future Presidencies of CoP have adopted a Geneva Ministerial Biodiversity Call for Immediate Action, which I had the honour to cochair. We have recognised the inextricable linkages between the issues of climate change and biodiversity loss, and have specifically proposed that implementation of voluntary REDD/REDD+ mechanisms should be done to enrich biodiversity. We look forward to clinching a forestry agreement at the forthcoming Conference of the Parties to the UNFCCC at Cancun.

There are also extremely important issues relating to the linkages between the CBD and the TRIPS Agreement under the WTO that need to be addressed and finalized soon.

Thank you.
Statement by S.M. Krishna, External Affairs Minister, at the High Level Meeting on 'Revitalizing the Work of the Conference on Disarmament and Taking Forward Multilateral Disarmament Negotiations.

His Excellency Mr. Ban Ki Moon, Secretary General of the United Nations, Distinguished colleagues,

India welcomes the Secretary General's initiative to convene this meeting. We believe that its main purpose is to send a clear message of support for the Conference on Disarmament as the single multilateral disarmament negotiating forum and to provide political impetus to the multilateral disarmament agenda. India associates itself with the statement made on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement.

Mr. Chairman,

The Conference on Disarmament adopted a consensus decision in May 2009 on its Programme of work, which included immediate commencement of negotiations on a Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty. Such negotiations, which we support, are without prejudice to India's principled position on other agenda items, in particular the priority issue of nuclear disarmament. We share the disappointment expressed here by a number of speakers that the CD has been prevented from undertaking its primary task of negotiating multilateral treaties. We reaffirm our support for the CD as the single multilateral negotiating forum, recognized as such by the international community. We also support the immediate commencement of FMCT negotiations in the CD as part of its Programme of work in early 2011.

Mr. Chairman,

India remains committed to the objective and vision of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's Action Plan of 1988 for ushering in a nuclear weapon free and non-violent world order. It is a painful reality that this has remained a distant goal, not least due to the continued opposition to negotiations on nuclear disarmament, in the Conference on Disarmament. It may be recalled that the Final Document of the First Special session on Disarmament accorded nuclear disarmament the highest priority. We call for intensification of dialogue amongst UN member states for strengthening the international consensus on disarmament and non-proliferation.

Mr. Chairman,

While it is not possible for this short meeting to deliberate on all issues nor take decisions on the disarmament agenda, the Chair's summary that the UN Secretary General will make at its conclusion, will, we hope, add positive momentum for the disarmament agenda and reaffirm the critical role of the CD as the single multilateral negotiating forum for achieving our common goals.

Thank you.

670. Statement by S.M. Krishna, External Affairs Minister at the High Level Meeting on Sudan [Read out by Ambassador Harsh V Shringla, Joint Secretary] at the UNGA.

Mr. Secretary General, Foreign Ministers, Excellencies,

At the outset permit me to compliment you for convening this very timely Conference on Sudan. The United Nations has been at the forefront of the international community's attempts to stabilise the situation in Sudan. As one of the prime contributors to the United Nations Mission in Sudan (UNMIS), India shares the principles and purposes behind the United Nations involvement in the country. I would like to take this opportunity to reiterate India's commitment to contribute fully to the shared goals we have for this troubled region.

Sudan today is on the threshold of profound change. The Comprehensive Peace Agreement signed by the warring Sudanese parties has brought peace, after a prolonged and bitter civil war, to Sudan. The culmination of the CPA process will take place in a few months with the referendum of 9
January 2011 when the people of Southern Sudan will decide whether they favour unity of the country or opt for secession. We are happy to note that the referendum process is on track and is expected to be concluded by the stipulated date. I would like to take this opportunity to compliment the Government of National Unity in Khartoum and the Government of Southern Sudan in Juba for their statesmanlike approach in resolving the difficulties at hand and in ensuring that the referendum time schedule is maintained.

We trust that the referendum will be conducted in a timely, transparent and credible manner and the outcome of the referendum will be respected by all parties in accordance with the provisions of the CPA as also the international community. India hopes for a peaceful resolution of the issue.

Insofar as the situation in Darfur is concerned, we would like the issue to be resolved in a manner consistent with Sudan's unity and territorial integrity. We are aware that there are several sets of on-going efforts in progress at achieving peace in Sudan and we wish the efforts, including the Doha Peace Talks, to bring peace and prosperity to Sudan.

India is extensively engaged with Africa and highly values its relations with the region. The Pan-Africa E-Network Project, the 2nd phase of which was inaugurated by me recently, is one of the finest examples of the growing partnership between India and Africa. We value Sudan's participation in the Project. It is the biggest project of distance education and tele-medicine ever undertaken in Africa. Extension of concessional lines of credit to countries in Africa, including Sudan, has been another way of assisting our partners in the development process.

India and Sudan share the most cordial of relations. Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru successfully argued for Sudan's inclusion at the 1955 Bandung Conference even before Sudan became independent. Our age old ties have been cemented in modern times with people to people contacts, trade and commerce, investments and a broad commonality of outlook on global issues. India is, therefore, deeply committed to the stable development of Sudan. India looks forward to peaceful development of this region which will depend, irrespective of the outcome of the referendum, on maintaining close cooperation between Southern and Northern Sudan and its neighbours, and the world community.
671. Intervention by S.M. Krishna, External Affairs Minister at the Meeting of the Foreign Ministers of the "Group of Fifteen" (G-15) countries (Read on his behalf by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative).

Mr. Chairman,

I am pleased to participate in the Ministerial meeting of the Group of Fifteen (G-15) and would like to begin by expressing our deep appreciation for your leadership of the Group. We commend your efforts in undertaking a frank and thorough review of the working of the Group with the help of the High-Level Task Force. We welcome the recommendations of the Task Force. We hope that the implementation of the recommendations will help to revitalize and reposition the Group.

Mr. Chairman,

The continuing global economic crisis points towards the urgent need for the creation of a more effective and responsive governance architecture for the global economy, including through bringing about appropriate reforms in the international financial institutions. Only equitable and inclusive solutions that provide a due place for developing countries, can redress existing systemic challenges and help avert future crises.

Developing countries continue to face a range of challenges in various multilateral fora. In order to counter these challenges and optimize the outcomes for developing countries, the need for sustained interaction and coordination among our countries in multilateral processes becomes paramount. We, therefore, welcome the recommendations of the Task Force to promote thematic consultations and articulation of common positions, where possible, on key international issues of interest to member countries.

Mr. Chairman,

While global economic recovery is still fragile and private demand in the industrialized countries is likely to remain weak for some time, South-South cooperation acquires particular salience. The Group's membership has varied capabilities in diverse areas which can be harnessed for the common good of developing countries. G-15 collaborative projects can serve as vehicles to share national competencies and exemplify concrete and credible partnerships between our countries. With the youthful demographic profile in our countries, (G-15 projects can focus on human resource development and help translate this advantage into empowering economic assets.

In this context, the Revised Guidelines proposed by the Task Force for monitoring and successful implementation of the projects are timely and welcome. With the new guidelines and monitoring mechanisms in place, we hope that there will be a renewed zeal to initiate projects based on contemporary priorities of the member states. India has, in the past, actively participated in G-15 projects and has coordinated a number of them. We assure you of India’s continued support and active collaboration in G-15 projects. On our part, we stand ready to share our developmental experience and partner interested member countries in capacity building, training, technical assistance and other sectoral cooperation projects.

Mr. Chairman,

In order to respond to the challenges of today’s fast changing and interconnected world, G-15 must improve its internal working methods and streamline its institutional mechanisms. India, therefore, welcomes the recommendations of the Task Force for the establishment of the working groups on Sectoral Cooperation and Institutional Mechanisms. We hope that these working groups will be operational soon and contribute to a revitalized and energized Group. The institution of the Personal Representatives is central to the successful functioning of the Group. We look forward to their more regular and frequent meetings to provide effective supervision of the Group’s activities.

Mr. Chairman,

In conclusion, we hope the new set of reforms will revitalize the Group and enable it to play a more significant role in the international arena, commensurate with the potential and capabilities of its member countries, both in contributing to the bridging of the North-South divide and in enhancing South-South Co-operation.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.
672. Statement by S. M. Krishna, External Affairs Minister at the High Level Review Meeting of the Mauritius Strategy for Implementation, Multi-Stakeholder Roundtable -II on "Enhancing International Support for Small Island Developing States".

Mr. Chairman,

Thank you for your leadership, guidance and support for the cause of the Small Island Developing States (SIDS).

The international community has expressed solidarity with the SIDS since the Barbados Programme of Action and subsequently through the Agenda 21 and the Mauritius International Meeting on Sustainable Development of SIDS. Unfortunately, the declared commitments have not been supported by commensurate global efforts.

The Mauritius Strategy for Implementation of the Barbados Action Plan to strengthen and advance sustainable development in the SIDS has made limited progress in spite of the best efforts by these countries.

The structural deficiencies in SIDS economy arising out of lack of diversification, excessive dependence on tourism and commodities, higher production and transportation costs, small domestic market and vulnerability to external shocks have placed these countries at a clear disadvantage.

The impact of the global financial, food and energy crises has further exacerbated their vulnerabilities and reversed their socio-economic development.

Building resilience in the SIDS to address their structural vulnerabilities must, therefore, continue to be the central plank of the Mauritius Strategy for Implementation.

Mr. Chairman,

India fully recognizes the significant threats posed by climate change to the SIDS and the urgency to address the need for adaptation, mitigation, financial and technological support to these countries to develop an effective response.

Our consciousness of the situation is particularly deep since we too have large and vulnerable populations living on our island chains and in low lying coastal areas.

India fully supports a firm demonstration of greater sensitivity and a more concrete response to the urgent adaptation needs of the Small Island Developing States as part of any emerging outcome of the ongoing multilateral negotiations.

The financial pledges made at Copenhagen including the Fast Start Funds must be fulfilled at the earliest. We would urge the developed countries to disburse these funds without further delay, under the overall supervision of the UNFCCC, to meet the urgent adaptation needs of the SIDS for whom climate change poses an existential threat.

The strategies adopted by the SIDS to build their renewable energy capabilities in wind and solar power, and waste to energy systems are steps in the right direction to lessen dependence on fossil fuel imports.

Food production is vital to sustainable development and we appreciate and support the steps taken by the SIDS in developing aquaculture systems to enhance food availability. The international community must address the specific concerns of the sea fishing industries in these countries and ensure that food security is given primacy over short-term market needs.

Mr. Chairman,

SIDS urgently need adequate financial resources - access to ODA, FDI and other forms of external capital flows- capacity building, market access, and technology transfer to address their special needs.

I take this opportunity to urge our developed country partners to fulfill their promise made and extend 0.7% of their GNI to global development agenda.

Addressing debt sustainability amongst the SIDS remains a leading challenge. India supports policies that provide safer debt instruments and limit destabilizing capital flows.
The international community needs to pay particular attention to assisting the SIDS through strengthening national disaggregated data and information systems and developing strategies to enhance disaster management capabilities in them.

Mr. Chairman,

We believe that capacity building in the SIDS holds the key to sustainable development. We are willing to help the SIDS in whatever way we can - within our resources and as part of our South-South cooperation, to share our experience and expertise in the fields of climate-friendly technologies and sustainable development to supplement their national programmes.

Our cooperation has been in diverse sectors, and has included climate change adaptation, information and communication technology, waste management systems, remote sensing, hydrographic survey, telemedicine, public transport, education, irrigation systems, fisheries, and agriculture and food security.

Permit me, however, to stress that efforts by fellow developing countries cannot be a substitute for the efforts required from our developed partners.

India remains steadfast in its effort for the holistic and sustainable development of the Small Island Developing States.

Thank You.
Mr. Chairman,

Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Arab Republic of Egypt,

Mr. Secretary General,

Excellencies,

Distinguished delegates,

At the outset, I would like to express my sincere thanks and appreciation to you, Mr. Chairman, for convening this meeting.

Mr. Chairman,

Our Movement has come a long way. As a force representing the newly-independent former colonies emerging from variety of national liberation struggles, the Movement helped close a long and painful chapter of colonialism, imperialism and institutionalized racism- an achievement of which the Movement can be justifiably proud and draw inspiration.

Challenges posed by terrorism, weapons of mass destruction, drug-traffickers and organized crime syndicates, and other challenges to international peace and security are much more pressing than ever before. The developing countries, in particular continue to face the brunt of challenges emanating from continuing uncertainty in global economy and finance, securing stable food and energy supplies, stabilizing prices of essential commodities and coping up with climate change.

The apparent failings of our global political, economic and fiscal institutions constrict our collective ability to respond to these challenges.

Mr. Chairman,

Moving forward, we need to reinvigorate our efforts towards a more democratic, equitable, and legitimised international architecture that reflects the contemporary realities. Genuine reform is essential, in particular of the Security Council and must encompass expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories of membership.

Terrorism is one of the greatest scourges of our times. It is high time that we demonstrate the necessary political will and agree on a Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism.

The Movement needs to play a more active and advocating role in efforts towards achieving universal nuclear disarmament and a world free of all nuclear weapons.

Moreover, there is imperative need for the developing and developed countries to work together to effectively tackle the challenges of food security, energy security, health, education and environment and climate change.

Mr. Chairman,

Today we are at the cusp of an opportunity that would allow us to strengthen multilateralism and a multi-polar world order. Our overall approach while addressing the global challenges must be guided by a new, forward-looking and focused agenda for our Movement, which draws inspirations from our convictions of the past and our aspirations for the future.

This will require consolidation of our Movement especially through strengthening areas of commonality, building on our unity and solidarity and recognizing that amongst 118 members, there will be diversity.

The imperative for a new agenda and discourse in our Movement has never been greater.

Thank you.
674. Statement by S. M. Krishna, Minister of External Affairs, at the Commonwealth Foreign Ministers Meeting.

New York, September 27, 2010.

Excellencies Foreign Ministers of Commonwealth Member States,
Secretary General of the Commonwealth,
Distinguished Delegates,
Ladies and Gentlemen

Let me begin by applauding the manner in which the Government of Trinidad & Tobago has chaired the Commonwealth in the past year, in particular the successful hosting of the CHOGM in Port of Spain in November 2009. I would also like to take this opportunity to convey the support of my government to Australia as the chair of the next Summit to be held in 2011 in Perth.

With its unique membership structure, substantive orientation and style of functioning based on consensus-building, informality and goodwill, the Commonwealth provides its members with a strong sense of purpose and utility. The Commonwealth has also devoted much of its activities to the needs and interests of its larger developing country membership, including 32 Small Island Developing States and the Least Developed Countries. India, on its part, also has a strong and abiding interest in promoting, maintaining and strengthening healthy democratic institutions and the rule of law, which are the primary objectives of the Commonwealth.

At the CHOGM 2009, the Prime Minister of India had announced several new initiatives in support of the Commonwealth. I am happy to share with you that all of these initiatives have already been implemented or are in the final stages of implementation. These pertain to training of diplomats, the Commonwealth Partnership Platform Portal (CP3) portal doubling our contribution to the Commonwealth Media Development Fund, creation of 250 additional slots for training civilians from Commonwealth countries under the Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) Programme, and in addition, providing on a bilateral basis 1,564 training slots to ITEC partner countries in the Commonwealth.

I am happy to learn that 2009 CHOGM mandates are successfully being implemented. During 2009 CHOGM, the need to conclude negotiations on a Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism on a priority basis was emphasised. It is important that this happens early, preferably during the current Session of the UN General Assembly.

Like other Member States of the Commonwealth, India believes that the future successes of the Commonwealth rest with young people. India is, therefore, supportive of developing a new assessed scale of contributions for the Commonwealth Youth Programme (CYP) on a consensus basis as early as possible.

I am convinced that the Commonwealth Secretariat will continue its pro-active role in other areas as mandated by 2009 CHOGM such as education, health, energy security, food security, migration, human rights, combating corruption, human trafficking, reform of international institutions, trade and investment, and assisting the small states to implement crisis-resilient strategies. It is also our hope that the 'Commonwealth Connects' would promote strategic partnerships and help member states build ICT capacity.

This year the Secretary General and our Permanent Representatives have interacted to bring to the UN the unique perspective of the Commonwealth on current issues in the global discourse. This interaction could be facilitated by regular contact of the Commonwealth Office in New York with the UN Missions of Commonwealth countries on matters of interest.

Before I conclude, I would like to mention that India eagerly looks forward to welcoming sportspersons and officials from Commonwealth countries to the Delhi Commonwealth Games, due to begin the coming Sunday.

Thank you.
Mr. Chairman,

Allow me to begin by thanking you for your distinguished leadership of the Group this year.

I would like to take this opportunity to wish Argentina the very best on being elected the Chair of the Group for the year 2011.

India welcomes Tajikistan as the newest member of G-77. India also deeply appreciates the initiative taken by Libya to host the third South Summit.

Mr. Chairman,

The founding principles of G-77 of equity, solidarity and unity have withstand the test of time. In all these years, our larger aspirations and goals, collective identity and purpose, in spite of our myriad and at times differing challenges, have remained resolute.

The global economy, though on track, is still to regain its full strength. The recovery is only partial. We need to impart further dynamism to our respective economies to boost global demand and trade.

Economic growth is the key to achieving development goals. The Indian economy grew 7.4 % in 2009-10 and is slated to grow more than 8.5% in 2010-2011. This robust economic performance has enabled us to pursue our poverty alleviation and sustainable development options including the Millennium Development Goals.

Global trade is an important instrument for promoting economic growth. The Group must act in unison to achieve a fair and equitable multilateral trading system that takes into account the interest of the poor and the marginalized.

Mr. Chairman,

We fully recognize that the global economic and financial architecture, so overwhelmingly loaded against the developing world needs urgent reform.
It has been our endeavour to push for reforms in the Bretton Woods Institutions so as to make them more democratic and equitable.

The global community a few days back renewed its commitment to the Millennium Development Goals at the High level plenary meeting. It is time now for the high words to translate into action.

Global partnership especially addressing financing for development is crucial for the developing countries to meet their MDG targets. Similarly, transfer of technology and an IPR regime which balances reward for innovators with the principle of global public good ought to be pursued to create a global environment conducive to development.

G-77 has been the pillar of the UNFCCC negotiations on Climate Change. We must remain united in our pursuit of an equitable and ambitious outcome from the Cancun meeting.

The special needs of the LDCs, SIDS, LLDCs and African countries must continue to receive priority in the Group. India has taken the lead to support the fourth UN LDC Conference to be held in Istanbul next year. We have also offered to host a Ministerial preparatory meeting in New Delhi in early 2011 for the Conference.

India has been in the forefront of South-South cooperation. We have in spite of our limited resources shared our technical resources and development experience with fellow developing countries. Of late, there have been attempts to equate South-South Cooperation with North-South collaboration. We must reject all such assertions.

Mr. Chairman,

G-77 has brought immense benefits to the people in the developing world. I am confident that its high commitment and sense of purpose would continue with matchless zeal in the years ahead. The Group can continue to count on India's steadfast support in all its endeavours.

Thank you.
676. Statement by S.M. Krishna, External Affairs Minister at the General Debate of the 65th Session of the UNGA.

New York, September 29, 2010

Please see Document No.610.

677. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, on the Situation in Afghanistan at the UN Security Council.

Mr. President,

At the outset, I would like to thank you for scheduling today's debate on the situation in Afghanistan. We are grateful for the latest report of the Secretary-General and are appreciative of the briefing by the SRSG Staffan de Mistura. We also thank Dr. Zalmai Rassoul, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Afghanistan for his statement.

Mr. President,

The Kabul Conference marked a new phase in the partnership of the Afghan Government and international community the Kabul Process and a renewed commitment to a secure, prosperous and democratic Afghanistan. The Conference demonstrated Afghan Government's determination to take full responsibility for Afghanistan's own development, security and governance, and the international community's willingness to realign international assistance in accordance with Afghanistan's priorities and action plans. The success of Kabul Process largely depends on detailing and implementing the commitments flowing from the Kabul Conference.

The holding of national assembly elections on September 18, in which over 2500 candidates contested, is an important step forward in strengthening the democratic framework in Afghanistan. We appreciate UNAMA's lead role in providing overall coordination of international support to the electoral process.
Mr. President,

India and Afghanistan enjoy a relationship based on history, civilization, trade and cultural exchanges and shared values and interests stretching back thousands of years.

India is committed to the unity, integrity and independence of Afghanistan underpinned by democracy and cohesive pluralism and free from external interference. India has contributed to these goals through our Development Partnership which is implemented entirely in accordance with the priorities of the Afghan Government and people. Our Assistance programmes are spread all over Afghanistan and cover all sectors of development: humanitarian, infrastructural, institution and capacity building, small-scale quick gestation projects, and agriculture. The ultimate aim of our assistance, which presently stands at over US$ 1.3 bn, is to strengthen the capacity of the Afghan state and people to stand on their own feet in the areas of governance and services for the Afghan people.

Mr. President,

Afghanistan's stability and economic development depend a lot on its neighbours and the region as a whole. Afghanistan's greatest economic potential perhaps resides in its immense potential as a trade, transport and energy hub, and as a bridge linking Central, West, South Asia and the Gulf. Its prosperity also depends on the consumer market of nearly 1.5 billion people in the South-Asian sub-continent. The recent reports of Afghanistan's great mineral wealth also open up possibilities for mining and investment. But for Afghanistan to realize its full potential in these areas, Afghanistan's neighbours need to come together to forge greater regional cooperation and facilitate trade and transit.

Growing economic inter-dependence will also help in weaning disaffected youth away from insurgency and militancy and in creating a zone of co-prosperity in the region. We support the wishes of the Government of Afghanistan to take the lead in this direction.

Mr. President,

Peace and reintegration efforts in Afghanistan could succeed provided they are fully Afghan-led and Afghan-owned and carry all sections of Afghanistan's population together as well as abide by the redlines agreed to at the London Conference, i.e., giving up violence, cutting off all links with terrorism, and accepting the democratic and pluralistic values of the Afghan Constitution, including women’s rights.

The international community must learn lessons from past experiences at negotiating with fundamentalist and extremist organizations and ensure that any peace process is conducted in an inclusive and transparent manner. Adequate capacity of the Afghan security forces and other Afghan institutions is a sine qua non for protecting Afghanistan’s sovereignty, plurality and democracy. Gains of the last nine years stand to be squandered if this aspect does not receive the attention that it deserves as the international community ponders its next steps regarding Afghanistan.

The international community should also ensure that there is no selectivity in dealing with terrorism. The fight against terrorism cannot be compartmentalized. One cannot distinguish between Al Qaeda and plethora of terrorist organisations which have imbibed the goals and techniques of Al Qaeda. Security and stabilization of Afghanistan will remain a distant goal unless we are able to isolate and root out the syndicate of terrorism, which includes elements of Al Qaeda, Taliban, LeT and other terrorist and extremist groups operating from within and outside Afghanistan’s borders. It is, therefore, essential to ensure that support, sustenance and sanctuaries for terrorist organisations from outside Afghanistan are ended forthwith.

As we discuss today, it is worrisome that there has been a continuing deterioration in the security environment. The UNSG report notes that there has been a 69% increase in security incidents as compared to the same months in 2009.

Mr. President,

In conclusion, the international community as a whole has made a great contribution in assisting Afghanistan to stand on its own feet. The Kabul Conference was a big step in the right direction. It is important that the international community remains steadfast in its commitment in supporting Afghanistan. We welcome these efforts and are fully supportive of them. We support the good work done by UNAMA.

Thank you
Mr. President,

I am exercising the Right of Reply in response to the statement just made by Pakistan.

Regrettably, my distinguished colleague from Pakistan has once again raised the issue of Jammu and Kashmir.

Such unsolicited and untenable remarks will not and indeed, cannot divert attention from the multiple problems Pakistan needs to tackle for the common good of its people, and indeed of the entire region.

Rather than making unsolicited remarks about internal affairs of others, Pakistan should seriously concentrate on addressing the enormous challenges confronting it: terrorism, extremism and sectarianism, to name a few and the dismantling of the terrorist infrastructure that exists on territory under its control.

Violence in Jammu and Kashmir has been fuelled over the past decades by external forces which do not want peace and progress in our region. This is a well known fact. The Indian Constitution guarantees the fundamental rights of all our people, including our brethren in Jammu and Kashmir, which is an integral part of India. Free and fair elections in Jammu and Kashmir have been regularly held and the people of Jammu and Kashmir have exercised their right to franchise to elect their representatives.

Thank you

Statement by Mr. Manish Gupta, First Secretary exercising Right of Reply for the second time, during the General Debate of 65th session of UN General Assembly, September 29, 2010
Mr. President,

I am exercising the Right of Reply in response to comments from the Pakistani delegate.

We reject the untenable and unsolicited remarks from the distinguished delegate of Pakistan.

Thank you

679. Statement by Adi Sankar, Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation to the UN, on Agenda Item 27 - Social Development [a] Implementation of the Outcome of the World Summit for Social Development and of the Twenty-fourth Special Session of the General Assembly [b] Social Development, Including Questions Relating to the World Social Situation and to Youth ageing, disabled persons and the family [c] follow-up to the International Year of Older Persons: Second World Assembly on Ageing [d] United Nations Literacy Decade - Education for all at the Third Committee of UNGA.

New York, October 5, 2010.

Mr. Chairman,

Since I am taking the floor for the first time in this Committee, let be begin by conveying to you and to the members of your Bureau our warmest felicitations on the election and to you for chairing this important Committee. I would like to assure you of my delegation's fullest cooperation in the deliberations and work of this Committee.

Let me take this opportunity to thank the Secretary General for all his reports under this agenda item. I also wish to thank the Under-Secretary General for the Economic and Social Affairs for his statement in this Committee yesterday. My delegation would like to associate itself with the statement made by the Chair of G77.

Mr. Chairman,

Fifteen years have passed since the world leaders adopted the Copenhagen Declaration and Programme of Action at the World Summit for Social Development in 1995. The Declaration placed people at the centre of development. Furthermore, the Declaration identified three pillars for social development, namely poverty eradication; full and productive employment and decent work for all; and fostering just, social and stable societies by social integration.

In fact, these are linked to the achievement of the internationally agreed development goals including the MDGs. Copenhagen Summit was instrumental in the subsequent development of concerted World Programme of Action for various groups, including youth, elderly, indigenous people to name a few. This also led to, in 2006, adoption of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities and its Optional Protocol which entered into force in May 2008.

Mr. Chairman,

In India, we are presently implementing the 11th Five Year Plan covering the period 2007-12. The key focus of the Plan is inclusive growth. Our endeavor is to ensure that the gains of economic growth reach all sections of our population. In this context our special effort has been to ensure that rural India, where the vast majority of our huge population lives, derives direct benefit from the growth dividend. We are also paying special attention on gender equity issues and for the inclusion of vulnerable and marginalised sections of society in our development efforts.

As a result, in addition to setting up of a target for growth, the 11th Plan also identifies 26 measurable indices of performance relating to poverty, education, health, women and children that will reflect social integration achieved through development policies and programmes.

At this juncture, I want to say in my native state of Tamil Nadu, in health sector, the State Government introduced a new health insurance scheme called Karunanidhi Health Insurance Scheme for all the people of Tamil Nadu. The premium amount is paid by the government. This provides the insured people a benefit of Rs 100,000/- for medical treatment.

Mr Chairman,

Government of India also introduced a flagship revolutionary programme for breaking down social inequalities, rejuvenating economic growth and empowering the grassroots in 2005, which is also world’s largest work programme, called the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act.

This scheme ensures 100 days employment to every rural household and improves wage levels. Regarding poverty eradication, the Government of India has taken several steps. I belong to one regional party named DMK party. One of the slogans of this party in Tamil means to eradicate poverty and ensure social harmony.

This scheme provided employment to more than 45 million people last year with programmes covering rural development. Women and other marginalized sections of society have been particular beneficiaries of this programme.

Here I would like to mention, that in my own State of Tamil Nadu, this scheme has been particularly successful. Even the Supreme Court of India appreciated the State Government of Tamil Nadu and also the Deputy Chief Minister of Tamil Nadu, Mr. Stalin, who is implementing the scheme effectively.

Mr Chairman,

Social integration is essential for fostering a stable, safe, harmonious peaceful and just society. Social integration should not be construed as achieving uniformity, but to understand and respect diversity and to promote equal opportunity and participation of all in order to create a “society for all”.

Mr. Chairman,

For persons with disabilities, India had taken a very proactive legislative step in 1995 by promulgating an Act, namely Persons with Disabilities (Equal Opportunities, Protection of Rights and Full Participation) Act. Among other legal provisions, the Act mandates affirmative action through reservation of not less than 3% vacancies for persons with disabilities under the government as well as in education institutions.

We have taken several measures to promote development of persons with disabilities in various ways, including by community based-rehabilitation. Government also funds programmes for community based rehabilitation involving NGOs, persons with disabilities, parents’ organizations and public authorities.

Additionally, following the ratification of the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, the Government has now set up a Committee consisting of various stakeholders to draft a new legislation to harmonize it with the provisions of the Convention.

Mr. Chairman,

The Right to Free and Compulsory Education Act, enacted in 2009, entitles every child from 6-14 years of age to free and compulsory education. In fact, enrolment, attendance and completion of eight years of elementary education schooling for all children have become an inalienable and justiciable right.

In order to improve the attendance and enrolment of students in schools, as part of the mid day meal scheme, the Government of Tamil Nadu, under the leadership of Shri Karunanidhi, has ensured that nutritious food, including one boiled egg every working day, is provided to every student.

While India has made commendable progress in providing access to primary education with the completion of infrastructure for primary schools under the Sarva Siksha Abhiyan, our flagship programme of universal elementary education, the focus is also been extended to secondary and tertiary education.

With nearly 80 million older persons in India, we are strongly commitment to implement the Madrid International Plan of Action of 2002, which provides guidance on capacity-building on ageing at national, regional and international levels.
Mr. Chairman,

The pledge the international community made 15 years ago for an inclusive society is still elusive. The challenge is still formidable, but our resolve is strong. Let us continue our efforts of creating and providing an enabling economic, political, social, cultural and legal environment for all our citizens.

I thank you Mr. Chairman.

680. Statement by Hamdullah Sayeed, Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation, on Agenda Item 140 - Administration of Justice at the United Nations at the Sixth Committee of the UNGA.

Madam Chairperson,

Since I am taking the floor for the first time in this Committee, let me take this opportunity to congratulate you and other members of the Bureau on your election. My delegation assures you of its full cooperation and support. I am sure under your able guidance this Committee will make good progress on this agenda item.

First of all I would like to thank the Secretary General for his Report on the administration of Justice at the United Nations. We would also like to thank the Internal Justice Council for their Report on the Administration of Justice at the United Nations and on the Code of Conduct for the Judges of the United Nations Dispute Tribunal and the United Nations Appeals Tribunal.

Madam Chairperson,

The subject matter of this agenda item is very dear to my heart being a lawyer by profession. I come from a country that is the largest democracy in the world. We follow parliamentary form of government. Judiciary in my country is one of the most important and critical organ of the government.
While reading the report of the Secretary General, issued yesterday, a thought came to my mind about the judicial reforms being undertaken in India by the UPA Government led by the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh, and UPA Chairperson Madam Sonia Gandhi ji, focusing on strengthening a transparent, accountable, responsive, effective and efficient judiciary. I see many of these elements are common in the new system of the administration of justice at the United Nations.

The report of the Secretary General is both interesting and insightful, especially keeping in mind the achievements made by the new system of administration of justice in the first year of its operation since it became operational from 1 July 2009. The creation of a new administration of justice system at the United Nations was a real challenge. Since the United Nations has always laid emphasis on the development of international standards in the field of human rights and the rule of law, it was imperative on the part of the Organization to devise and put in place a system of administration of justice which is independent, transparent, impartial, efficient and effective and which is capable of fulfilling the aspirations of the Organization as well as its staff in the 21st century.

We are happy to note the achievements of the new system of administration of justice. The new system is a welcome and significant improvement over the old system that used to take years for the resolution of a case, while in the new system a case is finalized on an average of six months. This is an important example of the implementation of the principle of justice delayed is justice denied.

We are also happy to note that the number of users of the new system is already greater than the cases in the prior system and that the number is still increasing. This is the result of increasing awareness of the staff about the existence of the new system and their confidence in the new system that their grievances will be addressed professionally, fairly and in a timely manner.

Madam Chairperson,

The Internal Justice Council, pursuant to its mandate has now presented a code of conduct for the judges of the United Nations Dispute Tribunal and the United Nations Appeals Tribunal.
The Code of Conduct relies on the United Nations basic principles on the independence of Judiciary that are designed to secure and promote the independence of judicial bodies as a basis for providing guidance to the internal administration of justice within the United Nations.

The Code of Conduct establishes standards for ethical conduct of judges by providing a framework for regulating judicial conduct. The document identifies various principles and then outlines many rules there under to ensure the proper application of those principles. The seven core principles that have been identified and laid down include independence; impartiality; integrity; propriety; transparency; fairness in the conduct of judicial proceedings; and competence and diligence.

These core principles highlight the rules that should be followed by every judge in the performance of his duties. This reaffirms the faith of stakeholders in the impartiality of judiciary. These rules, apart from trying to secure independence of the Tribunals and maintaining the confidence in the judicial system, are intended to ensure judicial accountability which is seen as a facet of independence of judiciary.

Madam Chairperson,

We thank the Internal Justice Council for their excellent work and welcome the Code of Conduct prepared by them. The values which have been laid down in the Code reflect the universally accepted values for the judiciary. The Code of Conduct would further help bolster the World body's formal system of dealing with internal grievances and disciplinary cases with professionalism and accountability.

We appreciate the efforts of the Internal Justice Council in holding meetings with the judges of the Dispute Tribunal and judges of the Appeals tribunal in New York, Geneva, Nairobi, Addis Ababa; with Ombudsman; head of mediation services; the office of the staff legal assistance; and the staff councils of many international organizations. After these meetings the Council has assessed the needs of these bodies and has identified many challenges that need to be addressed.

The Internal Justice Council has also identified certain issues and made a number of suggestions to ensure that the new system does indeed work to the potential and deliver a system of justice that is independent, professional and accountable. We look forward to engaging ourselves constructively in the work of the working group in the coming days to consider all important issues and Council’s recommendations.

Madam Chairperson,

From the report of the Secretary General we also note that there has been a marked improvement in the dispensation of informal justice. These efforts should be strengthened further. In this connection we would like to see the report of the Ombudsman.

I am confident that with the Disputes and Appeals Tribunals in place from 1 July 2009, and with the Code of Conduct for the Judges in place, the United Nations new two-tier formal administration of justice system would address work related disputes in an independent, transparent, impartial, efficient and effective manner. I am also confident that the new justice system, along with strengthened ombudsman and mediation services, will effectively promote speedy resolution of disputes between the staff and the management, ensuring mutual trust, harmony and understanding.

Madam Chairperson,

While in the last session there is considerable progress in the work of the Committee, still there remain some crucial outstanding issues, including the scope of the new system of the administration of justice; legal assistance to staff and the question whether the staff associations may file applications before the United Nations Dispute Tribunal; complaints against judges; delegation of authority for disciplinary measures; and independence of management evaluation unit etc.

Madam Chairperson,

In paragraphs 8 and 9 of resolution 64/233, the General Assembly requested the Secretary General to provide further information including compiling and comparing the respective advantages and disadvantages for a number of options that were enumerated in those paragraphs. The report of the Secretary General highlights some options but at the same time has raised a number of issues that need to be addressed.

We look forward to constructively contributing on these issues in the meeting of the Working Group.
Madam Chairperson,

In our view all members of the United Nations workforce should have access to justice, irrespective of their designation or nomenclature. We are flexible in this matter and willing to look at various proposals and options that are put forward in the report of the Secretary General and in the report of the Internal Justice Council. We support strengthening of the Office of Staff Legal Assistance as we believe that the continued availability of legal assistance to staff would ensure that no one is left out without recourse. We hope that the new system of administration of justice would remain consistent with the outcome of the overall reform of human resources within the United Nations System.

Thank you, Madam Chairperson.

681. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, on Agenda Item 108 - Report of the Secretary-General of the Work of the Organization at the UNGA.

New York, October 6, 2010.

Mr. President,

I wish to thank the Secretary General for his annual report on the work of the organization (A/65/1).

The commitments we undertook in 2000 enshrined in the Millennium Declaration were renewed by our leaders two weeks ago at the High-level plenary meeting on the Millennium Development Goals. In taking stock of the MDGs, it is evident that the progress reported by the Secretary-General on various fronts such as poverty reduction, primary education enrollment, narrowing the gender gap in education, and access to clean water is tempered by the uneven reach and the significant gaps that persist in all the MDG categories, significantly health-related MDGs.
Never before in the 65 years of the UN’s existence has there been such a groundswell of global support for taking development to the poorest and the most vulnerable amongst us, of which the overwhelming majority are found in developing countries. Never before has it been clearer of what needs to be done to address the many dimensions of poverty and inequality and to build a global partnership for development.

It is, therefore, imperative that we ensure that our collective commitments are achieved in the agreed timeframe. While countries bear the primary responsibility for their own development strategies and goals, there is no denying that resource constraints pose a significant impediment to progress in achieving the MDGs. The global partnership on financing for development is crucial for the developing countries to meet their MDG targets, particularly as they relate to the special needs of Africa and the LDCs, SIDS, and LLDCs. They must continue to receive priority attention.

We could not agree more with the Secretary-General that the achievement of the MDGs requires unswerving commitment, proactive engagement, and collective global political leadership and will. It is time now for the high words to translate into action.

Mr. President,

India shares the priority placed by the Secretary-General on climate change.
We are aware of the consequences it has for vulnerable communities and regions in our countries. We welcome his initiative on a High-Level Advisory Group on Climate Change Financing and a high-level panel on global sustainability. India will participate constructively for an ambitious and equitable outcome in the UNFCCC negotiations.

Mr. President,

While the Secretary-General’s Report captures the priorities that engaged the organization and its membership as well as and the progress achieved on a number of fronts, we are struck by the singular lack of mention of the important progress made in advancing the agenda of Security Council reform. The launch of text-based negotiations and the overwhelming and emphatic support extended by the membership of the UN for expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories of Security Council cannot go unacknowledged and needs to be properly recorded.
Intergovernmental negotiations on UN Security Council reforms witnessed a positive momentum in the 64th session with resolve from the membership to "immediately continue intergovernmental negotiations on Security Council reform" on the basis of the negotiation text.

The organization's success in meeting the diverse and complex challenges it faces is to a great extent based on our willingness to accept and undertake the crying need for reform of the principal organs of the United Nations, in particular the Security Council. It is our firm belief that the effectiveness and relevance of the multilateral endeavor that constitutes the United Nations and its activities diminishes every day that we delay implementing real reforms to its governance architecture.

Mr. President,

I also draw your attention to the progress made in revitalization of the General Assembly to restore its preeminence as the chief deliberative, policy-making and representative organ of the United Nations in letter and in spirit. The Ad Hoc Working Group on GA Revitalization did commendable work in the last session. We welcome the adoption of a consensus resolution contained in paragraph 64 of the report of the Ad Hoc Working Group. A number of forward looking provisions were agreed on, including those relating to enhancing the Assembly's role in the selection and appointment of the Secretary-General, enhancing the role of the Assembly in the maintenance of international peace and security, strengthening the institution of the PGA as well as improving the quality of reporting by the Security Council to the General Assembly.

Mr. President,

Terrorism poses a grave threat to all states and all societies. It is a global threat that requires a coordinated and concerted global response to combat it. In this regard, India believes that the adoption of the Comprehensive Convention against International Terrorism (CCIT), which has been under negotiation for over fifteen years, would provide a solid legal basis for the fight against terrorism. We therefore welcome the Secretary General's assertion in his Report on Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism that the comprehensiveness of implementing the Global Counter Terrorism Strategy will not be complete without the conclusion of the comprehensive convention on international terrorism.
On-going efforts such as the recent second review of the Global Counter Terrorism Strategy, institutionalization of the Task Force, as well as strengthening the sanctions regime created by UNSC Resolution 1267 are steps in the right direction. India will continue its active involvement in all the counter-terrorism efforts of the UN.

Mr. President,

Peacekeeping continues to be the most visible contribution of the United Nations towards maintaining peace and stability in conflict-torn regions around the world. As one of the largest contributors to peacekeeping operations, both in terms of troops and resources, we support efforts by the Secretary General to strengthen the capability of the organization to keep peace in increasingly complex situations. The challenge is to ensure that field missions are equipped with adequate resources and expertise to satisfactorily execute peacekeeping mandates.

My delegation is following with close interest the Secretary General’s efforts to enhance the Secretariat’s ability to support peacekeeping operations. In this regard, we expect the Secretariat to closely consult with us and other Troop Contributing Countries in further taking forward the global field support strategy that was unveiled earlier this year.

Mr. President,

India remains acutely conscious that peacekeeping cannot be a substitute for the task of nation-building and peace building. The Government of India is committed to the principle and practice of peace building. We have been actively involved in the process of the on-going review of the peace building architecture that is centered on the Peace building Commission and its instrumentalities.

There have been a number of innovative mechanisms put in place to bolster the UN’s peace building efforts, including collaboration with the World Bank, expanding the footprint of post-conflict consolidation through enhancing civilian capacities, maximizing the positive role that women can play in peace building and also strengthening the catalytic role of the Peace Building Fund. We support these innovations. We would further like to stress the imperative of national ownership and the anchoring of international peace building efforts at the country level.
Mr. President,

We are encouraged by the positive signs of an invigorated international debate on global disarmament in 2010. India attaches the highest priority to the goal of universal nuclear disarmament and has an impeccable non-proliferation record. Nuclear disarmament and nuclear non-proliferation are mutually reinforcing processes and they require concerted and cooperative international efforts.

We would like to express our appreciation for the Secretary General's initiative to convene a high level meeting on "revitalizing the work of the conference on disarmament and taking forward multilateral disarmament negotiations. We believe that it has rightfully sent a clear message of support for the Conference on Disarmament as the single multilateral disarmament negotiating forum and to provide political impetus to the multilateral disarmament agenda.

Mr. President,

We appreciate the efforts of the Secretary-General in advocating the principles of promotion and protection of human rights, and the rule of law. We also recognize their synergistic link with human welfare and socio-economic development, including the achievement of the Millennium Development Goals.

The review exercise of the Human Rights Council should explore ways that preserve transparency and inclusiveness and ensure that while urgent human rights situations are addressed, duplication and overlap are avoided; streamline the number of resolutions tabled in each session; rationalize the work of the Council and the mandates of Special Procedures without in any way undermining our commitment to human rights; and make the dialogue between the Council and member states genuinely interactive.

Mr. President,

The institutional strengthening of the organization to better enable it to deliver on its vision and mandate received a boost with the adoption of the General Assembly resolution 64/289 on system-wide coherence.
India particularly welcomes the landmark decision to create a unified gender entity—UN WOMEN. We look forward to the early operationalisation of the entity and welcome the appointment of Michelle Bachelet as the first Under Secretary-General of UN WOMEN.

Mr. President,

In closing, I pledge my delegation’s full support in achieving the important goals we have set for ourselves and taking forward the important mandates entrusted to the organization. We look forward to building on the positive momentum from last year on crucial issues and working towards meaningful and result-oriented discussions on the various items on the agenda of the General Assembly.

I thank you.

682. Statement by Vidya Charan Shukla, Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation at the General Debate of the Second Committee of the UNGA.

New York, October 6, 2010.

Madam Chairperson,

Allow me to begin by congratulating you and your bureau on your election to steer the work of this important Committee of the United Nations.

We are confident that under your able leadership and guidance the Second Committee would be able to fulfill its responsibilities to the optimum.

We associate ourselves with the statement delivered by Yemen on behalf of G-77. After the crises and turbulence in the global arena that we witnessed in the last few years, the year 2010 gives us a glimmer of hope for the global development agenda. The high level events on the Millennium Development Goals, Mauritius Strategy of Implementation and Biodiversity held last month made promises for enhanced action to meet the Internationally Agreed Development Goals.
Madam Chairperson,

The global economic situation, though still fragile, is on its path of recovery. It is of the utmost importance that the economic growth is sustained.

However, our collective sense of hope and optimism is marked by caution. There are still large pockets of global economy which are yet to overcome structural difficulties. The developing countries, who have been hit the hardest by the crises, are still struggling to cope up with the aftermath. Their limited policy space has constricted their choice of action.

We must continue to boost global demand to put the economy fully on track. Enhanced economic growth is not an option but a necessity, especially for the developing countries that have huge developmental challenges to meet, first and foremost being poverty eradication.

Global trade is an important instrument for promoting economic growth. We must act in unison to achieve a fair and equitable multilateral trading system that takes into account the interest of the poor and the marginalized.

India fully recognizes that the global economic and financial architecture, so overwhelmingly loaded against the developing world needs urgent reform. It has been our endeavour to push for reforms in the Bretton Woods Institutions so as to make them more democratic and equitable.

Madam Chairperson,

Global leaders had gathered last month at the UN to review the progress made on the MDGs. High commitments were made to take on the challenge to attain the MDGs by 2015. It is now time for those words to translate into action.

The commitment made by the developed countries of meeting the 0.7% of GNI ODA target must be fulfilled at the earliest so that the principal question of lack of resources for development can be overcome. Equally significant is the need for ensuring access to technology in an affordable manner and capacity building.

India, on its part, is committed to sharing its development experience with fellow developing countries. South-South cooperation, however, cannot be a substitute for North-South collaboration.
Madam Chairperson,

There is an all pervading sense of urgency to work for a meaningful outcome from the Climate Change negotiations. But the lack of progress on the promises made at Copenhagen seems to be undermining the level of trust that is required to take the process forward.

India is among the worst affected by Climate Change, and we therefore have a major interest in ensuring that climate change is addressed substantively and constructively. At the meeting in Cancun, India would continue to push for an ambitious and equitable outcome under the UNFCCC and Kyoto Protocol processes; one that is based on the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

India fully recognizes the significant threats posed by Climate Change to the Small Island Developing States and the urgency to address their needs. Our consciousness of the situation is particularly deep since we too have large and vulnerable populations living on our island chains and in low lying coastal areas. India supports a firm demonstration of greater sensitivity and concrete response to the urgent adaptation needs of the small island developing states as part of any emerging outcome of on-going multilateral negotiations. We have set up an India Endowment for Climate Change in South Asia to help SAARC Member States in meeting urgent adaptation and capacity building needs.

Madam Chairperson,

The Convention of Biological Diversity, one of the three RIO Conventions, is an important pillar of the global sustainable development strategy. In the absence of an Access and Benefit Sharing (ABS) protocol, the convention has not been fully equipped to deal with the continued and alarming loss of biodiversity.

I take this opportunity to urge Member States to provide urgent impetus to conclude the ABS protocol at the COP 10 meeting of the Convention on Biological Diversity to be held in Nagoya this month.

India also calls for the early creation of the Inter-Governmental Panel on Biodiversity and Ecosystem services (IPBES).
The RIO+20 Summit to be held in 2012 would be an important milestone in the global sustainable development discourse and action. Our preparations must focus on an ambitious outcome taking the interest of the poor and the marginalized to be the least common denominator.

Madam Chairperson,

The Least Developed countries, Landlocked developing countries, Small Island Developing States and countries in Africa, need enhanced support from the international community.

As we prepare for the IV UNLDC Conference in Istanbul, we must bear in mind to rethink our strategy to address the peculiar vulnerabilities of LDCs. The Brussels Programme of Action needs to be considerably strengthened to address these concerns.

In keeping with our commitment for the LDCs, India would be hosting a Ministerial preparatory event in New Delhi next year for the IV UNLDC Conference. We have also extended financial support worth US$ 250,000 to the UN Trust fund for the travel of LDC delegations to the Conference in Istanbul.

Madam Chairperson,

In conclusion, I would like to emphasise that the task for the Second Committee is clearly defined and its contours are well marked. Let us work to help the Committee make a meaningful contribution to the global development agenda; a contribution that is worthy of this high office and one that moves from mere theoretical resolutions to concrete actions.

I end with India’s greetings to all the attending delegates.

Mr. Chairman,

I want to begin by congratulating you on your election as Chairman of this important Committee and by assuring you of my delegation's full cooperation in the discharge of your duties. This Committee has the vital task of strengthening consensus on the international disarmament agenda and our common resolve to achieve specific steps that enhance international peace and security. India aligns itself with the statement made by Indonesia on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement.

Mr. Chairman,

India attaches the highest priority to global and non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament. The vision for establishing a nuclear weapon free and non-violent world order was most eloquently articulated by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi here in 1988. Twenty two years later, that vision remains as compelling as before but the goal remains a distant reality. In the meantime newer threats have emerged, including the threat of terrorists gaining access to weapons of mass destruction.

In 2006, India tabled a working paper on Nuclear Disarmament containing specific proposals that reflect the spirit and substance of the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan. The Working Paper suggested a number of measures including reaffirmation of the unequivocal commitment by all nuclear weapon states to the goal of complete elimination of nuclear weapons, reduction of the salience of nuclear weapons in security doctrines, measures to reduce nuclear danger, including de-alerting of nuclear-weapons and negotiation of a global agreement among nuclear weapon States on 'no-First-use' of nuclear-weapons, negotiation of a Convention prohibiting the use of nuclear weapons and negotiation of a Nuclear Weapons Convention for the complete elimination of nuclear weapons, within a specified timeframe.
We believe that the progressive de-legitimization of nuclear weapons is essential to achieving the goal of their complete elimination. There is need for a step by step process underwritten by a universal commitment and an agreed multilateral framework for achieving global and non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament. We support an intensification of dialogue to strengthen the international consensus on disarmament and non-proliferation. This dialogue should cover not just member states but the wider spectrum of non-governmental communities as well.

Mr. Chairman,

Without prejudice to the highest priority we attach to the goal of nuclear disarmament, India supports the negotiation in the Conference on Disarmament of a multilateral, non-discriminatory and internationally verifiable FMCT that meets India’s national security interests. India is a nuclear weapon state and a responsible member of the world community, and would approach these negotiations as such.

Addressing the High level meeting called by the UNSG on September 24th 2010, India’s External Affairs Minister expressed disappointment that the CD, the single multilateral disarmament negotiating forum, had been prevented from undertaking its primary task of negotiating multilateral treaties. He expressed India’s support for the immediate commencement of FMCT negotiations in the CD as part of its programme of work in early 2011.

India remains committed to maintaining a unilateral and voluntary moratorium on nuclear explosive testing. India has a policy of a credible minimum nuclear deterrent. We do not subscribe to any arms race, including a nuclear arms race. India has espoused the policy of no first-use and non-use against non-nuclear weapon States and is prepared to convert these undertakings into multilateral legal arrangements. We support negotiations with a view to reaching agreement on effective arrangements to assure non-nuclear weapon States against the use and threat of use of nuclear weapons. We also support a Global No-first Use treaty.

India is a party to the Chemical Weapons Convention and the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention. The CWC remains a unique treaty providing for elimination of an entire category of weapons of mass destruction through a multilaterally negotiated, non-discriminatory and internationally verifiable instrument. It is important that all state parties uphold and fulfil their commitments under the treaty. We look forward to strengthening the implementation of the BWC at the 7th Review Conference to be held in Geneva in 2011.

India continues to support efforts to strengthen the international legal framework on the security of space assets to enhance space security for all space users and specifically to prevent the weaponization of outer space, a common heritage of mankind. While universal and non-discriminatory TCBMS are useful complementary measures, we support the negotiation of legally binding instruments to strengthen space security and to prevent an arms race in Outer Space.

Mr. Chairman,

India is strongly committed to the CCW process as a keystone in the edifice of the law of armed conflict and international humanitarian law. We have ratified all the five CCW protocols. India has actively engaged in the negotiations on a draft Protocol on Cluster Munitions that strikes a balance between humanitarian and security considerations. We welcome the successful outcome of the Fourth Biennial Meeting of States on the implementation of the UN Programme of Action on illicit trade in small arms and light weapons held here in New York in June 2010. While we have participated actively in the preparatory meetings with regard to the ATT, we believe that the prospects for a viable and effective outcome would be enhanced only if the interests of all the stakeholders are addressed in a transparent and consensus based process.

Mr. Chairman,

As in the previous years, India would be tabling three resolutions in the First Committee on:
— Measures to prevent terrorists from acquiring Weapons of Mass Destruction
— Reducing Nuclear Danger
— Convention on the Prohibition of the Use of Nuclear Weapons

We will be making more detailed presentations on these resolutions during the time allocated for that purpose.

Thank you
2246 INDIA’S FOREIGN RELATIONS - 2010

684. Statement by Rajnath Singh, Member of Parliament and Member of the Indian Delegation, on Agenda Item 107 - Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism at the Sixth Committee of the UNGA.

New York, October 6, 2010.

Madam Chairperson,

I would like to deliver my statement in Hindi as Hindi is our national language.

Let me take this opportunity to congratulate you on your election as Chairperson of this Committee and also congratulate the members of the Bureau on their election. I assure you of my delegation’s full cooperation and support in all your efforts.

I thank the Secretary General for his annual report on Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism which contains important and valuable information about the measures taken by States at the national level as well as by the UN system and other international organizations for the prevention and suppression of international terrorism.

We also would like to thank Ambassador Rohan Perera and the Facilitator of the Working Group, Ms. Maria Telalian, for their untiring efforts in resolving the outstanding issues.

Madam Chairperson,

India attaches highest importance to the agenda item relating to "Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism" presently under consideration before this Committee. Terrorism is a crime against humanity. It is the most vicious amongst international crimes. It affects us all equally. It is a scourge that open democratic societies have to contend with and the challenge is to maintain our openness, safeguard individual rights, and at the same time, give no quarter to terrorists. The international community therefore needs to marshal all its efforts and resources to combat this scourge.

As you are aware, India has been a victim of terrorism for decades. The people of India continue to pay a heavy price in our fight against terrorism. The haunting memories of horrific terrorist attacks in Mumbai in the year 2008, which was planned and executed from across the border, and witnessed by the whole world on television, are still alive. We are determined to confront these challenges unshakably and decisively.

Madam Chairperson,

We align with the statement made by Iran on behalf of NAM. No cause could ever justify the indiscriminate killing of innocent peoples. Criminal acts intended or calculated to provoke a state of terror in the general public, a group of persons or particular persons for whatever purposes, wherever, by whomever, against whomever committed, are in any circumstances unjustifiable, whatever the considerations or factors that may be invoked to justify them.

The Declaration on Measures to Eliminate International Terrorism adopted by UNGA Resolution 49/60 condemns international terrorism in all its forms and manifestations. The Declaration also unequivocally condemns all acts, methods and practices of terrorism as criminal and unjustifiable, whenever and by whoever committed. States are also obliged to refrain from organizing, acquiescing in or encouraging activities within their territories directed towards the commission of such acts. States are also obliged to ensure that their territories are not used for terrorist installations or training camps or for the preparation or organization of terrorist acts intended to be committed against other States or their citizens. If this happens, then the UNGA or the Security Council must take strong action.

Madam Chairperson,

Terrorism poses a grave threat to all States and all societies. It undermines peace, democracy and freedom thus endangering the very foundations of the continued existence of democratic societies. Terrorism is a global threat and requires a coordinated and concerted global response to combat it. In this context in addition to the urgent need to conclude and adopt the draft Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism, we support the recent second review of the Global Counter Terrorism Strategy and the institutionalization of the CTITF.
Madam Chairperson,

At the National level we have taken many steps to strengthen international cooperation in combating terrorism. Apart from strengthening our strategic and operational framework to combat terrorism effectively, we have also amended and strengthened our national legislation entitled Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act, 1967 by integrating in it a mechanism for the effective enforcement of the measures adopted by the 1267 Committee against designated individuals and entities. The Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act incorporates provisions that deal with all aspects of terrorism including incitement. The Act also criminalizes raising of funds for terrorist activities, holding of proceeds of terrorism, harbouring of terrorists, unauthorized possession of any bomb, dynamite or hazardous explosive substance or other lethal weapon or substance capable of mass destruction or biological or chemical substance of warfare.

We have concluded bilateral treaties with many countries in the areas of combating terrorism, organized crime, money laundering, terrorist financing and illicit drug trafficking. We also have in place treaties on extradition and mutual legal assistance in criminal matters to further strengthen and enhance international cooperation efforts in this regard. These treaties facilitate transfer of fugitive offenders and suspected terrorists to stand trial in the State in which the offence is committed and in their effective prosecution. These treaties also facilitate exchange of operational information and development of joint programs among concerned States.

At the international level, India has become party to 13 sectoral conventions on terrorism that have been adopted under the auspices of the United Nations. In relation to a specific activity, these conventions remain fundamental tools in the fight against terrorism. India has also become an active member of the Financial Action Task Force (FATF). We have always fulfilled our obligations under international and regional conventions and relevant Security Council resolutions on international terrorism.
Madam Chairperson,

Now coming to the draft Comprehensive Convention against International Terrorism, I am happy to note that the Ad-Hoc Committee that met in April this year witnessed some forward momentum as some delegations have shown better understanding and flexibility.

Reflecting on the general sense of the debate that time, the Chairman of the Ad-Hoc Committee also advised delegations, and subsequently made a personal appeal to the Legal Advisers of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to come prepared to take necessary decisions and move forward.

During the General Debate in the 65th Session of the General Assembly last month, many States have reiterated their support for the successful and early adoption of the draft CCIT. The Secretary General’s report on the review of the Global Counter Terrorism Strategy is very important. The Secretary General very aptly pointed out in paragraph 139 of his report that “the comprehensiveness of implementing the Strategy will not be complete without the conclusion of the comprehensive convention on international terrorism. As committed in the Strategy, Member States should make every effort to reach an agreement on the text and conclude the convention in order to unite behind the global counter-terrorism efforts. The recent Security Council Presidential statement also encourages Member States to make every effort to conclude the negotiations of the draft Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism.

Madam Chairperson,

All these appeals and expectations expressed at various levels only remind us that we have already lost invaluable time in taking a concrete decision on this important issue and that the international community cannot afford to wait any longer at a time when there is the most urgent need to show solidarity and collective global action against international terrorism and to send a clear message that terrorism cannot be tolerated in any form or manifestation for whatever cause.

Madam Chairperson,
The negotiations over the years have by and large got a near full text of the proposed Convention with general agreement. There remain just a few outstanding issues in Article 18. We look forward to the Chair of the Ad Hoc Committee to guide us in agreeing to a full text that can be recommended by us for adoption in this Session itself. We would also strongly urge delegations to show flexibility and reach a common understanding on the text so that we can move forward and fulfill the expectations of the Secretary General, the Security Council, and of the international community as a whole.

I have full confidence that we will eventually succeed in our struggle against terrorism. There is a need to address terrorism not only at the governmental or political levels but also at the intellectual level. The mindset of attaining goals through violent means will have to be changed. Towards this end, there is a need to raise awareness about the thoughts of eminent personalities like Martin Luther King and Mahatma Gandhi in the society. With our thousands of years old tradition of harmonizing divergent streams of thoughts, culture of non-violence and non-aggression, India could make significant contribution in the fight against terrorism not only at the political level but also at the intellectual level.

Thank you, Madam Chairperson.
685. Statement by K.C. Venugopal, Member of Parliament, on Agenda item 105 - Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice & Agenda Item 106 - International Drug Control at the Third Committee of the UNGA.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me thank the Executive Director of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) for his statement in this Committee and also the Secretary General for all his reports under this agenda items.

One of the significant finding of this year's World Drug Report has been the steady global reduction in the cultivation of crops for illicit drugs since 2007. We must build on these successes by redoubling our efforts, nationally, regionally and internationally to tackle this menace. India's resolve to fight the menace of illicit drugs remains steadfast. We will continue to adhere to the commitments made in the three UN Conventions as well as in the Political Declaration and Plan of Action to overcome the world drug problem, adopted at the 1998 Special Session of the UN General Assembly.

While a holistic and balanced approach towards drug control measures is essential, however, the keystone in this fight still is the supply reduction strategies by sustained alternative development programmes for the cultivators of these crops as well as overall economic development of such regions. In this regard, we would like to voice our support for such initiatives and strategies by strengthening North-South as well as South-South cooperation by sharing of best practices, lessons learnt and provision of technical assistance. On the demand side, we must raise social awareness about the adverse consequences of drug addiction, particularly amongst the younger generation, which is one of the most vulnerable groups, especially in the schools and colleges. Apart from stringent legal measures, societies should strive to inculcate the highest moral values in our youth.
Under the able leadership of Dr Manmohan Singh, Prime Minister of India and Mrs Sonia Gandhi, Chairperson of the United Progressive Alliance, a revised Scheme for Prevention of Alcoholism and Substance (Drugs) Abuse (2008) was launched in India. The approach of this Scheme was to provide the whole range of services including awareness generation, identification, counseling, treatment and rehabilitation of addicts through voluntary and other organizations with a thrust on preventive education programmes and Whole Person Recovery of the addicts. Presently about 41 Drug Awareness and Counseling Centres and 401 Treatment- Cum- Rehabilitation Centres are functioning with the support of the ministry in the country. De-addiction camps are organized regularly to reach out to uncovered areas. In addition, The National Consultative Committee on De-addiction and Rehabilitation (NCCDR) has been set up at national level, headed by Minister of Social Justice and Empowerment, to advise Central and State Governments on issues connected with drug demand reduction, especially education/ awareness building, de-addiction and rehabilitation.

However, we are conscious that national efforts alone cannot effectively address this problem. Combating the menace of illicit drugs requires member states to develop a cohesive, balanced and integrated approach to the issue. In this context, India reaffirms its commitment to working closely with other countries, both bilaterally and through regional and international collaboration, to achieving our common goal of a world free of illicit drugs. India is the world's largest producers of licit opium. We pursue a balanced drug control approach. We ensure that the demand and supply of licit opiates required for genuine medicinal and scientific purposes is maintained and there is no proliferation of manufacture beyond the traditional and established manufacturers of licit opiate. We also welcome INCB's contribution in monitoring the balance between demand and supply for opiate for legitimate purposes.

Terrorism continues to pose grave threat to all States and all societies. It undermines peace, democracy and freedom thus endangering the international community and the humankind as a whole. India has been a victim of terrorism for decades. Innocent lives are been lost to heinous terrorist attacks and our resolve against perpetrators of such attacks should be strong and resolute. India has taken several steps to strengthen international cooperation to combat terrorism. We are party to all the 13 sectoral conventions on terrorism that have been adopted under the auspices of the UN. Terrorism is a global threat and requires a coordinated and concerted global response to combat it. This year’s Secretary General’s report on review of the Global Counter Terrorism Strategy very aptly pointed out that the comprehensiveness of implementing the Strategy will not be complete without the conclusion of the Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT). It is upon us, Member States, to give the necessary political push and adopt the CCIT. Let us not lose further invaluable time in taking a concrete decision on this important issue. It is time that the international community shows its resolve and solidarity for a collective global action against international terrorism and to send a clear message that terrorism in any forms or manifestations for whatever cause, will not be tolerated.

The UN made significant progress in the fight against trafficking of persons this year by launching the Global Plan of Action against Trafficking in Persons in August this year. We are pleased that for the first time an agreement of the international community has been reached to address the scourge of trafficking in persons in holistic manner. This comprehensive Plan will ensure that trafficking in persons policies are integrated, balanced, coherent, result-oriented and people centric.

There is a need to create as well as reinforce bilateral, regional and international cooperation to develop strategies to combat the menace of the deep-rooted nexus between drug mafias, arms dealers, and money launderers for financing terrorism. This is a grave, dangerous and destructive nexus. We support the efforts of the UNODC in providing necessary assistance to countries that seek financial and technical assistance in their efforts at capacity-building and training and in putting in place the administrative and legal framework, institutional reforms that are required for fighting transnational organized crime. In this context, we would also like to voice our support for the call made by Jamaica, on behalf of the CARICOM countries, yesterday, to seriously reconsider UNODC’s decision to close its regional office in Barbados, which served 29 countries. A UNODC office in the CARICOM region would be able to lead valuable institutional and financial capacity building support in the CARICOM countries' fight against transnational organised crime, in a concerted manner.

India has enacted strong anti-money laundering domestic legislation and bilateral agreements have been entered into to develop joint programs to prevent money laundering, counter terrorism and organized crime. I would like to inform that the Government of India have also decided to ratify the Convention and its three Protocols. At this 10th anniversary of the Convention, it is critical that we commit ourselves to translate our obligations into actions with an even greater degree of cooperation.

We are deeply concerned about new areas of transnational crimes like cyber-crime, economic fraud, education related fraud and identity-related crimes and their links with other criminal and terrorist activities. In our view, these developments demand that we agree to take a wider look at transnational organized crime encompassing these new and emerging threats while also dealing with crime prevention, criminal justice and treatment of offenders.

India remains committed to working bilaterally and through regional and international cooperation towards a world free of transnational organized crime, illicit drugs, money laundering, trafficking in persons, illegal arms transactions and above all, terrorism.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.
686. Statement by Dr. Pradip Choudhary, Counsellor, at the Permanent Mission at the UN on Agenda Item 76-Criminal Accountability of the United Nations Officials and Experts on Mission at Sixth Committee of the UNGA.

New York, October 8, 2010.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me first congratulate you and other members of the bureau on your election and assure you of full cooperation of my delegation.

We thank the Secretary General for his Report outlining the information received from Member States regarding the extent their national laws establish Jurisdiction, particularly over crimes of a serious nature committed by their nationals while serving as United Nations officials or experts on mission, as well as information on cooperation among States and with the United Nations in the exchange of information and the facilitation of investigations and prosecution of such individuals.

Mr. Chairman,

We align with the statement made by Iran on behalf of NAM. We note with great concern the instances of serious crimes committed by United Nations officials and Experts on Mission in spite of clear codes of conduct and a policy of zero tolerance by the United Nations. It is important that all UN Officials and Experts on Mission perform their duties in a manner consistent with the Charter of the United Nations and in a manner that promotes the image, credibility, impartiality and integrity of the United Nations. My Government is totally committed to punishment of those found guilty of any misconduct and concurs with the view that officials and experts on mission should be held accountable whenever they commit criminal acts not only because of the prejudice or harm caused to the victims but also because they undermine the work and image of the United Nations.

It is essential to ensure that in no circumstance are any United Nations personnel exempt from the consequences of criminal acts committed by them at their duty station.
The latest GA Resolution on this agenda item strongly urges all States to consider establishing jurisdiction over crimes of a serious nature committed by their nationals while serving as United Nations officials or experts on mission, at least where the conduct as defined in the law of the State establishing jurisdiction also constitutes a crime under the laws of the host State.

We sincerely hope that the implementation of this Resolution would help fill the jurisdiction gap in respect of Member States that do not assert extraterritorial jurisdiction over crimes committed by their nationals abroad.

Mr. Chairman,

As regards India, the Indian Penal Code extends to extra-territorial offences committed by Indian nationals, therefore offences committed by Indian officials or experts on missions while serving abroad are punishable under Indian law.

The Resolution also encourages all States to cooperate with each other in the conduct of investigations and prosecution of those who are charged.

In this aspect, India has a well developed law on mutual assistance in criminal matters which enables it to seek from and extend cooperation to foreign States in respect of mutual legal assistance in criminal matters. This law is contained in the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973. It includes provisions on execution of judicial processes; assistance in relation to orders of attachment or forfeiture of property identified as unlawfully acquired; management of property so seized or forfeited; procedure to be followed in case of letter of request; letter of request to competent authority for investigation in a country or place outside India; and the execution of a letter of request from a country or place outside India to a Court or authority for investigation in India.

India has also concluded several bilateral agreements on mutual assistance in criminal matters. These agreements are designed to provide mutual legal assistance in criminal matters that are necessary for the prosecution of offences, searching persons and property in question, location of fugitives and property involved, transfer of witnesses and exhibits and freezing and confiscation of proceeds of crime.
The Indian Extradition Act, 1962 deals with extradition of fugitive criminals. It allows for extradition for extraditable offences i.e. an offence provided for in the extradition treaty with another State. This Act also allows consideration of an international Convention as the legal basis for considering extradition in the absence of a bilateral agreement.

In cases where there is no bilateral treaty on extradition or mutual legal assistance in criminal matters with a State, the Government of India can offer assistance on a reciprocal and case by case basis in accordance with the provisions of the Indian Criminal Procedure Code and the Extradition Act.

Mr. Chairman,

The issues of pre deployment and in mission training are crucial. Careful preparatory training in terms of a multi-cultural, pluralistic and tolerant outlook is as important as subsequent swift punitive action, once culpability is established. We thank the Secretariat for providing the details of measures taken to strengthen existing training on United Nations Standards of Conduct, which include not only pre deployment and in-mission training but also mission specific training that takes into account cultural aspects of the host population.

We appreciate the offer of the United Nations to support Member States, at their request, in the development of domestic criminal law relevant to the crimes of a serious nature committed by their nationals while serving as United Nations officials or experts on mission. We, in particular appreciate the expertise of the UNODC in this regard. We hope that Member States, who perceive a gap in their national system will rely on the expertise of UNODC to help them close the gaps so as to enable them to criminalize the conduct of a serious nature, establish jurisdiction, conduct investigation and provide international cooperation as they relate to UN officials and experts on mission committing serious crimes.

Mr. Chairman,

In conclusion, we once again reiterate and support the policy of zero tolerance and view with serious concern the instances of sexual abuse and exploitation and other criminal acts committed by United Nations officials and experts on mission in spite of clear codes of conduct. On the issue of elaboration of a convention we are of the view that there seems to be no need to elaborate specific convention as the existing provisions in domestic laws are adequate to address this issue and wherever jurisdictional or other gaps persist, attention should be focused on those issues and specific countries to enable them to bridge the gaps.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

687. Statement by Dr. Charan Das Mahant, Member of Parliament, on General Debate of the Special Political and Decolonization Committee of UNGA [fourth committee].

New York, October 11, 2010.

Thank you Mr. Chairman,

I take this opportunity to congratulate you on your election as Chairman of the Special Political and Decolonization Committee to the Sixty Fifth Session of the General Assembly and also the members of the Bureau on their election. I would also like to congratulate former Chairman, the Permanent Representative of Qatar, Ambassador Nassir Abdulaziz Al-Nasser for the way he conducted the work of this Committee during the 64th session.

As a founding member of the UN and the Special Committee of 24 on Decolonization, the deliberations on decolonization are of special significance for India. I assure you of my delegation's full cooperation and support during this 65th session of the UN General Assembly.

My delegation broadly aligns itself with the statement of the Chair of the NAM delivered on October 4, 2010.

Mr. Chairman,
That we continue to grapple with the vestiges of colonialism, a bygone system that runs contrary to the fundamental principles of this Organization—even after 65 years reflects poorly on all of us. Colonialism is not only anachronistic, archaic and outmoded but also contravenes the fundamental tenets of democracy, freedom, human dignity and rights.

On 14 December 1960, the General Assembly adopted the resolution 1514 on "Declaration on the Granting of Independence to the Colonial Countries and its Peoples" thereby formulating an institutional framework aiming to "end colonialism in all its manifestations". This year we would be celebrating the 50th anniversary of the resolution. Again in December this year, second international Decade for the Eradication of Colonialism (2000-2010) is coming to an end. While noting these landmark events, there is a need to assess the progress achieved and review the existing work methods to attain the remaining goals.

Mr. Chairman,

Decolonization is in fact one among more visible achievements of the United Nations since its formation in 1945. The fact that today, fewer than 2 Million people live under colonial rule in remaining 16 Non-Self-Governing Territories when compared to 750 Million in 1945 is a testimony to the efforts to this august body. However, there is still a long way to go. The journey is not complete until the last milestone is crossed.

Mr. Chairman,

As we commemorate 50th year of the resolution, we have to maximize our efforts and reaffirm commitment to advance the process of decolonization. We need to approach the task with sense of urgency and activism on the one hand, and sensitivity and circumspection on the other. Ascertaining the political aspirations of the people in each of these remaining 16 Territories and taking into account the stages of development of each Territory are critical inputs for making decisions towards decolonization. It is indeed happy to note that many of them already have threshold to form functional institutions that can thrive on their own. We welcome efforts of Special Committee on Decolonization (Committee of 24) to engage the administering Powers in a positive and constructive manner to end colonialism. The administering Powers are required to work with the Committee in a spirit of cooperation and flexibility.

Mr. Chairman,

My delegation is happy to note efforts made by Special Committee on Decolonization to disseminate information on legitimate political options available to the people in the Territories. The Pacific Regional Seminar conducted by the Special Committee of 24 on Decolonization at Noumea, New Caledonia in May this year is an attempt in the right direction. Such seminars help to mobilize world opinion to support and assist the peoples of the Territories in speedily ending colonialism.

Mr. Chairman,

India appreciates the efforts taken by the Special Committee on Decolonization in formulating the report (A/65/23) and its recommendations. India also welcomes the recommendation of launching of Third International Decade for the Eradication of Colonialism in view of outstanding decolonization issues.

In India our milestone poverty eradication programmes like the Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme devised by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singhji and UPA Chairperson Mrs. Sonia Gandhiji, aim at ensuring inclusive growth so that the benefits of development reach every section of our society and thus we are able to do away with even the residual vestiges of colonialism exacerbated societal divisions and disadvantage.

Mr. Chairman,

The State of Jammu and Kashmir is an integral part of India and people of Jammu and Kashmir have regularly exercised their franchise in elections conducted in a free and fair manner.

Mr. Chairman,

Allow me to conclude with a quote of Father of our Nation, Mahatma Gandhiji which is more appropriate in the current context. He said:
“Just as a man would not cherish living in a body other than his own, so do nations not like to live under other nations, however noble and great the latter may be”

Mr. Chairman,

India-as always, is a strong believer in ideals of democracy, human rights, dignity and peaceful co-existence which are the corner stones of a civilized society. We commit ourselves to decolonization efforts to ensure that the remaining 16 Non-Self-Governing Territories attains them sooner than the later.

Thank you.

Madam Chairperson,

Since I am taking the floor for the first time in this session, let me congratulate you and other members of the bureau on your election. I assure you full cooperation and support of my delegation.

India values the work of the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL) and its efforts to establish and promote modern private law standards on international trade. We thank the Commission for its report on the work done during 43rd session. We are pleased to note that that this session of the UNCITRAL has been a very productive one.

Madam Chairperson,
During its 43rd session, the UNCITRAL has approved a number of important texts. On 25th June 2010, it has adopted the text of the revised UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules, which were originally adopted in 1976. These rules have been used in all parts of the world in a wide variety of circumstances covering a broad range of disputes, including disputes between private commercial parties, investor-State disputes, State-to-State disputes and commercial disputes administered by arbitral institutions.

The revision was necessitated in order to conform to the current needs and practices in international trade and to meet changes that have taken place over the last thirty four years in arbitral practice. We hope that the UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules, as revised in 2010, will significantly enhance the efficiency of arbitration under the Rules as the revised rules reflect current commercial practices.

Madam Chairperson,

Since the rules have been adopted by consensus, they reflect the will of all countries representing different legal, social and economic systems. We are confident that the revised rules will significantly contribute to the development of harmonious international economic relations, by significantly contributing to the establishment of a harmonized legal framework for the fair and efficient settlement of international commercial disputes. For us, the adoption of the revised arbitration rules is timely as my country is in the process of amending the arbitration legislation in order to meet the changing requirements.

Another important contribution of the Commission during 43rd session is the adoption of ‘the UNCITRAL Legislative Guide on Secured Transactions. Supplement on Security Rights in Intellectual Property’. We hope that while dealing with security rights in intellectual property, the Supplement would help States in assessing the economic efficiency of their secured transaction regimes as well as their intellectual property regimes and in revising or adapting legislation relevant to secured transactions and intellectual property.

Madam Chairperson,

Working Group V (Insolvency Law) has also done a commendable job during 43rd session as it was mandated to complement the UNCITRAL
Legislative Guide on Insolvency Law which did not contain provisions concerning the treatment of enterprise groups in insolvency, we support the adoption by the Commission of part three of the UNCITRAL Legislative Guide on Insolvency Law which now contains provisions concerning the treatment of enterprise groups in insolvency.

We are happy to note the progress made by Working Group I which is engaged with the work of updating UNCITRAL Model Law on Procurement of Goods, Construction and Services, adopted in 1994, with a view to reflect in it new practices, in particular those resulting from the use of electronic communications in public procurement, and to incorporate the experience gained in the use of the 1994 Model Law. We are confident that the Working Group would be able to complete its work during its next two sessions so that the draft revised model law may be adopted by the Commission at its forty-fourth session in 2011.

Madam Chairperson,

With respect to the future work in the field of settlement of commercial disputes, we support the decision taken by the Commission that the topic of transparency in treaty-based investor-State arbitration should be dealt with as a matter of priority by the Working Group II (Arbitration and Conciliation) with the task of preparing a legal standard on that topic. Efforts should be limited to the preparation of rules of uniform law on transparency in treaty-based investor-State arbitration and any other aspect related to this topic maybe brought to the attention of the Commission at its next session, in 2011.

Regarding the possible future work in the area of electronic commerce, we hope that the proposal of the Secretariat to convene a colloquium and possibly other informal meetings to discuss topics such as electronic single window facilities, electronic transferable records, identity management, and the use of mobile devices in electronic commerce, which were submitted by delegations during 43rd session, would provide sufficient information for the Commission to make an informed decision and to give a clearly defined mandate to a working group, if deemed appropriate.
We also support the proposal of the Secretariat to hold another colloquium on microfinance, with the possible participation of experts from other organizations working actively in this field. The report of the colloquium could be usefully considered by the Commission at its next session in 2011.

Madam Chairperson,

We emphasize the importance of technical cooperation and assistance to the developing countries, in particular on the adoption and use of UNCITRAL texts at the national level. The legislative technical assistance, in particular to developing countries, was an activity that was not less important than the formulation of uniform rules itself. We encourage Secretariat to continue to provide such assistance to the broadest extent possible and to improve its outreach to developing countries, in particular.

Madam Chairperson,

As regards the working methods of the Commission, we welcome the comprehensive review being done in this regard. Given the highly technical nature of the work, we would support inclusiveness and transparency.

Finally, we appreciate the continuing work under the system of collecting case law on the UNCITRAL texts. We commend the Secretariat for its wide range of technical assistance activities.

Thank you, Madam Chairperson.
Mr. Chairperson,

Before I begin, let me express my appreciation for the detailed reports brought out by the Secretary General on important macroeconomic policy questions, some of which are being considered on the agenda today. We associate ourselves with the statement delivered by Yemen on behalf of G-77.

The global economic situation, though still fragile, is on its path of recovery. It is of the utmost importance that the economic growth is sustained.

However, our collective sense of hope and optimism is marked by caution. There are still large pockets of global economy which are yet to overcome structural difficulties.

The developing countries, who have been hit the hardest by the crisis, are still struggling to cope up with the aftermath. More than 60 million people have slipped back into poverty in 2009. The figure for 2010 is likely to be equally discouraging.

I would like to make a special mention that the policies of the Government of India led by Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh and Mrs. Sonia Gandhi, UPA Chairperson have been instrumental in withstanding the global economic recession in our country. Through their vision and forward looking leadership, India, in spite of the odds was able to grow 7.4% during 2009-10 and is expected to grow by 8.5% in 2010-11.

Mr. Chairperson,

A critical lesson from this crisis is that the unregulated capital flows are highly destabilizing in nature. The withdrawal of huge amounts of money has left developing countries without adequate coping mechanisms and in fact even more financially unstable than before.

While we are seeing signs of global economic recovery, we must not lose sight of the fact that many developing countries are not in a position to implement counter-cyclical measures. There is an urgent need for international assistance - be it ODA, concessional finance, debt relief and moratorium or FDI- to help such economies gather momentum.

The loss in demand in developed countries has directly translated into fall in exports of developing countries and a consequent adverse impact on employment and growth. This loss in export demand needs to be made up through expansion in other components in domestic demand such as investment.

In this context, India has been advocating increased infrastructure investment in developing countries.

Our Prime Minister Shri Manmohan Singh speaking on 27 June 2010 in Toronto said - "Developing countries need to rebalance their strategies to rely less upon exports and more on domestic demand. In many developing countries, this is best done through increased investment directed to infrastructure. This will sustain growth in the short run by offsetting the contractionary effect of lower exports."

Our companies have led the way and made substantial investments in the service and infrastructure sectors in Africa, Asia and Latin America especially in the LDCs, LLDCs and SIDS.

Mr. Chairperson,

India fully recognizes that the global economic and financial architecture, so overwhelmingly loaded against the developing world needs urgent reform. It has been our endeavour to push for reforms in the Bretton Woods Institutions so as to make them more democratic and equitable.

We call for early implementation of the two phase package of reforms announced by the World Bank in 2008 to enhance voice and participation of developing countries. We also support tightening of capital and liquidity rules by global banking regulators to allow the financial system withstand future downturns.

Mr. Chairperson,

The financial crisis has led to acute debt problems in the developing world. The total external debt of these countries increased by 8% during 2007-08 and the debt servicing burden rose by more than 11% during the same period.

The LDCs are the worst affected. Despite significant debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries programme and the Multilateral Debt Relief Initiative, the total debt service burden of LDCs in the year 2008 reached US$6.03 billion.

In 2009, debt service in relation to government revenue increased by more than 17% in heavily indebted poor countries.

The external debt burden constrains the national policy space and policy independence in many developing countries and their ability to play the role of a developmental State.

Debt sustainability analysis frameworks remain limited and subjective. We agree with the report of the Secretary General that further consideration must be given to move towards a debt structure which is linked to a country's ability to pay, instead of an understanding of unacceptable level of debt accumulation.

Mr. Chairperson,

The international community must remain vigilant in monitoring the debt situation of the affected countries. We should work to design policies that promote safer debt instruments, reduce destabilizing capital flows and limit solvency crisis by promoting responsible sovereign borrowing.

The roadmap of our global economic and financial reform agenda is clear and unambiguous. Let us make it happen.

Thank you.
Madam Chairperson,

Let me first thank the Secretary-General for his excellent annual report on “strengthening and coordinating United Nations rule of law activities”. The Report very eloquently highlights the United Nations approach to the rule of law at the national and international levels.

The Report illustrates key achievements of the United Nations support to States at the national level over the past one year as well as identifies critical gaps and challenges. We are happy to note that there continues to be progress towards a more comprehensive and joint approach among United Nations entities to support the rule of law in line with national priorities and plans. With regard to the rule of law at the international level, the Report provides insights into emerging mechanisms and practices that promote the effective implementation of international law by Member States.

Madam Chairperson,

The item "Rule of Law at the International and National Levels" has been on the agenda of the United Nations General Assembly since its Sixty-Second Session. The main objective for inclusion of this agenda item was to strengthen the United Nations attention to the Rule of Law at all levels.

We align ourselves with the statement made by Iran on behalf of NAM. India strongly adheres to the rule of law both at the international and national levels. At the national level India considers the advancement of the rule of law as an essential tool for the protection of democracy, promotion of sustainable economic growth, sustainable development, poverty and hunger eradication and protection of all human rights and fundamental freedoms. At the international level we see the promotion of the rule of law as an essential tool for promoting harmony, and ensuring development, peaceful co-existence and cooperation among States and strengthening international peace and security.
Madam Chairperson,

Pursuant to GA Resolution 64/116, the focus of our debate in this session is on the sub-topic "Laws and practices of Member States in implementing international law".

In this context I would like to mention that the Indian Constitution is firmly rooted in rule of law principles, ensuring separation of powers between the executive, legislative and judicial branch of the Government and making each one accountable for their actions; ensuring adherence to the provisions of the Constitution by the authorities; making Central Government responsible for the implementation of the international treaties and agreements to which India is a party; guaranteeing to the people equality before law without any discrimination whatsoever; and ensuring the promotion and protection of individual rights and fundamental freedoms, etc.

Another important aspect of the promotion of the rule of law at the national level is the implementation by States of their obligations undertaken pursuant to international treaties and agreements. India fulfills this obligation very rigorously in respect of the agreements or treaties to which it is a party.

Madam Chairperson,

Compliance with the rule of law standards at the national level not only assures respect for the country and its people, it also helps underprivileged and other vulnerable sections of the society in getting justice, dignity and empowerment. It also strengthens linkage between municipal law and international law, while promoting development and enhancing democratic values and institutions.

Our judicial system oversees that the rule of law is enforced rigorously at the national level. Presently, the judicial reforms being undertaken in my country by the UPA Government, led by the Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh ji, and UPA Chairperson Madam Sonia Gandhi ji, would further supplement the rule of law efforts at the national level as these reforms are aimed at strengthening a transparent, accountable, responsive, effective and efficient judiciary.
At the executive level the Government has adopted many milestone social development programmes, aimed at poverty elevation and ensuring inclusive growth so that the benefits of development can reach every section of the society. The legislature is also not lagging behind in its efforts to adopt appropriate legislative measures for the protection and upliftment of the disadvantaged and vulnerable sections of the society.

India is thus firmly committed to implement the rule of law at the national level so that the ideals of democracy, human rights, dignity and peaceful co-existence, which are the cornerstones of a civilized society, can be achieved and further promoted.

Madam Chairperson,

The rule of law must be strengthened at all levels - national, institutional, and international. To ensure transparency, fairness and adherence to the rule of law in the UN system, it is necessary that the mandate of one organ of the UN should not be infringed upon or duplicated by the other organ of the UN. It is also necessary to support and further encourage those institutional policies and processes that ensure a just and effective international order based on the rule of law.

In this regard all efforts should be made to strengthen the capacity of States, especially of developing States, as the rule of law assistance has sometimes been piecemeal and, in some instances, donor-driven and not in line with national priorities of the recipient countries. There is an urgent need to move towards approaches that are nationally-driven and sustainable, and approaches that can garner the requisite political and popular support.

Thank you, Madam Chairperson.
691. Statement by K.C. Venugopal, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 28 [a] Advancement of Women [b] Implementation of the Outcome of the 4th World Conference on Women and of the 23rd Special Session of the General Assembly at the Third Committee of the UNGA.

Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, please allow me to thank the Secretary General for all his reports under this agenda item. We would also like to thank all the speakers who made presentations on this agenda item. Our delegation would like to broadly associate ourselves with the statement made by the Chair of the G77.

Gender equality and the empowerment of women remains the key focus area of social development and distributive justice globally. Socio-economic development will be incomplete, if women are ignored. In fact, gender equality and the empowerment of women is an integral part of the realization of the Millennium Development Goals.

Soon after gaining independence, the founding fathers of India ensured that in the Constitution of India, the principles of gender equality and the empowerment of women were codified and enshrined, which not only guarantees equality to women, but also advocates affirmative action for women, wherever necessary. These have been further reinforced through periodic amendments in legislation and policy. Following successive policies and programmes, in 2001, we formulated the National Policy for the Empowerment of Women with the main objectives of empowering women socially, economically and politically; ensuring equal access to health care, education and employment; strengthening legal systems to eliminate all forms of discrimination against women; and building and strengthening partnerships with civil society, particularly women’s organizations. The ongoing Eleventh Five Year development plan of India (2007-12) has recognized women as agents of sustained socio-economic growth and change. Gender has been made a cross-cutting theme in all the development plans. The purpose of this holistic approach was to reduce gender disparities across regions and communities and ensure access to basic physical infrastructure as well as health and education services to all. While a large number of programmes and schemes are being implemented to mainstream gender in all activities throughout the Government of India under the dynamic leadership of Hon'ble Prime Minister of India, Dr Manmohan Singh, I would like to highlight a few.

In the field of education, the Education for All Campaign (Sarva Shiksha Abhiyan) has made tremendous impact on girls. There has also been a special focus on girls' education, aiming to target the "hardest to reach" girls through residential schools, mid day meals and other incentives. In order to address adult illiteracy in women, the National Literacy Mission has been recast as the Female Literacy Mission and aims to target 70 million adults in the next 5 years, out of which 60 million will be women.

Significant progress has been made in the field of economic and social empowerment. One of our flagship schemes in this regards has been the "Swayamsidha" scheme, which means "self help". This scheme seeks to empower women by creating economically sustainable Self Help Groups. With more than 2.2 million Self Help Groups across the country, covering 33 million households, this programme has been a silent revolution for women. In my own experience as a Member of Parliament from Alleppey District (which is popularly known as the Venice of the East), self help groups have created tremendous results by setting up small and medium scale industrial units, especially in handicraft and traditional industries like coir and handloom as well as agriculture, including horticulture and fisheries. This had also helped in converting unutilized farm land into productive land as well as improving the living conditions of farmers and fishermen, especially women workers.

Health is yet another important component for the empowerment of women. We have redoubled our efforts to reduce maternal mortality rates, which is an indicator of any society's health status. With the launch of the National Rural Health Mission (NRHM) in 2005, more than US $ 3.5 billion is being spent on health annually, in particular maternal and children's health programmes. Under this programme, all the villages are covered through village-based "Accredited Social Health Activists" (ASHA) who act as a link between the health centers and the villagers. Although these ASHAs are honorary women volunteers, but they are paid performance-based compensation for undertaking specific health or other social sector programmes with measurable outputs. Currently, India is focusing on strengthening its efforts in the 235 districts that account for nearly 70% of all infant and maternal deaths. With our concerted efforts, there has been a decline in the infant and maternal mortality rates with the IMR at 53 (2008) and MMR at 254 (2006). We are hopeful that as we approach the target date of Millennium Development Goals in 2015, we will be able to achieve the goals.

Mr. Chairman,

Political empowerment is the most important component in the overall empowerment of women. Our efforts in India have been to include women in decision making process at all levels, in particular at the grassroots level. Under the vision of former Prime Minister of India, late Mr. Rajiv Gandhi, the Constitution of India was amended to give 33% reservation for women in rural and urban local bodies. Since 1993, currently, we have more than a million elected women representatives in local bodies. Building on these successes, under the leadership of Hon'ble Prime Minister of India, Dr Manmohan Singh and the strong conviction and determination of Hon'ble Chairperson of the United Progressive Alliance, Mrs. Sonia Gandhi, the Parliament was convinced last year to raise the percentage of women in local bodies to 50%. I am happy to inform you that in my State of Kerala, first elections after the enactment of this law will be held next week. In addition, the Upper House of Parliament has also passed a bill to reserve 33 % of seats in the Parliament and the State Legislative Assemblies for women. This bill is being actively pursued in the Lower House of the Parliament.

This year, as we commemorate the fifteenth anniversary of the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action and the tenth anniversary of the adoption of the Security Council Resolution 1325 on "women and peace and security", three important achievements related to advancement of women was made at the United Nations. We were able to successfully create UN Women, launch the Global Plan of Action against trafficking in person and launch the UN Secretary General’s Global Strategy on Women’s and Children’s Health. In this regard, let me congratulate Ms. Michelle Bachelet on the assumption of the important post of heading the UN Women. We would like to extend her our full support and cooperation in her assignment. Under her able leadership, we hope the UN Women would be able to stand up to the expectations of Member States in providing necessary assistance, when requested, in a timely and adequate manner. In this regard, we also look forward to the early constitution of the new Executive Board of the UN Women and its early operationalisation.

Mr. Chairman,

More than eighty years ago, Mahatma Gandhi said “there is no occasion for women to consider themselves subordinate or inferior to man….but unfortunately today she does not realize what tremendous advantage she has over man. Hence, it is onto us to take valuable measures so that the same can be avoided and women like men can have an equal experience in the society.” This clarion call is, unfortunately, still valid all over the world today. While commendable progress has been made around the world, much needs to be done to ensure that the gap between policy and programmatic implementation are reduced. Let us recommit ourselves to accelerate our efforts to achieve gender equality and the empowerment of women with effective programmes and policies to make this a reality.

Let me assure you that India is fully committed to the implementation of the Beijing Declaration and the Platform for Action. Gender equality and empowerment of women is one of India’s foremost priorities.

Thank you Mr. Chairman.
692. Statement by Vidya Charan Shukla, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 24 - Eradication of Poverty & other Development Issues - Plenary Devoted to Follow-up to the International Year of Microcredit at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

Allow me to begin by thanking the United Nations and all those working tirelessly in the promotion of microcredit as a tool for eradication of poverty.

The Secretary General's report, brought out in pursuance of the General Assembly resolution 63/229 and in consideration of the second United Nations Decade for Eradication of Poverty, is an insightful summary of the global microcredit experience with valuable lessons for all of us.

The development of microcredit and microfinance as a strategy to eradicate poverty was the central theme of the International Year of Microcredit in 2005.

It is well recognized that microcredit and microfinance as policy platforms have contributed significantly to socio-economic development and poverty reduction especially in developing countries.

Mr. President,

As a market based approach to fighting poverty, microfinance is focused on developing entrepreneurship and expanding self-employment. Microfinance institutions, which number more than 3500 worldwide today, serve approximately 155 million people the world over.

As microfinance institutions demonstrated the sustainability of micro lending, commercial banks have transformed the model into a major global industry. Between 2004 and 2008, these institutions experienced average annual asset growth of 39% and accumulated more than US$ 60 billion in total assets.
We, however, remain concerned about the high rates of interest charged by the commercial microfinance entities. Governments must address this anomaly through policy intervention.

Microfinance schemes have also demonstrated their viability to bring about social change, especially promotion of women's empowerment and gender equality.

Many such programmes in the developing world are accompanied by social service schemes and act as social safety nets in times of crisis. The insurance schemes of microfinance provide inexpensive short-term coverage for life, health, property, livestock, crops and natural disasters.

India, which has the largest microcredit network in the world, has had significant success with the programme. In particular, I would like to mention the impressive performance of microcredit schemes being run by the Self-Help Groups in India, which today number around 2.2 million. Based on the microcredit model, we are also running micro-pension schemes for the informal sector, a large segment of our economy which otherwise could not have availed of social security benefits.

Mr. President,

Notwithstanding the success of microfinance, we are well aware of its limitations as a poverty reduction strategy. But in the final analysis of things, going by our experience in India and what we have noted across the world, I must say that microfinance has been able to play a significant role in dealing with poverty reduction and social development in developing countries.

The financial and economic crisis has severely impacted the liquidity of microfinance institutions and has weakened their ability to offer innovative services.

The crisis has also led to a realization among governments that it was time to move from microcredit and microfinance regime to a more comprehensive financial inclusion.

Mr. President,

India has set a goal to make every village in the country financially included by 2015 through mobile banks.
The expansion of Information and Communication Technology services has fueled the growth of microfinance. The concept of branchless banking through mobile phones, bank cards and banking agents have met with particular success in developing countries. In the Least Developed Countries and in Africa, it has established direct channels for receiving remittance and has spurred domestic mobilization of resources.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that India stands strongly committed to financial inclusion for all and calls for further expansion of microcredit and microfinance strategy for achieving poverty reduction and other MDG targets.

I end with greetings to all co-workers around the world involved in this task.

693. Statement by Adhi Sankar, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 50-International Cooperation in the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space in the General Debate of the Special Political & Decolonization [fourth] Committee of UNGA.

Mr. Chairman

I take this opportunity to congratulate you on your election as Chairman of the Special Political and Decolonization Committee to the Sixty Fifth Session of the General Assembly and also the members of the Bureau on their election. I would also like to congratulate former Chairman, the Permanent Representative of Qatar, Ambassador Nassir Abdulaziz Al-Nasser for the way he conducted the work of this committee during the 64th session. I assure you of my delegation’s full co-operation and support during this 65th session of the UN General Assembly.

The Indian Delegation notes with appreciation that UN-COPUOS, under the mandate of General Assembly, has been contributing significantly towards capacity building for sustainable development, strengthening the international co-operation to utilise outer space for peaceful purposes towards serving the humanity. We are pleased to note the substantial progress made during the 53rd session of UN-COPUOS, under the able chairmanship of Mr Dumitru-Dorin Prunariu of Romania.

The Indian Delegation also expresses its full satisfaction at the work carried out by the two sub-committees of UN-COPUOS, the Scientific and Technical Sub-committee at its 47th session and the Legal Sub-committee at its 49th session.

While acknowledging the significant achievements of various member states in space endeavours during the last one year, the Indian delegation desires to brief the Committee, on the significant achievements made by India in the field of space since the last Session.

In its fifteenth successive successful flight, the Polar Satellite Launch Vehicle (PSLV) named PSLV C-14, placed OCEANSAT-2 and other six international nano-satellites in orbit on September 23, 2009. OCEANSAT-2, the successor of 11 year old operational OCEANSAT-1, carries Ocean Colour Monitor, Scatterometer and Atmospheric Sounder from Italy. Noting the increased global demand for the data from Scatterometer, India has consented to share the data with international space agencies for their operational applications.

The Indian delegation is proud to report that India’s Chandrayaan-1 with many international payloads including that from USA, was instrumental in conclusively establishing the presence of water and hydroxyl molecules on the lunar surface.

India has performed a unique joint experiment, known as Bi-Static Experiment involving Chandrayaan-1 and NASA's Lunar Reconnaissance Orbiter (LRO) spacecraft on August 21, 2009, for obtaining additional information on the possibility of existence of ice in a permanently shadowed crater near the North Pole of the Moon. Additionally, the analysis of data obtained by the Miniature Synthetic Aperture Radar (Mini-SAR) onboard Chandrayaan-1 spacecraft has provided evidence for the presence of ice deposits near the Moon's North Pole.

The longest annular solar eclipse of the millennium which occurred on January 15, 2010 was studied through successful launch of eleven Indian Rohini Sounding Rockets during a short period of two days.

On July 12, 2010, PSLV, in its sixteenth successive successful flight named PSLV C-15, placed CARTOSAT 2B and four auxiliary satellites namely STUDSAT from Indian students, ALSAT-2A from Algeria and NLS 6.1 and NLS 6.2 from Canada into their respective orbits.

Mr. Chairman

In the coming months, ISRO aims to augment India's constellation of remote sensing and communication satellites. Currently, India is getting ready for launch of RESOURCESAT-2 and Radar Imaging Satellite (RISAT-1) for natural resources management; and ISRO-CNES joint mission MEGHA TROPIQUES for tropical atmospheric studies and SARAL for studying Ocean surface. Additionally, YOUTHSAT, a small satellite built with participation of Moscow State University, X-SAT, built with participation of NTU of Singapore and SAPPIRE from Canada are scheduled to be launched as co-passengers in these flights. GSAT-5P, GSAT-12 and GSAT-8 are the communication satellites to be launched in coming months.

India has achieved significant progress in the last one year, in realising GSLV Mk III, a heavier class launch vehicle, capable of launching 4-ton class communication satellites into a Geostationary Transfer Orbit.

Mr. Chairman

The emphasis of Indian space programme has always been on integrating the advances in space technology and applications with the national developmental goals, particularly in vital service areas such as telecommunication, television broadcasting, meteorology, disaster warning, as well as natural resources survey and management. ANTRIX Corporation of ISRO has been conferred with the Globe Sustainability Research Award 2010 by the Globe Forum, Stockholm, Sweden. This recognition is for demonstrating the use of space technology and Information Technology solutions to effectively reach out to grass root levels.
Mr. Chairman

India places considerable importance on International Cooperation in space activities, mainly in taking up new scientific and technological challenges, defining international frameworks for exploitation and utilisation of outer space for peaceful purposes. Recently it has entered into agreements with Argentina, Republic of Korea and Saudi Arabia for peaceful uses of Outer Space.

India is establishing a user terminal in Papua New Guinea to receive multispertal Earth observation data from India’s IMS-1 satellite, to support its initiative of using space technology for developmental purpose. India is actively participating in the initiatives of the Asia-Pacific Regional Space Agency Forum (APRSAF) including Sentinel Asia project and STAR- Satellite Technology for the Asia-Pacific Region programme and sharing our data and expertise for the benefit of this region. The Indian delegation is happy to inform that India hosted the Secretariat for the International Charter on Space and Major Disasters and has contributed significantly to support disaster assessment and relief activities in different parts of the world.

Under the STORM programme of SAARC, India is providing a Doppler Weather Radar to its Member countries. India is also committed to sharing the data obtained from its IRS satellites with the ASEAN countries for disaster management support. India has recently made an arrangement with Brazil for providing the RESOURCESAT-1 data.

Mr. Chairman

India is actively participating in the Global Earth Observation System of Systems (GEOSS) and pursuing 10-year implementation (2005-2015) plan in various societal benefit areas. India is also hosting the Secretariat for Global Agricultural Monitoring System of Systems (GLAMSS) of GEOSS.

The Indian delegation is happy to inform that India will take up the Chair of Committee for Earth Observation System (CEOS) for 2012 and host the Plenary. India actively supports space based virtual constellation on satellites for various themes by committing its satellites and data products.
During March 9-12, 2010, India has conducted 28th Meeting of the Inter-agency Space Debris Coordination Committee, wherein 86 delegates from 10 space agencies deliberated on this important topic endangering the global space assets and activities.

Mr. Chairman

India continues to provide expertise and services for supporting the developing countries in the application of Space technology through capacity building. The Center for Space Science and Technology Education for Asia and Pacific Region, affiliated to UN and operating from India, has so far benefitted 894 scholars from 31 countries from the Asia-pacific region and 28 scholars from 17 countries outside the Asia-pacific region. India would like to request more participation from the member countries.

Mr. Chairman

The Indian space programme is entering into space exploration phase mainly to explore the Sun, inner solar system and build such capabilities for exploring outer solar system. Aditya-1, a project to study the solar chronosphere, is being taken up by ISRO along with leading science laboratories of India.

Mr. Chairman

In conclusion, the Indian delegation is pleased to greatly acknowledge and fully support UNCOPUOS in all its endeavours to increase the awareness of space-based benefits and to maintain outer space for peaceful purposes.

Thank you Mr. Chairman
694. Statement by Dr. Charan Das Mahant, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 62[A] & [B] - Joint Debate on the New Partnership for Africa’s Development: Progress in Implementation and International Support; 2001-2010: Decade to Roll Back Malaria in Developing Countries, Particularly in Africa at the UNGA.

New York, October 14, 2010.

Mr. President, Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

I am honoured to speak on behalf of India at today’s joint debate on the New Partnership for Africa’s Development. Let me begin by thanking the Secretary-General for his reports on the items under discussion, including the Eighth consolidated progress report on implementation and international support to NEPAD.

We align ourselves with the statement delivered by the distinguished Representative of Yemen on behalf of the Group of 77 and China.

The New Partnership for Africa’s Development articulates “both a vision and a strategic socio-economic development framework for Africa”. It reflects the commitment of African countries to undertake their own programs of development, and the commitment of the international community to support these efforts.

India applauds the progress achieved by African countries in implementation of the NEPAD priorities through the various multi-sectoral initiatives. We further welcome the integration of the New Partnership for Africa’s Development (NEPAD) into the structures and processes of the African Union through, inter alia, the establishment of the NEPAD Planning and Coordinating Agency (NPCA) as a technical body of the African Union.

Mr. President,

Despite these positive developments, serious challenges remain to be addressed before the African continent can achieve sustainable peace and prosperity. Most African countries remain off-track with respect to achieving the Millennium Development Goals. Conflict, poverty, lack of adequate nutrition and other malaises continue to shackle the tremendous potential of the African people.

It is universally acknowledged that addressing Africa's development needs and challenges require unwavering commitment and resolute action not only from within Africa, but equally important, from outside the continent by its partners through sustained cooperation including transfer of resources, technology, and an enabling international environment. The role of the international community in Africa's development is indispensable and crucial.

This is recognized in a number of multilateral and bilateral initiatives directed at Africa. This is also recognized in a number of international conferences and summits including the recently concluded High-Level Plenary Meeting of the General Assembly on the Millennium Development Goals that brought into sharp focus the special needs of Africa and the urgency of galvanizing international efforts. This role finds further articulation in a number of declarations, resolutions and plans of action in support of Africa to which the international community has pledged adherence.

In spite of the commitments and initiatives, there is a gap between promise and delivery by the international community that needs to be addressed on a priority basis. First and foremost, NEPAD can succeed only if the global partnership delivers in terms of resources. The picture on the ground is not inspiring. Official Development Assistance to Africa is estimated to have reached US$ 44 billion in 2009. This leaves a shortfall of US$ 16 billion relative to the Gleneagles target set in 2005. In this context, we would like to stress the urgent fulfillment of the commitments made by the Group of Eight at the 2005 Gleneagles Summit.

Mr. President,

India's own links with Africa go back a long way. They are anchored in a history of civilizational contact and friendship across the Indian Ocean. Our friendship and cooperation has been further strengthened through a common journey of anti-colonial struggle and post-colonial nation-building.

Today, our long and historic relationship has evolved into a sustainable and enduring partnership that embraces the entire spectrum of human engagement. In the economic realm, it translates into a vibrant economic partnership that covers, inter alia, infrastructure development, capacity-building, agriculture, health and food security, development of SMEs, and information and communication technology.

India has so far extended over US $ 3 billion concessional lines of credit to countries in Africa. These have been used in projects as prioritized by the African countries themselves. During the India-Africa Forum Summit held in April 2008 in New Delhi, India decided to extend additional lines of credit of US $ 5.4 billion over the next five years. It includes an allocation of US$ 300 million to be utilized by the African Union in support of NEPAD objectives. This line of credit is in addition to the US $ 200 million line of credit extended to NEPAD in 2002, most of which stands utilized. At the same time, India had proposed to undertake projects against grants in excess of US $ 500 million over the next five to six years. These are being implemented in consultation with our African partners.

India is also unilaterally making available duty free and quota free market access for goods from 34 Least Developed Countries in Africa. This covers 94% of India's total tariff lines and provides preferential market access on tariff lines that comprise 92.5% of global exports of all LDCs.

The Pan African E-network project is another far-reaching initiative undertaken by India in Africa. It aims at sharing our expertise in the fields of healthcare and education. It symbolizes India’s commitment to transferring skills and technology to Africa by bridging the digital divide within the framework of South-South Cooperation. It will connect 53 African countries into one network through satellite, fiber optics and wireless links to provide tele-education, tele-medicine and voice and video conference facilities. We expect the Project to bring major benefits to Africa in capacity building.

India has also been at the forefront of contributing to Africa’s human resource development efforts. The Indian Technical and Economic Cooperation (ITEC) Programme has benefited thousands of experts and students from Africa who have been coming for training courses in professional institutions in India since 1964. Apart from provision of experts, we are providing training to African personnel in diverse fields such as agriculture and agro processing, entrepreneurship development, tool design, small business creation, promotion of rural industries and information technology. In addition, several thousand African students are currently studying in Indian universities and colleges.

Mr. President,

India is also a steady contributor to the maintenance of peace and security in conflict-torn regions of Africa through our long-term involvement in peacekeeping efforts on the continent over the past six decades. Presently, India has over 7000 peacekeepers serving in Africa, including a 4000 strong contingent in the Democratic Republic of Congo.

India's first full all-female formed police unit serves with distinction in Liberia. It has earned laurels for its pioneering role in this regard which, in addition to normal peacekeeping, has included their successful outreach to vulnerable sections of the society, particularly women and children.

Mr. President,

India is steadfastly committed to the peace, stability and socio-economic development of Africa. India and Africa are joined in a common quest for sustainable economic growth and development. A blueprint for further intensifying the engagement between India and Africa is contained in the Delhi Declaration and the Africa-India Framework for Cooperation that was adopted during the landmark India-Africa Forum Summit held in Delhi in April 2008. We will continue to accord the highest priority to furthering our multi-dimensional partnership with Africa, which encompasses priority sectors integral to the developmental goals of Africa.

I thank you.
695. Statement by Muhammed Hamdullah Sayeed, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 19 Follow-up to and Implementation of the Outcome of the 2002 International Conference on Finance for Development and the 2008 Review Conference at the Second Committee of the UNGA.

New York, October 14, 2010.

Mr. Chairman,

Allow me to begin by expressing my deep appreciation of your stewardship in steering the work of the Second Committee. India aligns itself with the statement delivered by Yemen on behalf of the G-77.

Financing for development lies at the heart of the global development agenda and I hope our deliberations today would help in mobilising action towards addressing our concerns on the issue. We note with satisfaction the efforts made by the UN to follow up on the Monterrey Consensus and the Doha Conference including through the 4th High Level Dialogue on Financing for Development organised by the General Assembly in March this year.

At the recently held High Level Review meeting on MDGs, the global fraternity had once again emphasised the importance of adhering to the commitments of the Monterrey Consensus of 2002 and the Doha Conference of 2008.

The Declaration adopted at the event stated in clear terms the role that was envisaged for ODA, innovative financing, domestic resources, debt relief, global economic governance reforms and international trade and investment to play in the context of achieving the Internationally Agreed Development Goals.

Mr. Chairman,

The developing countries, especially the LDCs, LLDCs, SIDS and countries in Africa quite clearly cannot meet the MDG targets and other developmental challenges without external development assistance.
These countries, in spite of their best efforts have not been able to mobilise adequate domestic resources to meet their development needs due to lack of economic opportunities, limited policy space and weak productive capacities.

The global financial crisis along with the food and energy shocks has further weakened their resource base to fight hunger, poverty and disease.

As the global economy contracted, the financing gap for development in existence prior to 2008 further widened.

As of 2009, only five donor countries had met their ODA commitment of 0.7%. The aid flow to developing countries last year stood at US$ 120 billion, representing 0.31% of the total GNI of the donor countries and well short of the 0.7% mark.

Mr. Chairman,

The commitment that the international community made in Monterrey and Doha of ensuring predictable development assistance including ODA, concessional financing and debt relief to developing countries and supporting nationally owned development strategies need to be fulfilled urgently.

India welcomes the reaffirmation of commitments by some countries to reach the ODA target of 0.7% of GNI by 2015, to channel at least 50% of aid increases to Africa and to meet the target of 0.15% to 0.20% of GNP to the LDCs.

Mr. Chairman,

The gap in financing for development has led to a spurt in global discourse on innovative and new tools of financing.

India believes that innovative sources of financing must be expanded to support the global development agenda. We compliment the work undertaken by GAVI to support its health initiative through the International Finance Facility for Immunisation. Such models could also be replicated to support global action in areas such as education, food security, environment and climate change.
We are hopeful that the completion of an ambitious Doha Round, expansion of aid for trade, strong assistance from international financial institutions and policies of financial inclusion would strengthen the capacities of developing countries to mobilize greater domestic resources in the medium and long term.

A comprehensive reform of the international financial architecture to address systemic issues is at the heart of general implementation of the financing for development process. India has been working closely with countries to ensure greater voice and participatory space for developing countries in the international financial institutions.

Mr. Chairman,

The new tools of financing development or strengthening the capacity of developing countries can at best bring additional resources. There is no substitute to the ODA commitments for financing development.

On its part, India remains fully committed to support the development needs of countries in the South. We have extended lines of credit worth more than US$ 5 billion to developing countries since 2003 to enhance their participation in global trade. Our annual outlay on concessional lending and grants is over US$ 1 billion, covering countries in our region, in Africa and beyond. Our companies have invested more than US$ 15 billion in Africa in the last few years.

South-South financial and technical assistance may be expanding lately but it cannot be a substitute for the North-South commitment.

Mr. Chairman,

The financing for development process, as embodied in the Monterrey Consensus and the Doha Review Conference, is crucial for attainment of our development aspirations. We must adhere to its principles in letter and spirit.

Thank you.
Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, please allow me to thank the Secretary General for all his reports under this agenda item. We would also like to thank all the speakers for their useful and informative presentations under this agenda item.

Mr. Chairman,

India's commitment to children and their welfare and development is manifest in our commitment and ongoing efforts to meet the goals of "A World fit for Children" and the related Millennium Development Goals.

Children in the age group 0-18 years constitute 44% of our total population. In our efforts to make this world a better place for our children to grow in, India has been relentless in her efforts to provide the highest possible standards in education, welfare and development for our children.

Mr. Chairman,

Our flagship programme for children, namely the Integrated Child Development Services (ICDS) Scheme, represents one of the world's largest and most unique programmes for Early Childhood Care and Education. This programme, on the one hand, provides pre-school non-formal education for children up to 6 years, on the other hand, breaks the vicious cycle of malnutrition, morbidity and mortality by providing supplementary nutrition, immunization and periodic health checkup.

Last year alone, more than 71.8 million children and 15.7 million pregnant and lactating mothers benefited from this programme. As this programme has direct implication on the success of the MDG 4, (of reducing by two thirds the mortality rate among children under five), the financial allocation for this scheme has increased fourfold in the last 5 years to Rs 49 billion in 2009-10.

Mr. Chairman,

One of the most notable progresses in India in the field of child development has been - education. By bringing into force the Right to Free and Compulsory Education Act in April this year, it is now an inalienable and justiciable right of all children to obtain free and compulsory education including, enrolment, attendance and completion of eight years of elementary education schooling till the age of 14 years.

This Act also requires all private schools to reserve 25% of seats to children from poor families (to be reimbursed by the state as part of the public-private partnership plan). There is also a provision for special training of school dropouts to bring them at par with students of the same age. The Act also has a number of other provisions regarding improvement of school infrastructure and teacher-student ratio. The National Council for the Protection of Child Rights, along with various Commissions set up by the State Governments will monitor the implementation of this Act.

Notwithstanding this, our Universal Elementary Education Scheme (Sarva Siksha Abhiyan) has also been expanded to cover the entire country to reduce out-of-school children as well as to emphasis on the girl child's education.

The government has also committed increased spending on education. In order to attain universal education, 6% of India's GDP for the period 2007 to 2012 has been allocated for education and there has been an increase of 16 % in the Union Budget (2010-11) for school education.

Mr. Chairman,

Last year, government of India launched a new scheme called the Integrated Child Protection Scheme (ICPS) to create a safe environment for children in need of care and protection, children in conflict and contact with law and any other vulnerable child. This scheme brought under one umbrella several existing schemes of child protection, namely, a) A Programme for Juvenile Justice; b) An Integrated Programme for Street Children; and c) Scheme for Assistance to Homes to Promote In-country Adoption.

The primary focus of this new scheme is to provide quality and better accessible child protection services; to raise public awareness about child rights; to clearly articulate responsibilities and enforced accountability for child protection; and to establish functioning structures at all government levels for delivery of statutory and support services to children in difficult times. One of the important and innovative elements of this scheme has been the commencement of a dedicated 24 hours toll free telephone helpline service for all children in distress or to adults on behalf of children in distress. At present this service is available in 83 cities and is being gradually expanded to other parts of the country.

Mr. Chairman,

A special mention of girl child deserves your attention. The girl child is one of the most vulnerable members of any society. A number of initiatives to enhance the status of the girl child have been initiated in India. Starting from effective policies to ban of sex selective abortion and child marriage, since 2009, every year January 24 is marked as "National Girl Child Day" in India to highlight the different problems faced by the girl child and the need to spread gender sensitization amongst various sections of the society.

Mr. Chairman,

We are also cognizant of the fact that our children should not be engaged in any form of hard labour at the cost of their right to education. India is strictly enforcing a ban on employment of children less than 14 years as domestic help or at eateries by way of the Child Labour (Prohibition & Regulation) Act. Child labour is intrinsically linked to the intricate web of social problems that children living in poverty are subject to. We believe that any strategy to completely eliminate all forms of child labour must be a holistic effort that targets health, nutrition, poverty and education for children.

Ending exploitation and violence against children is fundamental to ensuring a healthy future for every child. In this connection, India has set up a National Commission for Protection of Child's Rights in 2007 to provide speedy trial of offenders committing crimes against children and violating the rights of children.

Mr. Chairman,

Before I conclude, let me reiterate India's firm commitment to work towards not only complete realisation of the goals of "A World Fit for Children" and the realisation of all the related Millennium Development Goals but also higher standards of physical, social, emotional and psychological life for each and every child in India. They are indeed our future. Let us strive to provide them the best.

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

697. Statement by Mani Shankar Aiyer, Member of Parliament, on Thematic Discussion on Nuclear Weapons at the First Committee of UNGA.

Mr. Chairman,

22 years ago, on 9 June 1988, India's then Prime Minister, the young Shri Rajiv Gandhi, presented to the Third Session of the UN Special Session on Disarmament an Action Plan for a Nuclear-Weapons-Free and Nonviolent World Order which set out a road map to attain the goal of nuclear disarmament, followed by general and complete disarmament, in a time-bound, universal, non-discriminatory, phased and verifiable manner within 22 years, that is, by this year, 2010.

Tragically, we are no nearer attaining that goal today than we were 22 years ago. The promise of a nuclear weapon free world, which seemed a real possibility near the end of the Cold War, has been belied. There has been welcome reduction in numbers by the two largest possessors of nuclear weapons but the global threat posed by nuclear weapons has not abated. The possibility of non state actors acquiring weapons of mass destruction has added a new dimension to that threat.

The one ray of hope is that there is a far wider measure of consensus on the imperative need to move towards that goal than there was 22 years ago. The Cold War has been over for almost two decades. And voices of wisdom, particularly on the part of those who were once the most ardent advocates of a policy of deterrence based on nuclear weapons, are beginning to be heard.

Several world leaders have expressly acknowledged the necessity of moving towards global zero. We are greatly encouraged by President Obama's statement in Prague on 5 April 2009 which led to his richly deserved Nobel Prize for Peace where he reiterated his commitment to "seek the peace and security of a world without nuclear weapons".

The UN Secretary General too has called for consideration of a Nuclear Weapons Convention in his Five-Point Plan. Yet, negotiations are still to commence in the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva aimed at ensuring the universal, non-discriminatory, time-bound, phased and verifiable elimination of nuclear weapons as presaged in the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan.

For its part, India remains committed to the objective of that Plan and the realization of its vision of ushering in a nuclear weapon free and non-violent world order. We believe that nuclear disarmament can be achieved by a universal commitment for global elimination of nuclear weapons through a step by step process undertaken in the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva. We believe that progressive steps for the de-legitimization of nuclear weapons are essential to achieving the goal of their complete elimination. Measures to reduce nuclear dangers arising from accidental or unauthorized use of nuclear weapons, increasing restraints on the use of nuclear weapons, de-alerting of nuclear weapons, measures to prevent terrorists from gaining access to nuclear weapons are all pertinent in this regard. India's resolutions in the First Committee give expression to a large number of these proposals, which are justifiably gaining increasing international support. We have also co-sponsored resolutions by others seeking to initiate with all deliberate speed the processes which could lead to an international convention or conventions in this regard. We reiterate our desire to work with all fellow member states of the United Nations to achieve this goal.

Addressing the threat posed by nuclear weapons to international peace and security in a sustainable and comprehensive manner requires their global elimination on a non-discriminatory basis. While non-proliferation is important and all states should fully and effectively implement the obligations arising from the agreements or treaties to which they are parties, we must not lose sight, as the UN Secretary General has underlined, of the essential and mutually reinforcing linkage between disarmament and non-proliferation. Progress on nuclear disarmament would reinforce non-proliferation like no other measure can. And progress on non-proliferation cannot be a pre-condition for progress on nuclear disarmament.

International efforts in this regard should build the necessary confidence among states so that international treaties and agreements are multilaterally negotiated and freely accepted which remains the true test of their legitimacy and credibility. India has acceded to and is in full implementation of the two non-discriminatory international Conventions banning Biological and Chemical Weapons. I recall in this connection Premier Rajiv Gandhi saying, while presenting his Action Plan to the Special Session of the UNGA in 1988:

"We have an international convention eliminating biological weapons by prohibiting their use in war. We are working on similarly eliminating chemical weapons. There is no reason in principle why nuclear weapons cannot be so eliminated. All it requires is the affirmation of certain basic moral values and the assertion of the required political will, underpinned by treaties and institutions which ensure against nuclear delinquency."

India’s position on the NPT needs no reiteration. There is no question of India joining the NPT as a non-nuclear weapon state. Nuclear weapons are an integral part of India's national security and will remain so, pending non-discriminatory and global nuclear disarmament.

It is but natural that the countries with the largest nuclear arsenals bear a special responsibility for nuclear disarmament. In this regard we welcome the new Russia-U.S. agreement to cut their nuclear arsenals. Between them the two still hold more than 90% of the nuclear weapons in the world.
and the new START is a step in the right direction. Even as we applaud the revitalisation of the Russia-U.S. bilateral arms control process, we believe that this is not a substitute for a step by step process underwritten by a universal commitment and an agreed multilateral framework for achieving global and non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament.

Mr. Chairman, as part of its credible minimum nuclear deterrent, India has espoused the policy of “No First Use” against nuclear weapon states and non-use against non-nuclear weapon states and is prepared to convert these undertakings into multilateral legal arrangements. We support negotiations with a view to reaching agreement on effective arrangements to assure non-nuclear weapon States against the use and threat of use of nuclear weapons. We are committed to a unilateral and voluntary moratorium on nuclear explosive testing. As a nuclear weapon state and a responsible member of the international community, we will participate constructively in the negotiation of an FMCT in the Conference on Disarmament as part of its programme of work. India is also ready to work with others in the international community to strengthen nuclear security against the threat of nuclear explosive devices or fissile material falling into the hands of non-state actors.

Mr. Chairman, our highest priority, however, remains nuclear disarmament, as it has been since Mahatma Gandhi in 1945 expressed his horror at the use of nuclear weapons and Premier Rajiv Gandhi outlined in his Action Plan a roadmap which, if accepted then, would have given us this year a world free of nuclear weapons and anchored in Nonviolence.

In a working paper submitted to the UNGA in 2006, India suggested a number of measures in this regard, including reaffirmation of the unequivocal commitment by all nuclear weapon states to the goal of complete elimination of nuclear weapons and specific legal measures such as a Global No First Use Agreement, a Convention on the Prohibition of the use of Nuclear weapons and a Nuclear Weapons Convention for the complete elimination of nuclear weapons, within a specified timeframe. On 13 August 2007, Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh reiterated India’s position: “...we must not forget India’s long-standing commitment to the noble ideas of nuclear disarmament and our refusal to participate in any arms race, including a nuclear arms race. Our commitment to universal, non-discriminatory and total elimination of nuclear weapons remains undiminished. It is this vision of a world free of nuclear weapons which Shri Rajiv Gandhi put before the UN in 1988 and this still has universal resonance."

More recently, at the start of this UNGA session, our Minister of External Affairs, Shri S.M. Krishna, stressed our "...abiding commitment for achieving universal, non-discriminatory nuclear disarmament within a specified timeframe, a vision that was most eloquently articulated here in the General Assembly by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi in 1988."

In that same context, speaking at the High Level Meeting on Revitalizing the Conference on Disarmament and Taking Forward Multilateral Disarmament Negotiations, India's External Affairs Minister has called for intensification of dialogue amongst UN member states for strengthening the international consensus on disarmament and non-proliferation.

This was also the intent of our 2006 Working Paper containing proposals that reflect the spirit and substance of the Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan. The idea was to stimulate debate and discussion on what could be done today to implement the abiding vision of that Plan. The time for action is now. In this 22nd year of the presentation of our Action Plan, there is a growing international consensus which signposts the need for this session of the UN General Assembly to take, with the broad consent of all concerned, the vitally required step of authorising the commencement of intergovernmental negotiations in Geneva which take into account the 1988 Rajiv Gandhi Action Plan, previous and present resolutions of the UN General Assembly, the Working Paper we circulated in 2006 and several proposals made by concerned members of international civil society, and high authorities like the UN Secretary General.

Hence, with a view to taking action aimed at achieving nuclear disarmament, we call for an intensification of discussion and dialogue among Member States, to seek an international consensus, if possible during this session of the UN General Assembly, to commence the process of intergovernmental negotiations at the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva. The Conference on Disarmament would be the appropriate forum to consider India's proposals, as also numerous other proposals that the international community has received and that have been floated by the larger non-governmental communities.

Thank you.
698. Statement by Dr. Mehboob Beg, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 84 - Report of the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization at the Sixth Committee of the UNGA.

New York, October 18, 2010.

Madam Chairperson,

As I am taking the floor for the first time in this Committee, let me congratulate you and other members of the Bureau on your election. We are confident that this Committee will make good progress under your leadership.

We align ourselves with the statement made by Iran on behalf of NAM. My delegation considers the Special Committee on the Charter of the United Nations and on the Strengthening of the Role of the Organization as an important one and all items on its agenda and all the specific proposals on the table deserve due consideration. While my delegation will address them as and when each item is taken up, we would like to make some general remarks at this time with specific reference to maintenance of international peace and security: impact and application of sanctions; peaceful settlement of disputes and on the overall thrust of some of the proposals under consideration.

Madam Chairperson,

The impact and application of sanctions in the context of maintenance of international peace and security is an important issue. Maintenance of international peace and security is the primary responsibility of the Security Council, which acts on behalf of all members of the United Nations in the discharge of its duties. While the Security Council has the authority and the competence to impose and enforce sanctions in accordance with chapter VII of the UN Charter, the Charter does not intend that such a legitimate and permissible action by the Security Council should adversely affect other States, entities or peoples.

India attaches great importance to the proper implementation of article 50 of the Charter, relating to assistance to third States affected by the application of sanctions under chapter VII. Article 50 is an integral part of Chapter VII providing for the right to consult in favour of the third States. Article 50 was intended by its drafters to have tangible and concrete effect and not to remain a dead letter.

We are happy to note that in recent years the Security Council has given due consideration to this very important aspect and has made a shift from general sanctions against States to targeted sanctions against individuals and entities, especially in the global fight against terrorism.

The Security Council has adopted both substantive as well as procedural safeguards to mitigate the adverse effects of sanctions on third states. These measures range from standardizing humanitarian exemptions to developing procedures and establishing a focal point. The proper implementation of targeted financial sanctions, focused arms embargoes and travel sanctions will minimize the economic, social and humanitarian impact in targeted as well as non-targeted States. These are important steps and have proved successful in the international community's coordinated and joint efforts to counter global terrorism.

My delegation is of the firm belief that in as much as article 50 is an important part and parcel of Chapter VII, the essence of any solution to the problem of affected third States should vest in the Security Council with such authority and responsibility.

Last year the adoption of the Russian paper on the introduction and implementation of sanctions by the United Nations as an annex to the GA Resolution 64/115 was an important step. However, we may have to move beyond that. The procedural elements of the application of sanctions would have to be matched with substance. The effectiveness of sanctions and assistance to third States to recover from the effect of sanctions are both parts of the same whole of Chapter VII, and in fact, are integral to each other.

The application of sanctions can only be further reinforced and made more acceptable by finding permanent and predictable solutions to the problem of third states affected by sanctions. The virtue of this solution is predictability of a mechanism and automaticity of its application. This also necessitates the development of capacity to assess and evaluate the impact of sanctions on third States and individuals.
We are happy to note from the report of the Secretary General that keeping with the shift of the Security Council from comprehensive economic sanctions to targeted sanctions, no sanctions committee has been approached by member states with regard to special economic problems arising from the implementation of sanctions since 2003.

We also note with satisfaction that in accordance with the relevant resolutions of the General Assembly, the competent units within the Secretariat have maintained their capacity and used methodologies to compile and evaluate information pertaining to any special economic problems in third States arising from the application of sanctions. We support the efforts of the Department of Political Affairs to stay abreast of similar and related methodologies for assessing the impact of sanctions in general in order to be responsive when an appeal is made by any State under article 50 of the Charter.

Madam Chairperson,

The duty to settle disputes by peaceful means is a fundamental principle enshrined in article 2, paragraph 3 of the UN Charter. It obligates States to settle all their international disputes by peaceful means and in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice are not endangered. Article 33 of the Charter further strengthens this duty and provides a number of means which the party to a dispute can choose freely. These include arbitration, enquiry, mediation and judicial settlement. The International Court of Justice, being the principal judicial organ of the United Nations plays an important role in this regard.

Madam Chairperson,

There are many proposals before the Special Committee for quite some time now. We will make specific comments on those proposals as and when they are taken up for consideration by this Committee. The essence of these proposals is to strengthen the role of the organization.

In the World Summit Outcome Document in 2005 our leaders made commitment to strengthen the United Nations by highlighting the role of the General Assembly as the chief deliberative, policy making and representative organ of the United Nations. It also called for the strengthening of the relationship between General Assembly and other principal organs of the UN and stressed for the early reform of the Security Council to make it more broadly representative.

India attaches great importance to the reform of the United Nations, including the revitalization of the General Assembly and democratization and expansion of the Security Council in both permanent and non-permanent categories.

Madam Chairperson,

India regards the Repertory of Practice of the UN Organs and Repertoire of Practice of the Security Council to be a valuable source of information on the application of the Charter as well as the practice of UN Organs and the Security Council. They are important tools not only for the preservation of institutional memory of the United Nations; they are immensely useful for Member States, academics and practitioners alike.

We commend the efforts of the Secretary General for the progress made in the preparation of studies, including the increased use of internship programme of the United Nations and further expanded cooperation with academic institutions for this purpose. We note with satisfaction the progress made by the Secretariat in their preparation, updating, and publication and putting them on the web for general information.

I thank you Madam Chairperson.
Mr. President,

Excellencies, Ladies and Gentlemen,

I am honored and privileged to participate in today's discussion on "Sport for peace and development". Let me begin by thanking the Secretary-General for his report on the item under discussion.

Mr. President,

Sports are an important element in building character. It not only teaches one to be just and fair but also prepares you to face challenges in life. Sports being a most popular activity for young people, it can help to motivate young people, build teams, develop leadership, promote volunteering, and educate apart from ensuring fitness and healthy lifestyles.

Sports also seek to promote peace, equality and friendship among all people and nations. In-fact, it is hard to imagine a more powerful medium, other than sports, to inspire and bring people together for a common purpose.

Swami Vivekananda, the great philosopher from India, when approached by a young man to explain the meaning of the Bhagwad Gita, is reported to have looked at his physique and advised him to first go play football.

Develop your body and mind, Swamiji told this young man, and then you will be better fit to study and understand the Gita.

Swamiji was clear that a healthy body and mind is fundamental in our quest for peace and sports, indeed, plays a critical role towards this end.

Mr. President,

The intrinsic linkage between sports and games and the human quest for excellence was recognized ever since the inception of human civilization. It reached its epitome in the ancient Greek civilization, which is the progenitor of the Olympic movement.
Sports, games and physical fitness were an integral component of India’s civilization, as is evident from the existence of the highly evolved system of yoga and a vast range of highly developed indigenous games, including martial arts.

After our independence, the integration of physical education and sports with formal education was emphasized in the First Five Year Plan itself.

Our efforts have been for broad-basing sports and provision of modern sports infrastructure. A National Sports Policy was adopted by India in 2001.

We have also encouraged the autonomous functioning of National Sports Federations and are happy to see that today all sections of our society, including the media and the business sector, are actively involving themselves in the promotion of sports.

Mr. President,

Sports are also a most effective tool to help achieve development objectives in the areas of health, education, HIV/AIDS prevention, child protection and child development.

They help generate public awareness and inspire broad, inclusive and committed action in support of developmental agenda.

I am glad that there is good recognition of the value of sports to help achieve the Millennium Development Goals and that many sports personalities have associated with UN in creating public awareness and understanding of various issues that affect the youth and society.

In this context I am, of course, particularly happy that our national cricket icon, Sachin Tendulkar is a Goodwill Ambassador of United Nations Environment Programme and that our former tennis champion Vijay Amritraj was UN Messenger of Peace in 2001.

Mr. President,

India was honoured to host the Nineteenth Commonwealth Games, which have just concluded in Delhi.
This two weeks long mega event featured participation from 71 countries across the world and more than 7,000 athletes, who celebrated sporting excellence, human skill and endurance and above all courage and character.

These games upheld and renewed the essential spirit of peace, equality and friendship among all people and nations.

We congratulate all those countries which successfully organized large global and regional sporting events during the last year. We also wish every success to all those countries which will be holding sporting events in the coming months and years.

We believe that such mega sporting events will strengthen the cherished ties of goodwill and understanding that unite us as one family.

Thank you.

Madam President,

I am deeply honoured and privileged to participate in today's joint debate under the agenda items of Global Agenda for Dialogue among Civilizations and Culture of Peace.

As we celebrate in 2010 the International Year of Rapprochement of Cultures and the International Decade for a Culture of Peace and Non-Violence for the Children of the World comes to an end, it provides us an opportunity to take a holistic view of the progress made so far and have an assessment of the challenges that lie ahead. Please allow me to express our sincere thanks and appreciation to the Secretary General for his...
Madam President,

In today’s world we are witnessing the rise of extremism and intolerance, outbreak of sectarian violence and increasing use of language of hatred and violence. These pose a serious challenge to the very foundations of our society.

The increasing interdependent and interconnected world has also, perhaps, accentuated the fault lines in our society. While there is an accelerated pace of economic and technological development, the same regrettably cannot be said with regard to ethical, moral and cultural development of our society. Indeed, our times have seen the rise of the scourge of terrorism.

The environment in which we live today is also accentuated by disparities, deprivation and exploitation. This is hardly conducive to laying the foundations of sustainable peace and development. Conscious of this stark reality, our former Prime Minister Shrimati Indira Gandhi had noted as early as in 1972 at the UN Conference on the Human Environment that poverty and need were the worst polluters. This stirred a global debate on the need to ensure that poverty eradication and developmental imperatives remained at the fore with environmental challenges in our pursuit of sustainable development.

Madam President,

Inter-cultural and inter-religious dialogue is a necessity and one of the central elements in developing a better understanding of the apparent contradictions and divergent approaches that exist today in our societies.

We need to create an environment conducive for fostering dialogue between diverse cultures, races, faiths and religions that inculcates the values that promote transition from force to reason, from conflict and violence to dialogue and peace.

Dialogue amongst different cultures and religions is also important because it is precisely in the absence of such dialogue and understanding, that intolerance, bigotry and violence flourish.
This is the reason why extremist ideologies, violence and terrorism, have grown in a world in which we seem to be moving away from dialogue and understanding.

There can be no disputing that terrorism, which is a manifestation of extremism, intolerance and violence, is the antithesis of all religions. No religion condones violence or the killing of human beings. It is, therefore, imperative that the nations of the world must work together in a concerted manner to tackle the menace of terrorism and extremism, which are an anathema for modern societies.

Madam President,

All the great religions of the world essentially represent what the Indian ethos postulate as “Ekam sadviprah bahudha vadanti” i.e. The Truth is One, the wise call it by many names.

Compassion, mercy and tolerance are the common values and beliefs among all major faiths of the world.

We must learn to live our faith with integrity while respecting and accepting each other.

Madam President,

India, the largest democracy in the world, a nation of unparalleled diversity with a population of over one billion, is the second most populous nation in the world.

While India, of course, has the largest Hindu population, we also have one of the largest Muslim populations in the world.

And, India provides a home to very significant number of practitioners of practically every other major religion of the world, be it Christianity, Buddhism, Sikhism, Jainism, Zoroastrianism or the Bahais. India is the birthplace of the Jainism. Gautam Buddha gave his first sermon in Sarnath, an eminent centre of Indian philosophy, after he attained enlightenment in Bodh Gaya.

The history of India, in essence, is a narrative of conversations between different civilizations and, indeed, conversation with the nature itself.
India is home to scores of languages, hundreds of dialects, thousands of cuisines, a medley of races, colours, landscapes and cultures. This assimilation and accommodation of diversity has contributed to the richness of our composite culture and durability of our civilization.

Our civilizational legacy treats nature as a source of nurture and there is high value placed on living in harmony with nature. The Vedas are a repository for holistic development of the human-being in full harmony with its surroundings. The continuous strand of Vasudhaiva Kutumbakam i.e. "the entire world is one family" has guided our constant interaction and exchange of thoughts with the outside world. The noble principles of life and spiritualism, including non-violence, have influenced successive generations of people worldwide.

The interaction between India and the West goes back to the time of ancient Greece. Millennia ago, the interaction between these two civilizations produced the exquisite Gandhara art form.

India’s contact with Islam produced the beautiful confluence of the Indo-Islamic culture, which includes the great human values of Sufism.

Indeed, India would not have succeeded in holding together and strengthening a composite Indian identity unless Indians practiced tolerance and were determined to live together in peace.

The Father of our Nation, Mahatma Gandhi was the greatest apostle of peace and non-violence. We firmly believe that Gandhi atleet hi nahi, bhavishya bhi hai i.e. "Gandhi is not the past, he is the future also". He said, "I do not want my house to be walled in on all sides and my windows to be stuffed. I want the cultures of all the lands to be blown about my house as freely as possible". We believe that no culture or religion is superior to any other and have always benefited from our interactions with various civilizations throughout our history.

We, in India, Madam President, understand the importance of building alliances among religions, cultures and ethnic groups and we have always supported all efforts to build bridges of understanding between nations, peoples, religions, cultures across the world.
It is our considered view that successful pluralism must be grounded on the basic tenets of mutual understanding and respect for diverse traditions. This is also critical for harmonious development of all sections of the society, including gender equity and empowerment of women all over the world.

Madam President,

Global efforts towards peace and reconciliation can only succeed with a collective approach that is built on commitment, trust, dialogue and collaboration. We must do this, at all levels, within nations, within regions and within the broader international community.

The only way to achieve this goal is to move conceptually to a new dimension of dialogue and harmony among diverse cultures, races, faiths and religions so that all human beings could live in a sane and peaceful global society of our collective dreams.

Thank You.
701. Statement by Mr. D. Raja, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 23 - Groups of Countries in Special Situations: [A] Fourth United Nations Conference on the Least Developed Countries and [b] Specific Actions Related to the Particular needs and problems of landlocked developing countries; outcome of the International Ministerial Conference of Landlocked and Transit Developing Countries and Donor Countries and International Financial and Development Institutions on Transit Transport Cooperation at the Second Committee of the UNGA.

New York, October 18, 2010.

Madam Chairperson,

At the outset, India wishes to express its deep appreciation for the continued priority being given to the Least Developed Countries (LDCs) and Landlocked Developing Countries (LLDCs) in the agenda of the Second Committee.

India aligns itself with the statement delivered by Yemen on behalf of G-77. India believes that for an equitable, balanced and sustainable global growth, it is a must that the fruits of development and progress be shared among countries. It is with this belief that India has been extending its steadfast support to strengthen the development process in LDCs and LLDCs.

As we take stock of the achievements of the Brussels Programme in its final year of operation, success seems to be only partial. Though a number of LDCs achieved increased GDP growth, it did not translate into poverty reduction. More importantly, the structural weakness of their economies and vulnerability to external shocks were left unanswered.

The LDCs have undertaken major efforts towards attainment of the MDGs but due to lack of resources and capacity the results are far from satisfactory. The global financial, food and energy crises have reversed their development gains.
The LDCs are in a race against time to bolster their food security given their rapidly expanding urban population and declining agricultural productivity. Of the 33 countries in a permanent state of food insecurity, 22 are LDCs.

Madam Chairperson,

In spite of the market diversification that LDCs have witnessed in recent years, their share in global exports in 2009 was just 1% and if oil was excluded, it would come down to 0.4%.

Integrating and enhancing the participation of LDCs in the global trading network through full implementation of the duty free and quota free market access by developed and developing countries needs urgent action.

We must also remain committed to a development oriented outcome of the DOHA Round to further support LDCs and their participation in global trade.

The global financial and economic crisis has worsened the debt situation of LDCs. India calls upon the international financial institutions in particular the World Bank and the IMF and the developed countries to provide immediate debt relief and make available concessional finance to spur economic growth and investment in LDCs. We also seek democratisation of the BWIs to allow greater voice and participation by the developing countries.

Climate Change poses a serious challenge to development in these countries. They need immediate financial and technology support to undertake mitigation and adaptation strategies.

Madam Chairperson,

Our engagement strategy with LDCs needs a rethinking. As we prepare for the Fourth UNLDC Conference in Istanbul next year, the issues that I have dilated upon must form the core of the action plan. Mobilisation of adequate resources and expanding the choice of international support measures to fill the huge financing gap for development in LDCs should receive our highest attention.
I call upon the countries to fulfil the commitments made by them to provide 0.15-0.20 % of GNI as ODA to LDCs. Transfer of technology, capacity building and strengthening economic support measures are equally crucial to meeting the needs of LDCs.

Madam Chairperson,

India has been steadfast in its support for the special needs of LDCs. As part of South-South Cooperation, India has shared its development experience and technological resources and expertise with them. India has extended assistance worth US$ 1.2 billion for the reconstruction of Afghanistan and offered concessional loans and grants worth US$ 550 million in 2009 to other LDCs. Indian companies have invested more than US $15 billion in the LDCs in Africa for infrastructure development.

In keeping with our WTO commitment, we have extended duty free tariff preference scheme to all LDCs since April 2008. To stimulate bilateral trade, since 2003, we have offered lines of credit worth US$ 4 billion to LDCs, including US$ 1 billion to Bangladesh.

We have made a contribution of US$ 250,000 to the UN Trust Fund to facilitate the travel of participants to the IV UNLDC Conference in Istanbul. We would also be hosting a Ministerial Preparatory event in New Delhi early next year for the Conference where we would be inviting one Minister and the Permanent Representative in New York from all the LDCs.

Madam Chairperson,

The inherent geographical difficulties of landlocked developing countries have placed them at a distinct disadvantage as far as international trade and economic linkages are concerned.

The global economic crisis which hit the LLDCs hard has bought to the fore the urgent need for these countries to transform their economies, broaden their productive base, build resilience to external shocks and achieve higher sustainable economic growth.

The Almaty Programme of Action has resulted in a clear acknowledgement of the special needs and problems of landlocked developing countries, including the need for sustained international support to address them. Equally important is the understanding that any effective solution must address the constraints and challenges faced by the transit developing countries that neighbour landlocked developing countries.

We must work to provide efficient transportation and communication services to LLDCs including reliable logistic chain to offset transit and access difficulties and costs. According to UNCTAD, LLDCs, on an average, spent two times more on payment of transport and insurance services for their exports in comparison to other developing countries and three times more than the developed economies.

India has special bilateral cooperation agreements with its landlocked neighbours for easy transit of their goods through India. We accord the highest priority to further strengthening our ties with these countries including through regional initiatives. We will continue to contribute economic and technical support to their development efforts as well as of other landlocked and transit developing countries, as part of South-South cooperation.

We would also urge cooperation for meeting special transit requirements of landlocked regions within a country, which due to geography or political boundaries, have similar difficulties in accessing international markets as LLDCs.

Madam Chairperson,

India, as always, remains fully committed to strengthening its partnership with LDCs and LLDCs.

Thank you.
702. Statement by Ambassador Hamid Ali Rao, Permanent Representative of India to the Conference on Disarmament, Geneva, at the First Committee Thematic Debate on Conventional Weapons, at the UNGA.

Before I make some remarks on this theme in my national capacity, I wish to speak in my capacity as President of the Third Conference of the High Contracting Parties to the CCW Protocol V on Explosive Remnants of War held in Geneva last year. Paragraph 30 of the Final Document (CCW/P.V/CONF/2009/9) of the Conference states in the context of the goal of universality of Protocol V that "the Conference requested the President to consider reporting to the sixty-fifth session of the United Nations General Assembly on his endeavours." I therefore take the floor first to discharge the responsibility given to me by the Third Conference.

2. Mr. Chairman, on the universalization of Protocol V, I am pleased to inform you that the number of High Contracting Parties to Protocol V has increased from 61 countries at the time of the Third Conference last year to 69 States parties this year. I would like to congratulate the 8 new States parties to CCW Protocol V, that are: Belgium, which acceded to Protocol V on 25 January 2010, China on 10 June 2010, Cyprus on 11 March 2010, Gabon on 22 September 2010, Honduras on 16 August 2010, Italy on 11 February 2010, Qatar on 16 November 2009, and Saudi Arabia on 8 January 2010.

3. Universalization will continue to be a priority in the coming year as well. The Third Conference also called on the High Contracting Parties to Protocol V to promote wider adherence to Protocol V in their respective regions, pursuant to Actions 2 to 5 of the Plan of Action to Promote the Universality of the Convention and its annexed Protocols as adopted by the Third Review Conference.

4. Aside from universalization, another pillar of Protocol V is implementation. The First Conference in 2007 established an informal mechanism of Meetings of experts to focus on a wide range of issues. The work of the Coordinators responsible for leading the discussions on those issues has been very significant in this process. I would like to express my gratitude to the five Coordinators and Friend of the Coordinator, who have led the discussions during the Meeting of Experts held in Geneva on 22 to 24 April 2009. They have indeed helped us advance our understanding on the various aspects of the Protocol’s implementation, notably on clearance, removal or destruction of explosive remnants of war; Victim assistance; Cooperation and assistance, and Requests for assistance; Recording, retaining and transmission of information; National reporting; as well as Generic preventive measures.

5. In his message to the Third Conference, the Secretary-General of the United Nations asserted that the States parties had made a good start, but more was needed. He encouraged the States Parties to agree on strong practical steps to assist victims of explosive remnants of war. He urged that the States parties should give even more support to the clearance, removal and destruction of unexploded ordnance, as well as to establish a culture of information-sharing, in particular to collect and record information despite the obstacles posed by battlefield dynamics. Indeed, all these efforts would mean mobilizing the necessary resources to enhance the Protocol’s implementation.

6. Mr. Chairman, explosive remnants of war are generated by every armed conflict. They kill and maim long after the end of hostilities. They are deadly hazards that must be eliminated. CCW Protocol V on Explosive Remnants of War is an invaluable tool toward that end. It provides a flexible and stable framework for addressing the horrendous humanitarian and developmental impacts of ERW. The Third Conference last year achieved much progress on the substantive issues under Protocol V, which would I am sure be continued under my successor, Ambassador Peter Richard Woolcott of Australia as President-designate of the Fourth Conference of the High Contracting Parties to CCW Protocol V, which will be held in Geneva on the 22nd and 23rd of November this year. I would like to pledge our full support to him. I would also like to convey India’s support to the two Vice-Presidents designate: the representatives of Pakistan and Slovakia.

7. Mr. Chairman, allow me now to say a few words in my national capacity. India believes that global measures on conventional arms control contribute significantly to international peace, security and development as well as to the goal of general and complete disarmament. As a State Party to the Convention on Certain Conventional Weapons (CCW) and all its five protocols, including the Amended Protocol-II on APLs, India attaches particular importance to carrying forward the CCW process, which offers a unique forum for progressive controls over certain categories of weapons through international consensus building and cooperation.

8. India has always exercised the highest degree of responsibility in conventional arms transfers. We have contributed regularly to the UN Register of Conventional Arms transfers since its inception in 1994 and have participated actively in deliberations in the UN Disarmament Commission and elsewhere on conventional arms transfers.

9. India’s security interests have been affected by illicit and irresponsible transfers, especially of small arms, light weapons and explosives. Illicit trade in conventional arms is a major factor in armed violence by organized criminals and by terrorists. Therefore priority must be given to combating and eliminating the illicit trade in such arms. This implies full and effective implementation of existing obligations of Member States, in particular those flowing from the UN Programme of Action (UN PoA) on Small Arms and Light Weapons on strict national control over production, adequate marking, international cooperation in tracing of illicit arms, effective management of stockpiles, exports controls and their strict enforcement.

10. India has participated actively in discussions in the GGE, the Open Ended Working Group and the first Prep Com on the proposed Arms Trade Treaty. We believe that a legally binding instrument establishing international standards for the import, export and transfer of conventional arms should contribute tangibly to preventing, combating and eliminating the illicit trade in conventional arms. The provisions under the UN Charter for self-defence imply that states enjoy the right to engage in trade of arms, including export to another country. The exercise of this right has to be in accordance with relevant international obligations.

11. In India’s view, establishing and exercising control over trade in conventional arms is a matter of national responsibility which states should discharge on the basis of their obligations under both national and international law and in the light of their legitimate security and foreign policy concerns. Our discussions underline the continuing technical and political difficulties involved in seeking to construct a single unified instrument to govern all conventional arms transfers. We believe that a step by step, pragmatic, realistic and consensus driven approach would enhance the prospects of an instrument of universal acceptance.

12. India supports the vision of a world free of the threat of landmines where individuals and communities live in a safe environment conducive to development and where mine survivors are fully integrated into their societies. Since 1997, India has discontinued the production of non-detectable anti-personal landmines and observed a moratorium on their transfer. We are contributing to international de-mining and rehabilitation efforts. We support the approach enshrined in Amended Protocol II of the CCW which addresses the legitimate defence requirements of states with long borders. However, we are fully committed to the eventual elimination of anti-personnel landmines. The availability of militarily effective alternative technologies that can perform cost effectively the defensive function of APLs will facilitate the achievement of this goal. India has been participating as an Observer in the meetings of the Ottawa Convention since the Review Conference held in November 2004 in Nairobi. We would be participating as an observer in the forthcoming meeting of the State Parties in Geneva.

13. India also remains engaged in negotiations on a Protocol under the CCW on Cluster Munitions. We share the international community's concerns about the humanitarian impact of the irresponsible use of cluster munitions. We believe that the use of cluster munitions is legitimate if it is in accordance with international humanitarian law. Accordingly we support the negotiation of an instrument in the CCW that strikes a balance between military and humanitarian concerns. We welcome the progress that has been made by the GGE on negotiating a draft text and look forward to concluding these negotiations so that we can add another edifice to the CCW framework.

I thank you.

Mr. Chairman,

We thank the Secretary General for his reports on this agenda item, "Promotion and Protection of Human Rights".

Mr. Chairman,

It does not need repeating that human Rights are inalienable rights afforded to every person in this world. The importance of human rights can be understood from the meaning of the word "inalienable" which means - "absolute, sacred and incapable of being surrendered". Thus the significance of the national, regional and international efforts to promote and protect these rights cannot be overstated. These rights are also the cornerstone of the Charter of the United Nations. We appreciate the institutionalization of these rights within the UN system through the establishment of the Human Rights Council and the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR).

Mr. Chairman,

The mission of the promotion and protection of human rights within the United Nations was put on a firm footing with the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) in 1948. In the UDHR we recognized that the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world. This was further reinforced by the development of a series of international human rights instruments in a short period of sixty years, with the most recent addition being the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities in 2007.
This Convention reminds us that human rights are not only the civil and political rights that the world media tends to focus on. A comprehensive debate on human rights is only possible if we understand the importance of economic, social and cultural rights, including the right to development and their inter-linkage with civil and political rights.

Mr. Chairman,

The multiplicity of the various treaty bodies had imposed several constraints on the effective and timely submission of the country reports. In this regard, we welcome the streamlining of the reporting process by a revised harmonization of the guidelines, including a common core document and treaty specific documents. This has not only reduced the element of duplication, but also has preserved scarce resources by maintaining uniform standards. We welcome the efforts made by the OHCHR in providing support, when requested, to States in developing countries to submit these reports.

This harmonization has also assisted the Committees of the Treaty Bodies to make assessments and practical recommendations. We appreciate these recommendations and acknowledge the impact they have on the strengthening of domestic legal regimes. However, in this context, it is important to reiterate that treaty bodies must give due credence to development, democracy and human rights as interrelated issues, in order to fully implement the goals of promoting and protecting fundamental freedoms and human rights.

We would also like to reiterate our support to the treaty bodies in the performance of their functions, and would continue to endeavour to fulfil our reporting obligations under the various treaty bodies. In fact, last week our “exceptional report” to the treaty body, the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), was examined by the Committee.

Mr. Chairman,

We have concerns about the delay in the examination of country reports by the treaty bodies. We support every initiative to speed up the process, including holding additional meetings to optimize the number of reports that the treaty bodies can consider. We also urge the OHCHR to take all necessary measures to deal with the existing backlog of country reports.
The treaty bodies play an extremely important role in upholding human rights and democratic values in various developing countries. We reiterate our faith in the independence of the treaty bodies and hope that they will continue to execute their tasks in an objective manner rather than subjectively.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me also draw your attention to the Universal Periodic Review (UPR) process, which has been acknowledged as one of the most important mechanisms of the field of human rights. Although the UPR process is only 4 years old, its successes have been commendable and all States, regardless of their size or development, will be "UPR-ised" by next year. We commend the effort that has been made by all the participating States to make this process a success, as also the support it has received from OHCHR and civil society. We consider the UPR to be a positive, indeed a unique, mechanism that enhances our commitment to making a genuine difference to the improvement of human rights on the ground.

We agree with the High Commissioner of Human Rights, when she mentioned in her report about the complementarity of the UPR with other human rights mechanisms. This complementarity is confirmed by the fact that many of the UPR recommendations formulated so far have been guided by the observations, recommendations and conclusions of human rights treaty bodies, special procedures and the reports of OHCHR.

Mr. Chairman,

As a founder member of the United Nations, and as a liberal, secular democracy, India attaches considerable importance to the promotion and protection of human rights. India is proud of its achievements in nurturing a diverse, multi-religious and multi-faceted society. India straddles all divides of ethnicity, religion, and language through its pluralist, moderate and democratic political culture.

We are perhaps the world's largest representative democracy and pride ourselves in a parliamentary system whose representatives are elected by more than 700 million registered voters. Our democratic values are reflected in our strong belief in principles of freedom of speech and expression, and of the dignity of labor. With our Constitutional guarantees, impartial judiciary, a progressive Parliament, a free and vibrant media, and a thriving civil society with a well established NGO community, India continues in her unflagging endeavour to promote and protect the fundamental freedom and human rights of all our citizens.

We will continue to play our part and contribute to the realization of the ideas enshrined in the International Bill of Human Rights. We attach the highest importance to the work of the human rights institutions, including Treaty Bodies, and will continue to actively participate in them and contribute to their effective functioning both at the official level and through the nomination of experts as members of these bodies. Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to express India’s firm commitment to all the national, regional and multilateral human rights mechanisms and to the promotion and protection of all human rights for all.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

New York, October 20, 2010.

Madam Chairperson,

The agenda for today’s discussion - “Globalization and Interdependence" - occupies a pivotal place in global public discourse.

India aligns itself with the statement made by Yemen on behalf of G-77
The phenomenon of globalization is an all pervading one. The interdependence between nations has increased manifold. It is hard to imagine today that an individual or a nation can be isolated from the influence of any process or development taking place in any part of the globe.

Globalization as a socio-economic system has given us a common destiny. We are in a world where we act together, succeed together and fail together.

Globalization has brought immense benefits to the people of this world. In India, it has created new opportunities and prosperity for all sections of our society. This we have achieved through the strategy of inclusive growth. We have also ensured that all sections of our society are heard and convinced of the benefits of our policies before we implement them.

It is our understanding that liberalization of economy has to be accompanied by purposeful state intervention to empower the weak and the marginalized to enable them benefit from economic growth and prosperity.

India has undertaken massive social protection programmes such as the Mahatma Gandhi Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme, National Rural Health Mission, Education for All programme, Bharat Nirman Programme, Urban Infrastructure Renewal Programme to name a few, in its effort to ensure inclusive growth. Our development strategy has succeeded. It has helped us withstand the impact of the global crises.

Madam Chairperson,

Now coming to the downside of globalization, we all clearly understand that its benefits are unevenly shared and while it has created wealth and opportunities, it has also brought in a high degree of instability and insecurity in our lives. The global financial and economic crisis is a manifestation of globalization at its worst.

It has also created economic disparity, poverty and hunger. On the one hand wealth of the world is increasing immensely, technology is advancing but on the other hand, millions of people are facing the pangs of hunger in different parts of the world. In spite of best efforts of the United Nations, the Millennium Development Goal of achieving poverty reduction is not on track.
Our world has more than enough for everybody but lack of social justice and corruption has created an unfortunate and vast multitude of hungry people.

Great Indian leader of present century Mahatma Gandhi gave the concept of ANTODYA. Those who are left behind should be brought forward on priority.

A great national poet of India has said:

_Shanti nahin tab tak, jab tak bhaag na sab ka sum ho,
Nahin kisi ko bahut adhik ho, nahin kisi ko kum ho!_
(There cannot be peace in this world until equitable share is given to all. No one should have too much and none too less.)

Promotion of good governance and eradicating corruption are critical challenges to our continued efforts to fight poverty. In this respect, the United Nations has done a commendable work by passing UN Convention Against Corruption. We heartily congratulate the UN for this achievement.

We urge upon the world assembly to persuade and if necessary to pressurize the tax haven countries not to allow illicit flows to be deposited in their banks. UN should force these countries to give back such money to the countries of origin.

In our enthusiasm for enhanced flows of capital, goods and services, technology and people and its attendant benefits, we did not pay adequate attention to develop global systems to protect us from the adverse influence of global shocks. The developing countries were hit the hardest by the impact of the financial, food and energy crises.

Madam Chairperson,

India believes that the UN, given its legitimacy and universality, has a unique and central role to play in developing an inclusive global governance structure. In this regard we welcome the theme chosen by the President of the General Assembly for the 65th GA - "Reaffirming the Central Role of the United Nations in Global Governance"- and he has our full support in this endeavour.
India strongly supports voice and participation reform of the Bretton Woods Institutions to allow greater say for developing countries in framing international policies that impact them.

Madam Chairperson,

The new global order that we envision to create must give priority to developing countries especially the LDCs, LLDCs, SIDS and countries in Africa who represent the most vulnerable segment of the international community today.

Clearly what is required is enhanced policy space for developing countries through flexibility in international regimes so that they can choose the correct policy tools in the context of their specific development challenges. They must be allowed to pursue counter-cyclical macroeconomic policies as well as develop strategies that promote inclusive growth.

In the area of trade, agricultural policies of the developing countries are severely affected by the massive subsidies given by developed countries. Developing countries, in spite, of existing international trade laws face practical barriers in the form of unfavorable market access regimes and non-trade barriers.

In the area of technology access, critical technologies in the area of public health and climate change remain inaccessible and unaffordable to them due to the limitations of the Intellectual Property Rights regime.

We must work together to rectify the situation. I am hopeful that the Doha Round would be able to address many of the issues that I have highlighted and which are the core concerns of developing countries.

Madam Chairperson,

India remains committed to the principle of Antodaya of Mahatma Gandhi in removing poverty and hunger and fighting corruption to ensure a fair, just and equitable system for all in our country. Let us all try. I conclude with the historical words of President John F. Kennedy "Even one man can make a difference and every man should try".

I thank you.

♦ ♦ ♦ ♦ ♦
Mr. President,

Allow me to begin by reaffirming India's conviction in your leadership of the 65th UN General Assembly.

I also take this opportunity to warmly thank Member States for electing India as a member of the UN Security Council for the term 2011-12.

India aligns itself with the statement delivered by Yemen on behalf of G-77. India welcomes the theme you have chosen for the current General Assembly—"Reaffirming the central role of the United Nations in global governance".

A stronger United Nations, reflective of contemporary realities is, indeed, the need of the hour.

This would ensure that the imperatives of maintaining international peace and security are addressed and there is an integrated and coordinated follow up of the UN development agenda.

The United Nations conferences and summits held since the 1990s have generated an unprecedented global consensus on a shared vision of development.

This common understanding was emphatically reiterated at the high level events on MDGs, Mauritius Strategy for Implementation and biodiversity held in September 2010 in New York.

The MDG Declaration clearly articulated that allocation of resources, developing appropriate national and international policies and integrated follow up and implementation are an absolute imperative for the realization of our cherished millennium goals by 2015.

Interlinkages and overlaps between the various UN development summits and conferences are strong.

The Mauritius Strategy for Implementation would derive immense benefits and strength from a comprehensive, ambitious and equitable outcome of the Climate Change negotiations.

Similarly, the Conference of Parties of the Convention on Biological Diversity underway in Nagoya, Japan must fully address the various social and economic development challenges along with its core environmental concerns so as to maximize from the global action to protect biodiversity loss.

Mr. President,

Multiple UN conferences and summits focused on attainment of Internationally Agreed Development Goals must have a seamless, holistic and integrated working relationship with each other.

We must work for developing work models that ensure synergetic resource flows, coordinated assessment and planning and a holistic approach to our global development programmes. In this context, India sees the creation of UN Women as an important step toward an integrated approach to development within the UN.

The strengthened interaction and institutional linkages between the ECOSOC and the Peace Building Commission are also equally encouraging.

Our successful follow up efforts on pivotal Conferences having significant bearing on global development goals such as the Monterrey Consensus and the June 2009 UN Conference on Global Financial and Economic crisis deserve special mention. We must sustain these efforts.

It is, however, important to remember that no one size fits all and it is imperative that national priorities of countries always have primacy in the pursuance of the development agenda by UN bodies.
Mr. President,

India fully realizes the importance of a strong global partnership supported by international and national development strategies on trade, debt, investment, technology transfer, food security, energy access, climate change and host of other issues to create an environment conducive to development.

India will push for an ambitious, comprehensive and equitable outcome at the Climate Change negotiations; one that is based on the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

We also look forward to a development oriented outcome of the DOHA Round.

To ensure that international policies are pro-development, concerns of developing countries in the formulation and implementation of these policies must be effectively taken on board.

Unfortunately, current institutional structures do not permit this, even though developing countries are the most affected ones.

The economic crisis highlighted the grave imbalance in the structures of global governance, including on the economic side. India, along with fellow developing countries, has been in the forefront to demand a greater voice in the Bretton Woods Institutions.

In order to make this process as inclusive as possible, the United Nations, with its unique position has a key role. But, as I mentioned earlier, it needs urgent reform. And, no-where is this more needed in the UN than in the Security Council, which must be expanded in both the permanent and non-permanent categories as is the desire of an overwhelming majority of UN Member-States.

I am glad that the 64th UN General Assembly decided that the text based negotiations must be immediately taken up in the 65th session. It is important that these negotiations are progressed on an urgent basis.

The United Nations system also cannot be strengthened without revitalizing the General Assembly. Here too I am glad that in the resolution on this subject adopted in the 64th session, for the first time in several years, there was some progress.
Mr. President,

The Economic and Social Council has a crucial role in fostering a comprehensive development agenda of the United Nations through an integrated and coordinated implementation of its commitments.

The Council has an acknowledged role as a principal body for coordination, policy review, policy dialogue and recommendations on issues of economic and social development.

It is satisfying that the Annual Ministerial Review and the Development Cooperation Forum of the Economic and Social Council have become important events to review efforts to achieve the Internationally Agreed Development Goals including MDGs.

The July 2010 ECOSOC session focused on promoting greater coherence between policy and development goals, and making development partnership more participatory and transparent.

Over the years, ECOSOC has played an important role in advancing a holistic and coordinated approach to global economic and social development taking into account the inter-relatedness of the different goals and targets of major UN conferences.

We must work to make ECOSOC even more meaningful than what was originally envisaged by the UN Charter and subsequently strengthened by the various UN resolutions, particularly resolution 61/16.

Mr. President,

My delegation looks forward to your proposals to strengthen the centrality of the UN system in global governance and its development role. You can count on our express support in this regard.

I thank you.
Madam Chairperson,

It is customary for a delegate at these occasions to say how honoured and privileged he is to participate in this discussion on “Questions relating to information”. But in my case the honour and privilege are particularly meaningful, since the successful working of the Department of Public Information (DPI) is very special to me. As a former head of DPI for nearly six years, and as Under Secretary-General for Communications and Public Information till 2007, I enjoyed being on the other side, as it were. Now that I am back as a member of the Indian delegation, I am very happy to have this opportunity to address some of the same issues on behalf of my Government.

DPI is the public voice of the United Nations and plays a very important role in promoting an awareness of the indispensable role of the UN in the global affairs. I would like to commend DPI for its excellent work in this regard. We welcome the reports of the Secretary-General and of the Committee on Information, which are before us.

I would also like to express my delegation’s appreciation to my distinguished successor, Mr. Kiyo Akasaka, Under-Secretary-General for Communications and Public Information, under whose leadership DPI has gone from strength to strength, and to pay tribute to the often unsung men and women of the DPI staff, whose tireless efforts are not always given the recognition and applause they deserve.

Madam Chairperson,

The dissemination of information and the promotion of awareness are fundamental to the success of the United Nations. The general public forms impressions about the workings of the UN from the mass media and from opinion leaders in their own countries, and it is in the UN’s interests to influence their perceptions. People who are interested in knowing about the policies and programmes of the Organization should be able to receive information very easily in a medium they have access to. Towards this end, the organization must develop innovative forms of contemporary communication, along with continued use of what one might call conventional media, to reach out to the widest possible audiences.

In India, freedom of speech and expression are among the six fundamental rights recognized and guaranteed by the Constitution of India. Freedom of the press is therefore an article of faith in our country, and the media's role in public education is fundamental to our political culture. At a time when so many newspapers and magazines are closing down in other developed democracies, unable to sustain themselves in today's Internet era, India remains one of the very few countries in the world where every kind of media - radio, television, internet, and print -- is growing.

My Government, led by the United Progressive Alliance, has enacted a landmark act on the "Right to Information" in the year 2005. Under the RTI, as it is popularly called given our national preference for acronyms, citizens can seek information from a government department or indeed any government body concerned, on any matter related to governance - and the government machinery has to answer within 30 days. This has become a revolutionary tool for the common citizen to access information and is transforming the governance of my country.

Madam Chairperson,

The Indian experience shows how important is the role of information in the life of the common citizen. It is precisely this aspect to which DPI should give more priority, in order to make information as accessible as possible to the largest number of users, making it an effective tool connecting the UN and the peoples of the world. There is an understandable tendency to be responsive to the concerns of the press-room here in New York, and that is certainly necessary, but it is equally essential to reach out to people in the information-starved corners of Africa, Asia or Latin America. Populations in developing countries continue to be deprived of the benefits of the information revolution and need to benefit from all aspects of the information and knowledge economy.

We believe that this is achievable with the use of the widest possible spectrum of technologies. This includes the use of modern technologies, such as webcasts and podcasts, as well of cost-effective and more traditional forms of communication, like the radio and print media, which remain of great importance in reaching out to people in parts of the developing world in their own languages. As India strongly supports a world in which the language one is born to speak should not handicap a person in the quest for information, it is essential to enhance DPI’s outreach in local languages. We appreciate the efforts of DPI to produce information in roughly 80 local languages, including radio programmes in three languages of my own country, Bengali, Hindi and Urdu.

The role of UN Information Centres (UNICs) in disseminating information about the activities of the United Nations, especially in developing countries, is critical. We encourage DPI to consult closely with host countries, other countries served by these Information Centers, as well as the concerned region, in its efforts to get the most out of the UNICs. As Internet penetration grows in developing countries, the creation of websites in local languages would greatly help in creating interest among local populations in the UN and its work. Adequate budgetary resources must be assigned to the UNICs so that they are able to pursue further initiatives.

The rise of social media, particularly Twitter and Facebook, provides an opportunity to the Department to inform and engage different audiences, particularly young people, in the work of the United Nations. India’s own Ministry of External Affairs and several other Government Departments have created Twitter and Facebook pages and I would urge DPI to fully explore the potential these represent. India, as a developing country that is acquiring a cutting edge in information and communication technology, has always encouraged the combination of traditional means of information along with modern technologies such as the use of social networking sites.
I am sure you would agree with me that information needs to be conveyed in a manner that makes it interesting and enjoyable for the audience at which it is aimed.

Madam Chairperson,

When I left the United Nations three and a half years ago, we were all uncertain about the scale, timing and implications of the Capital Master Plan. The conference room we occupy today, and the unobtrusive but very evident activity all around us, reflect the pace and ingenuity of its progress. We would, however, request the Departments of Public Information and Management to ensure that there is the minimal possible disruption to the guided tours and exhibits which are, to so many thousands each year, the face of the United Nations. We should not allow these activities to be suspended, for to stop and then resume them later will make it difficult to win the attention of schoolchildren, general visitors and tourists who see this as a vital part of their New York and, indeed, international experience.

We salute the Secretary-General for giving formal shape to the programmes of academic initiative and partnership commenced six years ago. The United Nations Academic Impact has the potential to command a true revolution in the manner in which scholars, university administrators and students place the work they are doing in the context of the greater human cause that the United Nations serves. It is a particular source of pride for my delegation that, after the United States, India has the largest number among the more than four hundred institutions that are already part of the Impact. The initiative is already working with university students in our country, and the New Delhi UNIC, on a conference addressing the MDGs, in which I am looking forward to taking part.

The Holocaust United Nations Outreach programme, which I was privileged to initiate, remains a beacon of remembrance and promise. The global, inclusive and non-political manner in which it has developed remains an example to other programmes of outreach which the General Assembly has mandated and which must be given resources commensurate with that expectation. I refer in particular to the programmes commemorating the transatlantic slave trade and the genocide in Rwanda. In parallel, we note with satisfaction the continued role of DPI in maintaining awareness of the long-pending Question of Palestine. The fulfillment of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people remains of great importance to my country. As we all know, DPI's strategic focus is meant particularly to lie in the areas of peace and security, development and human rights. My delegation is of the view that while DPI is doing a good job with the resources at its disposal, its needs to highlight issues that affect large sections of global civil society, notably the MDGs, disarmament, climate change, the UN's humanitarian efforts, and peacekeeping, in all of which my country is an active and committed contributor.

On Peacekeeping, we would like to see DPI, DPKO and DFS working closely in highlighting peacekeeping success stories and providing accurate, impartial and timely information on the regular activities of UN peacekeepers, as also on the exceptional work that they often do that goes beyond the call of duty and the routine keeping of the peace. Many developing countries send their soldiers out to the frontlines of peace-keeping operations in distant countries and remote regions to which their own media may not be able to manage or afford access. DPI could perform a signal service by facilitating, at its own expense, itinerant journalist seminars to such operations that would bring to the attention of the world, and particularly of the populations of troop contributing countries, stories of the goodwill, commitment and extraordinary courage of the men and women who represent the human face of UN peacekeeping. This would also help the UN to maintain the public support for peacekeeping that is vital to the continuation of this indispensable UN activity.

In conclusion, Madam Chairperson, I would like to assure you and the Secretary-General of India's full support in your efforts to make DPI more effective than ever.

Thank you, Madam Chairperson.

✨ ✨ ✨ ✨ ✨
Mr. Chairman,

I am very pleased to welcome you and the facilitator, Ms. Maria Telalian here in New York to chair the meeting of the Working Group of the Ad Hoc Committee to facilitate the CCIT process move forward. We greatly appreciate your untiring efforts towards the finalization of the draft Comprehensive Convention against International Terrorism (CCIT). We also congratulate other members of the bureau on their election. I assure you of India's full cooperation and support in all your efforts.

Mr. Chairman,

The Ad Hoc Committee in April 2010 generated good momentum highlighting the urgent need for adoption of the draft CCIT during 65th session of the UNGA. During the General Debate this year many delegations again reiterated their support for successful and early conclusion of the draft CCIT.

The Secretary General in paragraph 139 of his report on the review of the Global Counter Terrorism Strategy has very aptly pointed out that, and I quote, "the comprehensiveness of implementing the Strategy will not be complete without the conclusion of the comprehensive convention on international terrorism. As committed in the Strategy, Member States should make every effort to reach an agreement on the text and conclude the convention in order to unite behind the global counter-terrorism efforts".

The recent Security Council Presidential statement also encourages Member States to make every effort to conclude the negotiations of the draft Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism.

Mr. Chairman,
The negotiations over the years have by and large got a near full text of the draft Convention with the general agreement. There are just a few outstanding issues in article 18 that need be sorted out and I am hopeful that our collective wisdom will spare no efforts to achieve this objective.

Mr. Chairman,

We are here today to carry out a mandate that has been reminded to us by our leaders in different fora, by the General Assembly, and by the United Nations leadership repeatedly.

We are here not to repeat the rhetoric. We are also not here to merely remind ourselves about the need for early finalization and conclusion of the draft CCIT. We are here to take action and move forward. We should sort out any differences that exist between us on the outstanding issues.

Mr. Chairman,

We all know that this Ad Hoc Committee cannot provide solutions to problems arising out of political situations. The political solutions have to be explored through political process. We are here to finalize and conclude a law enforcement instrument that will supplement and strengthen the existing global framework of anti-terrorism conventions and provide to international community another important tool in its fight against terrorism.

Mr. Chairman,

In the context of outstanding issues, we see that a broad consensus exists amongst delegations on the following basic principles;

1. That international terrorism cannot be tolerated in any form or manifestation.

2. That we need CCIT as law enforcement instrument that should strengthen the existing framework of global anti-terrorism conventions.

3. That the convention should not affect the other rights, obligations and responsibilities, inter-alia, of peoples under international law, Charter of the United Nations and international humanitarian law.
4. That the military forces of a State should remain outside the scope of the convention, while not providing impunity for the wrongs, if any, committed by such forces.

5. That the convention should not, in any manner, affect the sanctity of the regime applicable in armed conflict under international humanitarian law and what is legal under international humanitarian law shall remain legal.

6. That the convention cannot make lawful, otherwise unlawful acts.

Mr. Chairman,

We have already lost invaluable time in taking concrete decisions on this very important issue. No country is immune from terrorism. Every now and then, one or the other country, whether developed or developing, rich or poor, is brutally targeted by terrorists. It is high time to show solidarity and take collective global action against international terrorism and to send a clear message to terrorists that international community is united in its resolve that terrorism cannot be tolerated in any form or manifestations.

Mr. Chairman,

From 2002 we have come a long way. In 2007 the facilitator tried to come up with a compromise package text reflecting the delicate balance that could be accepted by all delegations. In view of my delegation the facilitator's 2007 package proposal presents a viable, delicately balanced compromise text and like many other delegations, and for the sake of compromise, we are also inclined to go along with that package. It is imperative that this Committee must also address any legitimate concerns of any delegation that is not yet addressed under the facilitator's 2007 package proposal.

In the April 2010 session of the Ad Hoc Committee, the facilitator further explained her package proposal and suggested a way out to reach agreement on the text of the draft Convention. We were encouraged to see that delegations were inclined to consider common understanding on the facilitators' package proposal.
We strongly urge delegations that still have any legitimate issue left unaddressed in the facilitator's 2007 package proposal to come forward and discuss it in an open, honest and transparent manner.

The proposal suggested by Switzerland on the adoption of CCIT and thereafter convening the high level conference on international terrorism is a good one and we would like to engage ourselves constructively with Swiss delegation in working out the modalities of its implementation.

We look forward to you, Mr. Chairman, for your leadership, ingenuity and guidance during the present session of the Working Group so that a text of the convention can be recommended for adoption during this session of the General Assembly.

I thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

708. Statement by Dr. Mehboob Beg, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 131 - Improving the Financial Situation of the United Nations at the Fifth Committee of UNGA.

New York, October 21, 2010.

Mr. Chairman,

As my delegation is taking the floor for the first time this session, let me at the outset congratulate you on your election as Chairman of the Bureau of the Fifth Committee. We also extend our felicitation to other members of the Bureau on their election.

We thank Ms. Angela Kane, Under Secretary-General for Management, for her presentation last week on the financial situation of the United Nations.

My delegation aligns itself with the statement delivered by Yemen on behalf of the Group of 77 and China.

Mr. Chairman,

India has consistently upheld that full, timely, and unconditional payment of assessed contributions by Member States is the fundamental duty of every member-state enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations. The efficient and effective delivery of organizational mandates decided by member-states goes hand in hand with the provision of adequate and timely resources to the Secretariat for the fulfillment of entrusted tasks. They are two sides of the same coin, and must be treated as such.

We are of course conscious and sensitive to the situation of those member-states that are not in a position to pay their assessed contributions due to circumstances beyond their control. We believe that sympathetic consideration is merited in such cases.

While we have noted the marginal drop in unpaid assessments as of October 2010 for the regular budget and the tribunals, the reality is that unpaid assessments continue to remain at unacceptably high levels. My delegation is particularly concerned about the ballooning of outstanding assessments for peacekeeping operations to US$ 3.2 billion this year from US$ 1.85 billion at the end of last year. As a major troop contributing country, which also has significant contingent-owned equipment deployed with UN peacekeeping operations, we have witnessed with growing concern the exacerbation of this problem over the years. The financial aggregates presented last week indicate the persistence of this negative trend.

While we realize that several variables affect the peacekeeping financial situation including the peacekeeping financial cycle and the varying assessment schedules, the fact remains that 34 per cent of the unpaid assessments are concentrated in just two member-states and another 41 per cent in seven member states, several of whom are permanent members of the Security Council.

Mr. Chairman,

The delay in receipt of contributions from Member States has an adverse impact on the Secretariat’s ability to regularly reimburse payments to troop and equipment contributors of peacekeeping operations. The situation arising from delayed payments, sometimes non-payment as in a few closed peacekeeping missions, of troop costs and contingent-owned equipment reimbursements, is untenable in the long run and must be addressed as a matter of priority.
We draw some encouragement from the fact that the debt owed to member states in peacekeeping is projected to decline to US$ 430 million at the end of this year from US$ 775 million last year. While this is a marked decline, it is still considerably high by any yardstick.

India is among those who are owed significant sums towards troop and COE reimbursements. Nevertheless, we have continued to support the United Nations, and are presently one of the largest troop and equipment contributors. India’s contribution to UN peacekeeping is not a mercantilist venture. It is born out of our faith and conviction in the principle and purposes of the UN Charter.

However, we are accountable to our democratic processes at home and to our people and parliament. We have to explain to our national legislature why the UN is remiss in making payments, and how long this will continue. If the debt situation is left unaddressed, we may run the risk of diminishing legislative and parliamentary support for peacekeeping operations.

Mr. Chairman,

My delegation notes with some satisfaction the improvement in the financial situation with respect to the regular budget and the International Tribunals. We welcome the decrease in unpaid assessed contributions by US$ 43 million for the regular budget and by US$ 13 million for the Tribunals.

We nevertheless remain concerned about the concentration of outstanding assessments in a few member-states which is a recurring issue in all budget categories. Notably, 88 per cent of the unpaid assessment in the regular budget is concentrated in one Member State. Similarly, 68 per cent of the outstanding assessments for the Tribunals are concentrated in one member-state. We hope that this situation would be addressed urgently by the concerned parties.

In concluding, we add our voice in urging all Member States, especially those with the requisite means, to take expeditious action to meet their financial obligations. This is critical from the perspective of ensuring a financially healthy and sound United Nations and one that has zero indebtedness. It is an integral part of our common quest for prudent budgetary and financial management.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman.
Madam Chairperson,

With your permission, I am circulating the full text of my statement as I have to limit the spoken word.

We are two-thirds of the way down in time towards the Millennium Development Goals - but hardly two-thirds of the way down to the achievement of its goals.

In terms of the principal goal of the MDGs, which was the halving of the number of those earning less than $1.25 a day, we should have gone over 15 years from 1.8 billion poor to well under a billion poor. It would appear, however, that the reduction over ten years has been of the order of under half a billion; so, we will have to achieve another half billion in the remaining time - five years or half the time that has already elapsed - for the MDG of 0.9 billion at 2000 population levels to be reached by 2015. In fact, the task is even more daunting because the global population has soared and so has the absolute number of those to be rescued from poverty if the number of poor is to be halved by 2015. This is the key challenge we have to address as we move into the last lap of our race towards the Millennium Development Goals. In other words, yes, of course, there has been progress but we need very much more progress for the MDGs to retain their credibility among the poor of our lands. We acknowledge that India has a special responsibility in this regard for we and our South Asian neighbours are home to the largest number of the poor in the world.

Thus far, and into the foreseeable future, our principal instrument of poverty alleviation has been and will remain the stepping up of the rate of growth of our Gross Domestic Product (GDP). In this, we in India have been singularly successful. Our annual GDP growth rate steadily rose to 9.4% in 2007 before the global economic crisis the following year adversely impacted on our impressive growth rates. Yet, we weathered the crisis so well that we never fell much below 6%-7% and are now well on the way to returning to the 9% growth trajectory and are, indeed, confident that we will attain double-digit growth early in the coming decade and perhaps become the fastest growing economy in the world before the decade is out.

Yet, that is not a boast because we are deeply conscious that growth must be accompanied by the improved distribution of income and wealth, and the direct attack on poverty intensified, if growth is to include the people at large - and, in particular, the poor at large. Hence, the overarching objective of our Eleventh Five-Year Plan (2007-2012) has been the goal of "Inclusive Growth". We need, as the world needs, not only an India that prospers but also Indians who prosper. With this in view, we have initiated a series of major tax reforms that have substantially augmented Government revenues and deployed a substantial proportion of these enhanced revenues on social sector and anti-poverty programmes, complemented by special attention to the agriculture and allied activities sector which, in the accelerated growth scenario, have, in relative terms, been lagging behind. Our national goal is an annual average rate of growth of agriculture of at least 4%.

But [Therefore,] in addition to accelerated growth, we have also long recognised - the imperative of inclusive growth. We owe this awareness above all to Mahatma Gandhi, the Father of our Nation, who put before independent India the task of "wiping every tear from every eye" - in other words, not just accelerated growth but, more importantly, inclusive growth. Again, as the Mahatma foresaw, inclusive growth requires inclusive governance. The people cannot be left merely the beneficiaries of Governmental and international largesse. Their involvement in governing themselves, of being active participants in the processes of growth and governance is of the essence in enabling peoples and communities to spring the trap of poverty. The dream of an India where her people are empowered to develop themselves instead of waiting upon the charity and good will of others was given Constitutional sanctity, status, and sanction when Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi initiated over two decades ago the steps that led in 1992 to Parliament amending the Constitution to provide for "institutions of local self-government" as the third tier of governance below the Union and State Governments. If Abraham Lincoln had defined democracy as government of the people, for the people and by the people, our Constitution now aims at development of the people, for the people and by the people: grassroots development through grassroots democracy. In consequence, following several rounds of free and fair elections, supervised by independent State Election Commissions, we now have close to 300,000 institutions of local self-government to which we have elected some 3.2 million representatives. They include 1.2 million women, about 86,000 of whom serve as chairpersons or vice-chairpersons of their respective units. We are proud to inform this distinguished committee and, through you, Madam Chairperson, the entire international community, that there are perhaps more democratically elected women in India alone than in the rest of the world put together in units of local self-government at village, block and district level and in the municipalities and metropolitan corporations of urban India.

Of course, income poverty is only one dimension of poverty. Poverty is multi-dimensional, as the United Nations Development Programme has long recognised in its construction of the Human Development Index. The MDGs themselves, with their focus on not only income but also health, education, the removal of gender bias and several other aspects of the development process are evidence of the increasing sophistication and understanding of poverty in all its diverse dimensions on the part of the international community here represented.

So far, I have been talking mostly of India, the principle justification for which is that nearly half the world's poor live in my country. But we are more than conscious of poverty elsewhere, particularly in the Last Developed, Landlocked and Small Island Developing countries and most of Africa. These countries, badly affected by the global economic crisis for which they hardly responsible, bore the brunt of an estimated 60 million people, slipping back into poverty in 2009 alone, feared to be followed by an equal number this year, a major set back to the global war on poverty. We, therefore, welcome the decision to pay special attention to the development needs of these countries in the coming years. India will be an active and concerned participant in working out strategies to assist these countries to take their due place in the global economic sun. The restoration of economic normalcy in the developed world is, of course, a key requirement for the world to attain the MDGs and, in particular, for these specially disadvantaged nations to move in tandem with growth in the world as a whole.

The coincidence in time between the target period for achieving the Millennium Development Goals and the objectives of the Second Decade for the Eradication of Poverty provide a significant conjunction for promoting an integrated and holistic approach to problems of poverty eradication, now threatened by the simultaneous onset of financial, food and energy crises. The High-Level MDG Review undertaken about a month ago provided the United Nations with an opportunity to address in the totality the measures at national and international level that need to be taken to face up to these crises and return the world economy to the path of universal, accelerated and inclusive growth. There is some cause for satisfaction in the outcome of that High-Level Review. But it falls to this Committee to work out in detail the direction and content of what next needs to be done. India declares its willingness to sincerely cooperate with others, and, indeed, where required, to take the lead itself in working for the greatest good of the largest number in terms of the provision of adequate food, education, shelter and health services, as well as other basic minimum human needs through the empowerment of the poor and the marginalised, and according priority to the political, economic, social, cultural and administrative empowerment of half our population, women who have so long been deprived in all our societies of the opportunity to contribute in full measure to nation-building and poverty eradication in all that diverse dimension.

I mentioned a moment ago that we in the developing world are the hardly responsible for the global economic crisis but large parts of the world have become the principal if unwitting victims of the crisis. This only underlines the extent to which global governance issues are central to globalisation as vehicle of global prosperity. In this context, it is imperative that we look to the framework and institutions of international economic cooperation to see what needs to be done at the international level to pave the way towards the smoother and more rapid achievement of the MDGs.
These institutional measures would include the reform of the Bretton Woods Institutions; an ambitious and comprehensive outcome of the Climate Change negotiations; and a development-oriented outcome of the Doha Round on the multilateral trading system. These would put in place an improved international architecture that provides enhanced policy space to developing countries to pursue their development goals, including, above all, the eradication of poverty.

For decades now the undertaking made by developed countries of meeting the ODA target of 0.7% of Gross National Income has remained a paper commitment, with the honourable exception of some countries. With international cooperation having been inscribed as one of the MDGs, it is imperative that ODA targets be fulfilled at the earliest so that the lack of financial resources for development, especially in specially disadvantaged and least developed countries, be overcome. Equally imperative is the need to undertake the transfer of technology and capacity building in developing countries generally, but least developed and other disadvantaged countries in particular.

We are happy that today India’s development partnership with countries in the South goes beyond technical cooperation. Our annual outlay on concessional lending and grants is over US$ 1 billion, covering countries in our region, in Africa and beyond. In addition, we have extended lines of credit worth more than US$ 5 billion since 2003 to spur growth in developing countries.

We are committed to doing more in the coming years with our partners in the South and stepping up our support to South-South Cooperation, both on the development side as well as in support of humanitarian needs.

The quantum leap in South-South Cooperation has significantly complemented global resources targeted at development agenda, but cannot be a substitute for North-South cooperation.

Thank you.
Madam Chairperson,

On the recommendation of the General Assembly in 1973, the topic "International liability for injurious consequences arising out of acts not prohibited by international law" was included in the programme of work of the International Law Commission in 1978.

In 2001 the Commission completed the draft articles on prevention of transboundary harm from hazardous activities and recommended to the General Assembly the elaboration of a convention on the basis of the draft articles.

In 2006, the Commission completed draft principles on the allocation of loss in the case of transboundary harm arising out of hazardous activities and recommended the Assembly to endorse the draft principles by a resolution and urge States to take national and international action to implement them.

At its sixty-second session, the General Assembly by resolution 62/68 again invited Governments to submit their comments, including on the possible legal form the respective articles and principles may take.

The General Assembly also decided to include in the provisional agenda of its sixty-fifth session the item entitled "Consideration of prevention of transboundary harm from hazardous activities and allocation of loss in the case of such harm".

Madam Chairperson,

My delegation would like to give some comments on the draft articles on the prevention of transboundary harm as well as on the draft principles on the allocation of loss in the case of such harm. Let me first express our sincere appreciation for the work done by the Commission on the draft articles as well as the draft principles which represent progressive development of international law.

In our view, the draft articles on the prevention of transboundary harm provide useful addition to the existing customary law reflected in the Trail Smelter, Corfu Channel and Lake Lanoux cases dealing with the principle of transboundary harm and the ensuing damage from hazardous activities. In our view, the draft articles on prevention are dealt with in a general manner, providing enough flexibility to States to fashion specific liability regimes for particular sectors of activity under their jurisdiction.

Madam Chairperson,

Coming to the draft principles, while we agree with the basic purpose of the draft principles, we have concerns on an expanded definition of "damage" which includes: loss of life or personal injury, loss of or damage to property; loss or damage by impairment of the environment; costs of reasonable measures of reinstatement of the property; and costs of reasonable response measures.

A traditional civil liability regime as the one in our country provides for a definition of damage that includes loss of life, property and loss caused on account of "actual damage" to the environment. We believe that cost of response measures or reinstatement of the environment on account of "impairment of the environment" will come as a stumbling block in our developmental efforts.

In our view these principles should be complementary in nature and not prejudice the regime on state responsibility under international law.

Madam Chairperson,

We support the fundamental premise of the topic that in all situations involving harm arising out of hazardous activities, the primary liability shall be that of the operator. We also believe that operator should establish and maintain financial security and insurance cover to be able to pay for compensation for harm caused to innocent victims. Besides mandatory financial security, supplementary funding mechanisms may be established by the participation of the industry and other stakeholders.
As regards "response measures", we recognise that obligations to notify as well as consultation to mitigate the effects of transboundary harm are recognised in a number of international instruments governing hazardous activities. It may, however, be noted that competent authorities of a State shall have the power under domestic laws to require response measures from the operator towards mitigation/elimination of the damage. Any residual response measure from the State should be supplementary to the operator's liability, based on the capacity of the States to undertake such measures.

Madam Chairperson,

We believe that the draft articles on the prevention of transboundary harm and the draft principles on the allocation of loss in the case of such harm will serve as a useful guide to States in making efforts to adopt legislative, regulatory and administrative measures incorporating relevant principles in their domestic laws and policies.

As to the form of a possible legal regime on the draft articles on prevention and draft principles on allocation of loss, we are of the view that any attempt to codify them in the form of a convention would prove counter-productive. It may not add value to the already achieved progressive development of international law in this field by the ILC. The State practice shows that States prefer sectoral environmental treaties with in-built liability regimes.

Thank you Madam Chairperson.
711. Statement by Mr. Janardan Dwivedi, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 79 - Report of the International Law Commission on the work of its Sixty Second Session [Part - 1, Chap I-IIIIV and XIII] at the Sixth Committee of the UNGA.

New York, October 26, 2010.

Madam Chairperson,

Thank you for giving me the floor. As I am speaking in this Committee for the first time, let me first congratulate you and other members of the bureau on your election. I assure you of full cooperation of my delegation.

Let me join others in offering condolences on the untimely death of Paula Escarameia. She was an active participant in the work of the International Law Commission and made significant contribution to its work. She will be fondly remembered by her colleagues in the Commission as well as in the Sixth Committee as a voice for the integrity of international law and proponent of its core values, particularly as regards human rights and the role of civil society.

We also express our deep sorrow on the passing away of Professor Ian Brownlie, former member of the International Law Commission, in a tragic accident at the beginning of this year. Sir Ian Brownlie made a significant contribution to international law and to the work of the Commission, especially as a Special Rapporteur on the topic of 'effect of armed conflict on treaties'. His untimely death is a great loss to international law.

Madam Chairperson,

I thank the Chairman of the International Law Commission for his lucid and comprehensive presentation of the report on the work of the Commission at its 62nd Session and especially on the detailed discourse on the guidelines. The Commission, at its last session, has made considerable progress in the work of various matters on its agenda, including the identification of possible new topics. We also welcome the new member who has joined the Commission this year, Mr. Huikang Huang of China.
Madam Chairperson,

The rule of law constitutes the essence of the Commission's work. India attaches high importance to the debates and exchange of views between the Commission and Member States in the Sixth Committee and considers that these debates are important tools not only for the progressive development of international law but also for the promotion of the rule of law at the national and international levels.

The Commission has a symbiotic relationship with the International Court of Justice, the highest judicial organ of the United Nations. Time and again, the Court has relied on treaties as binding instruments in themselves and other documents prepared by the Commission as evidence of customary international law. Conversely, the Commission has formulated draft articles on many subjects taking into account the jurisprudence developed through Court's decisions. While the General Assembly has recognized the importance of the draft articles adopted by the Commission on different subjects, such rules have been relied on by national and international courts and tribunals in their work.

Madam Chairperson,

Coming to the topic of reservation to treaties, my delegation would like to congratulate Special Rapporteur Mr. Alain Pellet for his hard work that has led the Commission to provisionally adopt the complete set of draft guidelines with commentaries, constituting the Guide to Practice on Reservation to Treaties. We find his explanation to the guidelines immensely useful. The Draft Guidelines will serve as a comprehensive manual and would provide guidance to States and legal advisers on this subject.

The Commission intends to adopt the final version of the Guide to Practice during its sixty-third session in 2011 taking into consideration the observations of States and international organizations. India will be submitting comments on the guidelines separately as requested by the Commission. However, I would like to make very preliminary comments at this stage on reservations to treaties.

Madam Chairperson,

It may be recalled that quite early in its work on reservation, there was consensus in the Commission that there should be no change in the relevant provisions of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties and that the Guidelines would only serve to elaborate and elucidate those rules. However in dealing with the issue of impermissible reservations the proposed guidelines appear to have gone beyond the provisions of the Vienna Convention, particularly in paragraph 4.5.2 which provides a new concept of a general presumption in the case of an impermissible reservation. In such a case, under the proposed guideline, the reserving State becomes a party to the treaty without the benefit of the reservation made by it unless it clearly indicates that under these circumstances it does not wish to be bound by the treaty in question. We have serious concerns about this concept as it may bring uncertainty to international treaty relations.

On the question of succession to treaties, we note that the guidelines generally follow the 1978 Vienna Convention.

We appreciate the decision to make the edited summary records of the Commission's proceedings (incorporating the corrections of members of the Commission, and editorial changes by the Yearbook editors and in the form prior to typesetting and publication) up to 2004, available on a pilot basis, on the Commission's website. Considering the delay in the publication of the Summary Records, this will be of great assistance to member States and others in following the Commission's work. Further, priority should be accorded to expedite preparation of the summary records of the Commission.

Madam Chairperson,

We also support the Commission's views concerning the question of honoraria, resulting from the adoption by the General Assembly of its resolution 56/272 of 27 March 2002. The decision to discontinue the honoraria especially affects Special Rapporteurs from developing countries, as it compromises support for their research work. The Special Rapporteurs should also be given the opportunity to participate in the Meetings of the Sixth Committee and interact with delegations during the consideration of their topics. This would give them the opportunity to acquire a more comprehensive view of existing positions, to take note of observations made and to begin preparing their reports at an earlier stage.

Thank you, Madam Chairperson.
Mr. Chairman,

It is a great pleasure for me, as a former UN peacekeeping official for more than seven years, to address this Committee today on behalf of India.

My delegation would like to take this opportunity to align itself broadly with the statement made by the Delegation of Morocco on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement and at the outset recognize and applaud the dedication and sacrifices of UN Peacekeepers, both military and civilian.

Mr. Chairman,

Peacekeeping is a flagship activity of the UN and its budget comfortably exceeds the regular budget of the Organization. During the past decade, the Security Council has organized at least four debates, under four different Presidencies, on peacekeeping and on related thematic issues. This has underscored the huge importance of the role that peacekeeping plays in the UN’s efforts toward ensuring peace and security in the world.

As a country that has contributed more than 100,000 peacekeepers to virtually every United Nations peacekeeping operation in the past six decades, we in India are conscious that much has changed since the first peacekeeping mission was launched in 1956. The geopolitical environment in which peacekeeping is conducted today could not be more different from those days. Global capacities, be they economic, political or military, are also distributed in a significantly different pattern. The conflicts that our Peacekeeping Missions address today deal predominantly with intra-state issues rather than the classic role of interposing troops between warring states. The peacekeeping agenda has rightfully acquired new dimensions in the civilian, policing and civic domains. The UN’s initiatives on peacebuilding have also necessitated a relook into the entire enterprise of peacekeeping. The increasing talk today of partnership and capabilities reflects these changes that have occurred and the need for these changes to be accommodated in the global division of labour in the maintenance of international peace and security.

Mr. Chairman,

At present, member states are supposed to get their say in peacekeeping through the Fourth and Fifth Committees. Troop Contributing Countries, in addition, are formally consulted through the triangular meetings convened by the Security Council. The productive deliberations of the last C-34 notwithstanding, my delegation firmly believes in the need for more meaningful consultations with the C-34 and troop contributors in peacekeeping matters. My delegation acknowledges that improvements have been made in the timing of the triangular meetings. We have suggested a number of simple changes to make these meetings more useful and relevant. Predictability in terms of timing and the advance circulation of agendas are two of these measures. The system of consultations must also be extended to cover all stages of the mission cycle.

A perennial issue that has persisted is the need for the mandate and the mission to be better aligned. The drafting and adoption of a credible mission mandate should logically be the starting point of an operation, as noted in the Brahimi Report. So many times in the past, the mandates have been hurried and unrealistic, with overly ambitious timeframes. Too often, as we all know, the financial, human, equipment or logistical resources committed have not been commensurate with the declared objectives. The resultant mismatch risks lives and jeopardizes the prospects for an operation's success.

As a peacekeeping operation gathers momentum, it requires more resources, not less. The military component will have to be supplemented, and not supplanted, by police and other institutions to promote the rule of law and a capacity for development administration, by which we mean the ability to respond to the genuine aspirations of the people beyond the mere maintenance of law and order.
Mr. Chairman, it is pertinent to note that UN operations are essentially in aid of national authorities and national capacities. National authorities usually have a good idea of what they require. The Council and the Secretariat must not just listen more to governments but also listen carefully. My delegation believes that there is no substitute for national capacities. Where there has been a serious breakdown, as is often the case in conflict situations, the UN can help create the conditions where these capacities can be exercised. We believe that support to the national authorities in Security Sector Reform and in the field of primary inputs for socio-economic development is significant for a Mission's success. Security Sector Reform, in particular, needs far greater coordination, cohesiveness and unity of purpose. The training, equipment and working methods of national police and other rule of law institutions must be structured in a manner that is consonant with the wishes of national authorities and not the priorities of donors. In the case of economic development, national authorities, as the experience of the Peacebuilding Commission indicates, are capable of developing strategies and plans. What they need is resources and social investment.

Mr. Chairman,

Peacekeeping, which is the main contribution of the United Nations to the maintenance of international peace and security, has a substantial budget by UN standards, but it amounts to less than 0.5% of worldwide military expenditure. The DRC Mission, with about 18,000 peacekeepers, in effect provides one peacekeeper per 100 square kilometers for a country roughly the size of Western Europe in inhospitable and difficult terrain. These numbers indicate the daunting tasks we have set ourselves to achieve. It is evident, Mr. Chairman, that in relation to the needs, the resources available for peacekeeping are utterly inadequate. An increase in the number of high-quality well-trained troops is the first requirement. Such troops would also require proper equipment and enablers. We would like to see an increase in the deployment of police and rule of law capacities. The current composition of DPKO does not provide the capacity to plan for the nation-building activities that are central to peacebuilding. This capacity requires to be developed and will require a multi-disciplinary approach involving the development pillars of the UN and greater cooperation with countries in the global south.
In other words, Mr. Chairman, DPKO, which -- despite recent changes -- is still an organization driven mainly by the logic of its military operations, will have to transform itself further in the face of these challenges. It will need more policemen and more rule of law and development administration personnel in future. Member states will need to focus on the division of responsibilities between DPKO and UN Country Teams in order to prevent duplication and waste in the efforts of both to create conditions that will prevent a recurrence of conflict.

My delegation believes that the UN's troop-contributor base needs to be expanded further. Enhanced efforts must be made to encourage more countries to engage with UN peacekeeping efforts as troop and police contributors.

We need to recognize there are no short-cuts to peacekeeping. We are not dealing with classical belligerents who are looking for quick victory. We are dealing with forces that have a stake in continuing instability. We are combating elements that flourish in the absence of the rule of law and in the presence of violence and intimidation. We cannot overcome these forces unless we are committed for the long haul. The transition and exit strategies need to be approached accordingly.

Peacekeeping, in our assessment, will remain the major UN activity for the next few years. It will need more partners, not less; more capabilities, not less. The tendency in some quarters, in the name of expediency, to avoid intergovernmental discussions on the subject, is counter-productive. There is no shortage of capacities in today's world. The challenge that the United Nations faces is in its efforts to harness these capacities. My delegation submits that greater involvement of member states, not less, is the best way of obtaining these capacities for the common benefit of all.

Mr. Chairman,

It is very difficult to use objective parameters to determine an exit point from complex peacekeeping operations. A peacekeeping operation will have succeeded if there is durable peace. Durable peace can only follow from a successful peace agreement. The conditions that can lead to a successful peace agreement are also difficult, if not impossible, to define. Peace processes and political settlements cannot be subjected to budgetary discipline and evaluation by administrators. The creation of peace, as we are all learning in many different parts of the world, is not a business process. It is a complicated political undertaking with many imponderables. The Security Council is not bound by benchmarks on when and where it decides to intervene. Each decision is unique and subjective judgments are involved. Similar subjective judgments will be involved on when an operation can be wound up.

Mr. Chairman,

Two-thirds of UN peacekeeping resources are presently devoted to operations that are at least five years old. The international community must find the capabilities that are required to ensure that the gains that have been painfully accrued by peacekeepers in these mature operations are not squandered while facing the challenges of an altered operating environment.

Mr. Chairman, my delegation believes that peacekeeping and peacebuilding are not mutually exclusive enterprises. It is our understanding that both need to continue simultaneously over extended periods of time. Precipitate withdrawal of peacekeepers is a recipe for disaster and is a temptation best avoided. Too many conflicts have resumed after the peacekeepers have departed.

My delegation would like to stress that peacebuilding is a far more complicated endeavour than peacekeeping. The number of stakeholders is higher. The requirement for resources is also higher. It requires much greater coordination and joint activity with national authorities that are currently the norm. National needs, not priorities driven by external and donor interests, should be the yardstick used to approach peacebuilding.

Mr. Chairman,

The Secretariat has been reaching out to Member States through projects such as the New Horizon Report and in relation to the development of operational concepts in the areas of Protection of Civilians and Robust Peacekeeping. Draft operational concepts have been circulated. My delegation has continued being engaged in this process. We would, however, like to strike a note of caution. The work that is currently being undertaken has serious implications for international law and issues of state sovereignty. A key issue in this context is the distinction between the actions of the Council under Chapters VI and VII of the Charter. In this regard, the temptation to augment the theory and practice of intervention as a convenient short-cut must be firmly avoided. On protection of civilians, we must remember that this is a primary responsibility of the host country.

Mr. Chairman,

I would like to raise a different aspect of the issue of accountability. Should there not be an accountability requirement for those who craft the mandates? Surely, their responsibility cannot end with the generation of mandates. If unachievable mandates are generated for political expediency or if adequate resources are not made available, who should bear the responsibility? A deficit in the willingness and ability to enforce mandates is leading to an erosion in the UN's credibility.

80% of UN peacekeeping resources are devoted to areas with a legacy of colonialism. The problems that they face are not unique and have been confronted in many nations in Asia and Africa. It stands to reason that successful post-colonial nation building experience is relevant in planning and administering peacekeeping missions. Peacebuilding initiatives must also take into account the experience and insights of countries that have undergone successful post-colonial nation building exercises. Failure to do so could lead to sub-optimal results.

Mr. Chairman,

A debate on peacekeeping must also address the normative and legislative aspects. Indian troops have been at the forefront in protecting civilians on the ground. India has engaged constructively in the legislative debate on human rights and international humanitarian law.

The Charter, with good reasons, distinguishes between the actions of the Council under Chapter VI and VII. Even as we look forward to entering the Security Council next January, we believe in the important role that the General Assembly also plays in the peaceful settlement of disputes.

India firmly believes in women's role in conflict resolution and the attainment of peace. My delegation welcomes, in this regard, the initiative to enhance the role of women peacekeepers. India had deployed the first all women fully formed police unit in Liberia in 2007. I had the privilege of visiting these policewomen in Liberia and hearing first-hand from that nation’s President what an impact they had made - not least in inspiring many Liberian women to join their own country's police forces. We are happy to have been able to make this contribution and to reaffirm that the presence of women peacekeepers has effected a qualitative, if unquantifiable, value addition to the field missions in which they are deployed. Their effectiveness is testimony to the power of example in empowering the weak and the vulnerable. For this reason we would encourage DPKO to integrate the gender dimension in all its Peacekeeping Missions.

I would like to take this opportunity to reiterate our position that we are in favour of a policy of zero tolerance in respect of disciplinary and conduct issues.

Mr. Chairman,

Public support for peacekeeping is indispensable in all troop contributing countries. For this reason, as I mentioned to the Fourth Committee last week in the debate on Public Information, we would like to see DPI, DPKO and DFS working closely in highlighting peacekeeping success stories and providing accurate, impartial and timely information on the regular activities of UN peacekeepers, as also on the exceptional work that they often do that goes beyond the call of duty and the routine keeping of the peace. Many developing countries send their soldiers out to the frontlines of peace-keeping operations in distant countries and remote regions to which their own media may not be able to manage or afford access. DPKO, DFS and DPI could perform a signal service by facilitating, at UN expense, itinerant journalist seminars to such operations that would bring to the attention of the world, and particularly of the populations of troop contributing countries, stories of the goodwill, commitment and extraordinary courage of the men and women who represent the human face of UN peacekeeping. This would be most helpful in maintain the public and parliamentary support for peacekeeping that is vital to the continuation of this indispensable UN activity.
Mr. Chairman,

On behalf of my delegation, I also wish to salute all those peacekeepers, including many from my country, who have made the supreme sacrifice and laid down their lives while serving in UN Missions, most recently in Haiti. I had the painful privilege of visiting the rubble of the destroyed UN building in Port-au-Prince shortly after the earthquake there and paying my country’s tribute to the memory of the many former colleagues who had perished in that tragedy. India is no stranger to the tragic experience of bereavement in the pursuit of peace, and we remember the departed with respect and gratitude.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to assure you and the Secretary-General of India’s full support in your efforts to make UN peacekeeping more effective than ever.

Thank you.
the Security Council has organized at least four debates, under four different Presidencies, on peacekeeping and on related thematic issues. This has underscored the huge importance of the role that peacekeeping plays in the UN’s efforts toward ensuring peace and security in the world.

As a country that has contributed more than 100,000 peacekeepers to virtually every United Nations peacekeeping operation in the past six decades, we in India are conscious that much has changed since the first peacekeeping mission was launched in 1956. The geopolitical environment in which peacekeeping is conducted today could not be more different from those days. Global capacities, be they economic, political or military, are also distributed in a significantly different pattern. The conflicts that our Peacekeeping Missions address today deal predominantly with intra-state issues rather than the classic role of interposing troops between warring states. The peacekeeping agenda has rightfully acquired new dimensions in the civilian, policing and civic domains. The UN's initiatives on peacebuilding have also necessitated a relook into the entire enterprise of peacekeeping. The increasing talk today of partnership and capabilities reflects these changes that have occurred and the need for these changes to be accommodated in the global division of labour in the maintenance of international peace and security.

Mr. Chairman,

At present, member states are supposed to get their say in peacekeeping through the Fourth and Fifth Committees. Troop Contributing Countries, in addition, are formally consulted through the triangular meetings convened by the Security Council. The productive deliberations of the last C-34 notwithstanding, my delegation firmly believes in the need for more meaningful consultations with the C-34 and troop contributors in peacekeeping matters. My delegation acknowledges that improvements have been made in the timing of the triangular meetings. We have suggested a number of simple changes to make these meetings more useful and relevant. Predictability in terms of timing and the advance circulation of agendas are two of these measures. The system of consultations must also be extended to cover all stages of the mission cycle.
A perennial issue that has persisted is the need for the mandate and the mission to be better aligned. The drafting and adoption of a credible mission mandate should logically be the starting point of an operation, as noted in the Brahimi Report. So many times in the past, the mandates have been hurried and unrealistic, with overly ambitious timeframes. Too often, as we all know, the financial, human, equipment or logistical resources committed have not been commensurate with the declared objectives. The resultant mismatch risks lives and jeopardizes the prospects for an operation’s success.

As a peacekeeping operation gathers momentum, it requires more resources, not less. The military component will have to be supplemented, and not supplanted, by police and other institutions to promote the rule of law and a capacity for development administration, by which we mean the ability to respond to the genuine aspirations of the people beyond the mere maintenance of law and order.

Mr. Chairman, it is pertinent to note that UN operations are essentially in aid of national authorities and national capacities. National authorities usually have a good idea of what they require. The Council and the Secretariat must not just listen more to governments but also listen carefully. My delegation believes that there is no substitute for national capacities. Where there has been a serious breakdown, as is often the case in conflict situations, the UN can help create the conditions where these capacities can be exercised. We believe that support to the national authorities in Security Sector Reform and in the field of primary inputs for socio-economic development is significant for a Mission’s success. Security Sector Reform, in particular, needs far greater coordination, cohesiveness and unity of purpose. The training, equipment and working methods of national police and other rule of law institutions must be structured in a manner that is consonant with the wishes of national authorities and not the priorities of donors. In the case of economic development, national authorities, as the experience of the Peacebuilding Commission indicates, are capable of developing strategies and plans. What they need is resources and social investment.

Mr. Chairman,

Peacekeeping, which is the main contribution of the United Nations to the maintenance of international peace and security, has a substantial budget
by UN standards, but it amounts to less than 0.5% of worldwide military expenditure. The DRC Mission, with about 18,000 peacekeepers, in effect provides one peacekeeper per 100 square kilometers for a country roughly of the size of Western Europe in inhospitable and difficult terrain. These numbers indicate the daunting tasks we have set ourselves to achieve. It is evident, Mr. Chairman, that in relation to the needs, the resources available for peacekeeping are utterly inadequate. An increase in the number of high-quality well-trained troops is the first requirement. Such troops would also require proper equipment and enablers. We would like to see an increase in the deployment of police and rule of law capacities. The current composition of DPKO does not provide the capacity to plan for the nation-building activities that are central to peacebuilding. This capacity requires to be developed and will require a multi-disciplinary approach involving the development pillars of the UN and greater cooperation with countries in the global south.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, DPKO, which -- despite recent changes -- is still an organization driven mainly by the logic of its military operations, will have to transform itself further in the face of these challenges. It will need more policemen and more rule of law and development administration personnel in future. Member states will need to focus on the division of responsibilities between DPKO and UN Country Teams in order to prevent duplication and waste in the efforts of both to create conditions that will prevent a recurrence of conflict.

My delegation believes that the UN's troop-contributor base needs to be expanded further. Enhanced efforts must be made to encourage more countries to engage with UN peacekeeping efforts as troop and police contributors.

We need to recognize there are no short-cuts to peacekeeping. We are not dealing with classical belligerents who are looking for quick victory. We are dealing with forces that have a stake in continuing instability. We are combating elements that flourish in the absence of the rule of law and in the presence of violence and intimidation. We cannot overcome these forces unless we are committed for the long haul. The transition and exit strategies need to be approached accordingly.
Peacekeeping, in our assessment, will remain the major UN activity for the next few years. It will need more partners, not less; more capabilities, not less. The tendency in some quarters, in the name of expediency, to avoid intergovernmental discussions on the subject, is counter-productive. There is no shortage of capacities in today’s world. The challenge that the United Nations faces is in its efforts to harness these capacities. My delegation submits that greater involvement of member states, not less, is the best way of obtaining these capacities for the common benefit of all.

Mr. Chairman,

It is very difficult to use objective parameters to determine an exit point from complex peacekeeping operations. A peacekeeping operation will have succeeded if there is durable peace. Durable peace can only follow from a successful peace agreement. The conditions that can lead to a successful peace agreement are also difficult, if not impossible, to define. Peace processes and political settlements cannot be subjected to budgetary discipline and evaluation by administrators. The creation of peace, as we are all learning in many different parts of the world, is not a business process. It is a complicated political undertaking with many imponderables. The Security Council is not bound by benchmarks on when and where it decides to intervene. Each decision is unique and subjective judgments are involved. Similar subjective judgments will be involved on when an operation can be wound up.

Mr. Chairman,

Two-thirds of UN peacekeeping resources are presently devoted to operations that are at least five years old. The international community must find the capabilities that are required to ensure that the gains that have been painfully accrued by peacekeepers in these mature operations are not squandered while facing the challenges of an altered operating environment.

Mr. Chairman, my delegation believes that peacekeeping and peacebuilding are not mutually exclusive enterprises. It is our understanding that both need to continue simultaneously over extended periods of time. Precipitate withdrawal of peacekeepers is a recipe for disaster and is a temptation best avoided. Too many conflicts have resumed after the peacekeepers have departed.
My delegation would like to stress that peacebuilding is a far more complicated endeavour than peacekeeping. The number of stakeholders is higher. The requirement for resources is also higher. It requires much greater coordination and joint activity with national authorities that are currently the norm. National needs, not priorities driven by external and donor interests, should be the yardstick used to approach peacebuilding.

Mr. Chairman,

The Secretariat has been reaching out to Member States through projects such as the New Horizon Report and in relation to the development of operational concepts in the areas of Protection of Civilians and Robust Peacekeeping. Draft operational concepts have been circulated. My delegation has continued being engaged in this process. We would, however, like to strike a note of caution. The work that is currently being undertaken has serious implications for international law and issues of state sovereignty. A key issue in this context is the distinction between the actions of the Council under Chapters VI and VII of the Charter. In this regard, the temptation to augment the theory and practice of intervention as a convenient short-cut must be firmly avoided. On protection of civilians, we must remember that this is a primary responsibility of the host country.

Mr. Chairman,

I would like to raise a different aspect of the issue of accountability. Should there not be an accountability requirement for those who craft the mandates? Surely, their responsibility cannot end with the generation of mandates. If unachievable mandates are generated for political expediency or if adequate resources are not made available, who should bear the responsibility? A deficit in the willingness and ability to enforce mandates is leading to an erosion in the UN’s credibility.

714. Statement by Mr. D. Raja, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 41-“Necessity of Ending the Economic, Commercial and Financial Blockade Against Cuba”, at the UNGA.

New York, October 26, 2010.

Mr. President, Distinguished delegates

India associates itself with the statement made by the distinguished representative of Yemen on behalf G-77 and also the statement made by the distinguished representative of Egypt on behalf of NAM. My delegation would like to thank the Secretary General for the comprehensive report on the agenda item under consideration today.

Mr. President,

This is the nineteenth year in succession that this Assembly is deliberating the almost five decade old economic, commercial and financial embargo imposed on Cuba. In all these years, this Assembly has repeatedly rejected the imposition of laws and regulations with extra-territorial impact and all other forms of coercive economic measures that hurt the progress and prosperity of the people the world over.

The General Assembly has also called upon all States to respect their obligations under the United Nations Charter and international law, as well as repeal and invalidate laws and measures that have "extra-territorial effects" on the sovereignty of other States and affect the legitimate interests of entities or persons under their jurisdiction and the freedom of trade and navigation.

Despite the repeated calls of the General Assembly, its resolutions remain unimplemented in contravention of world opinion. Such callous disregard of the will of the United Nations undermines the credibility of this august house and weakens multilateralism. More importantly, meanwhile, the Cuban people continue to face the hardships induced by the embargo in their daily lives.

The embargo and its extra-territorial aspects continue to remain in full force. In particular, domestic US laws like the Cuba Democracy Act of 1992 and the Helms-Burton Act of 1996 have enhanced the extra-territorial reach of the embargo, encompassing foreign companies as well as foreign subsidiaries of US companies doing business with Cuba or Cuban entities.

Mr. President,

The embargo, particularly through its extraterritorial effects, is adversely affecting the lives of the Cuban people and their efforts for the socio-economic development in their country. The embargo has denied Cuba access to US market, investment, technology, financial services and scientific, educational, cultural and sporting institutions.

Cuba has had to pay enormous extra cost, in the last five decades for sourcing products, technology and services from third countries located thousands of kilometers away. The extra-territorial application of the US embargo has discouraged investment, technology transfer and sale and other forms of business collaborations between Cuba and third countries.

Health care, one of the MDG commitments, is particularly affected due to denial of critical medical equipment, medicines, technologies and diagnostic aids to Cuban hospitals. Cuba's efforts to provide health assistance to fellow developing countries as part of South-South cooperation has also borne the brunt of the embargo, making this yet another unexpected negative extra-territorial impact of the embargo.

In the report of the Secretary General, various UN entities have detailed the impact of the embargo and its extra-territorial effects. The UN Resident Coordinator in Havana has noted the high cost and negative impact of the embargo on humanitarian and development cooperation implemented by the UN system in Cuba. The Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean has stated that the embargo considerably affects the standard of living of Cuban citizens and may threaten Cuba's food security in the future. The UNDP has noted that the effects of the embargo can be observed in all spheres of Cuba's social and economic activities including the lives of the most vulnerable.
The UN Conference on Trade and Development states that the impact of the extraterritorial application is considerable owing to the significant US interests in transnational corporations.

In recent years, the financial, food and energy crises have made the impact of embargo even more acute.

Mr. President,

Geography has tied Cuba and the United States of America to maintain normal relations in trade and investment. Despite the embargo, the US continues to be a major source of food imports for Cuba, insofar as permitted by the US Trade Sanctions Reform and Export Enhancement Act of 2000. This only confirms the high potential for trade, commerce and investment between these countries.

People to people contact between the two countries remain severely curtailed. Lifting of US travel restrictions on Cuba would bring immense benefits to the Cuban tourism economy and to its people.

Congressional efforts in the United States to relax or lift the embargo and the substantial interest in the business sector for unhindered access to the Cuban market lend further credence to the UN annual resolutions calling for lifting of the US embargo against Cuba.

Before concluding, Mr. President, permit me to reiterate India’s opposition to unilateral measures by countries, which impinge on the sovereignty of another country, including attempts to extend the application of a country’s laws extraterritorially to other sovereign nations.

India joins other nations in calling for an immediate end to the US embargo against Cuba. India supports the resolution moved by Cuba.

Thank You.
715. Statement by Govindrao Adik, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 17 - 'Information Communication Technologies for Development' in the Second Committee of UNGA.

New York, October 26, 2010.

Mr. Chairperson,

The impact of Information and Communication Technologies on development is a subject of high importance. It is indeed fitting that you have accorded priority to this issue in the deliberations of the Second Committee.

India associates itself with the statement made by Yemen on behalf of G-77.

Mr. Chairperson,

Information and Communication Technologies have truly revolutionized the way we live. The transformative power of the internet and its ability to process, store and manage flow of information, data and knowledge has created a new world of cyber space. The possibilities of cyber activity are limitless. Its fast changing character and evolution based on ingenious innovation and invention are a tribute to the creative potential of human mind.

Information and Communication Technologies have made the world a global village. Distances, barriers and boundaries have become meaningless. It has altered the way we conduct business, undertake scientific research, manage our weather forecasting systems, decide on cropping pattern in our agricultural fields, control and command our space ships and communicate with people across continents.

The mobile phone, the personal computer and the internet have become the key enabling tools for development. Developing countries must, therefore, harness and be assisted in harnessing the benefits of Information and Communication technologies (ICT).

ICT has altered the way Governments manage their socio-economic programmes and outreach. E-Governance has helped countries revitalize public administration, overhaul public management, foster inclusive leadership and move civil service towards higher efficiency, transparency and accountability.

Mr. Chairperson,

Enhancing the penetration of information and communication technologies (ICT) in developing countries is also one of the targets under Millennium Development Goal 8 as part of the global partnership for development.

It is significant that global mobile penetration is now over 60%, with some developing countries already having achieved 100% mobile penetration. This demonstrates the possibility of developing countries leapfrogging the cycle of technology development.

The mobile penetration in developing countries has enabled governments to bring benefits of financial inclusion through phone banking to the remotest corners of the country. Efficient ICT systems are being increasingly used for providing education, medical services, environment management, electricity transmission, maintaining land records, running community programmes, providing weather information, transport services, among host of other activities.

We are happy that India is one of the success stories of mobile telephone penetration, and that our model is being used as an example in some other developing countries. Our proactive public policies in this sector have served to reduce monopolies, encourage open competition, and promote development of the domestic industry. As a result, mobile telephony costs in India are among the lowest in the world.

While ICT has brought immense benefits to development worldwide, it has some attendant challenges that we must collective overcome. Cyber attacks pose a grave threat to the security of the ICT systems. The international community must work closely to confront the transnational nature of cyber threats.

The report of the Secretary-General has correctly noted the large disparities in terms of penetration and affordability, particularly in the area of broadband connectivity. Greater efforts are required, particularly by the international community, to bridge the digital divide.
We thank the Secretary-General for the report on the progress made in the implementation of and follow-up to the outcomes of the World Summit on the Information Society and call on the international community to provide greater financial and technical support for its full implementation.

Mr. Chairperson,

I am happy to share that India has been active in using Information and Communication technologies for development. The Information Technology industry has been a major contributor to our economic growth in recent years.

India is also using Information and Communication technologies to implement an ambitious National e-Governance Plan. This involves the creation of physical infrastructure, setting up appropriate institutional mechanisms, development of policies and standards as well as adopting the necessary legal framework. Various public service areas like road transport, land records, taxes, agriculture, treasury, education, passport, postal service and identification documents are under the ambit of this Plan.

Mr. Chairperson,

Despite the global recession, the Indian Information Technology sector has been resilient, and remains one of the fastest growing sectors of the Indian industry.

India has been privileged to share its ICT expertise with fellow developing countries. A good example is the pan-African e-network project to support tele-education, tele-medicine, e-governance, infotainment, resource mapping and meteorological services across the continent using fibre optics and a dedicated satellite.

We have also been assisting in capacity building efforts in developing countries, both in our neighbourhood and beyond.

Thank You, Mr. Chairperson.
716. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, on the Open Debate on the 10th Anniversary of Adoption of the UN Security Council Resolution 1325 at the UN Security Council.

New York, October 26, 2010.

Mr. President

At the outset, I would like to place on record India's appreciation to you and your delegation for organizing today's open debate which marks the 10th anniversary of the adoption of Security Council Resolution 1325.

Mr. President

I am proud to belong to a country with a five thousand year old civilization that regards gender equality and the empowerment of women as its constitutive principles.

I am equally proud to be a Sikh, a religion which at the time of its founding, in the latter half of the fifteenth century, deemed it fit to incorporate gender equality and independence for women as among its essential attributes. The founder of Sikhism, Guru Nanak, said in 1499 that "[i]t is a woman who keeps the race going" and that we should not "consider woman cursed and condemned, [when] from woman are born leaders and rulers."

In Sikhism, women are considered to have the same souls as men and an equal right to grow spiritually. They are allowed to lead religious congregations, take part in the Akhand Path (the continuous recitation of the Holy Scriptures), perform Kirtan (congregational singing of hymns), work as a Granthi, and participate in all religious, cultural, social, and secular activities.

Mr. President,

The imperative of political empowerment of women cannot be overemphasized. India took a historic initiative of empowering women by reserving one third of the seats in more than 300,000 institutions of local self-government to women. As a result, today, out of the some 3.2 million elected representatives in these local bodies, there are 1.2 million women, about 86,000 of whom serve as chairpersons or vice chairpersons of their respective units.

We are taking further steps towards increasing the participation of women to 50% in these institutions, which will take the number of elected women to 1.6 to 1.8 million. A Bill for the same is under the consideration of the Parliament of India. There are, perhaps, more democratically elected women in India alone than in the rest of the world put together. This political empowerment of women is an unprecedented feat in the entire history of the world.

Mr. President,

Today’s open debate in the Security Council marks the 10th anniversary of the adoption of the Security Council Resolution 1325 (2000) on "women and peace and security". I am honoured to take part in this debate.

When Resolution 1325 was adopted unanimously in 2000, it was a landmark resolution dealing with women’s issues in the area of international peace and security. Recognizing this, the Secretary-General made a very pertinent point by saying that although women suffered the impact of conflict disproportionately, they also held the key to the solutions to the conflict.

Resolution 1325 highlighted the impact of armed conflict on women and the need for effective institutional arrangements to guarantee their protection and full participation in peace processes.

Having had the resolution in operational mode for a decade, we now need to redouble our efforts to increase women’s participation at all stages and all levels of the peace processes and peacebuilding efforts.

We can reach lasting peace and security in any country only when women are represented at the negotiating table or in talks on post-conflict reconstruction. In the same vein, let me add that the three pillars of lasting peace, namely, economic recovery, social cohesion and political legitimacy, cannot be achieved without the active engagement of women.

Mr. President,

India has consistently held the view that greater participation of women in the areas of conflict prevention, peace negotiations, peace keeping and post conflict reconstruction is an essential pre-requisite for lasting peace and security.

Let me also add my voice to other speakers who had called for greater deployment of female military and police personnel to United Nations peacekeeping operations, and to provide all military and police personnel with adequate training to carry out their responsibilities. In this regard, we encourage, especially those who champion the importance of participation of women peacekeepers and also have the inclination and capacity, to do so.

India has contributed more than 100,000 peacekeepers to virtually every peacekeeping operation in the past six decades. We have necessary disciplinary provisions in place to ensure that reports of incidents of violence against women or children or civilians are dealt with firmly, swiftly and resolutely within our existing legal provisions.

India even has the distinction of being the first country to deploy a full female peacekeeping unit of 100 personnel in Liberia since 2007. This oft cited Indian example, unfortunately still remains a rarity.

India will be happy to contribute positively to this process. As one of the largest troop contributing countries to the United Nations, India has been conscious of its responsibility as well as training of its troops on this important issue.

Mr President,

The United Nations system, Member States and civil society have made steady and noticeable efforts in implementing Resolution 1325.

While the Secretary General and several speakers before me have pointed out the mixed results in the implementation of the resolution by the international community and the UN system, it is worth noting that appointment of women in senior decision making levels as well as the participation of women in the mission planning, reporting, assessment, post-conflict planning and peacekeeping operations have actually increased. We welcome this but must stress the need to do much more.

Equally pertinent is the role played by civil society in internalizing the provisions of Resolution 1325 while addressing issues in various conflict zones. We would also, in particular, like to encourage local communities to step forward and assume their rightful role in conflict zones.

Mr. President,

Discussions on the establishment of a Security Council Working Group dedicated to reviewing the progress in implementing this Resolution are both relevant and has our support. We are confident that such an effort will go a long way in transforming words into concrete action.

The UN system has also come up with a useful set of indicators as global markers of progress in the implementation of Resolution 1325. India has taken note of the twenty-six global set of indicators in the four key areas.

We believe that reaching agreement on the set of goals, targets and indicators to monitor the implementation of the Resolution 1325 should be the first step in reducing defragmentation of information and monitoring progress in this critical and important issue.

We are equally mindful that the development of such indicators, benchmarks and guidelines, given their sensitivity, should involve a process of broader inter-governmental consultations and discussions before their eventual adoption. One must also be aware of the difficulties in obtaining authentic, credible, corroborative and verifiable data from conflict-ridden environments.

Mr. President,

We are happy that the Member States were able to reach consensus earlier this year in establishing the UN WOMEN, which will be fully operational by January 2011. In that context, we are particularly pleased to note that the Under Secretary General who heads this Entity was with us earlier today.

With consolidation of authority and responsibility within the UN System on women issues, I am positive that the UN system will also coherently coordinate and assist Member States, upon their request, in the implementation of the Resolution 1325.

Mr. President,

We unequivocally, unambiguously and resolutely condemn the abhorrent behaviour of sexual violence in armed conflict, regardless of who perpetrates it, be it parties to armed conflicts, peacekeeping personnel, including its civilian component, or humanitarian actors.

There is a need for more stringent regulations in combating and eliminating this menace. We would also request the Secretary-General to further strengthen his efforts to ensure zero tolerance of sexual exploitation and abuse in United Nations peacekeeping operations.

Mr. President,

We have not yet attained a global culture of human rights, which can serve as a unifying force rather than a divisive force. As the world's largest democracy, we consider it an honour to uphold and cherish the concept of gender equality and the empowerment of women.

I would like to reiterate India's firm commitment to its international obligations flowing out of the Resolution 1325 and its successor resolutions and look forward to engaging constructively and proactively with other delegations in the Security Council from the beginning of next year, when we assume our responsibility as a member of the Security Council.

Let us not lose the momentum which has been generated on this issue on the occasion of the 10th anniversary of Resolution 1325 - a symbol of strength for women in peace and security.

Thank you, Mr. President
Mr. Chairman,

I would like to thank the UN Secretary-General for his reports as well as the High Commissioner for Human Rights and the human rights special procedures for their presentations and reports under this agenda item relating to "protection and promotion of human rights". Promotion and protection of human rights is the fundamental as well as the primary responsibility of all States to its citizens. The international community has made noteworthy progress in advancing promotion and protection of all human rights and fundamental freedoms for all. We would like to welcome the role played by the special procedures of the Human Rights Council in further strengthening the international body of human rights.

India credentials in the promoting and protecting human rights, development, rule of law and democracy are well known. For millennia, India has been a home to diversities, cultures, traditions, religions and thoughts. Even before independence, we were the vanguard of the struggle against apartheid, racial discrimination and gender equality. The vision of our nation's founding fathers who framed our Constitution was based on a solid commitment to human rights. This was evident from the fact that when we adopted our Constitution in 1950, after nearly 200 years of colonial yolk, the section on the fundamental rights and freedoms granted to our citizens was made one of the most sacred pillars of the Constitution.

This included a triad of human rights namely, (i) the Right to Equality including the prohibition of discrimination in any form, (ii) the six vital freedoms of citizens (including the right to speech and expression) and
(iii) the Right to Life guaranteed to all persons. These rights have been recognized to be inalienable unalterable and part of the basic structure of the constitution which cannot be abrogated.

Apart from the fundamental rights, lawmakers in India are also guided by the Directive Principles of State Policy which the framers of the Constitution intended to serve as guiding principles for the years to come. These directives include eliminating and minimizing inequalities, ensuring gender parity, empowerment of women and children; and development of physical and mental health of all.

The Constitutional guarantees have been reinforced by the presence of a fiercely independent judiciary; a free and vibrant media and a vocal and proactive civil society. The remedy of public interest litigations was crafted by the judiciary to ensure that even the most vulnerable sections of society who may not be able to approach judicial courts otherwise can seek justice. This process of judicial redressal has been extremely effective in providing remedies to detainees, children and other vulnerable groups.

Keeping human rights perspective in mind, a major institutional mechanism was set up in 1993 to make human rights secure and enforceable. Under the Protection of Human Rights Act, a powerful and independent National Human Rights Commission was created and since then it has been working with an exemplary record. Various states in India have also established similar Commission to examine violation of rights at the state level. A separate institutional mechanism in the form of National Commission for Women was also created to investigate and register complaints of violations of rights of women including sexual crimes, violence and discrimination against women.

Another revolutionary as well as landmark development in India has been the enactment of the Right to Information Act in 2005. This enables any individual to seek and demand information about the governmental officials and decision making which has led to transparency, accountability and openness in the governmental process.

We also welcome the report of the Secretary General on the Right to Development. The Right to Development is a fundamental link in the web of human rights that promotes social progress and better standards of life for every person. We support the efforts of the Working Group on the Right to Development, and the endeavour to operationalize it and mainstream it in policies and operational activities of relevant actors at the national, regional and international level, including multilateral financial, trade and development institutions.

The process of monitoring and protecting human rights is not easy and the international community must continue its endeavor to unify their forces in the fight against those who commit gross violations. In this regard, it is worth noting that attempts to single out countries for intrusive monitoring and pointing out the failure of the state mechanism in the promotion and protection of human rights of its citizens has not borne any fruits. There is no doubt that human rights abuses must be addressed but it should be done in a comprehensive manner through cooperation, dialogue and consultation. We as international community can only succeed if we adhere to the principles of objectivity, transparency, non-selectivity, non-politicization and non-confrontation.

Terrorism is one of the main threats to the full enjoyment of human rights. Terrorists violate the most fundamental human right of their victims - the right to life. By instilling fear and using tactics of intimidation, terrorists also infringe several other rights of innocent citizens. Terrorism is also an attack on democracy, human dignity, human rights and development. In this regard, it is worth recalling that ensuring the security of its people is the first responsibility of a Government. Yet, States must also be very mindful of their responsibility to protect human rights. The challenge lies in striking the right balance between the imperatives of effectively tackling terrorism on the one hand, and fully observing international law and human rights standards, on the other. Terrorism has emerged as a truly global threat - one that no country should consider itself isolated from. Terrorism must be crushed if the concept of human rights is to retain any meaning for the common man. It should be our collective endeavour to ensure that the human rights debate is not misused for the pursuit of narrow political agendas, or to fulfil territorial ambitions as part of States with destructive foreign policy objectives.

India is proud of its achievements in nurturing a diverse, multi-religious and multi faceted society as well as the world's largest democracy. India will continue to play its part and contribute to the realization of the ideas enshrined in the International Bill of Human Rights. Promotion is the best protection of human rights. Mahatma Gandhi once said, "It has always been a mystery to me how men can feel honoured by the humiliation of their fellow beings." Let us use this forum to act promptly, collectively and effectively for universal adherence to human rights standards for all. This will also promote inclusive development. After all, development without democracy, social justice and respect for human rights can be neither lasting nor sustainable.

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

718. Statement by Dr. Mebhoob Beg, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 49 - Effects of Atomic Radiation in the General Debate of the Special Political & Decolonization [fourth] Committee of UNGA.

Mr. Chairman

I take this opportunity to congratulate you on your election as Chairman of the Special Political and Decolonization Committee to the Sixty Fifth Session of the General Assembly. I would also like to congratulate former Chairman, the Permanent Representative of Qatar, Ambassador Nassir Abdulaziz Al-Nasser for the way he conducted the work of this committee during the 64th session. I assure you of my delegation's full co-operation and support during this 65th session of the UN General Assembly.

Mr. Chairman

Over the past several years, India had seconded the resolution on the excellent work of, and support for the Scientific Committee, UNSCEAR, proposed by the Member State represented by the Chairman of UNSCEAR. The UNGA resolution no.64/85 of 19th January 2010 in its paragraph 13 asked the Committee (UNSCEAR) "to continue its reflections on how its current as well as potentially revised membership could best support its essential work, including by developing, with the participation of the observer countries, detailed, objective and transparent criteria and indicators to be applied equitably to present and future members alike and to report its conclusions". In the 65th General Assembly, India will carefully examine the political issues related to the Committee's stand on New and Potentially Revised membership of the Scientific Committee in the background of the request made by six member states of the UN for becoming the members of UNSCEAR.

Mr. Chairman

Since 2002 some Member States of the UN have been expressing their desire to become the members of the committee. This followed the publication of the 2002 and 2001 reports of the committee and a controversial report by WHO regarding the health effects of Chernobyl accident. Initially, Belarus and Ukraine expressed such a desire. Their scientists were, in fact, invited to the UNSCEAR session in 2000 before finalizing the scientific annexe related to Chernobyl accident. They also contributed significantly to the deliberations of its update in 2008. Later, UNGA wanted to know whether any other state was so interested. In response, 6 member states of the UN viz Belarus, Finland, Pakistan, the Republic of Korea, Spain and Ukraine expressed their desire to become members of the Committee. For financial and logistic considerations in conducting the sessions with such a large participation, the existing Committee has not been in favour of expanding the membership of the committee. In 2007, UNGA directed UNSCEAR to invite these six states as observers to the committee's sessions.

Mr. Chairman

The UNGA directed the scientific committee further in 2008 to develop detailed, objective and transparent criteria and indicators to be applied equitably to present and future members alike, and to report to the General Assembly.

Mr. Chairman

Before the 57th Session in 2010 which was postponed from April to August due to volcanic disruption of air traffic in Europe, the Chairman of the Committee, and the Vice Chairman, telephonically as well as by email contacted the Distinguished Representatives of the present member states of UNSCEAR including India through the Secretariat in connection with the response to this paragraph of UNGA resolution to develop a kind of consensus in the informal consultations to be held a day prior to the formal session. In earlier informal discussions at the time of the 56th session, the committee had considered several suggestions from the representatives such as continuation of the present observer status of the six new member states desirous of the membership of UNSCEAR, partly permanent and partly rotating membership, mixed delegations on a regional understanding, some members not participating in the sessions regularly, voluntarily opting out of membership etc. India cannot agree to share its UNSCEAR membership with another nation on a regional representation basis.

Mr. Chairman

The criteria and indicators included in the Committee's report to UNGA this year were evolved through these discussions. Among the criteria discussed was attendance at the session, response to the surveys on exposure to workers and public, natural radioactivity etc., references (scientific articles) cited in the 2006 and 2008 reports of the committee to UNGA. The existing membership was assessed based on these criteria by the Secretariat. Let me underline that this was said to be informal. Six countries that did not fully meet these criteria were requested to make a presentation before the informal meeting of the representatives. Five existing members of the committee, namely, Egypt, India, Indonesia, Mexico and Peru made presentations before the committee to explain their scientific strength and contributions to the working of the scientific committee. The reasons given for asking India to make a presentation was that even though it has proven scientific capabilities in the spheres of the Committee’s mandate, India did not provide the requested scientific data (in response to the committee’s surveys) for the committee’s work at the time of preparation of its 2000, 2006 and 2008 reports.

Mr. Chairman

Dr. K.B. Sainis, Director, Bio-Medical Group, BARC who represented India in the committee expressed India’s displeasure during his presentation as well as in all the subsequent discussions during 57th session stating that though he had agreed with the criteria and indicators and to make a presentation, it was beyond the mandate of the committee to single out or name any state and the membership issue was probably a political one. During the 57th session the observer states (6 countries desirous of joining the UNSCEAR) were also asked to make such presentations.

Mr. Chairman

The main reason India did not send the reports was that the formats were not acceptable. The expectations from member states of UNSCEAR, including responding to surveys, creation of a national framework for collection and analysis of important data on radiation exposure due to natural radioactivity, nuclear fuel cycle related activities, medical and industrial uses of radiation, governmental commitment and financial support are understandable. It is, however, possible that not all member states can come on board at the same time or to the same level. Further, information on radioactivity released from different type of reactors, which could be different and yet well within the regulatory limits, can create unnecessary fear in the minds of general public and nations may not like to make it available. Further, security concerns may constrain a sovereign member state to withhold such information in its national interest. These factors should be taken into account in the consideration of the issue. Therefore, while acknowledging the criteria, per se, India seeks simpler formats of data collection and a non-intrusive approach to it.

Mr. Chairman

There are several areas of re-emerging interest such as radiation induced cataracts, cancer risk due to low dose rate radiation including high natural background radiation, exposures due to internal emitters, paediatric medical exposure etc. Interestingly, while some studies suggest a positive risk for cancer following low dose exposures, studies in high background natural radiation in Kerala related to congenital malformations in newborn children and on cancer risk assessment in the HBR populations in India and China do not indicate an increased risk due to radiation exposure. India would strongly support the new program of work of UNSCEAR that covers these aspects. It is also satisfying to note that while continuously analysing the global data on sources and effects of radiation exposures of the committee is now addressing very specific issues on which scientific documents can be published in a short time.

While seconding the resolution on effects of atomic radiation, India strongly recommends making available sufficient financial resources for its effective functioning.

Thank you Mr. Chairman

719. Statement by Govindrao Adik, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 134 - Human Resources Management at the Fifth Committee of UNGA.

Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, my delegation wishes to thank Deputy Secretary-General Ms. Asha-Rose Migiro for her statement to the Committee on the Secretary-General's proposals on human resources management. We also thank Under Secretary General for Management Ms. Angela Kane, and the Director of the Ethics Office Ms. Joan Elise Dubinsky, for their introduction to the relevant reports of the Secretary-General on human resources management. We further thank the Chairperson of the ACABQ, Ms. Susan McLurg, for introducing the related report of the Advisory Committee.

We welcome the presentations by Vice President of the Staff-Management Coordination Committee, Ms. Paulina Analena, and President of the Staff Union of the UN Secretariat, Mr. Stephen Kisambira.

My delegation associates itself with the statement delivered by Yemen on behalf of the Group of 77 and China.
Mr. Chairman,

The 44,000 staff-members of the United Nations constitute its backbone and are critical to the efficient and effective implementation of the mandates that we as member-states have set for the UN.

India is a strong votary for reform initiatives that provide the UN a well-trained, motivated, committed, and versatile workforce with real experience. For this, it is important not only to recruit staff with high merit and experience, but also to ensure that they are beneficiaries of skills enhancement programmes and undertake self-improvement.

The current process of HRM reform has its genesis in the outcome of the 2005 World Summit, which rightly recognized that the management systems and staffing polices and regulations of the United Nations had not kept pace with the dramatic transformation of its operational and substantive work and contemporary realities.

This anachronistic situation in the system is sought to be addressed. It is important that this is done as a matter of priority in accordance with the guidance of the General Assembly. Our delegation is appreciative of the work done in this regard and the numerous proposals of the Secretary-General, some of which are already approved and under implementation.

Mr. Chairman,

We are mindful that more needs to be done. The process of reforming human resources systems and practices of the UN to address the contemporary needs of the organization can only be achieved through the collective efforts of the management and the staff. It must, of course, be underpinned by strong consultative process with Member States so that it has their full support and involvement.

As we move to in-depth deliberations on this agenda item, it would serve us well to remember that the proposals before us represent a continuum and must be seen as part of a comprehensive reform package. Our delegation will engage on specific issues during the interactive session. However, permit me to make brief comments on a few specific issues.

On recruitment, our delegation is very concerned about the high vacancy rates, particularly in field missions, and the lengthy recruitment process.
Indeed, we are unable to fathom the reasons for the persistence of huge vacancy figures. It surely cannot just be a case that there are not enough meritorious applicants? While we hope that some of the reform measures we undertake will mitigate the situation, it is important that we address this problem in a comprehensive manner, and to consider out of the box solutions. In this context we do believe that the United Nations should look at tapping into the capacities of member-states by seeking nominations from Member-States. To start with such an exercise could begin in those departments and field missions that are plagued by excessively high vacancy rates.

Another important area is workforce planning and talent management. We have been at the forefront of welcoming the Secretary-General's initiative to implement an integrated workforce planning system through establishment of a Talent Management Framework. While we have noted the issues that have marked the launch of the Inspira tool, we hope these are teething problems associated with a new system and look forward to a detailed update from the Secretariat on its functioning.

Two important pending issues before us that have a direct bearing on the overall functioning of the Organization are that of continuing contracts and the harmonization of the conditions of service across the common system. Our delegation is in favour of reaching a satisfactory resolution on them during this session. We cannot afford any further delay which may result in jeopardizing the reform process.

Turning once again to the issue of staffing, our delegation encourages the Secretariat to intensify efforts to correct the imbalance in terms of equitable geographic and gender representation. We further wish to draw attention to the need to adequately enhance representation of Troop Contributing Countries in the United Nations Secretariat taking into account their experience in peacekeeping, as has been requested by the General Assembly.

Mr. Chairman,

As we open our deliberations on the important proposals before the Fifth Committee during this session, we are acutely conscious that there are no easy choices to make. We further acknowledge that as with any reform, resistance is natural and dialogue is essential.
However, it is important to finish what we started. It is in our common interest to secure a stronger and more efficient Secretariat machinery, and to provide the required resources for the implementation of much needed and pressing reform. My delegation will work constructively to expeditiously arrive at decisions that contribute to the long-term effectiveness and efficiency of the organization.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

720. Statement by Mr. D. Raja, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 26 - Agriculture Development and Food Security - at the Second Committee of the UNGA.

Mr. Chairperson,

This august gathering is deliberating on one of the most pressing issues of the present time. Ensuring food security especially for the poor and the marginalised is a challenge that preoccupies Governments in developing countries first and foremost.

Our collective aspiration to attain the MDGs especially removal of hunger and reduction of poverty by the target year of 2015 is critically dependent on the issue of food security being addressed in its entire dimension.

The food crisis of 2008 exposed the global imbalance that had crept into the management of agriculture and food production worldwide and the inherent limitations of unsustainable farming and market practices to deal with food as a basic human need.

Mr. Chairperson,

Despite the recent fall in world prices, domestic food prices and price volatility remain high. This directly impacts the day to day survival of more than a billion poor people in developing countries.
Unsustainable agricultural practices, emphasis on producing non-food crops, consistent spells of drought, environmental degradation, impact of climate change and stagnant agricultural productivity, due to lack of investment and modern inputs, has led to a mismatch between global food demand and supply. Inadequate storage facilities in developing countries including India for food grains leads to wastage and rotting which needs to be tackled.

Some 29 countries, mostly LDCs, are in permanent state of food insecurity. Unavailability of food has led to increase in hunger, malnutrition and poverty in several parts of the world.

Mr. Chairperson,

Agriculture development is a livelihood issue for majority of the population in developing countries. In India, around 70% of our population is dependent on agriculture. Two-third of our agriculture is rain-fed which is totally dependent on the vagaries of nature.

The Government of India has undertaken several measures to tackle food security and agriculture development in an integrated manner. Our national policy for farmers, addresses the issue of improving the economic viability of farming, through substantially improving net income of farmers; promoting sustainable use of natural resources like soil, water, biodiversity; empowering small and marginal farmers; appropriate price and trade policy mechanisms.

However, ensuring food and nutritional security for all, while combating hunger and poverty and remunerative agriculture for our farming community, poses a major challenge to us. India is considering enacting a food security legislation. In the meantime, the Public Distribution System, even though not a universal one is maintained to provide essential commodities which include food grains to the poor.

India has launched a National Food Security Mission for enhancing production of rice, wheat and pulses by 20 million tonnes by 2012. Efforts are being made to help the small and marginal farmers from the vagaries of the market by way of price support system.

India has taken a few steps for providing crop and cattle insurance. Information on market intelligence and price analyses is also being provided to farmers and other stakeholders using Information and Communications Technologies.

Mr. Chairperson,

The solution to enhancing global food security lies in global action. No single country can, on its own, handle such complex issues.

Strengthening international cooperation to share best practices on agriculture development, transfer and diffusion of technology, collaboration in science and technology for development of new and improved varieties of crop and close policy coordination at local, regional and global level are a must.

In this regard, India reiterates its support for the L'Aquila Food Security Initiative and calls upon countries to meet their financial commitments to enhance the capabilities of developing countries to design and implement an effective food security strategy.

I am happy to inform this gathering that the SAARC member countries have decided to establish a SAARC food bank to enhance their collective food security. India would encourage other regional groups to undertake similar initiative.

Our collective effort should be to ensure higher investment in agriculture, greater use of modern technology and access to farm credit to enhance agriculture productivity and growth. Our approach should equally keep in mind the concerns of ecology and environment; empowering small and marginal farmers; and giving special attention to dry land agriculture.

Mr. Chairperson,

The ongoing multilateral trade negotiations, where arguments for liberalising trade in agriculture products are being put forth, must bear in mind the imperative of providing adequate safeguard to agriculture, food security and livelihood of the people in developing countries.

India takes note of the recent initiatives taken by the G-20 under the programme of global agriculture and food security to ensure agricultural development. India hopes that the reactivation of the Food Crisis Response Programme by the World Bank, which has dedicated US$ 760 million to countries at risk of food price volatility, will yield positive results.

India is aware of the urgent need for agricultural development and ensuring food security for all and is committed to adopt suitable strategies in this regard.

I wish to end my statement by recalling the prophetic words of Mahatma Gandhi, and I quote "there is enough for everybody's need but not for everybody's greed".

I thank you.

721. Statement by Baju Ban Ryan, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 70 - Report of the International Court of Justice at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

It gives me great pleasure to address this plenary session of the General Assembly on the report of the principal judicial organ of the United Nations, the International Court of Justice.

I would like to thank the President of the International Court of Justice for his comprehensive and lucid presentation of the Report of the Court.

Mr. President,

The International Court of Justice is the principal judicial organ of the United Nations. It was established, along with the other organs of the United Nations, to save future generations from the scourge of war and to find means of settling inter-State disputes through peaceful means by the application of international law.
The Court still remains the only judicial body with legitimacy derived from the Charter, enjoying general jurisdiction. All other international judicial institutions have specific competence and lack general jurisdiction of a universal nature.

The Statute of the ICJ has been made an integral part of the Charter. This is a status which is unique to the ICJ and not enjoyed by any other International Court or Tribunal established till date.

All States are free to approach the Court for the resolution of their disputes with other States. Under article 36 of the Charter, the Security Council may also recommend to the parties to refer their legal disputes to the International Court of Justice while the General Assembly and the Security Council may seek advisory opinions from the Court. These provisions clearly indicate the central role given to the ICJ within the UN system.

Mr. President,

The judgments of the Court have played an important role in interpreting and clarifying the rules of international law as well as its progressive development and codification. The Court has performed its judicial functions while remaining cautious in respecting political realities, sentiments of States and its own Statute.

The Court has emphasized on the rule of law and the role of international law in regulating inter-state relations even though inter-state relations are necessarily political in nature. The Court has contributed significantly towards settling legal disputes between Sovereign States, thus promoting the rule of law in international relations.

Mr. President,

India firmly believes that due to the Court's unique position in the UN system, no other judicial organ in the world can have the same capacity for dealing with international problems as the ICJ has.

Since its inception, the Court has dealt with a wide variety of complex legal issues. It has pronounced judgments in areas covering territorial and maritime delimitation, diplomatic protection, environmental concerns, racial discrimination, violation of human rights and application of international treaties and conventions. These judgments have played an important role in the progressive development and codification of international law.

Presently there are four new contentious cases and one new advisory proceeding before the Court. These cases deal with a diversity of subjects ranging from diplomatic relations to jurisdiction and enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters and an administrative matter related to the International Labour Organization. The Court is also dealing with geographic issues as in the case of whaling in Antarctica.

The cases before the Court involve countries from all around the world, involving States from Europe, Latin America, Africa and Asia, thus reflecting the Court's universality.

Mr. President,

The growing acceptance of the Court's jurisdiction by States further highlights the importance of the Court and confidence of the States in the Court's ability to resolve their legal disputes. This has increased the work load of the Court manifold. As of 31 July 2010, the number of contentious cases on the docket of the Court stood at 15 as compared to 13 last year.

To enable the Court to fulfill its task, it is necessary that the Court is provided with adequate resources so that it can respond efficiently and in a timely manner to the expectations of States which submit their disputes to it for settlement.

Thank You, Mr. President.

♦ ♦ ♦ ♦ ♦
Thank You, Madam Chairperson,

I would like to thank the Chairman of the International Law Commission for his comprehensive introduction of the Report of the 62nd Session of the International Law Commission on the second cluster of topics.

In connection with the topic "Expulsion of aliens", we commend the Special Rapporteur Mr. Maurice Kamto, for the revised and restructured draft articles on the protection of the human rights of persons who have been or are being expelled and the sixth report presented by him. To simplify the general scheme of things and to present the relevant principles in a focused and structured manner, we support the suggestion of the Commission about the reorganization of these articles in five parts.

We also support the general approach taken by the Special Rapporteur. We recognize that the State has the right to expel aliens. However, it is essential that the right of a State to expel aliens is exercised in accordance with the relevant rules of international law, including those relating to the protection of human rights and to the minimum standards for the treatment of aliens.

Madam Chairperson,

On the topic "Effects of armed conflicts on treaties", let me express our sincere condolences on the sad demise of Professor Ian Brownlie in a tragic accident in the beginning of this year, Professor Brownlie was the first Rapporteur on this topic. We commend the Special Rapporteur Mr. Lucius Caflisch for his report.

We support the view that the treaties should continue in operation as it leads to the stability of the treaties. Regarding the indicative list of treaties which deem to continue in operation, in our view all such treaties cannot be combined into one list. Some of the categories of treaties listed, e.g., treaties relating to IHL, expressly apply during an armed conflict. Similarly treaties on land or maritime boundaries are meant to be permanent in character and are not to be affected by armed conflict. Accordingly such treaties need to be listed separately from other treaties whose continued existence depends on the intention of the parties.

On the scope of the topic, we reiterate our view that it should be limited to treaties concluded between States and not include treaties concluded by international organizations; the definition of “armed conflict” should be considered independently of its effects on treaties; and that the scope of an “armed conflict” should be limited to conflicts between States and that it should not deal with internal conflicts, as treaties are entered into by States, and internal conflicts do not directly affect treaty relations.

The principle of non-automatic termination or suspension contained in Draft Article 3 is useful as it would encourage the stability and continuity in treaty relations. We also welcome the recognition in article 4 that the draft articles would not apply to situations to which articles in IHL apply. We also support article 15 which deals with the prohibition of benefit to the Aggressor State.

Madam Chairperson,

Draft Article 5 provides a listing of treaties which, on the basis of necessary implication from their object and purpose, are considered as continuing in operation during an armed conflict. It is necessary to identify some general criteria for determining the type of treaties that would continue to apply during an armed conflict. In particular, treaties that expressly apply in case of or during an armed conflict, and therefore, can in no circumstances be terminated by an armed conflict, should be identified and considered separately from other treaties.

Madam Chairperson,

On the topic of Protection of Persons in the Event of Disaster, we would like to congratulate the Special Rapporteur, Mr. Eduardo Valencia-Ospina for his third report.
Since there is wide agreement amongst States that armed conflict should not be covered by the draft articles, the reference to the principle of neutrality does not appear to be relevant and it would be appropriate to replace reference to “neutrality” in draft article 6 by a reference to “non-discrimination”. Further it would also be useful to emphasize in this article that humanitarian response should not be used to intervene in the domestic affairs of States as emphasized by the ICJ in the case of Nicaragua V. United States of America. In that case, the court referred to the purposes followed in the practice of the red cross in the context of humanitarian assistance in order to escape condemnation as an intervention in the internal affairs of the affected State, and specified that these purposes include “to prevent and alleviate the human suffering” and “to respect for the human being”, and that humanitarian assistance must be “given without discrimination to all in need”.

Draft Article 8, on Primary Responsibility of the Affected State, as proposed by the Special Rapp. consists of two paragraphs. Paragraph 1 states that “The affected State has the primary responsibility for the protection of persons and provision of humanitarian assistance on its territory. The State retains the right, under its national law, to direct, control, coordinate, and supervise such assistance within its territory”, while paragraph 2 provides that “External assistance may be provided only with the consent of the affected State.”

Madam Chairperson,

The General Assembly has, on a number of occasions, reaffirmed the primacy of the affected State in disaster response. In Resolution 46/182, the General Assembly held that: Each State has the responsibility first and foremost to take care of the victims of natural disasters and other emergencies occurring on its territory. Hence, the affected State has the primary role in the initiation, organization, coordination, and implementation of humanitarian assistance within its territory.

The General Assembly has also recognized the relevance of the concepts of Sovereign Equality and territorial Sovereignty in the context of disaster response, and the Guiding Principles annexed to Resolution 46/182, (quoted in para 69 of the Report) held that: “The sovereignty, territorial integrity and national unity of States must be fully respected in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. In this context, humanitarian assistance should be provided with the consent of the affected country and in principle on the basis of an appeal by the affected country."

Accordingly, while emphasizing the duty of cooperation with a view to encouraging assistance to affected persons, and providing for essential human needs as a priority in case of emergency situations resulting from a natural disaster, the Draft articles should recognize the sovereignty of the affected State, its responsibility towards its own nationals, its right to decide whether it requires international assistance, as it is in the best position to assess the needs of the situation, as well as its own capacity to respond, and if it accepts international assistance, the right to direct, coordinate and control such assistance within its territory.

I once again thank the Special Rapporteur for his Third Report, and support sending the Draft articles to the Drafting Committee.

Thank you, Madam Chairperson.

723. Statement by Govindrao, Member of Parliament, on "Review of the United Nations Peacebuilding Architecture" at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

Thank you for convening today's session on a topic of importance and significance to all of us. Let me at the outset align my delegation with the statement delivered by my distinguished colleague from Bangladesh on behalf of the Non-Aligned Movement.

I wish to begin by echoing the Secretary General's assertion, in his report last year, on peacebuilding in the aftermath of conflict wherein he had emphasized the imperative of national ownership and the anchoring of international peacebuilding efforts at the level host country.
My delegation recognizes the importance of post-conflict peacebuilding as the foundation for building sustainable peace, security, and development in the aftermath of conflict. Mr. President, sustainable peacebuilding requires an integrated approach with coherence between political, security, development, human rights and rule of law activities. Security clearly is the key peacebuilding pillar. Capacity building also assumes significance especially in instances where countries find it difficult to completely utilize the financial assistance they have been provided. It is equally important to focus on building economic opportunity, particularly for the youth, along with the political and social stability.

Mr. President,

Peacebuilding requires a holistic approach that is informed of economic, social and political milieu of the post-conflict situation. It is also necessary that we have stakeholders in the host country in the peacebuilding efforts. It also means that even in cases where it is difficult to locate national ownership, international peacebuilding efforts are geared towards strengthening the capacity of a post-conflict State that is able to govern effectively and to govern well. In this regard, capacity building assumes importance especially in instances where countries find it difficult to completely utilize the financial assistance they have been provided.

It is equally important to focus on building the economic opportunity, particularly aimed at the youth along with political and social stability. Unemployment amongst youth, Mr. President, is a major factor for perpetuation of the underlying causes of conflict. Economic revitalization and economic opportunity is, especially among the youth is crucial in achieving sustainable peace and security. Another key issue is that of financing. Let us be clear and acknowledge the fact that the lack of funding continues to be a major impediment to the success of peacebuilding initiatives. It goes without saying that other elements such as human resources, technical assistance through provision of appropriate technologies are important as well.

Given the sensitivities of peacebuilding tasks such as security sector reforms and development administration, a high degree of coordination within the United Nations is desirable. Work in the country-specific configurations has been a positive dimension. My delegation is, therefore, of the view that the international community, acting through the instrumentality of the PBC, must always strive to ensure that there exists a two-way dialogue between countries on the Agenda of the PBC and the Commission itself through all stages. In particular, the consultations with the troop and police contributing countries, both individually and through the instrumentality of the PBC, while formulating and revising mandates of UN Missions, would be of important.

Mr. President,

My delegation firmly believes that peacekeeping and peacebuilding are mutually supportive and reinforcing projects. Launching of peacekeepers speedily in a conflict-torn scenario is a reflection both of our ability to mobilize resources and to access conflict zones. Early peacebuilding efforts depend largely on the role of the peacekeeping missions. The multidimensional peacekeeping is a necessary condition for peacebuilding and sustainable peace. We firmly believe that the peacekeeping and peacebuilding endeavours have to be premised on national ownership and development of national capacity.

Mr. President,

Ever since the creation of the PBC in December 2005, India, as a member of the Organizing Committee has engaged itself constructively with the work of PBC. We have contributed to the Peacebuilding Fund with the spirit that PBF achieves its task as mandated by the General Assembly and the Security Council. Further, we are of the view that the Fund should act as a catalyst for good governance. In this regard, we note with approval the creation of the Senior Advisory Group for the Review of International Civilian Capacities in fulfillment of the "agenda for action" outlined by the Secretary General in his 2009 report on Peacebuilding in the aftermath of Conflict.

Mr. President,

My delegation is of the view that the international community, acting through the instrumentality of the PBC, must always strive to ensure that there is effective two-way dialogue between countries on the Agenda of the PBC and the Commission itself. In this regards, it is important that the on-going review reorients the existing peacebuilding architecture that enables the Organization Committee and the PBC to play a more decisive role in formulating the Commission's approach to post-conflict situations. Also, the country-specific configurations must not run ahead of the national governments in setting targets. National needs rather than the normative prescriptions should determine the peacebuilding priorities. A mechanism should be devised to incorporate the wealth of experience that is available with the troops on the ground. No efforts should be left unattended that may enrich the peacebuilding project in a post-conflict society. To maximize peace dividend through peacebuilding and peacekeeping it is necessary that the mandates are mindful of the specifics on the grounds. The Commission and the Organizing Committee should play an important role in this regard.

Mr. President,

The international community has to be pro-active when it comes to resource mobilization for peacebuilding. Resources available should be tailored to suit local demands. Experience thus gained will be valuable in apportioning Peacebuilding its due share in the process in the transition from conflict to peace. My delegation firmly believes in the significant role of PBF in this regard. PBF should bridge the crucial gap between resources and implementation by financing peacebuilding projects through flexible financing. Mr. President, my delegation is convinced that social revitalization can not be complete without an inclusive and cohesive social agenda. Early peace dividends have the potential not only to win the hearts and minds but also to catalyse the process of social recovery in a participative and inclusive manner. We believe that the net should be cast wide among the players present in the Peacebuilding architecture to harness the wealth of ideas, resources, capacities and expertise.

Mr. President,

It is not neither possible not desirable to transplant models specific to one region to another context. International community must not be unduly eager for standard implementation to bring peace in a hurry. Sustainable peace has to be earned diligently, empathically and inclusively. In this regard, the regional and sub-regional approaches to crisis situations have a greater relevance while working out peacekeeping and peacebuilding mandates at the UN. We believe that the peacebuilding architecture must institutionalize structures and processes to this end.
Mr. President,

Peacebuilding is a UN-centric term. It is important that this is connected to the real world on the ground. The elements and the intent of the Peace building Commission need to be communicated better to the larger audiences internationally. Various strategies and efforts of the peace building architecture must be geared to strengthen the institutions of governance and administration in the host country. Transition strategies will have to bear in mind the efficacy of the prospective State institutions to continue these initiatives forward.

To assist Peace building Commission carry out its mandated task of "an intergovernmental advisory body", it is incumbent that all organs of peace building architecture, such as the General Assembly, the Security Council, and the Economic and Social Council, work in a coordinated and coherent manner. The PBC should not merely advise States on post-conflict peace consolidation but should instead help with efficient harnessing of international expertise.

Mr. President,

We must be cognizant that peace building is still a concept in its infancy and is continuously evolving. The international community has taken on board the idea of peace building to fulfill the important need of handling post-conflict situations. It is therefore, imperative that we ensure that peace building and the institutions that constitute the peace building architecture are successful.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me share India's unique nation-building enterprise in a vast, varied and diverse settings. We have strived towards better life to our people. In the process we as a nation have earned capacities that are relevant to development and peace building. We have shared this expertise with a number of countries making transition from conflict to peace. We will continue to make available our abilities to countries in post conflict situations and cooperate with the United Nations in its peace building endeavours.

Thank You.
Let me at the outset thank the President of the International Law Commission for his lucid and detailed presentation on Part III of the Report of the ILC.

We support the objective of the topic 'extradite or prosecute', that an offender should not go unpunished for any reason, such as, due to the lack of jurisdiction, or state cooperation or because of other technicalities. Ensuring prosecution of offenders in any jurisdiction would work as a deterrent and would strengthen the cause of the administration of international criminal justice and the rule of law.

At the sixty-first session in 2009, an open ended Working Group was setup by the Commission under the chairmanship of Mr. Alain Pellet of France, and based on discussion, and with the aim of specifying the issues to be addressed, a general framework was drawn up for consideration of the topic in the Commission.

At its sixty-second session, the Commission reconstituted the Working Group, which, had before it a Survey of multilateral conventions, together with the general framework prepared by the Working Group in 2009.

The Working Group also had before it a working paper prepared by the Special Rapporteur, on the topic "the obligation to extradite or prosecute". The paper drew attention to questions concerning: (a) the legal basis of the obligation to extradite or prosecute; (b) the material scope of the obligation to extradite or prosecute; (c) the content of the obligation to extradite or prosecute; (d) relationship between the obligation to extradite or prosecute and other principles (e) the conditions for the triggering of the obligation to extradite or prosecute (f) the implementation of the obligation to extradite or prosecute, and the relationship between this obligation and the surrender of an offender to an international criminal tribunal.

The Working Group expressed the view that the general orientation of future reports of the Special Rapporteur should be towards presenting draft articles for consideration by the Commission, based on the general framework agreed in 2009.

Madam Chairperson,

Regarding the Indian position on the principle of extradite or prosecute, we would like to mention that India is a firm supporter of the suppression of crime and upholding of the rule of law. A person who has committed a crime must be tried and punished no matter by which State - the State of territory or by the State of his nationality or by the State of the nationality of the victim or by the State in whose territory he may be present.

In India, the Extradition Act of 1962, bilateral extradition treaties, together with relevant international conventions containing provisions for extradition, govern matters relating to extradition from India to other countries and vice-versa.

The Extradition Act contains provisions concerning the duty to extradite or prosecute. All bilateral extradition treaties that India has concluded with other countries contain provision concerning the obligation to extradite or prosecute. In practice, these provisions are implemented in letter and spirit in respect of all extradition offences.

India is a party to several international conventions dealing with international crimes in different fields. These conventions oblige State Parties to extradite persons accused of offences defined therein. In the event that an extradition request is refused, such persons must be considered for prosecution. In the absence of a bilateral extradition treaty, the Convention itself could be considered as the legal basis for considering extradition.

No reservation is made by India under any of these conventions concerning the duty to extradite or prosecute.
Madam Chairperson,

In relation to the topic "The Most-favoured-nation clause", we welcome the work of the Study Group, co-chaired by Mr. Donald M. McRae and Mr. A. Rohan Perera, the Study Group has considered and agreed on a framework to serve as a road map of future work, in the light of issues highlighted in the syllabus on the topic. In particular, the Study Group made a preliminary assessment of the 1978 draft articles and decided on eight papers to be dealt with under the topics identified and assigned primary responsibility to its members for the preparation of the papers (chap. XI). The MFN clauses are important. I hope that the ILC would study and add clarity to the use of MFN Clauses and better understanding of the implications of its use.

Madam Chairperson,

We also welcome the establishment of a Study Group chaired by Professor Nolte on the topic "Treaties over Time", which considered the question of the scope of the work of the Study Group and agreed on a course of action to begin the consideration of the topic.

On the topic of shared natural resources we are pleased to note that having finalized its recommendations on the transboundary aquifers in 2009, the Commission at its meeting on 28 May 2010, decided once more to establish a Working Group on Shared natural resources, chaired by Mr. Enrique Candioti. The Working Group had before it a working paper on oil and gas prepared by Mr. Shinya Murase.

The working paper noted that a majority of States were of the view that the transboundary oil and gas issues were essentially bilateral in nature, as well as highly political and technical, involving diverse situations. Doubts were expressed as to the need for the Commission to proceed with any codification exercise on the issue, including the development of universal rules. It was feared that an attempt at generalization would inadvertently lead to additional complexity in an area that may have been adequately addressed through bilateral efforts.
Given that oil and gas reserves were often located on the continental shelf, there was also a concern that the subject had a bearing on maritime delimitation issues. Maritime delimitation, which, in political terms, was a very delicate issue for the States, would be a prerequisite for the consideration of this as a sub-topic, unless the parties had mutually agreed not to deal with delimitation.

Furthermore, it was considered that the option of collecting and analyzing information about State practice concerning transboundary oil and gas or elaborating a model agreement on the subject would not lead to a fruitful exercise for the Commission, precisely because of the specificities of each case involving oil and gas. The sensitive nature of certain relevant cases could well be expected to hamper any attempt at a sufficiently comprehensive and useful analysis of the issues involved.

The Working Group having considered all aspects of the matter and taking into account the views of Governments, recommended that the Commission should not take up the consideration of the transboundary oil and gas aspects of the topic "Shared natural resources".

Madam Chairperson,

We fully subscribe to the views and concerns expressed in the Working Group and its recommendations that the Commission should not take up for consideration the "transboundary oil and gas aspects" of shared and natural resources. We would like to point out that transboundary oil and gas issues are best dealt with at the bilateral level bearing in mind the geological features, needs of the region, capacity and the efforts of neighbouring countries. Attempting any sort of codification may affect the established bilateral treaty obligations, as well as sometimes, the assiduously arrived agreement at the political level.

Thank you, Madam Chairperson.
Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, I would like to express my delegation’s appreciation to Mr. Filippo Grandi, Commissioner General of UNRWA for Palestinian Refugees in the Near East for the annual report on the extremely important work over the past year in Jordan, Lebanon, Syria and the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. My delegation would also like to take this opportunity to commend the work of Ms. Karen Koning AbuZayd, the outgoing Commissioner General who led the Agency for five years.

We also thank the UNRWA Advisory Committee and the members of the working group on the Financing of UNRWA, for their efforts in support of the work of UNRWA. India also places on record its admiration for the difficult and often risky work that UNRWA has carried out over the past six decades, placing service to the Palestinian refugees as its highest priority.

Mr. Chairman,

The services provided by UNRWA are of a critical importance in the context of the continuing violence in the Middle East. The Agency has played a key role in providing humanitarian assistance, including education, health care and social services to over 4.6 million Palestinian refugees. Today UNRWA is a symbol of the international community’s commitment to the well-being of the Palestinian refugees until a just and durable settlement of the issue is achieved.

The report of Commissioner General, clearly illustrates the severe challenges UNRWA continues to face. As the report notes, several of the challenges directly impinge upon the well-being of Palestine refugees and the Agency’s ability to efficiently and effectively discharge its humanitarian and development responsibilities.
Mr. Chairman,

The first of the challenges before UNRWA that needs to be addressed is the crisis of financing. The budgetary shortfall of UNRWA is growing, and this takes place at the same time as demands upon UNRWA for assistance and support have increased. Shortage of funds has direct implication on UNRWA work in general and projects like rebuilding of Nahr El Bared camp in particular. It also affects upgradation of services at several refugee camps. Therefore, there is a greater need for augmenting international efforts to improve UNRWA’s financial health.

We note the concern of the Chairperson of the Advisory Commission of UNRWA that “the separation of barrier, closures, curfews and other restrictions on movement in the West Bank and Gaza Strip have led to further hardship for the affected population”. As we have stated in the past, the walls/encroachment on Palestinian land and interests creates great hardships for the people affected by its construction and exacerbates the already grim situation.

An area of continuing concern is the restriction in freedom of movement of UNRWA staff members. Regrettably, the environment in which the Agency carries out its operations continues to hamper its ability to deliver services. Of equal concern is that these restrictions have had a serious impact on the ability of UNRWA to move staff and provide humanitarian assistance to those in urgent need. Closures and blockades need to be lifted and unhindered access allowed to humanitarian supplies. The events of 31 May 2010 that led tragic loss of life and the reports of killings and injuries to people on the boats carrying supplies for Gaza is deplorable.

The continued levy of fees and charges for the transit of humanitarian goods is not called for as it seriously affects the working of Agency which is already short of funds. The detention of UNRWA staff and lack of Agency access to and information on its staff is matter of serious concern. We support the Commission calls on all parties to respect United Nations resolutions and international law, including international humanitarian law.

We support the call of the UNRWA Chairperson regarding removal of restrictions on the movement of agency staff and goods in throughout UNRWA’s areas of work. We also take note of UNRWA welcoming new measures towards easing of movement of goods to Gaza. However, more relaxation on movement of reconstruction material is required to effectively address the situation in Gaza.

We have, as in the past, manifested our support to the Palestinian people through continuing developmental support to Palestine. Last year, we enhanced our annual contribution to UNRWA to $1 million, besides, making a special contribution of US $1 million to UNRWA in response to UNWRA’s flash appeal. Last year and this year, India contributed US$ 10 million annually as untied budget support to the Palestinian National Authority. This year’s budget support followed from discussions between His Excellency, President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Dr. Manmohan Singh in New Delhi in February this year. These exemplify India’s continuing commitment to Palestine.

The support for the Palestinian cause has been a central feature of India’s foreign policy since even before it achieved independence in 1947. India will continue to do all within its capacities to assist Palestine in its endeavours in capacity and institution-building. We salute the struggling people of Palestine. We express our solidarity with the Palestinian people.

Mr. Chairman,

It is critical for the international community to work closely with the parties with a view to encouraging them to resume direct negotiations that began in September. We are hopeful that the talks and negotiations would continue, leading to a comprehensive peace process for final resolution of the conflict.

Till such time, Mr. Chairman, it is incumbent upon all of us to fully support UNRWA, as the primary source of humanitarian assistance to the Palestinian refugees. For this reason, we endorse all efforts to support UNRWA by expanding its capacity to render assistance.

Thank you Mr. Chairman
726. Statement by Dr. Kakoli Ghosh Dastidar, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 20-Sustainable Development at the Second Committee of the UNGA.

New York, November 2, 2010.

Madam Chairperson,

We would like to thank the Secretary General for the detailed reports on Agenda Item "Sustainable Development."

India associates itself with the statement made by the distinguished representative of Yemen on behalf of the Group of 77.

Madam Chairperson,

The global community continues to face immense challenges in its pursuit of equitable and balanced growth, social cohesion and environmental sustainability. The threats from climate change are severe and need an urgent and effective response.

This underscores the importance of an integrated approach to sustainable development, with emphasis on its three pillars of economic development, social development and environmental protection. Such an approach is the key to ensuring the achievement of our development goals, particularly the eradication of poverty and hunger.

In this regard, we emphasize the importance of the full implementation of the Agenda 21 and the Johannesburg Plan of Implementation, specifically the aspect of an international environment conducive to development.

The RIO+20 Summit to be held in 2012 would be an important milestone in the global sustainable development discourse and action. Our preparations must focus on an ambitious outcome taking the interest of the poor and the marginalized to be the least common denominator. We believe that the global understanding on "green economy" and "green growth" should be subsumed in the larger framework of sustainable development and priority must continue to be given to eradicating poverty in developing countries.
Madam Chairperson,

We are cognizant of the special challenges faced by Small Island Developing States [SIDS] in their efforts to achieve sustainable development, which have been further exacerbated by climate change. The strong political commitment expressed by the global community at the High Level Meeting of the Mauritius Strategy of Implementation held in September 2010 to effectively address the specific vulnerabilities of SIDS must be backed by action.

We are privileged to have been able to contribute to the development efforts of SIDS in the spirit of South-South solidarity. Our engagement with SIDS has included areas like capacity building, natural disaster preparedness, adapting to climate change and enhancing resilience. However, what is urgently required is enhanced financial and technical support by developed countries.

Madam Chairperson,

There is an all pervading sense of urgency to work for a meaningful outcome from the Climate Change negotiations. But the lack of progress on the promises made at Copenhagen seems to be undermining the level of trust that is required to take the process forward.

India is among the worst affected by Climate Change, and we therefore have a major interest in ensuring that climate change is addressed substantively and constructively. At the meeting in Cancun, India would continue to push for an ambitious and equitable outcome under the UNFCCC and Kyoto Protocol processes; one that is based on the principle of common but differentiated responsibilities and respective capabilities.

India fully recognizes the significant threats posed by Climate Change to the Small Island Developing States and the urgency to address the need for mitigation, adaptation, financial and technological support in these countries to develop an effective response. Our consciousness of the situation is particularly deep since we too have large and vulnerable populations living on our island chains and in low lying coastal areas.

Let me particularly emphasize the importance of technology transfer to deal with climate change. We need a change in mindset, a change that permits developing countries to have critical climate related technologies at concessional and preferential rates. If we are serious about confronting climate change as an unprecedented global challenge, we must be willing to balance rewards for innovators with the common good of humankind and introduce necessary flexibilities in the Intellectual Property Rights regime.

In this context, I am happy to inform the gathering here that India along with Mexico and UN-DESA is jointly organizing the “Delhi Ministerial dialogue on climate technologies” from 9-10 November 2010 in New Delhi with a view to develop, deploy and transfer environmentally sound technologies in agriculture, health, renewable energy, energy efficiency and other adaptation and mitigation areas for combating climate change.

Madam Chairperson,

The conservation, protection and sustainable use of genetic resources are important aspects of achieving sustainable development. In this regard, we welcome the adoption of a legally binding instrument on Access and Benefit Sharing in Nagoya at the CBD COP meeting, as also the decision taken by the Parties to urge the 65th UNGA to consider setting up an Inter-Governmental Panel on Biodiversity and Ecosystem services (IPBES) at the earliest. The success of Nagoya serves as an assurance that multilateralism continues to play a constructive role in the field on environment.

The floods in Pakistan, earthquakes in Haiti, Chile and China and the volcanic eruption and tsunami in Indonesia are reminders of increased natural disasters in recent years. We must, therefore, work for strengthening the global preparedness to handle natural calamities. In this regard, India expresses its full support to the International Strategy for Disaster Reduction.

India looks forward to closely working with Member States and other stakeholders to strengthen the global sustainable development agenda and action. Thank you.
Statement by Gopinath Pandurang Munde, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 21 - "Implementation of the Outcome of the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements [Habitat II] and Strengthening of the United Nations Human Settlements Programme [UN-Habitat] at the Second Committee of the UNGA.

New York, November 2, 2010.

Mr. Chairperson,

We thank the Secretary General for the report on the agenda item under discussion today. India associates itself with the statement delivered by Yemen on behalf of the G-77.

Majority of the world population today lives in urban areas. It is projected that by 2050 this figure would go up to 70% with developing countries accounting for most of the change. Such a population settlement scenario, especially in developing countries, entails new challenges for policy planners and the way the global community approaches sustainable development.

The development role of UN-Habitat, urban planners, municipal and local governments and other stakeholders, thus, assumes far greater importance. The UN-Habitat with its valuable experience of working in a dynamic urban setting can play an important role in enriching the discussions on sustainable development at the Rio+20.

India supports the guidelines on decentralization and strengthening of local authorities, adopted by the Governing Council of UN-Habitat.

We are working for governance reform in our local bodies to make them a catalyst for change. Our efforts have involved greater representation of all sections of society in local authorities, and expansion of their functional domain to focus on environment, local economic development, as well as innovative resource mobilization.

Mr. Chairperson,

India is a founding member of UN-Habitat and has been an active member of the organization. We support the Medium-term Strategic and Institutional Plan of UN-Habitat for the period 2008-2013, particularly the focus on strengthening the catalytic and pre-investment role of UN-Habitat.

In this context, we urge upon all entities to contribute to further capitalization of the United Nations Habitat and Human Settlements Foundation so as to enable UN-Habitat to provide more financial and seed capital support for slum upgrading and prevention, as well for pro-poor investment in urban water and sanitation.

We welcome the developments towards early operationalization of the reimbursable seeding operations activities, which will permit UN-Habitat to assist national housing development programmes. India has been active, particularly through public housing finance institutions, in promoting institutional housing finance for the poor and the economically weaker sections.

Mr. Chairperson,

India’s economic growth in the past decades has led to a massive shift in its population from rural to urban areas. This trend would continue in the future. We have added 65 million people to our urban population in the decade of the 90’s alone, and we are poised to having nearly 50% of India living in our cities by the earlier part of the present century.

To meet the challenges of rapid urban development in an integrated manner, India launched a National Urban Housing and Habitat Policy in 2007. The policy seeks to realize the goal of “Affordable Housing for All”, through sustainable development of habitat, towards ensuring equitable supply of land, shelter and services at affordable prices to all sections of society.

An important element of this policy is the "Jawaharlal Nehru National Urban Renewal Mission". This programme seeks to provide seven basic services to the poor, namely, land tenure, affordable shelter, water, sanitation, education, health and social security.

With majority of its population still living in rural areas, India has also been actively promoting affordable rural housing. Dedicated programmes such as "Indira Awaas Yojna", provide direct support through grant-in-aid for construction of dwelling units and upgradation of temporary houses.

The report of the Secretary-General has highlighted the significance of rational land-use planning, green building codes and energy efficient transport options to reducing energy consumption and emissions. In this context, I am happy to mention that India has adopted an Energy Conservation Act and an Energy Efficiency Code for new commercial buildings, and has been promoting use of compressed natural gas for public transport.

Mr. Chairperson,

It is satisfying that the resource mobilization efforts of UN-Habitat have borne fruit. However, it is of concern that regular budget, which provides non-earmarked and predictable funding, remains low. We fully support the demand for enhanced budgetary resources for UN-Habitat.

Enhanced efforts by the international community to provide financial and technical assistance, including transfer of technology, in the areas of poverty eradication and infrastructure support, remain crucial if the human settlements related Millennium Development Goals are to be achieved by developing countries.

I would like to highlight that India has been privileged to share appropriate housing technology, particularly in the field of cost-effective, environment friendly and disaster resistant construction, with fellow developing countries within the framework of South-South cooperation. The international community could strengthen such initiatives through triangular cooperation.

I thank you.
Statement by Gopinath Pandurang Munde, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 61 - Report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, Questions Relating to Refugees, Returnees and Displaced Persons and Humanitarian Questions at the Third Committee of the UNGA.

Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, let me thank the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for his report as well as presentation under this agenda item.

Mr. Chairman,

Sixty years ago, when UNHCR was created for a period of three years, it might not have been anticipated that the institution which was to handle a transient problem of refugee following the World War II, would become a permanent institution. This is a sad indicator of the fact that the situation of refugees has remained protracted. Even today, we continue to remain concerned at these protracted refugee situations. This issue has become increasingly challenging with the numbers of ‘populations of concern’ rising and the UNHCR is unable to adequately access the very people it is supposed to protect.

Nevertheless, let me take this opportunity to commend the UNHCR for the commendable work done since the last 60 years. They have been delivering under extremely difficult and dangerous conditions protection as well as quick emergency response to refugees. We endorse the UNHCR’s advocacy of the approach of repatriation, reintegration, rehabilitation and reconstruction to bring together humanitarian and development actors and funds to ensure allocation of greater resources for conducive environment for sustainable repatriation and returnees.

It is worth noting that the refugees and stateless persons are a particularly vulnerable group, forced to leave the country of their nationality or origin for various reasons. We have long held that adequate attention has not been paid to the widespread and abject poverty and deprivation in which the refugee movements in the developing countries have and continue to take place. We would urge a better analysis and understanding of the underlying reasons that impede durable solutions.

Mr. Chairman,

The latest UNHCR report indicates that at the end of 2009, there were 36.5 million 'people of concern' to UNHCR, including around 10.4 million refugees. As per the same report, the number of internally displaced people has increased to 27.1 million, out of which 15.6 million benefit from UNHCR in some manner. Regrettably, the number of returned refugees (251,000) has steadily decreased since 2004, with 2009 being the lowest level in the last two decades. Yet another alarming statistics has been that in 2009, nearly 0.9 million individuals claimed for asylum or refugee status to various Governments or UNHCR offices, which is an increase of 5 percent compared to last year. This is a pointer to the enormity of the challenge.

In this context, we would also like to acknowledge the changing nature of conflict with the emergence of the role of non-state actors in situations of armed conflict. The international community must address the issue of accountability of these non-state actors, and the limited leverage that the international human rights and humanitarian framework and machinery have over non-state actors. Further, it is equally imperative that the determination of refugee status should conform strictly to UNHCR's mandate to ensure that those guilty of terrorist and criminal acts do not abuse the national asylum systems and the international protection regime.

It is a well recognized fact that the challenges posed by internal displacement is well beyond the capacity of any single organization to handle. We also believe that the primary responsibility to look after the IDPs lies with national authorities. The UNHCR's involvement, therefore, can only complement the efforts of national authorities and cannot substitute them. We would, once again, underline that UNHCR's involvement in IDPs should only be with the concurrence of national authorities. Further, such involvement should be based on due consideration of its mandate, modality of intervention, availability of resources and careful examination of all implications before mainstreaming such activities.

UNHCR represents our collective endeavour to address global refugee concerns. Given the importance and significance of this mandate, it goes without saying that UNHCR must remain a non-partisan and impartial humanitarian actor. We commend it for being one.

A large number of developing countries with limited resources continue to honour their humanitarian obligations, often risking their delicate economies. As is well known, it is predominantly developing countries that constitute countries of origin as well as asylum. Their problems deserve particular attention. In this context the relationship between UNHCR and Member-States must be strengthened further to recognize and acknowledge the in-kind contribution and services of the States hosting refugees.

We are aware of a body of opinion, which places an overwhelming importance on States acceding to Conventions and Protocols as a measure of their commitment to the refugee issue. This is a narrow and restrictive way of looking at this global challenge. We are convinced that the international solidarity and burden sharing are the foundations on which refugee protection rests. The essence of partnership on this issue is in having a shared objective, in accepting the humanitarian dimension of the issue and the need for a global response.

India is not a signatory to the 1951 Convention on Refugees. This is because we believe that this Convention does not address the problem of massive refugee flows or factors like mixed migration, which accompany such flows. Nevertheless, our commitment to humanitarian issues is second to none. We host a large number of refugees, and our programmes relating to them are managed entirely from our resources. At all times, India has demonstrated its abiding commitment to the principles of protection and non-refoulement. Also, the refugees in India have been enjoying full protection of the rule of law, based on the principle of fundamental rights guaranteed by the Indian Constitution.
Mr. Chairman,

India remains committed to working in concert with the UNHCR and the international community to address the international protection agenda for refugees in the region and beyond in a spirit of solidarity. The challenge of ending displacement is inseparable from the challenge of establishing and maintaining peace. The time has also come, to move away from narrow, legalistic approaches, to comprehensive practical solutions, from rhetoric to meaningful action.

Thank you Mr. Chairman.

729. Statement by Dr. Kakoli Ghosh Dastidar, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 66-Elimination of Racism and Racial Discrimination, Agenda Item 67- Rights of Peoples of Self-Determination at the Third Committee of the UNGA.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me begin by thanking the Secretary General for his various reports on the agenda items 'Elimination of racism and racial discrimination' and 'Right of peoples to self-determination' and also thank all the speakers for their useful and valuable presentations. My delegation broadly associates itself with statement made by the Chair of the G-77.

Mr. Chairman,

India, the land of "ahimsa" or non-violence, has and will always be fully committed toward the indispensible goal of elimination of racism and the right of peoples to self-determination. Our fight to end racism stems from the significant contribution of our great leaders more than a century ago when our venerable monk Swami Vivekananda spoke about the concept of universal brotherhood. Mahatma Gandhi’s tireless struggle against the abhorrent crime of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and other related intolerances is historic, significant and memorable.

It was, therefore innate and instinctive that at independence, adequate safeguards were built into the Indian Constitution and the Indian Penal Code against racism. Our commitment is inherent in Article 14 and 15 of our Constitution, which enshrines the principle of equality and expressly prohibits discrimination on the grounds of race.

These Constitutional and legal provisions are effectively and vigorously implemented by various instruments of governance in India and are further buttressed by the energetic and committed civil society and a vocal media that provides necessary vigil as well as support for elimination of all forms of discrimination.

Mr Chairman,

Though the era of colonialism and imperialism is now well behind us, it is unfortunate that even today people's attitudes and their very deeply imbibed beliefs fuel racial hatred and discrimination. As we work towards a world free of the racial prejudices of the past. The recrudescence of racism and xenophobia in different parts of the world has been a disturbing phenomenon. The world today continues to see real and tenacious manifestations of racial discrimination, despite the fact that none want to be seen as racist themselves.

Mr. Chairman,

We would also like to caution against the improbable linkage of racial discrimination with some of the other forms of discriminations or intolerance. We would in particular like to emphasize on the improper association of religious intolerance with racial discrimination. The discourse on the so-called "multiple discrimination" should not be allowed to dilute the commitment and determination necessary to combat racial discrimination and related intolerance.

We have to continue our fight, not just in the United Nations, but also in our own countries by promulgating stringent national laws, strict implementation and most importantly, ensure that attitudinal behaviour of people are changed. The mindful nurturing of multi-cultural, democratic and pluralistic traditions; inculcation of tolerance and respect for diversity; and implementation of appropriate educational and legislative strategies would perhaps provide the surest guarantee against racial prejudice, discrimination and xenophobia.

We would like to reiterate our firm commitment to the implementation of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (ICERD) and Durban Declaration and Programme of Action and seek to create more effective measures to enhance its effective implementation.

Mr. Chairman,

Self-determination has long been recognized as the right of peoples of non-self governing colonies and trust territories to independence and self-government. India’s ongoing efforts to secure the right of peoples to self-determination is momentous and India has played a vital role in the struggle for decolonization, in order to ensure that people who live under subjugation, domination and exploitation, are afforded the right to freely determine their own political status and pursue their economic, social and cultural development.

Mr. Chairman

India’s support to Palestine has always been unwavering and we will continue to extend solidarity to its people. India believes that the solution to the Palestine issue should be based on the relevant UN Resolutions, the Arab Peace Plan and the Quartet Roadmap resulting in a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine living within secure and recognized borders, side by side at peace with Israel.

Mr. Chairman,

I would like to remind the distinguished representative of Pakistan, who made innumerable references to the Indian State of Jammu and Kashmir in his statement, that the State of Jammu and Kashmir is an integral part of the Union of India where free and fair elections have been time and again. India, Mr Chairman, is an open, inclusive and democratic polity with a vibrant public and media discourse and adequate mechanisms to redress issues concerning our people. I would urge the delegation of Pakistan to refrain from using this forum to detract from the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people to self-determination.

Mr. Chairman

With freedom, comes responsibility. The right to self-determination cannot be abused to encourage secession and undermine pluralistic and democratic states.

Moreover, there is no room for self-determination to be distorted and misinterpreted as a right of a group, on the basis of ethnicity, religion or racial criteria, or any other such categorization, and use it to attempt to undermine the sovereignty and territorial integrity of state. Ethnic or religious segregation cannot be legitimised on the ground that societies need to be constituted on homogenous lines before they can be tolerant towards diversity and accept multi-culturalism. Such a view will only aid forces of extreme nationalism. Lastly, the international community and the world at large must work toward the total and complete elimination of racism, as lukewarm acceptance is more bewildering than outright rejection.

Thank you, Mr Chairman.
730. Statement by Gopinath Pandurang Munde, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 63 - Report of the Human Rights Council at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

My delegation would like to thank the President of the Human Rights Council (HRC) for his presentation as well as report under the agenda item 63 titled "Report of the Human Rights Council".

Mr. President,

Since its creation in 2006, the Human Rights Council has played a commendable role. This has helped the Council to achieve its pre-eminent, legitimate and premier position in dealing with human rights issue in the international scene.

We are encouraged by the broad consensus that the Council has been a considerable improvement over its predecessor, the Commission on Human Rights, and has addressed human rights issues in a more constructive manner.

This has been possible mainly owing to the Council's basic shift in emphasis on principles of universality, impartiality, objectivity and capacity-building that underlie its mechanisms, agenda and programme of work, and methods of work.

Mr. President,

The Council's strength also lies in its emphasis on dialogue, cooperation, transparency and non-selectivity in the promotion and protection of all human rights and fundamental freedom for all.

In substantive terms, the enthusiastic participation of Member States in the Universal Periodic Review (UPR) process till date is a pointer in this direction. This also underscores the success of this innovative mechanism, which has provided a platform for sharing of national experiences and best practices in consultation and with the consent of the country concerned.
It is also worth noting that the UPR has generated a new momentum towards ratification of core international human rights instruments, submission of periodic reports to treaty bodies, better cooperation with special procedures, greater openness towards human rights complaints procedures, and enactment of national measures in line with the obligations of a State Party under relevant human rights instruments.

Mr. President,

I am happy to note the proactive attitude of the Human Rights Council in examining and reacting to several emergent human rights situations. Since its creation, the Council, in addition to its fifteen regular meetings, has also convened thirteen special sessions to deliberate on issues of special concerns. This has helped in further reinforcing and strengthening the Council's credibility internationally and also provided an appropriate forum for Member States to raise human rights issue.

Mr. President,

We are in the fifth year of the establishment of the Council. This has given us an opportunity to ensure that we learn from the current functioning and practices of the Council and formalise them in the on-going review of the Human Rights Council. We hope that our review efforts are based on an inclusive approach, which respects diversity in historical national experiences, cultures and development.

In this regard, we would like to welcome the discussions which took place last week in first meeting of the Open-ended Intergovernmental Working Group on the Review of the Work and Functioning of the Human Rights Council.

During the review process, we feel that the Council should consider streamline its programme of work by meeting in two regular sessions for a total of eight weeks every year, with the remaining third session of two weeks be added to the existing programme for Universal Periodic Review (UPR).

In addition, in order to give necessary focus on the intergovernmental nature of the Council, we would support preserving the procedural and organisational role for the President of the Human Rights Council and the Bureau.
We would also like to reiterate that the Complaint Procedure with the Council should be retained while exploring the possibility of streamlining its functioning. We believe that it serves a useful purpose and its effectiveness can be judged from the relatively high rate of both quality and timely responses from States.

Mr. President,

Having created the Human Rights Council as the subsidiary body of the UN General Assembly, we appreciate the current practice of the presentation of the report of the Council in the General Assembly directly, with the understanding that all its recommendations are considered and acted upon by the Third Committee of the UN General Assembly.

We would also call for putting in place mechanisms and procedures by which the decisions of the General Assembly, especially those with financial implications, on the report of the Council can be acted upon quickly by shortening the time of consideration of financial implications by ACABQ and the Fifth Committee, so as to minimize the time-lag being experienced currently.

Mr. President,

India attaches considerable importance to the promotion and protection of human rights. India remains committed in making the Human Rights Council a strong, effective and efficient body capable of promoting and protecting human rights and fundamental freedoms for all.

I would also like to say that a spirit of cooperation and mutual understanding should guide the work of the Human Rights Council. We reiterate our firm commitment to continue to engage constructively with all Member States, and strive to ensure that the Council retains its preeminent place in the international human rights arena.

Thank you, Mr. President.
Mr. Chairperson,

We thank the Secretary General and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) for the reports on “International Trade and Development”.

Mr. Chairperson,

We are yet to overcome the after effects of the multiple crises. The global economy, though on its recovery path, is still fragile. As such, our collective efforts must be geared to ensure a strong, sustained and balanced global economic growth. This is a pre-requisite for addressing poverty eradication, employment creation and attainment of the MDGs, especially in developing countries.

International trade has an important role to play in enhancing global economic recovery and in promoting a sustainable and job oriented growth in developing countries. However, due to difficulties in market access, lack of capacity for trade and lack of concessional finance and credit, developing countries especially the LDCs are hardly in position to optimize their share in global commerce.

The LDCs share in global trade in 2009 was about 1% and if oil is excluded from it, it would go down to 0.4%.

UNCTAD in its report on trade and development has highlighted the need to maintain balance between domestic and overseas demand for sustainable economic growth. We fully concur with this suggestion.

To offset the negative impact of an export led growth, we are of the view that countries must pursue an export strategy that looks for diversification of markets and products.
The lower volatility of services export to income shocks highlighted the relative resilience of services trade to the crisis. Hence, export diversification by developing countries into the services sector would be conducive to building economic resilience and reducing excessive dependence on commodity.

Mr. Chairperson,

The onus lies on the global community to create an international trading regime which is equitable and fair; one from which developing countries can truly benefit. We must also find solutions to adding value to the products of developing countries, in place of simply perpetuating the role of developing countries being providers of raw materials.

In this regard, we look forward to an ambitious, fair, balanced and equitable outcome of the Doha Round; one that corrects the present imbalances and truly reflects a developmental agenda.

We also need to work to lower trade barriers and shun protectionism to stimulate global trade.

There is a heightened sense of food insecurity today, especially in poor countries. Livelihood of billions of people depends on agriculture in the developing world. India, therefore, places high importance to the Special Safeguard Mechanism in the Doha Round and on the need to maintain a balance between agriculture and NAMA in the text.

Mr. Chairperson,

Promoting the benefits of trade must take into account the special needs of developing countries, particularly the Small Island Developing States, Landlocked Developing Countries and Least Developed Countries.

India also calls for the full implementation of the Duty Free Quota Free market access for the LDCs by the international community as mandated by the Hong Kong WTO Declaration.

Technology plays a key role in promoting development. Issues that affect humankind at large must be given special treatment.

India supports flexibilities in the Agreement on TRIPS for public health concerns and stresses the need to extend such flexibilities to climate-change technology transfer. We also support measures to make intellectual property rules fully supportive of the objectives of the Convention on Biological Diversity.

Mr. Chairperson,

The reform of global financial and economic institutions lies at the heart of creating a more responsive, equitable and democratic global economic order.

India seeks to strengthen the voice of developing countries in the Bretton Woods Institutions. In this regard, we welcome the recent IMF quota shift of over six % to dynamic emerging markets and developing countries by 2012.

I thank you.

732. Statement by Dr. Kakoli Ghosh Dastidar, Member of Parliament, on the Situation in Afghanistan at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

At the outset, I would like to express India's appreciation for scheduling this discussion on a subject of great significance for us, our region and the world. I also commend the German delegation for coordinating intergovernmental negotiations in an excellent manner that has led us to this annual General Assembly resolution on the "Situation in Afghanistan".

As we have been doing for the last several years, we are happy to co-sponsor this resolution, which is traditionally adopted by consensus.

Mr. President,

The efforts of the international community in Afghanistan have increasingly focused on security, development, governance and regional and international cooperation issues with the overall objective of the Afghan government eventually assuming full responsibility and taking charge of Afghanistan's destiny. There have been significant political developments during this year including the London Conference, the Kabul Conference and the Parliamentary elections.

The Kabul Conference marked a new phase in the partnership of the Afghan Government and international community - the Kabul Process and a renewed commitment to a secure, prosperous and democratic Afghanistan. The Conference demonstrated Afghan Government's determination to take full responsibility for Afghanistan's own development, security and governance, and the international community's willingness to realign international assistance in accordance with Afghanistan's priorities and action plans. The success of Kabul Process largely depends on detailing and implementing the commitments flowing from the Kabul Conference.

Tangible and sustained improvements on the security front are a prerequisite for realizing these shared goals. Indeed, improved security could create an enabling environment for an accelerated progress on development and governance issues. This is also critical in expanding the footprint of the Afghan Government and ensuring the greater ownership of these processes by the Afghan people. For these processes to be enduring, Afghan ownership should go hand-in-hand with Afghan leadership.

The holding of national assembly elections on September 18, 2010 was an important step forward in strengthening the democratic framework in Afghanistan. India appreciates the resoluteness and determination of the Afghan people who participated in these elections, notwithstanding threats and intimidation by the Taliban. I would be remiss if I do not place on record our appreciation for the Afghan Government's lead role and the critical supportive role played by the UN and the international community towards organizing these elections.

Mr. President,

India's relationship with Afghanistan is multi-faceted characterized by civilizational, trade and cultural exchanges stretching back to antiquity.

India is committed to the unity, integrity and independence of Afghanistan underpinned by democracy and cohesive pluralism and free from external interference. India has contributed to these goals through our Development Partnership which is implemented entirely in accordance with the priorities of the Afghan Government and people. Our Assistance programmes are spread all over Afghanistan and cover all sectors of development: humanitarian, infrastructural, institution and capacity building, small-scale quick gestation projects, and agriculture. The ultimate aim of our assistance, which presently stands at over US$ 1.3 bn, is to strengthen the capacity of the Afghan state and people to stand on their own feet in the areas of governance and services for the Afghan people.

Turning to the regional aspect, Mr. President, Afghanistan’s stability and economic development depend a lot on its neighbours and the region as a whole. Afghanistan's greatest economic potential perhaps resides in its immense potential as a trade, transport and energy hub, and as a bridge linking Central, West, South Asia and the Gulf. Its prosperity also depends on the consumer market of nearly 1.5 billion people in the South-Asian sub-continent.

However, for this to materialize, Afghanistan’s neighbours need to come together to forge greater regional cooperation and facilitate trade and transit. We must expand, rather than hinder, trade, transit and transport ties, including overland transit and trade. That is the best way of bringing the regional dimension into play in a positive manner.

Growing economic inter-dependence will also help in weaning disaffected youth away from insurgency and militancy and in creating a zone of co-prosperity in the region. We support the wishes of the Government of Afghanistan to take the lead in this direction.

Mr. President,

Peace and reintegration efforts in Afghanistan could succeed provided they are fully Afghan-led and Afghan-owned and carry all sections of Afghanistan’s population together as well as abide by the redlines agreed to at the London Conference and later reaffirmed at the Kabul Conference, i.e., giving up violence, cutting off all links with terrorist groups, and accepting the democratic and pluralistic values of the Afghan Constitution, including women's rights.

Moving forward, it is important that the international community must keep in mind the lessons learnt from past experiences at negotiating with fundamentalist and extremist organizations and ensure that any peace process is conducted in an inclusive and transparent manner. Adequate capacity of the Afghan security forces and other Afghan institutions is a sine qua non for protecting Afghanistan’s sovereignty, plurality and democracy. Gains of the last nine years stand to be squandered if this aspect does not receive the attention that it deserves as the international community ponders its next steps regarding Afghanistan.

Security and stabilization of Afghanistan will remain a distant goal unless we are able to isolate and root out the syndicate of terrorism, which includes elements of Al Qaeda, Taliban, LeT and other terrorist and extremist groups operating from within and outside Afghanistan’s borders. The fight against terrorism cannot be compartmentalized. It is essential to ensure that support, sustenance and sanctuaries for terrorist organizations from outside Afghanistan are ended forthwith.

It is worrisome that despite reinforced International Security Assistance Force (ISAF)’s presence, there has been a continuing deterioration in the security environment. The latest report of the UNSG notes that there has been a 69% increase in security incidents as compared to the same months in 2009.

Mr. President,

In conclusion, in the arduous journey for lasting peace, prosperity and stability in Afghanistan, Afghanistan needs a long-term commitment of the international community to successfully confront the challenges that lie ahead while progressively taking charge of its own destiny.

The international community must remain steadfast in its commitment in supporting Afghanistan. The Kabul Conference was a major step in the right direction. We welcome these efforts and are fully supportive of them. We appreciate the good work done by UNAMA.

Thank you
Mr. Chairman,

Let me at the outset welcome and thank you for convening this Peacebuilding Annual High-Level Stakeholders Meeting today at a time when our endeavours for peace and security, globally, stand at a critical juncture. Mr. Chairman, international community’s response to post-conflict societies stands enriched with what UN peacekeepers have been delivering tirelessly on the ground and with the recent Peacebuilding initiatives.

India recognizes PBF as a critical constituent of the larger architecture in our quest to achieve lasting, enduring and sustainable peace in post conflict societies. In this regard, today’s event is timely, relevant and opportune for us to take stock of what we have achieved thus far and the way forward.

Mr. Chairman,

As a contributor to the Peacebuilding Fund and as a member of the Peacebuilding Commission, India has remained actively engaged in the critical task of peacebuilding. We will continue our active association with both, the Commission and the Fund, with a view to enable these institutions fulfill their assigned tasks.

Mr. Chairman, in this spirit, I am happy to announce a fresh contribution of 2 million dollars (USD) to the Peacebuilding Fund.

Mr. Chairman,

India believes that Peacebuilding Commission has bridged a critical gap in attaining peace and security. We believe and hope that the Commission will make significant contributions to the recovery, reconstruction and development of countries emerging from conflict, wherever it agrees to act upon a request for advice and assistance by a Member State.

It is with this conviction that India had engaged proactively in formulating the revised terms of reference for the Peacebuilding Fund and had co-sponsored a resolution in the same spirit. We are happy to note that the Secretary General’s Annual Report on the Peacebuilding Fund notes that its revised terms of reference have enabled the Fund “to serve as a fast-disbursing, agile, responsive, and risk-taking peacebuilding instrument”.

Mr. Chairman,

It is imperative that the relationship between the Commission and the donors is managed creatively, so that the synergies presents in the Peacebuilding Architecture are harnessed optimally.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me conclude by stressing two important imperatives:

First, we must always strive to ensure that there is an effective two-way dialogue between countries on the Agenda of the Peacebuilding Commission and the Commission itself through at all stages. Second, there is a need to improve the governance structure of the peacebuilding architecture. PBC and PBF should be in a position to respond swiftly and with greater efficiency so that all available resources that are geared towards peacebuilding in post conflict situations are harnessed optimally and expeditiously.

Thank You, Mr. Chairman
734. Statement By Bhubaneswar Kalita, Member of Parliament, at the 2010 United Nations Pledging Conference for Development Activities at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

Allow me to congratulate you, and other members of the Bureau, on your election as Chairman of the 2010 United Nations Pledging Conference.

India is strongly committed to the development mandate of the United Nations, which must be accorded the highest priority. Our participation in this Pledging Conference demonstrates India's continued and unwavering faith in the development agenda of the United Nations.

At the recently concluded High-level Plenary Meeting on the Millennium Development Goals, our Heads of State and Government reaffirmed their commitment to eradicating poverty, disease and hunger that transcends national borders, as well as their resolve to work together to ensure that the right to development is a reality for everyone sooner rather than later.

We are particularly sensitive to the multi-dimensional impact of underdevelopment and poverty in vulnerable countries including the Least Developed, Landlocked and Small Island Developing countries and most of Africa. The international community must strengthen the role of the United Nations in multilateral development cooperation to help address their special needs.

One of the most important factors in stepping up our struggle to bring development to vulnerable populations worldwide will be the quantum of resources marshaled by the international community in this effort. It hardly bears mentioning that stagnation or, worse still, a decline in funding to the development activities of the UN poses a threat to the viability of operational activities and severely circumscribes its ability to work at the country level.
Despite our own challenges and constraints, India has consistently contributed to both increasing core resources availability to the UN Funds and Programmes and to enhancing the predictability of the funds provided to operational activities of the UN system.

This year, we would like to welcome the creation of the newly created consolidated gender entity UN WOMEN. I wish to pledge India's full and unequivocal support to UN WOMEN in its critical mandate of gender equality and the empowerment of women.

Mr. President,

I now have the honour to announce India’s pledges of contributions for operational activities for development of the UN system for the year 2011.

I thank you, Mr. President.
Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, my delegation thanks the Executive Director of the Office of the Administration of Justice, Mr. Andrei Terekhov for introducing the report of the Secretary General on Administration of Justice at the United Nations. We also thank the United Nations Ombudsman, Mr. Johnston Barkat, for introducing the report of the Secretary General on the activities of his Office. We convey our appreciation to Ms. Susan Mclurg, the Chairperson of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ), for introducing the related report of the advisory committee. We further thank the Vice-President of the Staff-Management Coordination Committee (SMCC), Ms. Paulina Analena for her statement.

My delegation aligns itself with the statement made by Yemen on behalf of the Group of 77 and China.

Mr. Chairman,

My delegation is encouraged with the progress recorded by the new system of internal justice since its birth in July 2009. Even in the short time that the system has been operational, it is evident that it represents a marked improvement over its predecessor. Some of the benefits from the new system are already visible. We particularly welcome the timelier disposition of cases since last year with finalization of a case taking an average of six months. The new system accords primacy of place to the fundamental axiom of "justice delayed is justice denied."

In this regard, we would like to place on record our appreciation of the commendable effort and dedication demonstrated by the judges and staff in navigating the transition from the old system.
Mr. Chairman,

We remain supportive of informal conflict resolution through the use of ombudsman and mediation services as a first step of recourse under the new system. These efforts should be further strengthened, so as to enhance accountability and have a positive impact on human resources management by facilitating speedier resolution of disputes and promoting mutual trust, harmony and understanding between the staff and the management.

We share the disappointment of the ACABQ with regard to delays in finalizing cost sharing agreements with the funds and programmes. We reiterate paragraph 62 of resolution 62/228, wherein the General Assembly had approved the cost sharing arrangement for the new system of administration of justice on the basis of "headcount" approach, rather than on the basis of actual cases disposed, as proposed by the funds and programmes. We urge the Secretary-General to expedite early conclusion of the cost-sharing arrangement.

Mr. Chairman,

My delegation broadly concurs with the ACABQ's reasoning that any meaningful assessment of the new system would require more time and experience before a determination on what more needs to be done is taken. Nevertheless, we remain open to considering specific resource requests on a case-by-case basis. We further support strengthening of the Office of Staff Legal Assistance as we believe that the continued availability of legal assistance to staff is crucial to the efficacy of the new system.

We have noted the Secretary-General's requests for adequate funds for translation and interpretation services, and for granting travel entitlements to the Appeals Tribunal judges based on that provided to former judges of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal.

Mr. Chairman,

In concluding, it must be underscored that the new system will ultimately be judged by the confidence it inspires amongst Staff that their grievances will be addressed professionally, fairly and in a timely manner. We further hope that the new system of administration of justice would remain consistent with the outcome of the overall reform of human resources management within the United Nations System.

A good beginning has been made. Let us build on it so as to meet the goal of an independent, transparent, professionalized, adequately resourced and decentralized system of internal justice.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

736. Statement by Bhubaneswar Kalita, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 29 - Report of the Security Council; and 119 - Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council and other Related Matters at the UNGA.

New York, November 11, 2010.

Mr. President,

I am honoured to address the General Assembly on behalf of my country on the Report of the Security Council and the Question of equitable representation on and increase in the membership of the Security Council and related matters.

We thank the delegation of the United Kingdom for introducing the annual report of the Security Council for the period 1 August 2009 to 31 July 2010. We would also like to thank the delegation of Nigeria for their efforts in preparing the "Introduction" section of the report.

My delegation would also like to place on record our appreciation for the delegation of Uganda for convening an informal meeting with Member States on 21 October for the preparation of the report.

At the outset, let me state that we align ourselves with the statement to be made by the distinguished Permanent Representative of Jamaica on behalf of the L.69 Group on Security Council reforms.
Mr. President,

In our view, the report of the Security Council is an important means for facilitating interaction between the most representative organ of the United Nations and its most empowered brethren. The UN Charter itself bestows on the report a profound gravitas as is evident from the fact that there exists a separate provision mandating such a report, rather than clubbing it with the provision for reports from other UN bodies.

It is, therefore, imperative that the annual report of the Security Council inform, highlight and analyze the measures that it has decided upon or taken to maintain international peace and security during the reporting period.

The membership of the General Assembly has repeatedly requested that this report be more analytical and incisive than becoming a mere narration of events. It is important the General Assembly be aware not only of what decisions were taken, but also the rationale, efficacy and impact of the Council's decisions, in terms of crystallized take-aways for the membership of the General Assembly.

At the same time, however, let us give credit where it is due. I refer in particular to the resolution adopted by the 64th UN General Assembly on "Revitalization of the work of the General Assembly." Operative Paragraph 9 refers to the improvements that have been made in the quality of the annual reports and encourages the Council to make further improvements as necessary.

Like other delegations, we are of the view that while we may have covered a few yards, but we still have miles ahead of us.

Mr. President,

The UN membership must recognize that the lacunae in the report are a manifestation of the underlying problems of representation and working methods of the Council, which remain opaque and non-inclusive. The report, this year too, continues to be a statistical compilation of events, a bland summary and listing of meetings and outcome documents.

There is no other option but to recognize that the real solution not only for a more credible, legitimate and representative Council, but even for a more thorough report lies in the comprehensive reform of the Council, including expansion in both the permanent and non-permanent categories, and its working methods.

In this context, it is important to note that an overwhelming majority of member states have clearly expressed their preference for such a reform during the five rounds of intergovernmental negotiations held so far on the issue of reform of the Council.

Mr. President,

We are enthused by the fact that you have undertaken a number of quick and commendable steps thereby ensuring that the General Assembly remains faithful to the central directive of its Decision No.64/568 of 13 September, namely "to immediately continue intergovernmental negotiations on Security Council reform in informal plenary of the General Assembly at its sixty-fifth session."

At the earliest instance, on 1st October this year to be precise, you re-appointed Ambassador Zahir Tanin as the Chair of the intergovernmental negotiations on Council reforms. And on 21 October you convened a meeting of the entire UN membership on this important issue.

My delegation welcomes these steps which reflect the resolve of the vast majority of the UN membership for achieving early reform.

These actions hopefully bode well for the process. There exists sufficient basis for optimism that, by the end of the current session of the General Assembly, we will be able to achieve concrete results on Security Council reform under your stewardship and guidance.

Equally, Mr. President, we are happy that with each passing day, countries and leaders around the world are publicly articulating their support for India’s candidature as a new permanent member of an expanded Security Council. Most recently, India received affirmation of support from the US President Barack Obama. The Indian delegation takes this opportunity to thank the US side for this kind gesture. We also call on other nations to extend their valuable support to us.

We also hope that the UN Secretary General will complement your initiative and enthusiasm in the context of Council reforms. This issue, without doubt acquires salience in the coming year as the Secretary General prepares for his second term.

Mr. President,

In both our individual capacity, and as a member of two groupings devoted to early reform of the Council, namely the G4 and the L69, India would like to highlight certain salient features of the various proposals and positions as captured in the negotiation text.

First, the overwhelming majority of UN member-states have expressed their clear preference for expansion of the Council in both its permanent and non-permanent categories.

Second, on the size of the Council, there is convergence on the need for expansion from the current fifteen to a figure in the mid-twenties. Also, most of the positions have called for a mandatory review after a period ranging from eight to fifteen years.

Third, the G4 position on the "question of the veto? is unambiguous and constructive. We stress the need for an outcome that ensures the democratization of decision-making within the Council. India is willing to engage with all concerned with an open mind on this key issue.

Fourth, India associates itself with the growing clamour for early reform of working methods of the Council.

Fifth, on the issue of regional representation, we lay great store by the principle of equitable geographical distribution. India supports a Charter-based distribution of seats that addresses the lack of representation of African, Latin American and Caribbean countries and the lack of adequate representation of Asian countries in the permanent membership; as well as the lack of adequate representation of developing countries, including least developed, landlocked countries and small island states in the non-permanent membership.

And finally, India calls for the General Assembly and the Security Council as two principal organs of the UN to respect each other's distinct roles, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter, so as to secure the effective functioning of the UN as a whole.
Mr. President,

In conclusion, we are both ready and willing to reach out to other countries and to work in close cooperation with them towards the goal of achieving urgent reform of the Council in keeping with the changing realities of the current times.

We need to shorten the negotiation text and then proceed wholeheartedly into real negotiations. This is the view of the overwhelming majority of the UN membership, besides being the only logical course of action for anyone even remotely committed to reform.

Let me assure you and the rest of the UN membership of our willingness to remain constructive and reasonably flexible on all issues on the table in the months to come and urge other delegations to do likewise.

Thank you, Mr. President.

737. Statement by Dinesh Chandra Yadav, Member of Parliament, on Agenda Item 161 - Report of the Committee on Relations with the Host Country at the Sixth Committee of the UNGA.

New York, November 11, 2010.

Madam Chairperson,

We thank the Chairperson of the "Committee on Relations with the Host Country" for his Report.

The Committee on Relations with the Host Country provides a useful forum for addressing issues relating to the functioning of Missions of Member States and for enabling their representatives to perform their functions without hindrance.

This year the Committee examined a number of problems raised by interested delegations on "acceleration of immigration and custom procedures", "entry visas issued by the host country", and "security of missions and safety of their personnel", "question of privileges and immunities", "transportation" and other matters. The open and transparent exchange of views in this forum helped in addressing the issues in question in a spirit of cooperation and in accordance with international law.

Madam Chairperson,

India had brought to the attention of the Committee the issue of property taxes being imposed by the City of New York on diplomatic premises used by the Permanent Mission of India to the United Nations to house its diplomats. The issue is presently being pursued in New York Courts.

I am pleased to inform this Committee that while an appeal from the decision of the District Court's decision was pending, the United States Department of State issued a Notice pursuant to the Foreign Missions Act, designating as a "benefit" under the Act an exemption from real property taxes on property owned by foreign governments and used to house the staff of permanent missions to the United Nations or the Organization of American States or of consular posts. The Notice states that the benefit determination preempts all inconsistent state and local laws, and also applies to all property taxes that "have been or will be assessed," on such property.

In a historic 3-0 judgment on 17 August 2010, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit held that the Notice issued by the Department of State was a lawful exercise of the Department's authority under the Foreign Missions Act, and that the Notice operates in this case to render Appellants exempt from the property taxes imposed by the City, and so nullifies the City's existing tax liens against Appellants.

Madam Chairperson,

We thank the Host Government for their active cooperation. Issuance of the Notification is in accordance with international law, the Headquarters Agreement between the UN and the United States, and the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. We look forward to the continued support and active involvement of the Department of State as the City of New York has decided to go in appeal to the United States Supreme Court against the judgment of the Court of Appeals.
Nevertheless, we continue to believe that under international law and the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, my government, being a sovereign, is not liable to pay property tax in respect of the portion of the building of the Permanent Mission owned by it and occupied by its diplomats for residential purposes.

We understand that many Permanent Missions are facing a similar problem. We again urge the host country to do its utmost to resolve the situation that has arisen from a given interpretation of its law. As a friendly country, India does not wish to be seen agitating on such issues in US courts.

Madam Chairperson,

We recognize that the host country has a right to monitor and control entry into its territory and to adopt the requisite security measures it deems necessary. This has to be balanced, on the one hand with the right of the delegations to participate in the work of the United Nations in a timely manner and on the other to ensure that the delegations do not misuse their privileges and immunities.

As regards entry visas, we support the Committee’s recommendation that the host country enhance its efforts to ensure their issuance in a timely manner to enable representatives of Member States to attend official meetings in a timely manner.

We welcome the steps taken by the host country to address the parking problems of diplomatic missions through the efficient implementation of the Parking Program for Diplomatic Vehicles and hope that the remaining issues in this respect, including the request for change of allotted parking slots allotted to our Mission, would be addressed soon.

Thank you, Madam Chairperson.
Mr. President,

Allow me at the outset to congratulate you on assuming the Presidency of the Security Council. I would also like to thank the three distinguished Chairs of the Committees established pursuant to Security Council Resolutions 1267, 1373 and 1540 for their briefings and sharing of their experiences while carrying out the work of these Committees.

Mr. President,

Terrorism is the most abhorrent and heinous crime against humanity as a whole. It continues to be a pervasive and insidious threat not only to global security but also to the core values of the United Nations. It is our firm conviction that no belief, justification, political cause or argument can be used to justify acts of terrorism. We condemn terrorism in all its forms and manifestations, irrespective of its motivations, as criminal and unjustifiable.

There are deep concerns about the potential nexus between clandestine proliferation and terrorism and the ever-present danger of such weapons or vulnerable nuclear materials falling into the hands of non-state actors.

Being a victim of terrorism and worst sufferer for the last many decades, India fully supports all efforts for greater and more meaningful international cooperation in countering and combating the scourge of terrorism.

Mr. President,

We support the anti-terrorism mechanisms established by the United Nations, including United Nations Security Council Resolution 1267, related to sanctions against Al-Qaeda/Taliban; United Nations Security Council Resolution 1373, which led to the establishment of the Counter Terrorism Committee; and United Nations Security Council Resolution 1540, which addressed the issue of non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

We support measures to strengthen the review process of the listings in the Consolidated List through the Office of the Ombudsperson pursuant to the UN Security Council Resolution 1904. At the same time, we are concerned that the process of listing and de-listing in the Consolidated List continues to be subjected to political will and pressure - a scenario we can ill-afford in our united fight against terrorism.

We fully support the Counter Terrorism Committee and the Counter Terrorism Executive Directorate (CTED)'s efforts to play a more effective role in countering terrorism. As the CTED’s mandate comes up for renewal next month, the endeavour should be to enhance coherence and synergy among different counter terrorism structures that are dealing with the issue of terrorism within the UN. We appreciate the Counter Terrorism Committee’s efforts to organize thematic briefings, streamlining its working methods and give more focus to substantive and analytic work.

We have also taken note of the recommendations made in the report of the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism. This requires careful examination and further consideration.

We support efforts of the 1540 Committee towards handling assistance requests by countries and to find means to address the most commonly found gaps in the implementation of Resolution 1540. However, it is important that these activities are performed at the request of Member States while keeping in mind their varying national capacities, procedures and systems.

We look forward to greater efforts to bring together inter-related aspects of the operational mechanism of the 1267 Committee, 1540 Committee and the Counter Terrorism Committee. In this context, the institutionalization of the Counter Terrorism Implementation Task Force (CTITF) in 2009 is a positive step in strengthening UN efforts to countering terrorism by providing an umbrella under which different UN entities can effectively work in a coordinated and coherent manner.

India has an abiding interest in expeditiously concluding the long-pending Comprehensive Convention on International Terrorism (CCIT). An early adoption of CCIT is in the interests of all Member States and would provide impetus to multilateral and collective action to countering international terrorism efforts. The UNSG in his latest report A/64/818 on the Global Counter Terrorist Strategy has rightly pointed out in paragraph 139 that the comprehensiveness of implementing the Strategy will not be complete without the conclusion of the CCIT.

Mr. President,

It is important to bear in mind that the success of implementation of counter-terrorism measures not only requires the fullest collective effort by the entire membership, but also their fullest participation in processes that affect the collective security of all the nations equally.

During our membership of the Security Council from January 2011 onwards, we intend to work very closely with the counter terrorism mechanisms. It would be our endeavour to strengthen ongoing efforts to promote open dialogue and interactive discussions to ensure wider participation of the membership.

Thank You
Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Acting Permanent Representative of India at the special commemorative event to pay tribute to the late Secretary-General of the Union of South American Nations (UNASUR), Mr. Néstor Kirchner (organized by the Permanent Mission of Ecuador, in its capacity as President of UNASUR) at the UNGA.

New York, 15 November 2010.

Mr. President,

Mr. Secretary General and

Your Excellency the Permanent Representative of Ecuador,

It is indeed with a heavy heart that I am standing here on this solemn occasion to deliver a statement on behalf of the Asian Group.

The Asian Group thanks the Permanent Mission of Ecuador, in its capacity as President of the Union of South American Nations (UNASUR) for organizing today's special commemorative event to pay tribute to President Kirchner.

Mr. President,

President Néstor Kirchner was a very important leader who made significant contributions not only to the American continent during the course of a long and impressive political career, but also for the international community, his region and all of us in the South.

Dr. Kirchner was not only a patriot, a politician, a statesman but also an active human rights activist. His untimely demise is not only a great loss to the friendly people of Argentina but will also be mourned by peace-loving admirers in other countries around the world.

As President of Argentina, he played a guiding role for the national economy at a time of serious crisis. His stewardship of the UNASUR was exemplary as was his positive contribution to regional cooperation and development in his region.
We have no doubt that the international community shares the sense of loss and sorrow that our South American brethren are feeling with the passing away of President Kirchner.

On behalf of the Asian Group and the Permanent Mission of India here, I would like to convey heartfelt condolences to Her Excellency, Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner, President of the Argentine Republic and her family and to the grieving people of Argentina. We share in your sense of loss and stand by you during these sad times.

Mr. President,

Please allow me also, to convey, on behalf of the Government and people of India, our profound grief and deepest condolences to the Government and the people of Argentina in the very sad demise of President Néstor Kirchner. In the demise of H.E. Dr. Nestor Kirchner on 27 October 2010, Argentina lost one of its greatest leaders.

Thank you.

Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative, on [a] Agenda Item 13-Integrated and Coordinated Implementation of and followup to the outcomes of the major United Nations Conferences and Summits in the Economic, Social and Related Fields [b] Agenda Item 115 - Follow-up to the outcome of the Millennium Summit-notes by the Secretary-General and [c] Agenda Item 120 - Strengthening of the United Nations System - Notes by Secretary-General at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

At the outset I wish to express our sympathies to New Zealand for the trapped miners and Cambodia for the very tragic deaths in a stampede.
Thank you for organizing today's joint debate on agenda items 13, 115 and 120. The issues that they deal with are central to our collective efforts to strengthen the UN system and even more relevant for the theme that you have chosen for the current General Assembly "Reaffirming the central role of the United Nations in global governance".

Mr. President,

India has all along emphasized that sustaining economic growth is the key for poverty eradication. It is also imperative that the fruits of development reach across the board and result in inclusive growth and the achievement of MDGs.

We are happy to co-sponsor the resolution titled "Sustained, inclusive and equitable economic growth for poverty eradication and achievement of MDGs" for adoption by the General Assembly today.

In this regard, we recognise the crucial role of the Economic and Social Council in pushing for a comprehensive development agenda at the United Nations through an integrated and coordinated approach.

Mr. President,

Let me now turn to the WHO report. We, of course, align ourselves with the statement by the Chair of G-77 on the report

Like many other countries, India is also undergoing "epidemiologic transition" with the initial high burden of disease and mortality due to infectious diseases gradually giving way to Non Communicable Diseases, injuries and geriatric problems as the main burden of disease.

It is estimated that today 42% of all deaths in India are due to NCD and we have lost millions of potentially productive years of life, due to premature deaths caused by cardiovascular disease in the age group of 35-64 years. This also signifies the enormity of the challenge we face.

There is also emerging evidence that poor people are particularly vulnerable to NCDs owing to high rates of smoking and tobacco use, occupational risks, and living conditions.
Mr. President,

The Government of India has accorded very high priority to the health care in our country. The Flagship National Rural Health Mission is using innovative and decentralized approaches to public health with strong involvement of the local community.

The Ministry of Health and Family Welfare in India have also formulated various national programmes for NCDs including national programme for prevention and control of diabetes, cardio-vascular disease and cerebro-vascular diseases (stroke); National Cancer Control Program and National Mental Health Programme.

While obviously, much is being invested on the prevention and health promotion side, we, of course, need to tackle the need for affordable treatment. With NCD becoming a major issue globally, it is imperative that policies on access to safe drugs also ensure their affordability for all.

We look forward to the high-level meeting of the General Assembly in September 2011, as it would give us an opportunity to bring global attention to this important and growing developmental challenge.

Mr. President,

My delegation welcomes the report of the JIU on "selection and conditions of service of Executive Heads in the United Nations system organizations." It is a long overdue evaluation of the legal and institutional framework and practices in the selection and appointment of such senior officials.

We are firmly of the view that the relevant legislative bodies, whether it is the General Assembly in the case of the Secretary-General or the governing bodies in the case of the Funds, Programmes and specialized agencies, should have a greater role in such appointments.

My delegation has repeatedly voiced our strong support for a greater say for the General Assembly in the process of selection of the Secretary General, most recently in the context of our discussion on "Revitalization of the General Assembly".
This report of the JIU should give an impetus to the discussion amongst Member-States to enhance the role of the General Assembly in selection of the Secretary-General.

The situation is not much different in the case of executive heads of the Funds and Programmes. The process of consulting the governing bodies must involve real engagement with members. We would not like to see it reduced to a mere pro forma exercise which is regrettfully the case at present, with members given unrealistically tight time frames to react to the Secretary-General’s recommendation.

My delegation believes the JIU has offered useful recommendations on selection and conditions of service of executive heads in the United Nations system. It supports the objective of making the process and system more transparent, effective, and accountable by involving its principal stake-holders. We urge Member-States to give it careful consideration.

Thank you, Mr. President.

741. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, on Agenda Item 37 "Question of Palestine" at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

I thank you for convening this discussion on the Question of Palestine at the General Assembly. Yesterday we marked the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People. This allows all of us to underline our support for the people of Palestine in their quest for peace and justice.

Mr. President,

The support for the Palestinian cause has been a central feature of India’s foreign policy even before it achieved independence in 1947. Starting with our vote against partition of Palestine, through India's recognition of the PLO in 1974 as the sole and legitimate representative of the Palestinian people and our recognition of the state of Palestine in 1988, India has consistently stood by the Palestinian people.

Mr. President,

Our Prime Minister in his message on the occasion of the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People has reiterated India's unwavering support for the Palestinian people's struggle for a sovereign, independent, viable and united State of Palestine with East Jerusalem as its capital living within secure and recognized borders, side by side and at peace with Israel as endorsed in the Arab Peace initiative, Quartet Road map and relevant UN Security Council Resolutions.

India's solidarity with Palestine's struggle for the realization of its fundamental rights is an article of faith for us and enjoys national consensus in India. India has and will always support the Palestinian people in their pursuit of legitimate goals and quest for development based on dignity and self-reliance.

Towards this objective, India extended further budgetary support of US $ 10 million to the Palestine National Authority earlier this year in addition to a similar contribution last, to assist in their work of reconstruction and development. India has also continued to support UNRWA through its annual contribution of $ 1 million.

Mr. President,

India welcomes the direct talks between Israel and Palestine and reiterates its full support for efforts to achieve a durable, comprehensive and just settlement. We sincerely hope that the talks and negotiations would lead to a comprehensive peace process for final resolution of the Middle East conflict.

We remain convinced that lasting peace in the region will contribute to global stability and prosperity.

Thank You.
Mr. President,

I am honoured to address the General Assembly on behalf of India at today's joint debate. We believe that the issue of General Assembly revitalization has assumed particular significance in recent years.

My delegation was therefore encouraged by the theme chosen by the President of the General Assembly, Dr. Joseph Deiss for the general debate of the 65th General Assembly in September this year, namely, "Reaffirming the central role of the United Nations in global governance" for which we would like to place on record our appreciation. We also welcome his personal attention to matters of badly needed institutional reforms, in particular reform of the Security Council and revitalization of the work of the General Assembly.

Mr. President,

The starting point of my delegation's position on the issue of General Assembly revitalization is the firm belief that the General Assembly can be revitalized only when its position as the chief deliberative, policy-making and representative organ of the United Nations is respected both in letter and in spirit.

The General Assembly should take the lead in setting the global agenda and restoring the centrality of the United Nations in formulating multilateral approaches to resolving transnational issues. This was the role intended for the Assembly in Article 10 of the UN Charter, namely that it discuss any questions or matters within the scope of the present Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organs provided for in the Charter, i.e. the Security Council, the ECOSOC, Trusteeship Council, the ICJ as well as the Secretariat.
Mr. President,

My delegation participated actively in the deliberations of the Ad Hoc Working Group on General Assembly revitalization in the 64th session. We provided a number of inputs at the meetings held during the last session. These inputs were provided in a spirit of constructive engagement and we are pleased that these were taken on board in the negotiations leading to the adoption of Resolution 64/301.

I am happy to place on record our appreciation for the good work done by the Co-Chairs of the Ad Hoc Working Group last year, Ambassador Sanja Štiglic of Slovenia and Ambassador Jorge Argüello of Argentina. Equally, I would like to place on record my delegation’s appreciation for the work done by the Algerian delegation as the NAM Chair on this issue as well as for the other negotiating partners who worked in a spirit of cooperation.

While we are generally happy that Resolution 64/301 has been able to highlight some of the important steps required on our collective journey towards a revitalized General Assembly, we firmly believe, Mr. President, that we have some distance to travel.

Mr. President,

Let me place on record my delegation’s resolve to continue to actively participate in the deliberations on this issue in the current session. We are enthused by the fact that you have chosen two outstanding and distinguished colleagues of mine, H.E. Mr. Camillo Gonsalves, the Permanent Representative of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines and H.E. Mr. Dalius Cekoulis, Permanent Representative of the Republic of Lithuania to Co-Chair this year’s Ad Hoc Working Group. They can count on the Indian delegation as they go about their important task.

Mr. President,

Without prejudging the proceedings of the Ad Hoc Working Group that should start soon, I would like to place on record the Indian delegation’s considered views on some of the important aspects of issue of General Assembly Revitalization.

First of all, it is critical that we establish a proper relationship of respect for respective mandates between the General Assembly and the Security Council in the spirit of the Charter. In this it is particularly important that the Council not encroach upon the mandate of the General Assembly through extremely wide and permissive interpretations of what constitutes a threat to international peace and security, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression and to the situations under which it can take action under Chapter VII of the UN Charter.

As we prepare to join the Security Council, after a gap of 19 years, it is clear that the Council's agenda is, to say the least, overburdened because it has anointed itself with the responsibility of dealing with issues, though seemingly important, which leave it with less time to deal with the real hotspots that constitute the real threats to international peace and security. The balance between the General Assembly and the Council is only one of the dimensions of what needs to be addressed. We propose to raise these issues in the Ad Hoc Working Group.

The Assembly must have a greater say in the process of selection of the Secretary General. The continued circumscribing of the Assembly's role and responsibilities in the process of selection and appointment of the Secretary General needs to change in the interests of the United Nations system in general and the Assembly's prerogatives in particular. And, as it was the General Assembly which limited its own role, it will have to be the General Assembly that claws back its rightful place in the process of selecting the Secretary-General.

The Assembly and the other entities that form part of the UN system must reflect diplomatic best practices in its day to day functioning. And it has a lot to learn from member-states in this regard.

Mr. President,

In conclusion, let me re-emphasise the need to discuss substantive measures that would strengthen the role of General Assembly as the chief deliberative, legislative and policy-making and representative body of the international community.

The General Assembly can expect India's constructive support and participation in these efforts.

Thank You.
743. Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, on Agenda Item 116 - Follow-up to the Commemoration of the Two-hundredth Anniversary of the Abolition of the Transatlantic Slave Trade at the UNGA.

Mr. President,

I would like to thank the Secretary General for his report under the agenda item, "Follow-up to the commemoration of the two-hundredth anniversary of the abolition of the Transatlantic Slave Trade".

Mr. President,

Transatlantic slave trade is one of the most shameful chapters in human history.

The wrenching of people and their transportation away from their own people and homes to distant lands, across an ocean, makes every other atrocity committed in the history of mankind pale into insignificance.

The work of the United Nations can never be complete until we emphatically and without any reservation condemn the transatlantic slave trade. We firmly believe there should be a genuine sense of acceptance that these horrific crimes took place along with sincere repentance of the same.

It is also imperative that the international community takes upon itself the commitment to never let such crimes ever take place again. Additionally, at the level of the United Nations we must take all initiatives to ensure that future generations do not forget the grief and tragedy borne by the victims of slavery and the transatlantic slave trade.

The construction of a Permanent Memorial will be a fitting tribute of the United Nations to the millions of victims of the transatlantic slave trade. We are humbled and honoured to be part of the initiative to erect a Permanent Memorial.

Mr. President,
With our contribution of US $ 260,000/-, India is proud to be the lead contributor to the "United Nations Trust Fund for Partnerships - Permanent Memorial" for receiving contributions to erect the Permanent Memorial.

India's contribution is reflective of our firm belief that the international community must pay homage to the victims of slavery and the transatlantic slave trade.

The Trust Fund, however, as of date has only received a mere US $ 800,000. This falls significantly short of the anticipated expenditure of US $ 4.5 million for the construction of the Memorial.

It is, therefore, obvious that there is an imperative for the international community to actually come forward and contribute to this noble cause. We, therefore, strongly urge all countries, and especially those who benefited from the transatlantic slave trade, to come forth and generously contribute to show their earnest acceptance that wrongs were committed and there is a sense of repentance.

The international community cannot let the idea of this memorial just remain on its design board.

We also hope that the Committee which has been established to oversee the construction of the Permanent Memorial finalizes its Memorandum of Understanding with UNESCO at the earliest so that the international design competition for the Memorial could be launched as soon as possible.

Mr. President,

I would like to place on record India's support for the various activities and programmes undertaken by the Department of Public Information to commemorate the "International Day of Remembrance" every year on March 25.

We would also like to support the call for adequate, regular and predictable financial allocation to the Department of Public Information in organising these events in New York as well as in various countries through the network of the UN information centres.
Education has a critical role in creating awareness amongst present and future generations, about the history, causes and impact of slavery and the transatlantic slave trade. Its importance cannot be overemphasized.

Mr. President,

We are happy that the CARICOM has today introduced their draft resolution titled "Permanent memorial to and remembrance of the victims of slavery and the transatlantic slave trade". We have been co-sponsoring this resolution since 2007 and today I am happy to co-sponsor this resolution again.

Mr. President,

Let me conclude by quoting George Mason, one of the founding fathers of the United States, who said, "the augmentation of slaves weakens the states; and such a trade is diabolical in itself and disgraceful to mankind".

We have a chance to pay tribute to the victims who suffered this disgrace by openheartedly contributing to the Trust Fund.

This is, Mr. President, the least we can do.

Thank you.

✍️✍️✍️✍️✍️
Mr. President,

I have the honour to deliver this statement on behalf of the Asian Group on Agenda Item 124 entitled “Global Health and Foreign Policy”.

Let me begin by thanking the delegation of Thailand for preparing this statement on behalf of the Asian group and also the delegation of Pakistan for coordinating the same as the Chair of the Open Ended Working Group on “Enhancing the role of the Asian Group in the UN Affairs”.

Mr. President,

I would like to express our sincere appreciation to the Secretary-General for his efforts in preparing the report under this agenda item. The report contains a rich and very timely discussion on the increasing prominence and relevance of global health issues in the international and foreign policy agendas. Furthermore, it highlights and follows important developments on the synergies between these two policy arenas. It suggests that mutual benefits and strengthened global health responses can result when we explore ways to enhance policy coordination and coherence between global health and foreign policy.

Mr. President,

The Asian Group fully acknowledges that global health has always been and continues to be a pressing concern on the international agenda. In September of this year, the General Assembly convened a High Level Plenary Meeting of its sixty-fifth session on the Millennium Development Goals, which was attended by an impressive number of high level dignitaries from around the world. Throughout the course of the Summit, the international community was reminded of the important place occupied by health issues and the three health-related MDGs within the overall discussions on socio-economic.
Furthermore, the MDG Summit, and the outcome document in particular, also reaffirmed the interdependent nature of all the Millennium Development Goals, while underscoring that the best way to successfully accelerate achievement in any one MDG is through taking a holistic and comprehensive approach to all MDGs. Making progress on the health-related MDGs would therefore entail a multi-sectoral approach that places equal emphasis on the attainment of all the other goals ranging from poverty and hunger eradication, achieving universal primary education, promoting gender equality and the empowerment of women to promoting global partnership and achieving environmental sustainability, including necessary measures in the areas of safe water and sanitation.

In this regard, the Asian group supports "the Sustainable Sanitation; Five Year Drive" initiated by the United Nation Secretary-General's Advisory Board on Water and Sanitation (UNSGAB) as a follow up of the International Year of Sanitation 2008."

Among the health-related MDGs, a holistic and comprehensive approach is also pertinent and the Asian Group remains seriously concerned about the lack of progress, in particular, in ameliorating maternal, newborn and child health. In this respect, the Group welcomes the introduction of the Secretary-General's Global Strategy for Women's and Children's Health and expects the strategy to be implemented by a broad range of partners in a well harmonized and integrated manner.

Mr. President,

The MDG Summit served as a strong reminder for the international community that the promotion of global health cannot be achieved in isolation. Despite the earnest efforts of all countries to promote and protect the right of every person to enjoy the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health, substantial gaps persist. It has become all too clear that we must reinvigorate our efforts to strengthen our national health systems so that we may be better able to deliver equitable health outcomes. In this regard, we must continue to build sustainable health systems and strengthen national capacities to deliver comprehensive, accessible, affordable and quality healthcare, including through providing and strengthening comprehensive and affordable community-based primary health-care services so as to ensure a continuum from health promotion and disease prevention.

Hence, the role of foreign policy and international cooperation cannot be overemphasized, in particular the role of aid targeted towards the health sector, ODA-related commitments, North-South, South-South and triangular cooperation in support of national plans and strategies, as well as innovative sources of financing.

Furthermore, global health must be a priority consideration when dealing with trade issues. We must continue to promote universal access to medicines, fairer access to vaccines -- in particular in situations of pandemics -- and increasing global vaccine production capacity.

The Asian Group also welcomes all health related initiatives at national, regional and global levels supporting the global health agenda. In this regard, the Asian Group looks forward to the Second Global Forum on Human Resources for Health, during the Prince Mahidol Award Conference, in Bangkok, Thailand in 2011.

Mr. President,

The Asian Group is of the view that in-depth discussions are best left to competent health professionals. However, the positive and perhaps even catalytic political support for promoting such discussions with a view to concluding them can and oftentimes must come from the General Assembly.

In the past, numerous high level meetings on important global health concerns were convened at the General Assembly. These have duly highlighted the fact that global health concerns are not addressed merely by medical responses, but require sustained political will and effective international cooperation and partnership. In this regard, the Asian Group supports the General Assembly's continued engagement in global health concerns and looks forward to participating actively in the high level meetings currently being planned on the issue of non-communicable diseases as well as the United Nations Comprehensive HIV/AIDS Review in 2011.
Mr. President,

I wish to underline that a firm and collective commitment to global health is paramount to surmounting the multiple financial, economic and other crises and challenges that we face today and may face tomorrow. Considering that two of our members are part of the core group of seven "Oslo Group" countries behind the resolution being submitted under this agenda item today, I can assure you that the Asian Group stands ready to work closely with its partners in promoting global health around the world and looks forward to seeing the resolution adopted without a vote.

Mr. President,

In closing, allow me to say a few words in my national capacity on the progress made by India in the field of health. In 2005, we launched our flagship National Rural Health Mission, which continues to be perhaps one of the biggest interventions of its kind in the health sector in the world. This programme has helped us strengthen the public health infrastructure with the appointment of over 100,000 healthcare providers and over 700,000 trained community workers.

India is presently spending over US $ 3.5 billion each year on health services, with substantial expenditure on services aimed towards women's and children's health. Currently, India is focusing on strengthening its efforts in the 235 districts that account for nearly 70% of all infant and maternal deaths. We have also made commendable South-South cooperation in the field of public health. With our unique position as a source of cost-effective generic medicines, we are currently assisting many developing countries in ensuring easy and ready availability of affordable and quality vaccines and medicines to vulnerable people. We also call on all countries to support rather than hinder or create barrier to such legitimate efforts. We are also ready to provide technical assistance to other countries and share our experience in the field of public health.

In view of our commitment to global health, we are happy to co-sponsor the draft resolution "Global Health and Foreign Policy".

I thank you, Mr. President.
745. Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative, at the Annual High-Level Conference on the Central Emergency Response Fund at the 65th Session of the UNGA.

Madam Chair,

I would like to thank you for your strong leadership and OCHA for organizing this annual event.

I would also like to thank the Secretary General and you for update on CERF funded relief operations.

We are happy to note that CERF has been effective in mobilizing resources and implementing its mandate. In the short span of five years it has become a valuable and impartial tool for prompt and significant UN humanitarian action.

We are also happy to see Fund acquiring a greater profile and role in rapid response to humanitarian emergencies. CERF assistance this year was critical in the international response to the earthquake in Haiti and floods in Pakistan.

There is little doubt that with an increasing number of natural disasters requiring the help of the international community, the role of the Fund will become even more relevant in the coming years.

Madam Chair,

India accords the highest importance to the role of the United Nations in coordinating international emergency humanitarian assistance and of providing support to national authorities in responding to humanitarian emergencies. India also values the multilateral setting, voluntary and impartial nature of such humanitarian assistance adhering to humanitarian principles and international humanitarian law.

India has always been forthcoming in extending assistance to countries affected by humanitarian disasters. India contributed US Dollars Twenty Million to the UN for assistance to Pakistan earlier this year. And, in February, we contributed US Dollars Five Million for the Government of Haiti to meet its immediate needs in the aftermath of the earthquake. We have also joined Brazil and South Africa as part of our joint IBSA Trust Fund to establish a waste management project in Haiti. India has made a commitment of contributing US$1.5 million to CERF over a three-year period from 2009. In accordance with this we had contributed US$500,000 in 2009 and 2010. I am happy to announce that we will continue with our contribution of US$500,000 in 2011.

Thank you.

Statement by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri on the "IBSA - Joint Statement": Open Consultations on Enhanced Cooperation at the UN.

Mr. Chairman,

I am presenting this statement on behalf of India, Brazil and South Africa (IBSA).

2. Mr. Chairman, the IBSA is a coalition of three countries of the South, that is, India, Brazil and South Africa. This coalition was established in 2003 and is aimed at contributing to the construction of a new international order and for the three countries to coordinate, cooperate and convey the same message on pertinent global issues. In addition to the same vision, the IBSA countries share similar principles of democracy, multilateralism and the respect for international law. The Internet governance is one of the issues the IBSA countries have common interest in.

3. In April 2010, in Brasilia, the IBSA Heads of State highlighted the importance of “building a wide political concertation at international level for making the global Internet governance regime as multilateral, democratic and transparent as provided by the World Summit on Information Society”.

4. The IBSA countries recognize the importance of the democratization of Internet governance. The Tunis Agenda of 2005 recognizes the need for Enhanced Cooperation “to enable governments, on an equal footing, to carry out their roles and responsibilities, in international public policy issues pertaining to the Internet, but not in the day-to-day technical and operational matters, that do not impact on international public policy issues”. The purpose of enhanced cooperation is therefore to enable States to fulfill their roles and responsibilities in Internet governance - international Internet related public policy issues. Further, the process towards enhanced cooperation, was mandated to be started by the UN Secretary-General, "by the end of the first quarter of 2006, involving all stakeholders in their respective roles, and proceeding as quickly as possible consistent with legal process" as contained in para 71 of the Tunis Agenda. It has been almost five years since the Tunis Agenda had

5. Apart from technical aspects, the discussion on Internet governance has several critical public policy implications that necessitate the involvement of governments. These include among others, issues such as stability of the internet; interoperability; accessibility and openness (costs and human rights); specified first quarter of 2006 to begin Enhanced Cooperation. The need for Enhanced Cooperation has grown exponentially and become more urgent since 2005 owing to the rapid expansion of the internet and its growing impact on public policy and other issues. Therefore, the IBSA views this consultation as long-overdue, yet opportune, to initiate the process towards enhanced cooperation as stated in paragraphs 68, 69 and 71 of the Tunis Agenda.

5. Apart from technical aspects, the discussion on Internet governance has several critical public policy implications that necessitate the involvement of governments. These include among others, issues such as stability of the internet; interoperability; accessibility and openness (costs and human rights); network neutrality; access to knowledge and the balanced approach between openness, security and privacy aspects of the Internet; cyber security and the ICTs (as they relate to the Internet) and development nexus. A central issue in Internet governance is the management of Critical Internet Resources. Although there is a positive movement towards improving transparency and accountability in the activities of the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers (ICANN), its legal status remains problematic. The fact that only one country, instead of the international community of States, is the provider and guarantor of the management of names and numbers of the Internet in all countries contravenes established UN principles and universally accepted tenets of multilateralism.

6. Unfortunately, these issues are yet to be discussed among UN Member States in depth from a public policy point of view due to the absence of an intergovernmental platform mandated to systematically discuss them and make decisions as appropriate. It is thus necessary for governments to be provided a formal platform under the U.N that is mandated to discuss these issues. Such a platform would also complement the Internet Governance Forum, a multi-stakeholder forum for discussing, sharing experiences and networking on Internet governance.

7. The IBSA believes that this platform once identified and established will allow the international community to accomplish the developmental objectives of the Tunis Agenda, including inter alia paragraph 65 of the Tunis Agenda that expresses the "the need to maximize the participation of developing countries in decisions regarding Internet governance, which should reflect their interests, as well as in development and capacity building". It would also allow for meaningful implementation of para 89 of the Tunis Agenda which emphasizes the need "to improve international, regional and national connectivity and affordable access to ICTs and information through an enhanced international cooperation of all stakeholders that promotes technology exchange and technology transfer, human resource development and training, thus increasing the capacity of developing countries to innovate and to participate fully in, and contribute to, the Information Society". Operationalizing Enhanced Cooperation will also enable the Internet to realize its well-recognized potential as a powerful tool for development and poverty reduction, and of achieving the Internationally Agreed Development Goals including the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs).

8. Keeping in view the urgency and importance of establishing such a platform, the IBSA countries reiterate the need to ensure that the present consultations result in a clear roadmap for operationalizing Enhanced Cooperation. In this context, we would like to propose that an inter-governmental working group be established under the UN Commission on Science and Technology for Development (CSTD), the focal point in the UN system-wide follow-up to the outcomes of WSIS. The Working Group should be mandated to prepare a report on the possible institutional design for enhanced cooperation in consultation with all stakeholders, and asked to submit its report to the UN General Assembly in 2011. The Working Group should also take on board inputs from all international organizations including the ITU, and should recommend on the feasibility and desirability of placing the Enhanced Cooperation mechanism within an existing international organization or recommend establishing a new body for dealing with Enhanced Cooperation.

9. In order to allay any misgivings about a so-called "UN takeover" of Internet governance, the IBSA reaffirms its commitment to the stability and security of the Internet as a global facility based on the full participation of all stakeholders, from both developed and developing countries, within their respective roles and responsibilities in line with paragraph 35 of the Tunis Agenda.

10. The IBSA urges the UN Secretary General to continue the process of consultations with Member States and all stakeholders with a view to facilitating forward movement towards operationalizing Enhanced Cooperation.

747 Statement by Ambassador Manjeev Singh Puri, Deputy Permanent Representative, during the Commemorative Meeting on the occasion of the Fiftieth Anniversary of The Adoption of the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and peoples on behalf of Asian Group, at the UNGA.

Madam President,

I have the honor to deliver this statement on behalf of the Asian Group and would like to express appreciation of all members of the Asian Group to you for taking this initiative to organize this meeting on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

I wish to place on record my appreciation to the delegation of Pakistan as chair of our open ended working group on coordinating such statements for having done in this case too.

In the late 1940s when many countries in Asia were emerging from the dark shadow of colonial rule, the cardinal importance of independence from colonial rule was highlighted like never before. Indeed, birth of Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) also echoed this sentiment.

Madam President,

The Charter provisions on Non-Self Governing Territories were given a new thrust when this august body adopted the landmark 1960 Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples. Many Asian countries were co-sponsors of the Declaration. The Declaration solemnly proclaimed the necessity of bringing to a speedy and unconditional end, colonialism in all its forms and manifestations. The right of peoples under alien subjugation, domination and exploitation, to freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development was recognized as a result of these initiatives in which Asian countries were at the forefront.
The following year, the Special Committee on the Implementation of the Declaration on Decolonization was established to study, investigate and recommend action to bring an end to colonialism. India was elected the first Chairman of the Decolonization Committee. As members of the Committee of 24, as it came to be called, Asian countries have ceaselessly struggled for an end to colonialism.

Today, the majority of the membership of the UN comprises former colonies; this is clearly a measure of the success of the historic struggle against colonial rule. The fact that today, fewer than 2 Million people live under colonial rule in remaining 16 Non-Self-Governing Territories when compared to 750 Million in 1945 is a testimony to the efforts to this august body and of the crucial role of the Declaration.

Madam President,

Asian countries have supported numerous resolutions in the UN fora on decolonization. For coming generations, colonialism may be a part of history: new challenges of tomorrow have to be faced. However, it was the struggle against colonialism, successfully waged in solidarity by the Asian countries, which has brought them to a stage where they can set the goals of economic and social development for their societies.

It should be our common endeavour to work with the people of the remaining non-self-governing territories to realise what they perceive to be in their best interest. They should be given an opportunity to determine this freely from a well-informed standpoint. The way ahead must be a judicious mix of urgency and activism on the one hand, and on the other, one of sensitivity and circumscription, that takes into account, first and foremost, the needs of the people of the Territories and their special circumstances.

Today, as we commemorate the Fiftieth anniversary of the adoption of the Declaration, let us re-dedicate ourselves to the cherished ideals of freedom, democracy, human rights, dignity and peaceful co-existence, while also reaffirming our commitment to achieve the goal of decolonization to which, we are as member of the UN family, have subscribed.
Madam President

Please allow me also to say a few words in my national capacity coming as I am from the land of Mahatma Gandhi, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru two of the tallest leaders among tall leaders fought against colonialism and the right of the need of justice for all.

Given that we are a country which experienced colonialism, and earned independence through a non-violent struggle in the exercise of its right of self-determination, India has always supported the legitimate right of peoples to self-determination and its application to peoples under colonial or alien domination an adopted under the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples.

I thank you Madam President.

748. Intervention by Ambassador Hardeep Singh Puri, Permanent Representative, at the informal meeting (closed) of the plenary on the Intergovernmental Negotiations on the Question of Equitable Representation on and Increase in the Membership of the Security Council and Other Matters Related to the Council.

Mr. Chairman,

Let me begin by welcoming the decision of Ambassador Zahir Tanin, the Chair of the intergovernmental negotiations on Security Council reform for his decision to convene this meeting today. His letter of 24 November has encouraged and provided us with a faint ray of hope on the way ahead and possibly some light at the end of the tunnel.

The time for decisive action is at hand.

The UN membership has been in intergovernmental negotiations since March 2009. With each passing day, the distressing realization that an unreformed Security Council reflecting the realities of 1945 and the "to the victor belong the spoils" approach continues. This is so only because there is a perception that there are some member-states that do not want to reform the Organization and the Council because they themselves lack the confidence to make a bid for permanent membership.

We have repeatedly stressed that reform of the Security Council is necessary in order to align it with today's 21st century realities and to bring to the table large unrepresented parts of the world-Africa, Latin America and the Caribbean, Asia, the Small Island Developing States and others.

Even more unacceptable, in my delegation's view, is the lethargy which in turn reflects not the position of the member-states but the cynical perception of those who view the status quo as serving their own interests.

An eleven member Council with five permanent members in 1945 at a time when the UN membership was just above 50 cannot claim to be the legitimate and linear progenitor of today's 15 member Council with the same set of P5 in the midst of a UN membership that has quadrupled in the last six decades.

Mr. Chairman,

At the outset, I would like to align myself with the statement made by Ambassador Raymond Wolfe, PR of Jamaica on behalf of the L.69 Group.

As you are well aware, the L.69 is a group of UN member-states that comprises a diverse group of countries from Africa, Latin America and the Caribbean, Asia and the Pacific. Today's statement by the L.69 Group is a game changer for the reform process as it reaches out to various countries by incorporating the aspirations of our brothers from Africa, Latin America and the Caribbean, Asia, the Small Island Developing States. The core message of the L.69 Group is the call for comprehensive reform of the Council which has as its central element an expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories of membership. Also it provides the contours of what a final settlement would look like.
My delegation calls for a much shorter text amenable to real negotiations that does not exceed two or three pages. This text should first and foremost capture the prevailing and unchallenged sense of this august assembly, namely, the urgent need for expansion in both permanent and non-permanent categories of membership of the UN Security Council.

Those who differ should feel encouraged to put their own proposals into the text. Not doing so could result in their missing the boat.

We are confident that Ambassador Zahir Tanin will be able to produce such a shorter text by the middle of January 2011.

Mr. Chairman,

India’s position on Security Council reform is too well known to require reiteration. In both our individual capacity, and as a member of two groupings devoted to early reform of the Council, namely the G4 and the L69, India would like to mention the elements that need to be in the negotiation text.

First, the overwhelming majority of UN member-states have expressed their clear preference for expansion of the Council in both its permanent and non-permanent categories.

Second, the shorter text should faithfully reflect the convergence regarding expanding the Security Council to 25/26. This must include an expansion in the permanent category from the present 5 to 11, with the addition by name of two new permanent seats from Africa, two new permanent seats from Asia, one new permanent seat from the Latin American and Caribbean region and one new permanent seat from the WEOG countries. The non-permanent category must be expanded from the present 10 to 14/15 with the addition of one new non-permanent seat each for the Asian, East European, GRULAC states and one/two non-permanent seats for the African states taking into account the need to ensure representation from developing countries, including small island developing states, wherein participation shall be on the basis of the concept of rotating seats.

Third, new permanent members shall have the same rights and obligations as the current permanent members. However, if some of the new permanent members decide not to enforce their veto right till such a time as a comprehensive review is undertaken, they should be allowed to do so. This would of course be without prejudice to the proportionate changes in the minimum numbers needed to take decisions on matters other than the procedural ones in the reformed Council. This also does not however preclude from the immediacy of the task at hand, namely for restricting or limiting the use of the veto under certain circumstances such as: genocide, crimes against humanity and serious violations of international humanitarian law; war crimes, ethnic cleansing and terrorism.

Fourth, India associates itself with the growing clamour for early reform of working methods of the Council.

Fifth, India calls for the General Assembly and the Security Council as two principal organs of the UN to respect each other's distinct roles, in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Charter, so as to secure the effective functioning of the UN as a whole.

And finally, there must be a comprehensive review after a period of fifteen years during which the entire structure of the Security Council would need to be revisited.

Mr. Chairman,

In conclusion, we are both ready and willing to reach out to other countries and to work in close cooperation with them towards the goal of achieving urgent reform of the Council in keeping with the changing realities of the current times.

Let me assure you and the rest of the UN membership of our willingness to remain constructive and reasonably flexible on all issues on the table in the months to come and urge other delegations to do likewise.

Thank you.
Madam President,

I would like to thank you for organising this important open debate on Sexual Violence and Conflict in the broader context of the discourse on Women, Peace and Security.

There is a saying that all that is necessary for evil to continue is for good men to do nothing.

My delegation believes that the community of nations must ensure that the human rights of all are respected. Universal respect for human rights is, in our view, the basis of the common and better future that we seek to build.

The weakest, Madam President, are the biggest victims of conflict and as the Secretary General points out in his report, women continue to suffer appallingly in conflicts around the world.

Sexual violence is, according to the report, not merely a consequence of conflict but a driver. It perpetuates conflict and locks its victims into a vicious cycle of violence and oppression.

The international community has not just the responsibility, but the obligation to do its utmost to ensure the security of women and children, to ensure that they are not handicapped in any respect and that every possible effort is made to create conditions where they can realize their potential.

Madam President,

Two important strands of international concern converge in this debate. These are the struggle to empower women and the constant endeavor of the United Nations to preserve peace and international security.

The struggle to empower women has moved from declaratory resolutions to a more comprehensive approach. The 1995 Beijing Declaration and Platform of Action, the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), the Commission on Status of Women have been milestones in this journey.

I was myself pro-actively involved in the final stages of the critical negotiations that led to the creation of UN WOMEN. We have, indeed, very high expectations from this entity as women's empowerment and gender equality are among our key national development priorities.

No country can be absolved from the responsibility of acting against sexual violence, one of the more abhorrent forms of violence against women. My delegation is therefore committed to the creation and augmentation of international regimes that furthers these objectives.

The proceedings of the Council today will build upon and add to the edifice that has been created by UNSC Resolutions 1325, 1612, 1820, 1882 and 1888. These resolutions and other associated decisions of the UN Security Council on inter alia Sexual Violence, Children and Protection of Civilians have led to a significant accretion in the corpus of international law. We also welcome the appointment of Ms. Margot Wallstrom as SRSG for Sexual Violence in Conflict.

Madam President,

The resolve of the international community in the area of Sexual Violence in Conflict has also oriented the operational and peacekeeping activities of the United Nations towards recognizing the plight of women and children in conflict areas and to be proactive in working towards preventing violence against them.

India supports these developments. These are, however, first steps towards ensuring that no woman lives in fear, even if we cannot ensure that she is free from want.

The Resolution that is being adopted today, and which we have co-sponsored, will add a number of new dimensions to the ongoing work in this area.

The provenance of the concepts that have been introduced in the resolution today is the structure that has been created in respect of Children in Armed Conflict.
While the objectives of this framework are laudable, its implementation remains and will remain work in progress for some time. As a delegation that will join the Security Council in January 2011 we will remain seriously engaged with both the evolution of the normative side and its implementation.

The Monitoring and Reporting Mechanism, in particular, which is to provide the data on the basis of which this system is to operate needs close supervision by the Member States to also ensure its veracity and credibility.

The process of data collection and analysis and that of listing and de-listing should also be carried out in a transparent and judicious manner under the close supervision of Member States.

Madam President,

It is not enough for the Security Council to mandate. It must make available the resources that are required to implement the ambitious legislative framework that it has created. UN peacekeeping missions and peacekeepers in the ground are being asked to do more and more with less and less.

The resolution that is being adopted today is a case in point. While the decision of the Council will expand the scope of peacekeeping mandates, no cognizance is taken of the fact that resources to implement the existing mandates are already inadequate.

Accountability must be established for those who mandate but do not provide resources.

Being the largest troop contributing country in UN history, with more than 100,000 peacekeepers in 40 UN missions, India has perhaps more experience than most in implementing Security Council mandates. It is, indeed, Indian troops along with the peacekeepers of fellow TCCs, who convert the intent of this Council into deed.

We take great pride in the stellar record of our peacekeepers, both men and women, in the protection of women, children and the weak.

The Council has been briefed that Indian troops have apprehended some of the principal culprits behind the recent sexual violence in MONUSCO.
We can do much more if more troops are deployed, if more resources, capacities and enablers are made available. It is a matter of concern that the Council is unable to address these deficits.

Martin Luther King once said that "Injustice anywhere diminishes justice everywhere." My delegation believes that the perpetrators of these crimes must be brought to justice. We believe that the national capacities to adjudicate and to punish must be strengthened and supported to ensure that justice is done and the guilty punished.

Madam President,

My delegation is of the view that the UN Secretariat and the Funds and Programmes can do more. We have consistently held the view that greater participation of women in the areas of conflict prevention, peace negotiations, peace keeping and post conflict reconstruction is an essential pre-requisite for lasting peace and security.

Today’s resolution identifies Women Protection Advisors as key components of the implementation strategy. We support this concept. We believe that Advisors need to have direct and relevant experience and would be happy to contribute personnel who have what would be required to be effective.

I would also like, at this point, to state that we value the contributions of Civil Society in this arena. We look forward to working with them in taking this common agenda forward.

Madam President,

I belong to the Sikh faith. Four centuries ago, Guru Gobind Singh, at a time when conditions in India were unstable and conflict-ridden, ordered us to treat women captured in battle with the greatest respect. This is the Indian ethos in respect of women, particularly during situations of conflict. This is what we are committed to and this is what we will uphold.

Thank You.

Madam President,

I would like to thank you for scheduling today’s debate on the situation in Afghanistan. We are grateful for the latest report of the Secretary-General and are appreciative of the briefing by the SRSG Staffan de Mistura. We also thank Ambassador Zahir Tanin, PR of Afghanistan for his statement.

Madam President,

I join others in expressing our sincere condolences on passing away of Mr. Richard Holbrooke, US Special Envoy to Afghanistan and Pakistan. An accomplished diplomat, Mr. Holbrooke served his country and the cause of international peace and security with great distinction in difficult conditions in various parts of the world. He will be missed by us all.

As the year draws to a close, today’s meeting offers us a timely opportunity to comprehensively review the goals and commitments that we have been able to achieve and fulfill in Afghanistan and the tasks that remained unaccomplished so far on the long road to lasting peace, prosperity and stability in Afghanistan.

The overarching objective of the efforts of the international community has been to create an enabling environment for the Afghan government to eventually assume full responsibility and take charge of its own destiny. The London Conference in January, the Kabul Conference in July and the Parliamentary elections in September have been significant political milestones in this direction.

The Kabul Conference marked the beginning of Kabul process - a new phase in the partnership of the Afghan Government and international community. I am happy to note that the focus of the Kabul process has now shifted from planning towards implementation and delivery, an important step on the road to transition to greater Afghan ownership. The UNSG’s latest report also highlights that a framework for detailing of implementation plans for the short and medium terms of all the 22 national priority programmes has been put in place.

The holding of national assembly elections, despite threats by Taliban and other illegal armed groups in September, 2010, has been an important step in the consolidation of the democratic framework in Afghanistan. We are particularly encouraged by the robust participation and campaigning by around 2500 candidates, including 396 women in these elections. We hope the uncertainty regarding the results of the elections is settled sooner rather than later.

In our shared pursuit of sustained and tangible improvements in security, governance and development, the unity of purpose of efforts is indeed imperative to enhance the efficiency and over all coordination of the international community’s presence in Afghanistan.

I am pleased to note that UNAMA is assuming a greater role in generating a coherent approach to coordinate donor assistance and the alignment of Provincial Reconstruction Teams, donors and other implementation partners to the government led processes including at the sub-national level. I could not agree more with the observation in the UNSG’s report that ‘as the process of transition to full Afghan leadership and ownership advances, both the Government and the international community should be guided by realities rather than schedules’.

Madam President,

We need to guard against the impulses to consider the peace process as a short-cut to facilitate transition. Going down this path without respecting the ‘redlines’ for the process laid out at the London Conference and endorsed at the Kabul Conference would risk Afghanistan sliding back to becoming a safe haven for terrorists and extremist groups.

The international community must bear in mind the lessons learnt from past experiences at negotiating with fundamentalist and extremist organizations and ensure that the process must remain Afghan-led, inclusive and transparent.
India supports Afghan Government's efforts to reintegrate those individuals who abjure violence, give up armed struggle, do not have links with terrorist groups, and are willing to abide by the values of democracy, pluralism and human rights as enshrined in the Afghan Constitution.

As the ISAF prepares to gradually withdraw from Afghanistan, there is a need for adequate capacity building of Afghan security forces, along with adequate enablers, prior to the transition of security responsibility to them. The necessity of dealing with the terrorist sanctuaries and safe havens beyond Afghanistan borders is equally important in this context. Adequate capacity of the Afghan security forces and other Afghan institutions is a sine qua non for protecting Afghanistan's sovereignty, plurality and democracy.

Security and stabilization of Afghanistan will remain a distant goal unless we are able to isolate and root out the syndicate of terrorism, which includes elements of Al Qaeda, Taliban, LeT and other terrorist and extremist groups operating from within and outside Afghanistan's borders.

As we discuss today, though we appreciate the gains made in southern provinces of Kandahar and Helmand against Taliban strongholds, it is worrisome that deterioration in the security environment, especially in the North has been a continuous trend this year. The UNSG report notes that there has been a 66% increase in security incidents in Afghanistan as compared to the same period in 2009.

Madam President,

Afghanistan's stability and economic development depend a lot on its neighbours and the region as a whole. Afghanistan's greatest economic potential perhaps resides in its immense potential as a trade, transport and energy hub, and as a bridge linking Central, West and South Asia, given Afghanistan's traditional cultural and economic moorings in South Asia.

Growing economic inter-dependence will also help in weaning disaffected youth away from insurgency and militancy and in promoting regional cooperation. We support the wishes of the Government of Afghanistan to take the lead in this direction.

In India's efforts towards stabilization of Afghanistan, the focus has been on developmental and humanitarian work to assist the Afghan people as they build a peaceful, stable, democratic and pluralistic nation. We have sought to assist Afghanistan within our means. Our US $ 1.3 billion assistance programme is aimed at building infrastructure, capacity building in critical areas of governance, health, education, agriculture etc. and in generating Afghan capacity and employment.

Madam President,

At the dawn of New Year, it is our earnest hope that the international community would remain steadfast in its commitment in supporting Afghanistan. Enhanced synergy and coherence of efforts of the international community are critical in creating an enabling environment which facilitates transition to greater Afghan ownership and puts Afghanistan firmly on road to peace, progress and stability. We support the good work done by UNAMA.

Thank you
